出 版 说 明

法律出版社作为法律专业出版机构，我们一直致力于寻找一部简明实用的法律英语辞书奉献给法学界和法律界人士。

《牛津现代法律用语词典》就是一本再恰当不过的工具书。它涉及法律专业英语写作中的诸多方面内容，如法律术语和特殊惯例；单词构成、时态、拼写和发音；标点和字体等。当然，并不是每一个词条都包括上述方面，而是根据需要，有详有略。法律专业英语写作从纠正语法错误到构建法律论点，再到区分相似但却不同的法律英语术语的过程中，常常遇到许多棘手的难题，这些难题在这部词典中都有权威的解答。不仅如此，作者还精细而准确地阐释了那些深奥难懂的法律术语，并且使之简单明了；着意强调语法和用词中的细微差别，对容易混淆和出错的地方一一做了详细比较。为了便于查阅，所有条目均按字母顺序编排。正如作者在前言中所说，其宗旨是让法律英语写作者"在拿不准某个词或某语法点时，能很方便地在手头得到详细的解答"。

熟悉第一版的读者会注意到我已经增加了几千条新的说明性引文，这反映了我在写作方法上所作的重大改变。

也许我欠人情最多的是格拉斯哥的 David M. Walker 和达拉斯的 Beverly Ray Burlingame。这些优秀的学者阅读了本书第一稿的全部内容并在空白处写下了详细的评论。我认为本书几乎每一页内容的改进都包含着他们付出的劳动。

我所创立的关注现代法律语言用法的 H. W. Fowler 协会的会员为词目提供了许多例子,出了不少主意。最值得注意的是 John W. Velz,他是奥斯汀市得克萨斯大学的名誉教授,一位伟大的莎士比亚学家,诚心诚意地给我寄来几百条"词语拾遗"。如果不是他,这些词条就不会在词典中出现了,如 wile away 和 wreckless。

我非常感谢我的妻子 Teo,在我艰难写作时她给予我全部的支持。1981 年,在我到法学院的第一周,我告诉了她撰写这本书的计划——当时我甚至告诉了她书的名字——但她并没有嘲笑我。的确,是她给了我鼓励。就在那一周我们谈定了终身,她看着我在 3×5 的卡片上开始了这项工作。到了第二年,卡片已经堆成了山。在 1981 年到 1987 年之间,她支持我,看着这本书梦想成真,本书第一版和第二版的许多词条都因她博学的评价而受益。

1921 年，美国律师协会杂志登载一篇文章，呼吁出版一本“法律英语写作”的书，[①]作者 Urban A. Lavery 指出，律师查阅的语法和作文方面的书籍，连他们查阅的法律书籍的百分之一也没有。但是，正如该文作者所言，当需要使用令人信服的论据或者清晰的表达方式的时候，良好的写作基础通常比罗列一堆案例更重要。[②] 自 Lavery 表明其观点起，出版了很多“法律英语写作”的书，但这些书总是涉及面窄或不能让读者一看便解决法律英语写作中出现的语法和体例方面的问题。本书的目的就是弥补这方面的不足。

话、特别的习惯表达方式、语法特点，而有些新词即便是在当今最新最全的词典里也难找到。这些语言学上的事情，通常很少被律师和法学教授讨论，但是，这却是他们口头和书面法律表达的一部分，新入门的律师们则每天吸收这些东西，并且无意识地学习使用它们。这种吸取语言过程中的偶然性常常导致矛盾的、多变的语言习惯，需要对此进行规范、说明，在有些情况下需要加以理顺。

基于法律语言的这种现状——发展过程、使用上的挑战、吸取方式——本书则致力于三个主要方面。

首先，帮助律师们跨越法律语言的沼泽。过去，每个想得到这方面指导的人，最后得到的都是一般性的写作手册。这本词典不敢妄称全面，但它提供了数百条具体的使用要点。因为律师写的都是较正式的文书，词典中建议的语法和用法都相对保守。写作中出现的失误会引起有知识的读者的恼怒和迷惑，影响法律写作的说服力。但这里所说的保守是一种开明的保守主义，既不无谓地反对语言的既成事实，也不无视语言的发展和变化。

其次，词典涵盖了许多只有受过法律教育（训练）的人在写作中才会碰到的问题，这在普通写作指南中是不会涉及的。当然，它肯定要包括写作的一般性原则，但首要的是指出早已存在却未被记录的法律和非法律用法的分歧，因此，该词典既服务于律师也服务于非律师人员，因为它可以在可能的范围内成为一座桥梁，跨越二者之间的鸿沟。近年来，律师们越来越认识到简洁、直白的语言的重要性，并致力于这方面的努力。的确，简单、明确——优秀的写作必备的两个标准贯穿这部词典，以尽力改变法律术语的艰涩和带有炫耀意味的行话。

再次，在一定程度上，本词典也可以作为进行改革的工具。在律师和法官不准确或者模棱两可地（或者确实是错误地）使用术语时，它可以提供标准，强调而不是抹杀有价值的细微差别。对法律而言，语言的精确是至关重要的，任何含混不清（除非是有意的）都是不能容忍的。考虑这些因素，该词典寻求保留大量法律词汇的区别，致力于重要语法用法和传统习语，避免任何对已有区别的混淆。当然，不可能有法律写作方面的万灵药，因而，该词典力求培养法律写作者对文章的美感，促使他们更多地考虑在上下文中什么是有效的。

法方面的词典则不必如此，除非是收集在词典编纂上值得注意的用法。无论何时，范例总是要说明缘由的，对此，讲明来源，而不是引用事件的背景，因此，在范例之后所引判例的来龙去脉并未交代。

编写这样一部词典是一项很危险的工作，因为让某个人接受使用的裁判，把自己的文章放在读者的放大镜下，读者一定会发现这样或那样的瑕疵。这也是《现代英语用法词典》作者 H. W. Fowler 的命运。他的词典既是我学习的榜样，也是借鉴的教训。因此，对这部词典中的任何失误，我都准备事先承担全部责任。

Edmund S. C. Weiner，卓有成就的牛津词典编纂家和 Martin S. Stanford，纽约声名卓著、颇有创见的编辑，详细地阅读了全部手稿并且作了很多改进。我特别对这两位学者表示感谢，同时，我也对我的父亲，Gary T. Garner 博士表示感谢，他花费了很多时间阅读校样。

最后，我无法对我的爱妻充分地表达我的感谢之情，谨以本书献给她，因为她敏锐的洞察力和在面对当初看来似乎是太过于野心勃勃的计划时给予我的坚定不移的支持。

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

Although there is much new material in this second edition, little need be said by way of introduction. I therefore confine this space to a word about citations and a listing of my literary debts.

Readers familiar with the first edition will note that I have added several thousand new illustrative quotations, with full citations. This represents a significant change in approach.

When writing the first edition, I omitted citations for four reasons. First, I was following the model of H.W. Fowler's Modern English Usage (1926), which simply quotes sentences from anonymous sources. (His earlier work, The King's English (1906), which he cowrote with his brother, F.G., named sources such as The Times but gave no detailed citation.) Second, because the quotations merely reflected what I was reading at the time, they came predominantly from judicial opinions issued by Texas courts and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit; having just completed a Fifth Circuit clerkship as I finished the manuscript in 1985, I thought it would not be particularly gracious of me, in a work of this kind, to cite a disproportionately high percentage of Fifth Circuit opinions. Third, as I had begun practicing law in Texas, it seemed imprudent to cite the work of judges before whom I might appear. Finally, the lawyers' briefs from which I drew quotations did not lend themselves to citation.

Although I still quote briefs without citing them, other sources are now fully cited. Why? I now think it helpful to show sources—helpful both legally and lexicographically—so I reject Fowler's approach. Further, the citations in this second edition represent a breadth that was unattainable for the first edition, so I am satisfied that the sources from Texas and surrounding states are only slightly overrepresented, if at all. Finally, I am satisfied that the lexicographic value of citations outweighs the risk of offending someone who has written something that might offend against the language.

I have tried to be dispassionate in my approach to citations. This means, for example, that I have unfavorably cited my own work (see bequest), the work of my grandfather (see feoff (C)), and the work of my mentor, Charles Alan Wright (see disinterested). Of course, in Wright's case, there must be 100 other instances in which I quote him favorably.

One more thing about citations. I collected many of them before 1991, when the Bluebook began to require first names for authors of books and articles. This caused me no end of needless work, but there were finally a few elusive citations for which neither I nor my research assistants—nor, indeed, my allies in law libraries—could fill in the blanks. In those few instances, I made concessions to the shortness of life and followed the pre-1991 Bluebook form.

Readers will find that this edition is much enriched with quotations not only from cases, but also from books and other sources. The shame is that it is not more enriched than it is, for in January 1991 a small lexicographic catastrophe occurred—an event that will no doubt bedevil me for as long as I care about lexicography. That month, I arranged to ship some 40 lawbooks from my office at the University of Texas to the American office of the Oxford Dictionary Department. These books had been thoroughly marked up for excerpting thousands of illustrative quotations, and they represented several years of work. Mysteriously these books—which were to be returned to me for use in preparing this edition—disappeared. They have never been accounted for. And the work that went into marking them can probably never be duplicated.

That loss, though, has been greatly outweighed by the tremendous help I have received from dozens of friends and colleagues. My debts are vast. I must merely list them as an insolvent debtor might do, in schedule form. Some of these friends have simply sent me comments and suggestions without my ever having met them face to face. Others I have known for many years, and I merely prevailed upon them to look over several entries within their areas of expertise; luckily for me, no one ever seemed prevailed upon—in fact, quite the opposite. They have all helped in splendid ways:

Mark G. Yudof

If I've omitted anyone, as I must have, my apologies.

Perhaps my vastest debts are to David M. Walker, of Glasgow, and Beverly Ray Burlingame, of Dallas. These fine scholars read the whole of my first draft and gave detailed comments in the margins. I doubt that there is a page in the book that hasn't been improved by their work.

Law librarians have repeatedly come to my aid. I've received the most help from Roy M. Mersky and his staff at the Tarlton Law Library in Austin. David Gunn in particular has generously run down countless sources for me, with uncommon skill and verve. Likewise, the Southern Methodist University Law Library has been extremely helpful. I cannot overstate how important it was to my research when the director, Gail Daly, gave me two card catalogues for storing lexicographic cards. (That may sound quaint in the age of computers, but index cards remain indispensable to lexicographers everywhere.) Finally, Barbara Tearle and R.G. Logan of the Bodleian Law Library, in Oxford, kindly helped me track down some sources that were otherwise inaccessible. As you might guess, I have never met a law librarian I didn't like.

I'm grateful to Dean Paul Rogers of S.M.U. Law School for allocating research-assistant funds that made it possible for me to have all quotations and citations verified. I don't know another dean who would extend this courtesy to a former faculty member, but S.M.U. is a special place.

I've benefited enormously from the teaching I've done in continuing legal education, primarily through LawProse, Inc. From my LawProse colleagues—Betty S. Flowers and John R. Trimble, both English professors at the University of Texas at Austin—I have learned a great deal. Many of the new entries show the influence they have had on me: from Betty I have learned more about the writing process, and from John I have learned more about effective editing. John has also contributed useful terminology, such as "miscues," and is largely responsible for my about-face on the subject of contractions.

I've also learned from the thousands of lawyers who have participated in LawProse workshops on legal writing and legal drafting. Through questions and comments, many of these participants have given me a deeper understanding of specific legal-linguistic issues.

The members of the H.W. Fowler Society—a loose organization I founded in order to monitor modern usage—have contributed dozens of examples and ideas for headwords. Most notably, John W. Velz, a great Shakespearean scholar and professor emeritus of English at the University of Texas at Austin, has faithfully sent me hundreds of so-called gleanings. I would not have entries such as the ones on wile away and wreckless if it weren't for him.

This edition owes much to Claude Conyers and Nancy Hoagland of Oxford University Press. Time and again, Claude approved my requests for extraordinary assistance of one kind or another. And Nancy is the author's dream of what a production editor should be: perfectionist and highly proprietary in her approach to the book, but respectful on those rare occasions when I perversely resisted her improvements.

I am much indebted to my wife, Teo, for all her support while I've labored over this book. During my first week of law school in 1981, I told her of my plan to write it—I even told her the name of it—and she didn't laugh. Indeed, she encouraged me. We also became engaged that week, and she saw me beginning the work on 3-by-5 cards, which in the coming years accumulated in mountainous piles. Between 1981 and 1987, she supportively watched the book materialize, and many entries have benefited—both in the first edition and in this one—from her fine scholarly judgment.

When DMLU came out in 1987, our daughter Caroline had just been born some six months earlier. There is a funny photograph of her sitting beside the one-foot-tall pile of manuscript. Now she is eight, and her sister, Alexandra, is three; meanwhile, the manuscript pile has doubled in size. As my girls continue to grow, I'm rather hoping that DMLU has reached its full maturity. But I somehow doubt it.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

In 1921, an article in the American Bar Association Journal called for a book on "writing legal English."[1] The author of that article, Urban A. Lavery, pointed out that lawyers rarely consult a book on grammar or composition even once to the hundred of times they consult lawbooks; and yet, as he observed, when convincing argument is to the fore, or clearness of expression is desired, the elements of good writing are often more important than piled up citations of cases.[2] Since Lavery proclaimed his judgment, many books on "writing legal English" have been published, but none with the broad scope or easy accessibility that might allow readers to resolve at a glance the many grammatical and stylistic questions that arise in legal writing. Filling that gap is the goal of this book.

Anglo-American law has a language of its own, consisting in a vocabulary with an unusually large number of foreign phrases, archaic words and expressions, terms of art, and argot words. Its formal style reflects the dignity and solemnity with which the profession views its mission. These distinctive qualities of legal language—evident alike in the speech and the writing of lawyers—are well enough documented. What has remained uncollected and unscrutinized in any systematic way is the vast body of legal usage.

For a specialist language, the language of law remains remarkably variable, largely because it has been incompletely recorded and mapped. In this respect it is analogous to English before 18th-century grammarians attempted to reduce its variability and make logical its many quiddities. This is not to say, of course, that the language of the law has the malleable capacity of Elizabethan English, which, in the hands of a creative genius like Shakespeare, could be supremely expressive and evocative. Quite the opposite. Stare decisis remains at the core of our system of law—so much so that the continual search for precedents often discourages legal writers from straying beyond precisely how things have been said before. As a result, many locutions have become fossilized in legal language over generations. And the inheritors of that language cannot always distinguish mere form from necessary substance, to the extent that form and substance are ever separable.

Legal traditionalists may be justified in not wanting to throw over too readily what has long served well. Yet tradition alone is not sufficient reason for retaining outmoded forms of language. Modern legal writers must strike a difficult balance in the quest to simplify legal English. They should not cling perversely to archaic language, which becomes less comprehensible year hy year, for its own sake. Nor should they seek to jettison every word or phrase that bears the stamp of legal tradition.

As for students of law, they learn the technical language that they will need—the quirks of legal jargon, the peculiar idiomatic expressions, the grammatical idiosyncrasies, the neologisms that cannot be found even in the most current unabridged dictionaries—largely by osmosis. These linguistic matters are, for the most part, seldom discussed by lawyers or law professors; rather, they are part of the spoken and written legal discourse that neophyte lawyers absorb every day and learn to use unconsciously. This casualness in acquiring the language frequently leads to variable and contradictory linguistic habits that need explicating, codifying, and, in some instances, taming.

Granted these basic facts of legal language—the course of its growth, the challenge of its use, the pattern of its acquisition—this book aims at serving three primary functions. First, it helps lawyers chart their way safely through the bogs of legal language. In the past, anyone wanting such a guide has had to make do with general writing manuals. Though this dictionary lays no claim to comprehensiveness, it offers the legal writer guidance on hundreds of specific points of usage. The advice it gives is generally on the conservative side of usage and grammar, for the simple reason that lawyers generally write in a relatively formal context. Lapses from what has come to be accepted as correct irritate and distract the educated reader, and this makes the writing less persuasive. Yet the conservative approach exemplified in these pages aspires to be an informed conservatism, one that neither battles hopelessly against linguistic faits accomplis nor remains blind to the inevitable growth and change that occur in language.

Second, the dictionary addresses a great many usage problems that do not ordinarily arise in the writing of persons untrained in the law, and therefore that are not addressed in standard writing guides. Certainly it covers territory common to general guides, as inevitably it must. But one of its chief uses should be in pointing out divergences between legal and lay usage, many of which have remained heretofore unrecorded. To this end, the dictionary serves lawyers and nonlawyers alike, for it can help both groups bridge the linguistic gulf that separates them, to the degree that is possible. The greater effort here needs to be made by lawyers, who in recent years have become increasingly aware of the importance of using legal language that is simple and direct. Indeed, simplicity and directness, two of the touchstones of good writing, are advocated throughout this dictionary in an effort to tag and to discard legalese and highfalutin jargon.

Third, this work may serve, to some extent, as an instrument of reform. Where lawyers and judges use terms imprecisely or ambiguously (or, indeed, incorrectly), this dictionary often presents standards that will enhance rather than destroy valuable nuances. If ever a prescriptive approach to language is justified, it is in law, where linguistic precision is often of paramount concern, and where ambiguity and vagueness (except when purposeful) are quite intolerable. Within its compass, the dictionary thus seeks to preserve the rich differentiation in our legal vocabulary, to set out some of the important grammatical usages and traditional idioms, and to oppose slipshod usages that blur well-developed distinctions. Of course, no work of this kind can be a panacea for the problems that occur in legal writing. But such a work can realistically seek to make legal writers sensitive to the aesthetic possibilities of their prose, to goad them into thinking more acutely about what works in a given context, and what does not.

Modern Legal Usage is arranged so that the legal writer, unsure of or puzzled by a particular word or point of grammar, can consult a specific entry addressing the problem at hand. Virtually all the sentences quoted to illustrate legal usage, including linguistic pitfalls, originated in judicial opinions. A few come from statutes, fewer still from lawyers' briefs and other sources. The authors of the quoted specimens generally remain anonymous, because ordinarily it is unimportant who made a particular mistake. Attention should be focused on the mistake itself, and how to remedy it. Where stare decisis is the ruling principle, citations are necessary; in a dictionary of usage they are not, except of course when documenting usages that are lexicographically noteworthy. Whenever specimens do receive attribution, the importance of that fact lies in documenting the source, not in giving context to the quoted matter; hence subsequent histories of cases cited are not given.

Undertaking to write a dictionary of this kind is a precarious task. For by setting oneself up as an arbiter of usage, one also sets one's prose before the magnifying glasses of readers, who are certain to find blemishes of one sort or another. Such was H.W. Fowler's fate in his Dictionary of Modern English Usage (1926), a work that has served me as both exemplar and caution. For whatever may be amiss or at fault in this dictionary, I readily acknowledge full responsibility in advance.

As my manuscript swelled, any number of friends and colleagues looked on with far more than a polite interest. Several have actively contributed to whatever merit the final product has. Randall K. Glover of Austin and Kelly Bowers of Seattle called problematical words to my attention almost daily during the year we worked side by side for Judge Thomas M. Reavley. The Judge himself, whose approach to life and law cannot but inspire, gave me advice and encouragement that emboldened me to persevere.

Several fellow lawyers undertook to read large portions of the manuscript and made expert comments throughout. My learned friends Dr. Betty S. Flowers, David Radunsky, Michelle D. Monse, Roy J. Grogan, Jr., Hal Roberts Ray, Jr., Joe W. Pitts III, Alfredo Estrada, Roger Arnold, Lindsay H. Lew, Kenneth S. Klein, Lisa M. Black, Laura Cale, Sim Israeloff, and Jeffrey B. Brawner have all left the work sharper than they found it. I am indebted also to the late John N. Jackson, whose comments reflected years of thought on the subject of legal writing style.

The Honorable Robert W. Calvert, formerly Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Texas, generously read and marked up a prototypical draft of the work; he kept me on the reader's path and gave me a number of useful ideas. I am grateful to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor for corresponding with me on some of the stylistic practices of the United States Supreme Court.

Edmund S.C. Weiner, the accomplished Oxford lexicographer, and Martin S. Stanford, an extremely knowledgeable and thoughtful editor in New York, minutely read the full manuscript and made innumerable improvements. To these two scholars I am especially beholden, as I am to my father, Dr. Gary T. Garner, who spent many hours reading galleys.

Finally, I cannot adequately express my gratitude to my dear wife, to whom this book is dedicated, for her keen insights and unfaltering support in the face of what must have seemed at the outset to be a grossly overambitious task.

CLASSIFIED GUIDE TO ESSAY ENTRIES

This guide lists essay entries that may be grouped according to (1) style; (2) grammar and usage; (3) legal lexicology and special conventions; (4) word formation, inflection, spelling, and pronunciation; and (5) punctuation and typography. The guide does not include any entries that are concerned only with the meaning or idiomatic use of title words, or with their spelling, pronunciation, etymology, or inflections.

As for symbols within the work, a virgule (/) separates different illustrative quotations that are not part of a bulleted list. A parenthetical geographic reference following such a quotation, such as (Eng.) or (Aus.), indicates the national origin of the quotation. (Illustrative quotations not having a geographic reference are American in origin.) Small capitals refer the reader to the named article for further information.

MODERN LEGAL USAGE

a; an. This entry treats two common problems with the indefinite articles; for advice on using definite and indefinite articles generally, see ARTICLES.

A. Choice Between a and an. The indefinite article a is used before words beginning with a consonant sound, including -y- and -w- sounds. The other form, an, is used before words beginning with a vowel sound. Hence a European country, an LL.B. degree, a heuristic device, a uniform, an F.B.I. agent, an SEC subpoena. And, for those who have been wondering, the correct form is a usufruct in Louisiana law and a hypothec in Scots law.

The distinction between a and an was not solidified until the 19th century. Before that time an preceded most words beginning with a vowel, regardless of how the first syllable sounded. The U.S. Constitution reads: "The Congress shall have Power . . . To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization . . . ." U.S. Const. art. I, § 8. But that is no excuse for a 20th-century writer: "[T]hus retaining an unique [read a unique] and personal quality style creates nevertheless an essential value in all written expression." Perlie P. Fallon, The Relation Between Analysis and Style in American Legal Prose, 28 Neb. L. Rev. 80, 80 (1949).

Writers on usage formerly disputed whether the correct article is a or an with historian, historical, and a few other words. The traditional rule is that if the -h- is sounded, a is the proper form. If we follow that rule in the U.S. today, most people would say a historian. Even Fowler, in the England of 1926, advocated a before historic(al) and humble.

The theory behind using an in such a context, however, is that the -h- is very weak when the accent is on the second rather than the first syllable (giving rise, by analogy, to an habitual offender, an humanitarian, an hallucinatory image, and an harassed schoolteacher). Thus no authority countenances an history, though several older ones prefer an historian and an historical. Cardozo wrote: "What we hand down in our judgments is an hypothesis. It is no longer a divine command." Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 472, 478 (1939). Earlier Holmes used the same phrase.

Today, however, an hypothesis and an historical are likely to strike readers and listeners as affectations. As Mark Twain once wrote, referring to humble, heroic, and historical: "Correct writers of the American language do not put an before those words." The Stolen White Elephant 220 (1882) (as quoted in C.M. Babcock, The Ordeal of American English 1, 2 (1961)). Anyone who sounds the -h- in such words should avoid pretense and use a. Thus a hypothecation, a hereditament, a hallucinatory image, a harassed schoolteacher. An humanitarian is, judged even by the most tolerant standards, a pretentious humanitarian. See humble.

B. In the Distributive Sense. A, the distributive sense <ten hours a day>, is preferable to per, which originated in commercialese and LEGALESE. It is wrong to consider a informal or colloquial in this context. The natural idiom is sixty hours a week and ten dollars a pair, not sixty hours per week and ten dollars per pair. E.g., "At oral argument, St. Genevieve suggested that nominal damages be awarded at one dollar per [read an] acre."/ "These employees were paid less than the minimum hourly wage and they regularly worked more than forty hours per [read a] week without receiving overtime pay."

Nonetheless, per is at least minimally acceptable, except in the phrase as per, q.v. And in a few contexts, especially when used attributively, per is the only idiomatic word. E.g., "The case asks whether the same per-unit lease term amounts to a tax on imports in violation of the Import-Export Clause of the Constitution."

abandon = (1) to give up property or some right with the intent of never claiming it again; or (2) in family law, to leave children or a spouse willfully and without an intent to return. In sense (1), a person's losing a billfold (say) and then giving up an unsuccessful search does not mean that the person abandons the lost billfold: to abandon it, the person would have to take some purposeful action such as throwing it away.

abandoned property. See lost property.

abandonee means, not "one who is abandoned," as the suffix -ee might suggest, but "one to whom property rights [in a thing] are relinquished." As in advancee (= one to whom money is advanced) and patentee (= one te whom a patent has been issued), the suffix -ee carries a dative sense. Leff writes that "there are numerous circumstances in which abandonment of something by one person will have the practical or even legal effect of vesting that thing in a particular other person, who thus may usefully be called an abandonee." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1856 (1985). See -EE (A).

abandum; abandonum. The former is the correct spelling of this word, which means "anything prohibited or ordered to be cast away." Abandonum is a misspelling.

abate is a FORMAL WORD common in legal contexts, meaning (1) v.t., "to nullify; quash; demolish" <to abate a legal action>; (2) v.t., "to diminish" <to abate a debt>; or (3) v.t., to remove physically <to abate a nuisance>; or (4) v.i., "to come to an end" <all suits abate upon the death of the plaintiff>. There is, additionally, a technical legal sense that is rarely if ever used today: "to thrust oneself tortiously into real estate after the owner dies and before the legal heir enters" <abatement of freehold>.

Today abate is used most often in senses (2) and (3). Sense (2): "If the noise remains audible to lessee's tenants for more than five consecutive days, the lessor shall abate the rental payments in proportion to the square footage affected by the noise." Sense (3): "A person who suffers from a nuisance may abate it, i.e. remove it, even without giving notice, if he can do so without going on to another's land . . . ." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 144 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

The adjective is abatable, as in, "Appellants further contend that, where a nuisance is abatable, the damages assessed must be limited to the rental value of the property."

abator. So spelled.

ABBREVIATIONS. See ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS & INITIALESE.

abbuttals. See abutment.

abdicate may mean (1) "to disown"; (2) "to discard"; or (3) "to renounce." In legal writing it usually takes on sense (3)—e.g.: "We did not . . . imply that we had abdicated our equitable powers to prevent an unjust forfeiture." Foundation Dev. Corp. v. Loehmann's, Inc., 788 P.2d 1189, 1195 (Ariz. 1990)./ "The majority, as I see it, has abdicated its responsibility to enforce federal constitutional norms." Clemons v. Mississippi, 494 U.S. 738, 774 (1990) (Blackmun, J., concurring in part & dissenting in part).

abduct; abduce. These words overlap in meaning, but are not interchangeable. Both may mean "to draw away (a limb, etc.) from its natural position" (OED). Yet the more common meaning of abduct is "to lead away by force." (For a fuller definition, see abduction.) Although the OED contains a notation that abduce is archaic, W3 does not label it so; in any event, it is certainly rare.

abductee. See -EE (C).

abducter. See abductor (B).

abduction; kidnap(p)ing; child-stealing. Abduction = the act of leading (someone) away by force or fraudulent persuasion. It constitutes a statutory offense in many states; for example, abduct is statutorily defined in one state as "to restrain a person with intent to prevent his liberation by: (A) secreting or holding him in a place where he is not likely to be found; or (B) using or threatening to use deadly force." Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 20.01 (Vernon 1989).

In England, abduction is generally given a narrower sense: "the offence of taking an unmarried girl under the age of 16 from the possession of her parents or guardian against her will" (CDL). The OCL additionally defines abduction in English law as taking "a girl under 18 or a defective woman of any age from the possession of her parent or guardian for the purpose of unlawful sexual intercourse, or a girl under 21 with property or expectations of property from such possession to marry or have unlawful sexual intercourse, or . . . taking away and detaining any woman with the intention that she shall marry or have unlawful sexual intercourse with a person, by force or for the sake of her property or expectations of property."

In current AmE, abduction has virtually no connotations relating to the victim's sex. But in British legal writing—and at common law—the victim is almost invariably a woman. Abduction of voters, a criminal offense in G.B., is one usage in which the abductee's sex is irrelevant.

Kidnapping = the act or an instance of stealing, abducting, or carrying away a person by force or fraud, often with a demand for ransom (W3). Kidnapping (the -pp- spelling is preferred) is not restricted in application to children as victims, though the etymology suggests it. Child-stealing is the technical statutory term for the abduction of children. See kidnapping (B).

abductor. A. Plural Form. Abductor forms two plurals: -tors and -tores. The English plural, abductors, is preferable to the Latin plural, abductores.

B. And abducter. This alternative spelling, which is etymologically inferior, is not as widespread as abductor.

aberration; aberrance; aberrancy; aberrant, n. Aberration means (1) "a deviation or departure from what is normal or correct," or (2) "a mental derangement." Aberrance and aberrancy are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

Although the word aberration is not limited to persons, aberrant almost always is. As a noun, it means "a deviant; one deviating from established norms."

aberrational; aberrant, adj.; aberrative. Aberrational = of or pertaining to an aberration (see the preceding entry). E.g., "It is our duty to allow a decision to be made by the Attorney General's delegate, as long as it is not so aberrational that it is arbitrary rather than the result of any perceptible rational approach." Aberrant = deviating from behavioral or social norms. Aberrative = tending to be aberrational.

abet. See aid and abet.

abetment (= the act of abetting) is sometimes erroneously made abettance or abettal, both NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

abettor. A. And abetter. In both BrE and AmE, abettor is the more usual spelling; the OED states that it "is the constant form of the word as a legal term." Abettator is the defunct LAW LATIN term from old English law. Cf. bettor. See -ER (A) & perpetrator.

B. And accessory. An abettor, as distinguished from an accessory, is usually one who is present at the scene of a crime and gives aid or encouragement.

abeyance has a general sense ("a state of suspension, temporary nonexistence, or inactivity" [OED]) and a technical legal sense ("expectation or contemplation of law; the position of waiting for or being without a claimant or owner" [OED]). Even in legal contexts, however, the general lay sense is commonly used, as in, "Texas would not consider his claim if this action were held in abeyance."

abhorrent, meaning literally "shrinking from in abhorrence" or "strongly opposed to," frequently refers to things in legal contexts in the sense "so far removed from (a thing) as to be repugnant or inconsistent." E.g., "The very nature of a partnership is such that joint tenancy between one of the partners and a stranger to the partnership would be abhorrent to the Act."

abide. A. General Senses. Abide = (1) to stay <the right of entering and abiding in any state in the Union>; (2) to tolerate, withstand; (3) to obey; (4) to await; or (5) to perform or execute (in reference to orders or judgments). The last is the strictly legal meaning: "Since we do not doubt that the court will promptly proceed to abide our judgment and certify our decision before proceeding to trial, we decline to issue a peremptory order at this time."

Abide also commonly takes on the sense "to await," as in the following legal construction: "The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event."

Abide by is a PHRASAL VERB meaning "to acquiesce in or conform to"—e.g.: "Jurors must abide by the oath with respect to both sentencing and determining guilt or innocence."/ "Eastman indicated his intention to abide by the plea agreement, clearly hoping that this would be a consideration in favor of leniency."

Abiding = lasting, enduring. E.g., "The two gifts are both of a kind that indicates an abiding and unconditioned intent—one to a church, the other to a person whom she called her adopted son."

B. Past-Tense and Past-Participial Forms. With the meanings most probably to be found in legal texts ("await" and "execute"), abided is the preferred past tense and past participle. In the archaic sense "to stay, dwell," abode is the preferred past tense, and either abode or abided as the past participle. For most ordinary purposes, abided serves well without seeming stilted.

ability; capacity. Whereas ability is qualitative, capacity is quantitative. Ability refers to a person's power of body or mind ; capacity, meaning literally "roomy, spacious," refers figuratively to a person's physical or mental power to receive <her memory has an extraordinary capacity for details>.

ab initio; in initio. The former means "from the beginning" <an act beyond one's legal competence is void ab initio>; the latter means, as its prefix suggests, "in the beginning." Neither LATINISM seems quite justified in ordinary contexts, although ab initio, which in legal writing is used commonly in the phrase void ab initio, is common enough not to be particularly objectionable—e.g.: "Smith secured from an equity court, ab initio, an injunction against Jones." Leff notes that the phrase is sometimes used in the sense "thoroughly," roughly equivalent to "from first to last." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1863 (1985). E.g., "We find respondent's argument that the decision in that case is controlling here unpersuasive ab initio, because the relevant language of the two statutes differs materially."

abjudge; adjudge. These words are antithetical in one sense. Abjudge is a rare term (not in most abridged dictionaries) meaning "to take away by judicial decision" (OED). Adjudge, in contrast, means "to award, grant, or impose judicially" (id.). One abjudges from and adjudges to. For the latter term's other senses, see adjudge.

abjure; adjure. The former may mean either (1) "to renounce" <Germany abjured the use of force>, or (2) "to avoid" <her evaluation abjured excessive praise>. The latter means "to charge or entreat solemnly" <Reagan adjured the Soviets to join him in this noble goal>.

The noun forms are abjuration (or abjurement—now defunct) and adjuration. The adjectival forms end in -tory. The agent nouns are abjurer and adjurer.

abjurer; abjuror. The -er spelling is preferred. See -ER (A).

able. For the meaning of this word in the phrase ready, willing, and able, see ready, willing, and able.

-ABLE. A. Choice of -able or -ible. Many adjectives have competing forms ending in -able and -ible. Some of these have undergone DIFFERENTIATION in meaning; the less commonly used forms in some pairs are merely NEEDLESS VARIANTS of the predominant forms. The lists that follow contain the most troublesome words of this class.

Unlike -ible, -able is a living suffix that may be added to virtually any verb without an established suffix in either -able or -ible. Following are some of the adjectives preferably spelled -able:

actionable	circumscribable	diagnosable
addable	commensurable	diffusable advisable	committable	discussable affectable	condensable	endorsable allegeable	conductable	enforceable analyzable	connectable	excisable annexable	contestable	excludable arrestable	contractable	expandable assessable	conversable	extendable averageable	convictable	garnishable bailable	correctable	ignitable blamable	definable	immovable changeable	demurrable	improvable chargeable	detectable	includable inferable	ratable	suspendable movable	redressable	tractable noticeable	retractable	transferable patentable	salable	willable persuadable

The following words, limited in number because -ible is dead as a combining form in English, are spelled with the -i-:

accessible	dismissible	perceptible
adducible	divisible	perfectible admissible	edible	permissible audible	educible	plausible avertible	eligible	possible collapsible	erodible	producible collectible	exhaustible	protectible combustible	expressible	reducible commiscible	extendible	remissible compactible	fallible	reprehensible compatible	feasible	repressible comprehensible	flexible	resistible compressible	forcible	responsible concussible	fusible	reversible contemptible	horrible	revertible controvertible	impressible	risible convertible	incorrigible	seducible corrodible	indelible	sensible corruptible	intelligible	submersible (or credible	interfusible	submergible) deducible	inventible	suggestible deductible	invincible	suppressible defeasible	irascible	susceptible defensible	irresistible	terrible descendible	legible	transfusible destructible	negligible	uncollectible digestible	omissible	vendible
discernible	ostensible	visible

Some adjectives with these variant suffixes have different meanings. Thus impassable means "closed, incapable of being traversed"; its twin, impassible, means "unable to feel pain," or, less distinctively, "impassive, emotionless." Passable and passible have correspondingly positive meanings. (These pairs are formed from different Latin roots, L. passus "having suffered" and L. passare "to step.") Similarly, impartible means "not subject to partition" and impartable "capable of being imparted." Conversable means "oral," whereas convertible is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of convertible. Forcible means either "effected by means of force" <forcible entry> or "characterized by force"; forceable, much less frequently encountered, would be the better term to describe a door that is "capable of being forced open." See forcible.

Other variant adjectives, though, are merely duplicative. Typical examples are extendable, extendible, and extensible. The first of these is now prevalent in AmE (though labeled obsolete in the OED). Extensible was, through the mid-20th century, the most common form, but today it trails extendable by a substantial margin, while extendible continues to appear infrequently. Writers and editors ought to settle on the most firmly established form—extendable, which is as well formed as the variants—and trouble their minds with weightier matters. See NEEDLESS VARIANTS, DIFFERENTIATION & MUTE E

B. Appended to Nouns. This suffix is usually appended as a passive suffix to verbs (e.g., forgettable, avoidable, reproachable). Sometimes, however, it has been joined with nouns (e.g., objectionable, actionable, dutiable, marriageable, salable—even clergyable and reversionable, qq.v.). These do not mean "able to be objectioned," "able to be actioned," and so on. Objectable would perhaps have been the more logical formation, though time, idiom, and usage have made many such forms as actionable both ineradicable and unobjectionable.

C. Converting -ate Verbs into -able Adjectives. When the suffix -able is added to a transitive polysyllabic word ending in -ate, that suffix is dropped. Hence, accumulable, calculable, estimable, etc. (See -ATABLE.) Exceptions, however, occur with the two-syllable words (e.g., rebatable, debatable).

D. Dropping or Retaining the Medial -e-. This question arises in words such as movables, q.v., which sometimes takes the form moveables. Maine used such forms as irreconcileable and resumeable—forms that are now archaic. See Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 85, 241 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). Generally today, both AmE and BrE drop such a medial -e-, except in words with a soft -c- (traceable) or a soft -g- (chargeable). See MUTE E.

able-bodied seaman; able seaman. The former, though much more recent, seems to be the usual term in admiralty law, meaning "a merchant seaman certified for all seaman's duties" (AHD). It is abbreviated A.B. The phrase able seaman is used in the United States Shipping Code, 46 U.S.C. § 7307 (1988). It also appears in Herman Melville's Billy Budd (1891). It would be difficult and footless to categorize either as a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the other. See seaman & mariner.

aboard. Usually restricted to ships in BrE, this word is used broadly in AmE—e.g.: "Two of the passengers aboard the bus were killed." State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. v. Tashire, 386 U.S. 523, 525 (1967).

abode, as past tense of abide. See abide (B).

abode, place of. This phrase is a pretentious way of referring to someone's home or house.

abolishment; admonishment. These nouns are inferior to—and much rarer than—the organically derived abolition and admonition; no longer is there any difference in meaning between the -ment and the -tion forms. The -ment forms waywardly persist in much legal writing. E.g., "The Securities Industry Association issued a 'legal alert' that refers to the NYSE memo and its strongly worded admonishment [read admonition] to have securities loan arrangements covered by written agreement."/ "The Legislature must be given a fair opportunity to take whatever action it should deem advisable before the abolishment [read abolition] of the long-accepted immunity."

aborigine was long considered to be correct only in the plural form, aboriginal being the singular noun. Today, however, aborigine has entered standard English as a singular noun. But in Australia, Aboriginal with the initial capital is the only correct form in formal usage.

abort = (1) (of a pregnancy) to end prematurely; (2) (of a fetus) to cause to be expelled before full development; or (3) (of a pregnant woman) to cause to have an abortion. Senses (1) and (2) are more usual than sense (3), which, as an example of HYPALLAGE, strikes many readers as odd. E.g., "In a case of 1949, the trial judge sentenced a husband who had tried to abort his wife and killed her to five years' penal servitude . . . ." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 155 (1957).

abortee. Logically, one might expect this word to refer to the fetus (one who is aborted)—but by convention, and based on sense (3) of abort, the word abortee refers to the woman whose miscarriage has been produced. See Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 100 (1957). Today the word is little used even in legal contexts, perhaps because it seems callous. See -EE.

abortifacient; contraceptive. The former is anything intended to produce an abortion. The latter is anything designed to prevent conception. Abortifacient should not be used to include contraceptive.

abortion; aborticide; feticide. The word abortion, strictly speaking, means no more than "the expulsion of a nonviable fetus" (W3). In this sense it is synonymous with miscarriage. But today it more commonly applies specifically to an intentionally induced miscarriage—not one that results naturally or accidentally. Though abortion was once used interchangeably with criminal abortion, that is no longer so with the advent of legalized abortion. In the criminal context, then, it is necessary to use the full phrase criminal abortion or crime of abortion.

Aborticide = the act of destroying a live fetus. It appears to be a NEEDLESS VARIANT of abortion—and a tendentious one. In any event, though, aborticide is an ill-formed equivalent of feticide. If, as the dictionaries suggest, it is formed on the verb abort, then ironically it is what Fowler called an "abortion," but here is termed a MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY. If it is formed on the noun abortus (= an aborted fetus), then it is illogical, for an abortionist does not—except in the grossest imaginable circumstances—"kill" (-cide) a fetus that has already been aborted. Aborticide is to be avoided in favor of the superior alternative, feticide (BrE fœticide).

The term feticide is often used to describe the death of a fetus caused by an assault and battery against the mother.

The current euphemism for abortion—a highly charged term since the Supreme Court handed down Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)—is pregnancy termination. See EUPHEMISMS.

ABORTIONS, LINGUISTIC. See MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITIES.

abortive; aborted. Abortive may mean (1) "unsuccessful," or (2) "inchoate." With sense (1), it takes on the figurative sense of aborted (= cut short), as an abortive trial, i.e., one cut short before the verdict by, e.g., settlement of the dispute. (Note that -ive, an active suffix, here has a passive sense.) E.g., "A jury convicted appellants of various offenses arising out of an abortive scheme to import a large quantity of marijuana into the United States from Mexico." In the following sentence, abortive has the sense "unsuccessful" without the connotations of "cut short": "More cross-examinations with well-chosen objectives are rendered abortive by the pursuit of 'will o' the wisp' decoys than by any other single factor."

about; approximately. Approximately is a FORMAL WORD; about is the ordinary, perfectly good equivalent. About should not be used, as it often is, with other terms of approximation such as estimate or guess, because it means "roughly" or "approximately." Hence, "roughly about $10,000" is redundant.

above. A. Meaning "more than" or "longer than." This usage is to be restricted to informal contexts. "Above [read More than] six-hundred lawsuits have been filed since the tragedy."/ "Should the piano remain, by mutual consent, above [read longer than] the term of four months, it is understood that the company is to pay Stieff interest at the rate of six percent per annum."

B. For above-mentioned. Above is an acceptable ellipsis for above-mentioned if clear in context; and it is much less inelegant—e.g.: "The above arguments apply only to judicial disqualification under section 455(a)."

It was long thought that above could not properly act as an adjective; but the word has been so used in legal writing throughout the 20th century, even by the best legal writers. E.g., "[I]f the above sections were the only law bearing on the matter, [we assume] that they created a civil liability to make reparation to any one whose rights were infringed." Slater v. Mexican Nat'l R.R., 194 U.S. 120, 126 (1904)./ "Yet in the middle of the above passage from Lord Lindley's opinion there is a sudden and question-begging shift in the use of terms." (Hohfeld) The OED records this use from 1873 and states: "By ellipsis of a pple. as said, written, mentioned, above stands attributively, as 'the above explanation.'"

Some critics have suggested that above in this sense should refer only to something mentioned previously on the same page, but this restriction seems unduly narrow. Nevertheless, it is generally better to make the reference exact by giving a page or paragraph number, rather than the vague reference made possible by above. Idiom will not, however, allow above to modify all nouns: above vehicle is unidiomatic for above-mentioned vehicle. Better yet would be the vehicle, if we know from the context which one we are talking about.

C. As an Attributive Noun. This casualism, which has appeared even in Supreme Court opinions, derives from the uses discussed in section (B). E.g., "Do not hesitate to call me if the above is not the agreement we have made."

above-mentioned; above-quoted; above-styled; above-captioned. All such compounds should be hyphenated; one sees the tendency nowadays to spell above-quoted and above-mentioned as single words. Actually, it is best to avoid these compounds altogether by using more specific references; that is, instead of writing the above-mentioned court, one should name the court (or, if it has just been named, write the court, that court, or some similar identifying phrase). Then again, any of these options may simply be a sign of OVERPARTICULARIZATION, the cure for which would be simply to omit the reference altogether. See above (B), aforesaid & captioned.

abridge; violate. Constitutional and other rights are often said to be abridged or violated. A connotative distinction is possible, however. Violate is the stronger word: when rights are abridged, they are merely diminished; when rights are violated, they are flouted outright. Following are examples of the milder term: "The provision of a new and sanitary building does not ensure that it will be operated in a constitutional way; the first amendment can be abridged in the cleanest quarters."/ "A statute denying nonresidents the privilege of serving as trustees of living trusts might be unconstitutional as abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States."

abridg(e)able. The preferred spelling is abridgable in both AmE and BrE. See MUTE E.

abridg(e)ment. The British usually spell it with the -e-, and the Americans always without it. Armed with this knowledge, an American writer should not defend his "misspelling" on grounds that he prefers the BrE form. Cf. acknowledg(e)ment & judg(e)ment.

abrogate; obrogate; arrogate. Abrogate, far more common than obrogate, means "to abolish (a law or established usage) by authoritative or formal action; annul; repeal." Abrogate is occasionally confused with arrogate (= to usurp). The proper use of abrogate is illustrated here: "Texas courts will abrogate school district policies only when they clearly violate statutory provisions."

Obrogate is a civil-law term meaning "to repeal (a law) by passing a new one" (OED).

Arrogate (= to usurp) is properly used in the following sentence: "Courts may arrogate the authority of deciding what the individual may say and may not say, and there may be readily brought about the very condition against which the constitutional guaranty was intended as a permanent protection." See arrogate.

abscond is both transitive ("to hide away, conceal [something]") and intransitive ("to depart secretly or suddenly; to hide oneself"). The latter is more common in modern contexts—e.g.: "He sold the cottages, called in the mortgage, and absconded with the proceeds . . . ." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 46 (4th ed. 1991).

abscondee (= one who absconds) is, like escapee, q.v., illogically formed, and it is rarer than the better-formed absconder, the usual agent-noun: "Evidently, because of loose security safeguards, the abscondees [read absconders] just walked out of the hotel." Ledesma-Valdes v. Sava, 604 F. Supp. 675, 677 (S.D.N.Y. 1985)./ "Appellant, age 15, was an abscondee [read absconder] from a youth development center . . . ." Commonwealth v. Thomas, 392 A.2d 820, 821 (Pa. Super. 1978). See -EE abscondence; abscondment; absconsion. The second and third are NEEDLESS VARIANTS rarely found; abscondence is the preferred and much more common noun corresponding to the verb abscond, q.v. E.g., "[D]efendant demonstrated a command of the English language not likely to have been acquired during his period of abscondence . . . ." People v. Ferrer, 551 N.Y.S.2d 201, 201-02 (N.Y. App. Div. 1990). Abscondance is an infrequent misspelling.

absconder. See abscondee.

absent (= in the absence of; without) is commonly used as a preposition in legal writing. It can be effective if sparingly used. E.g., "The statute, in permitting a verdict of guilty absent a finding of a design to effect death, allows the imputation of intent from one defendant to another."/ "Absent a clear manifestation of a contrary intent, it is presumed that the settlor intended the trustee to take a fee simple so that in selling he could pass title as owner rather than as donee of a power." For an interesting discussion of how this American LEGALISM has spread into nonlegal contexts, see two pieces by Alan R. Slotkin: Absent "Without": Adjective, Participle, or Preposition, 60 Am. Speech 222 (1985); Prepositional Absent: An Afterword, 64 Am. Speech 167 (1989).

absentee, used as an adverb, is a new and useful linguistic development. E.g., "Our inquiry as to [read into] why the defendants took Alaniz and her son and daughter to vote absentee has to begin with whether the request came from Alaniz herself." It would be cumbersome in that context to have to write, "to vote as absentees." W3 records absentee as a noun only, but the adverbial usage is increasingly widespread. The word may also function as an adjective, as in absentee landlord.

Absolute Constructions. Nominative absolutes, increasingly rare in modern prose, allow writers to vary their syntax while concisely subordinating incidental matter. Such phrases do not bear an ordinary grammatical relation to the rest of the sentence, since the noun or noun phrase does not perform any of the usual functions (subject, object, apposition, etc.) that grammatically attach nouns to other words in the sentence. Yet the whole absolute phrase adverbially modifies some verb. E.g., "The court adjourning [i.e., When the court adjourned], we left the courtroom."

This construction often has an antique literary flavor. Few modern writers would use the nominative absolute in the way Herman Melville did: "[A] drumhead court was summarily convened, he electing the individuals composing it . . . ." Billy Budd 63 (1891; repr. Signet ed. 1979). (The pronoun he is modified by the participle electing; the individuals composing it is the object of electing. The whole phrase he electing the individuals composing it is a nominative absolute, for it has no grammatical function in the statement A drumhead court was summarily convened.)

But most modern examples don't strike readers as being so stuffy, as the following examples of the nominative absolute show:

- "In Martin v. Texas, Harlan writing again for a unanimous Court, the defendant's allegations of discrimination were unsupported by any evidence whatever and were denied." (If a pronoun were to be used instead of Harlan, the absolute phrase would read "he writing again for the court.")
- "For the purposes of this proceeding, at least, it is conceded that the collision was solely the result of Holeman's negligence, he apparently having been intoxicated at the time."
- "The husband being about to sail, the alleged parol agreement sued upon was made." (Eng.)
- "This court having found that the two types of uses under the trademark maintenance program were not sufficient uses to avoid prima facie proof of abandonment, the district court must specifically address Exxon's intent to resume use of the HUMBLE trademark."

In the following example, the writer attempted a nominative absolute, but incorrectly used the possessive rather than the nominative case: "The trial court concluded [that] Vance was not a good candidate for non-state prison sanction, his [read he] having 'manipulated the system before.'" Vance v. State, 475 So. 2d 1362, 1363 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985).

absolute, decree. See decree absolute.

absolute liability. See strict liability.

absolute, rule. See decree absolute.

absolve, depending on the context, takes either of or from. One is absolved of financial liability, and absolved from wrongdoing—assuming the courts treat one kindly. In the following sentence, from appears wrongly for of: "If the mother contributed nothing to his support because she was absolved therefrom [read, if we must, thereof] under the act, no expectation of pecuniary advantage exists."

Here the opposite error appears: "Chudde considered that Hardgrave's letter completely absolved her of [read from] any charges of improper behavior in her teaching methods or in the context of her course."

absorb; adsorb; sorb. Absorb is the common term meaning "to soak up", adsorb is a scientific term used in referring to condensing gas. Sorb is a relatively obscure term comprehending both of its prefixed siblings.

abstract, n. American lawyers often use abstract as a shortened form of the phrase abstract of title (= the history of a particular tract of land, consisting of a written summary of the material parts of every recorded instrument affecting title).

abstract, v.t.; abstractify. Abstract is the CHAMELEON-HUED verb meaning (1) "to separate", (2) "to summarize" <to abstract a judgment or title>; (3) "to divert"; (4) "to steal"; or (5) "to make (something concrete) abstract."

The OED labels sense (4) a EUPHEMISM. In that sense—"to take away secretly, slyly, or dishonestly"—abstract is a FORMAL WORD that really beclouds the act it describes. E.g., "Universal's funds were surreptitiously abstracted and deposited in Richfield's account." A more common word, such as removed or withdrawn, would be preferable.

Abstractify is not listed in the dictionaries, though it has appeared in legal texts. It serves as a pejorative alternative for sense (5) of abstract. Perhaps it is a useful invention, for there is no reason for abstract to undergo any further degeneration of meaning.

abstracter. See abstractor.

abstraction means, to nonlawyers, (1) (rarely) "the act of removing"; (2) "an abstract idea"; (3) "abstractedness"; or (4) "an example of abstract art" (OAD). In law, however, abstraction = the act of taking, usu. wrongfully or fraudulently, as in abstraction of funds. But in the phrase abstraction of water (= the taking of water from a river or other source of supply [CDL]), the word connotes no wrongdoing, for in England one may obtain a license. See abstract, v.t.

ABSTRACTITIS. "How vile a thing . . . is the abstract noun! It wraps a man's thoughts round like cotton wool." Arthur Quiller-Couch, On the Art of Writing 109 (1916). Abstractitis is Ernest Gowers's term for writing that is so abstract and obtuse (hence abstruse) that the writer does not even know what he or she is trying to say—far be it from the reader, then, to give such writing a coherent meaning.

One sympathizes with a keen reader like Judge Learned Hand, who wrestled with the Internal Revenue Code: "[T]he words . . . dance before my eyes in a meaningless procession: cross-reference to cross-reference, exception upon exception—couched in abstract terms that offer no handle to seize hold of—leave in my mind only a confused sense of some vitally important, but successfully concealed, purport, which it is my duty to extract, but which is within my power, if at all, only after the most inordinate expenditure of time." Learned Hand, Thomas Walter Swan, 57 Yale L.J. 167, 169 (1947).

Perhaps the best antidote to this malady—which in some degree afflicts most sophisticated writers—is an active empathy for one's readers. Rigorous thought about concrete meaning, together with careful revision, can eliminate abstractitis.

Three short examples suffice to illustrate the malady:

- "This Note, therefore, structures its analysis around a consideration of definitional methodology and proposes a constitutional definition of religion on the basis of that consideration." Timothy L. Hall, The Sacred and the Profane, 61 Tex. L. Rev. 139, 140 (1982). What? The sentence states that the note proposes a definition of religion on the basis of a consideration of methodology, which makes little sense. See OBSCURITY.
- "[A]s used within the context of this book . . . , demonstrative evidence is evidence which [read that] has, in some form or fashion, been processed." Mark A. Dombroff, Dombroff on Demonstrative Evidence 2 (1983). One reads that sentence with mounting expectations of a punch word at the end—yet all we get is the vague word processed. What is evidence that has, in some form or fashion, been processed? Been processed by the brain? Unfortunately, even the fuller context of that quotation provides little help.
- "Win or lose, the County Committee is a focal force of substantiality within the electoral process, whether it be for federal, state or local purposes." Doherty v. Meisser, 321 N.Y.S.2d 32, 41 (N.Y. Sup. 1971). What is a focal force of substantiality?

The first and third examples contain the archetypal abstract words, here termed BURIED VERBS—that is, words ending usually with these suffixes: -tion, -sion, -ity, -ence, -ance, -ment. Writers are well advised to take these longish nouns and turn them back into verbs if possible—that is, write to state, not to make a statement; to submit, not to make a submission; to rely on, not to evidence a reliance on; and so on.

The Fowlers quote the following sentence—laden with buried verbs—in The King's English (1906): "One of the most important reforms mentioned in the rescript is the unification of the organization of judicial institutions and the guarantee for all the tribunals of the independence necessary for securing to all classes of the community equality before the law." The following revision eliminates the buried verbs: "One of the most important reforms is that of the courts, which need to be independent within a uniform structure. In this way only can people be assured that all are equal before the law." Arthur Quiller-Couch, The Art of Writing at 109–10.

The newest vogue in legal theorizing, Critical Legal Studies (q.v.), is characterized by abstractitis and jargonmongering, the favored words in the field being purposivist, constitutive, co-opting, demobilizing, structuralism, deconstruction, formalism, and praxis, among others. See Louis B. Schwartz, With Gun and Camera Through Darkest CLS-Land, 36 Stan. L. Rev. 413, 440 (1984). Some CLS writing reads on this order: "In the reciprocity of roles that are artificial, you think people are more alienated in that bank than I think they are. I think there's more intersubjective zap and unalienated relatedness among tellers." Peter Gabel & Duncan Kennedy, Roll Over Beethoven, 36 Stan. L. Rev. 1, 25 (1984). The phrase intersubjective zap, by the way, has become a buzz-phrase among CLSers, having now appeared in well over 20 law-review articles.

By some accounts, abstractitis leads to far worse things. "If concepts are not clear," wrote Confucius, "words do not fit." But he did not stop there: "If words do not fit, the day's work cannot be accomplished, morals and art do not flourish. If morals and art do not flourish, punishments are not just. If punishments are not just, the people do not know where to put hand or foot." Confucius, Analects XIII, 3. It is no frivolous assertion to say that, when we descend into abstractitis, more than just our language is afflicted.

Fred Rodell—the Yale law professor, realist, and semanticist who frequently criticized lawyers' language—issued his own inimitable warning about abstractitis: "Dealing in words is a dangerous business, and it cannot be too often stressed that what The Law deals in is words. Dealing in long, vague, fuzzy-meaning words is even more dangerous business, and most of the words The Law deals in are long and vague and fuzzy. Making a habit of applying long, vague, fuzzy, general words to specific things and facts is perhaps the most dangerous of all, and The Law does that, too." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 39 (1939; repr. 1980).

ABSTRACT NOUNS, PLURALS OF. See PLURALS (B).

abstract of title. See abstract & title.

abstractor; abstracter. The OED notes that -or is "analogically the more regular form"; it is the more usual as well. See -ER (A).

abuse of discretion, the phrase denoting a lenient standard of reviewing a lower court's judgment, signifies "no single level of deference or scrutiny." 1 Steven A. Childress & Martha S. Davis, Standards of Review § 4.21, at 287 (1986). The "variability [of the phrase] is not hopeless. It just means that generalizations about the standard may not be helpful." Id. at 288.

Abuse in this context is not pejorative; the word here is "wholly unrelated to the meaning of the . . . term when used in common parlance." Beck v. Wings Field, Inc., 122 F.2d 114, 116 (3d Cir. 1941). Thus some writers have proposed substituting misuse in place of abuse. See, e.g., Pearson v. Dennison, 353 F.2d 24, 28 n.6 (9th Cir. 1965). The phrase abuse of discretion is unlikely, however, to be changed.

abuse of process. See malicious prosecution.

abutment; abuttals. An abutment is the place at which two or more things touch. Abuttals—a term used only in the plural—means "land boundaries." Abuttals usually refers to abstract boundaries, and abutments usually to physical structures (e.g., the walls of bridges adjoining land). Abbuttals is a variant spelling to be avoided.

abutter; abuttor. Abutter is the accepted spelling. The word means either (1) "the owner of adjoining land"; or (2) "land that adjoins the land in question." Sense (1) is far more common.

abysm(al); abyss(al). The nouns are synonymous in signifying "a bottomless gulf." Abyss is the more current form, and is therefore to be preferred. Though abysm is obsolescent, abysmal thrives (indeed, has become trite) as a figurative term for "deep" or "immeasurably great" (W3) <abysmal benightedness>. Abyssal is a technical oceanographic term <the geology of the abyssal deep>.

accede; exceed. Accede = (1) "to agree or consent"; (2) "to come into office or a position of stature"; or (3) "to enter a treaty or accord." It is an intransitive verb that takes the preposition to. Exceed, a transitive verb, means (1) "to surpass"; or (2) "to go beyond the proper limits." The first syllable of accede should be pronounced with a short -a-, so as to differentiate its sound from exceed.

accent, v.t.; accentuate. These synonyms have a latent distinction that might usefully be observed. Fowler notes that accent is more common in literal, and accentuate in figurative, senses. Hence one properly accents the third syllable of appellee, and accentuates the weaknesses in an opponent's legal arguments. E.g., "These elements, although accentuating the wrong, are not the essence of it."

acceptance; acceptancy; acceptation. The first corresponds to the active sense of the verb (to accept), and the second the passive sense (to be accepted). Acceptance = the act of accepting; specif., the final and unqualified expression of assent to the terms of a contractual offer. Acceptation = the state of being accepted <widespread acceptation of the doctrine of strict liability in tort was long in coming>. Acceptancy is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of acceptance, just as acception is for acceptation.

Following are examples of acceptation—the less common word—used correctly: "In actions of slander, words are to be taken in their common acceptation."/ "That there is no right of property in a dead body in the ordinary acceptation of that term [Which term: property or dead body?] is undoubtedly true when limited to a property right in the commercial sense."

acceptance for honor; acceptance supra protest. Both terms mean "a form of acceptance of a bill of exchange to save the good name of the drawer or an endorser" (CDL). Both are TERMS OF ART, acceptance for honor perhaps being the more generally comprehensible of the two. Acceptance supra protest ought to be avoided.

acceptancy; acceptation. See acceptance.

accepter; acceptor. "The first form is now generally used for one who accepts. The second (earlier) form is the legal term, one who accepts, or undertakes the payment of, a bill of exchange." Margaret Nicholson, A Dictionary of American-English Usage 6 (1957). Acceptor is also regularly used in law, however, of one who accepts an offer to enter into a contract—e.g.: "From the point of view of the offeror it seems immaterial whether the acceptor knew of the offer or not." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 52 (3d ed. 1981).

access, as a verb, has its origins in COMPUTERESE. Like a number of nouns turned into verbs (e.g., contact), it now seems increasingly well ensconced in the language. As Fowler notes with regard to contact, it is an ancient and valuable right for English-speaking peoples to turn their nouns into verbs when they are so minded. Gain access to or some other such equivalent is admittedly ungainly alongside access, though the latter still jars sensitive ears. "Other electrical units do not access the electric energy source through the plug."

accession /ak-se-shən/ = (1) a coming into possession of an office or right; (2) acquisition of (something connected to one's property) by growth, labor, or the like; or (3) a secondary or subordinate thing that is connected with another thing. Sense (1) is the most common in legal and nonlegal contexts alike <Rehnquist's accession to the Chiefship>; senses (2) and (3) are largely peculiar to legal contexts. Sense (1): "The right [of acquisition] is obtained without an act of possession by: . . . 'Accession,' when the owner of the principal object becomes also owner of its accessory." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 218 (13th ed. 1924)./ Sense (2): "It often happened, however, that of the two things united, one was a mere accession to the other, a mere secondary or subordinate part . . . ." James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 170 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co. 1881)./ Sense (3): "[W]e held that tires and tubes added to a car did not become a part of it by accession." Bank of America v. J. & S. Auto Repairs, 694 P.2d 246, 251 (Ariz. 1985) (en banc).

accessorial (= [1] of or relating to an accessory; or [2] collateral) appears most commonly in sense (1)—e.g.: "We now come to another set of cases in which the English courts have departed from, or at least modified, the derivative theory of accessorial liability." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 386 (1991).

Sense (2) has been largely superseded by either accessory <accessory promise> or collateral <collateral obligation>. See collateral obligation.

accessorial obligation. See collateral obligation.

accessory, n. A. And accessary, n. Accessory now predominates in AmE and BrE in meaning both "abettor" and "a thing of lesser importance." Though Fowler believed a distinction existed between accessory and accessary (the first applying primarily to things, the second to persons), the second is now merely a NEEDLESS VARIANT and should be avoided.

B. Pronunciation. Both words discussed in (A) should be pronounced with the first -c- as a hard -k- sound—hence /ak-ses-ə-ree/. A common mispronunciation is /ə-ses-ə-ree/.

C. And accomplice. See accomplice & principal (B).

accident. A. And mistake. In law, the usual distinction is that an accident occurs without the willful purpose of the person who causes it. A mistake, by contrast, presupposes the operation of a person's will in producing the event, even though the person has been misled by erroneous impressions.

B. And incident. "Available statistics establish that flight engineers have rarely been a contributing cause or factor in commercial aircraft accidents or incidents." Here incident apparently means "near-accident," and for the purposes of one-time differentiation may be justified. Incident should be avoided, however, as a EUPHEMISM for accident.

accidentally. So spelled; accidently is a solecism. The confusion may arise from the form of evidently and patently. Cf. incidentally.

acclimate, -ation; acclimatize, -ization. H.W. Fowler and other authorities prefer the -ize forms. Similarly, W10 includes the primary definitions under acclimatize and acclimatization, the better forms. In the noun, using acclimatization keeps listeners from confusing the homophones acclimation and acclamation.

accommodable. The word is so formed—not accommodatable, as it is sometimes erroneously written. E.g., "[E]qual treatment of inmates is not a legitimate interest when it is accomplished at the expense of denying the exercise of an otherwise accommodatable [read accommodable] constitutional right." Goodwin v. Turner, 908 F.2d 1395, 1405 (8th Cir. 1990) (en banc). See -ATABLE.

accommodation. So spelled. The word is commonly misspelled with one m-. accommodatum. See commodatum.

accomplice; accessory. American writers tend to use accomplice to include all principals and accessories before the fact, but to exclude accessories after the fact. Thus, the word embraces all perpetrators, abettors, and inciters. See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 727 (3d ed. 1982).

Other writers use accomplice to include all principals and accessories. The CDL, for example, defines accomplice as "one who is a party to a crime, either as a perpetrator or as an accessory." And it defines accessory as "one who is a party to a crime that is actually committed by someone else (the perpetrator)." This usage appears to be primarily BrE—e.g.: "[W]e are concerned with the first topic—the parties in different degrees of complicity to a crime, who are termed 'accomplices.' Accomplices consist of the perpetrator and the accessories." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 285 (1978).

Still other writers, however, use accomplice and accessory as synonyms—e.g.: "[A] principal is a person whose acts fall within the legal definition of the crime, whereas an accomplice (sometimes called an 'accessory' or 'secondary party') is anyone who aids, abets, counsels, or procures a principal." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 363–64 (1991). See accessory.

accomptant general. See accountant general.

accord; accordance. To be in accord is to be in agreement. E.g., "This holding was in accord with the overwhelming weight of authority in the state courts as reflected in Wigmore's classic treatise on the law of evidence."

This phrasing should not be used in place of a more direct statement—e.g.: "The adoption of this method was based on the premise that the order in point of time of deposits and withdrawals was essential to proof, and that the burden was upon claimant; we are not in accord with [read we reject (or disagree with)] that view."

To be in accordance is to be in conformity or compliance. In accordance is sometimes cumbersome, but often useful. E.g., "The search was conducted in accordance with FCI regulations and without excessive use of force." Out of accordance = not in conformity.

Accord is wrongly used for accordance in the following sentences: "The agency disbursed funds in accord [read accordance] with the plan."/ "In accord [read accordance] with the approach taken by this court in these decisions, we hold that the presentation of an administrative claim in excess of $100,000 is a sum certain under 28 C.F.R. § 14.2."

accord, v.t.; afford, v.t. These are CHAMELEON-HUED words that share the meaning "to furnish or grant," as commonly used in legal texts <accorded (or afforded) all the rights due him under due process>. Yet some DIFFERENTIATION is possible: accord has the nuance of granting something because it is suitable or proper <accord litigants a stay of costs pending appeal>. E.g., "The children were not accorded procedural due process before school officials reached the conclusion that they could not continue to attend school." Accord in this sense should usu. take a personal object, not an inanimate one; this error most commonly occurs when accord is used as high-sounding substitute for give: "I cannot subscribe to the court's sweeping refusal to accord [read give] the equal protection clause any role in this entire area of the law."/ "Courts generally accord [read give] statutory language its commonsense meaning." The origin of the correct use of accord lies in the historical (and still current) sense "to grant (a thing asked) to (a person), to give with full consent, to award" (OED).

Intransitively, accord takes the prepositions in, to, or with, depending on the context <we accord in our opinions> <we accord to plaintiff his due> <this accords with the prevailing view>.

Afford is the more general term, meaning "to furnish (something) as an essential concomitant" <afford to the indigent defendant legal representation>. E.g., "The Sixth Amendment guarantees that a person brought to trial in any federal court must be afforded the right to assistance of counsel before he can be validly convicted."/"If we afford relief to this town, will we have to do likewise as each unincorporated village decides to incorporate?"

accord, n.; concord, n. Both mean "an amicable arrangement between parties, esp. between peoples or nations; compact; treaty." Accord is perhaps the less formal word, and the more frequently used today. See concord (A).

accord, used as a signal in citations, ordinarily indicates that the authority cited directly supports the proposition, but in a way slightly different from previously cited authorities. One should include a parenthetical explanation of what that difference is, rather than leaving the reader to search for it. Sometimes it introduces like cases from other jurisdictions. See CITATION OF CASES.

accord and satisfaction; compromise and settlement. The former appears usually in contractual contexts. Though the two phrases may overlap to some extent, compromise and settlement is used in the context of a dispute more probably giving rise to litigation. It applies to all disputes, not just to those arising from contracts. The two substantive words in compromise and settlement are broader than those in accord and satisfaction, but compromise is roughly analogous to accord, and settlement to satisfaction.

An accord is an agreement to substitute for an existing debt or obligation some alternative form of discharging that debt; a satisfaction is the actual discharge of the debt by the substituted means. Stated otherwise, an accord is the agreement to perform (in an alternative way), and the satisfaction is the actual performance. Any claim (if disputed, unliquidated, or undisputed and liquidated) may be discharged by an accord and satisfaction.

But only a disputed or unliquidated claim may be the basis for a compromise and settlement. Though the two words in this phrase have been used with a variety of meanings and even synonymously, at base compromise means "an agreement between two or more persons to settle matters in dispute between them"; settlement means "the performance of promises made in a compromise agreement."

according. A. According to. This is a weak form of attribution <according to Corbin, . . .>; a text sprinkled with according to's gives the appearance of having little originality. Legal writers should avoid the phrase when attributing an idea.

B. According as. This phrase means "in a manner corresponding to the way in which; just as." E.g., "The special law is either favorable or unfavorable according as it enlarges or restricts, in opposition to the common rule, the rights of those for whom it is established." (See the quotation from Blackstone under misdemeanor.)

C. According to; accordingly to. According to = (1) depending on; (2) as explained or reported by (a person); or (3) in accordance with. Sense (1): "The Courts exercise what, according to our prepossessions, we call a moderating or an obstructive influence." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 43 (1945).

D. As a Dangler. For according as an acceptable dangling modifier, see DANGLERS (D).

accordingly. See according (C).

accost (= to approach and usu. to speak to in an abrupt or challenging manner) has historically had no connotations of physical contact. Hence it would traditionally be considered inappropriate in the following sentence: "One lady leaving the shop was grabbed by the arm and in a threatening manner told that she had better not go in the place again because it was a 'scab' shop; another lady was likewise accosted and told that she ought to be shot for going into that 'scab' shop." Accost is not a strong enough word for that context, assault (in the nonlawyer's sense) might have served better.

In the following sentence, the author might not have contemplated physical contact as part of the "initial contact," so the meaning is unclear: "[W]here the two were strangers and the circumstances of the initial contact were involuntary—accosted in parking lots, house break-ins—nearly everyone was certain that a rape had occurred." Susan Estrich, Real Rape 13 (1987). Cf. altercation & assault.

account, n. = (1) a detailed statement of the debits and credits between parties to a contract or to a fiduciary relationship; (2) a statement of monetary transactions; (3) at common law, a legal action used by a lord of a manor to order his bailiff to account for the profits of the manor; (4) more modernly, a legal action commenced by one who has given another person money to be applied in a particular way, the action being designed to compel the receiver of the money to provide details of the debts owed to the plaintiff. For one variety of sense (4), see account stated.

accountable takes for or to, not from. E.g., "A factor or commission merchant is to be held strictly accountable from [read for] any deviation from instructions received from his principal."

accountancy. See generally accepted accounting principles.

accountant is a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY that originally, in the 15th century, denoted "the defendant in an action of account." (See account, n.) By extension, in the 16th century, the word came to mean "one whose occupation is the keeping of accounts."

accountant general; accomptant general. The latter spelling—originating in the Renaissance habit of respelling French loanwords on the Latin model—is archaic. Cf. comptroller.

accounting. See bookkeeping & generally accepted accounting principles.

account stated. This phrase bears two distinct meanings: (1) an agreed balance between parties settling an action for debt; (2) a defendant's plea, in response to a bill for an accounting, in which the defendant states that the balance found due on the statement of the account has been discharged and that the defendant holds the plaintiff's release. See account.

accouter(ments); accoutre(ments). As with many other words having this suffix, the -er form is AmE, the -re BrE.

accrual; accruer. Accruer, like accruement, is an obsolete form of accrual, the general noun corresponding to the verb accrue. Accruer survives only in the phrase clause of accruer. Yet accrual has made substantial inroads even into this phrase, so that accrual and accruer now coexist needlessly. It is time to reject the archaic, and to establish firmly the modern form. Hence we should write clause of accrual.

accrue. A. Restriction to Financial Context. At least two critics have recommended that this word be restricted to monetary contexts, quite unaware of its most common meaning in legal contexts. Interest accrues, we may be certain, but so do causes of action—at least in jurisdictions in which they do not arise. (See (B).) E.g., "Plaintiff's cause of action for silicosis did not accrue until the plaintiff either knew of or had reason to know of the disease."

This use should not be extended further to mean "to inure to the benefit of," however, as here: "The appellate issue turns on whether the tax attributes associated with operations of certain commercial real estate properly accrued to [read inured to the benefit of] the corporation that held legal title."

B. Accrue and arise. In reference to causes of action, some courts have held that accrue and arise are synonymous, others that they can be distinguished. Arise may refer to the onset of the underlying wrong (e.g., exposure to asbestos), whereas accrue may refer to the ripeness of the claim (e.g., contraction of asbestosis or discovery of the disease). We need not set down a rule of usage so much as beware of the ambiguities of these terms in this particular context.

accruement. See accrual.

accumulate, -tive; cumulate, -tive. The former is far more common as the verb; the latter is current only in the adjective it yields (cumulative). Accumulate and cumulate both mean "to pile up; collect." Cumulate, however, should generally be avoided as a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Accumulate has the additional intransitive sense "to increase."

The adjectives demonstrate more palpable DIFFERENTIATION. In one sense they are synonymous: "increasing by successive addition," in which meaning cumulative is the usual and therefore the preferred term. Cumulative also means: (1) "relating to interest or a dividend paid to the corpus if not disbursed when due"; or (2) in law, "increasing in force as a result of additional or supporting evidence." In Scots law, cumulative is used also to mean "concurrent" <to serve cumulative sentences>.

Accumulative = acquisitive; inclined to amass. In addition, it has the meanings ascribed to cumulative. Yet it would be salutary to strengthen the distinction and restrict accumulative to the sense "acquisitive."

accusation; accusal. The first, of course, is current; the second is an obsolete word now classifiable as a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "Even families who limit themselves to superficial conversations . . . will recognize the dynamics at work here—the mother-son thing, the mother-daughter thing, the sister-brother thing, the brother-brother thing, the whole stew of tensions and attractions, accusals [read accusations] and denials." Dan Sullivan, "Total Blame," L.A. Times, 2 Dec. 1989, at F9. Cf. recusal.

accusatorial; inquisitorial. Accusatorial = (1) of or pertaining to an accuser; or (2) indicating the form of criminal prosecution in which the alleged criminal is publicly accused of the crime and is tried in public by a judge who does not act as the prosecutor" <accusatorial procedure>. Sense (2) grew directly out of sense (1), for, in the accusatorial system of criminal trial, the victim (i.e., accuser) made complaint against the offender.

Today, of course, accusatorial denotes the common-law system of criminal procedure. It is commonly contrasted with the civil-law term inquisitorial, which describes "a system of criminal justice . . . in which the truth is revealed by an inquiry into the facts conducted by the judge" (CDL).

Despite its neutral sense in civil law, inquisitorial often appears in common-law contexts as a pejorative word—e.g.: "The interrogation described in Miranda illustrated the extreme importance that American society placed on criminal prosecution, allowing tricks, cajolery, and even coercion to secure evidence from the suspect; the distinction between the inquisitorial and the accusatorial systems had become blurred."

A variant term for accusatorial procedure is adversary procedure, although the latter term may suggest civil as well as criminal proceedings.

accusatory; accusative; accusatorial. Accusatory (= accusing; of the nature of an accusation) is occasionally confused with accusatorial, q.v.

Accusative, although sometimes used in the place of accusatory, should be restricted to its grammatical sense relating to the objective case of nouns. E.g., "The feelings, attitudes and relations of the parents of the five-year-old child are strained, accusative [read accusatory] and acrimonious." Rodgers v. Hill, 453 So. 2d 1057, 1058 (Ala. Civ. App. 1984)./ "There is no contention herein that the witness was emotional, condemnatory, accusative [read accusatory] or demanding vindication." McQueen v. Commonwealth, 669 S.W.2d 519, 523 (Ky. 1984).

accuse may be used transitively or, less commonly, intransitively. Here it is intransitive: "It is conceivable that the Court has overstepped its boundaries as the dissenting Justices accuse." See charge (A).

Usually a word for criminal-law contexts, accuse has also been used to introduce allegations of noncriminal conduct (as in the preceding quotation). E.g., "The teams stand accused, essentially, of refusing to grant plaintiff's cablecast rights in furtherance of a conspiracy with Cablevision to monopolize cable television trade in Huntington."

accused, n., (= the defendant in a criminal case) was once said to be "more appropriate than either prisoner or defendant." Archibald Brown, A New Law Dictionary 10 (1874; repr. 1988). Its superiority to prisoner—a word that can prejudice juries (and perhaps even judges)—is unquestionable. But why it should have been considered "more appropriate" than defendant is a mystery. Today it is certainly less common in American and British courts than defendant, a colorless term: "[I]f you were on trial for a crime, would you rather be called 'the accused' or 'the defendant'? It seems to me that the latter expression is preferable, as the more neutral." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 93 n.3 (1978).

From a stylistic point of view, accused becomes awkward in the possessive case or as a plural: "The accused's silence may generate a reasonable inference that the accused believed the statement to be true." Usually this awkwardness can be remedied by use of the genitive: "The silence (or statement) of the accused . . ."; or, "The accused person's silence (or statement) . . . ." Cf. deceased. See POSSESSIVES (F) & PLURALS (D).

accusee is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of accused, q.v. E.g., "Later, [Judge Oren R. Lewis] turned to James S. Augus, the senior Justice Department trial lawyer, and accused him of 'shifting the burden of proof from the accuser [the Justice Department] to the accusee [read accused] . . . .'" Robert Meyers, Courtroom Becomes Classroom, Washington Post, 17 March 1979, at C3./ "This would, of course, suggest Nicholas Daniloff, U.S. News' Moscow correspondent, as the actual accusee [read accused]." Rance Crain, Spying Inside the Inside Story, Advertising Age, 29 Sept. 1986, at 46. See -EE.

accuser; accusor. The -er form is standard. See -ER (A).

accustomed. Formerly, the idiom was accustomed to do—e.g.: "[F]rom the beginning of our legal studies we are accustomed to think of law and equity as sharply divided." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 413 (7th ed. 1964). But in the mid-20th century, the idiom shifted to accustomed to doing, accustomed to thinking, etc. Today the older usage sounds strange to many ears, but some traditionalists stick to it.

acerbic, in AmE, is sometimes considered inferior to acerb, but the latter is so rare—and the former so common—that the criticism is misplaced. Acerbic is standard in BrE, in which acerb is virtually unknown. The noun is acerbity.

acknowledg(e)ment. A. Spelling. As with judgment and abridgment, the spelling without the -e- is preferable in AmE, acknowledgement being more common in BrE.

B. And verification. An acknowledgment is a formal declaration made in the presence of an authorized officer, such as a notary public, by someone who signs a document and swears to the authenticity of the signature. E.g., "It is sufficient if the testator states to the witnesses that the signature is his signature. This is known as acknowledgment of the signature." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 245 (1946).

A verification, by contrast, is such a formal declaration by which one swears to the truth of the statements in the document. E.g., "After making demand for judgment for $955, defendants appended a verification, notarized and sealed, in which they swore that the facts stated in the [answer were] . . . 'true and correct.'" Miller v. Master Home Builders, Inc., 239 A.2d 696, 697 (Del. Super. Ct. 1968).

acquaintanceship is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of acquaintance; it adds nothing to the language except another syllable, which we scarcely need. E.g., "The trial judge's acquaintanceship [read acquaintance] with the witness was not unusual in that it is to be expected that he would have contacts with other members of his bar in the normal practice of law."

acquiesce takes in or to. Some authorities have suggested that in is the only proper preposition. Yet the OED shows age-old examples with the construction acquiesce to, and its labeling that construction obsolete must be deemed a premature judgment, for it is fairly common in legal texts. E.g., "[T]he defense requested, or at least acquiesced to, the inclusion of a voluntary manslaughter instruction in the jury charge." Clara Tuma, Appeal of Self-Made Error Denied, Tex. Law., 7 Oct. 1991, at 9. Acquiesce with is not, however, in good use. The verb has three distinct syllables: /ak-wee-es/.

acquiescence. See permission.

acquirement; acquisition. "The former denotes the power or faculty of acquiring; the latter, the thing acquired." Eric Partridge, Usage and Abusage 17 (1973). E.g., "His acquirements in law surpass his acquisition of wealth." Both also mean "the act of acquiring," though acquisition is more usual.

acquirer. So spelled—not acquiror, as it is sometimes misspelled: "[T]he acquiror [read acquirer] gained a substantial position in the target company's stock." Gearhart Indus., Inc. v. Smith Int'l, Inc., 592 F. Supp. 203, 218 (N.D. Tex. 1984).

acquisition. See acquirement.

acquit. A. Civil and Criminal Contexts. Leff writes: "One might loosely refer to a party 'acquitted' in a civil action, though one would ordinarily be tempted to use the terminology only if the cause were quasi-criminal, e.g., an action charging actual fraud, or an intentional physical tort like battery." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1905 (1985).

B. Preposition with. The verb acquit takes of, not from—e.g.: "In the end James was induced to withdraw a letter resigning from the Society, after the Council had passed a resolution acquitting him from [read of] any unfairness." K.M. Elisabeth Murray, Caught in the Web of Words 286 (1977).

C. Past Tense. As a past-tense verb or a past-participial adjective, the form acquit is obsolete. It lives only in the LAW FRENCH phrase autrefois acquit (= heretofore acquitted). The accepted form today is acquitted.

acquittal; acquittance; acquitment. The first is the usual term, meaning both (1) "a release or discharge from debt or other liability" (W3); and (2) "a setting free or deliverance from the charge of an offense by verdict of a jury, sentence of a court, or other legal process" (W3). Acquitment, a NEEDLESS VARIANT, is obsolete.

Acquittance is obsolete in all senses except "a written release showing that a debtor has been discharged of an obligation." Perhaps it would be advantageous to allow acquittance this commercial meaning, and to leave acquittal to the criminal law. E.g., "There are suggestions in the case that if Mrs. Beer on receipt of the last installment had given Dr. Foakes an 'acquittance'—that is, an acknowledgment of payment in full—that would have been binding on her." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 31 (1974).

acquittal-prone. See guilt-prone.

acquittee (= one acquitted of a crime) is an ugly NEOLOGISM; the phrase acquitted defendant is ordinarily the better choice. E.g., "The Code also provides that the acquittee [read acquitted defendant] is entitled to a judicial hearing every six months." Jones v. U.S., 463 U.S. 354, 354 (1983)./ "He is, therefore, not an 'insanity acquittee' but a 'criminally insane committee.'" Glatz v. Kort, 650 F. Supp. 191, 195 (D. Colo 1984). [Read He is therefore not a defendant acquitted by reason of insanity, but one committed to a guardian as criminally insane.] See committee & -EE.

ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS. Four points merit our attention here. First, we should be aware of the traditional distinction between the two types of abbreviated names. An acronym is made from the initial letters or parts of a phrase or compound term. One ordinarily reads or speaks it as a single word, not letter by letter (e.g., radar = radio detection and ranging). An initialism, by contrast, is made from the initial letters or parts of a phrase or compound term, but is usually pronounced letter by letter, not as a single word (e.g., r.p.m. = revolutions per minute).

Second, the question often arises whether to place periods after each letter in an acronym or initialism. Search for consistency on this point is futile. The trend nowadays is to omit the periods; including them is the more traditional approach. Yet surely if an acronym is spoken as a single word (e.g., ERISA, ERTA), periods are meaningless. If an initialism is made up of lowercase letters, periods are preferable: rpm looks odd as compared with r.p.m., and am looks like the verb (as opposed to a.m.). One method of determining whether to omit or include periods is to follow the form of the organization one names (e.g., IRS, HUD), although inconsistencies are common.

Third, the best practice is to give the reader some forewarning of uncommon acronyms by spelling out the words and enclosing the acronym in parentheses when the term is first used. A reference to CARPE Rules may confuse a reader who does not at first realize that three or four lines above this acronym the writer has referred to a Committee on Academic Rights, Privileges, and Ethics.

Finally, as illustrated under the entry entitled INITIALESE, the use in a single text of a number of these abbreviated forms leads to dense and frustrating prose.

act. A. And action. These are important words in law; yet they are often used indiscriminately. To be sure, the words overlap a great deal, and it is difficult to delineate the distinctions accurately. Act is the more concrete, action the more abstract word. But even act is a vague word, "being used in various senses of different degrees of generality. When it is said, however, that an act is one of the essential conditions of liability, we use the term in the widest sense of which it is capable. We mean by it any event [that] is subject to the control of the human will." M.G. Paulsen & S.H. Kadish, Criminal Law and Its Processes 212 (1962).

Generally, act denotes the thing done, action the doing of it. Crabb approaches a workable demarcation:

> When these words are taken in the sense of the thing done, they admit of a . . . distinction. An act is the single thing done, or what is done by a single effort, as that is your act or his act; an action may consist of more acts than one, or embrace the causes or the consequences of the action, as a bold action, to judge of actions, etc.
> Hence it is that the term act is more proper than action where it is so defined as to imply what is single and simple, as an act of authority, an act of government, an act of folly, and the like; but otherwise the word action is to be preferred where the moral conduct or character is in question. We may enumerate particular acts of a man's life, as illustrative of certain traits of his character, or certain circumstances of his life; but to speak at large of his actions would be to describe his character.
> George Crabb, Crabb's English Synonymes 24–25 (1917).

As a further gloss, action suggests a process—the many discrete events that make up a bit of behavior—whereas act is unitary.

B. Act of omission. Is it proper to speak of an act of omission, or does act invariably denote a positive act, i.e., an act of commission? Usage differs: in the phrase act or omission, the word act denotes an act of commission, as opposed to a forbearance; but at other times the word appears to include a forbearance as well as an act of commission. Thus, the phrase act of omission may be proper; at the same time, though, some readers are likely to sense a MISCUE by wondering whether of is a typographical error for or.

C. And enactment. Act has many meanings, but, when used as a synonym for statute, it is usually clear from the context. Strictly, enactment should refer to the passing or enacting of a law (i.e., its enactment), but not to the law once enacted. E.g., "[T]he purpose of an enactment [read act] is embedded in its words even though it is not always pedantically expressed in words." U.S. v. Shirey, 359 U.S. 255, 261 (1959) (per Frankfurter, J.)./ "Several states that have patterned their surveillance statutes on the federal model have simply incorporated this exception into their enactments [read acts; see INELEGANT VARIATION], and other states have adopted consent surveillance statutes." Enaction is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of enactment. To sum up, courts pass on the constitutionality of acts, not enactments; one witnesses the enactment of a bill.

In BrE, Act (= statute) is usually capitalized so as to prevent MISCUES—e.g.: "[W]hen an Act was repealed, and the repealing statute itself was subsequently repealed, the first Act was revived as from the original time of its commencement." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 472 (7th ed. 1964). See treaty.

actio(n). In phrases such as actio(n) ex contractu and actio(n) ex delictu, action is better than actio. Better yet is contract action or tort action.

action. A. And suit. Action = a mode of proceeding in court to enforce a private right, to redress or prevent a private wrong, or to punish a public offense. As the latter part of that definition suggests, it is possible to speak of criminal actions. Originally, action referred exclusively to proceedings in a court of law; suit referred to proceedings in chancery (or equity), as well as to prosecutions at law. When the jurisdictional distinction existed, an action ended at judgment, but a suit in equity ended after judgment and execution. Today, since virtually all jurisdictions have merged the administration of law and equity, the terms action and suit are interchangeable. See suit.

B. And act. See act (A).

C. In Phrases Such as action in trespass, action in detinue. Often such phrases are shortened to trespass, detinue, etc., and the result is often a MISCUE. In the following sentence, for example, the trespasser and the complainant seem to be transposed: "Trespass by Rollin A. Richmond [the plaintiff] against James W. Fiske [the trespasser]." Richmond v. Fiske, 35 N.E. 103, 103 (Mass. 1893).

actionable has two important senses: (1) "furnishing grounds for a lawsuit"; and (2) "liable to a lawsuit." Sense (1) is the most usual in legal contexts—e.g.: "One of the general rules governing this action is that words are actionable when spoken of one in an office of profit which may probably occasion the loss of his office."/ "Plaintiff Banks states no actionable claim of constitutional deprivations."

The word has recently taken on a third sense: "giving rise to an act or action; act-on-able"—e.g.: "He had an actionable intent—that is, he would act on it."/ "Many are ambitious visions of a utopian business state—nebulous feel-good credos designed to inspire employees but lacking any actionable component." William B. Yanes, Mission Statements Can Be Inspiring but Impractical, Investor's Daily, 10 Dec. 1990, at 8./ "Only [a marketing professional] who understands the real world of lawyering can utilize the data to make recommendations that are precise and actionable." Mercy Jimenez, The Group, A.B.A. J., Jan. 1991, at 86. But most dictionaries do not record any definition consistent with this usage, which is predicated upon a misunderstanding of action (= lawsuit) as used in the term (i.e., "giving rise to a lawsuit").

action, form of. See form of action.

action for money had and received. See money had and received, action for.

action for money paid. See money had and received, action for.

action on the case, a LOAN TRANSLATION of the LAW FRENCH action sur le case, is the common-law term for a personal tort action. E.g., "This is an action on the case by husband for the alienation of affections of his wife by her parents, the defendants."

Trespass on the case and case alone are variant forms. None of these phrases is used much in modern legal prose, except in historical contexts—e.g.: "The modern torts, for the most part, are the offspring of that prolific 'action on the case' which began to be developed in the later years of the fourteenth century." C.H.S. Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law 3 (1949). See trespass on the case.

activable. So formed—not activatable, as some writers mistakenly write: "Perry does not assert that film coatings activatable [read activable] to adhesiveness by head were new in the art." S.D. Warren Co. v. Nashua Gummed & Coated Paper Co., 205 F.2d 602, 604 (1st Cir. 1953). See -ATABLE.

ACTIVE VOICE. See PASSIVE VOICE.

act of God is a vague, frequently vilified shorthand expression that does not lend itself to clear legal thinking. It is narrower than vis major or force majeure in that it denotes an unusual and uncontrollable action of nature, whereas vis major and force majeure also include the results of human action. See force majeure & vis major.

actual; constructive. These words are opposed in a variety of legal phrases, for example, constructive as against actual fraud, constructive as against actual possession. When actual is used in such a phrase, the extrinsic facts merit the legal conclusion that, e.g., fraud or possession exists. When constructive is used, the extrinsic facts do not fall within the strict definition of, say, fraud or possession, but the court finds (or is requested to find), usu. on equitable grounds, that the legal conclusion of fraud or possession should apply. Lon Fuller considered the adjective constructive a "badge of shame," saying that expressions such as those just mentioned "stand out like ugly scars in the language of the law, the linguistic wounds of discarded make-believes." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 22–23 (1967; repr. 1977). See constructive.

actual fact, in. A redundancy: all facts are actual, just as they are all true. When one is uncertain of the truth of allegations, then there might be "alleged facts." In actual fact is a pomposity for actually.

actuality is frequently a turgid substitute for reality or fact. E.g., "The existence of a fiduciary relationship is to be determined from the actualities [read facts] of the relationship between the persons involved."/ "The great divide in the equal-protection decisions lies in the difference between emphasizing actualities [read realities] and the abstractions of legislation." In actuality is always inferior to actually.

actuate; activate. The Evanses wrote that actuate means "to move (mechanical things) to action" and that activate means "to make active." Bergen Evans & Cornelia Evans, Contemporary American Usage 10 (1957). The distinction is a fine one not generally followed by dictionaries. Here actuation is correctly used: "A blade brake control device would stop the blade less than one second after actuation."

More often, however, actuate and actuation appear in legal prose as fancy substitutes for motivate and motivation in a variety of contexts. This usage should generally be avoided on stylistic grounds, but it is not strictly incorrect—e.g.: "To prevent imposition of a constructive trust, the wife would have to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the conveyance was actuated [read motivated] by fraud."/ "The wrong was actuated [read motivated] by a positive design to injure the third person to whom the duty was due."

The temptation to use actuate rather than motivate is much greater where the noun motive appears, so that one avoids REDUNDANCY. But a simple rewording usually obviates the need for actuate—e.g.: "When one exercises a legal right, the motive that actuates him is immaterial [read one's motives are immaterial]."/ "Counsel had the absolute privilege of making such deductions, even though they were false and he was actuated by improper motives [read had improper motives]."/ "The showing of invidiousness is made if a defendant demonstrates that the government's selective prosecution is actuated by constitutionally impermissible motives [read the government, in its selective prosecution, was acting on constitutionally impermissible motives]." See animate.

actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea. This MAXIM, phrased in LAW LATIN, is pronounced /ak-təs-non-fas-ət-ree-əm-nI-sI-men-sit-ree-ə/. Meaning "an act does not make a person guilty unless his or her mind is guilty," the maxim expresses the criminal-law requirement of mens rea in addition to an actus reus. Traceable to the early 12th century, the brocard (q.v.) appears much more commonly in British than in American legal writing—e.g.: "Intent becomes the chief, though not the only, test; and the general rule is formed: actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, i.e., an act does not make the doer guilty unless his mind is guilty . . . ." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 196 (3d ed. 1955).

actus reus. See mens rea* & overt act.

A.D. This abbreviation (for Anno Domini, not after death) is unnecessary after dates in legal documents. In fact, it is absurd to use it with a modern date.

ad for advertisement is acceptable only in very informal contexts.

adapt and adopt are occasionally confounded. To adapt something is to modify it for one's own purposes; to adopt something is to accept it wholesale and use it.

adapt(at)ion, -(at)ive. The longer form is preferred in the noun (adaptation), the shorter in the adjective (adaptive).

a dato; a datu. Both LEGALISMS mean "from the date," and both are anachronistic. A dato is the better Latin form.

addable; addible. The former is preferred. See -ABLE (A) ad damnum [L. "to the damage"] = (1) adj., of, relating to, or constituting the clause stating—in a declaration, writ, or pleading—what damages the plaintiff demands; (2) n., a prayer for relief that names the amount of damages claimed; or (3) n., the amount of damages that a plaintiff claims in any given case.

Generally, it is possible for legal writers to use clearer phrasing without this LATINISM—e.g.: "Thus, even if the statute were retroactively applicable . . . it refers only to the ad damnum plead- ing [read pleading demanding damages] and not to the closing argument." Gumbs v. Pueblo Int'l, Inc., 823 F.2d 768, 771 n.1 (3d Cir. 1987)./ "[A] plaintiff may file a lawsuit with an ad damnum [read claiming damages] in excess of the amount in the notice of claim." McFarlane by McFarlane v. U.S., 684 F. Supp. 780, 782 (E.D.N.Y. 1988)./ "Counsel reasoned that each of the original plaintiffs claimed an amount far in excess of $10,000 in the ad damnum clause of [read in the prayer for relief in] their amended complaint." Sterling v. Velsicol Chem. Corp., 855 F.2d 1188, 1195 (6th Cir. 1988).

added to. See together with.

addicted; dependent. In the realm of human reaction to drugs, the distinction between these terms can be an important one. One who is addicted to a habit-forming drug has a compulsive physiological need for it. One who is dependent on a drug has a strong psychological reliance on it after having used it for some time. Addiction, then, is primarily physical, whereas dependency (also known as habituation) is primarily psychological.

additur; increscitur. Neither synonym is as common as the correlative term—remittitur (for which see remittitur)—but additur is the more usual of the two, as Traynor explained: "Additur, sometimes called increscitur, is used . . . to describe an order by which a plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground of inadequate damages is denied on the condition that the defendant consent to a specified increase of the award." Dorsey v. Barba, 240 P.2d 604, 610 n.1 (Cal. 1952) (en banc) (Traynor, J., concurring & dissenting).

The term additur is an American NEOLOGISM of the early 20th century; it does not occur in English cases, and the first contextual use by an American court suggests its newness: "[T]he order made in this case, might perhaps be termed an 'additur.'" Schiedt v. Dimick, 70 F.2d 558, 563 (1st Cir. 1934). For an interesting but erroneous account of the word—erroneous because it attributes the word first to a Yale Law Journal article commenting on the case just cited—see Michael H. Cardozo, A Word Is Born: "Additur," 1934–___, 2 Scribes J. Legal Writing 143 (1991).

address, v.t., = (1) to call attention to for discussion or consideration; or (2) to state (a question) (to someone). In sense (1) it is a FORMAL WORD that is sometimes used inappropriately—e.g.: "That portion of the trial court's decree is not, therefore, assailed by Maria Rosa, as clearly her discontent addresses [read centers on or arises out of] the denial of a jury trial on the only factual issues raised having to do with proper division of the estate." That sentence exemplifies HYPALLAGE run amok; generally, address should take personal subjects, although by legitimate transference one might say that arguments or pleas address certain points. But discontent is not a proper subject for the verb. Following is a correct use of the term: "These points of error all relate to events after the making of the contract and fail to address the issue of fraud in the inducement."

Address should be accented on the second syllable both as a verb and as a noun.

addressable is listed in RH2 as a NEOLOGISM dating from 1950–1955, but much earlier examples exist in law—e.g.: "[I]nasmuch as counsel themselves say that [the objections] are made not so much to impeach the validity of the act as to show its injustice, a consideration addressable to the Legislature, but not to us, no discussion of them is required." Riley v. Chambers, 185 P. 855, 859 (Cal. 1919).

adduce; educe; deduce. All are useful in reference to evidence. To adduce is to put forward for consideration something by way of evidence or arguments. E.g., "In the original panel opinion we held that Rushing's live testimony at trial would have had only a cumulative effect on this issue, because Wells had access to and did adduce testimony concerning the town's supervision and training of Rushing."

To educe is to draw out or evoke or elicit. E.g., "That divorce judgment, after the filing of this suit, was reversed and remanded for retrial by a Texas intermediate court on October 27, 1983, as was educed on further showings made in the federal trial court before that court's judgment of dismissal now before us on appeal."

To deduce is to infer—e.g.: "The jury could reasonably have deduced that defendant intended such a result." See deduce & educe.

adducible. So spelled—not adduceable. (See -ABLE (A).) Occasionally, adducible (or its misspelled variant) is misused for deducible—e.g.: "Thus, if . . . we determine that the residue of facts is so devoid of evidence of probative value and reasonable inferences adduceable [read deducible] therefrom, as to preclude guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, we should so declare." Liston v. State, 250 N.E.2d 739, 743 (Ind. 1969)./ "On appeal, after . . . presuming the existence of every fact reasonably adduceable [read deducible] from the evidence, the court must determine whether substantial evidence supports the finding of premeditation and deliberation." People v. Mitchell, 183 Cal. Rptr. 166, 171 (Cal. Ct. App. 1982).

adduction, n., corresponds to the verb adduce but is not nearly as common as that verb. E.g., "His only reply to Scrope's adduction of a named case is, 'Never will you see such an avowry received.'" Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 194 (7th ed. 1964).

adeem is the verb form of ademption. The pair is analogous to redeem / redemption.

ademption. A. And lapse. Whereas lapse occurs when a beneficiary does not survive to receive property given in a will, ademption occurs when the testator otherwise disposes of the property: "Lapse was a matter of no-Henry. Ademption is a matter of no-car. To raise the question is usually to answer it. If the testator has no car at his death, what if anything does he want Henry to have? The will should say. If it does not say, the dispute will turn on whether the bequest is specific—in which case it is adeemed by extinction and Henry gets nothing—or general, in which case the executor will have to get a car for Henry." Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 180 (2d ed. 1979).

B. Two Types. The two types of ademption are usefully distinguished. Ademption by extinction is the forfeiture of a legacy or bequest by the beneficiary because the property specifically described in the will is not in the estate at the testator's death. Ademption by satisfaction occurs when the testator, while alive, gives property to a donee named in the will, with the intention of rendering the testamentary gift inoperative.

adequate; sufficient. Though originally both words were used in reference to quantity, today there is a trend toward using adequate qualitatively, and sufficient quantitatively. Hence adequate means "suitable to the occasion or circumstances," and sufficient means "enough for a particular need or purpose."

In contracts, with respect to consideration, q.v., a special distinction applies. One rule of consideration is that it need not be adequate but it must be sufficient. Here, adequate consideration means a realistic economic equivalent of the promise it buys, whereas sufficient consideration means something having economic value and not stemming from a preexisting legal duty.

ad fin(em) = to the end. One would be hard-pressed to justify the Latin phrase in place of the English equivalent. (See LATINISMS.) The phrase is sometimes used in citations in a sense similar to et seq., q.v., but the better practice is to cite specific pages, that is, to give an ending as well as a starting point. If, however, ad fin. is to be used, a period should follow the abbreviated form (as just given).

adherence. A. And adhesion. Both words derive from the verb to adhere, but adhesion is generally literal and adherence generally figurative. One should write of adherence to tenets or beliefs, and of adhesion of bubble gum to the sole of one's shoe. The word more frequently called upon in legal contexts is adherence: "There are also authorities to the contrary and we might make mention of a retreat by the Supreme Court of Nebraska from adherence to the rule."/ "Can conspirators signify their adhesion [read adherence] at different times?" Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 353 (1978).

Yet the standard rules of usage relating to these words find exceptions in the law. One exception to the foregoing advice is the phrase adhesion contract or contract of adhesion. Said to have been introduced into legal nomenclature by Edwin W. Patterson in The Delivery of a Life Insurance Policy, 33 Harv. L. Rev. 198, 222 (1919), the term refers to a standard printed contract prepared by one party, to be signed by the party in a weaker position, usu. a consumer, who has little choice about the terms of the contract. The metaphor suggested is that the consumer must adhere to the contract as presented, or reject it completely. (Such a contract is also known, more familiarly to nonlawyers, as a take-it-or-leave-it contract.) Adhesion, then, has a figurative rather than a literal sense in this legal phrase. See leonine contract.

Another exception, not so frequently encountered, involves treaties. When a government enters into some but not all of the provisions of a treaty already existing between two other governments, adhesion is the term to describe the third government's entrance into the treaty.

B. Preposition with. Adherence, like adhesion, takes the preposition to. "This holding mandates close adherence from [read to] the letter of the law."

adhibit, v.t., and its noun equivalent adhibition are pompous LEGALISMS. To adhibit is to apply; an adhibition is an application (of something to something else). E.g., "We are importuned by the Dayton Newspapers, Inc., in this original action in this court to adhibit [read apply] the extraordinary writ of prohibition . . . ." State ex rel. Dayton Newspapers, Inc. v. Phillips, 351 N.E.2d 127, 139 (Ohio 1976) (Corrigan, J., dissenting)./ "[A]ppellants' adhibition [read application] of mortality tables and their presentation and argument in the second trial . . . were predicated . . . on the metachronism that Sally was born nineteen years before the accident [that] took her life in 1970 . . . ." Hines v. Sweet, 567 S.W.2d 435, 438 (Mo. Ct. App. 1978)./ "A threshold requirement for the adhibition [read application] of Title VI to a federal grantee's employment practices appears in § 604." Guardians Ass'n v. Civil Serv. Comm'n, 466 F. Supp. 1273, 1281 (S.D.N.Y. 1979).

ad hoc, adv. & adj., is a widespread and useful term meaning "for this specific purpose." Though some witch-hunting Latin-haters have questioned its justification in English (see, e.g., Vigilans [Eric Partridge], Chamber of Horrors 26 (1952)), it is firmly established and serves legal language well when used correctly <ad hoc committee>.

By extension—some would say SLIPSHOD EXTENSION—the term has come to mean "without any underlying principle that can be consistently applied"—e.g.: "The majority opinion insufficiently considers the basic substantive rules of law invoked by plaintiff's complaint, it is an ad hoc opinion that grants desired relief to needy persons but its effects on established law could be serious." Sometimes the phrase appears to mean "improvised from whatever is at hand," as here: "This procedure is carried out on a very ad hoc [read haphazard?] basis."/ "Lawyers and judges apparently devise voir dire questions in a fairly ad hoc [read haphazard or desultory] way; sometimes prosecutors inadvertently pose questions that work to the advantage of the defense, and vice-versa."

Generally speaking, the phrases on an ad hoc basis and in an ad hoc way are verbose for the adverb ad hoc. (See basis (B).) Likewise, ad hoc should rarely if ever be qualified by very or fairly. Finally, attempts to coalesce the phrase into one word have failed, and should be forgotten. Cf. pro hac vice (A).

ad hominem [L. "to the man"] is shortened from the LATINISM argumentum ad hominem (= an argument directed not to the merits of an opponent's argument but to the personality or character of the opponent).

The word is sometimes misspelled ad hominum—e.g.: "The Petitioners object to the conclusion that it is permissible to challenge an expert witness through an ad hominum [read ad hominem] argument . . . ." U.S. v. Ellingsworth, 692 F. Supp. 356, 369 (D. Del. 1988)./ "[T]he Commonwealth has chosen to couch its appeal in language characterized by an ad hominum [read ad hominem] attack on the trial judge." Commonwealth v. Rosario, 583 A.2d 1229, 1233 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1990) (Cavanaugh, J., dissenting).

ad idem = to the same point or matter; in agreement. E.g., "That being so, there was no consensus ad idem, and therefore no binding contract."/ "At the end of the short trial I felt constrained to find that the plaintiff and defendant were never ad idem [read never had the same understanding] on the purported sale of land by the defendant to the plaintiff." (Eng.) An English equivalent, such as of the same mind or to that effect, is generally more comprehensible than this Latin phrase, and even more elegant. See FORBIDDEN WORDS. For consensus ad idem, see meeting of the minds.

adjacent; contiguous. These words should be distinguished. Adjacent = lying near. Contiguous = directly abutting or bordering on. See adjoin.

adjective law is not a set of rules governing words that modify nouns, but rather the aggregate of rules on procedure. In law as in language, the adjective affects the substantive. E.g., "The adjective law of workmen's compensation, like the substantive, takes its tone from the beneficent and remedial character of the legislation." 3 Arthur Larson, Workmen's Compensation Law § 77A.10, at 15-1 (1986).

Adjectival law is a little-used variant—e.g.: "[A] constructive trust frequently is classified as a division of adjectival rather than substantive law." 76 Am. Jur. 2d Trusts § 222, at 448 (1975)./ "Adjectival law relates to the enforcement of rights and duties: in particular, it concerns procedure and evidence." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 19 (11th ed. 1982).

ADJECTIVES. A. What One Is. An adjective is a word that modifies a noun. The word is sometimes used sloppily as if it meant "noun"—e.g.: "'Excellence' is an adjective [read noun] that describes something which is of the highest quality." Their Work Stands Out, Barrister, Summer 1989, at 5.

B. Uncomparable Adjectives. A number of adjectives describe absolute states or conditions and therefore cannot take comparative degrees in most or more, less or least, or intensives such as very or quite or largely. The illogic of such combinations is illustrated in this sentence: "It is possible that this idea too has outlived its usefulness and soon will be largely discarded." The literal meaning of discard impinges on the metaphor here: it is hard to imagine a single idea being halfway discarded, though certainly it could be halfway discredited.

The best-known uncomparable adjective is unique (= being the one and only of a kind). Because something is either unique or not unique, there can be no degrees of uniqueness. Hence more unique and very unique are incorrect. Yet something may be almost unique or not quite unique—if, for example, there were two such things extant. (See unique.) Many other words belong to this class, such as preferable: "We think that, while perhaps the denial did not follow the most preferable [read the preferable] course, it was adequate."

Following is a short list of uncomparable adjectives:

absolute	fundamental	possible adequate	ideal	preferable basic	impossible	principal certain	inevitable	stationary chief	irrevocable	sufficient complete	main	true devoid	major	unavoidable entire	manifest	unbroken essential	minor	uniform false	necessary	unique fatal	only	universal
first	perpetuity	whole

The general prohibition against using these words in comparative senses should be tempered with reason; it has exceptions. For example, Thomas Jefferson used the phrase more perfect in the Declaration of Independence, and the phrase then made its way into the U.S. Constitution: "We the People of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." U.S. Const. pmbl. One writer criticizes this phrase and suggests that it "should read 'to form a more nearly perfect Union.'" George J. Miller, On Legal Style, 43 Ky. L.J. 235, 246 (1955). Although the Constitution is not without stylistic blemishes, this surely is not one of them, and the suggested edit is pedantic. See more perfect.

In short, good writers occasionally depart from the rule, but knowingly and purposefully. Poor writers use uncomparable adjectives indiscriminately, and in the end weaken their writing through hyperbolic qualification. See WEASEL WORDS.

C. Adjectives as Nouns. Words in the English language frequently have the ability to change parts of speech. Thus nouns may act as adjectives (deposition testimony, court protocol) and adjectives as nouns (corporeals [BrE] = corporeal things). Legal writers refer to innocents (= innocent persons), immovables, movables, and necessaries (= necessary things). Indigent was originally an adjective (15th c.), but it came to be used as a noun (16th c.).

The same process occurred with hypothetical, postmortem, principal (= principal investment), ignitables, potential, explosives, and recitative. More modern examples are finals (= final examinations) and classifieds (= classified advertisements). Similarly, we refer to the poor, the homeless, the rich, the religious, and the destitute.

Though recent semantic shifts remain unsuitable for formal contexts, we should resist the benighted temptation to condemn all such shifts in parts of speech. Cf. NOUNS AS ADJECTIVES

D. Adjectives as Verbs. Though noun-to-adjective, adjective-to-noun, and even noun-to-verb transformations are common in English, adjective-to-verb transformations have never been common. They usually have a jargonistic quality (as in the first example below) or a trendy quality (as in the second). Careful writers avoid them or, when quoting someone else, distance themselves by using telltale quotation marks (as Gilmore and Black did): "The New York City Fire Commissioner directed that her cargo tanks be 'inerted' through the introduction of carbon dioxide into the tanks." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 925 (2d ed. 1975).// "Clinton would be well-advised to low-key the task force before it announces anything embarrassing . . . ." Joe Klein, Time to Step Back, Newsweek, 17 May 1993, at 40. Cf. NOUNS AS VERBS.

E. Coordinate Adjectives. When two adjectives, both modifying the same noun, are related in sense, they should be separated by and or by a comma—e.g.: "[T]he purpose of Rule 11 as a whole is to bring home to the individual signer his personal, non-delegable responsibility." Jeffrey N. Cole, Rule 11 Now, 17 Litigation 10, 12 (Spring 1991).

But when the consecutive adjectives are unrelated, they should have no intervening comma or conjunction—e.g.: "An interesting contrast in judicial philosophy as to the scope of an employee's ethical duty is revealed in a similar and Texas case [read similar Texas case]."

Some consecutive adjectives present close questions—e.g.: "The brief, unsigned Supreme Court opinion said that the lawyers for Ms. Benten had failed to show a substantial likelihood that the case would be won if it were argued before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit . . . ." Phillip J. Hilts, Justices Refuse to Order Return of Abortion Pill, N.Y. Times, 18 July 1992, at 1. Is the fact that the opinion is brief related to the fact that it is unsigned (i.e., per curiam)? If so, the comma is proper; if not, the comma is improper. Because signed opinions tend to be longer than unsigned opinions, the comma is probably justified.

For more on the punctuation of successive adjectives, see PUNCTUATION (C)(1).

F. Proper Names as Adjectives. When a proper name is used attributively as an adjective, the writer should capitalize only that portion used in attribution. In Southmark Properties v. The Charles House Corp., 742 F.2d 862 (5th Cir. 1984), the opinion is scattered with references to "The Charles House property." The, however, should be lowercased, for the skeletal phrase is "the property," and only Charles House is being used attributively. The definite article, then, derives from the skeletal phrase and not from the name of the party, even though the name of the party is The Charles House Corporation.

The practice of using place-names as adjectives is generally to be resisted, although it is increasingly common. Using a city plus the state as an adjective disrupts the flow of the sentence—e.g.: "Farmland's president, Marc Goldman, sent out sleuths who traced the missing containers to an Elizabeth, N.J., warehouse he says is filled with discarded bottles of designer water." Edward Felsenthal, Nobody's Crying Yet, But There Must Be Spilled Milk Somewhere, Wall St. J., 20 June 1990, at B1. Such constructions contribute to NOUN PLAGUE, lessen readability, and offend sensitive, literate readers.

The disruption does not occur when the city's name occurs without the state—e.g.: "An Austin jury returned a verdict in the court of Judge Walter Smith of Waco." Accountant Found Guilty, Austin American-Statesman, 21 July 1990, at B6.

G. Pronominal Indefinite Adjectives. Adjectives such as each, any, every, all, no, and some should be used only when they serve some demonstrable purpose. When a subject is plural, such an adjective is usually unnecessary—e.g.: "All corporate officers [read Corporate officers] shall . . . ."

A few conventions with these words are useful in the realm of DRAFTING. First, if a right, privilege, or power is extended, the drafter should use each or a <each director may>. Second, if a duty is imposed, the drafter should use each or a <each director must>. And third, if a proscription is set out, the drafter should use no <no director may>. See STATUTE DRAFTING & WORDS OF AUTHORITY.

H. Past-Participial Adjectives. Some past participles work perfectly well as adjectives, and others do not. There can be a tired or irritated person, but not a disappeared person: "Because of the nonaccess between C.W. and her disappeared husband [read husband who has disappeared], such a presumption should fail." The reason is that disappeared has not been accepted idiomatically as a prepositive adjective, whereas other past participles (such as tired and irritated) have been. Some legal phrases can be framed either way: thus, cases decided and cases cited, or decided cases and cited cases.

I. Phrasal or Compound Adjectives. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

J. Modification of Adjectives Ending in -ed. See very (B).

K. Adjectives Ending in -ly. See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (B).

L. Adjectives That Follow the Noun. See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

M. Dates as Adjectives. See DATES (C).

adjoin means both "to join" and "to lie adjacent to." In the latter sense, it is transitive and should take a direct object: "The park was likened to a garden that traditionally (as an appurtenance) adjoined to a residence [read adjoined a residence]." Etymologically, adjoining means "directly abutting; contiguous," as opposed to adjacent, q.v.

adjourn [fr. F. à jour "to a day"] means literally "to put off to another day or place." E.g., "But the case was adjourned to the court of Exchequer Chamber, where all the judges of England considered difficult cases . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 105 (1966)./ "[M]agistrates have very wide powers to grant or refuse bail when a person is first brought before them, and the case has to be adjourned to a later date." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 25 (1983).

adjournment; adjournal. Except in Scotland, the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. In Scotland, the Books of Adjournal are the records of the Justiciary Court.

adjudge; adjudicate; dijudicate; judge. Adjudge = (1) to consider judicially; to rule upon; (2) to deem or pronounce to be; or (3) to award judicially. Adjudicate shares all three meanings of adjudge and is more common than adjudge in sense (1). In senses (2) and (3), adjudge is the more usual term: "Nor can a court of equity adjudge [sense (2)] the decree of any other court binding or punish the violation of any decrees but its own."/ "Costs are adjudged [sense (3)] to appellant." For examples of adjudicate in sense (2), see adjudicate (B).

Dijudicate (= to decide between; adjudicate) is a rare term without justification in modern prose.

Judge is the general term meaning "to try a person or case as a judge does." Additionally, it has the lay meaning "to form a critical estimate of." Judge should not be used in sense (2) of adjudge, as here: "Plaintiff argues that the society must declare a winner of the contest or be judged [read adjudged] to have breached an implicit agreement with the contestants."

The Evanses wrote that adjudicate was more common than judge in reference to disputes outside the courts. Bergen Evans & Cornelia Evans, Contemporary American Usage 261 (1957). Lawyers, however, restrict adjudicate to contexts involving courts or other resolvers of disputes, whereas they may use judge in nonlegal senses. See adjudicate.

Adjudge is best used with the object immediately following: "The court found him guilty of the charge and adjudged him in contempt." There is a tendency (to be avoided) to insert as after adjudge—e.g.: "adjudge as bankrupt" for "adjudge bankrupt." Cf. abjudge.

adjudg(e)ment. See judg(e)ment.

adjudicate. A. Proper Object with. Disputes and controversies are adjudicated, or "settled judicially"; property cannot be adjudicated, although conflicting rights in it can be. E.g., "The supersedeas bond must be in the amount of the judgment or the value of property adjudicated [read property in dispute, or property subject to adjudication]."/ "We reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Kansas insofar as it held that Kansas law was applicable to all the transactions that it sought to adjudicate [read transactions giving rise to this controversy (or adjudication)]." See adjudication. Cf. litigate.

B. Meaning "to deem." Adjudicate frequently means "to deem or pronounce judicially," sense (2) of adjudge, q.v. "Neither dolomite nor granite has been adjudicated a 'mineral.'"/ "Once laws are validly enacted it is not for the courts to adjudicate upon their wisdom, their appropriateness, or the necessity for their existence." (Eng.)/ "Associates continued to deteriorate financially and in 1975, it was placed in liquidation and, in separate proceedings, adjudicated a bankrupt." (Most legal texts written in BrE say that an insolvent entity is "adjudicated bankrupt," not "adjudicated a bankrupt," as in AmE.) For other senses of adjudicate, see adjudge.

adjudicated has come into use as an adjective. Thus instead of writing, "The ward was adjudicated an incompetent," some legists have begun to write, "The ward is an adjudicated bankrupt." The adjectival usage purports to give the statement more authority, for it focuses on what the subject is, as opposed to what someone has done to it.

adjudication; adjudicature. Adjudication = (1) the process of judging; (2) a court's pronouncement of a judgment or decree; or (3) the judgment so given. Adjudicature is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. (See judicature.) On the plural use of adjudication, see PLURALS (B)

Leff writes that, in modern usage, "adjudication can . . . be used as a rough synonym for litigation—e.g.: 'the matter is in adjudication now.'" Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law 1855, 1934 (1985). This SLIPSHOD EXTENSION should be avoided unless, of course, the writer intends to refer to the deliberative process of judges and not to the courtroom proceedings in which lawyers take part. See adjudicate (A) & litigate.

adjudicative; adjudicatory; judicative; judicatory; judicatorial. As between adjudicative and adjudicatory, both meaning "having the character or attribute of adjudicating," the former is standard, easier to pronounce, and better sounding. Yet the latter appears with some frequency. Thus, even though we have adjudicative facts and adjudicative hearings, our legal texts reveal adjudicatory proceedings and an adjudicatory action. There is no need for the two to coexist, for no workable DIFFERENTIATION now appears to be possible. One is best advised to use adjudicative in all contexts.

adjudicative facts. See legislative facts.

adjudicator; adjudicataire; judicator. Adjudicator = one who adjudicates. If used merely for judge, it is a pomposity. But in some contexts it is quite defensible—e.g.: "We find nothing in the history or constitutional treatment of military tribunals that entitles them to rank along with Article III courts as adjudicators of the guilt or innocence of people charged with offenses for which they can be deprived of their life, liberty, or property." Adjudicataire, a term from Canadian law, means "a purchaser at a judicial sale" (W3). Judicator is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of adjudicator.

adjudicature for adjudication. See judicature & adjudication.

adjure (= to urge earnestly) for require is an odd error: "Arizona law adjures [read requires] that statutes should be construed to effect their objects . . . ." Knapp v. Cardwell, 667 F.2d 1253, 1261 (9th Cir. 1982)./ "Assaying the quality of defendant's acts and omissions . . . adjures [read requires] just such a judgment call." Swift v. U.S., 866 F.2d 507, 511 (1st Cir. 1989). See abjure.

But adjure for abhor is even odder: "Most of us don't dislike lawyers individually; we adjure [read abhor?] them as a group." Our Legal System's Put Us in a Box, Chicago Tribune, 23 Aug. 1988, at C19.

adjurer; adjuror. The -er spelling is preferred. See -ER (A).

adjuster; adjustor. Adjuster (= one who seeks to determine the amount of loss suffered when an insurance claim is submitted and who attempts to settle the claim) is the preferred spelling. See -ER (A).

ad litem [L. "for the suit"]. Formerly—and still in English law—a guardian ad litem represented only an underage defendant (a next friend or prochein ami representing an underage plaintiff). BrE retains this restrictive sense—e.g.: "For purposes of litigation . . . an infant can and must be represented by an adult, who will be called 'the next friend' of an infant plaintiff, the 'guardian ad litem' of an infant defendant . . . ." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 45 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). But in modern AmE, underage plaintiffs (as well as defendants) are afforded guardians ad litem.

In AmE, the phrase guardian ad litem is often shortened to ad litem. E.g., "As you requested, I called the ad litem [i.e., the guardian ad litem] today." See guardian ad litem.

adminicular(y). Adminicular (= corroborative), seen usu. in the phrase adminicular evidence, is the standard adjectival form of the noun adminicle, meaning "supporting or corroborative evidence" (OED). In Scots law, adminicle has the more specific sense "a writing that tends to establish the existence and terms of a lost document."

administer; minister. Administer suffices in most legal contexts. It is a transitive verb and, in its most common legal sense, means "to manage and dispose of the estate of a deceased person, either under a will or under letters of administration" (OED). E.g., "Generally speaking, a natural person has the same capacity to take, to hold, and to administer property under a trust as he has to take, to hold, and to administer property for his own benefit." Administer may also mean (1) "to dispense (as justice or as punishment); or (2) "to give (an oath)."

The verb minister, now primarily intransitive, shares these last two meanings, albeit only rarely. Minister is most commonly used in the sense of attending to others' needs, or, in religious contexts, of administering sacraments. Persons in need are ministered to. E.g., "A testator's favor expressed in a will may be won by devoted attachment, self-sacrificing kindness, and ministering to him through friendship and love."

administerial. See administrative.

administrable; administratable; administerable. The first form is correct; the others are near-abominations, and NEEDLESS VARIANTS to boot. E.g., "This court did in fact find a more administratable [read administrable] way to evaluate the property—the trial de novo." U.S. v. 2,175.86 Acres of Land, 687 F. Supp. 1079, 1081 (E.D. Tex. 1988). See -ATABLE.

administrate is an objectionable BACK-FORMATION from administration; it should be avoided as a NEEDLESS VARIANT of administer. E.g., "By the same reasoning, the legislature could delegate the power to promulgate regulations having the force of law to administrate [read administer] organs of the government." John H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 24 (1969).

administrative; administerial; administrational. Administrative is the general, all-purpose term meaning "of or pertaining to administration or an administration." Administerial and administrational are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

administrative law = the law governing the organization and operation of the administrative branch of government and the relations of the administration with the legislature, the judiciary, and the public. "Administrative law . . . has suffered a long gestation and a difficult birth in our [Anglo-American] legal system. It is still a delicate child, with an uncertain future, but it is beginning to take the shape of manhood. It has been forced upon us, against much blind prejudice, by irresistible circumstances. It is now taught in our law schools as a branch of law [that] is essential to an understanding of our whole legal system, though with all its growing complexities it is difficult to fit into a legal education." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 605 (7th ed. 1964).

administrative-law judge; hearing officer. In U.S. federal law, so-called hearing officers had their titles changed in 1978 to administrative-law judges. The U.S. Supreme Court has said that they are "functionally comparable" to U.S. District Judges. See ALJ.

administrator; executor. Both terms refer to the personal representative who administers the estate of a decedent. An executor is named in a will, whereas an administrator (usu. someone close to the decedent) is court appointed. There are two kinds of the latter: the first is an administrator cum testamento annexo (or c.t.a.)—i.e., with the will annexed; the second is an administrator de bonis non (or d.b.n.), an elliptical phrase for administrator de bonis non administratis (= administrator of goods not administered). An administrator c.t.a. is appointed if the testator does not name an executor or if the named executor for any reason does not act; an administrator d.b.n. is appointed if a prior administrator has begun to act but later dies or is removed.

The phrase administrator c.t.a. is often translated administrator with the will annexed, a healthy practice that helps minimize the LATINISMS associated with this area of the law.

administratrix. Pl. administratrixes, preferably not administratrices. See SEXISM (C). admiralty. A. And maritime law; law of the sea. Black's states that the first two terms are "virtually synonymous" in referring to the law of marine commerce and navigation, the transportation at sea of persons and property, and marine affairs in general. Today the words are used interchangeably.

Yet Article III, section 2 of the U.S. Constitution is not redundant in providing, "The judicial power shall extend . . . to all Cases involving admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction." One commentator notes that admiralty (dated from ca. 1327 in the OED) was the better-known term when the Constitution was drafted, and that maritime (OED: ca. 1550) was used in conjunction with admiralty for two reasons: "(1) to exclude that jurisdiction which the English Admiralty anciently exercised or attempted to exercise over nonmaritime cases arising ashore, and (2) to preclude a resort to those English instances in which common law courts encroached upon the jurisdiction of admiralty . . . ." Elijah Jhirad et al., 1 Benedict on Admiralty § 101, at 7-3 (7th ed. 1983).

Law of the sea carries a distinct meaning: "the rules governing the relationships between states regarding the use and control of the sea and its resources." Thomas J. Schoenbaum, Admiralty and Maritime Law § 2-1, at 20 (1987). Thus, the law of the sea falls within public international law, whereas admiralty or maritime law is a division of private law.

B. The admiralty. The phrase the admiralty refers to the office of an admiral (fr. Arabic amir-al-bahr "chief of the sea") or other person entrusted by the crown with command of the seas and of royal ships. Because the admirals came to have jurisdiction over maritime matters, the phrase by extension came to refer to that jurisdiction. E.g., "The theory of the case, according to the summary of argument in the Supreme Court report, was that Chelentis, in a common law action outside the admiralty, could recover damages on common law tort principles without regard to the maritime law." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 325 (2d ed. 1975).

admissible; admissable; admittable. Admissible (the standard word) = (1) allowable; or (2) worthy of admittance (i.e., gaining entry). The other two forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS to be avoided.

admission. A. And admittance. The distinction between these terms is old and useful, but it has a history of being ignored. The latter term is purely physical, as in signs that read "No admittance." E.g.,"Plaintiff instituted an action to enjoin defendant from refusing her admittance to its amusement park because of her race or color, or for any other reason not applicable alike to other citizens."

Admission is used in figurative and nonphysical senses, such as: "His admission to the bar in 1948 began a career that would be long and noteworthy." Admission is also used, however, in physical senses when rights or privileges are attached to gaining entry: "The admission of aliens into the United States is considerably more restricted in this century than it was in the last."

B. And confession. In criminal law, a distinction has traditionally existed between these words: an admission is a concession that an allegation or factual assertion is true without any acknowledgment of guilt with respect to the criminal charges, whereas a confession involves an acknowledgment of guilt as well as of the truth of predicate factual allegations.

C. In Civil Litigation. Although nonlawyers tend to associate admission with criminal law (see B), it has broad uses in noncriminal evidentiary contexts: "An admission is a statement oral or written, suggesting any inference as to any fact in issue or relevant fact, unfavourable to the conclusion contended for by the person by whom or on whose behalf the statement is made." James F. Stephen, The Law of Evidence 23 (1876).

admit. A. *Admit to. In the sense of "confess," admit to is generally much inferior to admit. E.g., "In 1978, appellant admitted to [omit to] killing his wife and daughter and pleaded guilty to two charges of first-degree murder." See confess (to).

B. Admit of. Admit of = to allow; to be susceptible of. E.g., "This clause in the contract admits of two interpretations."/ "The former construction should be adopted if the language used will admit of such a construction."

C. Admitted to the bar; called to the bar. The former is the American phrase for qualifying to practice—e.g.: "I was admitted to the bar at Chattanooga." William G. McAdoo, Crowded Years 40 (1931). The phrase called to the Bar is the British phrase for qualifying to practice as a barrister (as distinguished from a solicitor, who is called to the roll). Called to the bar, q.v., appears infrequently in AmE.

admittable. See admissable.

admittance. See admission (A).

admonish; monish. See admonition.

admonishment. See abolishment.

admonition; monition. In general usage, both mean "a warning; caution." Admonition is the more common, less technical term: "We must follow the Supreme Court's admonition that courts ought not to impose constitutional restraints that would inhibit the ability of the political branches to respond through immigration policy to changing world conditions." Admonition has the additional sense "a mild reprimand."

Monition is the more specialized legal term; it may mean (1) in admiralty and civil-law contexts, "a summons to appear and answer in court as a defendant or to contempt charges"; (2) in ecclesiastical contexts, "a formal notice from a bishop mandating that an offense within the clergy be corrected." The object of a monition is a person monished.

admonitory; admonitorial; monitory; monitorial. The -ory forms predominate.

adopt. See adapt.

adoption; ratification; novation. In contractual contexts, these three words have deceptively similar meanings. Adoption of a contract is accepting it as one's own, or consenting to be bound by it, though it was entered into by someone else acting on one's behalf. A ratification is the confirmation of a contract performed or entered into on one's behalf by another who at the time assumed without authority to act as an agent. These two words are near-synonyms. Novation has two important meanings: (1) "the substitution of a new contract between parties in place of an existing contract"; and (2) "the substitution of a new party in an existing contract." Sense (1) predominates in American law. See novation.

In corporate law, the distinctions have relevance, and are somewhat different, when a promoter enters into a contract that purports to bind a newly formed corporation, or one soon to be formed. If a promoter contracts with a third person when it is understood that the corporation will be formed, the corporation is later properly said to adopt the contract. Ratify, in contrast, is the proper word when the corporation already existed when the contract was signed. If, after a corporation adopts or ratifies the contract, the promoter is expressly relieved from liability, the adoption or ratification becomes a novation.

adoptive; adopted. Adoptive = (1) related by adoption <an adoptive son>; or (2) tending to adopt <adoptive admissions under Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(b)>. The phrase adopted father is an example of HYPALLAGE, to be avoided in favor of adoptive father. The original Latin word, adoptivus, applied both to the adopting parent and to the adopted child.

Here the correct usages are observed: "If an adopted child can inherit from or through his natural or adoptive parents, the child of an adopted child can claim through him in an appropriate case."/ "The controlling statute provides that an adopted child inherits through his adoptive parent."

adpromissor (= surety, bail) has two plural forms in adpromissors and adpromissores, the latter being unEnglish and therefore inferior. (See PLURALS (A).) The dilemma of choosing between plural forms is easily remedied by writing sureties.

ADR. See alternative dispute resolution.

adsorb. See absorb.

adulter. See adulterer.

adulterant. See adulterous.

adulterate. See adulterous.

adulteration; adultery. Adulteration = (1) the act of debasing, corrupting, or making impure; (2) a corrupted or debased state; or (3) something corrupted or debased. Adultery = sexual intercourse engaged in voluntarily by a married person with someone who is not the person's lawful spouse. The Latin verb adulterare, from which both English words derive, encompasses all these senses. See adulterine bastard.

adulterer; adulter; adulteress; adultera; adulterator. Adulterer is the usual form meaning "one who commits adultery." Adulter is an obsolete variant of adulterer that also had the meaning of adulterator (= counterfeiter).

Adulteress is the feminine form, now disfavored because of the growing awareness of SEXISM—likewise with adultera, the term from the civil law. Adulterator, as suggested above, derives from the noun adulteration, and not from adultery, like the other personal nouns discussed in this entry.

adulterine bastard. Leff defines this phrase as "the child of a married woman by a man other than her husband," and comments: "As 'adultery' has come to include sexual relations by a married man with a woman not his wife, whether she is married or not, the term adulterine bastard has sometimes come to include a child born to an unmarried woman by a married man. This makes no difference, as no legal consequences presently attach to adulterine bastardy that do not attach to plain old bastardy." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1951 (1985). The form adulterine bastard is preferable to adulterous bastard, the latter suggesting an unfaithful spouse rather than a child produced by adultery.

The very term bastard is now being displaced by euphemistic terms in legal contexts. See bastard, illegitimate child & EUPHEMISMS.

adulterous; adulterine; adulterant; adulterate, adj.; adulterated. Adulterous and adulterate both mean "of, characterized by, or pertaining to adultery," the former term being the more common. E.g., "We think there was evidence that his conduct and that of the defendant had a legitimate tendency to prove adulterous inclination, although insufficient to establish criminal conversation." Adulterate, adj., more common in Shakespeare's day than in ours, has been relegated to the status of a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Adulterine = (1) spurious; (2) illegal; or (3) born of adultery <adulterine bastard>. (See adulterine bastard.) Adulterant = tending to adulterate. Adulterated = (1) corrupted or debased, or (2) vitiated or made spurious.

adultery; fornication. The latter often implies that neither party is married; if either participant is married, adultery is the usual term. See adulteration.

adumbrate (= [1] to foreshadow, or [2] to outline) is a FORMAL WORD that has been called an affectation. But legal writers have considered it serviceable in formal contexts. "The contours of the action for indemnity among tortfeasors were adumbrated by the Louisiana Supreme Court."/ "The majority's holding and reasoning in Alvarez-Gonzalez II tended to expand the concept of functional equivalency as adumbrated by the Supreme Court fourteen years earlier in Almeida-Sanchez."

advance; advancement. Generally, the former refers to progress, the latter to promotion. Hence, one might get an occupational advancement, but one speaks of the advance of civilization. E.g., "The advancement [i.e., promotion] of religion has ever been held to be one of the principal divisions of charitable trusts."/ "These actions, according to the complaint, violated the plaintiff's rights under the first and fourteenth amendments to associate for the advancement of their common interests in dealings with the college."/ "Any one of these considerations might tend toward the advancement of the employees."

In senses suggesting the action of moving up or bringing forth, advancement is the proper word. "Considering the backlog of cases in most jurisdictions and the absence of any further right to advancement on the court calendar, the significance of victory or defeat at this stage is readily apparent."/ "The advancement of a prosecutorial-vindictiveness claim brings into conflict two antithetical interests."

The distinction gets fuzzier in financial contexts. Although we speak (properly) of cash advances and advances on royalties, in law advancement takes on a sense similar to that which advance has in these phrases. Leff defines advancement in this sense as "a gift, i.e., an expenditure not legally required, made by a parent to or on behalf of a child, with intention that the value thereof be deducted from the amount that the child would otherwise receive if the parent died intestate." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1952 (1985). E.g., "The father had made numerous advancements to the son by way of establishing him in life with a college education, by setting him up in business, and by buying him an automobile and other items of personal property."

This legal usage is too well entrenched to allow a precisian's attempted "correction" of it: "This use led in turn to the 'hotchpot clause' in deeds and wills, similarly designed to ensure that an advance [read advancement] inter vivos to one of the class entitled to share in the estate should be brought to account."

advance directive. See living will.

advancee is an inaesthetic and unnecessary NEOLOGISM. E.g., "The Code does not state in detail what the writing must contain, although as applied to a writing by the intestate, a statement of an 'intent to advance' would seem necessary and presumably also a description of the property and the name of the advancee [read recipient of the advancement]." See -EE (A).

advance sheet. See slip opinion.

adventitious; adventitial. Adventitious means "added extrinsically" or "accidental." It was formerly a legal term meaning "befalling a person by fortune," and was opposed to profectitious (= deriving from a parent or ancestor). These terms are now archaic except in the civil law. Adventitious is used today, however, in nonlegal senses—e.g.: "Her obtaining a law degree had the adventitious effect of nearly doubling her starting salary when she entered the business world."

Adventitial is a medical term that means "of or pertaining to a membrane that covers an organ."

ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH. A. Placement of Adverbs. A fairly well-known manual on legal style long cautioned its readers to avoid splitting verb phrases with adverbs—e.g.: "He had quickly gone to the scene of the crime," recommending instead, "He quickly had gone to the scene of the crime." This nonsense apparently derives from a phobia of anything resembling a SPLIT INFINITIVE. Here a phobic writer fell into the awkward phrasing: "The task of questioning veniremen and evaluating their answers is more difficult than anything that heretofore has been attempted [read than anything that has heretofore been attempted or, better yet, than anything that has been attempted before] in the process of jury selection." See HYPERCORRECTION (H) & SUPERSTITIONS (C).

In fact, as all reputable authorities agree, frequently the most proper and natural placement of an adverb is in the midst of the verb phrase. E.g., "The corporation was virtually bankrupted by the massive tort liability."

B. Awkward Adverbs. Adjectives ending in -ly often make slightly cumbersome adverbs, e.g., sillily, friendlily, uglily, and so on. One need not be timid in writing or pronouncing such adverbs when they are called for; but if they seem unnatural, one can easily rephrase the sentence, e.g., in a silly manner. Words such as timely and stately, however, act as both adjectives and adverbs.

In any event, unusual adverbs are to be used sparingly. Some writers display an overfondness for them. One judicial opinion, for example, contains the adverbs corollarily, consideredly, and the spurious widespreadedly, q.v. See United Medical Labs. v. Columbia Broadcasting Sys., Inc., 404 F.2d 706 (9th Cir. 1968).

C. Adjectives or Adverbs After Linking Verbs. English contains a number of linking verbs (or copulas) apart from to be, for example, appear, seem, become, look, smell, taste. These verbs connect a descriptive word with the subject; hence the descriptive word following the linking verb describes the subject and not the verb. We say He turned professional, not He turned professionally.

Legal writers frequently fall into error when they use linking verbs. One must analyze the sentence, rather than memorize a list of common linking verbs, much as this may help. Often an unexpected verb of this kind appears—e.g.: "No other testimonial privilege sweeps so broadly [read sweeps so broad]." The writer is not describing a manner of sweeping, but instead is saying that the privilege is broad.

D. Redundantly Formed Adverbs. Some adverbial forms are incorrectly formed by adding -ly to words that already function as adverbs. See HYPERCORRECTION (D), doubtless(ly), much(ly), over(ly) & thus (B).

E. No Hyphens with Adverbs Ending in -ly. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A).

adversary, adj.; adversarial; adversarious; adversative; adversive; adverse. Adversary, which can act as both noun and adjective, is the legal term used in phrases such as an adversary relationship. E.g., "The need to develop all relevant facts in the adversary system is both fundamental and comprehensive."

Adversarial is not listed in most dictionaries, though it is fairly common as a near-equivalent of the adjective adversary. E.g., "Rarely does this type of adversarial [read adversary] relationship exist between school authorities and pupils." New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 349-50 (1985) (Powell, J., concurring)./ "The evolution of this area of the law has been and will remain a product of the interaction of two adversarial forces—prosecutors who seek to exclude all scrupled jurors, and defense counsel eager to retain them." In fact, adversarial and adversary have begun to undergo DIFFERENTIATION: adversarial connotes animosity <adversarial conferences>, whereas adversary is a neutral, clinical word.

Adversarious (= hostile), though listed in the OED, has dropped from the language. Adversative is a term of grammar and logic meaning "expressing an antithesis or opposition" <adversative conjunction>. Adversive is an anatomical term for "opposite." See adverse.

adverse; averse. Both may take the preposition to; averse also takes from. To be averse to something is to have feelings against it. To be adverse to something—the phrase is usually used of things and not of people—is to be turned in opposition against it.

Adverse is used as an adjective in the phrase adverse party (= opposing party) in reference to persons, but seldom elsewhere. In reference to circumstances, adverse means "potentially afflictive or calamitous," but most great triumphs come in the face of adverse conditions.

Adverse(ly) to for against is a slight pomposity. E.g., "The court rendered a judgment adverse to [read against] the plaintiff."/ "Most of the questions raised by this appeal have been disposed of adversely to [read against] the appellants in the companion case decided this day."

adversive. See adversary.

advert; avert. To advert to something is to refer to it, to bring it up in speech or writing. It is a word best reserved for contexts that are especially formal, except in BrE, where it is more common. "Finally, I must advert to the pain suffered and to be suffered by the appellant as a result of the car accident." (Eng.) (See allude (A).) The word should not be used in its etymological sense "to turn to," as here: "Before adverting to [read Before turning to] the factual setting, we briefly outline the legal context in which the issue of fraudulent transfer arises."

To avert is to ward off, turn away, or avoid. Thus a national leader who has failed to avert a political scandal might avert his or her eyes. E.g., "The rule averts potential diplomatic embarrassment from the courts of one sovereign sitting in judgment over the public acts of another." See avert.

advertise; advertize. The former spelling is standard (AmE, BrE).

advice. See advisement.

advisatory. See advisory.

advise. A. In Commercial Contexts. Here advise takes on a meaning with which nonlawyers are generally unfamiliar. It means "to announce; give formal notice of." E.g., "The letter of credit was advised through the Bank of America in Quito, Ecuador." In such contexts, advise has very nearly taken on the meaning "to negotiate."

B. For tell or say. This is a pomposity to be avoided. "I was advised by him [read He told me] that the deadline had not yet elapsed."/ "The dispatcher returned their call in several minutes but advised [read told] them that the computer had broken down, and that he could not check the registration."

C. And instruct. In G.B., barristers are said to advise solicitors (or clients through solicitors), whereas solicitors instruct barristers. See attorney (A).

advisedly means, not "intentionally," but "after careful consideration."

advisement; advice. Judges frequently take matters under advisement, meaning that they will consider and deliberate on a particular question before the court. E.g., "Punishment for contempt is hereby taken under advisement by the court." Advisement is best not used outside the legal idiom for advice or advising <the advising of entry-level officers>.

adviser; advisor. The -er spelling is sanctioned over the -or spelling in the dictionaries. Note, however, that the adjectival form is advisory. See -ER (A).

advisory; advisatory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of advisory, which commonly appears in phrases such as advisory opinion, advisory capacity, and advisory council.

advocacy; advocation. The first is the art or work of an advocate; the second was formerly the term in Scots law for an appellate court's review of lower-court decisions. Advocation should not be used, although occasionally it is, where advocacy would suffice.

advocate; advocator. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

advocation. See advocacy.

advocatory = of or pertaining to an advocate. Hence it corresponds to advocacy, q.v., not advocation.

advocatus diaboli, the Latin term for Devil's advocate, is an example of highfalutin humor and should be used cautiously if at all. Its opposite is advocatus dei.

advowson. This archaic legal term, though suggestive of a type of person, refers to a property right in an ecclesiastical office. The right is transferable and inheritable in perpetuity.

AE is a remnant of the Latin digraph, formerly ligatured (æ), appearing in such words as aegis, aesthetic, and praetor. In most Latinate words in which this digraph once appeared, the initial vowel has been dropped. One sees this tendency still at work in (a)esthetic, (a)eon, and (a)ether. Compare the retention of the digraphs in BrE (e.g., anaesthetic and foetus) with the shortened forms anesthetic and fetus, which are prevalent in AmE. See pr(a)edial.

aegis was originally a mythological term meaning "protective shield" or "defensive armor." The word is now used exclusively in figurative senses. One must be careful not to confuse aegis with auspices (= sponsorship; support). E.g., "Generally, it is required that what has been done regularly under the aegis [correct] of the law will be considered valid and will remain so even after a change in legislation." Idiom requires under the aegis, not with the aegis.

aesthetic; esthetic. Although the Merriam-Webster dictionaries have long recorded esthetic as the primary form in AmE, the form aesthetic remains more common in AmE and BrE alike.

affect; effect. In ordinary usage, affect is always a verb; it means "to influence; to have an effect on." Effect, as suggested by its use in that definition, is a noun meaning "result" or "consequence." To affect something is to have an effect on it. (See impact.) As a verb, effect means "to bring about; produce" <they could not effect a coup>.

In the following sentences, affect is wrongly used for the noun effect: "[T]he laws of New Jersey shall control the affect [read effect] of the agreement." Developers Small Business Inv. Corp. v. Hoeckle, 395 F.2d 80, 84 (9th Cir. 1968) (quoting a contract)./ "The participants must be afforded maximal protection against harmful side affects [read effects]."

Likewise, effect is sometimes misused for affect. See effect.

affectable; affectible. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

AFFECTATION, LITERARY. See PURPLE PROSE & LITERARY ALLUSION (B) affected, adj.; affective; affectional; affectionate. Affected, as an adjective, means "assumed artificially; pretended" (OED); affective = emotional; affectional = pertaining to affection; and affectionate = loving, fond.

Just as affect, q.v., is sometimes misused for effect, affective is sometimes wrongly placed where effective belongs: "The parties to the contract would have had to stipulate an affective [read effective] date." We might prefer to call this a typographical error rather than an ignorant bungle.

affection; affectation. The former means "love, fondness"; the latter, "pretentious, artificial behavior." In Elizabethan English, these words were used more or less interchangeably, but now each has acquired its own distinct sense—which is good for the language.

Affectation doctrine is sometimes seen for affects doctrine in the context of American constitutional law, specifically of the commerce clause. E.g., "For the essence of the affectation doctrine [read "affects" doctrine or effects doctrine] was that the exact location of this line made no difference, if the forbidden effects flowed across it to the injury of interstate commerce . . . ." Mandeville Island Farms, Inc. v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U.S. 219, 232 (1948). Affects is the correct word because the test is whether the activity "affects" commerce. Because the noun corresponding to affect (= to influence) is effect—not affectation—a better phrasing would be effects doctrine (i.e., "that has effects"), but it has not gained currency. See affect & effect.

affectional; affectionate. See affected.

affeer; amerce. Both words mean generally "to fine." Specifically, affeer = to fix the amount of [a fine] (W3). The variant spellings affeere and affere should be avoided. Amerce = to fine arbitrarily (OED), meaning that the amount of the fine is not prescribed by statute, but rather is lodged in the discretion of the court. Etymologically speaking, when being amerced, one is "at the mercy" of the court.

The nominal forms are affeerment and amercement—amerciament having gone the way that all NEEDLESS VARIANTS should. Amerce has no recorded personal nominal form. Affeeror and affeerer are competing forms, the -or spelling perhaps the better one because it is more distinctly pronounceable.

affiant /ə-fī-ənt/, a term that began as an Americanism in the mid-19th century, ordinarily means "one who gives an affidavit." More broadly, and less accurately, it refers to any deponent. See further affiant . . . .

affidavit [L. "he swore"] is ordinarily a noun referring to a voluntary declaration of facts written down and sworn to by the declarant before an officer authorized to administer oaths.

Occasionally, however, lawyers have used the word as a verb. But a better choice is invariably available—e.g.: "This counsel later testified that the reason for filing the Notice of Change of Judge was 'personal to us and the plaintiff, [and that] we affidavited or noticed [read filed an affidavit and notice of] that change of judge, on Judge Patterson . . . .'" Hickox v. Superior Court, 505 P.2d 1086, 1087 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1973) (quoting counsel)./ "Noteworthily missing from this record, however, is any affidavited [read sworn] assertion by a representative of the banks . . . ." In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group Inc., 113 B.R. 830, 840 (S.D.N.Y. 1990).

affiliation, in BrE, refers to a father's maintenance of illegitimate children. E.g., "The mother has the right to the custody of her illegitimate children, and is bound to maintain them. She may obtain an affiliation order against the father from the local police court, either before the child is born or within twelve months after the birth . . . ." Anon., The Home Counsellor 172 ([London: Odhams Press] ca. 1940–1945)./ "[T]here is the rule [that] requires the testimony of the plaintiff in an action for breach of promise of marriage, and the applicant in an affiliation case, to be corroborated by independent evidence." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 77 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).

affined; affianced. Affined = closely related; connected. Archaically, affined means "obligated." Affianced = engaged, betrothed.

affinity; consanguinity. The former refers to relationship by marriage, the latter to relationship by blood. The distinction is usually carefully observed in legal writing. E.g., "The statutes prescribe the classes of persons entitled to appointment as administrator and indicate an order of precedence based on kinship by consanguinity or affinity with the decedent."

Affinity takes the preposition between or with, not to or for.

affirm. Usually only judgments are affirmed by appellate courts; cases are remanded; and opinions or decisions are approved or disapproved. (See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT.) The practice of writing "The trial court was affirmed" is informally an acceptable ellipsis for "The trial court's judgment was affirmed," but such phrasing should not appear in formal legal writing. E.g., "Had the trial judge followed his initial decision and overruled the motion for new trial without expressing any desire for leniency, he would be affirmed [read his judgment would be affirmed]."

affirmance; affirmation. There is, unfortunately, some overlap of these terms. Yet a useful rule might be formulated: When an appellate court affirms a lower court's judgment, there is an affirmance.

In all other contexts, affirmation is the preferable term. E.g., "Finally, we refer to the restatement and affirmation of the doctrine in Hood v. Francis." In the following sentences, affirmance is used where affirmation would be better: "The long-established recognition in Massachusetts of the doctrine of independent significance makes unnecessary statutory affirmance [read affirmation] of its application to pour-over trusts."/ "The court held that the instrument was a conveyance and a recognition, acceptance, and affirmance [read affirmation] of the devise, and not a renunciation."

Here the opposite error appears, affirmation for affirmance: "After the final decision in Finney and the appellate court's affirmation [read affirmance] of the judgment, the district court determined that the petitioner was not entitled to any relief other than injunctive relief already granted to class members." Cf. disaffirmation.

Quite apart from its ordinary meaning, affirmation has a specialized legal sense: "a formal and solemn declaration, having the same weight and invested with the same responsibilities as an oath, by one who conscientiously declines to take an oath" (OED). Many American jurisdictions now have statutes permitting affirmations under circumstances in which obtaining a notary public's acknowledgment would be inconvenient. The person affirming is termed an affirmant. See affirmant & oath.

affirmant; deponent. One who testifies by deposition and swears to the truth of the testimony is termed a deponent. One who, instead of swearing or taking an oath, affirms or solemnly states that the testimony is true, is termed an affirmant.

affirmative action. The phrase is sometimes used generically to denote "a positive step taken," as well as more specifically to denote "an attempt to reverse or mitigate past racial discrimination." Compare 15 U.S.C. § 2622(2)(b) (1988) ("the Secretary shall order . . . the person who committed such violation to take affirmative action to abate the violation") with 29 U.S.C. § 791(b) (1988) ("each department . . . shall . . . submit . . . an affirmative action program for the hiring, placement and advancement of individuals with handicaps").

affirmative, in the; negative, in the. These phrases have been criticized as jargonistic and pompous. (See, e.g., Quiller-Couch's statement quoted under JARGON (B).) They appear frequently in legal writing and in other types of formal prose. E.g., "The sole question raised on this appeal is whether the Texas rule that a defendant must prove duress by a preponderance of the evidence violates the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment; answering in the negative, we affirm."/ "The Sixth Circuit, when confronted with the identical question, answered in the affirmative and permitted the use of this same deposition against asbestos companies not represented in DeRocco."

This phrasing is probably better than the closest alternative: "Reversing the judgment of the bankruptcy court, we answer both questions presented 'No.'" In the formal context of judicial opinions, in the affirmative and in the negative should be allowed to exist peacefully. But when these phrases are used of mundane questions in mundane situations, they look foolish.

affirmative pregnant. See negative pregnant.

affixture; affixation; affixion. Affixture = the state of being affixed; affixation = the act of affixing or the use of an affix. Affixion = affixation or affixture, but it adds nothing to either; it should be avoided as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

afflatus; afflation; inflatus. For the sense "inspiration," or "supernatural impulse," afflatus is the standard term. E.g., "The decisions under the revenue acts have little weight as against legislation under the afflatus of the Eighteenth Amendment." (Holmes, J.) Inflatus and afflation are secondary variants. The plural of afflatus is afflatuses, not afflati. See PLURALS (A).

afflict. See inflict.

affluent and affluence are accented on the first rather than the second syllable.

afford. See accord.

affranchise. See franchise.

affray; fray. Both terms, though somewhat quaint, are still used in legal opinions. Affray is classically defined as "unpremeditated fighting in a public place that tends to disturb the public peace." E.g., "To some extent, crimes such as riot, violent disorder, and affray appear as inchoate offences of violence or even actual offences of violence." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 35 (1991).

There is some dispute over whether an affray must be in public. From the late 18th century onward, legal writers discussing affray said—mistakenly, it seems—that the fighting must occur in public. The germ of the error began with Blackstone's definition of affray in 1769 as "the fighting of two or more persons in some public place, to the terror of His Majesty's subjects: for, if the fighting be in private, it is no affray but an assault." 4 Blackstone, Commentaries 145 (1769). In 1822, the first edition of Archbold's Pleading and Evidence in Criminal Cases (p. 337) asserted, without support, that the allegation "in a public street or highway" should be charged in the indictment and proved. But the House of Lords has held that Archbold incorrectly grafted this requirement onto the law of affray—that an affray need not be in a public place. See Button v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1966] A.C. 591, 608, 627 (H.L.).

The idea that an affray must be public still holds sway, however, in most American jurisdictions. Thus, a leading criminal-law text states: "At common law an affray is a mutual fight in a public place to the terror or alarm of the people." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 479 (3d ed. 1982).

affreightment; affretement. Meaning "the hiring of a ship to carry cargo," affreightment is standard in common-law countries and in Louisiana (a civil-law jurisdiction). E.g., "Owners will be more likely to permit their charterers to enter freely into contracts of affreightment if owners know that no 'secret liens' will arise from obscure provisions in subagreements." (La.) Affretement is the spelling used in French civil law.

aficionado is often misspelled afficionado, as in Butts v. National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n, 751 F.2d 609, 613 (3d Cir. 1984).

afore (= before) is a dead ARCHAISM except in the phrases aforesaid and aforementioned. Words like aforedescribed need not be rescued from oblivion. See above (B), aforesaid & above-mentioned.

aforesaid; aforementioned. These LEGALISMS have little or no justification in modern writing. They often appear in spoofs and complaints—e.g.: "Individual laws . . . may be complicated and forbiddingly so, with the endless paragraphs, their aforesaids and provided howevers." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 14–15 (1968).

Aforesaid or aforementioned is unnecessary when the reference to what has already been named is clear. E.g., "Plaintiff, in the normal routine of his employment, was exposed to various toxic materials and irritants. Exposure to the aforementioned [read to these] substances and irritants caused him to contract pneumoconiosis, and finally he died of lung cancer caused by his occupational exposure to the aforementioned [read to these] toxic substances." See above-mentioned.

Worse yet, aforesaid is a word of imprecision: it sometimes refers to what immediately preceded, to what came just before that, or to everything that has come before. When the reference is intended to be vague, it would be better to use abovestated or some other equivalent that is less stilted and legalistic. See FORBIDDEN WORDS (A) & said (E).

The word aforesaid is, of course, a past-participial combination (afore + said) that is almost always used adjectivally <aforesaid land>. Occasionally, however, it appears as the past participle of a verb: "The association secretly and with intent to deprive appellant of the opportunity of purchasing said property, and with the intent to profit through the information obtained as aforesaid, immediately began to negotiate with the owner for the purchase of said property." The literary quality of that sentence speaks for quality of the participial use of aforesaid. Cf. said (A).

aforethought (= thought of in advance) is now used only in the phrase malice aforethought. It is essentially synonymous with premeditated or prepense. See malice aforethought, POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES, prepense & willfulness.

a fortiori /ah-fohr-shee-ohr-ee/ is an argumentative term meaning "by even greater force of logic; so much the more." The phrase is often used effectively—e.g.: "If an act is not a civil wrong, it cannot, a fortiori, be criminal." (Eng.)

The emphatic form of the term is a multo fortiori (= by far the stronger reason).

Legal writers sometimes use a fortiori as an adjective, a usage to be resisted—e.g.: "We have set forth the other two lines of possible proof only to suggest the a fortiori [read even stronger] position presented in the instant case."/ "Clearly, if laws depend so heavily on public acquiescence, the case of conventions is an a fortiori [read even more compelling] one." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 59 (1983).

after-acquired = obtained after a certain (specified) time. The term is ordinarily placed before the noun it modifies: "The agreement to hold the proceeds of the sale in trust is, in effect, an agreement to hold after-acquired personal property in trust."

afterborn, adj., = born after (a certain event, such as the father's death or the birth of a sibling) <an afterborn child>. The word is also used as a noun in pretermitted-child statutes; it means "a child born after the execution of a will."

aftereffect should be spelled as one word.

after having [+ past participle]. This construction is ordinarily incorrect for after [+ present participle]—e.g.: "After having passed [read After passing] a general educational test and given evidence of good character, the candidate must procure himself to be admitted as a student at one of the four Inns of Court above named." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 66 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967)./ "The flurry of laches litigation, after having gone [read after going] on for the better part of ten years, began to subside after the mid-1960's." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 774 (2d ed. 1975)./ "After having survived [read After surviving or Having survived] eight years of attacks during the Reagan administration, the Legal Services Corp. . . . still faces challenges." Nat'l L.J., 14 Oct. 1991, at 1.

against. See contra, versus & as against.

against conscience is a primarily BrE equivalent of unconscionable, q.v. "It is clear that any civilized system of law is bound to provide remedies for cases of what has been called unjust enrichment, that is, to prevent a man from retaining the money of or some benefit derived from

against nature. See EUPHEMISMS & unnatural.

against the peace. This phrase was traditionally used in a charging instrument for a misdemeanor, just as feloniously (q.v.) was used in a felony indictment. Sometimes the phrase is elaborated to against the peace of the king (or against the king's peace) or against the peace and dignity of the state.

ag(e)ing. See MUTE E.

agency, as a TERM OF ART, refers to any relationship in which one person (called an agent) acts for another (called a principal) in commercial or business transactions. Nonlawyers are largely unfamiliar with agency used in this way, although they understand the personal noun agent as meaning "representative."

agenda is (1) the plural form of the Latin noun agendum, which means "something to be done" (another, less proper plural of agendum being agendums); and, more commonly, (2) a singular noun meaning "a list of things to be done" or "a program." The plural of agenda in sense (2) is agendas; decrying agendas as a double plural is bootless.

Yet all careful writers should avoid the erroneous form agendae, the result of HYPERCORRECTION—e.g.: "Mr. Douglas . . . prepared agendae [read agendas] for meetings with the trustee and his attorneys . . . ." In re New England Fish Co., 33 B.R. 413, 416 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1983).

agent; servant. "The words agent and servant are not synonyms; nevertheless they both relate to voluntary action under employment." Lemmon v. State, 3 A.2d 299, 300 (N.J. 1938). An agent is a business representative who handles contractual arrangements between the principal and third persons. A servant, by contrast, is an employee whose function is to render service, not to create contractual obligations. In the modern legal idiom, servant has been almost entirely displaced by employee. See agency & employer and employee.

age of capacity; age of consent; age of majority; age of reason. All these terms share the general sense "the age at which a person is legally capable (of doing something)." But, over time, each term has assumed a specific sense in a particular context. In the following discussion, the numerical ages listed are established by statute and may vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction.

Age of capacity, usu. 18, denotes the age when one is legally capable of agreeing to a contract, executing a will, maintaining a lawsuit, and the like.

Age of majority, usu. 18, includes the rights attained at the age of capacity, but is broader because it also includes civil and political rights, esp. the right to vote. See majority (D).

Age of consent, usu. 16, denotes the age when one is legally capable of agreeing to marriage (without parental consent) or to sexual intercourse so that, regarding the latter, intercourse with someone under the age of consent is statutory rape. See statutory rape.

Age of reason denotes the age when one is able to distinguish right from wrong and is thus legally capable of committing a crime or tort. It varies from 7 to 14: 7 years is usu. the age below which a child is conclusively presumed not to have committed a crime or tort, while 14 years is usu. the age below which a rebuttable presumption applies. For related terms, see child, infant, minority (A) & nonage.

aggrandize; engrandize; ingrandize. The last two are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of the first.

aggravate for annoy or irritate, though documented as existing since the 1600s, has never gained the cachet of stylists and should be avoided in formal writing. Properly, aggravate means "to make worse; exacerbate." This meaning obtains in many legal phrases, such as aggravated assault. In its proper sense, aggravate is opposed to mitigate or extenuate—e.g.: "Here the indignity was of an aggravated sort; it occurred at a public place and in the presence of a large number of people."/ "It is clear that a state cannot explicitly make the murder of a white victim an aggravating circumstance in capital sentencing."

Even the brilliant Justice Holmes nodded once, using aggravate for irritate in a letter to Sir Frederick Pollock in 1895: "[O]ur two countries aggravate each other from time to time. . . ." 1 Holmes-Pollock Letters 66 (1941).

aggravated damages. See punitive damages.

aggregable is the preferred form, not aggregatable—e.g.: "[T]he Commission notified defendants that their trading activities were aggregatable [read aggregable]." Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Hunt, 591 F.2d 1211, 1227 n.5 (7th Cir. 1979). See -ATABLE.

aggregate, n.; aggregation. Both may mean "a mass of discrete things or individuals taken as a whole," aggregate being the more usual term. Aggregate stresses the notion "taken as a whole" (as in the phrase in the aggregate), and aggregation more "a mass of discrete things." Here the former term is used: "The price, while of trifling moment to each reader of the newspaper, is sufficient in the aggregate to afford compensation for the cost of gathering and distributing the news."

For "the act of aggregating," only aggregation will suffice. E.g., "There should not be aggregation of two or more obtainings of credit for the purpose of one offense."/ "It is a mass that has grown by aggregation, with very little intervention from legislation."

aggregate, vb. A. Sense. Aggregate = to bring together a mass of discrete things or individuals into a whole. The verb is sometimes misused for total in reference to sums: "Before us, appellant argues that the fines imposed, aggregating almost $15,000 [read totaling almost $15,000 or in the aggregate almost $15,000] were excessive."

B. Aggregate together. This phrase is a REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "For the purpose of establishing the rate at which capital transfer tax is payable, all property (with certain exceptions) passing on the death is aggregated together [read aggregated]." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 90 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

aggrievance. See grievance.

aggrieve (= to bring grief to; to treat unfairly) is now used almost exclusively in legal contexts, and almost always in the form of a past participle. E.g., "An aggrieved spouse is not compelled to seek the courts of another state for the protection of her marital status."/ "Suppression of the product of a Fourth Amendment violation can be successfully urged only by those whose rights have been violated by the search itself, not by those who are aggrieved solely by the introduction of damaging evidence."

aggrievement (= an act or instance of causing grief to a person) is illustrated in the OED with but one citation, but it appears with some frequency in law—e.g.: "[The exceptions do not] offer[ ] reason for aggrievement, and signify nothing except general dissatisfaction with the entire report." Kowalsky v. American Employers Ins. Co., 90 F.2d 476, 480 (6th Cir. 1937).

The word should not be used as a variant of grievance—e.g.: "Another of MacDonald's aggrievements [read grievances] centers on the deterioration of a bloody footprint, which he was no longer able to distinguish adequately at trial." U.S. v. MacDonald, 632 F.2d 258, 270 (4th Cir. 1980).

agnate; cognate. In Roman law, an agnate is a relative through one's father; a cognate is any relative, through one's father or mother. The corresponding adjectives are agnatic and cognatic.

a gratia. See ex gratia.

agréation; agrément. The first is a process, and the second is the usual result of the process. Agréation = a diplomatic procedure by which a receiving state makes a prior determination whether a proposed envoy will be acceptable; agrément = the approval of a diplomatic representative by the receiving state.

agree. A. And concur. In G.B., appellate judges who join in an opinion are said to agree, whereas in the U.S. they concur.

B. Agreed to and agreed upon. These are slightly awkward as PHRASAL ADJECTIVES, but when used before a noun, they should be hyphenated. E.g., "This clause refers to our previously agreed-to verbal contract." (See verbals.) / "To the extent that the nonoccurrence of a condition would cause disproportionate forfeiture, a court may excuse the nonoccurrence of that condition unless its occurrence was a material part of the agreed-upon exchange."

In a few phrases, agreed suffices as an idiomatic ellipsis for agreed-upon, as in agreed verdict, q.v., and agreed judgment. Generally, though, the entire phrase should appear. "As shown by the charge in the agreed [read agreed-upon] statement, Jan, at the time of the distribution, is the only child of an only child of a child of Hastings."/ "It cannot be said as a matter of law that their delay for an hour and a quarter was reasonable; the facts as to this are not agreed [read agreed upon]."

A similar ellipsis occurs with agreed to and agreed on, seemingly on the mistaken notion that one should avoid ending a sentence with a preposition—e.g.: "[I]n America there is a famous decision holding that a negotiating party who strings another party along with prolonged negotiations, constantly changing his terms, may be held liable to the other party for actual loss suffered if no contract eventually is agreed [read agreed to]." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 62 (3d ed. 1981)./ "However, Mr Dlouhy said the essentials had been agreed [read agreed on]." Leslie Colitt & John Lloyd, Comecon Takes First agree and covenant. See covenant and agree.

agreed verdict (BrE) = consent decree (AmE).

agreement; contract. The former may refer either to an informal arrangement with no consideration (e.g., a "gentlemen's agreement") or to a formal legal arrangement supported by consideration. Contract is used only in this second sense. The distinction applies also with the verbs agree and contract. The intended sense of agree(ment) is usually clear from the context.

Although every contract is an agreement, not every agreement is a contract. For example, one may agree to meet a friend at 7:00 p.m. for dinner, and the result is properly called an agreement—but not a contract, to which a legal obligation attaches. See bargain.

AGREEMENT, GRAMMATICAL. See CONCORD (A).

agrees and covenants. See covenant and agree.

agree with; agree to; agree on. Agree with means "to be in accord with (another)"; agree to, "to acquiesce in (usu. the performance or specifications of something)." Agree on refers to the subject of the agreement: one agrees with someone on a certain settlement. E.g., "Plaintiff agreed with defendant on the contractual provisions relating to time of delivery."

agrément. See agréation.

ahold and its variant aholt are dialectal. They might perhaps be justified in bizarre contexts such as this: "Plaintiff, driving her car, suddenly becomes convinced that God is taking ahold of the steering wheel."

-AHOLIC, -AHOLISM. Speakers and writers should avoid indiscriminately appending these newfangled "suffixes" to words to indicate various addictions. Each time this is done, a MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY is created.

aid and abet = "to assist the perpetrator of the crime while sharing in the requisite intent." U.S. v. Martinez, 555 F.2d 1269, 1271 (5th Cir. 1977). This phrase is a well-known legal DOUBLET that, like most doublets, has come down to us from the Middle Ages and Renaissance, when it was common to embellish terms with synonyms. Singly, aid is the more general term, abet generally appearing only in contexts involving criminal intent.

Aid and abet is sometimes called a TERM OF ART, but in fact it is, in the words of the chief American and British criminal-law commentators, "unnecessarily verbose" and "antiquated." See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 724–25 (3d ed. 1982); Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 288 (1978). It is still used in both AmE and BrE, although in the 1970s England's Law Commission Working Party proposed replacing the phrase with help—a proposal that was not accepted. Perkins and Boyce recommend abet, which can stand alone unaided.

The agent noun is aider and abettor—e.g.: "The appellant now makes the further claim that the complaint charged the defendant as an original instigator only, and that he cannot be held liable thereunder as an aider and abettor."/ "The court stated that it had found no other case discussing whether a nonparty aider and abettor is subject to the court's jurisdiction." See abettor.

Sometimes the phrase is made even wordier: "The further contention of the appellant is that defendant's acts are insufficient to support the trial court's conclusions that he knowingly aided, abetted, and assisted [read abetted] in the prosecution of false charges against defendant, and adopted them as his own." See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

aid(e)-de-camp (= military aide) is borrowed from the French and should retain the Gallicized spelling—aide—especially considering that aide is itself now an English word (meaning "a staff member under one's authority"). The plural is aides-de-camp.

In BrE, the phrase is often abbreviated A.D.C. <he was A.D.C. to General Montgomery in 1943>.

aim to [+ present infinitive]; aim at [+ gerund]. The idiom aim to establish is typical of AmE, aim at establishing typical of BrE.

airworthy is used in reference to aircraft and means "fit for operation in the air" (W3). The word, surprisingly enough first used in 1829, was analogized from seaworthy, q.v.

aitiology. See etiology.

alas; alack. Alas should express woe caused by a lamentable state of affairs. Here, in a quotation from a journal entitled Ethnicity, it is nonsensical: "There have been a number of meetings around the land about ethnicity (the phenomenon, alas, not this journal)." The writer would hardly bemoan the increasing attention given to ethnicity as an academic subject, even if the writer were editor of the journal. If one were to guess at the intended meaning in that quotation, alas might be a MALAPROPISM for some phrase such as to be sure.

Alack is archaic; alas and alack is a tiresome CLICHÉ.

al barre. See at (the) bar.

albeit. This conjunction, though termed "archaic" by Eric Partridge (the British lexicographer), thrives in AmE, both legal and nonlegal. And it still appears in BrE, esp. in legal writing. Labeled "literary" in the COD, the word albeit means "though" and introduces concessive phrases and sometimes subordinate clauses. The even more literary howbeit, by contrast, means "nevertheless" and begins principal clauses.

A. Introducing Phrases. The predominant modern use is for albeit to introduce concessive phrases: "The parties addressed the issue, albeit in fairly leisurely fashion."/ "Petitioner located employment in 1978, albeit at a lower wage than he earned working for the respondents."

B. Introducing Clauses. Albeit may begin a clause, albeit although is more common in this context: "The fifty-five mile-an-hour speed limit has its benefits; it also has its costs, albeit they may not seem apparent because a majority is willing to pay them."/ "When the relevant credit extends to £10, that is the moment at which the offense is committed, albeit it may be by aggregating a series of smaller sums." (Eng.)/ "We think that we have for review a decision on a stipulated record, albeit the matter was styled as a determination on motions for summary judgment."

C. For even if. Archaically, albeit is sometimes used for even if in beginning a clause: "Separate and distinct false declarations that require different factual proof of falsity may properly be charged in separate counts, albeit [read even if] they are all related and arise out of the same transaction or subject matter." This use of the term is to be discouraged.

aleatory; stochastic; fortuitous. These words have similar but distinct meanings. Aleatory = depending on uncertain contingencies <contingent remainders are aleatory>. E.g., "We will respect the aleatory nature of the settlement process, whether any of the parties are ultimately found to have made a favorable settlement."

Stochastic = random. Fortuitous = accidental, occurring by chance. See fortuitous. Cf. adventitious.

alegal, adj. This late-20th-century NEOLOGISM—lit. "without law"—recognizes the increasingly common view that we should not put every action or event on the plane of legality and illegality. In the view of some scholars, if an action is neither mandated nor prohibited by law, then it should be characterized as alegal—e.g.:

- "Think of the many human beings in pre-industrial society related through their dependence on territorial magnates, or guilds, or church organizations. They were not alegal institutions." Joseph Vining, Legal Identity: The Coming of Age of Public Law 49 (1978).
- "At the free, alegal end of the spectrum, realism views judges as charging their own individual courses unencumbered by law in all respects but form . . . ." Lewis A. Kornhauser & Lawrence G. Sager, Unpacking the Court, 96 Yale L.J. 82, 93 (1986).
- "[Treating] the promises of unmmarried cohabitors as contractual words rather than alegal words of commitment puts public force behind what is otherwise legally vacuous." Mark Kelman, A Guide to Critical Legal Studies 105 (1987).

In using this term, of course, one must respect the boundaries between alegal and illegal. Otherwise, the same confusion might arise as exists between amoral and immoral. See immoral.

For related terms, see extralegal & nonlegal.

alias is both adverb (= otherwise [called or named]), as an elliptical form of alias dictus, and noun (= an assumed name), today usually the latter. Alias refers only to names, and should not be used synonymously with guise (= assumed appearance, pretense). See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.

alibi. A. As a Noun for excuse. The words are not synonymous, although the confusion that has grown out of their meanings is understandable. Alibi is a specific legal term referring to the defense of having been at a place other than the scene of a crime. By SLIPSHOD EXTENSION it has come to be used for any excuse or explanation for misconduct, usually that shifts blame to someone else.

The Evanses wrote of this term:

> Cynicism and the common man's distrust of the law have tinged alibi with a suggestion of improbability and even of dishonesty. Purists insist that it should be restricted to its legal meaning, and those who wish to be formally correct will so restrict it. In so doing, however, they will lose the connotation of cunning and dishonesty which distinguishes it from excuse.
> Bergen Evans & Cornelia Evans, Contemporary American Usage 24 (1957)

Lawyers perhaps more than others ought to "wish to be formally correct."

B. As an Adverb. In recent years alibi has been used as an adverb (meaning "elsewhere" <she proved herself alibi>), but this usage should be eschewed. Although "elsewhere" is the original Latin meaning of alibi (originally a locative of L. alius "other"), in English it has long served only as a noun, and it is an affectation to hark back to the classical sense

C. As a Verb. Nor should alibi be used as a verb, as it is in the following sentences. The first sentence is doubly bad, for the misbegotten verb is based on the misused noun (see A): "The party cannot alibi [i.e., excuse] losses in the election."/ "The defendants alibied themselves [i.e., exculpated themselves by proving that they were not at the scene of the crime] and accused other men."/ "The conspirators attempted to alibi [i.e., provide alibis for] one another." The OED records this usage from 1909 and labels it colloquial.

alien, adj., takes the preposition from or, more commonly, to. For purposes of DIFFERENTIATION, "there is perhaps a slight preference for from where mere separation is meant (We are entangling ourselves in matters alien from our subject), and for to when repugnance is suggested (Cruelty is alien to his nature)" (MEU2 17).

alien, v.t.; alienate; abalienate. When we talk about property changing hands, the best choice of verb is convey or transfer rather than any of these legalistic words. But if some form of alien must be used, the most common and therefore the best word in all senses is alienate, whether one writes about alienation of property or of affections. Nonlawyers may understand that in certain contexts alienate means "to transfer (as property)"; they have little chance of understanding alien in such a context—much less abalienate (a NEEDLESS VARIANT from the civil law). E.g., "Since property owned by tenants by the entireties is not subject to the debts of either spouse, they may alien [read alienate] it without infringing the rights of their individual creditors."/ "The rule of common law is that a man cannot attach to a grant or transfer of property, otherwise absolute, the condition that it shall not be alienated." Aliene is an archaic variant spelling of the verb alien.

Alienate frequently takes on the lay sense in legal writing, as in the phrase alienation of affections, or as here: "This false statement was designed to alienate supporters of plaintiff and to affiliate them with the other candidate."

alienee (= one to whom ownership of property is transferred) is an unnecessary, and unnecessarily obscure, equivalent of grantee. See the quotation in the following entry.

alienor; alienist. Alienor (= one who transfers property) is equivalent to grantor; it should be avoided where grantor or transferor will serve: "Conveying lands by means of a fictitious or collusive suit, commenced by arrangement by the intended alienee [read grantee or recipient] against the alienor [read grantor]" (quoted in OED).

Alienist is an obsolescent term for psychiatrist. E.g., "The only witness testifying that the testator was incompetent was an alienist who had never seen him and the testator's divorced wife who had not seen him in two years."

alimony. See palimony.

alio intuitu is not a justified LATINISM, when there are so many more precise alternatives such as from a different point of view or with respect to another case (or condition). E.g., "Counsel urges us to reject all observations to the contrary in the other authorities as made alio intuitu [read under different circumstances] on the strength of admissions." (Eng.).

aliquot; aliquant. Aliquant = being a part of a number or quantity but not dividing it without leaving a remainder <4 is an aliquant part of 17> (W3); aliquot = contained an exact number of times in something else <4 is an aliquot part of 16> (id.).

These are technical terms generally best left to technical contexts. Aliquot adds nothing to the following sentence: "Compromises are contracts of settlement, and the compromise of one aliquot part of a single liability and payment of the balance in full is a settlement of all parts of such single liability."

One justified technical use of these terms occurs in the field of trusts, where payment of an aliquot or aliquant part of the consideration for transfer of legal title may determine whether the presumption of a resulting trust will arise. When a payor's contributions for the purchase of property in another's name are aliquot parts of the purchase price, some courts presume the contributions to be a gift or loan; when, however, these contributions are aliquant parts of the purchase price, the presumption does not arise. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts § 454 comment c (1959). This distinction may be obsolescent; the Restatement rejects it in comment b to section 454.

The term aliquot is also used in determining whether a gift of property in a will is a specific or a general legacy: "[B]equests of all testator's property, an aliquot part thereof, or all property except certain things . . . have been held to amount to general legacies." Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 733–34 (2d ed. 1953). See legacy.

aliunde (= from another source, from elsewhere) is a LATINISM with little justification in place of an English equivalent. The phrase evidence aliunde, for example, means "evidence from outside (an instrument, for example); extrinsic evidence." E.g., "Thereupon . . . counsel would present their respective reviews of the nature and effect of the state of the record with respect to the existence of sufficient evidence aliunde [read enough other evidence] to justify admission of the testimony." U.S. v. Azzarelli Constr. Co., 612 F.2d 292, 297 (7th Cir. 1979).

ALJ; A.L.J.; a.l.j. The usual abbreviation for administrative-law judge is ALJ (without periods)—an abbreviation first used in 1973 and now commonplace. For the first recorded use, see Hawkins v. Weinberger, 368 F. Supp. 896, 897 (D. Kan. 1973). The plural is ALJs. See administrative-law judge.

The uses of A.L.J. in late-19th-century American opinions generally meant either additional law judge or associate law judge.

all. A. *All (of). The more formal construction is to omit of and write, when possible, "All the arguments foundered." E.g., "Appellant was to guarantee unconditionally appellee's performance under the purchase agreement, including all appellee's obligations and liabilities." When the phrase is followed by a pronoun, all of is the only idiomatic choice (all of them, not all them), except when the pronoun is possessive <all my personal property>.

Before general nouns, all of is more common in AmE than in BrE; nevertheless, it should generally be avoided in formal writing. Rarely, all of reads better than all even where a pronoun does not follow—e.g.: "All of John's property was therefore subject to the IRS lien."

B. With Negatives. Not all—as opposed to all . . . not—is usually the correct sequence in negative constructions. "It seems that all things were not going well in Wheeler's own unit." (This expanded version of the idiomatic "All is not well" does not work. [Read either It seems that not all things were going well or, better, It seems that all was not well.]/ "However, all American courts did not reject it." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 89 (1938). [Read: But not all American courts rejected it.]/ "Students rightfully protest; and while all of their complaints do not [read not all their complaints] have merit, they too should be heard . . . ." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 14 (1970). Cf. every (C) & everyone . . . not.

C. And any. All follows a superlative adjective <most of all>; any follows a comparative adjective <more than any other>. Constructions such as more . . . than all are illogical—e.g.: "Thompson & Knight [a Dallas law firm] spent more time doing pro bono work than all Dallas law firms." [Read Thompson & Knight spent more time doing pro bono work than any other Dallas law firm.] See OVERSTATEMENT.

For any and all, see any and all.

all and singular is a collective equivalent of each and every. It is almost always unnecessary—e.g.: "Defendant denies each and every, all and singular, the allegations [read all the allegations] contained in the plaintiff's original petition." See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

all deliberate speed. See with all deliberate speed.

allegation; allegement; allegatum. The second and third forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

allegator = one who alleges. It is not often used, even in legal writing, perhaps because of its jocular suggestiveness of alligator.

allegatum. See allegation.

allege; contend. To allege is formally to state a matter of fact as being true or provable, without yet having proved it. The word once denoted stating under oath, but this meaning no longer applies. To contend, in the advocatory sense, means "to state one's position in a polemical way, to submit." (In its popular sense, contend means "to strive against.")

Allege should not be used as a synonym of assert, maintain, declare, or claim. Allege has peculiarly accusatory connotations. One need not allege only the commission of crimes; but certainly the acts alleged must concern misfeasances or negligence.

allegeable; allegible. Allegeable is the only recognized form of the word.

allegedly does not mean "in an alleged manner," as it would if the adverb had been formed as English adverbs generally are. Follett considered adverbs like this one ugly and unjustified (esp. reportedly). See Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 279 (1966). Yet allegedly is a convenient space- and time-saver for it is alleged that or according to the allegations. Though not logically formed, allegedly is well established and unobjectionable, if used in moderation. See reportedly.

allide; collide. The former is used only in a special context in reference to ships in admiralty law. When two ships allide, one of them is stationary; ships collide when both are moving before impact. Black's notes that the distinction is not carefully observed. See collision.

allision. See collision.

ALLITERATION. A. Rhetorically Effective Examples. "The primary appeal of the language," wrote Jerome Frank, "is to the ear." The SOUND OF PROSE is therefore a critical concern. And writers frequently harness sounds for any of several effects. When they repeat sounds, the result is called alliteration.

Sometimes alliteration creates a sarcastic tone, as when Vice President Spiro Agnew referred to the nattering nabobs of negativism. E.g., "And what is implied by that lovely limpid legalism, 'due process of law' ? " Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 51 (1939; repr. 1980)./ "Unblinded by the tweedledum-tweedledee twaddle of much that passes for learned legal argument, . . . he seems essentially a direct, plain-spoken politician . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 331 (1955).

At other times it merely creates a memorable phrase—e.g.: "[J]udges do and must legislate but they can do so only interstitially; they are confined from molar to molecular motions." Southern Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U.S. 205, 221 (1917) (Holmes, J., dissenting).

B. Unconscious Examples. The unconscious repetition of sounds, especially excessive sibilance (too many -s- sounds, as in the phrase especially excessive sibilance), can easily distract readers: "[W]hen used by accident it falls on the ear very disagreeably." W. Somerset Maugham, "Lucidity, Simplicity, Euphony," in The Summing Up 321, 325 (1938).

Though alliteration is quite common with -s- sounds, other unconscious repetitions can occur. In the following sentence (Uniform Probate Code 2-104), three words in a five-word phrase rhyme: "This section is not to be applied where its application would result in a taking of intestate estate by the state." [A possible revision: This section does not apply when its application would result in the escheat of an intestate estate.] Although one can avoid the use of state, intestate estate is well-nigh unavoidable. (The English Parliament enacted the Intestates' Estate Act, 15 & 16 Geo. VI & 1 Eliz. II, c. 64 (1952).) Sometimes one wishes that we could use the terms willed and unwilled rather than testate and intestate: "It is familiar law that the will is the source of the beneficiaries' title in the case of testate estates, while in intestate estates the source of title is the statute."

One good way to avoid the infelicity of undue alliteration is to read one's prose aloud when editing. See SOUND OF PROSE, THE.

all . . . not. See all (B).

allocable is the proper form, not allocatable—e.g.: "The division . . . held that the portion of increased tax expense attributable to facilities actually providing intrastate service was properly allocatable [read allocable] to Narragansett's intrastate operations." Nepco Mun. Rate Comm. v. FERC, 668 F.2d 1327, 1346 (D.C. Cir. 1981). See -ATABLE.

allocatee. See -EE.

allocator; allocatur. Allocator = one who allocates. Allocatur (lit., "it is allowed") in former practice meant "a certificate duly given at the end of an action, allowing costs" (OED).

allocute (= to deliver in court a formal, exhortatory address, i.e., an allocution) is a BACK-FORMATION from the noun allocution, q.v. Although some years ago the verb might have been viewed as a barbarous MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY, just as electrocute once was, we should accept allocute as a useful addition to legal language. E.g., "The appellants assert that the district court erroneously found that it had no cause to allocute."

Because allocution most properly refers to the court's and not to the criminal defendant's address, it is the court that allocutes; this distinction has given way to SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, however: "The trial judge denied the defendant the opportunity to allocute."

allocution; allocutus. Allocution is inadequately defined by the major dictionaries (usu. some variation on "a formal address"). In modern legal usage, the word refers to a trial judge's asking a criminal defendant to speak in mitigation of the sentence to be imposed. By SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, the word has come to denote the accused person's speech in mitigation of the sentence, rather than the judge's address asking the accused to speak. E.g., "The contention of this federal habeas corpus petitioner that he was not accorded his right of allocution in state court fails to raise a federal question." Allocutus is a NEEDLESS VARIANT and an unnecessary LATINISM. See elocution.

The phrase victim allocution—a popular phrase since the 1980s—refers to a crime victim's addressing the court with the objective usu. of persuading the sentencer to impose a harsher sentence. Arguably the result of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, the phrase is now established in American law.

allocutory is the adjective corresponding to the noun allocution, q.v.—e.g.: "[T]he right to make allocutory and other legal claims should be made effective by a right to counsel at sentencing." Note, Procedural Due Process at Judicial Sentencing for Felony, 81 Harv. L. Rev. 821, 833 (1968)./ "[A]llocutory pleas for mercy would have been unavailing and were not allowed." Harris v. State, 509 A.2d 120, 125 (Md. Ct. App. 1986).

al(l)odium, -ial. Black's and the OED list allodium (= land held in fee simple absolute) as standard, alodium as a variant; W3's listing is the opposite. Both forms may lay claim to etymological precedent. Allodium seems to be the more common and, because unanimity is desirable on this point, should be used to the exclusion of its single-elled counterpart. The plural is generally allodia.

The adjective form is allodial—e.g.: "There remained scattered tracts of 'allodial' land (literally, land 'without a lord') which were not incorporated into the system of feudal tenure and whose owners did not even in theory become tenants." Peter Butt, Land Law 38 (2d ed. 1988).

all of. See all (A).

allograph; autograph. An allograph is an agent's writing or signature for the principal. An autograph, of course, is one's own signature.

allonge (= a piece of paper attached to a note or other negotiable instrument, usu. to make room for further indorsements) derives from the French verb allonger (= to lengthen). Anglo-American lawyers borrowed the word from French law in the mid-19th century. Although Ballentine's Law Dictionary (3d ed. 1969) suggests that the word is pronounced /a-lənj/, the better and more common pronunciation is /ə-lonj/.

allow. A. Senses. Allow = (1) to give or grant (something) as a right or privilege <she allowed her neighbor an easement>; (2) to approve by not objecting <the court allowed appellee's counsel to reply to the rebuttal>; (3) to make provision for <the rules allow depositions upon written questions>; or (4) in BrE, to sustain (a judgment, claim, or appeal) <the appeal should be allowed>.

B. And permit. The words allow and permit have an important connotative difference. Allow, as in sense (2), suggests merely the absence of opposition, or refraining from a proscription. In contrast, permit suggests affirmative sanction or approval.

allowable, though structurally an adjective, often functions as a noun in legal contexts. As a noun it refers to the amount of oil or gas that an operator is allowed to extract from a well or field in one day, under proration orders of a state regulatory commission. E.g., "A well bottomed in this sand had an allowable that would enable it to recover an amount of oil and gas in excess of the tract's fair share of production from both reservoirs." See ADJECTIVES (B).

all ready. See already.

all right; alright. Alright for all right has never been accepted as standard and probably never will be. Although the phrase is considered unitary, the one-word spelling has not been recognized "perhaps because the expression remains largely an informal one" (Oxford Guide).

all the; all these. See all (A).

all together. See altogether.

allude. A. And advert; refer. To allude is to refer to (something) indirectly or by suggestion only. To advert or refer is to bring up directly, advert, q.v., being the more FORMAL WORD. Allude is commonly misused for refer; the indirect nature of allusion is an important element of the word's sense. E.g., "In a work purporting to discuss the ethical side of practice, a passing allusion [read reference] to the subject seems eminently proper if not necessary."/ "As the above notice contained an allusion to the plaintiff, and also statements that he considered were calculated to damage his character and the credit of his firm, a solicitor was consulted, and a letter was written by him to the defendants, protesting against the plaintiff's name being used as intended in the advertisement." (Eng.) (Here the final phrase reveals that the name was actually mentioned: that the publication contained a reference, not an allusion, to the plaintiff.) In the following sentence the writer creates an OXYMORON: "There being no words expressly alluding [read referring] to that contingency, the court is to cure the defect by implication."

B. And illude; elude. To illude is to deceive with an illusion; to elude is to avoid or escape. Here elude is misused for allude, a startling blunder: "That is the reason for the problem the dean was eluding to [read alluding to]."

C. For suggest. This is an attenuated use of allude to be avoided. "Appellants attempt to allude [read suggest] that their assistance in evading Iranian currency controls and that rebating money to appellee in American money was a major service that takes the contract outside the purview of the U.C.C."

allusion; illusion. The first is an indirect reference <literary allusion>, the second a deception or misapprehension <optical illusion>. For the difference between illusion and delusion, see illusion.

ALLUSION. See LITERARY ALLUSION (A).

allusive; allusury. Allusive is standard.

alluvio(n); alluvium. In the strictest sense, alluvion means "the flow or wash of water against a riverbank," and alluvium "a deposit of soil, clay, or the lack of such a deposit caused by an alluvion." Alluvion has come, however, to be used for alluvium—a regrettable development, for the DIFFERENTIATION is worth preserving. Alluvio is the Roman-law term for alluvion.

The plural forms of the English terms are alluvions and alluviums (or, less good, alluvia). See PLURALS (A). The adjective for alluvium is alluvial, the forms alluvious and alluvian being NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Alluvion has no clear-cut adjective; it should act as its own adjective.

ally. As a noun, the accent is on the first syllable /al-I/; as a verb, on the second /ə-lI/.

almoi(g)n. See frankalmoi(g)n(e).

alodian. See al(l)odium.

alongside (of). The word alongside, as a preposition, means "at the side of." Hence, one car is parked alongside another, and logs are stacked alongside one another. It is unnecessary to write alongside of.

already; all ready. Already has to do with time <finished already>, and all ready with preparation <we are all ready>.

alright. See all right.

also. See too (A).

also not is usually inferior to nor—e.g.: "The cases are also not [read Nor are the cases] in accord as to the effect of an accidental killing of another during an attempt to commit suicide." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 122 (3d ed. 1982)./ "My motion pictures were also not very good." [Read: Nor were my motion pictures very good.] Stephen White, The Written Word x (1984).

alterative; alterant. Both words may act as noun and adjective. As adjectives, they both mean "causing alteration." As nouns, however, the meanings diverge. An alterant is "anything that alters or modifies." Alterative is a term used in medical contexts—though rarely now by physicians—meaning "a medicine that gradually changes unhealthy bodily conditions into healthy ones."

altercation. This word refers to "a noisy brawl or dispute," not rising to the seriousness of physical violence. Here the word is almost certainly misused for fight in the physical sense: "While serving a term of imprisonment in a North Carolina penitentiary, the respondent Perry became involved in an altercation with another inmate; a warrant issued, charging Perry with the misdemeanor of assault with a deadly weapon." Leff ill-advisedly wrote that "coming to . . . blows is not totally excluded from the ambit of this term," and used it for a physical affray in his entry on aggressor. Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2003, 1981 (1985). For authority limiting the term to the sense "wordy strife," see the OED, W2, W3, and Partridge, Usage and Abusage 27 (1973).

alter ego (lit., "other I") = a second self. To nonlawyers, it means "a kindred spirit" or "a constant companion." To American lawyers it has a special meaning in the corporate context: "a corporation used by an individual in conducting personal business, such that a court may impose personal liability (by piercing the corporate veil) when fraud has been perpetrated on third persons dealing with the corporation." The phrase should not be hyphenated unless it functions as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE <alter-ego theory>.

alternate; alternative. A. As Nouns. An alternative is a choice or option—usually one of two choices, but not necessarily. It has been argued by etymological purists that the word (fr. L. alter "the other of two") should be confined to contexts involving but two choices; Fowler termed this contention a fetish, and it has little or no support among other stylistic experts or in actual usage. E.g., "None of the three alternatives pretends to show the sequence of transactions."/ "The defendant is directed to provide to the court within fourteen days in affidavit form information concerning three alternatives."

Indeed, alternative carries with it two nuances absent from the near-synonym choice. First, alternative may suggest adequacy for some purpose <ample alternative channels>; and second, it may suggest compulsion to choose <the alternatives are liberty and death>.

Alternate, n., means: (1) "something that proceeds by turns with another"; or (2) "one who substitutes for another." It is helpful to understand that alternative is called upon for use far more frequently than alternate.

B. As Adjectives. Alternative = mutually exclusive; available in place of another (COD). E.g., "Nevertheless, if he has failed to show an unlawful conspiracy and monopoly, he has under his alternative demand shown a cause of action to recover damages from either or both of the defendants."

Alternate = (1) coming each after one of the other kind, every second one; or (2) substitute. This sentence illustrates sense (1) of alternate: "The examination may be made either by one person reading both the original and the copy, or by two persons, one reading the original and the other the copy, and it is not necessary (except in peerage cases) that each should alternately read both." (Eng.) Here sense (2) of alternate applies: "Statutes providing for alternate jurors to sit on a case so that they can substitute for jurors ceasing to sit on the case sometimes provide for additional peremptory challenges with respect to such jurors."/ "Thereafter, the testator decided he did not wish to nominate this alternate executor."

In the following sentences, alternate is misused for alternative—a common mistake, perhaps understandable because of the close sense (2) of alternate: "Nor does it appear likely that further conversations would have convinced counsel to pursue alternate [read alternative] defenses [i.e., defenses available in place of the primary defense pleaded]."/ "Appellant based his claim on alternate [read alternative] theories."/ "The court permitted a damage action there despite the existence of the alternate [read alternative] remedy."

The notion that an alternative is one of two choices is strongly enough rooted that two alternatives may seem redundant: "Where a trust instrument contains two alternative conditions [read contains alternative conditions], of which the first might be too remote and the second, which actually occurs, is not too remote, the rule is not violated." In any event, because alternative suggests mutual exclusivity when referring to two objects, either is redundant when used in proximity: "A search of the record in this case establishes a likely absence of complete diversity between the parties on either of two alternative theories [read on either of two theories or on alternative theories]."

alternative dispute resolution; alternate dispute resolution. The proper form is alternative dispute resolution. The phrase is commonly abbreviated ADR. See alternate (B).

although; though. As conjunctions, the words are virtually interchangeable. The only distinction is that although is more formal and dignified, though more usual in speech and familiar writing. In certain formal contexts, however, though reads better. Though serves also as an adverb <He stated as much, though>.

Tho and altho are old-fashioned truncated spellings that were at one time very common but failed to become standard. They should be avoided.

although . . . yet was formerly a common construction; these two words were once considered CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS. Today the construction is seen only in the most formal contexts: "Although the relation of parent and child subsists, yet if the child is incapable of performing any services, the foundation of the action fails." (Eng.) In most modern contexts, either conjunction will suffice to give the same meaning as if both were used.

altogether; all together. Altogether = completely; wholly. "Such appeals are altogether frivolous." All together = at one place or at the same time. "The defendants were tried all together."

alumnus. A. Sense. This term is obsolete as a LEGALISM for foster-child; today it means only "a male former student (of a particular school, esp. an institution of higher learning)." Strictly speaking, one need not be a graduate to be an alumnus. One who abandons a course of study is still an alumnus.

B. The Plural Forms alumni and alumnae. The first, strictly speaking, refers to former students who are male; the singular form is alumnus. The second refers to former students who are female; the singular is alumna. Nowadays, however, alumni refers to males and females alike. The same is not true, however, of alumnae, which can refer only to women. "Throughout its history, the Securities and Exchange Commission has attracted lawyers of the highest quality; among its alumnae [read alumni], for example, are Mr. Justice William Douglas, Judge Gerhard Gesell, Professor Louis Loss, and Professor Homer Kripke." This statement might come as a surprise to the persons mentioned.

A more common mistake than confusing the gender of these words is confusing their NUMBER, as by using alumni or alumnae as a singular. That these are plural forms of alumnus and alumna should be apparent to anyone with even the faintest familiarity with Latin.

C. And alumnor. An alumnor is one employed to work with or at an ex-students' association. The word is a MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY, because the -or suffix should generally be appended to a verb, and alumn is no verb.

a.m., A.M.; p.m., P.M. It does not matter whether capitals or lowercase letters are used, as long as a document is consistent throughout. The lowercase letters are now more common. The phrases for which these abbreviations stand are ante meridiem and post meridiem, not meridian. Periods are preferred in these abbreviations.

amalgam; amalgamation. Some DIFFERENTIATION is possible. Amalgam, the older term, means "a combination" . Amalgamation means primarily "the act of combining or uniting; consolidation" <effecting an amalgamation of the companies>. Amalgamation is best avoided in the sense given to amalgam.

amatory. See amorous.

ambassador; embassador. The former is the preferred spelling. See embassy.

ambiance. See ambience.

ambidexter = a solicitor who, retained by one party to litigation, abandons that party for the adversary. E.g., "He is a d——d rascal, and an immoral and base man, and unless ignorance of the law makes a lawyer he is no lawyer—he is an ambidexter and a disgrace to his profession." Goodenow v. Tappan, 1 Ohio 60, 61 (1823) (quoting a declaration). See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

ambience; ambiance. The first form, the English form, is preferable. The latter is a Frenchified affectation that has become a VOGUE WORD. See ambit.

AMBIGUITY, despite what many lawyers seem to believe, inheres in all writing. Even the most tediously detailed documents that attempt to dispel all uncertainties contain ambiguities; indeed, usually the more voluminous the writing, the more voluminous the ambiguities. (See MYTH OF PRECISION.) Nevertheless, we must strive to rid our writing of ambiguities that might give rise to misreadings. DRAFTING especially is a constant battle against ambiguity—a battle that no one can entirely win: "Ambiguity is inherent in any language more complex than grunts, and even a grunt can be ambiguous." Philip Howard, At the Double, and Be Rather Sharp About It, The Times, 8 Feb. 1991, at 92.

The war against ambiguity should not be waged by overwriting and attempts at hyperprecision through exhaustive specificity. Rather, the legal writer should work on developing a concise, lean, and straightforward writing style, along with a sensitivity to words and their meanings. Once a writer has acquired such a style, ambiguities tend to become more noticeable, and therefore easier to correct. (See PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).) At the same time, an increased linguistic sensitivity allows one to see ambiguities in what might previously have seemed a model of clarity.

What exactly is an ambiguity? William Empson, the greatest expounder of ambiguity, has defined it as "any verbal nuance, however slight, which gives room for alternative reactions to the same piece of language." William Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity 19 (1930; Penguin ed. 1977). Courts tend to define ambiguity more narrowly: "An 'ambiguous' word or phrase is one capable of more than one meaning when viewed objectively by a reasonably intelligent person who has examined the context of the entire integrated agreement and who is cognizant of the customs, practices, usages and terminology as generally understood in the particular trade or business." Walk-In Medical Ctrs., Inc. v. Breuer Capital Corp., 818 F.2d 260, 263 (2d Cir. 1987).

> It is unfortunate that many lawyers persist in using the word ambiguity to include vagueness. To subsume both concepts under the same name tends to imply that there is no difference between them or that their differences are legally unimportant. Ambiguity is a disease > of language, whereas vagueness, which is sometimes a disease, is often a positive benefit. . . . Whereas ambiguity in its classical sense refers to equivocation, vagueness refers to the degree to which, independently of equivocation, language is uncertain in its respective applications to a number of particulars. Whereas the uncertainty of ambiguity is central, with an 'either-or' challenge, the uncertainty of vagueness lies in marginal questions of degree.

> Reed Dickerson, The Interpretation of Statutes 48–49 (1975).

Of course, even highly reputed legal writers confuse the two terms—e.g.: "[A] written constitution must be enormously ambiguous [read vague] in its general provisions." Edward H. Levi, An Introduction to Legal Reasoning 59 (1949; repr. 1972)./ "A wise draftsman, when he is dealing with novel issues in course of uncertain development, will deliberately retreat into ambiguity [read vagueness—there being no such thing as "purposeful ambiguity"]." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contracts 76 (1974).

Dickerson, of course, discusses ambiguity from the vantage of the legal drafter rather than that of the poet; for the latter, ambiguity is hardly "a disease of language." As Empson has so well demonstrated, in literature it is often "a positive benefit."

Following are some examples of the more common types of ambiguity in legal writing. Some of these are equivocal only in a technical (or stickler's) sense (i.e., are patent ambiguities); others create real dilemmas in meaning (i.e., are latent ambiguities); either way, these ambiguities detract from the context in which they appear.

A. Uncertain Stress. "Even if a merchant sells a product, if he was not engaged in selling that particular product in the normal course of business, he may not be held liable." Read the sentence once stressing may, the next time stressing not in the final clause. Rewording the sentence eliminates the ambiguity. Assuming the writer meant to say that the merchant is immune from liability (and not that he might or may be immune), he might better have written: he cannot be held liable (see can) or he is not subject to liability. See may.

B. Syntax. The ordering of sentence-parts is basic to clarity. When phrases are arranged with little reflection, ambiguities are certain to arise.

1. Verbal Correspondence

- "The parties shall make every reasonable effort to agree on and have prepared as quickly as possible a contract . . . ." Should the sentence read "to have prepared"? Does have correspond syntactically to shall, to make, or to agree? The three possible meanings vary substantially.
- "The artificial entity may sue or be sued as though it were a person, it pays taxes, it may apply for business licenses in its own name, it may have its own bank account, it may have its own seal, and so forth." All the its in this sentence have the antecedent entity. Yet, because of the placement of the first it, one is led to believe that the later ones will have a parallel structure ("as though it were a person, as though it pays taxes, as though it may apply . . ."). Thus the reader is syntactically sidetracked for a moment.

2. Poorly Placed Modifiers

- "No well shall be drilled within 200 feet of any residence or barn now on said land without lessor's consent." No well may be drilled without the lessor's consent? (This, obviously, is the intended meaning.) Or is it that the barn must be on the land without the lessor's consent?
- "The court concluded that literacy tests had abridged the right to vote on account of race or color." The right to vote on account of race or color was abridged? No: the right to vote was abridged on account of race or color.
- "Fear that a jury will wrongly convict an innocent man of rape because it believes a woman who is ambivalent or deceitful after the fact historically has pervaded the law of rape." Leslie J. Harris, Book Review, 66 Tex. L. Rev. 905, 905 (1988). Ambivalent or deceitful historically? No: historically is a squinting modifier that should be placed in the midst of the verb phrase: has historically pervaded. See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (A).
- "As such, the court would be correct in ordering a partial distribution of the amounts of the fund that has been sought in the motion." Does the relative pronoun that refer to fund, amounts, or distribution? Seemingly the last of these, because the verb (has) is singular—and fund is not logically the right word. Amounts is the right word logically, but it does not fit with has.
- "This chilling tale, told in a 13-page report released today by Edward F. Stancik, the Special Commissioner of schools, raised serious questions about the detection and reporting of child abuse by school officials." Josh Barbanel, Girl Writes About Rape by Father but School Ignores Plight, N.Y. Times, 5 Feb. 1993, at B1. Readers may infer that the story is about child abuse by school officials; in fact, however, it is about detection and reporting by school officials.
- "Israeli police officers pulled tires away from a burning fire lit in response to the slayings by Jewish protesters Tuesday." 2 Israeli Police Gunned Down, Daily Texan, 31 Mar. 1993, at 3 (adding that "[p]olice blamed militant Arabs for the pre-dawn slayings"). Is it slayings by Jewish protesters or fires lit by Jewish protesters? Though the latter interpretation seems more far-fetched, that is what the writer intended.

NOUN PLAGUE exemplifies one type of poorly placed modifiers. For example, alimentary canal smuggling was intended by the U.S. Supreme Court to mean "smuggling contraband goods by concealing them temporarily in one's gut." But the phrase suggests "the smuggling of alimentary canals." E.g., "A divided panel . . . reversed [defendant's] convictions, holding that her detention violated the Fourth Amendment . . . because the customs inspectors did not have a 'clear indication' of alimentary canal smuggling at the time she was detained." U.S. v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 533 (1985).

C. Poor Word Choice. "No one has ever told them how to edit syntactic confusion into clear prose." Joseph Williams, Style: Ten Lessons in Clarity and Grace 4–5 (1981). To get at the author's true sense, read transform for edit. Otherwise, edit . . . into can read as if it were insert . . . into.

These problems are remedied easily enough by thoughtful attention to one's prose, and by editing and revising with the realization that legal writers harm only themselves when they burden readers with these dilemmas in meaning. Drafters who commit these sins do their clients a disservice, unless, of course, the clients enjoy litigation for the sake of litigation. Cf. MISCUES.

ambit; ambience. The former means "scope," the latter "the immediate environment; atmosphere." Here the former is correctly used: "Yet this very narrow ambit of judicial review does not release us from our responsibility to scrutinize the record in its entirety to determine whether substantial evidence does support the Secretary's findings." See ambience.

ambulance chaser = (1) a lawyer who approaches victims of street accidents in hopes of persuading them to sue for damages; (2) a lawyer's agent who engages in this activity; (3) by extension, one who solicits personal-injury cases for a lawyer, usu. in return for a percentage of the recovery (today an illegal activity in most jurisdictions); or (4) by further extension, one who seeks to profit from the misfortunes of others <that politician is nothing more than a foreign-policy ambulance-chaser>.

The first so-called ambulance chaser—and the reputed coiner of the term—was Abraham Gatner, who in 1907 persuaded a New York law firm to let him sign up accident victims on retainer agreements for the law firm. Actually, though, the term was a misnomer from the beginning because Gatner would not reach the injured person until hours later—and often the next day. See Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 118–19 (1970). See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

ambulatory (lit., "able to walk") has a special sense in the law of wills: "taking effect not from when [the will] was made but from the death of the testator" (CDL), or "capable of being revised." A will is ambulatory because it is revocable until the testator's death. E.g., "The holding of the chancery court was based on the proposition that a will is ambulatory, speaks only at the death of the maker, and the 1955 will having been destroyed in the lifetime of the testatrix, it never had the effect of revoking the 1954 will."

ameliorate; meliorate. Ameliorate is the standard term meaning "to make or become better." E.g., "These anomalies appear sufficiently enmeshed in the current tangled web of jurisprudence on this subject to be beyond amelioration by a panel of this court."/ "Society's view of land as a commercial asset plays an important part in the law of ameliorative waste." Meliorate is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

It is incorrect to use ameliorate as if it meant "to lessen": "The First, Second, and Eleventh Circuits found that any resort to Iranian courts to recover the movants' monetary losses, should the preliminary injunction be denied, would be futile and that the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal did not ameliorate [read lessen] the likelihood of irreparable injury."

ameliorating waste. See waste.

amenability; amenity. These words, of unrelated origin, are occasionally confused. Amenability = legal answerability; liability to being brought to judgment <amenability to the jurisdiction of the foreign forum>.

Amenity = (1) agreeableness; (2) something that is comfortable or convenient; or (3) a convenient social convention. Here the word is almost certainly misused: "Fiat moved to dismiss the action against it for lack of personal jurisdiction, arguing that it was . . . not susceptible to the amenities of a Massachusetts forum [read not amenable to the Massachusetts forum]."

amenable takes the preposition to <amenable to process>.

amend; emend. Both derive from the Latin verb emendare (= to free from fault). Amend = (1) to put right, change; or (2) to add to, supplement. This is the general word; the other is more specialized. Emend = to correct (as a text).

Amend out has been used to mean "to excise." E.g., "This provision, essentially the same as that in the Senate bill, was amended out on the House floor." Taken out, cut out, or excised would have been more felicitous. See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY & out (A).

The nominal forms of amend and emend are amendment and emendation.

amendatory; amendable. Amendatory = effecting an amendment; amendable = capable of being amended.

amendment = (1) a legislative change in a statute or constitution, usu. by adding provisions not in the original; or (2) the correction of an error or the supplying of an omission in process or pleadings. This noun may take either to or of, usually the former—e.g.: "The continuing episodes of protest and dissent in the United States have their basis in the First Amendment to the Constitution, a great safety valve that is lacking in most other nations of the world." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 3 (1970).

a mensa et thoro (lit., "from board and bed") is a standard phrase in canon law denoting a decree of divorce—now generally outmoded because it does not permit remarriage—that was the forerunner of modern judicial separation. (Such a divorce is distinct from the later divorce a vinculo matrimonii, which does allow remarriage.) The LATINISM seems little justified today. "This was only a divorce a mensa et thoro, equivalent to the modern judicial separation and infrequent at that." (Eng.)/ "In Barber v. Barber, the Supreme Court held that a wife could sue in federal court in Wisconsin on the basis of diversity of citizenship to enforce a New York state court decree granting her a divorce a mensa et thoro." The phrase divorce from board and bed is sometimes used instead. See divorce.

amerce = (1) to fine; (2) to punish; or (3) to hold liable. Today, it is little more than a pretentious LEGALISM—e.g.: "To treat that clause as though it were a redundant or an insubstantial part of the agreement is to flout familiar experience of the readiness of juries to amerce insurance companies [read hold insurance companies liable]." Watson v. Employers Liab. Assurance Corp., 348 U.S. 66, 75–76 (1954)./ "When we provided . . . that costs were to be awarded to defendants and intervenors, we did not intend to amerce the plaintiffs with [read hold the plaintiffs liable for] all of the costs of the litigation since its inception." Environmental Defense Fund, Inc. v. Froehlke, 368 F. Supp. 231, 254 (W.D. Mo. 1973). See affeer.

amercement; amerciament; merciament. Amercement [fr. F. estre à merci "to be at [one's] mercy"] = (1) the imposition of a fine; or (2) the fine so imposed. Usually fining (sense 1) or fine (sense 2) suffices in place of this little-known word. Sometimes, though, an appropriate edit is not at all apparent—e.g.: "It appears that an amercement proceeding may properly be initiated by motion in the principal action." Vitale v. Hotel California, Inc., 446 A.2d 880, 882 n.1 (N.J. Super. Ct. 1982).

Amerciament and merciament are archaic variants. See affeer.

AMERICANISMS AND BRITISHISMS. Throughout this book Americanisms are labeled "AmE" and Britishisms are labeled "BrE." For guidance on distinctions not covered here, see Norman W. Schur, English English (1980); Norman Moss, British/American Language Dictionary (1984); and Martin S. Allwood, American and British (1964). For differences in editorial style, compare The Chicago Manual of Style (14th ed. 1993) with Judith Butcher, Copy-Editing: The Cambridge Handbook (2d ed. 1981).

amicable; amiable. The former we borrowed from Latin, the latter from French; but the two forms are at base the same word. Useful DIFFERENTIATION has emerged to set these words apart, however. Amiable applies to persons <an amiable judge>, amicable to relations between persons <an amicable settlement>.

amicable action. See friendly suit.

amicus brief. One amicus brief, two amicus briefs—not amici briefs. E.g., "An aberration of the norm occurred in Chadha: both petitioner Chadha and the respondent Justice Department were allowed to reply to the amici briefs [read amicus briefs]." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 104 (1988). See amicus curiae.

amicus curiae; friend of the court. The Latin phrase is well established, and is not likely to be replaced in legal writing by its LOAN TRANSLA-TION, friend of the court. At times lawyers have forgotten the role of the amicus curiae—"one who, not as [a party], but, just as any stranger might, for the assistance of the court gives information of some matter of law in regard to which the court is doubtful or mistaken, rather than one who gives a highly partisan account of facts." New England Patriots Football Club, Inc. v. University of Colorado, 592 F.2d 1196, 1198 n.3 (1st Cir. 1979) (ellipses omitted).

Amicus-curiae practice is less restricted in the U.S. than in England, where "it is customary to invite the Attorney General to attend, either in person or by counsel instructed on his behalf, to represent the public interest, [although] counsel have been permitted to act as amicus curiae [read amici curiae?] on behalf of professional bodies (e.g., the Law Society)" (CDL). In the U.S., virtually anyone with interests affected by the litigation, or indeed with political interest in it, may, when represented by counsel, be approved as an amicus curiae.

Amicus is frequently used as an elliptical form of amicus curiae. E.g., "This amicus believes in an absolute prohibition of the practice."/ "The court also rejected the state's contention that since the United States is only an amicus, it cannot ask for affirmative relief." Amicus also serves as an elliptical adjective: "Texas also failed to seek intervention or file an amicus brief in a Second Circuit case directly reviewing the contract rates."

Amicus is sometimes even used as an ellipsis for amicus brief: "In its amicus, El Salvador explains its interest in securing the ultimate relocation of the pilot station of what it views as its national carrier." Airline Pilots Ass'n Int'l, AFL-CIO v. TACA Int'l Airlines, S.A., 748 F.2d 965, 971 (5th Cir. 1984). This ellipsis is perhaps too elliptical, because amicus does not readily suggest itself as a shortened form of amicus curiae brief or amicus brief, either of which should have appeared in the quoted sentence. See amicus brief.

Although the modern trend is to place the phrase before the noun it modifies, amicus curiae is often used as a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE—e.g.: "The conclusion of the Administrator, as expressed in the brief amicus curiae, is that the general tests point to the exclusion of sleeping and eating time of these employees from the workweek and the inclusion of all other on-call time."/ "When he represents no new questions, a third party can contribute usually most effectively and always most expeditiously by a brief amicus curiae and not by intervention." See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

Friend of the court, as an equivalent of amicus curiae, is primarily journalistic; it appears in many newspapers and journals with a general appeal. E.g., "In a friend-of-the-court brief, the home builders say that permitting lawsuits for damages would show that the Supreme Court recognized 'limits on local regulatory powers that destroy private property rights.'" Wall St. J., 9 Jan. 1985, § 2, at 25. Even this translated phrase, however, must baffle the lay reader not familiar with court practice. The translation is therefore of limited value. See LOAN TRANSLATIONS.

The plural of amicus curiae is amici curiae. Frequently the singular is wrongly used for the plural: "The practice is particularly used in the U.S. Supreme Court, where organizations deeply interested in an area of constitutional law . . . will frequently petition for and be granted permission to participate as amicus curiae [read amici curiae]." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2012 (1985)./ "The utilities may seek to present their views as amicus curiae [read amici curiae], and leave to do so is here granted."/ "Counsel for respondents, as amicus curiae [read amici curiae], assert that conclusion as their principal argument before this court."

The singular is pronounced /ə-mee-kəs-kyoor-ee-ɪ/ and the plural /ə-mee-kee-kyoor-ee-ɪ/ or /ə-mee-see/. Another acceptable pronunciation of the first word—a common pronunciation in AmE—is /am-ə-kəs/.

amid(st); in the midst of; mid; 'mid. Amid and amidst are somewhat learned, to the degree that they have been branded bookish or quaint. The charge may be unjust, for amid(st) has its uses (see among (B)). AmE prefers amid, and BrE amidst; in AmE, amidst is considered a literary word. In the midst of is an informal and wordy equivalent. The preposition mid is poetic in all but traditional phrases (e.g., midnight, midstream) or scientific uses; if the word is appropriate, however, mid is better than 'mid.

amok; amuck. Usage authorities once held firmly to the idea that amuck is preferable to amok—solely on the mistaken notion that amuck is older in English and amok (though a better transliteration of the Malaysian word) was a late-coming "didacticism." In fact, both forms date from the 17th century. And, in any event, amok is by far the more common spelling today—e.g.: "[T]here are important exceptions—exceptions that ought sufficiently to demonstrate the possibility that the linguistic sense of a profession can run amok." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 22 (1967)./ "RICO is a statute run amok and no one among. A. And amongst. Forms in -st, such as whilst and amidst, are generally ARCHAISMS. Amongst is no exception: in AmE it is pretentious at best. E.g., "Schools that have offered special composition courses for pre-law students (Illinois, Utah, Wayne State, Loyola of Chicago, amongst [read among] several others) have generally found them well received and oversubscribed." George D. Gopen, The State of Legal Writing, 86 Mich. L. Rev. 333, 355 (1987).

Amongst seems more common and more tolerable in BrE, where it carries no hint of affectation: "The first count of the declaration stated that plaintiff had contracted to perform in the theatre for a certain time, with a condition, amongst others, that she would not sing or use her talents elsewhere during the term without plaintiff's consent in writing." (Eng.)

Elmer A. Driedger wrote: "To divide amongst seems to be a little clearer than to divide among; in all other cases among is probably to be preferred." The Composition of Legislation 78 (1957). His first statement is unfounded: divide amongst provides no gain in clarity, and no difference in connotation or denotation.

B. With Mass Nouns. Among is used with count nouns and amid with mass nouns. Thus one is among people but amid a furor. (See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS & amid(st).) In the following sentences, among is misused for other prepositions:

- "The DEA agents discovered large quantities of marijuana among the shipment [read amid the shipment]."
- "Incompetence in writing English is widespread among [read in] the legal profession." Robert W. Benson, The End of Legalese, 13 N.Y.U. Rev. L. & Soc. Change 519, 570 (1984–1985).
- "Among [read With] the president's contingent are Mr Robert Mosbacher, commerce secretary, and around 20 top US executives." Stefan Wagstyl, Japan Promises to Boost US Imports, Fin. Times, 8 Jan. 1992, at 1.
- "Among the evidence [read A part of the evidence] cited in support of the theory is Brawner's denial of any concrete knowledge of plaintiff's intentions."

C. And between. See between (A). amoral. See immoral.

amorous; amatory; amative. Amorous = (1) strongly moved by love and sex; (2) enamored; or (3) indicative of love. Amative is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Amatory = of, relating to, or expressing sexual love (W10).

amortise. See amortize.

amortization; amortizement. The first is the regular and preferred form.

amortize; amortise. The -ize form is preferred in both AmE and BrE.

amortizement. See amortization.

amount; number. The former is used of mass nouns, the latter of count nouns. Thus we say "an increase in the amount of litigation" but "an increase in the number of lawsuits." See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

amount of, an. See SYNESIS.

amphibious, adj., is frequently used in reference to mariners who work both ashore and on ship. E.g., "Our past decisions have enunciated several factors to be evaluated in determining whether an amphibious employee becomes the 'borrowed' employee of other than his payroll employer."/ "The cases all involve the delicate question whether the federal interest in an amphibious worker's personal injury claims is sufficiently strong to justify federal courts' supplanting state law with federal common law of admiralty." This extended sense of amphibious probably had its origin in the phrase of World War II vintage, amphibious forces.

amphibology; amphiboly. The form amphibology (= quibble; ambiguous wording) predominates. E.g., "The term 'and/or' as ordinarily used is a deliberate amphibology." The other form is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

The corresponding adjective is amphibological.

amuck. See amok.

amuse. See bemuse.

an. See a.

anachronism; parachronism; prochronism; archaism. All these words indicate that, in some respect, the time is out of joint. An anachronism is any error in chronology, or something that is chronologically out of place. "We rejected the longstanding but anachronistic rule of Lincoln."/ "Professor Wigmore termed the privilege against adverse spousal testimony 'the merest anachronism in legal theory and an indefensible obstruction to truth in practice.'" Parachronism is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of anachronism.

A prochronism is a reference to an event at an earlier date than the true date. An archaism is something archaic, outmoded, or old-fashioned. E.g., "Death statutes have their roots in dissatisfaction with the archaisms of the law that have been traced to their origin in the course of this opinion." See ARCHAISMS.

anachronistic; anachronous; anachronic. The last two are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

anaconda clause. See Mother Hubbard clause.

analects; analecta. In both AmE and BrE, the English plural (analects) is preferred to the Greek (analecta).

analog. See analogy.

analogism. See analogy.

analogous; analogical. These words mean different things. Analogous /ə-nal-ə-gəs/ = similar in certain respects. The word should be avoided where similar suffices; the two are not perfectly synonymous.

Analogical /an-ə-loj-ɪ-kəl/ = of, by, or expressing an analogy. E.g., "In Anglo-American law we do not think of analogical development of the traditional materials of the legal system as interpretation." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 51 (1922; repr. 1975).

analogy; analog(ue); analogism. An analogy is a corresponding similarity or likeness; in logic, analogy means "an inference that, if two or more things are similar in some respects, they must be alike in others."

An analogue is a thing that is analogous to something else. E.g., "The Esso decision suggests that analogues to such traditional equity doctrines as laches, election of remedies, and estoppel may justify a finding of peculiar circumstances." (The spelling analog should be confined to technical contexts involving physics or computers.)

analyse. See analyze.

analysis. See analyzation & in the final analysis.

analyst; analyzer; analyzist. The last two are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

analytic(al). No DIFFERENTIATION has surfaced between the two forms. The shorter generally serves better, although occasionally the longer form may be more euphonious, as where another -al adjective is proximate: "In most cases, the court treats the validity of a particular allegedly charitable trust as a legal issue to be decided largely by analytical and historical methods."/ "But the use of civilian treatises by English and American analytical and historical jurists had led to attempts to force common-law institutions and doctrines into civilian molds which retarded their effective development" (Roscoe Pound).

analytical jurisprudence = a method of legal study that examines law purely in its existing structure (without resort to its history), classifies its terms and concepts, and denies the law any validity unless it derives from or is sanctioned by a determinate sovereign. E.g., "Austin, the father of English analytical jurisprudence, viewed all law as essentially a command of the sovereign power." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 15 (2d ed. 1953).

An adherent to this view of the law is typically referred to as an analytical jurist—e.g.: "Early in this century English and American analytical jurists produced a good deal of scholarship that resembles the work of legal science in a number of ways, and a revival of analytical jurisprudence is now going on in the common law world." John H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 85 (1969). See jurist. Cf. sociological jurisprudence.

analyzation, a pseudo-learned variant of analysis, has no place in the language—e.g.: "Defense counsel was then provided with ample opportunity to cross-examine to expose any weaknesses in Wagenhofer's credentials or process of analyzation [read analysis]." U.S. v. Bartley, 855 F.2d 547, 552 (8th Cir. 1988).

analyze; analyse. The former is AmE, the latter BrE. Analyse does not merit a bracketed sic when quoted in an American publication, as here: "The dust jacket tells us: 'In this book, the author brings to bear empirical evidence and legal theory in a critical comparison of English and American discovery, and analyses [sic] and evaluates the differences between the two systems." Book Review, 61 Tex. L. Rev. 929, 929 (1983). See sic (A).

analyzer; analyzist. See analyst.

ananym. See anonym.

anarchy, -ic(al), -ial; anarchism, -ist(ic). Anarchism is a political theory antithetical to any form of government; anarchy is a state or quality of society. Only anarchy (= lawlessness, disorder) has pejorative connotations. Here anarchism is misused for anarchy: "Unless we find a better way of working together, sheer anarchism [read anarchy] will result." The preferred adjectival forms are anarchic and anarchist.

ancestor. Only in legal writing does the term ancestors include parents as well as grandparents and others more remote. Nonlawyers do not generally think of their fathers and mothers as ancestors. See ascendant (B).

ancillarity – the quality of being ancillary or of maintaining ancillary jurisdiction (in the U.S., jurisdiction assumed by the federal courts for purposes of convenience to the parties, although the reach of the jurisdiction exercised extends beyond the constitutional or congressional grant). Ancillarity is not recorded in any dictionary, but is gaining ground as a legal term—e.g.:

- "Hence it seems quite clear that as concerns venue there are what may be termed 'degrees of ancillarity.'" Lesnik v. Public Indus. Corp., 144 F.2d 968, 976 (2d Cir. 1944).
- "Many early decisions seem to go beyond this limited concept of ancillarity." Chicago & North W. Transp. Co. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry., 367 F. Supp. 801, 805 n.1 (N.D. Ill. 1973).
- "[T]here may be three possible bases for the exercise of federal subject-matter jurisdiction over these third-party claims: admiralty, diversity, or ancillarity." Joiner v. Diamond M Drilling Co., 677 F.2d 1035, 1038 (5th Cir. 1982).
- "The concept of ancillarity may explain decisions which hold that actions to enforce an alimony or custody decree are outside the diversity jurisdiction if the decree remains subject to modification by the court that entered it." Lloyd v. Loeffler, 694 F.2d 489, 492 (7th Cir. 1982).

and. A. Beginning Sentences. It is a rank superstition that this coordinating conjunction cannot properly begin a sentence. And for that matter, the same superstition has plagued but, q.v. But this transitional artifice, though quite acceptable, should be sparingly used; otherwise the prose acquires an undesirable staccato effect.

The very best legal writers find occasion to begin sentences with and—e.g.:

- "There are certain emergencies of nations in which expedients that in the ordinary state of things ought to be forborne become essential to the public weal. And the government, from the possibility of such emergencies, ought ever to have the option of making use of them." The Federalist No. 36, at 223 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).
- "This period gave rise to what came to be called the law merchant, and saw the hesitant but unmistakable beginnings of the law of intellectual and industrial property. And it is to these times that we may trace in recognizable form the patterns of modern shipping and its associated law." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 5 (2d ed. 1975).
- "Acts of Parliament after all are very real laws, as lawyers would unhesitatingly agree. And Acts of Parliament have a very tangible 'existence.'" P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 1–2 (1983).
- "Despite errors and failings, Blackstone did manage to put in brief order the rank weeds of English law. But even his picture was partial and defective, like a dictionary that omitted all slang, all dialect, all colloquial and technical words. And even this imperfect guide was not available to colonials before the 1750s." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 21 (2d ed. 1985).
- "The judges allowed shifting uses; that is, where a fee was to pass from one person to another upon a contingency. And they allowed springing uses . . . ." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 326 (3d ed. 1990).

See SUPERSTITIONS (D).

B. For or. Oddly, and is frequently misused for or where a singular noun, or one of two nouns, is called for. E.g., "Prisoners' cases are usually heard before federal magistrates and district judges." This construction wrongly implies that magistrates and district judges go together—that is, that they hear such cases at the same time. The true sense of the sentence is "magistrates or district judges."

Sloppy drafting sometimes leads courts to recognize that and in a given context means or, much to the chagrin of some judges—e.g.: "We give our language, and our language-dependent legal system, a body blow when we hold that it is reasonable to read 'or' for 'and.'" MacDonald v. Pan Am. World Airways, Inc., 859 F.2d 742, 746 (9th Cir. 1988) (Kozinski, J., dissenting).

For the opposite mistake—or for and—see the third bulleted quotation under ancillarity. For a fuller discussion of the ambiguities caused by these words, see or (A).

C. In Enumerations. Legal writers have a tendency, especially in long enumerations, to omit and before the final element. To do so in legal writing is often infelicitous: the reader is jarred by the abrupt period ending the sentence and may even wonder whether a part of the enumeration has been inadvertently omitted. One may occasionally omit and before the final element in an enumeration with a particular nuance in mind: without and the implication is that the series is incomplete—rhetoricians call this construction "asyndeton"; with and the implication is that the series is complete. This shade in meaning is increasingly subtle in modern prose. For examples drawn from the writings of Benjamin N. Cardozo, Karl Llewellyn, and Gerald Gunther, see Bryan A. Garner, The Elements of Legal Style 159–60 (1991).

Finally, on the question of punctuating enumerations, the best practice is to place a comma before the and introducing the final element. See PUNCTUATION (C)(2). and etc. See etc.

and his children; and her children. This phrase ought to be avoided in wills because it gives rise to an interpretative dilemma: is the phrase one of limitation, i.e., does it indicate the size of the estate given? Or is it one of purchase, i.e., does it indicate a gift also to the afterborn children themselves? See words of purchase.

and his heirs; and her heirs. These phrases are quintessential pre-20th-century TERMS OF ART—pieces of magical language—formerly necessary to create a fee-simple interest. They are no longer necessary, as it is now possible to say, "I convey to you Blackacre in fee simple," and the words will have that very effect.

and/or. A. General Recommendation. A legal and business expression dating from the mid-19th century, and/or has been vilified for most of its life—and rightly so. The upshot is that "the only safe rule to follow is not to use the expression in any legal writing, document or proceeding, under any circumstances." Dwight G. McCarty, That Hybrid "and/or," 39 Mich. State B.J. 9, 17 (1960). Many lawyers would be surprised at how easy and workable this solution is. See either (D).

B. A Little History. Lawyers have been among and/or's most ardent haters, though many continue to use it. The term has been referred to as "that befuddling, nameless thing, that Janus-faced verbal monstrosity, neither word nor phrase, the child of a brain of someone too lazy or too dull to express his precise meaning, or too dull to know what he did mean, now commonly used by lawyers in drafting legal documents, through carelessness or ignorance or as a cunning device to conceal rather than express meaning." Employers' Mut. Liab. Ins. Co. v. Tollefsen, 263 N.W. 376, 377 (Wis. 1935) (per Fowler, J.). Another court has stated: "[T]o our way of thinking the abominable invention and/or is as devoid of meaning as it is incapable of classification by the rules of grammar and syntax." American Gen. Ins. Co. v. Webster, 118 S.W.2d 1082, 1084 (Tex. Civ. App.—Beaumont 1938) (per Combs, J.).

These views, in retrospect, are more amusing than insightful. And/or, though undeniably clumsy, does have a specific meaning (x and/or y = x or y or both). But, though the phrase saves a few words, it "lends itself . . . as much to ambiguity as to brevity . . . it cannot intelligibly be used to fix the occurrence of past events." Ex parte Bell, 122 P.2d 22, 29 (Cal. 1942). And/or "commonly mean[s] 'the one or the other or both.'" Amalgamated Transit Union v. Massachusetts, 666 F.2d 618, 627 (1st Cir. 1981). (See the quotation under amphibology.) This definition suggests the handiest rewording: a good way to avoid the term is to write unlawful arrest or malicious prosecution, or both, instead of unlawful arrest and/or malicious prosecution.

Sometimes and/or is inappropriate substantively as well as stylistically. Many types of legal documents have been spoiled by the indecisiveness of and/or:

- a finding of fact ("associate and/or employ");
- a pleading ("office and/or agent");
- an affidavit ("fraud and/or other wrongful act");
- a will ("to Ann and/or John");
- an indictment ("cards, dice, and/or dominoes");
- a judgment (in an action that described the plaintiff by the formula Jones and/or Jones, Inc.).

Courts have not been kind to the word—e.g.: [T]he highly objectionable phrase and/or . . . has no place in pleadings, findings of fact, conclusions of law, judgments or decrees, and least of all in instructions to a jury. Instructions are intended to assist jurors in applying the law to the facts, and trial judges should put them in as simple language as possible, and not confuse them with this linguistic abomination." State v. Smith, 184 P.2d 301, 303 (N.M. 1947).

Moreover, the term gives a false sense of precision when used in enumerations: "In an enumeration of duties or powers, either conjunction is generally adequate. If or is used, no one would seriously urge that if one enumerated duty or power is performed or exercised, the remainder vanish; and if and is used, no one would say that an enumerated duty or power cannot be exercised or performed except simultaneously with all the

C. Editing the Hieroglyph. Sometimes and/or ought to be replaced by and itself—e.g.: "There is usually a blackboard, on which issues and/or [read and] votes may be recorded." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 122 (1990). (No one would seriously suggest that both issues and votes must be recorded on such a blackboard in a jury room.)/ "Mr Pearce and/or [read and] his publisher are to be congratulated for working so fast." Joe Rogaly, Behind the Man from Nowhere, Fin. Times (Weekend), 27–28 April 1991, at xviii. (If the book has come out promptly, then both the author and the publisher must have worked fast.)

At other times, and/or ought to be replaced by or—e.g.: "The legal disadvantages of illegitimacy can mostly be avoided by making a will and/or [read or] adopting the child . . . ." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 121 (1957). (No one would seriously suggest that one could be put to an election between making a will and adopting a child—i.e., that one could not do both.) For dealing with the construction either . . . and/or, see either (E).

D. Orland. This reversal of the words is a rare variant of and/or with none of the latter's virtues, and all its vices. Rather than hopelessly confuse readers by resorting to its pretended nuance, one should abstain from it completely.

and other good and valuable consideration. This phrase, used in consideration clauses of contracts, is sometimes false, as when all the legal consideration for the contract given is mentioned explicitly. The phrase should be avoided unless it serves a real function; that is, unless the rest of the items of consideration are too numerous and individually trifling to merit specific inclusion, or unless the parties to the contract do not wish to recite the true price in a publicly recorded document. The drafter of a contract should have some purpose in mind in using this phrase. For the distinction between good consideration and valuable consideration, see consideration (D).

and which. See which (C).

anecdotal; anecdotic(al). The first is standard; the other forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. In reference to evidence, anecdotal refers not to anecdotes, but to personal experiences of the witness testifying. Leff trenchantly calls anecdotal evidence "a term of abuse in assessing a social science argument." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2023 (1985). E.g., "In probing discriminatory intent, the trial court may examine the history of the employer's practices, anecdotal evidence of class members, and the degree of opportunity to treat employees unfairly in the appraisal process."

anent. Bernstein writes, "Except in legal usage, anent [= about] is archaic and semiprecious." Theodore M. Bernstein, More Language That Needs Watching 24 (1962). He could have omitted except in legal usage and semi-.

Another usage critic (following Fowler) has given somewhat narrower guidelines, for the term is still sometimes used in Scotland: "[A]part from its use in Scotch law courts, [anent] is archaic." Margaret Nicholson, A Dictionary of American-English Usage 25 (1957). Perhaps the best statement is that anent "is a pompous word and nearly always entirely useless." Percy Marks, The Craft of Writing 47 (1932).

The term was not uncommon through the first half of the 20th century. E.g., "Anent [read With regard to] the dismissal, the bank's attorney testified that . . . the memorial company had advertised the property for sale on December 7." Gandy v. Cameron State Bank, 2 S.W.2d 971, 973 (Tex. Civ. App.—Austin 1927). Today it occurs only infrequently in legal writing, but examples of it can still be found: "The district court denied Fiat's motion to dismiss . . . and ordered the parties to resolve any dispute anent [read about or over] service on that basis." Boreri v. Fiat S.P.A., 763 F.2d 17, 19 (1st Cir. 1985).

anesthetic, n.; anesthesia. An anesthetic (e.g., ether) causes anesthesia (= loss of sensation) AmE prefers these spellings, BrE anaesthetic, anaesthesia.

anesthetist; anesthesiologist. Generally, anesthetist will serve for "one who administers an anesthetic." The term dates from the late 19th century. Anesthesiologist, of World War II vintage, refers specifically to a physician specializing in anesthesia and anesthetics.

ANFRACTUOSITY, or syntactic twisting and turning and winding, has been one of the historical banes of legal prose. It was more common in the late 19th and early 20th centuries than it is today. Let us trace our gradual liberation from anfractuosity, while noting some modern throwbacks. The following is a classic 19th-century example:

> Unless the code, by abolishing the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of such actions and suits, and of pleadings theretofore existing, intended to initiate, and has initiated new principles of > law, by which a class of rights and of wrongs, not before the proper subjects of judicial investigation and remedy, can now be judicially investigated and remedied, the facts stated in the plaintiff's complaint in this action, do not constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer of the defendant to that complaint is well taken

Here, from 1919, is perhaps the quintessential example of what not to do syntactically:

> Upon the petition of Armour & Co. of New Jersey, Armour & Co. of Texas, a foreign and domestic corporation, respectively, and F.M. Etheridge and J.M. McCormick, of Dallas, Tex., having for its purpose the cancellation of a contract between the city of Dallas, the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and the Wholesale District Trackage Company, on the ground that it was void, because illegal, and for temporary injunction restraining all parties thereto from performing said contract or any portion thereof pendente lite, and alleging that the petitioners were taxpayers of the city of Dallas, and sued for themselves and all other taxpayers in said city of Dallas, Hon. Horton B. Porter, judge of the Sixty-Sixth district court in Hill county, upon the sworn allegation that the proceeding was a class suit, by fiat indorsed upon the petition in Hillsboro, directed the clerk of the district court of Dallas county to file the petition and docket the cause in the Fourteenth district court in Dallas county, and upon the petitioners entering into a bond in the sum of $10,000, conditioned as required by law, to forthwith issue the temporary injunction
> City of Dallas v. Armour & Co., 216 S.W. 222, 223 (Tex. Civ. App.—Dallas 1919).

Perish the thought of one idea to a sentence!

This phenomenon frequently occurs when one tries to sum up the entire case—the facts and the law—in one sentence. From 1984: "Here, the hazard—the scaffolding which was unsafe to work on until its guardrail was installed as planned—was a temporary structure, not a part of the ship itself, its gear, or equipment, which was created and used entirely by the independent contractor, who both owned and controlled it." And here, from 1985:

> Also of importance, without Ms. Stanlin's testimony that lawn mowers were actually missing from the Four Seasons store, it is doubtful that the evidence would have proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the delivery by the driver (even if he was Marshall) of two boxes, of unknown content, showed that two lawn mowers, or any, were dropped off at Frederick Street, even though one of the (perhaps previously discarded) boxes indicated that, at least at one time, a lawn mower had been contained within it

Frequently, anfractuosity leads to grammatical and syntactic blunders. E.g., "We further hold it was reversible error to deprive the jury of the opportunity to consider the opinions of those who best knew the person whose fate they were to determine, and with it, the opportunity to reject, accept, and assign weight to evidence concededly relevant, which, as the exclusive arbiters of fact, was the jury's sole function." In that sentence, which has no clear antecedent, and therefore was has no clear subject; they refers (loosely) to the jury.

When the syntax becomes so convoluted that it is unwieldy, or when the subject has become so far removed from the verb that readers no longer remember the subject when they reach the verb, it is time to break the sentence up into two or more tractable sentences. As Cardozo once wrote, "the sentence may be so overloaded with all its possible qualifications that it will tumble down of its own weight." Benjamin N. Cardozo, Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 472, 474 (1939).

Chief Justice Rehnquist offers a solution that will still allow the occasional long sentence: "If a sentence takes up more than six lines of type on an ordinary page, it is probably too long. This rule is truly stark in its simplicity, but every draft I review is subjected to it." William H. Rehnquist, The Supreme Court: How It Was, How It Is 299 (1987). See SENTENCE LENGTH.

angry takes the preposition at or with. The phrase angry at is used in reference to things <she was angry at the judge's denial of the injunction>, and angry with in reference to persons <he was angry with the opposing counsel>. See mad.

anguishment is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of anguish—e.g.: "The trial court award represented special damages for medical, surgical, and hospital and nursing expenses ($1,825.30), property damage ($425.00), . . . and general damages . . . for mental anguishment [read anguish], humiliation, and embarrassment." Pierrotti v. Louisiana Dep't of Highways, 146 So. 2d 455, 460 (La. Ct. App. 1962).

animadversion was once a legal term meaning "the act of taking judicial cognizance [q.v.] or notice of." Today it means "harsh criticism," as here: "In an Alabama case of 1948, a mother who was convicted of murdering her newly born child received a sentence of twenty years' imprisonment; happily, the conviction was reversed on appeal for lack of evidence, but there was no animadversion upon the terrible sentence that the trial court had thought fit to impose." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 31 (1957).

animate (= to move to action) has been used as a substitute for actuate—e.g.: "While the evidence may have shown that the action was animated by malice, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, the proof fails to show any legal malice." Like motivate, animate is a serviceable replacement for actuate, the ready LEGALISM. See actuate.

animo. See animus (B).

animus. A. Generally. Animus is a double-edged term. At times it is neutral, meaning "intention; disposition"—particularly the mental element in some conduct. This is the generally accepted legal meaning in legal contexts in G.B. and occasionally in the U.S. E.g., "This doctrine was overruled by statute in England, and the jury is now permitted to judge the whole case, and to decide not merely upon the responsibility of the publication, but upon the animus with which it was made."

More often in AmE animus denotes ill will, as if it were synonymous with animosity: "Appellant's lower salary was based on impermissible gender animus."/ "None of these houses were hooked up to city water and sewage lines until 1981; Campbell claims that this was due to racial animus on the part of city officials."/ "Thomas won [the Senate's] approval by 52–48 and said it was 'a time for healing, not a time for anger or for animus or animosity.'" Aaron Epstein, Bush Nominee Carries Closest Vote Since 1888, Philadelphia Inquirer, 16 Oct. 1991, at 1-A.

B. Latinisms. The malevolent sense just mentioned stems perhaps from the several Latin phrases denoting malicious intentions: "In my opinion all the circumstances prove that the words were spoken without animus injuriandi [= intent to injure]—even if they had the defamatory meaning ascribed to them." (S. Afr.) Similar phrases are animus furandi (= the intention to steal), animo felonico (= with felonious intent), and animus defamandi (= the intent to defame). These phrases are, happily, obsolescent if not obsolete.

Several neutral animus phrases have persisted, especially in the law of wills, yet these LATINISMS generally add nothing to analysis and muddy the waters. We know something is amiss when lawyers begin grammatically misusing Latin terms. For example, animo revocandi — with the intent to revoke (a will). In Latin, it is in the ablative case (equivalent to adverbial uses in English), here properly used: "It was generally held in common-law courts that by the destruction, animo revocandi, of a will containing a revocatory clause, a former preserved uncanceled will was thereby revived." In the following sentence, however, animo revocandi is wrongly used as a noun phrase: "To effect revocation of a duly executed will, by any of the methods prescribed by statute, two things are necessary: (1) the doing of one of the acts specified; and (2) the intent to revoke—the animo revocandi [read animus revocandi]." Just the opposite mistake appears here, the nominative being used where the ablative belongs: "There can be no conflict between these ambulatory instruments—these wills—until death, and as the latter were destroyed animus revocandi [read animo revocandi], they thus never constituted wills under § 64–59, and never revoked the 1938 and 1939 wills."

The same sorts of errors occur with other phrases, such as animus testandi (= testamentary intent) and animo testandi (= with testamentary intent). "The admissibility of such evidence for the purpose of establishing the animo testandi [read animus testandi] when offered for the purpose of supporting the writing as a testamentary disposition, is, in our opinion, the most serious question involved in this case." We can avoid these embarrassments by sticking to what we all know: English.

Of course, the British seem to know their Latin better, and only rarely misuse animo for animus, or vice versa. But they are apt to go off the deep end in their proclivity for Latinisms: "The animus vicino nocendi may enter into or affect the conception of a personal wrong." (Eng.)

annex, n.; annexation; annexment; annexion. Annex = something annexed or attached, as an appendix or a wing of a building. Annexation = the act of annexing or the state of having been annexed. In the parlance of property law, annexation refers to the point at which a fixture becomes a part of the realty to which it is attached. Annexment and annexion are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of annexation.

annex (= to attach) appears more frequently in BrE than in AmE, and in both far more frequently in legal than in nonlegal writing. "The facts are stated in the case, to which are annexed four representative contracts." (Eng.)

Annex is more physical in connotation than attach, and probably should not be used figuratively: "The courts do, nevertheless, at times deny validity to a condition annexed [read attached] to a testamentary gift where the condition is calculated to influence the future conduct of the beneficiary in a manner contrary to the established policy of the state."

Attach or annex is an unnecessary DOUBLET: "The officer's certificate, under official seal, must be attached or annexed [read must be attached] to the will in form and content substantially as follows."

annexable. So spelled.

annexation; annexment; annexion. See annex.

annihilate is rather too strong a term for nullify in legal contexts. "Where no execution issues within the prescribed time, the judgment is annihilated [read nullified]." See annul.

annotation; note; lawnote; casenote. An annotation is a note that explains or criticizes (usu. a case), esp. to give, in condensed form, some indication of the law as deduced from cases and statutes, as well as to point out where similar cases can be found. In law, annotations appear in the Lawyers' Edition of the United States Reports and in American Law Reports (ALR). Annotations usually follow the text of a reported case.

A note or lawnote is a scholarly legal essay shorter than an article and restricted in scope, usually written by a student for publication in a law review. In this sense note and lawnote are synonymous, the latter being slightly more specific. A casenote is so restricted in scope that it deals only with a single case; lawnotes, in contrast, tend to treat many cases in a general area of the law.

announce; annunciate; enounce; enunciate. Announce, the best known of these terms, may mean (1) "to proclaim"; (2) "to give notice of"; or (3) "to serve as announcer of." Annunciate is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, except in religious contexts. Enunciate =(1) to formulate systematically; (2) to announce, proclaim; or (3) to articulate clearly. Enounce is a NEEDLESS VARIANT in sense (1) of enunciate.

In reference to judicial opinions, announce means "to write for the majority." E.g., "Mr. Justice Douglas announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the following opinion, in which the Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Reed concur." Screws v. U.S., 325 U.S. 91, 92 (1945).

annuitant; pensioner. Annuitant = a beneficiary of an annuity. E.g., "[A] contract to buy an annuity was void where, at the time of the contract, the annuitant had died, so that the annuity no longer existed." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 249 (8th ed. 1991).

Pensioner = a person receiving a pension. For some purposes the terms are interchangeable. Yet annuitant has less disparaging connotations, perhaps because the person it denotes has usually established the annuity, whereas a pensioner is generally the beneficiary of a pension provided by a third party, such as the government or an employer. Pensioner sometimes suggests one who lives off a very limited fixed income.

annul; nullify. These words have much the same meaning ("to counteract the force, effectiveness, or existence of"). Annul more strongly suggests abolishing or making nonexistent by legal action <to annul a marriage>. E.g., "If at any time the seisin happens to be without a home it immediately returns to the transferor (or to his heirs if he is dead), and all subsequent interests are annulled and destroyed." Annul frequently appears in the verbose phrase annul and set aside, in which the last three words are unnecessary. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

Nullify has the broader meaning, and generally carries no necessary implication of legal action. "The Eighth Circuit nullified a breach-of-contract judgment obtained against the corporation in an Iranian court."/ "The senator's vote was not nullified, but rather cast in the absence of certain information." See set aside (A).

annulment. So spelled—not annullment (a common misspelling). See divorce (A).

anoint is sometimes misspelled annoint, as in Gulf States Tel. Co. v. Local 1692, AFL-CIO, 416 F.2d 198, 201 (5th Cir. 1969).

anomalous; anomalistic. Anomalous is the general adjective corresponding to the noun anomaly. Anomalistic should refer only to astronomical anomalies. But legal writers occasionally misuse anomalistic for anamalous—e.g.: "This kind of reasoning would inject into waiver proceedings the anomalistic [read anomalous] proposition that waiver should be granted because the child is 'too good' for placement in the youth correctional facility." In re Doe, 604 P.2d 276, 279 (Haw. 1979).

anomie; anomy. The former spelling is preferred; the adjective is anomic.

anonym(e); ananym. An anonym (preferably spelled without the final -e) is an anonymous person. (See pseudonym.) An ananym is a pseudonym arrived at by spelling the author's name backward (as, hypothetically, Renrag for Garner).

answer. To nonlawyers, this word denotes a reply to a question or a solution to a problem. In U.S. law, it usually refers to the first pleading of a defendant addressing the merits of the case. In G.B., however, answer = (1) a reply to an interrogatory; or (2) a response to a divorce petition.

ANTE-, ANTI-. The prefix ante- means "before," and anti- "against." Thus antecedent (= something that goes before) and antipathy (= feelings against, dislike). In but one word, anticipate (= to consider or use before the due or natural time), ante- has been changed to anti-. In compound words, the prefix anti- may cause ambiguities. See antimarital-facts privilege & antinuclear protester.

ANTE-, PRE-. See PRE-.

ante; supra; ubi supra; infra; post. Literally ante means "before," and supra "above." Some literalists therefore use supra for something higher up on the same page and ante for something further afield, with corresponding conventions for infra and post. That practice now has few adherents, at least in the U.S.

Both ante and supra are today used to refer to a preceding part of the text—however far afield—as in "supra at 11." Ubi supra was formerly used where supra now appears. It means "where above," and really has no place in modern legal writing.

Because supra is the more usual term, and because it is desirable that we achieve uniformity on this point, the recommendation here is to use supra for general purposes, not ante. An additional advantage of supra is that it translates directly into English. "See note 5 above" is English; "See note 5 before" is not.

The U.S. Supreme Court is one of few courts that distinguish between the signals supra and ante in usage; it also makes a distinction between infra and post. The term ante is used to cite a previous opinion published in the same volume of the U.S. Reports, whether or not that opinion is in the same case as that in which the citation appears. For example, ante is used in a dissent to cite a page in the majority opinion. Supra is used to refer either to earlier pages within the same opinion or to a previously cited authority. The Supreme Court uses post correlatively with ante, and infra with supra.

The phrases ut infra (= as below) and ut supra (= as above) are not current in legal writing, although they were common up to the mid-20th century. See ex ante* & infra.

All these Latin words—supra, ante, infra, post—should be used only as signals; they should not replace ordinary English terms in prose. E.g., "We discuss this argument infra [read below] and remand for the appropriate findings." Even in their use as signals, these terms are often vague without some specification of the reference; they are generally best avoided in CITATION OF CASES.

antecede, v.t., has become nothing more than an inflated and NEEDLESS VARIANT of precede, though the adjectives antecedent and precedent have distinct uses. In exalted prose, such as the passage following, it may be justified. "Language survives everything—corruption, misuse, ignorance, ineptitude. Linking man to man in the dark, it brought man out of the dark. It is the human glory which antecedes all others. It merits not only our homage but our constant and intelligent study." (Anthony Burgess) antecedent; prior. Used as adjectives—e.g., to qualify the term debt—these words are generally inferior to earlier or preexisting. Like previous, prior may occasionally be justified; antecedent may on rare occasions be forgivable, but not here: "Until the bonds mature, a purchaser for value, without notice of their invalidity as between antecedent parties [read previous parties or predecessors in interest], would take them discharged from all infirmities."/ "An allegation of special damages as a matter of aggravation is a substantive allegation of fact, and not an inference of law resulting from facts antecedently [read previously] stated."

The phrase antecedent to (= before) is a ludicrous pomposity. "If the defendant has the right, when did it accrue to him? If at all, it must have been antecedent to [read before] the finding by the plaintiff, for that finding could not give the defendant any right."/ "An alien in America, antecedent to [read before] the revolution, was entitled to all the rights and privileges of an alien in England, and many more." Cf. anterior to, previous to & prior to.

But if the phrase is to be used, it should not lose the particle to, as here: "Antecedent [insert to] this assigned Justice['s—see FUSED PARTICIPLES] joining the Court, facets of this controversy were here in In re Powers's Estate." In re Estate of Powers, 134 N.W.2d 148, 150 (Mich. 1965).

antecedents (= background; record) is broader in AmE than in BrE, where it means "an accused or convicted person's background, esp. any previous criminal record or evidence of bad character." In legal writing in the U.S., this term may be used in reference to a witness as well as to an accused: "Where the litigation is important the character, reputation and antecedents of the main witnesses of the adverse party should be investigated thoroughly." Asher L. Cornelius, The Cross-Examination of Witnesses 11 (1929). In such contexts, however, background would be a better term.

A 19th-century usage critic stung this word with a venom that has not lost its power: "This use of the word . . . is not defensible . . . [f]or in meaning it is an awkward perversion, and in convenience it has no advantage. . . . [I]t is a needless absurdity. For if, instead of, What do you know of his antecedents? it is asked, What do you know of his previous life? or, better, What do you know of his past? there is sense instead of nonsense, and the purpose of the questions is fully conveyed." Richard G. White, Words and Their Uses, Past and Present 91–92 (2d ed. 1872).

ANTECEDENTS, AGREEMENT OF NOUNS WITH. See CONCORD (B).

ANTECEDENTS, FALSE. An antecedent is a noun or noun phrase that is referred to by a pronoun. When used correctly and effectively, antecedents are explicitly mentioned, are prominent, and are not far removed from the pronouns that substitute for them. A variety of problems can occur, however, and some of them are here discussed.

A. Ghostly Antecedents. The problem of nonexistent antecedents occurs frequently when a word such as this or it (see DEICTIC TERMS) is intended to refer, not as it should to a preceding noun, but to the action accomplished in the verb phrase. E.g., "They are also told that X., a doctor employed by defendant, will vaccinate anyone who wishes to have this done." (What is the noun that acts as antecedent of this? We may supply the antecedent vaccination, but the sentence itself should supply the antecedent.)/ "To some degree, though not quantified, defendant's sales have declined; but quantification is not required because plaintiff is not seeking damages therefor [for what?]." (The writer intended—but failed—to say that plaintiff is not seeking damages for the decline in sales.)/ "The foregoing sufficiently answers, if any be necessary [read if any answer be (or is) necessary], the suggestion that the statute is unconstitutional." See ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE (C).

B. False Attraction. In the context of problems with antecedents, false attraction occurs when, instead of referring to the subject, a pronoun such as this or it refers to a noun appearing between the subject and the pronoun. E.g., "Harrelson nonetheless contends now that the admission of this testimony was reversible error because it had been hypnotically induced." What had been hypnotically induced? The writer intended to convey that the testimony, not its admission, had been induced by hypnosis. See SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT.

C. With Possessives. A noun in the possessive case is not a suitable antecedent for a pronoun because the possessive makes the noun functionally an adjective. The parts of speech of an antecedent and its referent must match. "Indeed, the Court's reading of the plain language of the Fourth Amendment is incapable of explaining even its own holding in this case." What is the subject of is, the antecedent of its? The intended antecedent is court, but the possessive court's is merely an adjective modifying reading, and is incapable of acting as the antecedent of it, or as the subject of is. [Read Indeed, the Court in its reading . . . .]/ "There may have been inimical voices raised among the jury, such as the foreman's, who [read such as that of the foreman, who] had just had an unpleasant brush with the bailiff." See APPOSITIVES (A), DEICTIC TERMS, POSSESSIVES (H) & it.

D. Remote Antecedents. See MISCUES (C) & REMOTE RELATIVES.

antecedent to. See antecedent.

antedate; predate. Both words are so commonly used that it would be presumptuous to label either a NEEDLESS VARIANT. One sees a tendency to use antedate in reference to documentary materials, and predate in reference to physical things and historical facts. E.g., "The origin of the rule predates our dual federal-state court system." The DIFFERENTIATION is worth enhancing.

antemortem; antemortal; premortal; postmortem; premortuary. Antemortem corresponds to postmortem, q.v. Premortal = (1) occurring before the time when human mortality was assumed (i.e., quite ancient); (2) occurring immediately before death. Premortem is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of antemortem and premortal. Premortuary = occurring before the funeral. The distinction between antemortal and premortal (in sense (2)) is that antemortal refers to any time before death, whereas premortal refers to the time immediately preceding death.

antenuptial; prenuptial. The latter is far more common in AmE today; antenuptial is the usual term in BrE, however. It is bootless, then, to label either a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Oddly, antenuptial does not appear in most English-language dictionaries. But it appears regularly in British legal writing—e.g.: "[T]he husband was liable for her antenuptial debts." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 270 (3d ed. 1955). See postnuptial.

antepenultimate. See penultimate.

anterior to for before is, like its various bombastic competitors, almost risible. It would be, alas, if some lawyers did not use it with a straight face. E.g., "The authorities petitioner cites to the effect that an express contract made anterior to [read before] his entering upon his duties is essential to a claim by an officer of a corporation for compensation, are against rather than for him." Cf. antecedent to, prior to & previous to.

ANTHROPOMORPHISM, the attribution of human qualities or characteristics to things, is not uncommon in the language of the law. One common manifestation of this phenomenon occurs in phrases referring to what a statute does or does not contemplate—e.g.: "The statutory provision contemplates a result contrary to the statute as a whole." Or this, a form of HYPALLAGE: "A concerned jurisdiction is one that in view either of its thinking about the particular substantive issue raised or of its more general legal policies, can be taken to have expressed some interest in regulating an aspect of the multistate transaction in question."

Occasionally, anthropomorphism reflects poor style, as when a writer refers to the mindfulness of pellucidity: "Notwithstanding the fact that it is centered chiefly in construction, pellucidity in legal writing is not unmindful of discriminating diction and choice figures of speech." There are no choice figures of speech in that sentence.

antiaircraft. See VOWEL CLUSTERS.

anticipatable (= that can be expected or anticipated) is listed in the OED, with one citation from 1872, but appears in neither W2 nor W3. "Stone's statement . . . was elicited to dispel the anticipatable suggestion that the government might be using threats of prosecution to induce Schbley to testify favorably." U.S. v. Fusco, 748 F.2d 996, 998 (5th Cir. 1984). The quoted sentence illustrates the loose usage of anticipate, q.v.; foreseeable would have been the better word. See -ATABLE.

anticipate = (1) to take care of beforehand; to preclude by prior action; forestall; or (2) to expect. Sense (2) has long been considered a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION; it should be avoided in formal legal writing. Lord Evershed, M.R., once addressed this question, saying: "[T]he liking [that] many persons appear to have for the use of words having twice as many syllables as the more natural and proper word to use has, in fairly recent times, undoubtedly led to the use of the word anticipate when the correct word is expect." Jarman v. Lambert & Cooke Contractors, [1951] 2 K.B. 937, 942.

The poor usage is now seemingly ubiquitous—e.g.: "Generally the measure of damages for a tort is the amount that will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, whether it could have been anticipated [read foreseen] or not."/ "It is clear that the parties and the court still anticipated [read expected] that further remedial proceedings would take place before the court approved any proposal."/ "It is not clear that the defendant might reasonably have anticipated [read foreseen] being haled into court in Louisiana."

The use of anticipated in the sense "eagerly awaited" constitutes still further corruption of the word. E.g., "The Supreme Court decided nearly twenty cases during its 1983–84 term relating to the Fourth Amendment; among these, the 'good-faith exception' cases were perhaps the most anticipated and controversial."

The following sentences illustrate the correct use of the word: "The trailer court was not built, nor was the sewage plant, at the time the action was started, and thus the injunction was sought against an anticipated nuisance." (Here anticipated = considered before the appropriate time.)/ "A spendthrift clause restrains the power of a beneficiary to anticipate his right to income or perhaps to principal." (Here anticipate = to preclude by prior action.)

anticipatory; anticipative. The former is standard in phrases such as anticipatory breach.

ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE is the vice of referring to something that is yet to be mentioned. Thus a sentence will be leading up to the all-important predicate, but before reaching it will refer to what is contained in the predicate. The reader is temporarily mystified. E.g., "Conflict of laws is the study of whether or not, and if so, in what way, the answer to a legal problem will be affected because the elements of the problem have contacts with more than one jurisdiction." This sentence would better read: "Conflict of laws is the study of whether the answer to a legal problem will be affected because the elements of the problem have contacts with more than one jurisdiction; and, if so, how the answer will be affected."

Only rarely can anticipatory reference be used in a way that does not disturb the reader—e.g.: "We think it is clear —and no party disputes this point—that the statutory commitment of review of FCC action to the Court of Appeals affords this court jurisdiction over claims of unreasonable delay." For innocuous examples with personal pronouns, see the second paragraph in (C) below.

The vexatious examples, which are far more common, occur in a variety of forms.

A. As do. "Texas, as do most jurisdictions, recognizes three general theories of recovery under which a manufacturer of a defective product may be held liable under strict liability principles." (One must either put as do most jurisdictions after the verb, or change the as do to like.)/ "Law professors, as do [read like] state court judges, produce a body of writing that can be analyzed to discern their political philosophies." See like (A).

A related error occurs with have: "The court, as have [read like] the parties, construes this motion as one for judgment notwithstanding the verdict."

B. Noun References. "Kramer made, among others, the following untrue and misleading statements of material fact." [Read Kramer made the following untrue and misleading statements of fact, among others.]/ "In an action, inter alia, to recover [read In an action to recover, inter alia,] moneys allegedly due, plaintiff appeals."/ "Mr Hytner is a director who knows how to keep the pot on the boil; whether you agree with them or not, he makes his points with boldness and panache." John Gross, A Badly Brought-Up Bunch of Girls, Sunday Telegraph, 15 July 1990, at ix. (Reverse the positions of them and his points.)

C. Pronouns. "The defense of itself is without a doubt one of the foremost concerns of any nation." [Read A nation's self-defense is without doubt one of its foremost concerns.]/ "The formidable difficulty involved in its definition and measurement is partially responsible for the lack of attention to quality." (Its has no clearly identifiable antecedent in the sentence just quoted; only at the end of the sentence do we realize that quality is the referent.)/ "Even if he construed the evidence most favorably to the state, a reasonable juror should have doubted that the left side of the safe was within the building." (Reverse the positions of he and a reasonable juror; and consider making the reference nonsexist. See SEXISM (A).)/ (Opening sentence of an opinion:) "After a hearing at which he and his office manager testified, appellant Reehlman, an orthopedic surgeon, was adjudged in contempt for disobeying a subpoena." (Recast the sentence so that he and his follow Reehlman.)/ "Assuming it applies to claims based on injunctive relief, the doctrine of res judicata would not bar a suit based on acts of the defendant that have occurred subsequent to the final judgment asserted as a bar." (Reverse it and the italicized noun phrase.) See ANTECEDENTS, FALSE (A).

Occasionally an anticipatory reference by pronoun is acceptable, but only where the "antecedent" follows the reference closely: "Making himself understood is the writer's first task."/ "Independently of the scope of his response to the auditor's request for information, the lawyer may have as part of his professional responsibility an obligation to advise the client concerning the need for public disclosure."

anticlimactic is the correct form; anticlimatic is a solecism. See climactic.

anticompete, like noncompete, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of noncompetition—e.g.: "Defendants Kentile . . . by adopting . . . the anticompete [read noncompetition] provision . . . have participated . . . in a contract . . . in violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1." Golden v. Kentile Floors, Inc., 475 F.2d 288, 290 (5th Cir. 1973)./ "Berkeley argues that it would be a disservice to the shopping center to allow Drug Fair to obtain the benefit of the anticompete [read noncompetition] clause." Berkeley Dev. Co. v. Great Atlantic & Pac. Tea Co., 518 A.2d 790, 796 (N.J. Super. Ct. 1986).

antilapse statute. See lapse statute.

antimarital-facts privilege. This is an obtuse name for the evidentiary privilege allowing a spouse not to testify about "marital facts," i.e., intimate facts relating to the marriage. The phrase antimarital facts = facts whose disclosure tends to harm the marriage. The prefix anti- causes the problem, for the privilege is not "antimarital." Yet the disclosure of the facts is thought to be "antimarital." The ambiguity caused by the prefix disappears when an alternative name for the privilege is used (e.g., privilege against adverse spousal testimony, spousal privilege, or marital privilege). The first of these alternative versions is used by the Supreme Court in Trammel v. U.S., 445 U.S. 40 (1980).

antinomy; antimony. These words are not to be confused. Antinomy = a contradiction in law or logic; a conflict of authority. This is the word used in legal contexts—e.g.: "The law was taken to be complete and self-sufficient, without antinomies and without gaps, wanting only arrangement, logical development of the implications of its several rules and conceptions, and systematic exposition of its several parts." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 19 (1922; repr. 1975)./ "[H]e has even more difficulty in absorbing the notion that antinomies among the principles of legal morality may be encountered in the design of legal institutions." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 240 (rev. ed. 1969).

Antimony is rather arcane, meaning "a brittle

antinuclear protester is technically ambiguous, though everyone should know what is intended. For the literally minded, however, it might refer to "a protester denouncing the antinuclear cause," instead of "a protester espousing the antinuclear position." Thus it might be preferable to write nuclear-energy (or -weapon) protester or antinuclear advocate. See protest.

antipathy takes against, to, toward, or for. The writer of the following sentence haplessly inserted one of the few unidiomatic prepositions: "J.W. has focused on the 'terrible plight of the American Indian' as a stratagem to publicize his antipathy of [read antipathy toward] government in general."

antisuit (= of or relating to a court order prohibiting the filing of another lawsuit against the same party or making the same claim) is a mid-20th-century legal NEOLOGISM that remains unrecorded in most English-language dictionaries. E.g., "Where the two courts involved are a state and a federal court, special attention should be given to such an antisuit injunction." Blanchard v. Commonwealth Oil Co., 294 F.2d 834, 839 (5th Cir. 1961)./ "Ordinarily antisuit injunctions are not properly invoked to preempt parallel proceedings on the same in personam claim in foreign tribunals." Laker Airways Ltd. v. Sabena, Belgian World Airlines, 731 F.2d 909, 915 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

antithetic(al). The longer form has become established in the phrase antithetical to and in most other contexts. The shorter form should be avoided as a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Antithetical = exhibiting direct opposition. E.g., "We believe that requiring domestic litigants to resort to the Hague Convention to compel discovery against their foreign adversaries encourages the concealment of information—a result directly antithetical to the express goals of the Federal Rules and of the Hague Convention." (Directly antithetical verges on REDUNDANCY.) The phrase should not be used as a mere synonym of opposed, a slightly broader word.

antitrust. So written—without a hyphen.

Anton Piller order. See CASE REFERENCES (C).

anxious. This word most properly means "uneasy; disquieted; worried." To use the word as a synonym for eager is to give in to SLIPSHOD EXTENSION—e.g.: "The wife seeks the court's directions as to the validity of the decree absolute and is anxious [read eager] to know what her present status is." (Eng.)/ "Defense counsel in death cases are anxious [read eager] to retain the scrupled jurors that prosecutors seek to exclude."

any. A. Singular or Plural. Any may be either singular or plural. Here is an example of the (rarer) singular use: "Consider whether any of the presidential statements is inconsistent with the modern Court's claims." In such contexts any is elliptical for anyone, q.v.

B. In Legislation. Any is greatly overworked in statutes <if any person shall commit any action upon any other person>. Usually, replacing any with the indefinite article a or an results in heightened readability with no change in meaning.

C. And all. See all (C).

any and all. The word all precisely captures the sense 99 out of 100 times. The one other time, it merely captures the sense. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

anyhow (= in any way; in any manner) is, in AmE, considered colloquial—almost dialectal—for anyway or nevertheless. E.g., "He understood the right to remain silent, but decided to talk anyhow [read anyway]."

In BrE, however, the word does not seem to strike readers as such a casualism—e.g.: "[I]n many cases it is not for one moment expected that a contracting party will actually perform in person, and when the contracting party is a corporation this would anyhow be a physical impossibility." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 283 (3d ed. 1981).

anymore. Unless it appears in a negative statement <the courts have no such requirement anymore>, this word is dialectal in the sense "nowadays"—e.g.: "Anymore, [read Nowadays or These days] the price of housing is outrageous."

anyone. A. And any one. In reference to persons, anyone should be spelled as one word. Formerly it was written as two words; now, however, the unification of the phrase is complete.

Yet sometimes the phrase is wrongly made one word when, not meaning "anybody," it should be two: "A question might arise as to anyone [read any one] or all of these legitimate 'conceivables.'" Any one = any single person or thing (of a number).

B. Anyone . . . they. See CONCORD (B) & SEXISM (A).

C. Anyone else's. See else's & POSSESSIVES (G).

anyplace (= anywhere) is not in good use. The word is vastly inferior to anywhere.

Any place (= any location) should always be two words <at any place>.

anything; any thing. The distinction is sometimes important in legislative DRAFTING. Any thing implies an opposition to any person. Anything is the far more general word meaning "whatever thing."

anything to the contrary contained herein notwithstanding. See notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained herein.

anytime, adv., = at any time; whenever. E.g., "Anytime a seller rents back from a buyer, an interim occupancy agreement should be completed." Dian Hymer, Seller Rent-Back Can Benefit Both Sides, San Francisco Examiner, 25 Oct. 1992, at F-1. Some writers consider this term a casualism, but it is highly convenient and has—for whatever reason—gained more widespread acceptance than anymore (in positive contexts) and anyplace. Cf. anymore & anyplace.

apex forms the plurals apexes and apices. The English plural—apexes—is preferred.

apology; apolog(ue); apologia. Apology, in its general sense, applies to an expression of regret for a mistake, usually with the implication of guilt. It may also refer to a defense of one's position, a sense shared with apologia. The latter should preempt this meaning for purposes of DIFFERENTIATION. An apologue is an allegory that conveys a moral. (Apolog is not recorded in the dictionaries and should be avoided. For analogous forms, see analogy (for analog) & catalog(ue).) apostasy; apostacy. The latter spelling is mistaken, the original Gk. word being apostasia. E.g., "Would he then have embraced and defended the Donovan apostacy [read apostasy] with the same generosity with which he yielded to the Camara majority in Barlow?" Maurice Kelman, The Forked Path of Dissent, 1985 Sup. Ct. Rev. 227, 245.

APOSTROPHES. See PUNCTUATION (A).

appal(l). The standard spelling is appall.

ap(p)anage. Though in today's French this term is spelled apanage, in the French of the 16th century it was spelled with two *-p-*s. We borrowed the word from the French early in the 17th century, and the OED notes that the spellings have been "equally common" in English. The OED favors apanage, whereas W3 favors appanage. The latter certainly appears more English, and on that basis alone might be deemed preferable.

In its literal and historical sense, appanage /ap-ə-nij/ means "a grant (as of lands or money) made by a sovereign or a legislative body for the support of dependent members of the royal family" (W3). Because Americans are not saddled with such burdens, the term is purely figurative in AmE, meaning "a customary or rightful endowment" (W3).

apparatus has the plural forms apparatus and apparatuses. The former is a Latin plural and the latter an English plural. When referring to more than one apparatus in Latin, write apparatus. When using English, however, use apparatuses. See PLURALS (A).

Apparati is an example of HYPERCORRECTION—e.g.: "Her testimony indicates that she had definite ideas as to where and how these apparati [read apparatuses] were to be used . . . ." Clarke v. O'Connor, 435 F.2d 104, 107 (D.C. Cir. 1970)./ "The court attempted to establish a procedure for determining whether a doctor could disconnect life-sustaining apparati [read apparatuses] from other patients." Linda F. Gould, Right to Die Legislation, 39 Mercer L. Rev. 517, 523 (1988).

apparent is frequently misused in the press, and sometimes in legal writing, in reference to fatal maladies. "Cardinal Cody died this morning of an apparent heart attack." One does not die of an "apparent" heart attack. [Read Cardinal Cody died this morning, apparently of a heart attack.] apparent authority; ostensible authority. Both refer to the authority that an agent appears to have by virtue of the principal's conduct—and that third parties might reasonably assume that the agent actually has. The usual phrase today, in BrE and AmE alike, is apparent authority.

appeal, n. A. Idioms. In AmE, cases are said to go on appeal; in BrE, the idiom under appeal is common. E.g., "Their Lordships are of opinion that the decision under appeal is not in accordance with that principle." (Eng.) The British phrase appeal allowed is equivalent to the American reversed. See appeal allowed, allow & on appeal.

Where American writers would refer to an appeal from a judgment, British writers typically refer to an appeal against a judgment—e.g.: "Again, in the case of Harris in 1952, the speeches were postponed until after the House had intimated that his appeal against conviction for larceny would be allowed." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 78–79 (2d ed. 1953).

B. And certiorari; review. In referring to consideration by the U.S. Supreme Court of lower-court and state-court judgments, many American lawyers make the mistake of calling the genus by the name of one species; that is, they refer to appeal when they mean to include certiorari as well. In fact, though, appeal is rare in the U.S. Supreme Court. See Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 775–76 (5th ed. 1994). The more accurate term for the genus—the word that includes certiorari as well as appeal—is review. See review (A).

appeal, adj. See appellate & appeals, adj.

appeal, vb. Depending on the context, appeal may be either intransitive or transitive in AmE. Usually one appeals from a judgment—e.g.: "Defendant appeals from a verdict and judgment against him in an action for libel."/ "We find no error in the decree appealed from."/ "Plaintiff appealed from an order sustaining separate demurrers of the defendants on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action."

Nearly as often, however, appeal is used transitively in AmE—e.g.: "Appellant appeals his conviction of possessing a firearm after having been convicted of a felony."/ "The United States appeals the suppression of evidence obtained during a warranted search."/ "Nolen appeals the award of an injunction against him."

In BrE—in which the transitive use has been obsolete since the late 16th century—one appeals against a lower court's decree. E.g., "The architect appealed against the master's order to Chapman J., who allowed his appeal and set aside the master's order." (Eng.)/ "An erroneous judgment may stand, and acquire an undeserved authority, merely because the losing party does not appeal against it . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 313 (7th ed. 1964).

appeal allowed; appeal dismissed. These British phrases are equivalent to the American phrases judgment reversed and judgment affirmed. See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT.

appeals, adj. In jurisdictions that have a court of appeals—as opposed to a court of appeal—the alternative wording is appeals court, not appeal court. E.g., "[A] federal appeals court in Philadelphia ruled last August that the OMB officials didn't have the authority to do so." Stephen Wermiel, Supreme Court Will Review OMB's Powers, Wall St. J., 16 May 1989, at B7. Even so, the term appellate is usually more natural-sounding in AmE.

Of course, where, as in England, the name of the intermediate appellate court is the Court of Appeal, the phrase appeal court is entirely proper—e.g.: "Within a week, the High Court decided that Lord Young, the trade secretary, should publish and refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission an inspectors' report on the takeover; then a unanimous three-judge appeal court decided he need do no such thing." Curbed in the Courts, Economist, 28 Jan.–3 Feb. 1989, at 56.

appear. The phrase it would appear is invariably inferior to it appears or it seems. There is no need for the modal verb would in this construction, unless a hypothetical subjunctive is intended. "As of the middle of this century, it would appear [read it appears, or, depending on the sense, appeared] that the extent of present development along these lines has [or had] been somewhat overstated." See would & SUBJUNCTIVES.

On the difference between appear and make an appearance, see appearance, make an.

appearance, make an; appear, v.i. The phrase make an appearance contains a BURIED VERB (appear), but uncovering the verb may shift the connotation slightly. Many American lawyers believe that a party makes an appearance by filing a paper in court or by having a lawyer present, but that to appear means to show up personally in court. Some have used this rationale to avoid changing make an appearance to appear in court rules.

Even so, actual usage supports the idea that appear is equivalent to make an appearance—e.g.: "In most cases, the husband and wife both desire divorce. If the husband gets his divorce in Nevada and the wife appears there—which means that an arrangement is made to have a lawyer in Nevada represent her—there will be no trouble." Max Radin, The Law and You 68 (1948).

appellant; appealer; appellor. Perhaps few readers have seen or heard any term other than the first. Appealer has not gained currency and should not be introduced as a fancy variant of appellant, properly pronounced /ə-pel-ənt/.

Appellor is an archaic term from English law meaning "one who accuses of crime, demands proof of innocence by wager of battle, or informs against an accomplice [by approvement, q.v.]" (OED). E.g., "Appeals of felony continued in use as a means of recovering stolen goods, or of achieving the execution of an aggressor; but the appellòr ran the risk of having to fight a battle, or of being severely punished if the appeal failed." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 71 (3d ed. 1990).

appellate; appellant, adj.; appeal, adj.; appellative. W3 records appellant as having been used adjectively in phrases such as appellant jurisdiction, perhaps mainly by nonlawyers. In legal writing, however, the adjective corresponding to the noun appeal is invariably appellate.

Appellate is defined by Johnson (1755) as "the person appealed against," the meaning now given appellee. But today the word is used only as an adjective.

In BrE especially, appeal itself functions as an adjective in contexts in which Americans would write appellate—e.g.: "The judges (at least in England) are not elected by the people, nor are they accountable to anybody (other than appeal courts) for their decisions." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 14 (1983). See court of appeal(s).

Appellative, adj., is a specialized grammatical term. Appellative interrogation is a variant (and fairly pompous) name for rhetorical question, q.v. As a noun, appellative = term, name. E.g., "It is a matter of common knowledge that the appellative 'revenue laws' is never applied to the statutes involved in these classes of cases."

appellee is pronounced /ap-ə-lee/, not /ə-pel-ee/.

appendixes; appendices. Both are correct plural forms for appendix, but appendixes is preferable in nontechnical contexts.

appertain; pertain. Some DIFFERENTIATION is possible. Both take the preposition to, but appertain usually means "to belong to rightfully" <the privileges appertaining to this degree>, whereas pertain usually means "to relate to; concern" <the appeal pertains to defendant's Fifth Amendment rights>.

Here appertain is correctly used: "The general principle seems to be that jurisdiction over an inchoate crime appertains to the state that would have had jurisdiction had the crime been consummated." (Eng.)/ "The ancient remedy of a bill of peace originated in and appertained to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery."

In the following sentence, however, it appears to have been used merely as a fancy variant of the more usual pertain: "There is a compelling reason why district courts should not be divested of jurisdiction over matters 'incident to or appertaining [read pertaining] to an estate' regarding pending probate proceedings."

applicable. A. And appliable; applyable. These two variants are incorrect forms. Applicable, the correct form, is properly accented on the first, not on the second, syllable.

B. And applicative; applicatory. The last two forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of applicable. Applicative is also a NEEDLESS VARIANT of applied, as in the phrase applicative psychology.

C. Is applicable to. This construction is almost always inferior to the simple verb applies—e.g.: "The doctrine is not applicable [read does not apply] here."

applicant; applicator; applier. An applicant is "one who applies for something (as a position in a firm)." Applicator = (1) a device for applying a substance, or (2) one who applies a substance. Applier is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of applicator.

When applicant is used merely for movant (as in American federal courts), the latter term is preferable. (See application.) In G.B., one who seeks a writ of habeas corpus or judicial review by means of mandamus, prohibition, or certiorari is termed an applicant.

application. In some jurisdictions, this term is merely a variant name for motion. Where that is so, motion is the better term.

apply. See follow.

applyable. See applicable (A).

appointor, despite its odd appearance, is the accepted spelling of the legal correlative of appointee.

apposite. See apt.

APPOSITIVES point out the same persons or things by different names, usually in the form of explanatory phrases that narrow in on the precise meaning of a prior more general phrase. Thus, in the sentence "My brother Brad is a musician," Brad is the appositive of brother. Usually, in phrases less succinct than my brother Brad (in which Brad is restrictive), the appositive is set off by commas or parentheses: "Plaintiff's decedent, John Doe, was killed in a plane accident," or, "The appellee in this case (XYZ, Inc.) has counterclaimed against the appellant." In these hypothetical sentences, John Doe is an appositive of decedent, and XYZ, Inc. is an appositive of appellee. Two problems crop up with appositives.

A. With Possessives. An appositive should match its antecedent syntactically. Here is the correct use of an appositive with a possessive antecedent: "A cannot confer on C his, A's, right to possess and deal with the chattel for a partnership purpose." (The appositive is unnecessary, however; see MYTH OF PRECISION.)

Having either an antecedent or an appositive that is possessive (and therefore adjectival) matched up with a nominal mate creates awkwardness, as in the following sentences: "In this case, appellant challenges the district court's grant of T.J. Stevenson & Co.'s (Stevenson) motion [read (Stevenson's) motion] for summary judgment."/ "In his petition, Wagner misrepresented to the court that federal jurisdiction became apparent during plaintiff's, Davis, [read plaintiff Davis's] closing argument."/ "We hold that the Appeals Council had the power to reopen the Administrative Law Judge's (ALJ) [read (ALJ's)] decision . . . ." Cieutat v. Bowen, 824 F.2d 348, 350 (5th Cir. 1987).

Here are two other examples of appositives that are needlessly awkward: "Appellee-plaintiffs Donald and Doris Taylor's property was damaged by floods in the summer of 1975." [Read The property of the appellee-plaintiffs, Donald and Doris Taylor, was damaged . . . .]/ "The scope of your brief should not be affected by the scope of your opponent, the appellant's brief [read by the scope of that of your opponent, the appellant]." See POSSESSIVES (G).

B. Punctuation. This problem has been touched on earlier in this entry. Generally, commas (or, less frequently, parentheses) must frame appositives except when the appositive is restrictive. Thus a person might write my brother Blair to distinguish Blair from another brother (say, Brad). But if one had only one brother, the reference would be to my brother, Blair.

One telltale signal that the appositive is restrictive is the definite article the preceding the noun (e.g., the maxim nulla poena sine lege is one generally respected by civilized nations).

When commas are omitted in nonpossessive phrases, the effect is that of a RUN-ON SENTENCE: "Plaintiffs offered the testimony of Jesus Leon an airport mechanic." (A comma should appear after the name Jesus Leon.)

An emphatic appositive is never set off by commas—e.g.: "He himself [no commas before or after] testified that the hiring requirement of a college degree was unrelated to performance on the job."

appraisal; appraisement. W3 treats these as variants; the OED definitions suggest some divergence in meaning. Both may mean "the act of appraising, the setting of a price, valuation." But appraisement, when connoting the acts of an official appraiser, is the term usually used in reference to valuation of estates; it appears far more frequently in legal than in nonlegal texts.

The more broadly applicable term appraisal is also frequent in legal texts, in figurative as well as literal senses. E.g., "The order, in my view, is too strong, too broad, and not fine-tuned enough in its appraisal of the statutory language, the legislative history, and the congressional purposes."/ "The court's appraisal of appellant's claim of prosecutorial vindictiveness must adhere to the principles established by the Supreme Court in Blackledge v. Perry."

Appraisal commonly appears in the writing of lawyers but is more a part of the everyday language. Ironically, however, Fowler classified it among those words "that have failed to become really familiar and remained in the stage in which the average man cannot say with confidence offhand that they exist" (MEU1 14). Since he wrote that, however, appraisal has become the standard term in BrE as well as in AmE, largely because of the American influence. Appraisal is now preferred in all ordinary contexts, unless the connotative distinction frequently given to appraisement is desired.

As with many other pairs of variant word terms, here the vice of INELEGANT VARIATION may tempt the writer. E.g., "The inventory and appraisement will then be filed by the attorney in the executor's name with the clerk of court, who will record them. The purpose of the inventory and appraisal [read appraisement] is to serve as the basis upon which the executor makes his accounts and furnishes information concerning the estate to interested persons; however, the appraisal [read appraisement] is conclusive upon no one."

appraise; apprise. The first means "to valuate," the second "to inform." In these sentences appraise is used for apprise: "Doctors have an obligation to keep their patients appraised [read apprised] of their condition [conditions makes better sense, because not all patients' conditions will be the same]."/ "The objection nowhere appraised [read apprised] the trial court that Ford Motor was complaining that the inquiry be limited."/ "Cementation were fully appraised [read apprised] of the requirements and responsibilities of the main contract." Greater Nottingham Co-operative Society Ltd v. Cementation Piling & Foundations Ltd, [1989] 1 Q.B. 71, 95, [1988] 2 All Eng. Rep. 971, 981.

A rarer mistake is for apprise to be misused for appraise: "The discussion thus far should indicate the limited value of superficial observation in apprising [read appraising] the effects of appellant's mental illness." Here apprise is correctly used: "It does not follow that because an officer may lawfully arrest a person only when he is apprised of facts sufficient to warrant a belief that the person has committed or is committing a crime, the officer is equally unjustified, absent that kind of evidence, in making any intrusions short of an arrest."

appreciate = (1) to fully understand; (2) to increase in value; or (3) to be grateful for. The last meaning began as a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION but is now established.

apprehend; comprehend. Apprehend = (1) to seize in the name of the law; to arrest <to apprehend a criminal>; or (2) to lay hold of with the intellect (OED). It should not be used as a supposed FORMAL WORD for believe, as here: "We apprehend [read believe] that it is unnecessary at this time to cite authority in support of the right in equity to maintain class suits." Comprehend = (1) to understand, grasp with the mind, or (2) to include, comprise, contain.

apprehension does not always mean "fear," its common lay meaning. It frequently takes on nominal senses corresponding to the verb apprehend—e.g.: "In the law of torts, one of the necessary ingredients of an assault is apprehension by the plaintiff of the imminent contact." Here apprehension refers merely to perception, not to fear or anxiety. See apprehend.

apprise; apprize. See appraise.

appro is an abbreviated form of approval, in phrases such as goods on appro. It is appropriate for telegrams but not for legal prose.

approbate and reprobate (= to accept and reject), used in the context that one may not accept the benefits of a legal document while challenging some of its conditions, is an unjustified LATINISM that Leff aptly calls "insufferably fancy." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2046 (1985). The simpler words used in the definition are preferable.

approbation; approval; approvement. There is no generally accepted distinction between the first two words, apart from the observation that the first is more unusual and dignified. Follett suggests that we restrict approbation to a favorable response on a particular occasion and use approval for a general favorable attitude. Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 72 (1966). E.g., "Again expressing our approbation of this doctrine, we conclude that the proof tendered should have been admitted." Follett's distinction would suggest that approval be used here: "This extreme view has never met the approbation [read approval] of the bar, either in England or in America, and is repudiated by the great majority of reputable practitioners." See disapprobation.

Rarely does approbate justifiably supersede approve—e.g.: "It must follow that all arranged or Sikh marriages are a priori void, unless the parties knew each other beforehand or approbated [read approved] the marriage afterwards." (Eng.) For a legal nuance of the verb approbate, see approbate and reprobate.

Approvement is an old term with two quite distinct meanings at common law: (1) "the practice of criminal prosecution by which a person accused of treason or felony was permitted to exonerate himself by accusing others and escaping prosecution himself" (Black's); and (2) "the conversion to his own profit, by the lord of the manor, of waste or common land by enclosure and appropriation" (OED).

appropriable is the adjective corresponding to appropriate, v.t.—not appropriatable. E.g., "[T]he Preissers have argued lack of standing on the part of the objectors and have contended that they are entitled to decrees, irrespective of the question of availability of appropriatable [read appropriable] water." In re Application for Water Rights of Preisser, 545 P.2d 711, 712 (Colo. 1976) (en banc). See -ATABLE.

appropriate, v.t.; expropriate. The verb appropriate may mean (1) "to give to a particular person or organization for a specific purpose" <government-appropriated moneys>; or (2) "to take from a particular person or organization for a specific purpose." The first sense is the more usual in AmE (and better known to the nonlawyer), perhaps because it is better to give than to receive. Following are examples of sense (2), the lawyer's sense: "Under this authorization she withdrew from the bank various sums of money, a considerable amount of which she evidently appropriated to her own use without any accounting to him."/ "The only matter that has been urged before us is whether defendant may lawfully be restrained from appropriating news taken from bulletins issued by complainant, for the purpose of selling it to defendant's client."

Expropriate means (1) "to exercise eminent domain over; to take, by legal action, private land for public use"; or (2) "to transfer title to another's property to oneself." See misappropriate.

In sense (2), appropriate is distinguished from expropriate because a private or semipublic entity does the former, whereas a public governmental entity does the latter. The difference between the terms is carefully observed by the courts. E.g., "[I]t makes no difference in determining the amount to be awarded that the property was appropriated and not formally expropriated." Gray v. State Through Dep't of Highways, 202 So. 2d 24, 30 (La. 1967).

appropriation = (1) the exercise of control over property; (2) the bringing about of a transfer of title or of a nonpossessory interest in the property; (3) a public body's act of voting a sum of money for any of various public purposes; or (4) the sum of money so voted.

In the following passage, a court has overstated the traditional significance of the term (sense 1): "Implicit in the meaning of the word appropriation, when it comes to competing and equal possessory interests in property, is that the accused person must have exercised 'unauthorized' control over the property." Freeman v. State, 707 S.W.2d 597, 605 (Tex. Crim. App. 1986). See misappropriate.

approve. A. *Approve (of). Approve may be either transitive or intransitive, but in legal usage is usually the former (i.e., it usually takes no of). "In our system evidentiary rulings provide the context in which the judicial process of inclusion and exclusion approves some conduct as comporting with constitutional guarantees and disapproves other actions by state agents."

B. And endorse. The two should be distinguished. To approve, apart from the legal sense of giving official sanction, is to consider right or to have a favorable attitude toward. The verb conveys an attitude or thought. To endorse is to support actively and explicitly. The word connotes action as well as attitude.

approvingly cited is awkward for cited with approval. "Judge Rubin found that neither of two kinds of contracts met the Howey test for an investment contract, a finding approvingly cited [read cited with approval] in Moody v. Bache & Co." Other awkward variations have appeared: "This suggestion, as illustrated by the Rogers decision, was approvingly used [omit approvingly] in the Commerce Clearing House Rewrite Bulletin of June 8, 1983." The implication here is that, by using a suggested legal theory, the user implicitly approves that theory.

approximate; approximal; proximate. Approximate = (1) closely resembling; (2) nearly accurate; or (3) close together. Approximal = contiguous. Proximate = (1) very near; or (2) directly related. See proximate.

approximately is almost never as good as about—e.g.: "These prior costs will be approximately [read about] $9,600." See about.

approximately about is a REDUNDANCY. See about.

à prendre. See profits à prendre.

a priori; a posteriori. These terms are best left to philosophical contexts. Very simply, a priori, the more common term, means "deductively; reasoning from the general to the particular," and a posteriori means "inductively; reasoning from the particular to the general, or from known effects to their inferred causes." Here a priori is used correctly, although the writer might better have written deductive: "Witherspoon's teaching is not limited to that particular inference; it counsels against any a priori judicial assumptions about the views of veniremen."

A priori becomes vague and confusing when it is used to mean "presumably" or "without detailed consideration," as here: "But we cannot say, a priori, without evidence, that there is not a sufficient rational distinction between such restaurants and other commercial establishments to warrant a study." This usage is a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION.

apropos (of). The two variations of this phrase are generally inappropriate in legal writing in the place of some English equivalent; they may prove serviceable in informal letters. Apropos of (suggested by the French phrase, à propos de) is well established in English and is correct. Yet apropos may be used as a preposition to mean "concerning, apropos of." Hence there is generally no reason to include of. The preposition to is always incorrect with apropos.

apt; apposite. Both words mean "fit; suitable"; apposite, common in legal writing, is a FORMAL WORD.

Apt for likely is a loose usage. As Fowler explains, however, "in British usage apt always implies a general tendency; for a probability arising from particular circumstances, likely is the word" (MEU2 34).

The same distinction applies in the best American usage. In the following sentences, apt is correctly used of general or habitual tendencies, rather than a likelihood in a particular instance—e.g.: "The restaurant is extremely popular and generally apt to be crowded."/ "Psychiatrists are more apt to see people face to face, sitting up and once a week rather than the traditional five times." (Note the MISPLACED MODIFIER and the lack of PARALLELISM in the final clause. A less awkward structure, and one easier to take in at a first reading, would be: "Psychiatrists are more apt to see people face to face, to see them sitting up, and to see them once rather than five times a week.") a quo; a qua. A quo = from which. A court a quo is a court from which a case has been removed or appealed. E.g., "If the court a quo has no jurisdiction, then a court ad quem gains none by appeal . . . ." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 12 n.24 (1916).

A qua was originally a solecism for a quo. It has gained some degree of currency in legal prose, although a quo remains the preferred term. Because a quo, the correct form, has persisted alongside the bastardized version, it is not overreaching to say that we should stick with what is correct. It is the only form given, for example, by Leff in his Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2050 (1985). "On March 30, 1984 the district court a qua [read a quo] stayed the scheduled execution, dismissed with prejudice the foregoing enumerated claims 2, 4, and 5 and docketed an evidentiary hearing on claims 1 and 3."/ "The sole question posed on appeal is whether the federal court a qua [read a quo] had personal jurisdiction over the nonresident defendant." Cf. terminus a quo.

arbitrable (= subject to or appropriate for arbitration) is the correct form, not arbitratable. Hence the corresponding noun is arbitrability—e.g.: "The appeals-court panel said, 'Since RICO claims are arbitratable [read arbitrable], we see no reason here for limiting arbitratability [read arbitrability] . . . .'" Wall St. J., 31 Jan. 1991, at B4. See -ATABLE.

arbitrage; arbitration. Arbitrage = the simultaneous buying and selling of currencies or securities at different values in order to profit by price discrepancies. For the sense of arbitration, see arbitration.

arbitrage(u)r. Though English-language dictionaries generally put their entries under the Frenchified arbitrageur, most journalists and courts now seem to prefer the naturalized form, arbitrager—e.g.: "The profit to the arbitragers was the difference between the price paid by them for the preferred [stock] and the amount received by them upon the sale of the common [stock]." Austrian v. Williams, 103 F. Supp. 64, 92–93 (S.D.N.Y. 1952)./ "The arbitragers who were indicted yesterday were D. Ronald Yogada . . . ." Kurt Eichenwald, Two Firms Are Charged as Insiders, N.Y. Times, 3 Nov. 1988, at 29./ "Robert Freeman, 46, of Goldman, Sachs & Co., was one of the country's most powerful takeover-stock speculators, or arbitragers . . . ." Steve Swartz & James B. Stewart, Kidder's Mr. Wigton, Charged as "Insider," Ends His Long Ordeal, Wall St. J., 21 Aug. 1989, at 1.

arbitral. A. And arbitrary. Arbitral = relating to arbiters or arbitration; arbitrary usually may be equated with "capricious, randomly chosen." (See arbitrary.) It also has a more and more disused legal meaning: determinable by the decision of a judge or tribunal rather than defined by statute. This, take note, was the original meaning of arbitrary. Could it be that its other, more modern meanings have grown out of this first one?

Arbitral may correspond to either arbitrator or arbiter. In legal language, it is almost invariably the adjectival form of arbitrator, q.v. <arbitral discretion>. It also sometimes corresponds to the noun arbitration, as in the phrase arbitral tribunal. See Graphic Communications Union v. Chicago Tribune Co., 779 F.2d 13, 15 (7th Cir. 1985).

B. And arbitrational; arbitrative. Both arbitrational and arbitrative are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of arbitral. E.g., "The witness privilege applies in any judicial, official, investigatory, legislative, or arbitrational [read arbitral] proceeding . . . ." Phillip J. Kolczynski, The Criminal Liability of Aviators, 51 J. Air L. & Com. 1, 42 (1985)./ "[Every Kansas corporation can sue and be sued] in all courts and participate . . . in any judicial, administrative, arbitrative [read arbitral] or other proceeding, in its corporate name . . . ." Kan. Stat. Ann. § 17-6102(2) (1992).

arbitrament; arbitrement. The first spelling is standard for this word, meaning (1) "the power to decide for others," or (2) "a decision or sentence." When first imported into English from French in the late 16th century, the word was spelled with -e- in the penultimate syllable. Thereafter the spelling was Latinized to arbitrament, which the OED notes has been the accepted spelling since about 1830. Following is an illustration of sense (1): "The court may not leave both the questions of law and of fact to the arbitrament of the jury."

In sense (2), the word was once common in arbitration contexts; it referred to the arbitrators' decision or award. This particular use is labeled obsolete in Katharine Seide, A Dictionary of Arbitration 24 (1970).

arbitrary; unreasonable. These words are extremely complex in law, their senses not readily encapsulated; but their most elemental senses are worth noting. Arbitrary = with no purpose or objective. (See arbitral (A).) Unreasonable = with a purpose that is excessively imposed.

arbitrate = (1) (of one or more parties) to settle by, or submit to, arbitration; or (2) (of an arbitral tribunal) to decide a dispute being arbitrated. Though surprisingly common, references to courts "arbitrating" disputes reflect poor usage—e.g.: "The plaintiff's lawyers would simply tell the plaintiff what he would net if he instructed them to accept the offer; if the plaintiff thought the lawyers were taking too much, he could ask the court to arbitrate [read decide] the dispute . . . ." Chesny v. Marek, 720 F.2d 474, 478 (7th Cir. 1983).

arbitration. A. And mediation. Both terms refer to methods of dispute resolution involving a neutral third party. The results of arbitration are binding—that is, the parties to the arbitrator's decision are bound by it. In mediation, to the contrary, the mediator merely tries to help two disputing parties reach a mutually agreeable solution; the parties are not, however, bound by a mediator's decisions. See mediation.

B. "Trying" an Arbitration. To say that an arbitration is tried is to betray an ignorance of idiom, as well as the process involved, by treating it as if it were litigation in a public tribunal. And, in any event, arbitration refers to a process; a case may be tried (or arbitrated), but a so-called litigation cannot be tried.

The standard idiom would be to say that an arbitration is heard or conducted. But legal writers increasingly get it wrong—e.g.: "[T]his would be prejudicial to the Hideca-Nereus arbitration which, it was claimed by Hideca, should logically be tried [read heard] first." Compania Espanola de Petroleos, S.A. v. Nereus Shipping, S.A., 527 F.2d 966, 971 (2d Cir. 1975)./ "[T]he court vacated the arbitration award since the arbitration had been tried [read conducted] on a totally different theory than the one on which arbitration had been ordered." Metropolitan Property & Liab. Ins. Co. v. Streets, 856 F.2d 526, 529 (3d Cir. 1988).

arbitrator; arbiter. An arbitrator is a person chosen to settle differences between two parties embroiled in a controversy. Arbiter, by contrast, is more general, meaning "anyone with power to decide disputes, as a judge." E.g., "As long as the pleas of both employer and employee are lawful, the courts have not been constituted arbiters of the fairness, justice, or wisdom of the terms demanded by either the employer or the employee."

The terms do, however, overlap considerably, and they cause confusion on both sides of the Atlantic. Yet when referring to legal arbitration, one should term the resolver of disputes the arbitrator. "To order arbitration is not to approve in advance of all or everything that the arbiter [read arbitrator] does." (Scots law presents an exception: one appoints an arbiter to hold an arbitration.)

Leff rightly rejects a distinction of a different nature: "Sometimes a distinction is sought to be made between an arbiter, who decides according to rules, and an arbitrator, who is free to settle matters in his own sound discretion. But the distinction doesn't hold; arbiters often have huge moments of discretionary power, and more important, most arbitrators today proceed according to elaborate rules, both procedural and substantive." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2050 (1985). That distinction, in fact, goes back to Roman law, but it has no validity today.

The phrase is always final or ultimate arbiter, not arbitrator. E.g., "The judicial system is regarded as the ultimate arbitrator [read ultimate arbiter] of disputes."/ "In an earlier and ruder age the appeal was to arms, and force was the final arbiter."

Arbitor is a misspelling—e.g.: "As the chief arbitor [read arbiter] in disputes between producers and the screenwriters' and directors' guilds, it is Dern's role to settle disputes ranging from payment schedules and credits to working conditions." Black, Dixon Q. Dern, Esq.: Hollywood Law, M Mag., May 1989, at 48, 53. See arbitral.

arbitrement. See arbitrament.

archaism. See anachronism.

ARCHAISMS, outmoded words or expressions that are not yet obsolete, abound in the language of the law. This work attempts to treat them individually under specific entries. A great many are collected under the entries FORBIDDEN WORDS, LAWYERISMS & LATINISMS.

Among the archaisms especially to be avoided are the following:

anent	howbeit	verily
anon	maugre	whilom
belike	methinks	withal
divers	perchance	wot
fain	shew (for show)	wroth

One writer aptly says of a similar list: "These are easily avoided by anyone of the least literary sensibility . . . ." Herbert Read, English Prose Style 9 (1952). See nay.

archetype; prototype. These words are close in meaning, but their DIFFERENTIATION should be encouraged. As commonly used, archetype means "a standard or typical example," whereas prototype means "the original type that has served as a model for successors." In the sentence following, prototype is misused for archetype: "The prototype [read archetype] of a personal benefit requiring heightened judicial scrutiny is cash flowing directly to the union officer from the union treasury."

architectural; architectonic. Architectural is usually the literal, and architectonic the figurative, term. Whereas architectural relates to the design of physical structures, architectonic relates to rational organization or to the abstract structure of a thing or idea. Although architectonic is sometimes used like architectural, it should be confined to figurative or abstract senses to make the DIFFERENTIATION complete.

Arden, Enoch. See Enoch Arden law.

ARGOT. See JARGON.

arguendo. In AmE, arguendo is unnecessary in place of for the sake of argument. Although brevity would commend it, its obscurity to nonlawyers is a distinct liability. E.g., "Assuming arguendo that her answers establish that she actually attempted to warn appellant, the court of appeals erred in inferring that her having done so established that she was acting as a state agent." Arguendo is one of those LATINISMS that neophyte lawyers often adopt as pet words to advertise their lawyerliness.

In BrE, the word means something else entirely: "during the course of argument." E.g., "'This air is too pure for a slave to breathe in,' was already ancient when Serjeant Davy uttered it arguendo in 1772 . . . ." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 198 (1973).

argufy = to dispute, wrangle. Krapp calls this term "illiterate or, in cultivated speech, a humorous and contemptuous form of argue." G.P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 50 (1927). Lawyers could use a good sarcastic term for argue, and argufy fills the bill. Cf. speechify.

argument(ation). Argumentation refers to the act or process of arguing, or the art of persuading. Argument should be reserved for all other contexts.

argument(at)ive. The longer form is preferred as an adjectival form of argumentation.

ARGUMENT, MODES OF. The Romans categorized and gave names to several different modes of argument, all of which (both names and modes) are still used today. Although it might be somewhat precious to use some of the more recondite Latin phrases in ordinary contexts (e.g., argumentum ad crumenam), they are at least as useful as most things that appear in legal footnotes. Following are some of these phrases, each of which is preceded by argumentum:

ab auctoritate	=	from authority (of a statute or case)
ab impossibili	=	from impossibility ab inconvenienti	=	from inconvenience a contrario	=	for contrary treatment ad baculum	=	dependent on physical force to back it up ad captandum	=	appealing to the emotions of a crowd ad crumenam	=	appealing to the purse or self-interest ad hominem	=	based on disparagement or praise of another in a way that obscures the real issue ad ignorantiam	=	based on an adversary's ignorance ad invidium	=	appealing to hatred or prejudice ad misericordiam	=	appealing to pity ad populum	=	appealing to the crowd ad rem	=	on the point at issue (what every good judge likes to hear) ad verecundiam	=	appealing to one's modesty a fortiori	=	from the stronger case a simili	=	by analogy or similarity; from a like case ex silentio	=	out of silence (based on the absence of solid evidence) arise. See accrue (B).

arm's-length; arms-length. In phrases such as arm's-length transaction, the correct form is to make arm possessive; the phrase is usually and best hyphenated when it appears before the noun it modifies—e.g.: "The stock was sold in an arm's-length transaction."/ "The renewal did not result from independent, arms-length [read arm's-length] negotiations." See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A).

An inferior method of signaling the adjectival quality of the phrase is to place quotation marks around it (by referring, for example, to an "arm's length" position.) This method, to be avoided, appears repeatedly in Geoffrey Hazard, Triangular Lawyer Relationships, 1 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 15, 33–34 (1987).

In the phrase at arm's length (= not having a confidential relationship), the second two words are not hyphenated.

around is informal for about or approximately, and should be avoided in favor of either of those substitutes.

around; round. In AmE around is preferred where in BrE round is.

arraignment; indictment. The meanings of these terms vary, depending on the jurisdiction. An indictment is the usual instrument charging a person with a felony. It also refers, loosely, to the act of charging someone with a crime. An arraignment, within the federal system of the U.S., is the "reading [of] the indictment or information to the defendant or stating to him the substance of the charge and calling on him to plead thereto." Fed. R. Crim. P. 10. See indictment.

arrant; errant. The original word was errant, which means "traveling, wandering" <knight errant>. By extension it has come to mean "straying out of bounds" and "erring, fallible." (See errant.) Arrant began as an alteration of errant, and originally had the same sense ("wandering"), but now usually appears as a term of contempt in the phrase arrant knave. It means "utter; extreme" or "egregious; outstandingly bad."

array; arrayal; arrayment. The three terms differ. Array is the most common, meaning (1) "order or arrangement"; (2) "venire; a panel of potential jurors, or a list of impaneled jurors" <after challenges for cause to the first array of jurors in the box>; (3) "clothing"; (4) "militia"; (5) "a large number" <an array of setbacks>; or (6) "a series of statistics or a group of elements." The specific meaning is usually apparent from the context. (See CHAMELEON-HUED WORDS.) By the definition under sense (2), array may refer either to a roster of jurors or to the body of jurors collectively.

Arrayal = the act of arraying or ordering. Arrayment shares this meaning, but more commonly means "clothing, attire." Arrayment developed into another form that is now more generally used in this archaic and learned sense, raiment.

Array as a verb has the special legal senses (1) "to impanel a jury for trial" <the jurors have been arrayed on the panel>; or (2) "to call out the names of the jurors one by one" <the defense lawyers scrutinized the jurors as they were arrayed>.

arrear(s); arrearage(s). The most common use of either of the terms is the phrase in arrear(s) (= behind in the discharge of a debt or other obligation). Current AmE idiom calls predominantly for in arrears, whereas a common BrE and older AmE idiom is in arrear. In arrearages is obsolete.

Arrearage, a LEGALISM, legitimately remains only in the sense "the condition of being in arrears." In all other meanings arrears serves: (1) "unfinished duties" <arrears of work that have accumulated>; and (2) "unpaid or overdue debts" <the creditor has reached an agreement with the debtor on settling the arrears>. E.g., "Earned income credits constitute 'refunds of federal taxes paid' and 'overpayment to be refunded' subject to withholding to satisfy child-support arrears."

Yet legal writers frequently use arrearage (not even listed in the COD) where arrears would be preferable. E.g., "In Fanchier v. Gammill, a Nevada court had awarded a wife alimony that, because of arrearages [read arrears], she was forced to reduce to a judgment in Mississippi."

In the singular, arrearage is common enough in legal texts to be perhaps forgivable, arrear being an unnatural-sounding singular. E.g., "This order recites findings that appellant paid $1000 of the $4000 arrearage found to exist by the 1982 order, leaving an arrearage of $3000 denominated in the order as 'amended arrearage.'" The OED records an incorrect American use of arrears as a singular: "They constitute a large arrears [read arrear or arrearage], which should be dealt with speedily."

arrestable. So spelled. See -ABLE (A). arrestee. See -EE.

arrester; arrestor. The former is the preferred spelling.

arrivee. See -EE.

arrogate, a transitive verb, should not be used reflexively, as here: "Should a justice court attempt to grant a divorce, its decision would be invalid as if the reader were to arrogate himself to do so [read to arrogate to himself this power or to appoint himself to do so]." The following sentence illustrates the correct idiom: "John had allowed sheriffs to arrogate to themselves once more the power of hearing pleas of the Crown . . . ." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 51 (2d ed. 1953). See abrogate.

arse; ass. Arse is the spelling (in the anatomical sense, not in horse-sense) in formal English.

arsen(i)ous. The spelling with the -i- is standard, the other form being a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Arsenious /ahr-sen-ee-əs/ (= of or pertaining to arsenic) should not be confused as being an adjectival form of arson. See arsonable.

arson; houseburning. Arson = (1) at common law, the malicious burning of someone else's dwelling house; or (2) under any of various statutes, the malicious burning of someone else's or one's own dwelling house or of anyone's commercial or industrial property.

The word houseburning denotes the common-law misdemeanor of intentionally burning one's own house that is within the city limits or that is close enough to other houses that they might be in danger of catching fire. The term applies only when no one else is actually damaged by the fire.

arsonable; arsonous. Both terms are omitted from most English-language dictionaries, including the OED, W2, W3, and AHD. But they are serviceable. Arsonable = (of property) of such a nature as to give rise to a charge of arson if maliciously burned. E.g., "It is sometimes said that the explanation of this rule is that a chattel is (with certain exceptions) non-arsonable property, while a building is arsonable, and it is therefore not possible to transfer the malice between the two legal species of property." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 130 (2d ed. 1961).

Arsonous = of or relating to arson. E.g., "After they poured ten gallons of gasoline about the inside of the home in preparation for their arsonous act, an unexpected explosion occurred which trapped Frank Owen in the home and resulted in his death." Smith v. Moran, 209 N.E.2d 18, 19 (Ill. App. Ct. 1965)./ "[T]he relatively few firebugs could not buy out the orphans for an amount remotely near the costs of their arsonous conduct." Mayer G. Freed & Daniel D. Polsby, Just Cause for Termination Rules and Economic Efficiency, 38 Emory L.J. 1097, 1112 (1989)./ "[S]tatement . . . not hearsay when offered as false exculpatory statement intended to conceal arsonous purpose for being in alley." Roger C. Park, "I Didn't Tell Them Anything About You": Implied Assertions as Hearsay Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, 74 Minn. L. Rev. 783, 816 n.180 (1990).

artefact. See artifact.

article, v.t., means "to bind by articles," and is conjugated articled, articling. An articled clerk (who is said to "take articles"), for instance, was formerly the term for an apprentice bound to serve in a solicitor's office in return for learning the trade. The verb is invariably used in reference to apprenticeships. E.g., "[Among the necessary qualifications for becoming a solicitor is an apprenticeship] or service under articles of clerkship to a practising solicitor for a period varying from two and a half to five years, according to the previous attainments of the clerk. This service is exclusive; and, unlike the Bar student, the articled clerk cannot devote any part of his attention to matters other than the study and practice of the law." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 70 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).

ARTICLES. A. Omitted Before Party Denominations. It is a convention in legal writing to omit both definite and indefinite articles before words such as plaintiff, defendant, petitioner, respondent, appellant, and appellee. It is almost as if these designations in legal writing become names, or proper nouns, that denote the person or persons referred to. The convention is a useful one because cutting even such slight words can lead to leaner, more readable sentences. Perhaps the most important aspect of one's preference, though, is to be consistent within a piece of writing. The convention of omitting articles should not spread beyond these few standard party designations, for beyond these standard party-names the convention may seem unidiomatic. E.g., "If decedent [read the decedent] disposes of his estate by will, he devises property and the takers are devisees, even though the subject is personal property."/ "Intervenors' [read The intervenors'] opposition to plaintiff's motion has two bases." (See the examples under (B) of this entry in which taxpayer appears without an article.)

To some, the practice of omitting these articles may seem symptomatic of LEGALESE. They are entitled to their point of view. The rest of us can enjoy not having to write, "The plaintiff, now the appellant, sued the defendant, now the appellee." (In fairness, though, "Plaintiff, now appellant, sued defendant, now appellee" is not much better reading.)

B. Wrongly Omitted. There is a contagious tendency in legal writing to omit articles before nouns, perhaps on the analogy of the special legal convention for party-names (see A). E.g., "Distinction [read A distinction] must be recognized between the review proceeding here involved and those which . . . are allowed only . . . through a 'civil action commenced . . . in the district court.'" White v. U.S., 342 F.2d 481, 484 (8th Cir. 1965). In our quest for concision through CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF, however, our writing should not become so abbreviated that we omit necessary articles; articles are more than mere chaff: they are signposts for the reader, who may become temporarily lost without them. There is a tendency, for example, in tax cases, to refer to taxpayer without an article, as if it were a proper name. E.g., "Federal law also required that taxpayer [read the taxpayer] make contributions under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act."/ "Taxpayers' [read The taxpayers'] request for compensatory and punitive damages is barred by the doctrine of sovereign immunity." These usages offend a sensitive ear, whether it is the mind's ear or one's actual ear.

Here are a few similar examples: "In approaching solution [read a solution] to this problem, we must look beyond the immediate consequences of the decision of this case."/ "The award as remitted by trial judge [read the trial judge] was not so gross as to be contrary to right reason."/ "If a sale is necessary, the representative can sue to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by decedent during lifetime [read his lifetime]." For exceptions to the general rule, see (A) above.

C. Wrongly Inserted. Writers sometimes unidiomatically insert articles where they have no business; this phenomenon is inexplicable, except insofar as we can identify the writer's failure to distinguish between COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS. E.g., "The nature of the agency relationship is such that the principal would be subject to a vicarious liability [omit a] as a defendant to another who may have been injured by the agent's negligence."/ "The Commission has taken the position that it may by its order allow an overproduction [omit an] for a period of time to meet the market demand."

D. Repeated. When two or more nouns are connected by a conjunction, it is usually best to repeat the article before each noun. When the article is not repeated, the sense conveyed is that the nouns are identical or synonymous. "The committee elected a secretary and treasurer" (one person); "The committee elected a secretary and a treasurer" (two persons).

The article should not be repeated in a second, parallel adjectival phrase. "Appellant testified and the United States admitted that P.A.L. was a validly formed and an existing corporation [omit an]."

articulable, not articulatable, is the correct form—e.g.: "The government argues that the stop of the car was either part of an 'extended border search' or a 'Terry stop' based on articulatable [read articulable] suspicion." U.S. v. Weston, 519 F. Supp. 565, 569 (W.D.N.Y. 1981). See -ATABLE.

artifact; artefact. The former spelling is standard in AmE, the latter in BrE.

artifice is sometimes misspelled artifice, as in "a scheme and artifice [read artifice] to defraud." U.S. v. Edwards, 716 F.2d 822, 823 (11th Cir. 1983).

artificial person. See juristic person.

artisan; artizan. The former spelling is standard.

as. A. Causal words: as; because; since; for. In the causal sense as should generally be avoided, because (not as!) it may be misunderstood as having its more usual meaning "while," especially when it is placed anywhere but at the beginning of the sentence. Fowler states: "To causal or explanatory as-clauses, if they are placed before the main sentence . . . there is no objection." E.g., "But as the case has been discussed here and below without much regard to the pleadings, we proceed to consider the other grounds upon which it has been thought that a recovery could be maintained." Robins Dry Dock & Repair Co. v. Flint, 275 U.S. 303, 308 (1927) (per Holmes, J.)/ "As I read the court's opinion to be entirely consistent with the basic principles which I believe control this case, I join in it." The reverse order is infelicitous, however, unless the reader necessarily knows what is to be introduced by the as-clause: "We do not explore the problem further, as [read since] the issue of damages was not litigated below."

The causal as becomes troublesome even at the beginning of a sentence when a temporal as appears in the same sentence. "As Nelda returned to her occupation as soon as appellant drove her from Newark to New York, and as he knew full well that she would do this, one might suppose that the violation of the Mann Act was clearly established." The first and last occurrences of as in that sentence are causal, the second and third temporal; the causal words should be changed to since or because.

Because of the syntactic restrictions on as, we are left with three general-purpose causal conjunctions. Because is the strongest and most logically oriented of these. Since is less demonstratively causal and frequently has temporal connotations. But using since without reference to time is not, despite the popular canard, incorrect. (See SUPERSTITIONS (G).) For is the most subjective of the three, and the least used. If because points out a direct cause-effect relationship, for signals a less direct relationship, adding independent explanation or substantiation. Moreover, for is a coordinating conjunction, and not, like because and since, a subordinating conjunction; hence it can properly begin sentences.

B. In Anticipatory Reference. When coupled with do-words, as can cause mischief of the kind outlined under ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE (A). E.g., "Texas, as do [read like] most jurisdictions, recognizes three general theories of recovery in products liability." See like (C).

C. And like. See like & HYPERCORRECTION (E)

as against means "toward; with respect to; in regard to," but with the implication of adversity or conflict—e.g.: "Every admission is deemed to be a relevant fact as against the person by or on whose behalf it is made." (Eng.)/ "[I]f a stick of timber comes ashore on a man's land, he thereby acquires a 'right of possession' as against an actual finder who enters for the purpose of removing it." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 176 (1881; repr. 1963).

But the phrase is sometimes misused for against: "Defendant was allowed, however, to testify as against [read against] the plaintiff [if the defendant gave adverse testimony]."/ "In a trial for felony the prisoner can make no admissions so as to dispense with proof, though a confession may be proved as against [read against] him." (Eng.)

Because as against is an idiom with a fairly set meaning in English, it should not be used in unfamiliar ways, such as in an ellipsis of as being against: "The policy is void as against public policy [read as being against public policy] because it opens a wide door by which a constant temptation is created to commit for profit the most atrocious of crimes."

as and when. This is a redundant expression; either as or when will suffice. "The bill provides that the balances shall be met by the Exchequer as and when [read as] they mature for payment." (Eng.—ex. fr. V. H. Collins, Right Word, Wrong Word 19 (1956)).

The variant when and as is equally bad: "A court of equity acts only when and as [read only when] conscience commands."

as . . . as. A. And so . . . as. In positive statements, the as . . . as construction is preferred. "If the guard had thrown [the packaged explosive] down knowingly and willfully, he would not have threatened the plaintiff's safety, so far as [read as far as] appearances could warn him." Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R., 162 N.E. 99, 101 (N.Y. 1928) (per Cardozo, J.)./ "So long as [read As long as] the courts fail to come to grips with that fact, so long as [read as long as] they persist in assuming that every juror has a precise and firmly held position, the process of jury selection will be unpredictable, arbitrary, and ultimately lawless."

Twenty years ago it was commonly believed that so . . . as is preferable to as . . . as in negative statements such as, "The limitations period was not so long as I had thought." But as . . . as generally serves equally well in such negative statements. Following is a construction in which not so . . . as does not read as well as not as . . . as: "Back at Bennie's Corners, affairs were not going so happily as they were at McGill University." On first reading this sentence, the reader may be temporarily misled into thinking that so means "very," in its colloquial sense, as it would if the sentence ended after happily. See as long as; equally as (B) & so as.

B. Repetition of Verb After. Often, when the second as in this construction is far removed from the first as, the verb is repeated for clarity: "Perhaps no area of corporate law is as beset with conflicting judicial opinions, variations among statutes, and confusion and uncertainty concerning the likely outcome of litigation as is the duty of loyalty."

as at (= as of) is characteristic chiefly of BrE and of financial contexts in AmE. E.g., "This book reflects the law as at August 1986." Stanley Berwin, The Economist Pocket Lawyer i (1986)./ "The common law took the coldly logical view that bastardy was judged as at the date of birth and was indelible . . ." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 558 (3d ed. 1990).

as a whole. See in whole.

as between (= in a comparison of [usu. two things]) is much more common in legal than in nonlegal writing. In fact, most general English-language dictionaries neglect the phrase. E.g., "The controversy as to the type of law, whether custom or common law or tradition, on the one hand, or legislation, on the other, the controversy as to the relation of law to morals, the discussion as between adjudication and administration, as between law and equity, as between strict and free procedure, all run back to this problem of stability and change." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 18 (1938)./ "A judgment gives rights and obligations to litigants as between themselves." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 10 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950)./ "This does not mean that in the English courts of the thirteenth century justice was no more than 'justice as between man and man.'" Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 401 (7th ed. 1964).

ascendant. A. Spelling. Both as a noun and as an adjective, the spelling ascendant is preferred over ascendent.

B. And ancestor; collateral; descendant. In the language of decedents' estates, both ascendant and ancestor mean "a person related to an intestate or to one who claims an intestate share in the descending lineal line (e.g., parents and grandparents)." Ancestor is the more universally comprehensible word but has two severe disadvantages: first, it is less likely to be understood as referring to a parent; second, it lacks the -ant suffix, which makes ascendant parallel with descendant. See ancestor.

Descendant denotes one who is descended from an ancestor—i.e., offspring in any degree, near or remote. E.g., "No one will deny that a marriage between an ascendant and descendant in the same line is properly within the forbidden degrees." Max Radin, The Law and You 41 (1948). See descendant.

A collateral is a relative who traces relationship to the intestate through an ancestor in common, but who is not in the lineal line of ascent or descent.

C. In the ascendant. This phrase is sometimes misconstrued to mean "ascending"; actually, it means "dominating, supreme." The phrase has been handed down to us from medieval astrology.

ascension; ascent. Both mean "the act of ascending." Ascent, however, has these additional senses: (1) "the act of rising in station or rank, or in natural chronological succession" <the ascent of man>; (2) "a method of ascending" <an unorthodox ascent>; and (3) "the degree of slope or acclivity" .

as concerns. See as regards.

ascribe (= to attribute to a specified cause) is sometimes misused for subscribe in the sense "to think of favorably"—e.g., "We ascribe [read subscribe] to the notion that judges should limit the evidence in criminal trials to what is relevant."

as do. See as (B) & ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE (A).

as equally. See equally as (D).

as far as. This phrase must be followed by is concerned or goes, or else idiom is severely violated—e.g.: "As far as damages [add are concerned], the case does not seem to be promising."

Idiom aside, however, this construction usually signals VERBOSITY. In the sentence just quoted, for example, the writer might have said: "We expect the damages to be insignificant."

as follow(s). As follows is always the correct form, even for a long enumeration.

as from, a formal way of dating the onset of something, is more common in BrE than in AmE. E.g., "Eventually it was decided that as from 1979 criminal causes in the House of Lords should be reported under the same title as in the court below." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 17–18 (11th ed. 1982)./ "Most building societies credit accounts with monies [q.v.] paid-in by cheque as from the date of deposit." Council Had No Choice, Fin. Times, 27 Jan. 1990, at 5.

aside from was once considered inferior to apart from. It has become standard, though it is confined primarily to AmE.

as, if, and when. This phrase, which commonly appears in real estate contracts, could almost always be made when with no loss in meaning. See as and when, if and when & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS as if; as though. Attempts to distinguish between these idioms have proved futile. Euphony should govern the choice of phrase.

as is; as was. "He bought the company 'as is.'" Although a martinet of logic might insist on as was in the preceding sentence, that phrase is jarringly unidiomatic. As is, in the context of that sentence, is really an elliptical form of on an "as is" basis, and is infinitely better than that paraphrase. The purpose of the phrase as is, of course, is for a seller to disclaim warranties and representations.

as long as; so long as. These phrases are not purely temporal constructions; more often than not, they express a condition rather than a time limit <as long as the transferees abide by these restrictions, they may enjoy possession of the land>. See as . . . as (A).

as much as or more. When than follows these words, the second as must appear <as much as or more than>. A common error is to write as much or more than.

In the following sentences, however, as much or more (not followed by than) is correct: "A legatee or devisee can witness a will if he takes as much or more as heir if the testator dies intestate."/ "Was she not as much or more a victim of the system as the astonishingly bright and collected Gregory?" Neil MacCormick, With Due Respect, TLS, 22 Jan. 1993, at 3. Cf. as well as or better than. See ILLOGIC (A).

as of. A. Generally. As of should be used with caution. Originally an Americanism, the phrase frequently signifies the effective legal date of a document, as when the document is backdated or when the parties sign at different times. When such a nuance is not intended, as of is the wrong phrase. E.g., it is often inferior to on: "The plaintiff's employment with the defendant ended as of [read on] September 30." Cf. as at.

B. Used Unnecessarily. Sometimes the phrase needlessly displaces a more direct word—e.g.: "It is also important to note that Arizona had itself not suffered any direct harm as of the time that [read when] it moved for leave to file a complaint . . . ." Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725, 743 (1981).

C. As of now. This phrase, along with as of itself, has been criticized as a barbarism. Lord Conesford wrote that "an illiteracy is introduced when the words as of precede not a date, but the adverb now. As of now is a barbarism which only a love of illiteracy for its own sake can explain. What is generally meant is at present." Lord Conesford, "You Americans Are Murdering the Language," in Advanced Composition 374, 383 (J.E. Warriner et al. eds., 1968).

But as of now does not mean "at present"; rather, it means "up to the present time." Follett also disapproved of the phrase, recommending instead up to now or for the present, but as of now is today unobjectionable in AmE.

Still, like its shorter sibling, it sometimes appears needlessly—e.g.: "Norman Mailer is a practiced writer. I am among those who are not convinced that he knows what to write, but it is clear he knows how to write. His most recent novel, as of just now, [delete as of just now and surrounding commas] contains the following sentence . . . ." Stephen White, The Written Word 81 (1984).

as of course. The phrase as of course, as opposed to as a matter of course, strikes nonlawyer readers as unidiomatic. But in law the idiom is common—e.g.: "It does hold that if such transfers are allowed as of course, the same right of transfer must be extended to every other child regardless of the dissimilarities of his circumstances." Dillard v. School Bd. of Charlottesville, 308 F.2d 920, 929 (4th Cir. 1962) (Haynsworth, J., dissenting)./ "A motion is not a 'responsive pleading,' within the meaning of rule 15(a), and thus the right to amend as of course is not defeated because the other party has filed a motion attacking the pleading." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 428 (4th ed. 1983)./ "[C]osts shall be allowed as of course to the prevailing party . . . ." Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d). See of course.

as of now. See as of (C).

as of right is acceptable legal shorthand for as a matter of right; the phrase means "by virtue of a legal entitlement"—e.g.: "Writs of error to the state courts have never been allowed as of right."/ "The action for damages is always available, as of right, when a contract has been broken." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 824 (8th ed. 1991).

as of yet. See as yet.

as per is commonly understood to mean "in accordance with" or "in accordance with the terms of." In re Impel Mfg. Co., 108 F. Supp. 469, 473 (E.D. Mich. 1952). It should, however, be commonly eschewed as an unrefined locution.

Originating in commercialese, as per is almost always redundant for per. Yet even per is a LAT-

INISM in place of which many everyday equivalents will suffice (e.g., according to or in accordance with). E.g., "The memorandum noted that the release between Avondale and Bean as per [read in accordance with] clause 6 thereof indicated an intent to allow third-party claims and was not a full release."/ "The secretary distributed the residual assets as per [read in accordance with] the judgment of the Louisiana court."

aspersions, to cast is a prolix CLICHÉ for to asperse—but the verb is little known.

asphyxia; asphyxiation. The former refers to the condition of having insufficient oxygen, resulting in suffocation. The latter is the action of producing suffocation.

asportable (= capable of being asported) is a lexicographic oversight, omitted from most English-language dictionaries, including the OED, W2, and W3. E.g., "[I]t was a reasonable inference . . . that once inside the department store warehouse the intruders would have access to a whole range of valuable, readily asportable consumer goods." State v. S.G., 438 A.2d 256, 260 (Me. 1981).

asport(ate), v.t. Asport (the better form) = to carry away or remove feloniously. E.g., "[T]he crime of larceny entails not only the act of taking property but also of asporting it." People v. Hammon, 236 Cal. Rptr. 822, 829 (Ct. App. 1987).

Though usually appearing in the context of larceny—hence of personal property—the verb can refer to the illegal carrying away of persons. E.g., "Between that act and the completion of the kidnapping is the drive into the District to the club where Ms. Allwine allegedly worked, finding her there, luring her outside to the car, and effectively restraining and asporting her." Frye v. State, 489 A.2d 71, 75 (Md. 1985).

Asportate is a poorly formed BACK-FORMATION and a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "On this venue issue, the trial court interpreted the stipulation between the parties as sufficient to show the truck was asportated [read asported] from Day County, South Dakota." State v. Graycek, 335 N.W.2d 572, 574 (S.D. 1983)./ "[T]he prosecutor . . . add[ed] the value of the pistol first removed from the display case and secreted in the thief's waistband to the value of the second pistol asportated [read asported] a few minutes later in the same manner." Sendejo v. State, 676 S.W.2d 454, 455 (Tex. App.—Fort Worth 1984).

asportation is a historical TERM OF ART meaning "the act of carrying off." The word denotes a necessary element of larceny. E.g., "The writ of trespass on the case might be joined with trespass quare clausum fregit or trespass for the asportation of chattels." (Eng.)

This old word has been adapted in modern contexts to mean "the act of driving (a vehicle) away": "Thereafter, by convoluted reasoning, it is held that under the facts of this case the asportation [= the driving away] of the automobile is a continuing process." See larceny, burglary & stole, took, and carried away.

asporter is the agent noun corresponding to asport, v.t. E.g., "The evidence did not identify any particular person as the actual asporter of the property from the room in which it was stored." State v. Hollis, 113 So. 159, 159 (La. 1927).

as regards; as respects; as concerns. As regards is a much maligned phrase; it is usually inferior to regarding or concerning, but it is not a solecism. E.g., "That service when finally effected was technically improper as regards the newspaper and two of the individual defendants."/ "It is true that Lady Dufferin's interest was a protected life interest, but she was left free as regards dealing with it in one particular way: surrender in favor of persons entitled in remainder." (Eng.) The phrase was a favorite of the great legal scholar Wesley N. Hohfeld, who used it frequently in his Fundamental Legal Conceptions (1919).

Though as regards is no more objectionable than with regard to, the whole lot of such phrases is suspect: "Train your suspicions to bristle up whenever you come upon as regards, with regard to, in respect of, in connection with, according as to whether, and the like They are all dodges of JARGON, circumlocution for evading this or that simple statement." Arthur Quiller-Couch, On the Art of Writing 114 (1916; repr. 1961). Cf. regard (A).

As respects and as concerns are equivalent phrases not commonly found outside legal writing. E.g., "This obligation may be limited by the certificates so that the insurance applies only to an injury as respects [better: to] ASI's operations."/ "Presentments as a method of instituting prosecutions are obsolete, at least as concerns [better: in] the federal courts."

ass. See arse & pompous ass.

assail (= to attack) is usually used figuratively in both legal and nonlegal contexts. Both attack and assail are used of findings and holdings of lower courts with which an appellant is displeased: "Appellants assail particularly these findings by the district court."/ "The writ of habeas corpus involves a collateral attack, while in certiorari the judgment is directly assailed."/ "In my opinion, the county court judge's finding cannot be assailed and the appeal must be dismissed with costs." (Eng.)

assault; battery. These terms have distinct meanings in criminal and in tort law. Essentially, an assault is the use or threat of force upon another that causes that person to have a well-founded fear of physical injury or offensive touching. A battery is the use of force or violence on another (in the criminal sense), or any repugnant intentional contact with another (in the tortious sense). Cf. accost.

Shooting a gun just to the side of someone, if that person reasonably fears physical injury, or shooting a blank gun directly at someone would be an assault. Hitting someone with a bullet makes the act a battery, even if the person never knew of the hit. In the tort sense, an uninvited kiss by a stranger would be considered a battery. See battery.

Leff notes that the distinction is observed only by lawyers, and even by them not consistently: "[I]n ordinary language, and even to some extent in legal talk, the two are conflated, and one speaks of an assault frequently in referring to the whole incident, from the threat through its consummation. Indeed, at least in ordinary understanding, use of the word assault most likely requires the actual battery; most people would not use 'He got angry and assaulted her' to describe an incident in which no physical contact was made." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2069 (1985).

assaultee (= one who is assaulted) is a mid-20th-century legal NEOLOGISM omitted from most English-language dictionaries. E.g., "The appellant denied that he assaulted the assaultee for any purpose other than getting her money . . . ." McKee v. State, 33 So. 2d 50, 53 (Fla. 1947) (en banc) (Chapman, J., dissenting)./ "The intent to kill may be established by a number of circumstances, such as, the fact that the weapon is directed at some vital spot on the assaultee's body . . . ." Caraker v. State, 84 So. 2d 50, 51 (Fla. 1955)./ "Self-defense is relative. It is available as an exculpation, or an excuse for assault, to an assaultee, not an assailant." State v. Brent, 347 So. 2d 1112, 1116 (La. 1977). See -EE.

assaulter. So spelled.

assaultive is the only adjective corresponding to assault. E.g., "The prior conviction here was for rape—an assaultive crime."

assault with intent to commit rape; assault to rape. Both forms occur in criminal cases, the former being somewhat more common. See rape (C).

assay; essay. These words, related etymologically, have distinct meanings. Assay = to test, to analyze. E.g., "The degree of harm must be assayed in light of the entire charge, the state of the evidence, the arguments of counsel, and any other relevant information revealed by the record of the trial as a whole."/ "Tenuous theories of liability are better assayed in the light of facts than in a pleader's suppositions."

Essay, though sometimes used synonymously as a verb with assay, most frequently takes on the meaning "to attempt; to try to accomplish." E.g., "The supreme court of the state has decided, in a case definitely involving the point, that the legislature has not essayed to interfere with the constitutional liberty of citizens to organize a party and to determine the qualifications of its members."/ "Lawyers' language essays precision by choice of particular words and phrases, and by devices of composition such as numbering, lettering, indexing, and even symbolic logic." Essay thus used is quite formal and somewhat archaic; attempt or try serves better in ordinary contexts. Cf. endeavor.

assemblage; assembly. An assemblage is a disorganized group of persons or things. An assembly is a group of persons that is organized and united for some common purpose.

assent; consent. These words are very close in meaning, yet "there is some implication that assent is more active and enthusiastic than consent, the meaning of which sometimes slides over almost to 'acquiescence.'" Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2069 (1985).

assenter; assentor. For "one who assents," assenter is standard. Assentor has the specialized legal meaning in England of "one who, in addition to the proposer and seconder of a candidate's nomination in an election, signs the nomination paper of that candidate." It should not be used in other senses.

assertedly. See reportedly, allegedly & confessedly.

assertive; assertory. The former is the word for ordinary purposes; the latter was at one time used by grammarians in reference to sentences or constructions in the form of affirmations. Assertory is used in but one legal phrase, assertory oath, which denotes a statement of facts under oath.

assertor, not asserter, is the usual agent noun corresponding to the verb assert. See -ER (A). assessment. See tax.

asseverate. See aver.

assign, v.t., is frequently merely an inflated synonym of give. E.g., "We dismiss for reasons expressed above and those assigned by the district court." The verb is a less inflated LEGALISM when used in the sense "to transfer," as in "He assigned his right in the property to his son."

assign, n.; assignee. Both words mean "one to whom property rights or powers are transferred by another." Assignee is more understandable to nonlawyers, who know assign as a verb only. The SET PHRASE heirs and assigns is unlikely to disappear, however; assign as a noun almost always appears, as in the phrase just adduced, in the plural.

assignability. See negotiability.

assignee. See assign, n.

assigner. See assignor.

assignment; assignation. Assignment = (1) the transfer of property, or the property so transferred; (2) the instrument of transfer; or (3) a task or job. See negotiability.

Assignation = (1) assignment; (2) tryst; or (3) assign (meaning "one to whom property rights or powers are transferred"). Assignation is a NEEDLESS VARIANT in senses (1) and (3), and should be confined to sense (2), in which it is truly useful. In sense (1), however, assignation is the usual and proper term in Scots law.

assignment of error = a specification of errors made at trial and contained in an application for writ of error directed to an appellate court. On appeal one assigns error to certain alleged prejudicial mistakes at trial. (See error (A).) E.g., "By proper assignments of error and cross-errors, the correctness of each of the trial court's conclusions of law and that part of the temporary injunction undertaking to prescribe a form of permissible picketing is challenged."

assignor; assigner. In all legal senses, assignor is preferred; it is the correlative of assignee. Assigner has appeared in nonlegal contexts, and there it should remain. See -ER (A)

assist, n., has come into the language through basketball lingo <with an assist from counsel>. It should be avoided as a newfangled variant of assistance.

assist, v.t., is usually inferior to help.

assistance. The phrases to provide assistance and to be of assistance—containing the BURIED VERB assistance—are generally much inferior to help.

assize, n., = (1) a session of a court or council; (2) a law enacted by such a body, usu. one setting the measure, weight, or price of a thing; (3) the procedure provided for by such an enactment; (4) the court that hears cases involving that procedure; (5) a jury trial; or (6) the jury's finding in such a trial. In short, this word is, historically speaking, a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD.

In the plural (assizes), the term refers to the sessions or sittings of a court, especially of a superior court in England or Wales, held twice a year, at which cases were tried by a judge and jury. The assizes ceased to exist in Great Britain after the Courts Act 1971. Assise is a variant spelling generally best avoided.

associate together is a REDUNDANCY; associate together in groups is even worse: "The first amendment protects the right of all persons to associate together in groups to further [read to associate in furtherance of] their lawful interests."

associational; associative. The OED defines these words as virtual synonyms ("of, pertaining to, or characterized by association"). It suggests, however, that associational refers to particular associations <his associational loyalties>, whereas associative refers to association generally. But W3 suggests that associative is now largely confined to contexts involving psychology and mathematics.

Certainly the usual term in legal contexts is associational: "Further, it is extremely doubtful that the rights to visitation asserted by the Thornes are the sorts of associational rights protected by the first amendment."/ "Any thought that due process puts beyond the reach of the criminal law all individual associational relationships, unless accompanied by the commission of specific acts of criminality, is dispelled by familiar concepts of the law of conspiracy and complicity." Scales v. U.S., 367 U.S. 203, 225 (1961).

assoil; assoilzie; absolvitor. Assoil (= to pardon, release, acquit) is an obsolete ecclesiastical term for the reversal of an excommunication. Assoilzie, a Scottish dialectal variant, is still used in civil and criminal Scottish cases in the sense "to free of liability by order of court." The Scottish decree is called absolvitor.

ASSONANCE. See ALLITERATION (A).

assort(at)ive. The longer form is preferred.

assume; presume. The connotative distinction between these words is that presumptions are more strongly inferential and more probably authoritative than mere assumptions, which are usually more hypothetical. E.g., "Defendants rely upon the ancient legal presumption that a woman is considered legally capable of bearing children at any age."/ "Where any document purporting to be thirty years old is produced from any custody that the judge considers proper, it is presumed that the signature and every other part of such document is in that person's handwriting." (Eng.)

Presumptions lead to decisions, whereas assumptions do not: "We assume, without deciding, that except for the provisions of section 18 of the Decedent Estate Law the trust would be valid." The phrase we assume, without deciding, is a favorite of common-law courts.

Where adverbs are concerned, one should always use the common forms derived from presume; that is, presumably (= I presume, it is to be presumed) or presumptively (= there is a presumption at law that). Here the writer seems to have been trying to avoid the simple term in favor of an outlandish one: "However, the life tenant is assumedly [read presumably] entitled to $5,760 per year."

Assumptive is pretentious for either assumed <assumptive beliefs> or assuming or presumptuous <an assumptive character>. For the sense of presumptive in heir presumptive, see heir (B).

assumpsit, a LAW LATIN term, means literally "he undertook" or "he promised." "Of the terms used in connection with the subject of restitution, assumpsit is one of the oldest and also perhaps one of the most troublesome." Peter W. Davis, Comment, Restitution: Concept and Terms, 19 Hastings L.J. 1167, 1182 (1968). The term originally applied to an action for breach of a simple contract, then was extended (after Slade's Case [1602]) to cases in which no independent agreement to pay could be proved, and finally to implied contracts and quasi-contracts. This CHAMELEON-HUED WORD is no longer widely used by common-law courts; in England the cause of action was abolished by the Judicature Acts of 1873–1875.

assumption, in lay writing, most commonly means "a supposition"; in legal contexts it frequently takes on the older sense "the action of taking for or upon oneself" (OED). E.g., "It is not clear whether ITT consented to an assumption of indebtedness." See assume.

assumption of the risk; contributory negligence. Originally these two were separate doctrines, but assumption of the risk has been, in most jurisdictions, subsumed by the doctrine of contributory (or comparative) negligence. Assumption of the risk = the principle that a party who has taken on the risk of loss, injury, or damage consequently cannot maintain an action against the party having caused the loss. An example of assumed risk is the man who volunteers his profile to a friend who wants to practice sword-throwing.

Perhaps because assumption of the risk as applied by the courts came to bar otherwise meritorious claims, legal scholars began to point out that contributory negligence could be applied to any case involving assumption of the risk. And with the rise of comparative negligence, q.v., the doctrine of assumption of the risk became especially unjust if applied to bar a claim. See volenti non fit injuria.

assumptive; presumptive. See assume.

assurance; insurance. The nouns follow from the verbs; hence the reader might first consult the next entry. Since ensurance is no longer with us, insurance is the nominal form of both insure and ensure. Usually, insurance refers to indemnification against loss (from the verb insure); in BrE, assurance is sometimes given this meaning, although Partridge notes its decline; its one surviving use in this sense is in reference to life policies. Generally, however, assurance = that which gives confidence. See insurance (B).

In AmE, assurance chiefly means "pledge" or "guaranty." E.g., "To give further assurance [better: To ensure] that these rules will not be breached, the states may wish to add 'safeguard' provisions."/ "The reviewing court may inquire whether there is adequate assurance that the respondent will be protected against the loss of proprietary information."/ "The heirs would have no assurance that the question of the personal fault of the executor would be properly tried."/ "Respondents received assurance that the customers would be willing to give them their laundry work."

Assurance also has the specialized, rather rare legal meaning "the act of transferring real property." Assure formerly had the corresponding meaning "to convey by deed."

assure; ensure; insure. A. Assure for ensure. One person assures (makes promises to, convinces) other persons, and ensures (makes certain) that things occur or that events take place. Any object beginning with that should be introduced by the verb ensure, if the verb is in the active voice. Here assure, which always takes a personal object, is properly used: "If Mr. Lucy's promise to pay for the Zehmer's farm becomes enforceable merely on the Zehmers' making their promise in return, how is Lucy assured [correct, because passive voice] that he will not have to pay the price unless he gets the farm?"/ "Although the court's instruction did petitioner no harm, it was thought that petitioner was assured a new trial if counsel had complained."

In the following sentences, assure is misused for ensure: "This course will be more likely to assure [read ensure] that the police officer will not be exposed to personal liability."/ "The State's strong interests in assuring [read ensuring] the marketability of property within its borders would also support jurisdiction."/ "Filing of a solicitation letter assures [read ensures] the public's ample protection."

Ensure is properly used in the following sentences: "Changes were made to ensure against overexpenditures in the program."/ "The verdict ensured that he would spend a long time in jail."/ "The requirement of minimum contacts ensures that the states, through their courts, do not reach beyond the limits imposed on them by the status as coequal sovereigns in the federal system."

B. Insure and ensure. Insure should be restricted to financial contexts involving indemnification; it should refer to what insurance companies do; ensure should be used in all other senses of the word. Intransitively, insure is commonly followed by the preposition against <insure against loss>; it may also be used transitively <insure one's valuables>. Following is a commonplace peccadillo: "Care must be taken to insure [read ensure] that the return of the loser does not become the guideline of the judgment."

C. Noun Forms. See assurance.

assurer; assuror. The -er spelling is preferred. See -ER (A) & underwriter.

as though. See as if.

as to is a vague, all-purpose preposition that should be avoided whenever a more specific preposition will fit the context. As to does not clearly establish syntactic or conceptual relationships; it hampers the comprehensibility of texts in which it appears. Were it not a phrase, it might justifiably be classed among FORBIDDEN WORDS.

A. Indefensible Uses. To illustrate the slippery variability of as to, a list of problematic usages follows; in each example, another preposition would more directly and forcefully express the thought.

1. For of. "Registration in the Patent and Trademark Office creates presumptions as to [read of] ownership and the exclusive right to use."/ "A contract in a lease giving an option of purchase might be good, provided it did not infringe the law as to [read of] perpetuities."/ "The jury was also instructed that if it believed appellant was guilty of either murder or involuntary manslaughter, but was unsure as to [read of] which, it was to find him guilty of the lesser offense."

2. For on. "The UCC is silent as to [read on or about] the reconciliation of different terms."/ "The will violates the common-law rule as to [read on] contingent remainders."/ "But the question really must be regarded as an open one, as to [read on] which commentators disagree."/ "We find no authority for the contention that the rule as to [read on] the destruction of contingent remainders should be applied to a case in which the estate is vested in quality but contingent in quantity."/ "Because the State produced no evidence as to [read on] this essential element, it is impossible to say that a rational trier of fact could have found beyond a reasonable doubt the facts necessary to support the life sentence."

3. For with. "In the business of life insurance, the value of a man's life is measured in dollars and cents according to his life expectancy, the soundness of his body, and his ability to pay premiums; the same is true as to [read with, or perhaps of] health and accident insurance."

4. For for. "The rule is the same as to [read for] specialists."

5. For to. "Offeree must wait until he gets an answer as to [read answer to] his counter-offer."/

"Was the option provision too uncertain to be enforced, so that parol evidence should not have been admitted as to [read admitted to] clarify its meaning?"/ "He was entirely indifferent as to [read indifferent to] the results."

6. For by. "Counsel was continually surprised at trial as to [read by] the evidence presented by his opponent."

7. For in or into. "When the petition is correct as to [read in] form, a notification shall be prepared."/ "The court submitted issues to the jury inquiring as to [read into] what was a reasonable attorney's fee."

8. For applicable to. "That is a fundamental doctrine as to [read applicable to] fiduciaries of all sorts, that it is somewhat surprising to find it questioned."

9. Completely Superfluous. "The trial court failed to specify as to what [read specify what] predicate under the statute plaintiff relied upon."/ "The Court does not say here as to how [read say here how] carefully the survey was conducted."/ "The only real issue in the case is as to [read real issue . . . is] the question of insanity." / "The question is as to [read question is] the validity of the twenty-eighth clause of the will of Mary C. Durbow, a childless widow." See as to whether & question as to whether.

10. Used Twice in One Sentence, with Differing Meanings. "The defense moved for a judgment of acquittal as to [read on] all counts, arguing, as to [read with respect to] the tax evasion count, that an affirmative act of concealment had to be found to convict the defendant."/ "The question as to [superfluous] whether information as to [read about] particular processes or other matters was 'confidential' or 'secret' is outside the scope of this annotation."/ "Petitioner's right to a salary before it was voted to him was so indefinite as to [read in] both amount and obligation as to be [read that it was] unenforceable."/ "It is the contention of the contestant that the residuary legatees under the will so unduly and improperly influenced the testator to make the will in their favor as to [read with regard to] the residue of this estate as to render [read that they rendered] the will of no legal effect." In each of the last two sentences quoted, the final as to is a part of the phrase so . . . as to, q.v. The suggested changes of those phrases to clauses beginning with that are for the purpose merely of enhancing clarity; apart from the confusion caused by using as to twice in different senses, the phrase so . . . as to is used in those sentences in a technically proper way.

B. Defensible Uses. The phrase is most justifiable when introducing the discussion of a matter previously mentioned only cursorily in the text: "As to these nine plaintiffs who failed to apply for re-appointment, the ruling in McBee v. Jim Hogg County requires rejection of their section 1983 claims."/ "As to whether the object that this bill discloses was sought to be attained [see PASSIVE VOICE (F)] by the members of the union was a lawful one, the authorities of this country are clearly in conflict." In beginning sentences in this way, as to is equivalent to the more colloquial as for.

The phrase is defensible when used for about. Nevertheless, it is stylistically inferior to about in most contexts, as in the following sentences: "The buyer was silent as to [better: about] the disclaimer."/ "Any doubt as to [better: about] the existence of a material fact is to be resolved against the moving party."/ "Complaints as to [better: about] procedural irregularities in a condemnation case must be preserved at the trial court level by motion, exception, objection, plea in abatement, or some other vehicle."

The phrase is sometimes a passable shorthand form of "with regard to" or "on the question of," a meaning it properly carries when beginning a sentence. E.g., "California has done what we think should here be done; it has made its solution as to life insurance proceeds consonant with its other community property laws."/ "The trial court entered judgment of nonsuit as to all defendants, from which plaintiff appeals."/ "The document is silent as to beneficial title." (Eng.)/ "The district court erred in denying the new trial sought as to the dismissal." In each of these sentences the as to phrase can be used to start the sentence and link it more firmly with a topic mentioned previously.

as to whether. The Fowlers describe it as "seldom necessary" in The King's English 344 (3d ed. 1930). That judgment has withstood the test of time. See as to (A)(9) & question as to whether.

as was. See as is.

as well. When used at the beginning of a sentence, this phrase is a casualism at best—e.g.: "As well, [read Also,] people are questioning how well the legal system really does protect people's rights." Alan Reid, Seeing Law Differently 4 (1992).

as well as. See together with & SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT (G). as well as or better than. Some writers illogically leave out as after well—e.g.: "Women would write in detail why they were working as well [as] or better than their male counterparts." Simon Hoggart, All Present and Incorrect, Observer Sunday, 15 Dec. 1991, at 37, 38. Cf. as much as or more. See ILLOGIC (A).

as yet is invariably inferior to yet alone, thus far, or some other equivalent phrase. "The judge has not decided as yet." [Read The judge has not yet decided.]/ "One must question whether the stipulation automatically extended to the not-as-yet-filed claim [read yet-unfiled or yet-to-be-filed claim]." (See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.)/ "No court has as yet [read has yet] held that such an injunction is entitled to full faith and credit in the sense that the action toward which the injunction is directed must be abated."/ "Plaintiff has as yet [read thus far] had no opportunity to testify about this matter." As of yet is illiterate. Cf. as of now.

asylee, a late-20th-century legal NEOLOGISM, is becoming a standard word in the language of the law for "a refugee applying for asylum." It has not yet made its way into most English-language dictionaries. Like many personal nouns ending in -ee, it is illogically formed. But illogical morphology has not presented an obstacle to many other forms ending in -ee. "This portion of the complaint as amended alleges . . . that plaintiffs as a class are 'asylees.'" Fernandez-Roque v. Smith, 539 F. Supp. 925, 932 (N.D. Ga. 1982). / "[T]he severity of harm to the erroneously excluded asylee outweighs the administrative burden of providing an asylum hearing." Chun v. Sava, 708 F.2d 869, 877 (2d Cir. 1983). See -EE.

The popular press tends to use the phrase asylum-seeker (a phrase best hyphenated)—e.g.: "More than 10,440 Haitians are in custody at Guantanamo, and more asylum-seekers are on cutters offshore." Barbara Crossette, U.S. Starts Return of Haiti Refugees After Justices Act, N.Y. Times, 2 Feb. 1992, at 1./ "Asylum seekers poured into Germany last month at the rate of more than one a minute . . . ." Christopher Parkes, Asylum Seekers Flood Germany, Fin. Times, 5 Aug. 1992, at 1.

at is incorrect when used with any locative such as where—e.g.: "Where is it at?" A curious example appears in the writing of Llewellyn: "[I]ts central notice-filing provisions make it cheap and easy for the prospective seller to find out just where he is at." Karl N. Llewellyn, Why We Need the Uniform Commercial Code, 10 U. Fla. L. Rev. 367, 379 (1957). U.S. District Judge William Terrell of Florida reports that, as an editor of the law review in 1957, he tried unsuccessfully to persuade Llewellyn to omit the at. See PREPOSITIONS (A).

-ATABLE does not generally appear other than in -able adjectives derived from two-syllable verbs (e.g., create, vacate), because in those short words the adjective would become unrecognizable. Fowler notes some long exceptions to the general rule (inculcatable, inculpatable, incubatable) and states his standard: "The practice should be to use -atable where the shorter form is felt to be out of the question." (MEU2 41) Other examples with which the shorter form is impracticable are anticipatable, translatable, and infiltratable (so that infiltrable not be thought to be derived from infilter [= to sift or filter in] rather than from infiltrate).

The following words, which occur with some frequency in legal prose, are better formed with -able:

abbreviable	confiscable	manipulable
abdicable	cultivable	mitigable abrogable	delegable	navigable accommodable	delineable	obligable accumulable	demonstrable	obviable activable	detonable	operable administrable	differentiable	originable
adulterable	educable	participable affiliable	expropriable	penetrable aggregable	generable	perpetrable agitable	indicable	perpetuable alienable	inebriable	predicable allocable	inextirpable	propagable annihilable	inextricable	regulable appreciable	infatuable	replicable appropriable	infuriable	repudiable arbitrable	integrable	segregable articulable	invalidable	subjugable calculable	investigable	vindicable communicable	isolable	violable compensable	litigable	vitiable

at all events; in any event. These phrases are perfectly synonymous. The former is more common in BrE, the latter in AmE. Yet at all events does appear infrequently in American texts as well: "At all events, from an early date, if not in Glanville's time, the necessity of a formal delivery of devised land to the executor was got rid of in England as Beseler says that it was on the continent." (Holmes)/ "When the option to purchase is given to Clarkson, it prima facie at all events means to include Clarkson's assigns."

In legal writing these phrases are preferable to in any case when used in the same sense, because in any case contains the confusingly ambiguous word case, q.v., which usually refers to a lawsuit in legal contexts.

at arm's length. See arm's-length.

at bar. See at (the) bar.

at bench. See case at bench.

at circuit. See circuit, to ride.

at common law, a LOAN TRANSLATION of the LAW FRENCH al common ley, is the legal idiom used to introduce statements of common-law doctrine. E.g., "At common law, the death of the injured person or of the tortfeasor, at any time before verdict, abated the action."/ "'At common law,' says Sir W. Erle, 'every person has individually, and the public also have collectively, a right to require that the course of trade be kept free from unreasonable obstruction.'" (Eng.) The preposition at is not used, however, in references to either equity or civil law.

As in the two examples quoted, some writers use the past tense when introducing a statement with the phrase at common law. Others use the present tense. Neither method can be recommended for all cases, but it is possible to formulate a rule: when referring to a rule that is long since defunct, use the past tense; but when referring to a rule that has some continuing validity, use the present tense.

at fault; in fault. An American critic once wrote that "hunting dogs [that] lose the scent are said to be at fault. Hence the phrase means perplexed, puzzled." He added that in fault means "in error, mistaken," with this example: "No certified public accountant should be in fault." Clarence Stratton, Handbook of English 24, 158 (1940). Today, however, in fault is seldom used in that way.

The phrase at fault is now standard in the sense "responsible for a wrong committed; blameworthy." E.g., "Apportionment of the percentages of fault among the parties found to be at fault cannot be accepted." The phrase is virtually never used synonymously with perplexed or puzzled.

at first blush. This phrase, common in legal writing, occurs in BrE as well as in AmE. At first blush is a home-grown equivalent of the LATINISM prima facie, q.v., but the two have distinct uses. Rather than serving as a simple adjective or adverb like prima facie, the phrase at first blush conveys the sense "upon an initial consideration or cursory examination." Blush here carries an otherwise obsolete sense: "a glance, glimpse, blink, or look." E.g., "At first blush, a reading of the rule would countenance joinder of the United States as a defendant along with another defendant in a situation such as is present here."/ "At first blush this punishment does not seem very severe." At first blush is becoming a grossly overworked CLICHÉ. The variant phrase on first blush is not idiomatic. See prima facie.

at hand; in hand. In the U.S., the former has ousted the latter in figurative senses, because in hand is most frequently used literally, as in "I have the contract in hand." One still occasionally sees the figurative in hand, but this is not the current idiom: "When justice in the cause in hand [read at hand] has been attained as near as may be and has been attained on grounds and in a manner prescribed by law, the duty of the judge under the civil law has been performed."/ "In their briefs in connection with Smith's motion, counsel on both sides state that they have been unable to find any case dealing with the specific problem in hand [read at hand]."

In G.B., however, in hand is frequently used in the metaphorical sense: "The court might have reached the same decision on the simple ground that the rule in Clayton's case was irrelevant to the issue in hand." (Eng.) at issue. See issue (A).

attach. See annex.

attachment = (1) the taking into custody of a person to hold that person as security for the payment of a judgment; or (2) the taking into custody of a person's property to secure a judgment or to be sold in satisfaction of a judgment. Sense (1): "[Courts of equity] may order a writ of attachment for the arrest and detention of the body of the contumacious party until obedience to the decree has been secured." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 139 (1916). / Sense (2): "The disputed residence was important because a writ of attachment—briefly, an order freezing cash or other assets—cannot be obtained against a person unless the person has a foreign address." Joseph Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 52–53 (1978). See sequestration.

attain, v.t.; obtain. The two are sometimes confused. Attain = to achieve, accomplish. E.g., "Another's business may be attacked only to attain some purpose in the eye of the law." Obtain = to get, acquire <obtain a license>. It is a FORMAL WORD.

Attain, in another sense, is also a FORMAL WORD for "to reach (an age)". E.g., "In Saunders v. Vautier, the English Chancery Court granted a petition by the sole beneficiary to terminate a trust upon his attaining the age of majority."

attainder; attaint, n. Both nouns derive from the (originally French) verb attaint (= to accuse, convict). As legal terms they are primarily of historical interest. Attainder usually appears in the phrase bill of attainder or act of attainder, and means "the act of extinguishing someone's civil rights by sentencing the person to death or declaring the person to be an outlaw, usu. in punishment for treason or a felony."

Attaint was formerly used to mean "the conviction of a jury for giving a false verdict" (OED). E.g., "An action called 'attaint' could be brought against jurors for giving a false verdict, and if it was successful the verdict would be quashed." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 156 (3d ed. 1990).

attaint; taint. These terms were originally unrelated, but the senses of the former came to be heavily tainted by erroneous association with the latter. Attaint = (1) to subject to attainder, to condemn; (2) to touch or affect; or (3) [obs.] to accuse. Attaint is justified today only in sense (1); taint is otherwise the better word. E.g., "In trials for high treason, or misprision of treason, no one can be indicted, tried, or attainted (unless he pleads guilty) except upon the oath of two lawful witnesses." (Eng.)

Taint = (1) to imbue with a noxious quality or principle; (2) to contaminate or corrupt; or (3) to tinge or become tinged. Taint is by far the more common word in modern writing: "The Court found that the initial illegal entry did not taint the discovery of the evidence subsequently seized under the valid warrant."/ "It is urged that if evidence is inadmissible against one defendant or conspirator, because tainted by electronic surveillance illegal as to him, it is also inadmissible against his codefendant or co-conspirator."

Taint is just as frequently used as a noun: "The practice is not shown to be such as to fix upon complainant the taint of unclean hands."

attempt. A. *Criminal attempt. In criminal law, attempt refers to the crime of intending to commit a crime, along with taking a step to carry out the crime. E.g., "Mallory thereupon pleaded guilty to the crime of attempt to commit burglary of the second degree and was given a short county jail term." People v. Eastman, 154 P.2d 37, 37 (Cal. Ct. App. 1944)./ "In England, indeed, the abortion legislation is worded only in terms of attempt, it being immaterial for the purpose of the offence whether the abortion itself is effected or not." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 180 (1957).

B. And endeavor; assay. See endeavor & assay.

attestant. See attester.

attestation clause; testimonium clause. Both appear at the end of a will. The testimonium clause is signed by the testator, the attestation clause by the witnesses to the will. A typical testimonium clause reads: "This will was signed by me on the 14th day of October, 1985, at Wilmington, Virginia." Testimonium clauses have traditionally begun with the phrase in witness whereof, q.v. See testimonium clause.

The attestation clause recites the formalities required by the jurisdiction in which the will might be admitted to probate. It raises a presumption that the formalities recited have been performed and thus aids the proponent of the will at probate. A typical attestation clause reads: "The foregoing instrument, consisting of four typewritten pages, was signed and declared by the testator to be her last will in the presence of us, who, at her request, and in her presence and the presence of one another, have subscribed our names as witnesses."

attest(at)ive; attestational. Attestative is the best adjective corresponding to attestation; it means "of or relating to attestation." Attestational is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Attestive is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of attesting.

attester; attestor; attestator; attestant. Attester is standard in legal contexts. The others are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

at (the) bar (= now before the court) derives from the LAW FRENCH phrase al barre. At the bar, which appears in early decisions such as Marbury v. Madison and McCulloch v. Maryland, has gradually been displaced in the U.S. by at bar in phrases such as in the case at bar. E.g., "In the case at bar there was no necessity of proving spite or ill will toward the plaintiff."/ "We think that no more was covered than situations substantially similar to those then at bar."

The British still use at the bar, "Until the present argument at the bar it may be doubted whether shipowners or merchants were ever deemed to be bound by law to conform to some imaginary 'normal' standard of freights or prices." (Eng.)

One writer states that at bar is used, esp. in law school, to refer to a case already decided and at the time under discussion by professor and students. Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2088 (1985). This usage is probably peculiar to certain law schools; to those unfamiliar with it, it smacks of the judge-manqué. Cf. at (the) trial. See sub judice.

at the present day is inferior to today—e.g.: "Criminal proceedings at the present day [read today] do not result only in death, imprisonment or fine . . . ." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 192 (3d ed. 1955).

at the present time; at this time; at present. These are inferior to now, nowadays, or today.

at the time that; at the time when. These phrases are invariably verbose for when.

at (the) trial. The shorter form is the more usual and the more idiomatic in AmE. "At the trial [read at trial], a nonsuit was denied." In the U.S. at the trial is outmoded except as an adverbial of place <he was seen at the trial>. Cf. at (the) bar.

In BrE, however, judges still write at the trial: "The practice has been, wherever possible, to adduce at the trial, before pronouncement of decree nisi, evidence of the proposed arrangements for the children." (Eng.)

Still another vanishing idiom is on (or upon) the trial: "On the trial plaintiff was nonsuited."/ "No such evidence was produced upon the trial." Today both phrases would be at trial in American legal writing. See trial, at.

attorn, vb., is pronounced /ə-tərn/. See attornment.

attorney. A. And Its Near Synonyms. Lawyers, like those in other walks of life, have long sought to improve their descriptive titles. Boswell relates: "The Society of Procurators, or Attornies, had obtained a royal charter, in which they had taken care to have their ancient designation Procurators changed into that of Solicitors, from a notion, as they supposed, that it was more genteel." 4 Life of Johnson 128 (1791).

The connotations of attorney and its near synonyms have historically been quite different in BrE and AmE. Originally, attorney denoted a practitioner in common-law courts, solicitor one in equity courts, and proctor one in ecclesiastical courts; all instructed barristers to appear and argue. Attorney, it seems, soon developed an unpleasant smell about it: one commentator writes that the 18th-century efforts "to deodorize the word attorney [were] later abandoned, and in the nineteenth century it was supplanted in England by solicitor. There solicitor lacks the offensive American connotation, as in 'No peddlers or solicitors.' In England, attorney, for a lawyer, survives only as the attorney (the attorney general), while in America the chief respectable lawyer-solicitor is the solicitor-general." David Mellinkoff, The Language of the Law 198 (1963).

The two most common terms in AmE, lawyer and attorney, are not generally distinguished even by members of the profession. In the U.S., attorney, attorney-at-law, and lawyer are generally viewed as synonyms. Today there seems to be a notion afoot, however, that attorney is a more formal (and less disparaging) term than lawyer.

Technically, lawyer is the more general term, referring to one who practices law. Attorney literally means "one who is designated to transact business for another." An attorney, technically and archaically (except in the phrase attorney in fact [see (B) below]), may or may not be a lawyer. Thus Samuel Johnson's statement that attorney "was anciently used for those who did any business for another; now only in law." A Dictionary of the English Language (1755) (s.v. attorney).

From the fact that an attorney is really an agent, Bernstein deduces that "a lawyer is an attorney only when he has a client. It may be that the desire of lawyers to appear to be making a go of their profession has accounted for their leaning toward the designation attorney." Theodore M. Bernstein, The Careful Writer 60 (1965). Yet this distinction between lawyer and attorney is rarely, if ever, observed in practice.

In the U.S., those licensed to practice law are admitted to practice as "attorneys and counselors." (The -l- spelling of counselor is preferred in AmE, the -ll- spelling in BrE. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.) This combination of names is unknown in English law, in which attorney = solicitor, and counsellor = barrister. Yet "in the United States, the term attorney has come to have a generic significance that embraces all branches of legal practice." G.W. Warvelle, Essays in Legal Ethics 53 (1902).

In G.B., a solicitor or attorney does all sorts of legal work for clients but generally appears only in inferior courts; a barrister is a trial lawyer or litigator.

In AmE, counsel and counselor are both, in one sense, general terms meaning "one who gives (legal) advice," the latter being the more formal term. Counsel may refer to but one lawyer <opposing counsel contends> or, as a plural, to more than one lawyer <opposing counsel contend>. See counsel (B) & postman.

B. Kinds of Attorneys (attorney in fact; attorney at law). The former means "one with power of attorney to act for another; legal agent." E.g., "It is held in Tynan v. Paschal that a letter of a decedent to his attorney in fact directing him to destroy his will does not operate ipso facto as a revocation of it." The latter means "a licensed lawyer." The plural forms are attorneys in fact and attorneys at law. See (D).

C. As a Verb. Attorney, like lawyer, has come to be used as a verb. E.g., "Among a number of mock trials that lawyers have liked to write is a Trial of Sir John Falstaff, wherein the Fat Knight is permitted to answer for himself concerning the charges against him, and to attorney his own case." (Eng.) See lawyering.

D. Plural. Attornies is an obsolete plural of the word (see the quotation from Boswell under (A) of this article); attorneys is now the universally accepted plural. Cf. monies, which is inferior to moneys.

attorneydom. See lawyerdom.

attorney general, made plural, forms attorneys general in AmE, attorney-generals in BrE. See PLURALS (E). attorneying. See attorney (C) & lawyer, v.i.

attorney's fees; attorneys' fees; attorney fees; counsel fees. The first of these now appears to be prevalent. See Attorney's Fee Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1988 (1988). The plural possessive attorneys' fees is just as good, and some may even prefer that term in contexts in which there is clearly more than one attorney referred to. Attorney fees is inelegant but increasingly common. It might be considered a means to avoid having to get the apostrophe right. (But cf. the phrase expert-witness fees.) Counsel fees is another, less-than-common variant.

The only form to avoid at all costs is attorneys fees, in which the first word is a genitive adjective with the apostrophe wrongly omitted. This form appears in Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1969 (1985), under "affirmative relief." See POSSESSIVES (E).

attornment has two analogous senses, the first relating to personal property and the second relating to land. It may mean either (1) "an act by a bailee in possession of goods on behalf of one person acknowledging that he will hold the goods on behalf of someone else" (CDL); or (2) "a person's agreement to hold land as the tenant of someone else." Both senses are used in BrE and AmE.

An English court has stated that the attornment clause in mortgages "is entirely obsolete and at the present time performs no useful purpose." Steyning & Littlehampton Bldg. Society v. Wilson, [1951] Ch. 1018, 1020.

attractive nuisance (= a dangerous condition that may attract children onto a property owner's land, thereby causing a risk to their safety) is a seeming OXYMORON. Statements such as the following illustrate the irony of the phrase: "We have no hesitation in affirming the jury's conclusion that the filthy, polluted, weed-choked, garbage plagued drainage canal located near a school . . . constituted an attractive nuisance." Orange County v. Gipson, 539 So. 2d 526, 529 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1989). See nuisance.

at trial. See at (the) trial.

attribute, n.; attribution. Although these terms overlap to a great extent, a distinction might advantageously be observed: attribution = the act or an instance of ascribing a characteristic or quality; attribute = a characteristic or quality so ascribed.

attributive; attributory. The former is the standard term.

at variance. See variance.

at which time is invariably prolix for when.

at will. Employee at will is an ellipsis for employee at [the employer's] will. At will is slowly changing from its position after the noun into a position before the noun it modifies <an at-will employee>. See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES. Cf. tenant at will.

atypical; untypical. The preferred term is atypical.

aught (= [1] anything; [2] all) is an ARCHAISM to be avoided. E.g., "For aught that appears [read For all that appears], the essence of what petitioner seeks either has been revealed to him already through the interrogatories or is readily available to him." Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S.

495, 509 (1947)./ "For aught appearing [read For all that appears], Patel has not sought legal entry." Patel v. Sumani Corp., 660 F. Supp. 1528, 1535 (N.D. Ala. 1987). Cf. naught.

auspices. Under the auspices is frequently misconstrued as meaning "in the form of" or "in accordance with." Actually, it means "with the sponsorship or support of." The term is properly used in this sentence: "The contest was determinable under the auspices of the newspaper company."

Here are examples of the all-too-frequent misusage: "The issue on appeal is the extent to which the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, under the auspices of [read in the form of] a receivership or conservatorship, can preclude judicial review of a state claim."/ "After rendition of the circuit court's opinion and order, plaintiffs filed a motion for new trial with the court of appeals under the auspices of [read under or in accordance with] Fed. R. Civ. P.50(d)." See aegis.

autarchy; autarky. Autarchy = absolute rule or sovereignty, autocracy. Autarky = national economic self-sufficiency; isolationism.

authentication—so spelled -is occasionally misrendered authentification. E.g., "[N]either the statutory authority nor the case law require[s] authentification [read authentication] of signatures." Commonwealth v. Gordon, 633 A.2d 1199, 1204 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1993).

author is becoming standard as a verb, though fastidious writers still avoid it. Generally it is a highfalutin substitute for write, compose, or create. E.g., "Shelley v. Kraemer stands at least for the proposition that, where parties of different races are willing to deal with one another, a state court cannot keep them from doing so by enforcing a privately authored [read created] racial restriction."/ "The orderly administration of an injunctive decree must be carried through by the court that authored [read composed or originated] and is administering that decree."

Nor is attribution to a collective body among the legitimate uses of this word: "Congress adopted an inclusionary approach when it authored [read drafted or framed] this rule." Coauthor has been considered more acceptable as a verb, perhaps because co-write seems deadpan. See NOUNS AS VERBS.

With reference to the author (= I), see FIRST PERSON (B). authoress. See SEXISM (C).

authorial; auctorial. The latter is a stuffy NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former.

autograph. See allograph.

autopsy; postmortem, n. These equivalents are each current in AmE and BrE. Autopsy is slightly more common in AmE, postmortem in BrE.

autopsy, v.t., was not until recently recorded in the dictionaries. It means "to perform a postmortem examination on." E.g., "Their testimony should be rejected as a matter of law because it ignored pathological studies of autopsied tissues of the bronchi and lungs that did not reveal the presence of chromates."

autrefois /oh-tər-foyz/ is a LAW FRENCH term, meaning "on another occasion, formerly," used in the phrases autrefois acquit (= a plea in bar of arraignment that the defendant has been acquitted of the offense by a jury) and autrefois convict (= a plea in bar of arraignment that the defendant has been convicted of the offense by a jury). These phrases are much more common in G.B than in the U.S.

avail, vb., because it is most properly a reflexive verb only <he availed himself of the opportunity>, does not work in the PASSIVE VOICE. E.g., "Congress meant that damages from or by floods should not afford any basis of liability against the United States regardless of whether the sovereign immunity was availed of or not [read whether the government availed itself of sovereign immunity]."/ "Sovereign immunity could not at that time be availed of by them for their participation in such wrongful conduct." Barrett v. U.S., 798 F.2d 565, 574 (2d Cir. 1986). [Read: They could not then avail themselves of sovereign immunity because they had participated in such wrongful conduct.]

The verb is best not used as a nonreflexive transitive or intransitive verb. In each of the following examples, help, profit, or benefit should replace avail: "The defence of fair dealing may avail a defendant who cites passages from the plaintiff's work in order to criticise the underlying doctrine or philosophy." (Eng.)/ "Plaintiff has not brought this action under any of the civil-rights statutes, and it would not have availed him if he had."/ "Plaintiff testified that the contract of employment was for life; even if it were, however,

availment (= the act of availing oneself of something) has scant support in the OED and is omitted from most other English-language dictionaries, but the word is now widely used in American legal writing. E.g., "[T]he employment of the known pure electron discharge above ionization voltages in tubes of the DeForest type was but the availment of those skilled in the art of the store of knowledge that had been accumulated and lay ready at hand . . . ." General Elec. Co. v. DeForest Radio Co., 23 F.2d 698, 707 (D. Del. Cir. 1928)./ "The conditions necessary for availment of this provision are not present in the instant suit." Henderson v. Prudential Ins. Co., 238 F. Supp. 862, 866 (E.D. Mich. 1965)./ "If on remand the plaintiffs amend their pleadings accordingly, they will have established a case on the purposeful availment issue sufficient to resist dismissal on the face of the pleadings." Thompson v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 755 F.2d 1162, 1173 (5th Cir. 1985).

avails, n., (= profits or proceeds esp. from a sale of property) is correctly labeled "archaic" in W3 and in the SOED. Legal writers—fond as they are of ARCHAISMS—still occasionally use it. E.g., "[N]o particular items are selected as representing the avails of the trust fund." George G. Bogert & George T. Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees § 923, at 390 (2d ed. 1982).

Avail, the singular form, is frequently used—e.g.: "The evidence in this regard, to have avail, should be of the most satisfactory kind."/ "We know that the admonition to the children would be wholly impotent and of no avail." Cf. availment.

avenge; revenge. To avenge is to visit fitting retribution upon another, usu. on behalf of a relative, friend, or the like. To revenge is to inflict suffering or harm upon another out of personal resentment. Avenge and vengeance have to do with justice and the legal process, revenge with getting even. Revenge is both intransitive and transitive; avenge is transitive only. Moreover, revenge can act as a noun, whereas avenge cannot.

aver; asseverate. These terms are popular with lawyers as substitutes for say or state. Aver has its place in solemn contexts—it should not be lightly used. Asseverate, an even weightier word, is seldom justified. Both refer to affirmations of fact, usually with no implication that an oath has been taken.

average is a word that assumes a broad sample of subjects. The word does not mix well with each: "Each Houston partner averages ten years of Houston experience." [Read Partners in Houston have an average of ten years' experience.] See each (B).

averageable. So spelled.

averment; averral. Averment is the preferred noun corresponding to aver in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "One plea on which the respondents' case depends is the relevancy of averments." (Eng.)/ "Upon review of a dismissal for failure to state a claim, we must accept all well-pleaded averments as true and view them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." Averral is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

averse. See adverse.

avert (= to turn away, prevent), when used for advert, is a MALAPROPISM if it is not merely a typographical error—e.g.: "Appellee correctly averts [read adverts] to the delineation in Brown Shoe Co. v. U.S., in which the Supreme Court stated that 'the outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use.'" For a correct use of avert, see advert.

avertible; avertable. The -ible form is preferable. See -ABLE (A). aviate; avigate. No distinction was originally intended with the introduction of avigate, although some DIFFERENTIATION in emphasis has emerged. Aviate, a BACK-FORMATION of aviation first used in the late 19th century, means "to operate an aircraft."

Avigate, a PORTMANTEAU WORD formed from aviate and navigate, means "to handle and guide (i.e., navigate) an aircraft in the air"—e.g.: "An occasional statute has made it a misdemeanor to operate a train, navigate a vessel, or avigate an airplane, while in an intoxicated condition." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 999 (3d ed. 1982). W3 records avigation but not avigate; the OED neglects both words.

In the American law of easements, the usual phrase is avigational or avigation easement. E.g., "An avigational easement . . . permits free flights over the land in question." U.S. v. Brondum, 272 F.2d 642, 645 (5th Cir. 1959)./ "We see no reason why an avigation easement may not be acquired by prescription in this state." Drennen v. County of Ventura, 112 Cal. Rptr. 907, 909 n. 2 (Cal. Ct. App. 1974)./ "[O]verflights of aircraft flying into and out of the airport had occurred with such avocation; vocation. These words are almost opposites, although many writers misuse avocation for vocation. The former means "hobby," whereas the latter means "a calling or profession." Here is the common mistake: "We defer to the opinions of our legal advisers, physicians, tradesmen, and artisans in all matters relating to their respective avocations." Did the writer of that sentence have in mind golf, gardening, and numismatics?

avoid, void, v.t.; avoidance, voidance. In legal writing these verb and noun pairs are perfectly synonymous. Avoid, in law, often means "to make void or to cancel," although in the language of nonlawyers it invariably means "to refrain from" or "to escape or evade." Here is an example of avoid in the old-fashioned legal sense: "We are next to consider, how a deed may be avoided, or rendered of no effect." (Blackstone)/ "Strictly, the word 'voidable' means valid until avoided." Void can act as noun, verb, or adjective. The noun voidance denotes "the act of voiding."

The legal senses of avoid and avoidance invariably confuse nonlawyers, who are accustomed to the ordinary meanings of these words. It might therefore be advisable to prefer void and voidance. E.g., "If the wife has inchoate dower in land transferred in living trust and does not release her dower, her dower claim is not avoided [read voided]." / "The Wills Act of 1837 added a provision avoiding [read voiding] the interest of a party whose spouse was a witness, but went on to declare that no will should fail because the witnesses thereto were incompetent." The archaic sense of avoid is ensconced in a number of statutes—e.g.: "[T]he trustee may avoid any transfer of an interest of the debtor in property." 11 U.S.C. § 547(b) (1988).

Here the popular meaning of avoid appears in a legal context in such a way that a lawyer might at first wonder whether the legal meaning was intended: "The affidavit contains nothing more than a recital of unsupported allegations, conclusory in nature; as such, it is insufficient to avoid summary judgment."

In its lay sense "to evade or escape," avoid is sometimes misused for prevent or circumvent: "Wide public participation avoids [read prevents] the problem of unfairness."

avoidance. See confession and avoidance.

avowal; avowry, avowtry. The noun corresponding to avow in its common meaning ("to declare openly") is avowal. Its sibling, avowry, serves as the noun form corresponding to the specialized common-law meaning of avow ("to acknowledge, in an answer, that one has taken something, and to justify the act"). Avowry is the equivalent in actions of replevin to the general common-law doctrine of confession and avoidance. E.g., "The reply of a plaintiff to an avowry by a defendant in a replevin action might take one of several forms." F.A. Enever, History of the Law of Distress 199 (1931). Avowtry is an obsolete synonym of adultery.

avulsion. Lawyers may run across the medical as well as the legal use of this word; hence it may be useful to understand the common thread in meaning. Generally, avulsion denotes the action of pulling off, plucking out, or tearing away; forcible separation (OED).

In land law, avulsion refers to the sudden removal of land, by change in a river's course or by the action of flood, to another person's estate; in which event, contrary to the rule of alluvion (q.v.) or gradual accretion of soil, it remains the property of the original owner (OED). Medically, however, the term has come to denote "a tearing away of a structure or part accidentally or surgically" (W3) <avulsion of the diseased limb>.

await; wait. Await is always transitive (i.e., it takes a direct object), and wait is always intransitive. One awaits something, but one waits for or on something. If no object is supplied, wait is the proper term: "Then she brought the dishes in to where the family awaited [read waited], sitting at the low table."

awake(n). See wake.

award over is verbose for award. E.g., "What is at stake, as far as the charity is concerned, is the cost of reasonable protection and the amount of the insurance premium, not the awarding over [read awarding] of its entire assets in damages." See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY & over (A).

aw(e)less. The spelling with the -e- is standard.

awful originally meant "inspiring or filled with awe." E.g., "No tribunal can approach such a question without a deep sense of its importance, and of the awful responsibility involved in its decision." McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 400 (1819) (per Marshall, C.J.). Its meaning has now degenerated to "horrible, terrible."

awhile; a while. Generally, one should use this term adverbially, without the preposition, and spell it as one word <he rested awhile>. Whenever the term is introduced by a preposition, however, it should be spelled as two words <he rested for a while>.

axiom = an established principle that is universally accepted within a given framework of reasoning or thinking. The term should not be used of propositions argued for by advocates; if the issue is the subject of controversy, it is not an axiom, unless the question is the applicability of an axiom to a given situation.

baby, splitting the. See splitting the baby.

backadation. See backwardation.

backberend; backberand; backverinde; backbearing. This Anglo-Saxon term means "having stolen goods in one's possession when apprehended" and refers to a person carrying off stolen property (lit., "bearing it on one's back"). Now confined to historical contexts, the word is most often spelled backberend. The other forms are variants.

Some writers prefer backbearing (often hyphenated in BrE) because it is the most modern form—e.g.: "The first dealt with the criminal taken in the act, and for him there was short shrift. Many local custumals relate the various deaths assigned to the hand-having and back-bearing thief." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 427 (5th ed. 1956).

Back-Formations, or clippings, are words formed by removing an affix from longer words that are mistakenly assumed to be derivatives. This process occurs most commonly when a -tion noun is erroneously shortened to make a verb ending in -te—e.g., from emotion comes emote.

Such back-formations are objectionable when they stand merely as NEEDLESS VARIANTS of already extant verbs:

Back-Formation	Usual Word
accreditate	accreditation administrate	administer asportate	asport
cohabitate	cohabit
delimitate	delimit
evolute	evolve
indemnificate	indemnify interpretate	interpret
orientate	orient
registrate	register
remediate	remedy
solicitate	solicit
subornate	suborn

Sculpt, arguably a NEEDLESS VARIANT of sculpture, v.t., is now actually the more common verb.

Many back-formations never gain real legitimacy (e.g., enthuse), some are aborted early in their existence (e.g., ebullit, frivol), and still others are of questionable vigor (e.g., aggress, attrit, effulge, elocute, evanesce). Burgle, q.v., (back-formed from burglar) continues to have a jocular effect (in AmE), as do effuse, emote, and laze. Three 20th-century back-formed words, choate, liaise, and surveil, have come to be used with some frequency in legal contexts.

Many examples have survived respectably, among them diagnose, donate, orate, resurrect, and spectate. Enthuse may one day be among these respectable words, although it has not gained approval since it first appeared in the early 19th century. But many have become accepted as legitimate because they have filled gaps in the language and won acceptance through their usefulness. The best rule of thumb is to avoid newborn back-formations that appear newfangled, but not, like a prig, to eschew common back-formations that are useful. Only philologists today recognize as back-formations beg (from beggar), jell (from jelly), peddle (from peddler), rove (from rover), and type (from typewriter).

For specific discussions of legal examples, see asport(ate), novate, registrate, remediate, solicitate, subinfeudate & subornate.

back of; in back of. These Americanisms strike a more casual tone than their equivalent behind, the word that good editors tend to substitute. E.g., "An original writ was an order issuing from the Chancery, 'as a matter of course.' . . . Back of [read Behind] the writ lay the authority of the king." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 30 (1963).] "The notion back of [read behind] these quotations is essentially the same as that of the familiar saying, 'The king can do no wrong.'" Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 24 (1968).

backpay is commonly spelled as one word in AmE. The British tend to spell it as two words.

backverinde. See backberend.

backwardation; backadation. Leff defines this term (having two forms) as, "in stock market parlance, a fee paid by a seller for the privilege of delaying the delivery of securities past their normal delivery date," and puts his main entry under backadation. See Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 2113 (1985). Most dictionaries, however, spell the term backwardation. Fowler included the term in his "ill-favored list" of HYBRID derivatives (MEU2 at 253), but it has become standard.

bad, in law, may mean "not valid"—e.g.: "As though thumbing their noses at a starving woman while self-righteously wrapping themselves in the flag, the Four Horsemen [q.v.] and Roberts held the law bad." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 241 (1955). The OED attests this legal usage from the late 19th century.

bad-man theory. "But if we take the view of our friend, the bad man, we shall find that he does not care two straws for the axioms or deductions, but that he does want to know what the Massachusetts or English courts are likely to do in fact. I am much of his mind. The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact, and nothing more pretentious, are what I mean by the law." Oliver Wendell Holmes, "The Path of the Law," in Collected Legal Papers 172–73 (1920; repr. 1952). This famous passage gave a substantial impetus to the realist movement among legal theorists—that one must study the actual behavior of courts and lawyers as well as, or even instead of, theorizing about ultimate sources of law and deductions from those sources. In fact, Holmes did not hold this iconoclastic view but wished to point to the fact that, for the parties, what matters about law is what happens, what the court decides or orders.

The passage gave rise to what theorists now customarily call the bad-man theory of law. Karl Llewellyn took the idea a step beyond Holmes's formulation: "[T]he people who have the doing in charge, whether they be judges or sheriffs or clerks or jailers or lawyers, are officials of the law. What these officials do about disputes is, to my mind, the law itself." Karl N. Llewellyn, The Bramble Bush 3 (1930; repr. 1981) (emphasis in orig.).

Later writers repeated the name often enough that it has become a basic idea in modern law, especially as framed originally by Holmes—e.g.: "Holmes returned to this idea (which he sometimes referred to as his 'bad man' theory of law) over and over throughout his career." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 126–27 n.124 (1974).

bail is a CHAMELEON-HUED legal term. As a noun, it means (1) "the person who acts as a surety for a debt"; (2) "the security or guaranty agreed upon"; or (3) "release on surety of a person in custody." In sense (3), modern idiom requires release on bail, although formerly in bail was not uncommon—e.g.: "Mr. Bartletta was then taken before the recorder and released in bail to await the act of the grand jury."

As a verb, bail means (1) "to set (a person) free for security on the person's own recognizance for appearance on another day" <the prisoner was not bailed but committed>; (2) "to become a surety for"; (3) "to guarantee"; or (4) to place (personal property) in someone else's charge.

bailable (= admitting of or entitled to bail) may refer either to persons or to offenses. E.g., "Furthermore, the record shows that Dovalina's attempted murder charge was not bailable." (One might as naturally have written that Dovalina himself was not bailable, because he had been charged with attempted murder.)/ "Even if Congress is free to define nonbailable offenses, certainly the allowable justifications are limited and cannot include punishing a defendant before the final determination of his guilt." See -ABLE.

bailee; bailie. Bailee = one to whom personal property is delivered (or bailed) without any change in ownership. E.g., "At common law a bailee (i.e., a person to whom the possession of goods is entrusted by the owner) who acted dishonestly had some immunity, since he was considered to be in lawful possession of the goods." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 244 (2d ed. 1979).

Bailie is a term for a Scottish magistrate; it is also a dialectal variant of bailiff, q.v. See also bailment.

bailer. See bailor.

bailie. See bailee.

bailiery; bailiary. The former is the preferred form of this word, meaning "the jurisdiction of a bailie."

bailiff, n., = (1) in England, a sheriff's officer employed to serve writs, make arrests, and execute process (see bumbailiff); (2) in the U.S., a court officer who keeps order with the parties, attorneys, and jurors during court proceedings.

bailiff, v.i. Primarily in law-school mock trials and moot court, the age-old noun bailiff has come to be used as a verb meaning "to act as bailiff." That being so, the newfangled verb will perforce soon infiltrate the speech of the profession. It is an American casualism that should not appear in serious contexts. See NOUNS AS VERBS bailiwick; sheriffwick; sheriffdom. Bailiwick = the office, jurisdiction, or district of a bailiff. Figuratively, it has become synonymous with domain. Sheriffwick = the office, jurisdiction, or district of a sheriff.

Because in one sense bailiff and sheriff are synonymous, the derivatives in -wick (lit. "village") have become synonyms. Bailiwick is the more common of the two: "A bailiff was popularly referred to as a 'bailie,' and before long a bailie's wick [i.e., village] was expressed as his 'bailiwick.' And in time this word came to be used to indicate the special territory over which a peace officer exercises his authority as such." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 1096 (3d ed. 1982). Bailiffry is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, and bailivia is an obsolete variant, of bailiwick.

In the sense "the office of the sheriff," sheriffwick is less common than sheriffdom, which was originally a Scotticism. E.g., "The history of the sheriffdom is one of the most important departments of the constitutional history of England." Grifenhagen v. Ordway, 113 N.E. 516, 517 (N.Y. 1916). See sheriffalty.

bail jump, n., = the act of defaulting on [i.e., "jumping"] one's bail. Though seemingly slang, state and federal courts in the U.S. regularly use the term—e.g.: "[T]he presiding judge made the following statement: . . . 'I intend to hold Mr. Lupo for the Grand Jury on the felony bail jump in that the warrant has been outstanding since 1970 . . . .'" People v. Lupo, 345 N.Y.S.2d 348, 350 (N.Y. City Crim. Ct. 1973)./ "McLennan timely moved to dismiss the indictment prior to trial arguing that it was fatally defective because it did not specifically allege that Chagra's bail jump, to which McLennan was allegedly an accessory, was willful." U.S. v. McLennan, 672 F.2d 239, 242 (1st Cir. 1982)

Whereas a specific instance is referred to as a bail jump (or sometimes bail-jump), the crime itself is known as bail-jumping (an older phrase)—e.g.: "On February 10, 1938, a short affidavit was filed in the Magistrates' Court charging the defendant with the crime of bail jumping." People v. Davis, 5 N.Y.S.2d 411, 412 (N.Y. Gen. Sess. 1938). Often the expression serves as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—e.g.: "It appears that he was not convicted on the bail-jumping charge but did plead guilty to a different misdemeanor charge . . . ." People ex rel. Lobell v. McDonnell, 71 N.E.2d 423, 425 (N.Y. App. Div. 1947). See jump bail.

bailment = (1) a delivery of personal property by a person (a bailor) to another (a bailee) who holds it under an express or implied-in-fact contract; (2) the personal property delivered to a bailee; (3) the action of posting bail for a criminal defendant; or (4) the record of one's posting bail for a criminal defendant. The definitions appear in order of decreasing frequency. Sense (1) is by far the most common—e.g.: "Another kind of situation [that] has traditionally been treated as contractual . . . is the relationship created by what is known as a gratuitous bailment, i.e., a transaction in which goods are loaned to, or deposited with, another party without payment." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 120–21 (3d ed. 1981).

bailor; bailer; bailee; bail bondsman. Bailor and -er are not at all clearly distinguished in actual legal usage, although they might easily and usefully be given clear DIFFERENTIATION. Bailor and bailee (i.e., the persons on the giving and receiving ends of a bailment [sense (1)]) are correlative personal nouns. E.g., "No bailee is permitted to deny that the bailor by whom any goods were entrusted to him was entitled to those goods at the time when they were so entrusted." (Eng.) See bailee & -ER (A).

Bailer (or bail bondsman) should be reserved for the sense "one who attaches bail (the surety in criminal law)." Nevertheless, the spelling bailor is often used in that sense, and bailer appears occasionally in civil contexts. Given the inevitable objections to bail bondsman on grounds of SEXISM, we ought to encourage wider use of bailer in this sense.

balance of probability; beyond a reasonable doubt. These phrases express two different burdens of proof. In a civil trial, once both sides have presented evidence, the jury is instructed to find for the party that, on the whole, has the stronger case, i.e., the party whose evidence tips the balance of probability—however slight the edge may be. But in a criminal trial, the proof necessary for a conviction must be beyond a reasonable doubt, because of the presumption of innocence. See burden of proof & preponderance of the evidence.

ballot. See vote.

banc. See en banc (A).

bandit has two plural forms, bandits and banditti. The native English form (bandits) is preferred. See PLURALS (A).

banish, v.t., generally takes the preposition from <he was banished from the country>. Krapp cites the use "The king banishes you his presence," with two objects, but this use is archaic. George Philip Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 68 (1927).

banknote is one word in both AmE and BrE.

bankrupt, adj.; bankrout. The latter is an obsolete form of the word. In the English Renaissance, scholars respelled French borrowings such as bankrout on the Latin model, hence bankrupt. Many of these respellings did not survive (e.g., accompt for account); bankrupt is one of the few that did. See comptroller.

bankrupt, n. Although in popular speech and writing it is common to refer to a bankrupt—a usage dating from at least the early 16th century—most modern bankruptcy statutes use the term debtor instead. Thus, one treatise states: "Nobody is a bankrupt. There is no such person under the Bankruptcy Code." David G. Epstein et al., Bankruptcy 6 (1993).

bankruptcy [fr. L. bancus "table" + ruptus "broken"] = (1) the fact of being financially unable to pursue one's business and meet one's engagements, esp. of being unable to pay one's debts; (2) the fact of having declared bankruptcy under a bankruptcy statute; or (3) the field of law dealing with those who are unable or unwilling to pay their debts. See insolvency.

Bankruptcy is often misspelled bankruptsy.

Bankruptcy Act; Bankruptcy Code. In the U.S., the phrase Bankruptcy Act refers to the Bankruptcy Act of 1898; it governed bankruptcy cases filed before 1 October 1979. The phrase Bankruptcy Code refers to the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 (frequently amended since then), which governs all cases filed since 1 October 1979.

bankrupt(cy) law. The normal idiom today is bankruptcy law(s), although bankrupt law was once fairly common—e.g.: "Under the bankrupt law [read, in more modern terms, bankruptcy law] the defendant had the same right to prove up the note for payment in the bankruptcy proceedings that the plaintiffs had, and . . . they were under no obligation to go into the bankrupt court [read, in more modern terms, bankruptcy court] and prove the claim for the benefit of the surety." Levy v. Wagner, 69 S.W. 112, 114 (Tex. Civ. App. 1902).

bankruptee, n., is an unnecessary NEOLOGISM equivalent to the well-established noun bankrupt (= one that has declared bankruptcy). E.g., "[A] judge sets a payback plan on the unsecured debt [that] he thinks the bankruptee [read bankrupt] can meet in good faith." Lisa J. McCue, Bankruptcy Changes Called Possible, Am. Banker, 29 Jan. 1981, at 3./ "The second method allows bankruptees [read bankrupts] to propose to the court a 'good faith' repayment program . . . ." Phil Battey, Bankruptcy Reform Drive Hits Lawmakers at Home, Am. Banker, 31 Aug. 1981, at 1./ "For legal purposes, the family homestead can include up to 200 acres (100 for a single adult) of real property that aren't located within city, town, or village limits, and/or one acre of land, plus any temporary residence if the bankruptee [read bankrupt] has not acquired another home." Shropshire, The Nouveau Broke, D Magazine, Nov. 1986, at 89 (inset). See bankrupt, n.

bar, n. In the U.S., all lawyers are members of a bar, whether they are litigators or office practitioners. In G.B., only barristers (in Eng.) and advocates (in Scot.), as opposed to solicitors, make up the Bar (the word is customarily capitalized in BrE). See called to the bar & attorney (A).

Unified bar and integrated bar are interchangeable terms referring to bar associations in which membership is a statutory requisite for the practice of law in a given geographic area.

For the sense of relating to a defendant's judgment on the merits, see merger (B).

bar; debar; disbar. The first two have closely related meanings. Bar means "to prevent (often by legal obstacle)." E.g., "The English Statute of Westminster II barred dower of a wife who deserted her husband and committed adultery; and some states have statutes barring an elective share on a similar principle."/ "The court concluded that these warranty disclaimers did not necessarily bar a breach of contract claim."/ "Legislative immunity does not, of course, bar all judicial review of legislative acts." Bar serves also as a noun .

Debar, a somewhat archaic FORMAL WORD, means "to preclude from having or doing." E.g., "It would require very persuasive circumstances enveloping congressional silence to debar this Court from re-examining its own doctrines."/ "There is no reason why the plaintiff should be confined to his action on the special agreement, and be debarred his remedy on the assumpsit implied by law." (Eng.) Disbar means "to expel from the legal profession." The corresponding nouns are debarment and disbarment.

bargain, n.; agreement; contract. Williston sorted these terms out with admirable clarity: "A bargain is an agreement of two or more persons to exchange promises, or to exchange a promise for a performance. Thus defined, bargain is at once narrower than agreement in that it is not applicable to all agreements, and broader than contract, since it includes a promise given in exchange for an insufficient consideration. It also covers transactions [that] the law refuses to recognize as contracts because of illegality." 1 Samuel Williston & W.H.E. Jaeger, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 2A, at 7 (3d ed. 1957).

bargain, v.t. In law, an otherwise obsolete sense persists: "to agree to buy and sell; to contract for." See grant, bargain, sell, and convey.

bargained-for exchange. This phrase is sometimes erroneously rendered bargain for exchange. Here variations of it are correctly used: "The doing of the act constitutes acceptance, the bargained-for consideration, and the offeree's performance."/ "If the termination of obligations were an immediate bargained-for right of consequence, he would presumably have taken advantage of his freedom from testamentary obligation to make a new will."

The origin of the phrase bargained-for exchange may be seen from this sentence: "Consideration is something bargained for and given in exchange."

bargainee (= the purchaser in a bargained-for exchange) is more obscure than purchaser, but the word is perhaps a useful correlative of bargainor. E.g., "The Statute itself operated to vest the seisin of the bargainor in the bargainee." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 183 (2d ed. 1988). See -EE & bargainer.

bargainer; bargainor. Though one might suspect that the two forms are synonymous, they are not. Bargainer means "one who bargains." Bargainor has a more specific legal meaning: "the seller in a bargained-for exchange." See bargainee.

bargee. Though illogically formed with the -ee suffix, the established form bargee (17th c.) is a variant of bargeman (14th c.), without the infelicity of SEXISM. E.g., "The story of the Elmhurst's bargee was that off Bedloe's Island a third tug of the railroad . . . came alongside, struck the barge a heavy blow on her port quarter, nearly capsizing her, driving her forward against the barge ahead, and breaking some planks forward." Sinram v. Pennsylvania R.R., 61 F.2d 767, 768 (2d Cir. 1932) (per L. Hand, J.). See -EE (A).

barratrous is the adjective corresponding to the noun barratry (q.v.)—e.g.: "The statute is clear that barratrous conduct is to be treated as a criminal offense." Galinski v. Kessler, 480 N.E.2d 1176, 1179 (Ill. App. Ct. 1985)./ "They simply state that the Master sailed away with the cargo and conclude that this conduct was barratrous." Tradewinds Marketing, Inc. v. General Accident Ins. Co., 665 F. Supp. 104, 105 (D.P.R. 1987).

barratry; simony. Why these terms are sometimes confused is not at all apparent. Barratry = (1) in criminal law, vexatious persistence in, or incitement to, litigation; (2) in admiralty, (of a master or crew) fraudulent or grossly negligent conduct that is prejudicial to a shipowner; (3) in older Eng. and Scots law, the act of going abroad to purchase a benefice from Rome; or (4) in Scots law, the accepting of a bribe by a judge. The adjective is barratrous (q.v.) and the agent noun barrator.

Simony = the purchase or sale of an ecclesiastical promotion. The adjective is simoniac(al), the agent noun either simonist or simoniac.

barrister = a specialist consultant and pleader belonging to a class of lawyers that is given predominant (formerly exclusive) rights of audience in superior courts. Ordinarily, the word applies to an English or Northern Irish pleader (the Scottish counterpart being an advocate). When used in reference to an American lawyer, the word smacks of highfalutin journalese—e.g.: "The prestige and importance of the federal circuit bench [in the U.S.] attracts high-caliber barristers [read lawyers]." Donald D. Jackson, Judges 312 (1974). See attorney (A), counsel (A), Queen's Counsel & solicitor.

barristerial = of or pertaining to a barrister; lawyerly. The term is, naturally, more common in BrE than in AmE, but it appears in the latter as well—e.g.: "Since the 12(e) motion is prone for implementation of barristerial shadow boxing, its exercise should be cast in the mold of strictest necessity." Lincoln Labs. v. Savage Labs., 26 F.R.D. 141, 142 (D. Del. 1960)./ "Having taken this position, plaintiffs, in the exercise of commendable barristerial caution, have nevertheless submitted documents indicating that . . . Dr. Newman directed the formation of a university-wide Salary Review Committee . . . ." Chang v. University of Rhode Island, 554 F. Supp. 1203, 1205 (D.R.I. 1983).

basis. A. For reason. Basis is sometimes used unidiomatically for reason—e.g.: "The court, after a full review of the authorities, concluded that there was now no sound basis [read reason] why the value of life insurance coverage, as well as the cash surrender value, might not be considered in a property division between parties to a divorce action." Basis is properly followed by for <the basis for the decision>. Reason, by contrast, fits with either for <the reason for the decision> or why (as in the example quoted above). Writers who use basis why are probably driven to it by the SUPERSTITION that reason why is an error. See reason why.

B. On a . . . basis. This long-winded phrase often ousts a simpler, more legitimate adverb—e.g.:

- "The commission was set up on a provisional basis [read provisionally]."
- "Those issues must be determined on a case-by-case basis [read determined case by case]."
- "The attorney represented his clients on a contingent-fee basis [read for a contingent fee]."
- "In Usery v. Brandel, nine migrant farm laborers working on a sharecropper basis [read as sharecroppers] sought to intervene in a suit brought by the Secretary of Labor to enforce the . . . Fair Labor Standards Act."

See FLOTSAM PHRASES.

C. Plural Form. The plural of basis, as well as base, is bases; the pronunciations differ, however: for basis, the plural is pronounced /bay-seez/, for base /bays-ez/.

bastard, a term of abuse generally, is still used neutrally in the law, in either of two senses: (1) "a child born out of wedlock"; or (2) "a child born to a married woman whose husband, for some provable reason, could not possibly be the father." Sense (1) has always been more common—e.g.: "Although a bastard cannot inherit from his parents or other ancestors at common law, statutes or judicial decisions permit a bastard to inherit from his mother and the mother to inherit from her bastard."

Today, however, the law's technical neutrality is not without comic overtones. See adulterine bastard, illegitimate child, natural child & EUPHEMISMS bastardy = (1) the condition of a bastard; illegitimate birth; or (2) the begetting of bastards; fornication (OED). Today in sense (1), illegitimacy is the more usual term, and the preferable one for avoiding unduly derogatory connotations. Sense (2) is not common.

bathos; pathos. These two words sometimes cause confusion. Bathos means "a sudden descent from the exalted to the trite, or from the sublime to the ridiculous." Pathos means "sympathetic pity" and is useful, e.g., in reference to juries.

battery. To nonlawyers, battery connotes physical violence. The legal meaning, however, is "the intentional or negligent application of physical force to, or the offensive contact with, someone without consent." Thus, offensive contact is enough—for example, an unwelcome kiss or caress. E.g., "[T]he battery here was a technical one, and was accompanied by neither physical injury nor violence. It was a mere touching of the person of the plaintiff, a mere incident of the restraint, the false imprisonment." Fisher v. Rumler, 214 N.W. 310, 311 (Mich. 1927). As a tort, battery is a civil wrong giving rise to a cause of action for damages; as a crime, it is a social harm punished by the state. See assault.

bawdy house; house of ill fame; disorderly house. These phrases are three of the EUPHEMISMS by which lawyers have traditionally referred to a brothel or house of prostitution. The quaint phrase disorderly house is the broadest of the three, denoting a house where people carry on activities that constitute a nuisance to the neighborhood; these activities might include gambling and drug-dealing as well as prostitution.

beak is a BrE slang term for a magistrate or justice of the peace. E.g., "In the cities a lone example was set by Henry Fielding (1707–54), the novelist, sitting at Bow Street as the self-styled 'principal Westminster magistrate,' and his brother and successor, Sir John Fielding, 'the Blink Beak.' Unpaid, like other magistrates, they spurned the bribes . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 270–71 (1966). The OED quotes many examples from the 16th to the 19th century, including one from Dickens's Oliver Twist (1837–1838), and notes that the precise etymology is unknown bear the relation. See relation (B).

because. A. Punctuation with. Generally, the word because should not follow a comma. E.g., "This court should remand the case, because the defendants have created federal jurisdiction pretextually." (Delete the comma after case.)

B. Causing Ambiguity After a Negative. When a causal phrase follows a negative, the resulting expression is usually ambiguous—though sometimes only technically so. E.g., "A proposition is not false because it is a truism darkly expressed." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 109 (1945).

In fact, putting a purpose clause or phrase after a negative often causes ambiguities, attested by a priest's unintentionally humorous statement: "I wear no clothes to distinguish myself from the congregation."

C. Coupled with reason. Because creates a REDUNDANCY when used as a conjunction after reason. E.g., "Clearly, one reason why this argument no longer appeals is because [read that] it rests upon an élitist assumption . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 93 (1983). (On still another question raised by that sentence, see reason why.)

In the following sentence, the construction is inverted: "Because [read That] the lessor accepted the first payment is no reason to conclude that the corporation existed by estoppel." See reason . . . is because.

D. Beginning Sentences with. An odd superstition holds that beginning a sentence with because is a mistake. There is nothing to it. See SUPERSTITIONS (F)

E. Wordy Substitutes for. Because is often needlessly replaced by verbose phrases such as for the reason that, due to the fact that, on the ground that, and the like. E.g., "It is still thought that many magistrates are too disinclined to reject police evidence, however implausible, perhaps for the reason that [read because] they feel the police should always be supported as a matter of principle." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 26 (1983).

F. As a Causal Word Generally. See as (A).

before for by. Cases come before courts and are then reviewed by those courts. But some writers mar these idioms—e.g.: "We note that such a determination is a matter placed within the sound discretion of the district judge, and review before [read by] us is very limited." Cf. anterior to. See previously.

before-mentioned. See above-mentioned & aforesaid.

beg is occasionally used in dissenting opinions in the phrases beg to differ and beg to advise. These are ARCHAISMS to be eschewed.

For the phrase beg the question, see begging the question.

begat; begot. See BIBLICAL AFFECTATION.

beget is today used only figuratively. E.g., "The services and gifts must have been rendered with a frequency that begets an anticipation of their continuance." In its literal sense, beget is an ARCHAISM. E.g., "When proof has been given of the non-access of the husband at any time when his wife's child could have been begotten, the wife may give evidence as to the person by whom it was begotten " (Eng.) The more usual term today is to conceive or to father.

begging the question does not mean "evading the issue" or "inviting the obvious questions," as some mistakenly believe. The proper meaning of begging the question is "basing a conclusion on an assumption that is as much in need of proof or demonstration as the conclusion itself." The formal name for this logical fallacy is petitio principii. Following are two classic examples: "Reasonable men are those who think and reason intelligently." Patterson v. Nutter, 7 A. 273, 275 (Me. 1886). (This statement begs the question, "What does it mean to think and reason intelligently?")/ "Life begins at conception! [Fn.: 'Conception is defined as the beginning of life.']" Davis v. Davis, unreported opinion (Cir. Tenn. Eq. 1989). (The "proof"—or the definition—is circular.)

In the following sentence, the writer mangled the SET PHRASE to beg the question and misapprehended its meaning (by using begs for ignores): "Blaming Congress and the Democrats for 'criminalizing of policy differences with the executive branch' begs a much larger issue here: Should members of the executive branch be allowed to withhold vital information from those members of Congress charged by law to monitor specific actions of the president?" Letter of John M. Burns, Wall St. J., 16 May 1990, at A17.

begin. A. *To begin. As an introductory phrase used to enumerate reasons, the idiomatic phrase is to begin with, not to begin. In the following sentence, the lack of the preposition with makes to begin sound narrowly chronological, as if A actually began something and then, at some indeterminate point, stopped: "To begin [add with], A played a substantial role in negotiating both agreements."/ "To begin [add with], it was clear that Dixon suffered a permanent injury and that he died of an unrelated disease."

B. And commence & start. Begin is the usual word, to be preferred nine times out of ten. Commence is a FORMAL WORD; ceremonies and exercises are likely to commence, as are legal proceedings. Start is usually used of physical movement <to start running>. Both begin and start—but not commence—may be followed by an infinitive. See commence.

behalf. A distinction exists between the phrases in behalf of and on behalf of. The former means "in the interest or in defense of" <he fought in behalf of a just man's reputation>; the latter, on behalf of, means "as the agent of, as representative of" <on behalf of the corporation, I would like to thank . . . > <she appeared on behalf of her client>.

Upon behalf of is now considered much inferior to on behalf of. "We conclude that the public interest involved in this dispute compels us to look beyond the immediate interests of the named litigants and to consider the situation of the natural gas consumers upon [read on] whose behalf the Mississippi Power Service Commission has intervened." See upon.

behavior(al)ism. The correct name for the doctrine that human behavior provides the only significant psychological data is behaviorism.

behest is a stronger word than request; it means (1) "a command," or (2) "a strong urging." Bequest is sometimes misused for behest, as here: "It is enough that a writing defamatory in content has been read and understood at the bequest [read behest] of the defamer."/ "At his bequest [read behest], I undertook this onerous task, but have been thankful to him for so urging me." See MALAPROPISMS.

behoof is the noun, behoove (AmE) or behove (BrE) the verb. Both noun and verb have an archaic flavor. Historically, the verb in BrE was pronounced, as it now is in AmE, to rhyme with move and prove. In BrE today "it is generally made to rime with rove, grove, by those who know it only in books" (OED).

belabor; labor, v.t., (= to beat severely). Modern dictionaries suggest that in practice the words are interchangeable. Historically, however, in the best usage belabor is not to be used figuratively in phrases such as to belabor an argument; the preferred expression is to labor an argument—e.g.: "I need not labor the point that the four elements of the positivist creed just outlined are interdependent . . . ." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 193 (rev. ed. 1969).

The popular grammarian Edwin Newman has chided a justice of the U.S. Supreme Court for writing "to say more would belabor the obvious," stating: "To belabor the obvious is to hit it, which hardly seems judicial conduct." Edwin Newman, Foreword to Morton S. Freeman, A Treasury for Word Lovers viii (1983). Examples of this usage are legion—e.g.: "Without belaboring [read laboring] the point, we observe that the separation agreement in this case will be at least partly performed in Texas because the payor resides in that state."/ "Brawner conceded his right against Pendarvis without undue belaboring [read laboring]."

belated has made its way into legal language as a synonym of untimely. E.g., "We must decline to entertain appellant's belated cross-points." Its use in this context is perfectly acceptable.

belie = (1) to disguise, give a false idea of; (2) to leave unfulfilled; or (3) to contradict or prove the falsity of. Sense (3) is by far the most common in legal contexts. E.g., "The Court suggests that the search for valuables in the closed glove compartment might be justified as a measure to protect the police against lost property claims; again, this suggestion is belied [i.e., contradicted] by the record."/ "Appellant contends that his lawyer's failure to put on evidence at the penalty stage prejudiced his ability to avoid the death sentence; but the nature of the evidence appellant asserts his attorney should have presented belies [i.e., proves the falsity of] the argument." See vitiate.

belief. Lawyers frequently speak of a genuine belief, a bona fide belief, or an honest belief. In fact, all such phrases are REDUNDANCIES, since it is quite impossible to believe something ungenuinely, in bad faith, or dishonestly.

belligerence; belligerency. Belligerence refers to a person's truculent attitude. Belligerency has traditionally, in international law, been the preferred term in referring to the status of a state that is at war—e.g.: "[O]ther states are within their rights in declaring themselves neutral in the struggle, and since there can be no neutrals unless there are two belligerents, such a declaration is equivalent to a recognition of the belligerency of both parties." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 134 (5th ed. 1955).

bellwether (= one who takes the lead or initiative; a trendsetter) is sometimes mistakenly written bellweather—e.g.: "The sheriff conducted me to one of the two vacant jury rooms, then the jury, bell-weathered [read bellwethered] by Callahan, the court officer, filed out and retired into the other directly opposite." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 226 (1943). (The verbal use illustrated in the quoted sentence is unusual—see NOUNS AS VERBS.)

below is often used by appellate courts to mean "at the trial-court stage." E.g., "As the district court noted below, this litigation involves only that portion of the contract relating to the actual construction of the platform." Some appellate courts—especially American ones—avoid this term because it may seem to slight trial judges. See inferior (B).

below-mentioned; under-mentioned. The former is AmE or BrE; the latter is BrE only. Below, like above, q.v., is frequently used as an ellipsis for below-mentioned.

bemuse; amuse. The former is frequently taken to be a fancy variant of the latter; the meanings differ significantly, however. Bemuse = (1) to plunge into thought, preoccupy; or (2) to muddle (one's mind); bewilder. Here sense (2) of bemuse applies: "It is easy to see why an equity court, bemused by the expression 'Equity acts in personam and not in rem,' would be tempted to say that an equity court has no 'power' to affect directly land titles in another state." Amuse needs no definition here.

bench = (1) the court considered in its official capacity <remarks from the bench>; (2) judges collectively <bench and bar>; or (3) the judges of a particular court <the Queen's Bench>. Cf. court.

Renaissance lawbooks, in referring to the Bench, invariably meant the Court of Common Pleas, not the King's Bench.

bencher, in England, means generally "one who sits on a bench" (OED), but particularly refers to a member of the governing body of one of the Inns of Court. E.g., "In Pennsylvania, Andrew Hamilton, a barrister and bencher of Gray's Inn, came to Philadelphia in 1682." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guaranties of Liberty 59 (1957)./ "There was thus little occasion for controversies as to discipline to be brought before the judges, unless the benchers failed in the performance of their duties." People ex rel. Karlin v. Culkin, 162 N.E. 487, 490 (N.Y. 1928) (per Cardozo, C.J.). Benchers are known formally as Masters of the Bench.

Archaically, the term was used more generally in reference to magistrates, judges, assessors, and senators.

benchmark (= a point of reference from which to make measurements) is best spelled as one word.

bench memo (AmE) = (1) a short brief submitted by a lawyer to a trial judge, often at the judge's request; or (2) a legal memorandum prepared by an appellate judge's law clerk to help the judge prepare for and participate in oral argument.

bench trial has become—mostly in southern parts of the U.S.—a common equivalent of trial to the bench (= a nonjury trial). See nonjury.

bench warrant, n., = process that a court issues for the attachment or arrest of a person who has been held in contempt, has been indicted, or has disobeyed a subpoena.

Some legal writers, esp. in Texas, have transformed this noun phrase into a PHRASAL VERB—e.g.: "Having been bench warranted from the Texas Department of Corrections where he is serving time for two prior convictions, appellant is hardly a fit candidate for probation." Roberts v. State, 587 S.W.2d 724, 725 n.1 (Tex. Crim. App. 1979)./ "Appellant sought the continuance so that Mr. Babineaux could either be bench warranted back to testify or deposed." Babineaux v. Babineaux, 761 S.W.2d 102, 103 (Tex. App.—Beaumont 1988). If the phrase is to be used as a verb, it should be hyphenated: hence bench-warranted would have been the better form in both quotations. See NOUNS AS VERBS benefic(ent); beneficial; benevolent. The etymological difference between beneficent and benevolent is the difference between deeds and sentiments. Beneficent = doing good, charitable (benefic now being merely a NEEDLESS VARIANT). Benevolent = well-wishing, supportive, (emotionally) charitable. The DIFFERENTIATION should be cultivated; we should reserve beneficent for "doing good," and benevolent for "inclined or disposed to do good." In the following sentences, benevolence is used for beneficence: "The beneficiary of a charity (e.g., one who uses a charitable hospital) has impliedly [q.v.] waived his right to sue in tort, by virtue of having accepted its benevolence [read beneficence]."/ "The will and the entire record reveal that the decedent was a very benevolent man [read beneficent man] who was in the habit of making charitable gifts all over the world."

Beneficial has the general meaning "favorable, producing benefits," and the specialized legal meaning "consisting in a right that derives from something (as a contract or an expectancy) other than legal title" <beneficial interest>. That specialized sense comes from the older legal meaning "of or pertaining to usufruct" (OED). E.g., "It is well established that the settlor (creator) may revoke the trust with the consent of all persons beneficially interested therein." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 157 (2d ed. 1988)./ "The supervised administration embraces a determination of the persons beneficially entitled to the estate after debts, expenses, and taxes are paid." See malevolent.

beneficiary. See cestui que trust & devisee.

benefit. Invariably the passive form of this verb can be advantageously made into an active construction: "Defendant has an adverse interest because he would have been benefited by [read have benefited from] a ruling in favor of the insurance company." See BE-VERBS (B).

benefit(t)ed; benefit(t)ing. These words should be spelled with one -t-, not two. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS benefitee. Though it has not yet made its way into most general English-language dictionaries, this word has appeared frequently in American legal prose since the 1950s. The earliest known use is a 1958 case styled (in full) Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., a Corporation, Individually and as Use Benefitee of The Howell Co., v. Hartford Accident & Indem. Co., 251 F.2d 761 (1958). Soon it had spread—e.g.: "This provision, without undermining the liberal scope of interrogatory discovery, places the burden of discovery upon its potential benefitee." David W. Louisell, Modern California Discovery 124–25 (1963).

The spelling benefittee is incorrect (cf. benefited) because the accent falls not on the penultimate syllable but on the last syllable. But the word is almost certainly unnecessary for beneficiary. See -EE.

benefit of clergy = (1) at common law (12th c.–19th c.), the right of a clergyman not to be tried for a felony in the King's Court; or (2) by SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, religious approval as solemnized in a church ritual. By invoking the benefit of clergy—usu. by reading the so-called neck verse (q.v.)—a defendant could have the case transferred from the King's Court (which imposed the death penalty for a felony) to the Ecclesiastical Court (which dispensed far milder punishments).

In sense (2), the phrase is not only a slipshod extension but also a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY, appearing most often in reference to children out of wedlock—e.g.: "With her, and without benefit of clergy, he had five children, and it was his boast that, as each arrived, he dispatched it promptly to a foundling home." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 215 (1962)./ "Wakefield's generation, twenty years on, didn't just engage in sex without benefit of clergy, they talked about it." Rhoda Koenig, Talkin' 'Bout Their Generation, New York (Mag.), 1 June 1992, at 57.

benevolent. See benefic(ent).

benign; benignant. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. The antonym of benign, however, is malignant.

bequeath. A. And *devise; devolve. Bequeath = (1) to give (an estate or effect) to a person by will <she bequeathed the diadem to her daughter>; or (2) to give (a person) an estate or effect by will <she bequeathed her daughter the diadem>. Lawyers and nonlawyers alike use this term metaphorically: "While its origins are somewhat obscure, we know that the marital privilege is bequeathed to us by the long evolution of the common law, not by constitutional adjudication." See legate.

Devise = to give property (usu. real property) by will. As a noun, devise refers to the realty so given—the analogue for personal property is bequest. The Uniform Probate Code uses only the term devise to describe giving property by will whether the property is real or personal; it would be bootless to call this well-ensconced terminological shift incorrect. See devise & give, devise, and bequeath.

Devolve = to pass on (an estate, right, liability, or office) from one person to another. In the context of estates, devolve usually takes the preposition upon, and sometimes to. See devolve.

B. For give. Using bequeath as a fancy equivalent of give or present is an ignorant pretension—e.g.: "Apparently Mayor Annette Strauss plans to bequeath [read present] the gift personally to Her Majesty—something rarely done, according to protocol experts. Usually, a gift is bequeathed [read presented] to the queen's secretary, who then bequeaths [read gives] it to the queen . . . ." Helen Bryant, Names & Faces, Dallas Times Herald, 5 April 1991, at A2.

bequest, n.; bequeathal; bequeathment. Bequest = (1) the act of bequeathing; or (2) personal property (usu. other than money) disposed of in a will. (Cf. legacy.) Bequest is sometimes confused with behest, q.v. See devise.

Bequeathal and bequeathment are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of sense (1) of bequest—e.g.: "We agree that [the statute] is not applicable, since the trust was demonstrative and not a bequeathal [read bequest] of specific property." Estate of Naulin v. Clancy, 201 N.W.2d 599, 603 (Wis. 1972)./ "The testator's preference for his relatives, it is claimed, was evident from . . . the bequeathment [read bequest] in Article VI . . . ." Estate of Fleer v. Elmhurst College, 315 N.E.2d 260, 261 (Ill. App. Ct. 1974).

bequest, v.t., is a silly error that has appeared in a would-be Shakespearean scholar's writing: "And by so felicitously using the words newly bequested [read bequeathed] to English, [Shakespeare], more than any other writer of the English Renaissance, validated the efforts of earlier and contemporary neologists." Bryan A. Garner, Shakespeare's Latinate Neologisms, 15 Shakespeare Stud. 149, 151 (1982).

bereave, v.t., yields past-tense forms bereft or bereaved, and the same forms as past participles. Bereaved is used in reference to loss of relatives by death. Bereft is used in reference to loss of incorporeal possessions or qualities.

To be bereft of something is not just to lack it but to have had it taken away. Hence the following uses are incorrect: "The Mann Act was not designed to cover voluntary actions bereft of [read lacking] sexual commercialism."/ "Because the certification was bereft of [read without] any clue as to the district judge's reasoning, we could merely vacate the order and remand for a fuller evaluation." Spiegel v. Trustees of Tufts College, 843 F.2d 38, 44 (1st Cir. 1988).

beside (= [1] alongside; or [2] in comparison with) is surprisingly often misused for besides (= [1] other than; except; or [2] in addition)—e.g.: "When we speak of a unilateral contract, we mean a promise in exchange for which an act or something beside [read besides] another promise has been given as consideration." Clarence D. Ashley, What Is a Promise in Law? 16 Harv. L. Rev. 319, 319 (1903)./ "Hill is the only man beside [read besides] Trevino to win on the Senior Tour this year . . . ." Jaime Diaz, At Tradition, Duel Falls Short of Hope, N.Y. Times, 31 March 1990, at 30.

bet > bet > bet. Bet is the preferred (and the far more frequent form) of the past tense and the past participle. E.g., "Thus, if a person betted [read bet] on Salisbury Plain there would be no place within the Act." Hugh P. Macmillan, Law and Other Things 158 (1938)./ "The defendant, Portner, answered that the consideration for his check to Caldwell was small pieces of celluloid called 'checks' representing money betted [read bet] and lost by him in a game of chance." Scolaro v. Bellitto, 184 N.E.2d 604, 606 (Ohio Ct. App. 1962).

bettor is the standard spelling for "one who bets or wagers." Better has also been used in this sense, but is liable to confusion with the comparative form of good. Cf. abettor.

between. A. And among. Between is commonly said to be better with two, and among with more than two, things. Sir Ernest Gowers calls this a "superstition" and quotes the OED: "In all senses between has been, from its earliest appearance, extended to more than two. . . . It is still the only word available to express the relation of a thing to many surrounding and individually; among expresses a relation to them collectively and vaguely: we should not say the space lying among the three points or a treaty among three Powers" (MEU2 at 57).

The rule as generally enunciated, then, is merely simplistic. Although it is an accurate guide for the verb divide (between with two objects, among with more than two), the only ironclad distinction is that stated by the OED. Between expresses one-to-one relations of many things, and among expresses collective and undefined relations.

Thus, Article VII of the U.S. Constitution uses between seemingly to express reciprocal relations: "The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same."

Yet even the more valid distinction is a relatively new one, not observed by the English courts in 1607: "All the Justices, viz., POPHAM, Chief Justice of England, COKE, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, FLEMING, Chief Baron, FENNER, SEARL, YELVERTON, WILLIAMS, and TANFIELD, JJ., were assembled at Sergeants-Inn, to consult what prerogative the King had in digging and taking of saltpetre to make gunpowder by the law of the realm; and upon conference between them, these points were resolved by them all, una voce." The Case of the King's Prerogative in Saltpetre, 12 Co. 12 (1607).

In the same case in which Justice Marshall several times writes, "among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation," Justice Brennan, in his concurring and dissenting opinion, writes: "between the controversy, the parties, and the forum state." See Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186, 225 (1977). The latter phrasing might be said to express a more specific individual relation between the named things, the former phrasing (perhaps consciously) expressing a somewhat vaguer relation.

B. Between and Numbers. The word between may cause problems when used with numbers, particularly if the numbers at either end of the spectrum are intended to be included. E.g., "If three petitioners and one respondent advance to Round Three from a bracket, then those four teams' names will be placed in a hat, and between one and three [read from one to three] teams will be chosen to switch sides." (Two is the only whole number between one and three.)/ "Saleh met with several other defendants in a Queens garage between June 23 and June 24 [read on June 23 and June 24] to discuss getting cars for the conspiracy." Peg Tyre & Kevin McCoy, Busted at Beach, Newsday, 24 July 1993, at 3. (There is no time "between" June 23 and June 24.)

C. Between you and I. One commentator has pointedly termed this locution "a grammatical error of unsurpassable grossness." Little can be added to that judgment. See HYPERCORRECTION (B).

D. Between; as between. Sometimes as between (= comparing; in comparison of) is misused for the straightforward preposition. E.g., "The contractual provisions as between [read provisions between] the parties are as follows." Cf. as against.

E. Fewer Than Two Objects. This construction is a peculiar brand of ILLOGIC, as in between each house or between each speech (instead of, properly, between every two houses and between speeches). Another manifestation of this error is between . . . or, with two prepositional objects, rather than between . . . and: the misuse results from confusion between either . . . or and between . . . and.

betwixt is an ARCHAISM.

BE-VERBS. A. Wrongly Omitted in Nonfinite Uses. Be-verbs, usually in the infinitive or participial form, are often omitted from sentences in which they would add clarity. One explanation is that they are intended to be "understood." (See UNDERSTOOD WORDS.) But this explanation does not excuse the ambiguities and awkwardnesses often caused by such omissions. The bracketed verbs in the sentences following were originally omitted:

- "These devices can be used to intercept a wire or oral communication; specifically designated as not [being] such devices are telephone or telegraph equipment furnished to a user and used in the ordinary course of business, and hearing aids."
- "The annotation necessarily starts with the assumption that the process or information involved was regarded as [being] of a secret or confidential nature."
- "If the western film offer were found [to be] different [from] or inferior to the musical film offer, it makes no difference whether Parker reasonably or unreasonably refused the second offer."
- "Because this instruction was substantially similar to the willfulness instruction at the end of the trial, which we have previously held [to be] proper, the instruction was not erroneous."
- "If I thought those two cases [to be] in point, I should have to consider them very carefully, but I do not." (Eng.)

B. Circumlocutions. Verb phrases containing be-verbs are often merely roundabout ways of saying something better said with a simple verb. Thus be determinative of for determine is verbose. But be determinative is all right where there is no object, as in Judge Learned Hand's statement: "All such attempts are illusory, and, if serviceable at all, are so only to center attention upon which one of the factors may be determinative in a given situation."

The following circumlocutory uses of be-verbs are common in legal writing; the simple verb is ordinarily to be preferred:

be abusive of (abuse)	be derived from (derive from)
be amendatory of (amend)	be desirous of (desire or want) be applicable to (apply to)	be determinative of (determine) be benefited by (benefit from)	be dispositive of (dispose of)
be conducive to (conduce to)	be in agreement (agree) be decisive of (decide)	be in attendance (attend) be indicative of (indicate)	be operative (operate) be in dispute (dispute or disagree)	be persuasive of (persuade) be in error (err)	be possessed of (possess) be in exercise of due care (exercise due care)	be productive of (produce) be in existence (exist)	be probative of (prove) be influential on (influence)	be promotive of (promote) be in receipt of (have received)	be violative of (violate)

Many such wordy constructions are more naturally phrased in the present tense singular: is able to (can), is authorized to (may), is binding upon (binds), is empowered to (may), is unable to (cannot).

C. Used Unidiomatically in Place of Action Verbs. One should always use the specific verb that conveys the idea of the action described, rather than an unspecific be-verb: "Some agencies adopt procedures that permit some public participation; understandable pressures from interested outsiders are [read require] that more agencies should or (in some cases) must do so."

BFP = bona fide purchaser. Though the abbreviation is an initialism and not an acronym, the periods are customarily omitted—e.g.: "Having thus failed to comply with federal law, the Bank is hardly in a position to claim the advantageous status of a BFP without notice . . . ." First Nat'l Bank v. Lewco Secs. Corp., 860 F.2d 1407, 1414 (7th Cir. 1988).

BI-, SEMI-. One can remember the proper prefix in a given context by noting that bi- means "two," and semi- "half." Hence bimonthly = every two months (not "twice a month") and semimonthly = every half-month, or twice a month. Biweekly and semiweekly work similarly.

Still, bi- has been used to mean "occurring twice in a (specified span of time)" so often (and legitimately, e.g., in biennial) that, for the sake of clarity, it may be better to avoid the prefix altogether when possible. See the next entry.

biannual; biennial; semiannual. Biannual and semiannual both mean "occurring twice a year." Biennial means "occurring once every two years." The distinction between these words becomes important, for example, when employment contracts provide for "biannual meetings of the committee to dispose of accident and bonus questions, and any other agreements." It is imprudent, however, to rely on a word like biannual for such a contractual provision. See BI-.

BIBLICAL AFFECTATION. In many respects the language of the law resembles the language of the King James Version (1611) or of Shakespeare. It is full of the ARCHAISMS we associate either with the Bible or, less commonly, with Shakespeare. Thus, as late as the 1980s, the Supreme Court of Mississippi published a sentence containing doth, q.v., which many readers have encountered only in traditional versions of the Bible. Likewise, hath and hast appear occasionally in DRAFTING (of a mediocre kind). Courts still occasionally use the Elizabethan burthen, q.v., as a variant of burden, though it has not been current for several centuries. And much of the syntax of legal prose is biblical: "A lawyer may never give unsolicited advice to a layman that he retain a client." See that (c).

Even today one can open up law reports and read of a bounden duty, as in the line from the Book of Common Prayer ("We beseech thee to accept this our bounden duty and service.")—e.g.: "It is enough for this purpose that valiant efforts were made to persuade the district to do voluntarily what the United States Supreme Court and the California Supreme Court had held was its bounden duty." Los Angeles Branch NAACP v. Los Angeles Unified Sch. Dist., 750 F.2d 731, 752 (9th Cir. 1984) (Pregerson, J., concurring). The origins of the phrase were legal and not religious, but today "when we say bounden duty we do not call in any way to mind the bond [that] tied the feudal underling to his lord or the apprentice to his master." Jocelyn Simon, English Idioms from the Law (pt. 1), 76 Law Q. Rev. 283, 285 (1960).

Though traditions die hard, these linguistic anachronisms ought not to be perpetuated. They needlessly widen the rift between what is legal and what is lay and unwholesomely lend the air of priestly sanctity to the legal profession. Even the terms lay and legal used as opposites, much like lay and ecclesiastical, conjure up this notion; but they are not easily avoided.

It is worth adding to this discussion that citation to the Bible as legal precedent is not an admirable practice. Cardozo once wrote, "In days not far remote, judges were not unwilling to embellish their deliverances with quotations from the poets. I shall observe toward such a practice the tone of decent civility that is due those departed." Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 471, 484 (1939). Yet, even in as religiously diverse a society as the U.S., the practice of quoting from the Bible has persisted. For example:

> [As] far as money buried or secreted on privately owned realty is concerned, the old distinction between treasure-trove, lost property, and mislaid property seems to be of little value and not worth preserving. The principal point of distinction seems to be the intent of the true owner who necessarily is not known and not available. Therefore the evidence on his intent will usually be scant and uncontroverted. . . . I would guess his motivation often to be that of the one-talent servant in the parable in the 25th Chapter of Matthew: "And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth. . . ." We should hold that the owner of the land has possession of all property secreted in, on and under his land and continues to hold possession for the true owner, who, incidentally, may not always be the person doing any burying. Matthew 13:44—"Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field." What reason is there for transferring possession to the individual who happens to dig up the property? Or for guessing about the intent or the memory of the person doing the burying? A simple solution for all of these problems is to maintain the continuity of possession of the landowner until the true owner establishes his title.

bid (= to offer a bid) forms bid in the past tense. E.g., "[T]he defendant bid for the wrong property at an auction sale . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 479 (1930)./ "The tax is computed on the amount bid for the property . . . ." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 48 (1946).

In the sense of bid farewell (= to wish someone well upon parting), the past tense is bade, rhyming with glad, and the past participle is bidden. "She did as she was bid [read bidden]."

But which past tense is correct in the phrase to bid fair (= to seem likely)—is it bid fair or bade fair? Writers have used both—e.g.: "[J]udicial decision as an agency of legal growth bade fair to become sterile . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 70 (1938)./ "[C]ertainly the action of indebitatus assumpsit bid fair to overtake, at one time or another, most of the other forms of action." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 420 (3d ed. 1990). The OED records only bade fair, the better form.

bid, n.; tender, n. In AmE, both terms are used, whereas in BrE only the latter would appear, in the sense "a submitted price at which one will perform work or supply goods."

biennial = every two years. If we scale the numerical summit, we have triennial (3), quadrennial (4), quinquennial (5), sexennial (6), septennial (7), octennial (8), novennial (9), decennial (10), vicennial (20), centennial (100), millennial (1,000). See BI- & biannual.

bigamy; polygamy; digamy; deuterogamy. Bigamy = going through a marriage ceremony with someone when one is already lawfully married to someone else (CDL). It may be committed knowingly or unknowingly; if knowing, bigamy is a criminal offense.

Digamy and deuterogamy both mean "a legal second marriage occurring after an annulment or a divorce from or the death of the first spouse." Deuterogamy is the more common term (to the extent that either might be called common!) and is not, like digamy, liable to confusion with bigamy. Hence digamy should be considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Polygamy is the generic term for "multiple marriages," and encompasses bigamy; it is much used by anthropologists, describing both polygyny (the practice of having several wives) and polyandry (the practice of having several husbands).

bilateral contract; unilateral contract. A unilateral contract is one in which a promise is given by one party in exchange for the actual performance by the other party. A bilateral contract is one in which each party promises a performance, so that each party is an obligor on his own promise and an obligee on the other's promise.

It is a legal solecism to use unilateral contract to mean a promise for which no consideration was requested, or for which no sufficient consideration was given. Instead, the phrase "should be reserved for cases in which a legal obligation has been created, but only one party to the obligation has made a promise." 1 Samuel Williston & W.H.E. Jaeger, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 13, at 26 (3d ed. 1957). If the transaction does not result in a legal obligation, unilateral offer or unilateral promise may describe the transaction, but not unilateral contract. Id.

bill = (1) a formal written complaint, such as a court paper requesting some specific action for reasons alleged; (2) a pleading or court paper in equity, such as a bill of certiorari, a bill of discovery, a bill in interpleader, a bill of peace, or a bill of review; (3) a legislative proposal offered for debate before its enactment; (4) loosely, an enacted statute; (5) an invoice; or (6) a bill of exchange, i.e., an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the addressee to pay on demand, or at a particular future time, a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person or to bearer. With such an array of meanings, bill is classifiable as a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD. See suit.

billion. In the U.S. and France, billion means "one thousand millions" (= 1,000,000,000); but in G.B., Canada, and Germany, it means "one million millions" (= 1,000,000,000,000). An American trillion, q.v., equals the British billion. In BrE, however, the AmE meaning is gaining ground esp. in journalism, technical writing, and even in government statements about finance.

bill of particulars; motion for more definite statement. In 1948, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were amended to abolish the bill of particulars, which was superseded by the motion for more definite statement. The latter allows a party who must respond to a pleading to ask the court to require the other party to refile a vague or ambiguous pleading. In several jurisdictions, though, the bill of particulars remains in current practice.

bill of rights = a section or addendum, usu. in a constitution, that defines the situations in which a politically organized society will permit free, spontaneous, and individual activity, and that assures members of the society that government powers will not be used in certain ways. The most famous such document is the Bill of Rights (conventionally capitalized) of the U.S. Constitution. But England also had a Bill of Rights of 1689, which established that the government could not raise revenue without parliamentary authorization.

bimonthly; semimonthly. See BI-.

bind = to impose a legal duty on (a person or institution). Thus, courts are said to be bound by precedent and persons who have signed contracts are said to be contractually bound.

binder = (1) in property law, a document in which the seller and the buyer of real property declare their common intention to bring about a transfer of ownership, usu. accompanied by the buyer's initial payment; (2) loosely, the buyer's initial payment in the sale of real property; or (3) in insurance, an insurer's memorandum giving the insured temporary coverage while the application for an insurance policy is being processed.

birth, v.i., was used with some frequency in the Middle Ages as a verb. It fell into disuse, however, and only recently has been revived in AmE <the birthing of babies>. Some dictionaries label it dialectal. Given its usefulness and its long standing in the language, there can be no substantial objections to it.

bite > bit > bitten. Writers occasionally fall into dialectal usage by using bit, the past-tense form, as a past participle—e.g.: "In a Texas case the court said hypothetically that if defendant had bit [read bitten] off such a portion of the victim's under lip as to deprive him of the lip, and the piece had been put back and made to grow 'it would still be maiming under the law.'" Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 242 n.38 (3d ed. 1982).

Blackacre is the proverbial example of real estate in hypothetical property problems. Abutting tracts are usually called Whiteacre, Brownacre, or some other colorized denomination. These terms have long been a part of the common-law tradition: "Where a devise is of blackacre to A., and of whiteacre to B. in tail, and, if they both die without issue, then to C., in fee, here A. and B. have cross remainders by implication." (Blackstone)/ "The world of bar law is a peculiar place. Every house has a name, usually Blackacre or Whiteacre." Stephen Labaton, At the Bar, 18 Aug. 1989, at 20.

blackletter law. Black-letter is a term that describes Gothic or Old English type in antiquated books <black-letter type>. (The word is usu. hyphenated in nonlegal contexts relating to typography—but see the final paragraph.) From 1482 to 1679, the medieval Year Books were printed in so-called Black Letter editions, which were printed in a heavy Gothic type (and which contain many errors).

By extension the term came to be applied to legal principles that are fundamental and well settled, or statements of such principles in a quasi-mathematical form, because such principles were traditionally printed in boldface type in lawbooks. Law students frequently distinguish between professors with a predilection for blackletter law (what the law is) and those whose interest lies more in public policy (why the law is or what it ought to be). See Blackstone lawyer & hornbook law.

Formerly hyphenated, legal writers have conveniently merged the phrase into a solid word—e.g.: "Robinson correctly stated the general understanding as of 1939 in blackletter text . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 342 (2d ed. 1975)./ "The format of blackletter rule and explanatory comment, familiar from real Restatements, is well suited to its purpose." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 266 (1991).

blackmail referred originally to rent payable in cattle, labor, or coin other than silver (i.e., white money). Then it came to denote, esp. in Scotland, a kind of protection money: payment that robbers extorted from landowners for exemption from their raids. Today the word applies to any menacing demand made without justification—i.e., to illegal extortion generally.

Since at least the late 19th century, the word has been a verb as well as a noun—e.g.: "Thus often arises secret intimidation, enforced confessions, and blackmailed pleas of guilty. These sinister dangers were extinguished from the Common Law of England more than six centuries ago." 1 Winston Churchill, A History of the English Speaking Peoples 223 (1956).

Blackstonean. The adjective is preferably so spelled. Some writers ill-advisedly make it Blackstonian.

Blackstone lawyer = (1) a lawyer with a broad knowledge of black-letter principles; (2) a self-educated lawyer, esp. in antebellum America, whose legal training consists primarily of reading Blackstone's Commentaries. Sense (2) usu. appears in historical contexts—e.g.: "For every Jefferson devoting five full years to legal training, scores of 'Blackstone lawyers' entered the profession after a few months of study, self-proclaimed masters of one text." Robert A. Ferguson, Law and Letters in American Culture 29 (1984). For an example from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, see LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

blamable. See blameworthy (B).

blamableness. See blameworthiness.

blame, v.t. In the best usage, one blames a person; one does not, in the traditional idiom, blame a thing on a person. E.g., "I blame the fires on him." [Read I blame him for the fires.]

blameworthiness; blamableness. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "The only rational basis for allowing recovery in tort seems to be blamableness [read blameworthiness]." C.B. Whittier, Mistake in the Law of Torts, 15 Harv. L. Rev. 335, 335 (1902).

blameworthy. A. And culpable. Though the two words are etymologically equivalent, in 20th-century usage the Anglo-Saxon blameworthy has tended to be used in noncriminal, the Latinate culpable in criminal contexts. Hence blameworthy in civil contexts: "The indemnitee's conduct is sufficiently blameworthy to preclude indemnity."/ "Plaintiff is not blameworthy in failing to bring suit earlier; thus laches does not apply."/ "We also consider whether there was trickery or blameworthy action by the police."

And culpable in criminal contexts: "The court's focus must be on the defendant's culpability, not on those who committed the robbery and shot the victims."/ "The defense of mistake of fact was not available as a defense to negate the culpable mental state of criminal negligence."/ "It is reasonable to presume that the sentencing judge who revokes probation takes a fresh look at the defendant's culpability and circumstances and considers at that point the amount of time the defendant should be required to serve." See guilty.

Occasionally, however, culpability creeps into civil contexts, as here in the context of punitive damages, a hybrid remedy: "Exemplary damages are awarded only in cases of extreme culpability and are limited to the plaintiff's demonstrable litigation expenses." Nevertheless, the writer of that sentence was describing egregious conduct, and blameworthiness today hardly seems appropriate for flagrant conduct.

B. And blameful; blamable. Blameworthy and blamable both mean "deserving to be blamed," the latter being a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Blameful (= imputing blame; blaming) has been mistakenly used for blameworthy. We need not use up more words for the meaning replicated by blameworthy and blamable. Cf. certworthy & enbancworthy.

blandish; brandish. The former means "to cajole; to persuade by flattery or coaxing." The latter means "to wave or shake in a menacing or threatening way."

blatant; flagrant. There is a well-defined distinction, but each word is frequently misused for the other. What is blatant stands out as glaring and repugnant; what is flagrant is shocking and deplorable; this latter term connotes outrage. A perjurer might tell blatant lies to the grand jury to cover up for his flagrant breach of trust. Egregious criminal acts are flagrant <flagrant arson>, not blatant. E.g., "For any flagrant dereliction or disregard of professional duty on the part of the attorney, the license by which he was admitted to practice may be revoked."/ "The court could have properly determined, as it did, that Batson's conduct was so flagrant as to justify severe sanctions."

Blatant is correctly used in this sentence: "The question concerning the blinding of the Libyan in the Colorado shooting was blatantly improper." Here flagrant is misused for blatant: "The constitutional violation is flagrantly [read blatantly] apparent in a case involving the imposition of a maximum sentence after reconviction."/ "No matter how infrequently the special counsel has brought Hatch Act charges in the past, federal employees can hardly be faulted for concluding that registering voters in flagrant [read blatant] disregard of the special counsel's advice is not worth the grave risk to their livelihoods."

Black's defines flagrant necessity as "a case of urgency rendering lawful an otherwise illegal act," and flagrantly against the evidence as "so much against the weight of the evidence as to shock the conscience and clearly indicate passion and prejudice of the jury." Flagrant is the wrong choice of word in the first phrase, though arguably correct in the second because of the element of shock. Blatant necessity would be the better wording for the first phrase, blatant here taking on its nonpejorative meaning "completely obvious or strikingly conspicuous"; a blatant necessity would allow one, e.g., to commit battery upon another by shoving him out of the way of an oncoming bus.

The phrase blatantly obvious is a REDUNDANCY. E.g., "The reasons for the dropping pass rate on the bar exam are blatantly obvious [read are obvious]."

bloc; block. Political groups or alignments are blocs. Block serves in all other senses.

blow hot and cold = to take mutually contradictory positions or put forward contradictory views.

- "The plaintiff is blowing hot and cold in this case; if we follow him in this latter position, why then he loses the case on the merits." Hall v. Keller, 80 F. Supp. 763, 774 (W.D. La. 1948).
- "Inconsistent allegations can be made in separate claims or defenses under F.R.C.P. 8(e)(2); but no authority is known to the undersigned which permits blowing hot and cold in the same cause of action, as attempted by the proposed amendment." Steiner v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp., 140 F. Supp. 906, 908 (S.D. Cal. 1953).
- "Allen had not only earlier taken a directly contrary position . . . he had taken the same contrary position in one state administrative proceeding where that also suited his purpose . . . . [N]o further judicial aid should be given this particular enterprise of blowing hot and cold as the occasion demands." Allen v. Zurich Ins. Co., 667 F.2d 1162, 1167 n.3 (4th Cir. 1982).
- "The theory of attack by prior inconsistent statements is not based on the assumption that the present testimony is false and the former statement is true, but rather upon the notion that talking one way on the stand and another way previously is blowing hot and cold, and raises a doubt as to the truthfulness of both statements." Charles T. McCormick et al., Evidence § 34, at 74 (3d ed. 1984).

For an amusing example of blowing hot and cold, see Codd's Puzzle.

Blue Book = (1) in G.B., a printed report (as of a Royal Commission) presented to Parliament and traditionally softbound in blue covers; (2) in some American states, a compilation of session laws; (3) a volume formerly published to give parallel citation tables for a volume in the National Reporter System; or (4) the formal name for the citation guide, formerly called A Uniform System of Citation (usu. written Bluebook).

For more terms connected with sense (1), see Green Paper & White Paper.

blue-pencil test = a judicial standard sometimes applied by a court considering an illegal contractual provision and deciding whether to invalidate the entire contract or only the offending words, the standard consisting in whether it would be possible to sever the offending words simply by running a blue pencil through them, as opposed to changing, adding, or rearranging words. E.g., "Despite such criticisms, numerous jurisdictions have presented meritorious justifications for requiring a strict application of the 'blue pencil' test." Holloway v. Faw, Casson & Co., 552 A.2d 1311, 1325 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1989). "It used to be thought that promises could be severed merely because the 'blue pencil' test was satisfied; but this view no longer prevails. The test may restrict, but it does not determine, the scope of the doctrine of severance." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 449 (8th ed. 1991).

blue-sky laws. In the early 20th century, blue sky meant "an unsound investment, esp. in fake securities." Hence laws designed to protect gullible investors in securities have been given the name blue-sky laws. The phrase is used in BrE as well as in AmE—in the latter, usually in reference to state laws.

As casual JARGON, blue-sky (usu. hyphenated) has been transformed into a verb meaning "to approve (the sale of securities) in accordance with blue-sky laws." The form of the verb is almost always past tense or past participle—e.g.: "This solicitation and purchase was unlawful under California law because it had not been blueskyed." Hecht v. Harris, Upham & Co., 283 F. Supp. 417, 443 (N.D. Cal. 1968). Less commonly, the past-participial adjective means "having blue-sky laws" <blue-skyed states>. See NOUNS AS VERBS.

blunderbuss (= an obsolete firearm that scatters shot and is intended for close-range shooting) is often used figuratively in legal contexts. E.g., "This claim—on which every serious constitutional question turns—was pleaded in blunderbuss fashion in each of the complaints."/ "Many of the discovery requests are specific, many are blunderbuss, and many seek discovery previously refused by the court."/ "Since double payments can be prevented by a letter or a telephone call, it is unreasonable to accomplish this objective by the blunderbuss method of denying assistance to all indigent newcomers for an entire year." The more recent sense of blunderbuss (= a blundering person) has nothing to do with this sense. The term is infrequently misspelled blunderbus.

Sometimes the equivalent shotgun or scatter-gun is used: "'Fraud, deceit, negligence, or estoppel' is a scatter-gun blast that could hardly miss winging the intended quarry."

bodily heirs; heirs of the body; body heirs. The first and second are the classic formulations of the phrase, both unobjectionable. Body heirs is much inferior to bodily heirs for two reasons: first, generally we should not use a noun adjectivally when we have a serviceable adjective; and second, body heirs is so little used that it grates on the legally trained ear.

body corporate is a variant of corporation that emphasizes the entity and the members that make it up rather than the abstract notion (corporation); body corporate is now used more commonly in BrE than in AmE. E.g., "A body corporate cannot be appointed receiver . . . ." J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 175 (4th ed. 1945).

body heirs. See bodily heirs & heir.

boilerplate [fr. the newspaper business, in which it originally referred to syndicated material in mat or plate form] = (1) ready-made or all-purpose language that will fit in a variety of documents; or (2) fixed or standardized language that is not subject to modification. Sense (1) expresses the lawyer's usual understanding; sense (2) expresses the nonlawyer's common understanding.

The term first entered American legal usage in the 1950s and is today commonly used either as a noun or as an adjective (in phrases such as boilerplate clause or boilerplate language). The earliest known legal example appeared in Ohio: "After what appears to be the ordinary 'boilerplate' reference to payment of debts, taxes and costs of administration, the testatrix in the case at bar gave more than usual attention to arrangements in connection with her last rites." In re Estate of Carrington, 136 N.E.2d 182, 185 (Ohio Prob. Ct. 1956).

The word is best spelled as one word in AmE. In BrE, it is commonly hyphenated (boiler-plate). For an example of boilerplate language, see attestation clause.

bolster = (of a courtroom lawyer) to build up a witness's credibility in anticipation of impeachment—a practice generally disallowed by American evidentiary rules. E.g., "[T]he prosecutor may not, among other things, make explicit personal assurances that a witness is trustworthy or implicitly bolster the witness by indicating that information not presented to the jury supports the testimony." U.S. v. Lewis, 10 F.3d 1086, 1089 (4th Cir. 1993)./ "Attempts to bolster a witness by vouching for his credibility are normally improper and an error." U.S. v. Baptista-Rodriguez, 17 F.3d 1354, 1372 (11th Cir. 1994).

bombastic is sometimes misconstrued to mean "strident" or "violent." Properly, bombastic (lit., "full of stuffing or padding") means "pompous; highfalutin; overblown." Here is a journalistic example of the error: "'If there is any change in the mood of the kids, it is for the worse,' says the Brixton police superintendent. 'They are more bombastic, they are cocky, they threaten riot as an answer if they don't get what they want.'" (Eng.) This confusion may arise from the suggestiveness of bomb in bombastic.

bona fide. A. And good-faith, adj. Bona fide, adj., is understood by educated speakers of English; as a legal term, it is unlikely to give way completely to good-faith. Cf. bona fides.

B. Adjective or Adverb. Bona fide was originally adverbial, meaning "in good faith" <the suit was brought bona fide>. The phrase is still used in this way, most often in BrE—e.g.: "[T]he undertaking was given bona fide, i.e., without any knowledge that the claim was not a good one." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 25 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950).

Today it is more commonly used as an adjective <it was a bona fide suit>. None of the forms of this term should be hyphenated or written as one word, as bona fide sometimes is when functioning as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE. The opposite of bona fide is mala fide, q.v.; the opposite of bona fides is mala fides.

C. Meaning "sincere, genuine." In legal contexts, the adjective bona fide should be avoided in the lay sense arrived at through SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, namely "genuine; not fake." E.g., "Even within the 50-mile area, containers that go directly to the owner of the cargo or to bona fide warehouses [read genuine warehouses] are exempted from the rule."/ "Ms. Rebhun argued successfully that Michael's alcoholism was a bona fide illness [read genuine illness] that prevented him from taking responsibility for filing his taxes." For Special Cases, a "Tax Therapist," N.Y. Times, 8 Dec. 1989, at 27.

One court has justifiably criticized the phrase bona fide doubt in reference to a judge's doubt, saying that the phrase "appears to be a faulty construction of words . . . . [U]nfortunately, it has reached a level of being standard legal idiom in mental competency cases . . . . For purposes of determining whether an evidentiary hearing should be held, . . . 'bona fide doubt' is a misnomer. It does not convey the correct sense of the test: the question whether an evidentiary hearing is required does not depend on the sincerity, genuineness, etc. of the judge's doubt—we can assume any judge's doubt has these qualities." Griffin v. Lockhart, 935 F.2d 926, 929 n.2 (8th Cir. 1991) (citing DMLU and recommending instead sufficient doubt).

bona fides, n.; good faith; *bonne foi. Though the adjective bona fide has been fully anglicized, the noun phrase bona fides has lost much ground—esp. in AmE—to good faith, n., which is generally preferable. The pronunciation of bona fides, /boh-nə-fī-deez/, unlike that of its adjectival sibling, sounds foreign and bombastic. Bonne foi, a Frenchified variant, sounds still more so; fortunately, it is rarely encountered.

Typically, one writes, "He executed the contract in good faith," not really thinking of bona fides as an alternative wording, although admittedly it is sometimes used: "[T]heir bona fides was manifest on the record." Patterson v. American Tobacco Co., 634 F.2d 744, 748 (4th Cir. 1980).

As in the example just quoted, the noun phrase bona fides is singular: this bona fides, not these bona fides. But writers sometimes mistakenly make it plural—e.g.: "Southwest asserts that it was denied the opportunity to be present and to present evidence when Lowe's bona fides were [read bona fides was] examined by the Land Office Manager." Southwestern Petroleum Corp. v. Udall, 361 F.2d 650, 657 (10th Cir. 1966)./ "[H]e was neither advised at trial that his bona fides were [read bona fides was] in issue nor given an opportunity to disprove . . . the inference drawn by the court." Sledge v. J.P. Stevens & Co., 585 F.2d 625, 641 (4th Cir. 1978).

bona vacantia (lit. "vacant goods") is a TERM OF ART meaning "property not disposed of by a decedent's will and to which no relative is entitled upon intestacy." E.g., "The Crown sought to interpose a claim to bona vacantia between creditors and former members." (Eng.) The phrase should not be used when unclaimed property or ownerless goods will suffice. Cf. escheat.

bond = (1) a written promise to pay a debt or to do some act (e.g., an appeal bond); (2) an interest-bearing certificate of debt that is issued by a corporation or governmental entity usu. to provide for a particular financial need (e.g., a municipal bond); or (3) an insurance agreement whereby a person or corporation becomes a surety to pay, within defined limits, for a financial loss suffered by a second person under certain circumstances (e.g., a bail bond, delivery bond, indemnity bond, or judicial bond). See debenture.

In criminal law, bail bond (= security for a released prisoner's return for trial) is archaic in BrE but current in AmE. See bond out.

bond out (= to post a bail bond and thereby obtain release from [jail]) is an American casualism. E.g., "Loretta Lynn's son Ernie has bonded out of a Tennessee jail . . . ." Helen Bryant, Names & Faces, Dallas Times Herald, 5 April 1991, at A2.

book, bring to. See bring to book.

bookkeeping; accounting. Bookkeeping (so spelled, being the only word in the English language with three consecutive sets of doubled letters) is the mechanical recording of debits and credits, or the summarizing of financial information, usu. about a business enterprise. Accounting differs from bookkeeping because it is not mechanical: it requires judgment about such issues as when a specified type of transaction should be recorded, how the amount of the transaction should be calculated, and how a balance sheet and income statement should be presented.

bootstrap(ping). The original expression was one among several variants of to pull oneself up by one's bootstraps (a futile effort)—e.g.: "[I]t would be as impossible for the directors, in undertaking to contract with themselves, to accomplish any result as it would be for them to undertake to lift themselves over a fence by their bootstraps." In re State Exch. Bank, 159 N.E. 839, 840 (Ohio Ct. App. 1927)./ "That would be equivalent to pulling one's self out of the mire by his own bootstraps." McCarthy v. State ex rel. Harless, 101 P.2d 449, 453 (Ariz. 1940)./ "To support the doctrine of precedent by reference to precedent would be to try to pull itself up by its own bootstraps." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 88 (11th ed. 1982).

The idea has now been telescoped into the gerund bootstrapping—e.g.: "It is only by deciding on appeal and on the merits that the claim of foreclosure is insubstantial that this court can [reach its own conclusion]. . . . This appellate bootstrapping is the more improper because the question of the adequacy of the foreclosure is in fact not concluded by this appeal." Pettit v. Olean Indus., Inc., 266 F.2d 833, 839 (2d Cir. 1959) (Lumbard, J., dissenting)./ "This argument, too, does not warm us and indeed strikes us as a bootstrapping approach." Hudson v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins., 314 F.2d 16, 23 (8th Cir. 1963). The term is now often used, esp. in law, in the sense "making a success out of one's meager resources."

bordereau (= [1] a note of account or, more commonly, [2] a description of reinsured risks) is the singular, -reaux the plural.

The word has recently come to be used as a verb—e.g.: "American and Southeastern Fire Insurance Co., to which the policy had been 'bordereauxed,' refused payment." Merchants Nat'l Bank v. Southeastern Fire Ins. Co., 751 F.2d 771, 773 (5th Cir. 1985). The proper verb form, however, would be bordereau (singular), not -reaux. Hence, in the above quotation the word should be bordereaued.

bork, v.t., an eponym of Robert Bork, President Reagan's unsuccessful nominee for the U.S. Supreme Court, means (1) "(of the U.S. Senate) to reject (a nominee) for the U.S. Supreme Court because of his or her untraditional political and legal philosophy"; or (2) "(of political and legal activists) to embark on a media campaign against (a Supreme Court nominee) in an effort to persuade the Senate to reject the nominee." Originally, the word was usually capitalized, but no longer. It most often appears in sense (2)—e.g.: "One of the legacies of the Bork nomination is, I think, a contribution to the political dictionary. I'm referring to the verb, to bork, which is what Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., did to Robert Bork. The passive, to be borked, is what happened to Bork. Now, what does it mean to be borked? Simply this: Your opponents take a matter involving a law and criticize you in terms of policy outcome. You defend yourself by discussing the issue in legal jargon." Terry Eastland, Reagan's Legacy at Justice Poses Challenge to New President, Manhattan Law., 1 Nov. 1988, at 12./ "After they persuaded Ms. Hill to submit an unsworn statement by fax, members of the Senate trio—probably in cahoots with a team of high-powered Washington lawyers, lobbyists and public relations specialists out to 'bork' the nominee—caused the sensational Hill statement to be leaked to a couple of reputable reporters." William Safire, The Plumbers' Return, 17 Feb. 1992, at A11.

born; borne. Both are past participles of bear. Borne is for general purposes <she has borne a child> <he has borne that burden for a long time>. Born is used either as an adjective  <their firstborn son> or as the fixed passive verb in to be born <she was born last June in London>.

Bear in mind yields borne in mind: "It should be born in mind [read borne in mind] that while the McAlester factors will often plainly indicate that immunity is available, there are situations in which immunity must be afforded even though one or more of the factors does not obtain."

both. A. *Both . . . and. This construction comprises a pair of CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS that must frame syntactically analogous parts of a sentence. E.g., "The Chancellor decided all questions both of law and fact [read both of law and of fact or of both law and fact]."

B. Both . . . as well as. This construction is incorrect for both . . . and. E.g., "Attorney's fees are expressly authorized both under section 1983, 42 U.S.C. § 1988, as well as under [read both under . . . and under or under . . . as well as under] the Rehabilitation Act, 29 U.S.C. § 794a(b)."/ "Both Norton as well as the judges [read Norton as well as the judges or Both Norton and the judges] conceded that Moses had a cause of action for special assumpsit on the agreement to indemnify him against the consequences of his agreement."

C. Redundancies with. Several wordings with both cause redundancies. One is both . . . each other—e.g.: "Both Signad and Sugar Land are seeking in personam, rather than in rem, judgments against each other." The sentence would bear either both or each other, but it cannot take them together.

Another is both alike—e.g.: "The statutes of these states are both alike [read are alike]."

Yet another is both concurrently—e.g.: "Happily now, as we shall see, every judge has both a Common Law and an Equity mind, and applies them both concurrently [read concurrently]." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 36 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).

D. Both (of) the. Though the idiom is falling into disuse, both the (or both these) has a fine pedigree and continues in formal English—e.g.: "The hazard, in both these respects, could only be avoided, if at all, by rendering that tribunal more numerous . . . ." The Federalist, No. 65, at 398 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961)./ "The Commission is to promote both these purposes." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 82 (5th ed. 1955)./ "For both these reasons, over reliance on foreign authorities diminished . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 46 (2d ed. 1975). The alternative phrasing, both of the (or both of these), is increasingly common in AmE.

E. Both . . . equally as. See equally as (C).

bottleneck is accepted as standard in the dictionaries. Certainly it has legitimate figurative uses—e.g.: "Our bottleneck in housing is particularly far-reaching and decisive." Oddly, the word may never have been used in a literal sense (i.e., "the neck of a bottle").

bottom, v.i. & v.t., may be used literally: "The well was bottomed in sand A." Or it may be used figuratively, as it more frequently is in legal contexts: "The district court properly dismissed plaintiff's section 1983 claim, bottomed on her assertion of an illegal arrest."/ "This contention is unsound, and the argument predicated thereon is bottomed wholly upon a false premise." Ford v. Moody, 276 S.W. 595, 597 (Ark. 1925). This peculiar legal idiom was originally nonlegal, dating in the OED from 1637. From a modern stylistic point of view, base might be preferable to bottom in figurative senses.

The transference to a nominal sense of bottom is likely to provoke laughter: "Title VI on its own bottom [read foundation] reaches no further than the Constitution." Guardians Ass'n v. Civil Serv. Comm'n, 463 U.S. 582, 589–90 (1983)./ "The decisions demonstrate that the due process approach considers each case on its own bottom [read basis]."

bottomry; bottomage. Bottomry, denoting a special type of commercial-insurance contract in admiralty, may be used as both n. & v.t. Bottomage is a NEEDLESS VARIANT from LAW FRENCH.

bountiful; bounteous. Bounteous is poetic or literary for bountiful, which is preferred in legal contexts.

bounty, which is becoming an ARCHAISM, is current in the context of wills and estates, although little used elsewhere. It means "munificence; liberality in giving; gift" (COD). E.g., "The court will distribute the testator's bounty equally among all persons belonging to the class designated in the will, wherever the person."/ "Spendthrift trusts allow the donor to control his bounty, through the creation of the trust, so that it may be exempt from liability for the donee's debts."/ "The testator may, if he chooses, fail to make provision in his will for his children, though they are the natural objects of his bounty." b(o)urgeois. The spelling with the -o- is preferred.

boutique. Since the mid-1980s, boutique has, in AmE, denoted a small law firm specializing in one particular aspect of law practice. E.g., "Davis, Everby & Feinberg is a small, boutique law firm specializing in litigation." Mark H. Epstein & Brandon Wisoff, Winding Up Dissolved Law Part- nerships, 73 Calif. L. Rev. 1597, 1625 (1985)./ "Samuel Sterrett . . . resigned Oct. 31 with partner Michael Durney to launch a tax boutique." Jennifer Frey, Myerson & Kuhn Loses Cabot and Office in D.C., Manhattan Law., 7–13 Nov. 1989, at 4.

BRACKETS. See PUNCTUATION (L).

Bracton. This proper name commonly refers both to the 13th-century judge (Henry of Bratton, who sat on the Court of King's Bench and of Assize in the reign of Henry III) and to the book he is thought to have written (De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae, c. 1250). Some historians doubt that Bracton was the author of Bracton (italicized when referring to the book)—e.g.: "The author of Bracton appreciated this point . . . ." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 300 (3d ed. 1990).

Brandeis brief. In Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908), Louis Brandeis persuaded the Court that minimum-hours legislation for women was reasonable—and not unconstitutional—with an unconventional brief that consisted primarily of statistical, sociological, economic, and physiological information. Such a brief has come to be known, since the 1940s, as a Brandeis brief, the main characteristics of which are: (1) reliance on extrarecord facts, esp. economic and sociological materials, that can be judicially noticed; (2) lengthiness. E.g., "The brief submitted on the law was . . . five pages, six pages, and on the facts whatever it was, 150 pages . . . . This kind of brief has ever since then been called 'a Brandeis brief.'" Felix Frankfurter, Felix Frankfurter Reminisces 97 (Harlan B. Phillips ed., 1960)./ "Plaintiff offered no evidence, nothing even in the way of a Brandeis brief, from which we might compare factually the problems private tortfeasors and governmental subdivisions have in dealing with stale claims, investigation of claims, and the budget process." Miller v. Boone County Hosp., 394 N.W.2d 776, 783 (Iowa 1986).

breach can be a troublesome word. Its most frequent legal use is in the phrase breach of contract. The word breach always suggests its more common cognate, break. One can either breach or break a contract; and another may refer to one's breach or breaking of it. That much is simple.

In general usage, breach is confused with two other words, breech, n. (= [1] buttocks; or [2] the lower or back part of something, as a gun bore) and broach, v.t. (= [1] to make a hole in to let out liquid; or [2] to bring up for discussion). The confusion of breach with breech consists in writers' mistakenly using the latter where breach belongs <breach of a treaty>. The lapse with broach occurs when someone writes of breaching (read broaching) a topic.

The meanings of breach and broach become close only in reference to dikes or levees and walls (breach = to break open; broach to make a hole in). E.g., "Less than three months ago—in the immediate aftermath of the breaching of the Berlin Wall—the Chancellor's closest aides were predicting that five to eight years might still be needed before unity became a reality." David Marsh, Kohl Takes the Burden of Unity on His Shoulders, Fin. Times, 22 Feb. 1990, at 3.

breachee is objectionable as an obtuse word meaning "one whose contract has been breached by the other contracting party." E.g., "The breachor's initial failure to comply establishes the inadequacy of the breachee's remedy at law." Stewart v. Stewart, 300 S.E.2d 263, 266 (N.C. Ct. App. 1983)./ "The breacher will offer the breachee's expectancy values plus some portion of the surplus." Michael L. Zigler, Takings Law and the Contracts Clause, 36 Stan. L. Rev. 1447, 1463 n.83 (1984)./ "[S]ince there is the incentive for the breachee to induce breach when circumstances change, the defendant should be allowed to raise the induced breach in mitigation." Thomas S. Ulen, The Efficiency of Specific Performance, 83 Mich. L. Rev. 341, 354–55 (1984).

The word is also an illogically formed word because it means not "one who is breached (by another)," but rather "one whose contract has been breached." Breachee is not, like refugee, an established exception. See -EE.

breacher (= a party in breach). So spelled—not breachor. See contract-breaker.

breach, more honored in the. Strictly speaking, this phrase refers to an unjust rule that is better broken than obeyed. Often, though, through SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, writers use the phrase to refer to a just rule that, in practice, is often broken. E.g., "Although the obligation of lawyers to cooperate with one another long has been considered a significant professional obligation, it, too, has been more and more honored in the breach [read frequently breached]." Roger J. Miner, Lawyers Owe One Another, Nat'l L.J., 19 Dec. 1988, at 13./ "[I]t is an American custom (perhaps more honored in the breach) as well as a Chinese one to show respect for one's elders."

Judith Martin, Ingenuity Can Overcome This Language Barrier, Chicago Tribune, 8 Oct. 1989, at 6C./ "The code of professional responsibility requires reporting an unethical colleague—a requirement more honored in the breach than observance." Raoul L. Felder, A Degree Isn't a License to Steal, Newsday, 19 March 1991, at 98.

break, v.t. A. In Contract Law. Break is frequently a casual equivalent of breach, v.t.—e.g.: "The power but not the right to break a contract exists, like the power to commit a crime or tort, but the breach is a wrong in either case." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 301–02 (1930)./ "[I]t is a crime to break such a contract, if the probable consequence will be to cause injury or danger or grave inconvenience to the community." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 162 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

B. As an Element of the Crime of Burglary. In the law of burglary, the word break is used in a peculiar sense. It does not require damage to property, yet it is more than crossing an imaginary line when we speak of "breaking into a house." Entering through an open door or window is not breaking; all that is needed is opening a door or window, even if not locked or latched.

breakdown = (1) failure; or (2) subdivision. The former meaning is much older (ca. 1832); the latter has been considered OFFICIALESE since it first appeared in the mid-20th century.

break-in, n. So hyphenated.

breast (of the court), in the. See LOAN TRANSLATIONS.

breath; breathe. The first is the noun, the second the verb. How one might mistake breath for breathe is almost inexplicable: "The complainant began screaming and appellant again covered her nose and mouth with his hand; the complainant began gagging and could not breath [read breathe]."

breathable. See breath(e)able.

breathalyzer; intoxilyzer; drunkometer; alcoholometer. Breathalyzer is a PORTMANTEAU WORD for breath-analyzer. The nominal form is breath-analysis. In BrE the word is breathalyser (standard) or breathaliser; in AmE it is sometimes spelled breathalizer, although -lyzer is more common: "The taking of a breathalyzer test with the consent of a defendant accused of driving while intoxicated violates none of his rights."

Intoxilyzer, likewise a PORTMANTEAU WORD (for intoxication-analyzer), is an increasingly popular term for the device that measures blood-alcohol content. See, e.g., State ex rel. Collins v. Seidel, 691 P.2d 678, 679 (Ariz. 1984) (en banc). Intoxilyzer is new enough, however, that it is not included in the dictionaries. Drunkometer, a HYBRID, was widespread when the device was still new (in the 1930s), but has fallen into disuse, perhaps because of its jocular effect. The term alcoholometer is likewise little used today.

In referring to the test performed rather than to the device performing it, breath test is the most succinct phraseology, used often by the U.S Supreme Court and by British courts as well. Breathalyzer test, a somewhat inferior variant, is also commonly used. See, e.g., Simpson v. State, 707 P.2d 43, 45 (Okla. Crim. App. 1985).

breath(e)able. The parenthesized -e- should be omitted: breathable. See MUTE E.

brethren. Where persons are not brothers by birth, the plural form brethren has survived only in religious and legal contexts. E.g., "In this case I have the misfortune to differ in opinion from a majority of my brethren." Smith v. Richards, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 26, 43 (1839) (Story, J., dissenting)./ "In Rookes v. Barnard Lord Devlin, with the unanimous approval of his brethren, had laid down that exemplary damages could only be awarded in three types of circumstances." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 167 (2d ed. 1985).

Courts have considered the word generic in testamentary contexts (i.e., as referring both to males and to females). But most readers are unlikely to see it as gender-neutral: one commentator writes that this EUPHEMISM "gives a not wholly misleading indication of the frequency with which women are appointed as judges." David Pannick, Judges 157 (1987). The word is unlikely to flourish in AmE because of its perceived SEXISM. Nor does brethren and sistren seem likely to catch on, sistren being the analogous archaic plural of sister. That plural, unlike its brother, is now chiefly dialectal. See brother & sistren.

Brothers is sometimes used where brethren would normally appear—e.g.: "[W]hile I see more ambiguity than do my dissenting brothers, it is of no matter because we do not write on a clean slate." James v. U.S., 760 F.2d 590, 606 (5th Cir. 1985) (Higginbotham, J., dissenting).

breve [fr. brevis "short"] is the LAW LATIN equivalent of writ. Hence, in older texts, breve originale means "original writ" and breve de recto means "writ of right." E.g., "A writ (breve in Latin, brief in French) was a thin strip of parchment containing a letter in the name of the king, usually written in Latin, and sealed with the great seal." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 67 (3d ed. 1990)./ "Furthermore, novel disseisin only lies in the Royal courts; there is no form of writ corresponding to the breve de recto." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 28 (1961). (See writ of right.) Pl. brevia.

briber; bribee; bribe-giver; bribe-taker. A bribe is a reward or favor given or promised to a person in a position of trust in order that that person's judgment will be skewed or conduct corrupted in one's favor. The one who gives the bribe is termed the briber, the one who receives it the bribee. E.g., "Made when the allegedly extorted bribe money was being paid, the tape recording in this case is of the actual voices of the briber and the bribee." U.S. v. Sopher, 362 F.2d 523, 525 (7th Cir. 1966)./ "This section does not reach a simple breach of fiduciary duty; it covers only corrupt breaches that involve a bribe. Briber and bribee are then equally guilty." Tex. Penal Code § 32.43, Practice Commentary at 667 (West 1974).

Some writers use the terms bribe-giver and bribe-taker, which are undoubtedly clearer to more readers. E.g., "The usual pleas of the bribe-giver or -taker is that he only followed the example he saw everywhere about him, that he only did directly and candidly what others were doing indirectly and hypocritically." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 49 (1968)./ "The starting point in the law of bribery seems to have been when a judge, for doing his office or acting under color of his office, took a reward or fee from some person who had occasion to come before him,—and apparently guilt attached only to the judge himself and not to the bribe-giver." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 527 (3d ed. 1982).

bribery (= the corrupt payment, receipt, or solicitation of a private favor for official action) generally refers to the bribe-giver's actions as well as to the bribe-taker's. (Some jurisdictions restrict bribe to the act of the bribe-giver and refer to the bribe-taker's offense as receiving a bribe.) A misdemeanor at common law, the offense has been made a statutory felony in most English-speaking jurisdictions.

In the phrase commercial bribery, the term has been extended beyond its traditional reference to the act of a government official. Commercial bribery refers to the advantage that one competitor secures over other competitors by surreptitious, corrupt dealing with the agents and employees of prospective buyers. See extortion.

brief, n. = (1) in AmE, the written arguments of counsel for consultation by the court; (2) in BrE, a document by which a solicitor instructs a barrister with an abstract of the pleadings and facts as the barrister prepares to appear as an advocate in court; (3) in BrE, a barrister's authority to appear; or (4) in AmE and BrE, an abstract of all the documents affecting the title to real property (known also as abstract of title, q.v.).

brief, v.t., occurs primarily in legal, military, diplomatic, and business contexts. In American legal writing, the term refers to preparing a written brief—e.g.: "Both the statutory and constitutional issues have been fully briefed and argued here." In British legal writing—as in American business, diplomatic, and military contexts—the term refers to preparing, informing, or authorizing a person. E.g., "The company briefed counsel to oppose the claim." (Eng.) See also debriefing.

briefcase gets its name from the legal profession, being originally "a case in which lawyers carry their briefs." Briefcase and attaché (case) are the only terms current in AmE. In BrE, brief-bag (for barristers), deed-case or briefcase (for solicitors), and attaché case are used.

briefly = (1) soon; or (2) not for long. Thus it may cause ambiguities in some contexts <he will deliver his speech briefly>. Cf. presently.

BRIEF-WRITING. Except on technical points touched on throughout, brief-writing as a discipline is largely beyond the purview of this book. Still, a few points deserve mention here.

First, a hardly disputable point: American judges find most briefs that they read tough going. As one federal appellate judge chastely puts it, "[I]n my experience it is the rare brief-writer who seizes the opportunity to employ the clarity, simplicity, and directness of expression necessary to endow a brief with maximum persuasive force." Roger J. Miner, Confronting the Communication Crisis in the Legal Profession, 34 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 1, 9 (1989). Other federal appellate judges have called most briefs "execrable" and have estimated the number of "truly helpful" briefs at somewhere between 5% and 10%. Though elected judges are generally more forgiving in their assessment, anyone concerned with the literary aspects of practicing law must be troubled by these evaluations.

Second, even though most briefs fall short of most judges' standards, those standards probably ought to be higher than they are. Consider the standard suggested by Karl Llewellyn in a brilliant lecture just a few days before he died: "[Y]ou need to interest them [the judges] in that brief. You've got to make them feel that when they come to the brief, 'Oh, baby; is it going to be hot.' And they've got to approach the brief with that favorable atmosphere you need." A Lecture on Appellate Advocacy, 29 U. Chi. L. Rev. 627, 639 (1962). In the hands of the right brief-writer, of course, virtually any brief can be "hot." But few are.

Third, the most important—and frequently the most neglected—aspect of any brief is the statement of the issues. Framing issues well has become an all but lost art among modern lawyers. For an explanation of how to frame issues effectively, see ISSUE-FRAMING.

For helpful discussions of the subject, see John W. Cooley, Callaghan's Appellate Advocacy Manual (looseleaf); Appellate Practice Manual (Priscilla A. Schwab ed., 1992) (pt. 3); Ruggero J. Aldisert, Winning on Appeal (1992); Edward D. Re, Brief Writing and Oral Argument (6th ed. 1987); Girvan Peck, Writing Persuasive Briefs (1984); and Jean Appleman's Persuasion in Brief Writing (1968). For a discussion of the most common sin in briefs, see OVERPARTICULARIZATION.

bright-line rule = a judicial rule of decision that is simple and straightforward and that avoids or ignores the ambiguities or difficulties of the problems at hand. The phrase dates from the mid-20th century. The metaphor of a bright line is somewhat older than the phrase bright-line rule—e.g.: "The difficult part of this case comes with regard to . . . the activity of the Board of Temperance . . . . A bright line between that which brings conviction to one person and its influence on the body politic cannot be drawn." Girard Trust Co. v. I.R.C., 122 F.2d 108, 110 (3d Cir. 1941)./ "[T]he McCambridge majority opinion . . . agrees that the Kirby bright-line-rule is but a mere formalism . . . ." J.G. Trichter, Bright-Lining Away the Right to Counsel, Tex. Law., 6 Nov. 1989, at 26. Cf. hard and fast rule.

brilliance; brilliancy. Brilliance is preferred in describing a quality or state. Brilliancy, not quite a NEEDLESS VARIANT, may be called on to mean "something brilliant" <the brilliancies in Justice Holmes's writings are legion>.

bring; take. "Bring is confused with take only by the illiterate or the unthinking." E. Partridge, Usage and Abusage 61 (1957). The OED notes that bring "implies motion towards the place where the speaker or auditor is, or is supposed to be, being in sense the causal of come; motion in the opposite direction is expressed by take [being in sense the causal of go]." The distinction would seem to be too elementary for elaboration here, but: "One of plaintiff's duties was to pick up old tie plates from around the railroad tracks and bring [read take] them to a central location."

bring an action against is verbose for sue—e.g.: "Hynes' mother brought an action for damages against the company [read sued the company for damages]." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 86 (1963).

bring error = bring an appeal. See error (A).

bring in (a verdict). Juries are traditionally said to bring in a verdict—that is, to bring it back into the courtroom. E.g., "The Judge's summing-up was brief but thorough, and after a short retirement the jury brought in a verdict of guilty." Stanley Jackson, The Life and Cases of Mr. Justice Humphreys 175 (n.d. [1951])./ "The jury brought in a $4.9 million verdict for the Coliseum . . . ." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 115 (1991).

bring to book = to arrest and try (an offender). E.g., "The genuinely unfortunate aspect of today's ruling is not that fewer fugitives will be brought to book." Steagald v. U.S., 451 U.S. 204, 231 (1981) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting)./ "Since then, however, both Reagan and Bush have been frustrated in their attempts to bring terrorists to book and to end the saga of US hostages in Beirut." Simon O'Dwyer-Russell, £2.5m Reward to Find Lockerbie Bombers, Sunday Telegraph, 29 April 1990, at 2./ "[I]t is not the aim of the EC to bring governments to book before the European Court of Justice." Tories Accused of Trying to Subvert Brussels Directive, The Times, 2 June 1990, at 3.

BRITISHISMS. See AMERICANISMS AND BRITISHISMS.

broach. See breach.

broad. See wide.

broad brush is a legal METAPHOR signifying a general or sweeping effect. E.g., "We are aware that exemption is a broad brush; the club that loses its exemption becomes taxable on income from all sources, including dues, assessments, and membership fees."/ "Congress is much more comfortable painting with a broad brush—'discrimination is forbidden'—than in filling in the details." Linda Greenhouse, A Changed Court Revises Rules on Civil Rights, N.Y. Times, 18 June 1989, at E1.

broadcast; telecast; cablecast; radiocast. These are the correct forms for the past as well as for the present tense. Adding -ed, though fairly common, is incorrect.

Broadcast sometimes acts as an illusory intransitive. "There are no doubt substantially more individuals who want to broadcast than there are frequencies to allocate." Though it has no object in this sentence, broadcast is not really used intransitively, for the object is understood. Obviously one broadcasts programs, and there is no need to specify what would be broadcast if it is plainly understood. See forecast.

brocard /broh-kard/ = an elementary legal principle or maxim, esp. one deriving from Roman law or ancient custom. The word is omitted from most abridged English-language dictionaries, such as W10 and AHD. E.g., "That important and novel legal questions should not be decided in a vacuum is a brocard." U.S. v. Birrell, 262 F. Supp. 97, 99 (S.D.N.Y. 1967)./ "[T]he brocard that a patent is a legally conferred monopoly ordinarily carries precious little value . . . ." Edward H. Cooper, Attempts and Monopolization, 72 Mich. L. Rev. 373, 416 (1974)./ "Mindful of these precepts, and of the brocard that summary judgments should be granted only sparingly in Title VII cases, . . . we find the district court's summary disposition improvident." Price v. Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 687 F.2d 74, 78 (5th Cir. 1982).

brokerage; brokage. Brokerage = (1) the business or office of a broker <real-estate brokerage is a profession requiring knowledge and experience>; or (2) a broker's fee <brokerage differs from an underwriting commission>.

The archaic brokage (or, alternatively, brocage) means "the corrupt jobbing of offices; the bribe unlawfully paid for any office" (OED). In this sense, brokage is the lay equivalent of simony. See barratry.

Brokage is also an archaic NEEDLESS VARIANT of brokerage, but it remains the standard form in a single phrase, marriage brokage—e.g.: "[T]he law of England will not enforce a contract of 'marriage brokage' . . . ." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 277 (13th ed. 1924)./ "So, also, marriage-brokage contracts have long been held to be void . . ." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 242 (3d ed. 1981)./ "A marriage brokage contract is one by which a person promises in return for a money consideration to procure the marriage of another." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 390 (8th ed. 1991).

brother. This term is often used, by judges, of a male associate on the bench. E.g., "Our trial brother [i.e., the trial court judge] fell into error of law in his analysis by his implicit assumption that the appellant's 'substantial disability' provided the postal service legally sufficient grounds for rejecting appellant's bid for the clerk/carrier position." See brethren.

A substitute for brother in this context, perhaps useful in avoiding SEXISM or in referring to a fellow judge who is a woman, is colleague: "I disagree with my colleagues because I believe the stipulation signed by the two attorneys was at best ambiguous."

brother-in-law. Pl. brothers-in-law.

brush, broad. See broad brush.

brusque; brusk. The former spelling is preferred.

brutum fulmen (= an empty noise; an empty threat) is no TERM OF ART; it is the worst type of LATINISM in the law, expressing a commonplace notion for which a variety of English phrases suffice. E.g., "A court of equity cannot lawfully enjoin the world at large, no matter how broadly it words its decree; if it assumes to do so, the decree is pro tanto brutum fulmen [read ineffectual] and the persons enjoined are free to ignore it."

budget, vb., forms budgeted and budgeting in AmE, budgetted and budgetting in BrE. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

budget-making is best hyphenated. See decision-making.

buggery is a legal term usually meaning "sodomy," but sometimes also "bestiality." Bugger (= sodomite) was originally a respectable legal term, though now it is a dialectal term of playful abuse, not necessarily implying sodomy. As the SOED chastely notes, bugger is "vulgar exc. in law." Here the original meaning obtains, though with contemptuous overtones: "The middle age of buggers is not to be contemplated without horror" (Virginia Woolf).

In BrE, buggery is the more usual legal term than sodomy. It means "anal intercourse by a man with another man or a woman or bestiality by a man or a woman" (CDL). E.g., "Buggery[:] One of the circumstances constituting this offence is where the penis penetrates the anus of a male or female, and the maximum penalty is life imprisonment." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 310 (1991). The active bugger is guilty as the agent, whereas the receiving bugger is called (and is guilty as) the patient. See EUPHEMISM.

bulk, n., sometimes causes writers to doubt which form of the verb to use, singular or plural—e.g.: "The vast bulk of recorded crimes falls [read fall?] into the category of property offences." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 39 (1991). Some writers, finding support in the principle of SYNESIS, would write fall in that sentence. And they have the better position: when the phrase bulk of the is followed by a plural COUNT NOUN, the verb should be plural—a form attested from the early 19th century in historical dictionaries. Hence, the bulk of the people are is better than the bulk of the people is (a dehumanizing formulation).

bulk large is an acceptable variant of loom large. E.g., "Transferability of interests should not ordinarily bulk large in the decision whether or not to incorporate."/ "It bulks very large, for instance, in every census of India." Both loom large and bulk large have become CLICHÉS.

bumbailiff is a BrE slang term for "a bailiff or sheriff's officer who collects debts." Bum (= buttocks) was aptly coupled with bailiff in this term—actually a corruption of bound bailiff—because of the debt-collectors' habit of catching debtors from behind. This humorous word is now obsolescent. See bailiwick.

buncombe; bunkum. This term (meaning "political talk that is empty or insincere") derives from Buncombe County, North Carolina, because the congressman from the district embracing that county early in the 19th century felt compelled, despite interruptions, to "make a speech for Buncombe." Buncombe has remained the standard spelling, and is to be preferred because it recalls the interesting origin of the word. E.g., "Or would we dig deeply into our stories of neighborliness and buncombe and cobble together something almost great?" Thomas Hine, Don't Blame Mrs. O'Leary, N.Y. Times, 15 July 1990, § 7, at 13.

burden of proof. A. Senses. This ambiguous term refers to two distinct concepts, as James Bradley Thayer was the first to observe in the late 19th century. See 1 James B. Thayer, Evidence 355–64 (1898). Many judicial decisions that ignore the distinction contain muddled reasoning.

The first concept is known more particularly—and unambiguously—as the risk of nonpersuasion, the burden of persuasion, and the persuasion burden. A party meets this burden by convincing the fact-finder to view the facts in a way that favors that party. Today the phrase burden of proof most often bears this meaning.

The second concept is known more particularly—and unambiguously—as the duty of producing evidence, the burden of going forward with evidence, the production burden, or the burden of evidence. A party meets this burden by introducing enough evidence to have a given issue considered in the case.

One writer explains what has emerged as the modern scholarly consensus: "[I]t is now commonplace that the term burden of proof is used in a double sense," adding: "Much confusion would be eliminated if . . . the ambiguous word proof [were] entirely discarded." Roy R. Ray, Texas Law of Evidence § 41, at 48 (3d ed. 1980).

B. And onus of proof. The phrase burden of proof is usual in American legal writing; both phrases are used in British legal writing. E.g., "The judge next directed the jury as to the onus of proof upon the issue of provocation." (Eng.) See onus & LOAN TRANSLATIONS bureau. The better plural form is bureaus; the Frenchified plural, bureaux, should be avoided as a pretension.

burgeon literally means "to put forth buds; sprout." Although some usage experts have considered it objectionable in meaning "to flourish, grow," no good reason exists to avoid burgeon in these figurative senses: but it should be used of growth at its incipient stages, not of full-blown expansion. Here it seems inappropriate: "The creation of 35 new circuit judgeships in 1978 was not intended as a long-term solution to the problem, but was simply one response to burgeoning caseloads."/ "Unsanitary and unsafe, many of our overflowing prisons no longer have the capacity to legally hold the burgeoning inmate populations created by our ever-increasing war on crime."

burglarious = of, relating to, or inclined to burglary. E.g., "The completion of the burglarious intent is not essential to guilt . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 169 (1957)./ "Although primarily aimed against the carrying of burglarious tools, it applies also to the possession of a large variety of other objects with the requisite intent . . . ." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 819–20 (1978).

Burglariously (L. burglariter) was formerly obligatory in indictments for burglary at common law. The word still occasionally appears in more modern contexts—e.g.: "[T]he state argued . . . that . . . he had burglariously and feloniously remained in the women's home." State v. Thomson, 861 P.2d 492, 495 (Wash. Ct. App. 1993).

burglarize; burgle. Burglarize is an American coinage from the late 19th century meaning "to rob burglariously" (OED). It is still largely confined to AmE. Burgle, a BACK-FORMATION of comparable vintage, has the same meaning; in AmE, burgle is usually facetious or jocular, whereas in BrE it is standard and colorless—e.g.: "If you think it is a good idea that the prime minister's house should be burgled, it is just as well not to express the thought to a cracksman . . . ." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 31 (1978).

In American judicial opinions, burglarize appears about 30 times as frequently as burgle. E.g., "He readily spoke about burglaries, . . . but attributed them to someone named 'George,' a person of bad influence who forced Heirens to search out places for him to burglarize." People v. Heirens, 122 N.E.2d 231, 234 (Ill. 1954)./ "While he was away both apartments were burglarized and damaged." U.S. v. Doby, 684 F. Supp. 558, 560 (N.D. Ind. 1988). See rob.

burglary. A. And *robbery; theft; larceny. These four terms may overlap to a degree, but no two are perfectly synonymous. Burglary = (1) (in the classic sense) the act of breaking and entering another's house at night with intent to commit a felony (e.g., murder) or—in jurisdictions with statutes making petit larceny a misdemeanor—possibly petit larceny as well; (2) (in the modern AmE sense) the act of breaking and entering a building with the intent to commit a felony (dropping the requirements that it be [a] a house, and [b] at night); or (3) (in the modern BrE sense) the offense either of entering a building, ship, or inhabited vehicle (e.g., a caravan) as a trespasser with the intention of committing one of four specified crimes in it (burglary with intent) or of entering it as a trespasser but subsequently committing one of two specified crimes in it (burglary without intent) (CDL). The specified offenses in G.B. are, for burglary with intent: (1) stealing; (2) inflicting grievous bodily harm; (3) causing criminal damage; and (4) rape. And for burglary without intent: (1) stealing or attempting to steal; and (2) inflicting or attempting to inflict grievous bodily harm.

Robbery = feloniously taking personal property by force or threat of force from the immediate presence of the victim. Theft is a statutory wrong that is broader than robbery, although nonlawyers often consider the words synonymous; robbery means "the taking of personal property belonging to another without his consent, and with the intent to deprive the owner of its value." Theft is also broader than larceny (= the felonious stealing of personal property, the fraudulent taking and carrying away [asportation, q.v.] of a thing without claim of right), for it includes the lawful acquisition and subsequent appropriation of the personalty. In England, the common-law felony of larceny was superseded by the Theft Act of 1968.

The exact definitions of these terms may vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. But it is universal that people are the objects of robbery; places are the objects of burglary; and things are the objects of larceny and theft.

In American legal writing, when of follows burglary, some infelicity or other is almost certain to follow; burglary of an automobile would traditionally have been considered a legal blunder, though several states now have statutes that incorporate this phrase; burglary of a building is a REDUNDANCY, unless the reference is to a particular building, as burglary of the Stokes Building.

B. And housebreaking. Whereas a burglary traditionally occurred at night, a housebreaking (q.v.) might occur at any time of day. In Scots law, either offense has historically been called housebreaking.

burgle. See burglarize.

BURIED VERBS. Jargonmongers call them "nominalizations," i.e., verbs that have been changed into nouns. Without the jargon, one might say that the verbs have been buried in a longer noun—usually a noun ending in one of the following suffixes: -tion, -sion, -ment, -ence, -ance, -ity. It is hardly an exaggeration—no, one hardly exaggerates—to say that, whenever the verb will work in context, the better choice is to use it instead of a buried verb. Thus:

The Verb Buried	The Verb Uncovered arbitration	arbitrate compulsion	compel
computerization	computerize conformity, -ance	conform

contravention	contravene dependence	depend enablement	enable enforcement	enforce hospitalization	hospitalize identity	identify incorporation	incorporate indemnification	indemnify litigation	litigate
mediation	mediate
knowledge	know
maximization	maximize minimization	minimize obligation	obligate, oblige opposition	oppose penalization	penalize
perpetration	perpetrate perpetuation	perpetuate reduction	reduce utilization	utilize, use (vb.)
violation	violate

Naturally, you will sometimes need to refer to arbitration or litigation or mediation as a procedure, and when that is so you must say arbitration or litigation or mediation. But if a first draft refers to the mediation of the claims by the parties, you might well consider having the second draft refer to the parties' mediating the claims or to the time when the parties will mediate their claims.

Why uncover buried verbs? Three reasons are detectable to the naked eye: first, you generally eliminate prepositions in the process; second, you often eliminate be-verbs by replacing them with so-called "action" verbs; and third, you humanize the text by saying who does what (an idea often obscured by buried verbs).

The fourth reason is not detectable to the naked eye: in fact, it is the sum of the three reasons already mentioned. By uncovering buried verbs, you make your writing much less abstract—it becomes much easier for readers to visualize what you're talking about. (Compare: "After the transformation of nominalizations, the text has fewer abstractions; readers' visualization of the discussion is enhanced.") Writing that is laden with buried verbs tends to numb the mind: "In our day, long English words of Latin origin—sometimes in the form of sociological or pseudo-scientific gobbledygook—often have hypnotic or sleep-inducing effects." Sperbeck v. A.L. Burbank & Co., 190 F.2d 449, 450 n.8 (2d Cir. 1951). See ABSTRACTITIS.

Though long neglected in books about writing, buried verbs ought to be a sworn enemy of every serious writer. In legal writing, they constitute a more serious problem even than PASSIVE VOICE—whether in analytical writing, persuasive writing, or drafting.

burthen is an ARCHAISM and a NEEDLESS VARIANT of burden that still occasionally burdens legal writing. Shakespeare used it frequently, but it has little place in 20th-century prose. E.g., "That the title of the land, when acquired by the community, was taken in the name of the wife, imposes no additional burthen [read burden] upon the purchaser of inquiring into the equities of the husband and wife in respect to it."

bus, n. & v.t. The plural form of the noun (meaning a large vehicle that holds many passengers) is buses. The verb (meaning "to transport by bus") is inflected bus > bused > bused; the present participle is busing. When the -s- is doubled, the sense is different: bussed means "kissed," and bussing means "kissing."

Arthur A. Leff knowingly uses bussing for busing in The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1967 (1985). In his entry under busing, Leff takes the position that the word is "also properly spelled bussing." Accepting that dictum would destroy the DIFFERENTIATION that has evolved between the forms, and therefore it is to be taken as unsound. Busing is preferred even in BrE in nonosculatory senses. See Oxford Guide 9.

bush lawyer is an Australian term meaning "a person pretending to have considerable legal knowledge" (W3). This term might deserve universal adoption, for we need such a name. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (B). bussing. See bus.

but. A. Beginning Sentences with. It is a gross canard that beginning a sentence with but is stylistically slipshod. In fact, doing so is highly desirable in any number of contexts, and most style books that squarely discuss the question say that but is better than however at the beginning of a sentence. See Garner, On Beginning Sentences with "But," 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 87 (1992). For combinations with and and but starting sentences, see and (A). See also SUPERSTITIONS.

Good writers frequently begin sentences with but, and have always done so—e.g.:

- "But let it be admitted, for argument's sake, that mere wantonness and lust of domination would be sufficient to beget that disposition . . . ." The Federalist No. 17, at 119 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).
- "When a vessel at sea begins to founder there comes a time when it must be given up as lost. But we do not give the order to abandon ship as soon as, let us say, a fuel pump begins to function erratically." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 21 (1968).

- "It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that such a husband might be convicted either of manslaughter or of abetting suicide. But he ought not to be." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 531 (1978).
- "[T]he strongest case for imposing legal liability arises where there are both benefit and detrimental reliance. But it is not necessary that both detriment and benefit should be present in order that the consideration should be good." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 101 (3d ed. 1981).
- "Despite errors and failings, Blackstone did manage to put in brief order the rank weeds of English law. But even his picture was partial and defective, like a dictionary that omitted all slang, all dialect, all colloquial and technical words." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 21 (2d ed. 1985).

B. More Than One in a Sentence. Putting this coordinating conjunction (also called a "coordinator") twice in one sentence invariably makes the sentence unwieldy and less than easily readable. E.g., "There is authority for damages when the employment denied would have enhanced the employee's reputation, as a motion-picture credit would, but this has been applied only once in the United States, but is [read though it is] common in England." See the following subsection.

C. For and. This is a common mistake. In the following sentences, the second clause follows naturally from the first—it does not state an exception to or qualification of the first—hence and is the appropriate conjunction. E.g., "Summary judgment is a potent weapon, but [read and] courts must be mindful of its aims and targets and beware of overkill in its use."/ "This action was brought by the administrator of Katherine Veach against the Louisville & Interurban Railway Company, to recover damages for [Miss Veach's] death in the sum of $25,000, but [read and] a trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the administrator." Veach's Adm'r v. Louisville & Interurban Ry., 228 S.W. 35, 35 (Ky. 1921).

D. Preposition or Conjunction. The use of but in a negative sense after a pronoun ("No one but she or her") has long caused confusion. If we take but to be a preposition (meaning "except"), the objective her (or him) follows. But if we take but as a conjunction, the nominative she (or he) would be proper.

The correct form depends on the structure of the sentence. If the verb precedes the but-phrase, the objective case should be used—e.g.: "None of the defendants were convicted but him."

If, however, the but-phrase precedes the verb, the nominative case is proper: "None of the defendants but he were convicted." This sentence is considered equivalent to "None of the defendants were convicted, but he was convicted." But thus acts as a conjunction when it precedes the verb in a sentence such as this, from Thomas Jefferson: "You, however, can easily correct this bill to the taste of my brother lawyers, by making every other word a 'said' or 'aforesaid,' and saying everything two or three times, so that nobody but we of the craft can understand the diction, and find out what it means."

but for (= if not for, except for) has become a useful LEGALISM, as in the following sentences: "I also think that the statute is constitutional, and but for the decision of my brethren I should have felt pretty clear about it." Adair v. U.S., 208 U.S. 161, 190 (1908) (Holmes, J., dissenting)./ "The evidence also showed that, but for the negligence of Lee-Vac, the socket would never have failed."/ "It is therefore quite plain that but for the constitutional prohibition on the operation of segregated public parks, the City of Macon would continue to own and maintain Baconsfield."/ "A bad motive will render a conveyance or transfer of property void which, but for the bad motive, would have been valid."

In American legal writing, the phrase is frequently used attributively as an adjective, as in but-for test or but-for relationship. In such phrases, it is better to hyphenate than to use quotation marks around the phrasal adjective. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES. For but-for causation, see CAUSATION (A).

One should avoid using this phrase in two different senses in close proximity, as here (in the third appearance of the phrase): "[T]here is no pretense that the Coliseum would ever be restored to the position it would have occupied but for [i.e., were it not for] the wrong. But for [i.e., were it not for] the NFL's antitrust violation, the Coliseum would have had college football plus the Raiders, and it would have had the Raiders immediately instead of later. It is true that these losses were short-term, but for [i.e., except that for] that period they were irreplaceable, and therefore irreparable." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 114 (1991).

but rather is usually unnecessary, either word singly doing the work that both purport to do. E.g., "The court does not mean to suggest by this opinion that all former sufferers of mental illness should be permitted to own firearms; but, rather,

[read rather,] if Congress has determined that there are circumstances under which former criminals can own and possess weapons and a means is provided to establish such an entitlement, former mental patients are entitled to no less."

but yet is always a REDUNDANCY for yet. E.g., "This report focuses on three disparate but yet related [read disparate yet related] areas of broker-dealer compliance." Cf. as yet.

buy; purchase. As a verb, buy is the ordinary word, purchase the more FORMAL WORD. Generally, buy is the better stylistic choice. As one commentator says, "Only a very pompous person indeed would say he was going to purchase an ice-cream cone or a bar of candy." Robert Hendrickson, Business Talk 61 (1984). Traditionally, however, purchase has been the proper word for real property. See descent.

Purchase, may also act as a noun; buy is informal and colloquial as a noun . See purchase.

buyback, n. One word.

buydown, n. One word.

buyer; purchaser. In most contexts, buyer is the better term because it is plainer.

buyout. One word.

by and between. Though this is a hallowed expression at the outset of contracts, it is unnecessary: between alone suffices. E.g., "This is an agreement by and between [read between] Grand Force, Inc. and William Shipley." See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

by and through, typical LEGALESE, can be replaced by either by or through. E.g., "On March 12, 1987, Defendant Caterpillar, by and through [read through] its counsel, Stephen Schoettmer, responded to Plaintiff's first amended interrogatories." See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

by and with is a classic legal REDUNDANCY with but one legitimate use: "For appointments to constitutional offices the phrase by and with the advice of the Senate is a TERM OF ART and should not be changed." Reed Dickerson, Legislative Drafting 75 n.4 (1954). See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

by(e)-election. By-election is preferred in both AmE and BrE.

byelaw. See bylaw.

by its four corners. See four corners of the instrument.

bylaw; byelaw. Not only the spelling but also the sense differs in AmE from that in BrE. In G.B., byelaws are regulations made by a local authority or corporation, such as a town or a railway. In the U.S., bylaws are most commonly the administrative provisions of a corporation that are either attached to the articles of incorporation or kept privately.

The spelling without the -e- is preferred in AmE. Though etymologically inferior, byelaw (sometimes hyphenated) is standard in British legal texts. E.g., "Clause four requires the contractor to comply with Acts of Parliament and byelaws." (Eng.)/ "It would surprise me if the courts of England would hold that when the English Parliament gave the Birmingham Municipality the authority to make bye-laws for the good government of the city, it intended also to give the municipality the authority to segregate West Indians from Europeans in the use of public conveniences." (Rhod.) For British publications, the house style of Oxford University Press, however, is by-law. See ordinance.

by law. See under law.

by means of is usually verbose for by.

by-product is usually hyphenated, though there is a tendency to make it one word.

by reason of is wordy for because of—e.g.: "[B]y reason of [read Because of] the injuries aforesaid, the plaintiff has been put to great expense for care and medical treatment . . . ." Max Radin, The Law and You 102 (1948) (quoting a pleading).

by the court; per curiam. By the court is merely an English translation of per curiam (see LOAN TRANSLATIONS), a term that appears in opinions not attributed to any one member of the court. Contrary to the notion that some lawyers have, per curiam opinions usually deal with routine matters that are seen by the judges as having little precedential value; they often dispose of such cases summarily. Per curiam opinions should not be construed as exhibiting greater unanimity among members of the court than a signed opinion without a dissent.

Some courts variously use both per curiam and by the court, of course without differentiation. (Though the practice is now rare, some courts have used merely the court for per curiam opinions.) It might be best to stick with a single phrase, lest readers of the opinions come to think there must be a distinction. On the one hand, per curiam is unambiguous and can be used attributively (per curiam opinion), whereas by the court may create ambiguities in speech and in writing. Though it is a LATINISM, per curiam is a useful and well-established one: it is not likely to be discarded any time soon. On the other hand, by the court is at least a comprehensible phrase to all speakers of English, even if they do not all understand its import. Certainly this is the better phrase for popular journalism.

by the later of [date] and [date]; by the later of [date] or [date]. See later of [date] or [date].

by virtue of. See virtue of, in & by.

byword (= a proverb or saying) is best spelled as one word and not hyphenated. "We are not harking back to Latin bywords (Nemo debet esse judex in propria causa [i.e., "No man ought to be a judge in his own case"]) without sanction of our highest court."

cab(b)ala(h) (= an esoteric or secret doctrine) is preferably spelled cabala in AmE, cabbala in BrE.

cablecast. See broadcast.

cab-rank rule = the rule (in G.B.) that a barrister or advocate, if not already engaged, must accept any case in his or her area of practice, however unpopular or disreputable the cause may be. The rule dates back to the 13th century, when the serjeants-at-law were sworn to represent all comers. The metaphor, of course, refers to how cabdrivers must line up to accept each fare in turn, without turning away any potential customer in favor of others. Nowadays, in English law practice, the rule is "more celebrated for the way in which it has been ignored." Robert Rice, Amendment to Cab-Rank Clause Is Welcomed, Fin. Times, 14 May 1990, at I-12.

caducary; caduciary; caducous. Most often rendered caducary, the word means (of a bequest or estate) "subject to, relating to, or by way of escheat, lapse, or forfeiture." Labeled "Old Law" in the OED, it has nevertheless persisted from Blackstone's day to 20th-century AmE—usu. in the phrase caducary succession—esp. in New York practice. See, e.g., In re Peer's Estate, 245 N.Y.S. 298, 301 (Surr. Ct. 1930) (noting that the amendments "were apparently intended to waive the rights of the State to claim escheat, or rights of 'caducary successions,' where there were no blood relatives").

The SOED entry appears under caduciary, which is the "nonetymological form" that, according to the OED, received the superfluous -i- by confusion with fiduciary. Perhaps because of its spurious origins, caduciary has not appeared in recent American or English caselaw. But Scottish texts predominantly use this spelling. One, for example, posits the question "whether the rights of the Crown in England are to be regarded as caduciary or successoral." A.E. Anton, Private International Law 679 (2d ed. 1990). Like caducous, the form caduciary is—outside Scotland—best considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT caduce, v.t. = to take by escheat or lapse. Derived as a BACK-FORMATION from caducary, q.v., this NEOLOGISM has achieved a surprising degree of currency. E.g., "As it is clear that the Government of Ecuador would not assume the obligation to pay the royalties, and that the contract provided that the companies would pay royalties only on oil they sold, the Government, in effect, caduced the plaintiff's royalty rights." Norsul Oil & Mining Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 703 F. Supp. 1520, 1542 (S.D. Fla. 1988)./ "The next day, the Government delivered a formal notice that Gulf Ecuador would be caduced unless it delivered all funds owed within 30 days." Phoenix Canada Oil Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 658 F. Supp. 1061, 1076 (D. Del. 1987).

caducity (= lapse of a testamentary gift) is current mostly in jurisdictions with strong civil-law ties, such as Louisiana and Puerto Rico. E.g., "In a civil-law context, time-for-suit provisions are of two kinds: prescription and caducity. The first can be tolled under some circumstances. The second cannot be tolled." Edelmann v. Chase Manhattan Bank, 668 F. Supp. 99, 102 n.5 (D.P.R. 1987)./ "The testatrix has not expressed any contingency for the caducity of the legacy . . . ." In re Vance, 2 So. 54, 56 (La. 1887).

caducous. See caducary.

Cain, mark of. See scarlet-letter.

calculatable, which has appeared in several reported cases, is incorrect in place of calculable.

calculated = (1) deliberately taken or made ; or (2) likely <no prospectus may be calculated to deceive>. Sense (2) represents a debasement in meaning that, particularly in criminal-law contexts, damages the utility of the word even in sense (1). See SLIPSHOD EXTENSION calculate out is verbose for calculate. E.g., "I need her to calculate out [read calculate] her lost profits." Cf. distribute out. See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

calculus is best confined to mean "a method of calculation," and not "calculation" itself. Here it is properly used: "One factor that weighs heavily in this calculus [i.e., method of calculation] is Louisiana's interest in providing effective means of redress for its residents."

In the following sentence, calculus should probably be replaced by calculation: "It is no answer to say that chance would have been of little value even if seasonably offered; such a calculus [read calculation] of probabilities is beyond the science of the chancery."

By SLIPSHOD EXTENSION of its proper sense ("a method of calculation") calculus has come to mean "a method of analysis" or even "analysis," an imprecise usage: "Many of the questions that are posed by the contemporary due process calculus [read analysis] cannot be answered with confidence."

calendar is used in BrE for docket or cause-list in criminal cases only; in the U.S. it is used for both civil and criminal cases. See docket.

American lawyers often use the word as a verb <the case was calendared for May 23, 1994>—a centuries-old and unexceptionable use of the word.

caliber; calibre. The preferred spelling in AmE is -er, in BrE -re.

call. See put.

called to the bar = (1) in BrE, admitted to practice as a barrister or advocate; (2) in AmE, admitted to law practice of any kind. Though primarily a BrE locution—limited strictly to barristers and advocates—the phrase has achieved some currency among American lawyers. E.g., "When I was first called to the bar, I received a very large certificate bearing the Governor's signature evidencing my appointment as Attorney at Law and Solicitor in Chancery." Letter of S.B. Rounds, quoted in William Safire, I Stand Corrected 417 (1984).

In BrE, to be called within the bar, as opposed to merely to the bar, is to be appointed King's or Queen's Counsel.

The noun phrase is call to the bar—e.g.: "Timothy, my former pupil, being by some two or three years the senior in call to the Bar, is detained more often than not by the claims of his profession." Sarah Caudwell, Thus Was Adonis Murdered 10 (1981; repr. 1983). Sometimes the phrase is shortened to call: "[H]e almost invariably became a member of the Serjeants' Inn, and ceremonially departed from his Inn of call . . . ." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 25–26 (1973). See admit (C).

callous; callus. The former is the adjective ("hardened, unfeeling"), the latter the noun ("hardened skin"). Unfortunately, during the early 1990s Dr. Scholl's—the firm specializing in foot products—mistakenly advertised callous removers instead of callus removers, encouraging further confusion.

calumny is a somewhat old-fashioned equivalent of defamation. Calumny may refer to either (1) the act of falsely and maliciously misrepresenting the words or actions of others, calculated to injure their reputations (OED), or (2) the false charges or imputations themselves. Although this term was used at common law as a technical legal word, today it is more literary than legal. The phrase breath of calumny is an old CLICHE.

The verb is calumniate—e.g.: "I suppose this woman to be completely innocent of the offence laid to her charge; but she has not been wantonly or maliciously calumniated." (Eng.) Calumnize is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that appears here as a purple flourish: "The second string to the defendant's bench trial bow calumnizes [read criticizes?] the granting of the motion." Moores v. Greenberg, 834 F.2d 1105, 1109 (1st Cir. 1987). See PURPLE PROSE.

came on for hearing; coming on for hearing. These INVERSIONS begin legalistically worded court orders—e.g.: "Came on for hearing this 5th day of July 1994 the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment . . . ." Such a sentence is best reworded—e.g.: "On July 5, 1994, the court heard the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment."

camera (lit., "chamber"—i.e., the judge's private room) is used in the phrase in camera, q.v. See also chambers.

can; may. The distinction between these words has been much discussed. Generally, can expresses physical ability <he can lift 500 pounds>; may expresses permission or authorization <the defense may now close>, and sometimes possibility <the trial may end on Friday>. Although only an insufferable precisian would insist on observing the distinction in speech or informal writing (esp. in questions such as, "Can I wait until August?"), writers are best advised to distinguish between these words in formal contexts.

cancel (out). See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY cancel(l)ed. Because the primary accent falls on the first syllable, in AmE the -l- should not be doubled in the second syllable. The -ll- spelling often mistakenly crops up in American writing, as in this passage: "Unless cancelled [read canceled] as provided in the agreement, the option could be exercised by giving written notice thereof no later than April 1, 1968." Note, however, that in cancellation the ells are doubled (-ll-). See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

candidacy; candidature. The former is the regular term in AmE, the latter in BrE.

cannon. See canon.

cannot should not appear as two words, except in rare instances such as, "With the principles of good English and literary composition to guide the author, legal writing can not only be literature, but also be good literature of obvious excellence and enduring value," in which not is part of the phrase not only . . . but also. (See not only . . . but also.) Cannot is preferable to can't in formal writing. See CONTRACTIONS.

cannot be heard to say is a trite LEGALISM that expresses the notion of estoppel. E.g., "Certainly if the conduct is eventually found by the National Labor Relations Board to be protected by the Taft–Hartley Act, the State cannot be heard to say that it is enjoining that conduct for reasons other than those having to do with labor relations." Weber v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 348 U.S. 468, 480 (1955)./ "All parties were familiar with the custom of the industry regarding liability of pilots and mooring masters and cannot be heard to say that they were ignorant of the practice of attributing mooring masters' negligence to the shipowner." Kane v. Hawaiian Indep. Refinery, Inc., 690 F.2d 722, 724 (9th Cir. 1982).

cannot help but be; cannot help being; cannot but be. In formal contexts, the last two phrases have traditionally been preferred. Still, because cannot help being and (esp.) cannot but be are increasingly rare in AmE and BrE alike, they strike modern readers as stilted and perhaps even alien. Cannot help but be is becoming an accepted idiom that should no longer be stigmatized—e.g.: "Experts say Thomas' court performance cannot help but be affected by the traumatic Senate confirmation hearings." Aaron Epstein, Thomas Survives Controversy, Wins Senate Confirmation, 52–48, Philadelphia Inquirer, 16 Oct. 1991, at 1-A./ "[I]t does not seem that any such argument was ever advanced . . . ; if it had been, I cannot help but think that it would have been given very short shrift indeed." National Employers' Mut. Gen. Ins. Ass'n Ltd v. Jones, [1990] 1 A.C. 24, 59, [1988] 2 All E.R. 425 (H.L.).

canon; cannon. Canon = (1) a corpus of writings <the Holmes canon>; (2) an accepted notion or principle <canons of descent>; (3) a rule of ecclesiastical law (either of the Roman Catholic canon law, or of the Anglican Church); or (4) a cathedral dignitary.

Cannon = (1) a big gun; or (2) the ear of a bell, by which the bell hangs. Cannon incorrectly displaces canon surprisingly often: "[T]he district court focused in part on the sections of the Indiana Code that make bailiffs 'at will' employees and [on] the Cannons [read Canons] of Professional Ethics." Meeks v. Grimes, 779 F.2d 417, 420 n.2 (7th Cir. 1985)./ "He was found to be guilty of violation of the cannons [read canons] of professional ethics by neglecting a legal matter entrusted to him hy a client . . . ." Kentucky Bar Ass'n v. Lester, 781 S.W.2d 517, 517 (Ky. 1989).

canon law; church law. These synonymous phrases refer to the codified law governing a church. Traditionally, the word refers specifically to the ecclesiastical law governing the Roman Catholic church, consisting largely of papal bulls, other official decrees, and writings by personages within the church.

The adjectival form corresponding to canons (= the laws or rules of the church) is canonical, which has long been a secularized synonym of axiomatic: "This court has so repeatedly held that complete dominion and authority over the property imports a fee simple title in the devisee that the rule is canonical." See axiom.

canon-law method. See civil-law method.

canonist = a specialist in ecclesiastical law, esp. in medieval times. Maine states that the English common law "borrows far the greatest number of its fundamental principles from the jurisprudence of the Canonists." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 132 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). Scholars frequently refer to canonists' opinions in discussing moral questions: "[A]ccording to many of the early canonists, the soul was not infused into the infant's body until some time after conception." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 196 (1957; repr. 1972). Cf. civilian.

Canvass, n. & v.t., means, as a verb, (1) "to examine (usu. votes) in detail"; (2) "to discuss or debate"; (3) "to solicit orders or political support"; or (4) "to take stock of public opinion." Here sense (4) applies: "An alderman stated that he had canvassed the board of aldermen, and that 23 would oppose the measure." Sense (1) is also common in legal contexts: "It was contended for the husband that there must be some evidence called or some substantial opening of the case or some canvassing of the issues." (Eng.)/ "Having determined that our rules on prosecutorial vindictiveness govern the instant case, we must canvass the competing policies, beginning with the defendant's interest in minimizing the apprehension of prosecutorial vindictiveness." The noun canvass means "the act of canvassing."

capable of = (1) able to be affected by; of a nature, or in a condition, to allow or admit of; admitting; susceptible (OED); (2) having the needful capacity, power, or fitness for (some specified purpose or activity) (id.); or (3) having capacity, ability, or intelligence. Sense (1) is far more common today in legal than in lay writing: "Allegations of perjured testimony must be supported by substantial factual assertions capable of resolution by an evidentiary hearing."/ "'Submission to arbitration' is capable of more than one meaning." (Eng.)

Sense (2) appears widely in lay and legal writing, but is not used in quite the same way; whereas nonlawyers usually connect a participial phrase to capable of, lawyers frequently follow it with a simple noun. E.g., "Appellees argue that the purchase of automobiles in New York would not occur but for the fact that the automobiles are capable of use in distant states like Oklahoma." Most modern writers would make it capable of being used.

capacitas rationalis is a LATINISM whose perpetration in non-Roman contexts is unforgivable, what with English phrases like rational capacity, rational faculties, reason, and rationality to do the work. In the following sentence the phrase arguably refers to the Roman-law doctrine: "The principle of capacitas rationalis embodies the free-will retributive idea that man is a rational being with the capacity to understand his actions intelligently and control them accordingly." (Eng.)

capacitate = to qualify; to make legally competent. This term is a fancy LEGALISM, in place of which qualify or make competent is more widely comprehensible.

capacity; capability. These words overlap, but there are nuances. Capacity = the power to receive, hold, or contain. Figuratively, it refers to mental faculties in the sense "the power to take in knowledge." In law, it is frequently used in the sense "legal competency or qualification" <capacity to contract>.

Capability = (1) power or ability in general, whether physical or mental; or (2) the quality of being susceptible of.

capacity; competency. Capacity refers to legal ability or qualification, as to sue, to make contracts, or to commit crimes. Competency is a closely analogous word used in evidentiary contexts, as in competency to testify.

capias (L. "that you take," a general term used of writs of attachment or arrest) is generally the shortened form of capias ad respondendum, which is a writ to enforce attendance at court. In AmE, the phrase arrest warrant is gradually displacing this use of capias.

There are also some less well-known species of capias, including:

- capias ad satisfaciendum, which was formerly used after judgment to imprison the defendant until the plaintiff's claim was satisfied. This phrase is often abbreviated ca. sa., as here: "Another basis for amercement exists where a writ of ca. sa. has issued to the sheriff who makes a return that the defendant cannot be found in the county." Poultrymen's Serv. Corp. v. Winter, 244 A.2d 308, 309-10 (N.J. Super. 1968). In England, this writ was available in rare cases until 1981.
- capias ad respondendum, which authorizes the sheriff to arrest a defendant.

- capias in withernam, which authorizes the sheriff to seize the cattle or goods of a wrongful distrainor.
- capias utlagatum, which commands the arrest of an outlawed person.

The word capias—as the shortened and anglicized form of capias ad respondendum—is a singular noun with the plural form capiases. Yet capias is occasionally misapprehended as being plural as well as singular. E.g., "On behalf of himself and others similarly situated, Stephen Crane brought an action complaining that Dallas County regularly issued capias [read capiases] without a finding of probable cause by a neutral and detached magistrate."

capital, n.; capitol. The former is a city, the seat of government; the latter is a building in which the state or national legislature meets (fr. L. capitoleum, the Roman temple of Jupiter). Until October 1698, when the Virginia governor specified that Capitol would be the name of the planned statehouse in a village then known as Middle Plantation, the word capitol had been used only as the name of the great Roman temple at Rome. See Mitford M. Mathews, American Words 62–63 (1959; repr. 1976).

Capital, whether as a noun or as an adjective (see the following entry), is called on far more frequently than capitol.

capital, adj. Lawyers use this word in two closely allied senses: (1) "punishable by death" <capital crimes>; and (2) "involving capital punishment" <capital cases>. The first example illustrates sense (1), the second and third sense (2): "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury . . . ." U.S. Const. amend. V./ "[I]t's the rare court-appointed lawyer who is skilled in the complexities of capital cases." Sally B. Donnelly, You Don't Always Get Perry Mason, Time, 1 June 1988, at 38, 39./ "A lawyer whose practice is primarily civil may initially face some trepidation in taking on criminal appellate or postconviction capital work." Paul J. Bschorr, Challenges for the Decade, 17 Litigation 1, 2 (Summer 1991). The OED traces these senses to the late 15th and early 16th centuries and lists a lesser-included sense in Roman law, in which capital = involving the loss of civil rights.

Additionally, capital can refer to the money used by an organization, as distinct from income.

capitalist(ic). Capitalist is the general adjective; the -istic form, a favorite of Marxists, is pejorative.

CAPITALIZATION. Conventions of capitalization abound in legal writing; several of the more important ones are here discussed. They vary, to be sure, as practices in capitalizing are governed as much by personal taste as by a set of rules. Sections (A), (B), and (C) below prescribe what might be called "rules" of capitalization, while sections (D), (E), (F), and (G) explain and describe common practices.

A. All Capitals. Avoid them. They impair readability because the eye cannot easily distinguish among characters that are all of a uniform size. Try reading these passages, which are ordered by increasing readability:

> Except as May Be Otherwise Specifically Provided in This Agreement, All Notices Shall Be in Writing and Shall Be Deemed to Be Delivered When Deposited in the United States Mail, Postage Prepaid, Registered or Certified Mail, Return Receipt Requested, Addressed to the Parties at the Respective Addresses Set Forth on Exhibit B or at Such Other Addresses as Either Party May Specify by Written Notice.

> Except as may be otherwise specifically provided in this Agreement, all notices shall be in writing and shall be deemed to be delivered when deposited in the United States mail, postage prepaid, registered or certified mail, return receipt requested, addressed to the parties at the respective addresses set forth on Exhibit B or at such other addresses as either party may specify by written notice.

What an odd phenomenon it is that lawyers—whenever they want to draw special attention to passages, such as main issues in a brief or warnings in drafted documents—make them typographically impenetrable. Using all caps is bad enough; underlining them is even worse. If you feel impelled to use all caps, make sure that they do not run for more than one line.

Writers should avoid using all caps even for the conventions discussed in sections (D)–(G) below. Large and small caps, as in the titles of essay entries in this book, are preferable to all caps because they provide greater typographic variety and are therefore easier on the eye. See DOCUMENT DESIGN.

B. Initial Capitals. When capitalizing only the initial letters of words—as in headings or titles—follow these conventions:

1. Capitalize the first letter of every important word, such as a noun, pronoun, verb, adjective, and adverb, no matter how short the word. Thus, words such as pi, it, and be should be capitalized in headings that use initial caps.
2. Capitalize the initial letter of the first and last word, no matter what part of speech either may be; also, capitalize the first letter of any word that follows a colon or a dash.
3. Put articles (the, a, an), as well as conjunctions (and, or) and prepositions having four or fewer letters (of, by, with) in lowercase.

C. Rules of Law. These are variously written with initial letters either capitalized (as if they were titles) or lowercased. Even when we capitalize, however, the extent of capitalization is not settled; thus we have the rule in Shelley's case, the Rule in Shelley's case, the Rule in Shelley's Case, and The Rule in Shelley's Case. The first of these is a mere description; the second is not quite logical, for its last noun (case) is presented as a descriptive term while its first noun (Rule) is treated as a proper noun; the third is the best form, and the most usual; and the fourth makes the a part of the name or title, which makes sense for a book or article bearing that name, but not for general references to the rule.

Other rules of law have just as many variations. (See, e.g., Rule against Perpetuities.) In questionable instances, the best policy is to determine to what extent general legal usage has sanctioned a certain phrase as being a rule of law, and then to capitalize those words essential to the name of the doctrine or rule. Hence the doctrine of the Destructibility of Contingent Remainders but the Rule in Shelley's Case; Destructibility of Contingent Remainders frequently appears without the doctrine or the rule, which is not really a part of the name of the rule, but Shelley's Case almost never occurs without the Rule in preceding it. Likewise the Rule Forbidding a Remainder to the Grantor's Heirs and the Doctrine of Worthier Title.

D. Vessel Names. These are now more commonly capitalized than not. But the habit of using all capitals is apparently of fairly recent origin. In a typical 19th-century case, The Harrisburg, 119 U.S. 199 (1886), the name of the ship had only the first letter capitalized; yet modern cases often write THE HARRISBURG when referring to the ship in that case. The older, more conservative convention might seem preferable, since words in all capitals are often distracting and difficult to read. See (A) in this entry. Cf. INITIALESE.

E. Judges' Names. It has long been a tradition, both in English and in American courts, to spell judges' names in all capitals when the names are referred to in opinions—though not elsewhere (For an older English example, see the quotation under between (A).) The U.S. Supreme Court regularly follows this practice. E.g., "This view garnered three votes in Arnett, but was specifically rejected by the other six Justices. See [Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134, 166–67 (1974)] (POWELL, J., joined by BLACKMUN, J.); id. at 177–78, 185 (WHITE, J.); id. at 211 (MARSHALL, J., joined by DOUGLAS and BRENNAN, JJ.)." Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 540 (1985).

F. Trademarks. Some judges prefer to use all capitals in spelling out trademarks. See, e.g., Conan Properties, Inc. v. Conans Pizza, Inc., 752 F.2d 145 (5th Cir. 1985). This convention has the advantage of distinguishing between the mark and the party, as here: "In addition, starting from the time of the changeover to EXXON as its primary mark, Exxon developed plans for extended use of the HUMBLE mark, as reflected in numerous internal memoranda." Again, however, using all capitals can be immensely distracting to readers.

G. Party Names. Some people ill-advisedly use all caps for party names: "It is conventional although not essential to put short forms in quotation marks when they are established: JOHN DOE ('DOE'). The quotation marks are dropped for all subsequent references. It is archaic and uselessly wordy to recite 'JOHN DOE (hereinafter referred to as 'DOE')." Barbara Child, Drafting Legal Documents 123 (2d ed. 1992). For an example of how distracting it is to use all capitals for party names, see Schneider v. Indian River Community College Found., Inc., 684 F. Supp. 283 (S.D. Fla. 1987).

capitalize (= to provide with capital, i.e., money) is a late 19th-century American NEOLOGISM that has gained universal acceptance. E.g., "Plaintiffs capitalized the project at $3 million." Sodima v. International Yogurt Co., 662 F. Supp. 839, 842 (D. Or. 1987).

capital punishment, whether one is for or against what it denotes, is a legal EUPHEMISM for state-imposed death. See death penalty.

capitol. See capital.

capitulatory, not capitulative, is the adjective corresponding to capitulation. E.g., "A defendant might moot the suit by taking unilateral capitulatory action."

caption. The sense "arrest or seizure by legal process" is the oldest for this word; now archaic, that sense has surfaced in several opinions that are, by the law's standards, within living memory. E.g., "That the debt was attachable in confiscation proceedings was held by this court in Miller v. The United States, and it was ruled that attachment or seizure could be made without manual caption of the visible evidences of the credit." Brown v. Kennedy, 82 U.S. (15 Wall.) 591, 599 (1872).

The usual sense in modern writing—that of a heading—derives ultimately from that legal sense. Caption came to be used in the 17th century as a shortened form of certificate of caption or taking; such a certificate appeared at the top of a legal process to show where, when, and by what authority it was to be served or executed. Lawyers then pressed caption into service in a variety of contexts, such as to describe the heading on an abstract of title (where the land is described).

American journalists in turn extended this LEGALISM further by making it refer, in the mid-19th century, to headings of newspaper articles and the like, where the English would have said title, head, or heading. See head.

captioned, as a short form of above-captioned <the captioned cause>, is, like the longer form, unnecessary JARGON. It is preferable to write this case, that case, the Smith case, or the like. See above-mentioned.

captor; capturer. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Cardozo is not only widely mispronounced /kahr-doh-zə/ instead of /kahr-doh-zoh/; it is misspelled Cardoza in more than 50 reported cases, such as State v. Saia, 302 So. 2d 869, 879 (La. 1974) (Summers, J., dissenting); Brubaker v. Glenrock Lodge Int'l Order of Odd Fellows, 526 P.2d 52, 59 (Wyo. 1974).

The better adjectival form is Cardozan—e.g.: "Cardozan prose is not of consistent quality, but it should not be judged by its worst examples, as it is by his detractors." Richard A. Posner, Cardozo: A Study in Reputation 23 (1990). A variant form is Cardozoean—e.g.: "Corbin . . . proposed to the Restaters what might be called a Cardozoean [read Cardozan] definition of consideration . . . ." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 63 (1974).

careen, v.t.; career, v.t. Careen = (1) v.i., to tip or tilt <the sailboat careened and then sank>; or (2) v.t., to cause to tip or tilt <the wind careened the sailboat>. Career, v.i., = to move wildly at high speed. E.g., "[H]is car overturned yesterday after careering out of control across three lanes of the motorway." M4 Driver Drowns, Sunday Telegraph, 11 Feb. 1990, at 2.

Since the early 20th century, AmE has tried to make careen do the job of career, as by saying that a car careened down the street. On September 7, 1992, in a campaign speech in Wisconsin, President George Bush said that "product liability has careened out of control." Despite the increasing currency of this use, however, careful writers reserve the verb career to signify something moving wildly at high speed.

carelessness, in law, can be a misleading word because it suggests that a person's actually caring negates carelessness. In the context of criminal and tort law, though, carelessness generally states an objective—not a subjective—standard. So, regardless of how careful a bicyclist might try to be, consciously assessing the risks, that bicyclist still might not reach the objective standard. In short, even those who care deeply can commit legal carelessness. Cf. recklessness.

carnal knowledge. This is an old legal EUPHEMISM for sexual intercourse—dating back at least to the 17th century. The phrase is often paired, in references to rape, with ravish, q.v., a word that today strikes many readers as romanticizing a horrible criminal act. Generally, the phrase carnal knowledge might be advantageously replaced with a more direct phrase such as sexual intercourse.

carrier. See underwriter.

carrying-away, n. See asportation.

carte blanche; carta blanca. The French form, carte blanche (= free permission), is the usual one in English contexts—not the Italian form (carta blanca), which is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. The phrase, meaning literally "a white card," does not take an article. "Codefendants conspired with the securities swindler and gave him a carte blanche [read carte blanche; no article] to conceive and carry out a securities fraud."/ "It is almost meaningless to contemplate a 'regulatory' policy that gives every regulated entity carte blanche to excuse itself from the consequences of the regulation."

cartelize = to organize into a cartel. (See -IZE (A).) Yet cartel has three quite different meanings: (1) "an agreement between hostile nations"; (2) carve out (an exception or the like) is a hackneyed METAPHOR in legal writing. E.g., "[W]e decline to carve out an exception to this principle in criminal negligence cases." State v. Tranby, 437 N.W.2d 817, 821 (N.D. 1989). See CLICHÉS.

"an anticompetitive combination, usu. that fixes commercial prices"; and (3) "a combination of political groups that work toward common goals." Modern usage favors sense (2).

ca. sa. = capias ad satisfaciendum. See capias.

case. A. Generally. "In the case of John Doe deceased, etc., is the sort of jargon which disfigures almost all legal writing." Percy Marks, The Craft of Writing 52 (1932). "It is permissible, of course, to write of a law case, a medical case, or a case of linen, but it certainly is not advisable to use case in any other way." Id. at 53. Quiller-Couch condemned this word as "Jargon's dearest child," esp. in the phrase in the case of, in his essay "Jargon," in On the Art of Writing (1916; repr. 1961). In the case of is, to be sure, generally an obnoxious phrase; it has its legitimate uses, but not generally in legal writing, in which case so frequently refers to a lawsuit, not an instance.

Even in the sense synonymous with cause, the word case, in a phrase such as in the case of Monroe v. Pape, is inferior to the case name itself: in Monroe v. Pape. E.g., "The case of Blair v. Commissioner [read Blair v. Commissioner] is to be distinguished from the present case in that there the corpus of the trust was in existence."

The worst offenders are the phrases in any case [read in any event], in case [read if], in the case of [usu. best deleted or reduced to in], in every case [read always or in every instance], and as the case may be [a phrase that is not easily circumvented]. "There is perhaps no single word so freely resorted to as a trouble-saver, and consequently responsible for so much flabby writing." (Fowler, MEU2 76.) Especially does case lead to flabbiness when it is used in a sentence twice with different meanings, as in the two examples following: "The popular image of a divorce case has long been that of a private detective skulking through the bushes outside a window with a telephoto lens, seeking a candid snapshot of the wife in flagrante delicto with a lover. Such is not exactly the case." J. Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 41 (1978)./ "I shall read in extenso the passage of general importance in case the instant case (or part of it) is reported." (Eng.)

B. Meaning "argument." This meaning, seen in the phrase the case for the defendant, is commonplace and immune from the objections lodged against the various phrases discussed in section (A). E.g., "Lincoln repeated his case from town to town in the seven debates with Douglas." Alfred Kazin, A Forever Amazing Writer, N.Y. Times, 10 Dec. 1989, § 7 (Book Rev.), at 3./ "The bank's case was that Tesam had not crossed the threshold which must be cleared before an English court had jurisdiction under the Convention to hear the claims." English Court Can Hear Shoe Case, Fin. Times, 27 Oct. 1989, at 12.

C. As Ellipsis for trespass on the case or action on the case. See the entries under those phrases.

D. And cause. See cause (A).

case at bar. This is the most usual expression in which at bar is used, but legal and evidentiary issues may be at bar, as well as cases. E.g., "National Union involved a termination clause similar to the one at bar." See at (the) bar.

case at bench is a variant of case at bar, q.v., cast from the judge's rather than the advocate's point of view. E.g., "And in this country, Mr. Justice Story felt so strongly on the point that although the case at bench was robbery on the high seas . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 144 (3d ed. 1982). Even so, most judges use case at bar, not case at bench.

casebook. Preferably one word in both AmE and BrE, though it occasionally appears in the latter as two words or as a hyphenated phrase.

casebook method; hornbook method; lecture method. These are the names of different pedagogical techniques in law. The casebook method (known also as the case method, casebook system, or case system) was devised in the 1870s at Harvard Law School by Professor Christopher Columbus Langdell. Instead of learning the law from lectures and textbooks, Langdell's students read law cases and then were questioned about them through the Socratic method. They were thus led to induce principles of law instead of receiving them as predigested deductions. Langdell's Selection of Cases on the Law of Contracts (1871) was the first such book of its kind.

The hornbook or lecture method, by contrast, involves a straightforward presentation of legal doctrine, sometimes interspersed with questions and problems. This method predominates in certain fields of law, such as procedure and evidence, and in civil-law countries.

Scholars continue to debate the merits of one system over the other. These comments from the literature help define the contours of the terms: "Under the casebook method the student, when confronted with a decision, is expected to analyze it in terms of a knowledgeable separation of superfluous facts from those issues impregnated with legal significance." Arthur D. Austin, Is the Casebook Method Obsolete? 6 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 157, 161 (1965)./ "The 'casebook method' of teaching Law is still the vogue in the law schools . . . . In many ways, the old fashioned hornbook method of legal education made more sense. It was more direct and more straightforward and you could learn more principles faster." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 140–41 (1939; repr. 1980).

case-by-case. When used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE before the noun <on a case-by-case basis>, the phrase should be hyphenated—but not when it follows what it modifies <the court will draw those lines case by case>.

The phrase case-to-case is a variant of case-by-case: "Typically federal courts, either by rule or by case-to-case determination, follow the forum state's practice." 10 Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 2671, at 228–29 (1983).

caseflow. This NEOLOGISM is commonly written as one word. E.g., Sallman, Observations on Judicial Participation in Caseflow Management, 8 Civ. Just. Q. 129 (1989).

case-in-chief. This term is useful legal JARGON. It means "that part of a trial in which the party with the initial burden of proof presents his evidence, after which he rests" (Black's). E.g., "In numerous cases this court has held that mention of the fact of defendant's silence following arrest by the prosecutor in his case-in-chief is a violation of constitutional dimensions."/ "The issue was raised by the offer of the gun as a part of the state's case-in-chief." The phrase should be hyphenated. See in chief.

case(-)law. This term appears in modern texts in three ways: as a single word, as two words, and hyphenated. Although all three forms can be found in abundance, the phrase is increasingly written as a single solid word. E.g., "That kind of surveillance does not, under the caselaw, constitute an actionable invasion of privacy." Pemberton v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 502 A.2d 1101, 1117 (Md. App. 1986). See decision(al) law, jurisprudence (B), & common law (B)(6). Cf. organic law.

Caselaw is usually opposed to statutory law (or statute law): "The law derived wholly or partially from adjudication and the law derived from ancient customs through the medium of judicial decisions together make up the Case Law, as distinguished from the Statute Law." William M. Lile et al., Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 7 (3d ed. 1914). Oddly, caselaw is often referred to as the unwritten law, q.v., though it is certainly written.

case, law of the. See law of the case.

case lawyer – a lawyer who has something approaching an encyclopedic knowledge of the caselaw within his or her jurisdiction. E.g., "These were still the days of the case lawyer, who knew his reports and found his way about them partly by use and wont . . . partly with the help of the Digests . . . ." Lord Wright, The Study of Law, 54 Law Q. Rev. 185, 185 (1938)./ "Since Cardozo was one of the best case lawyers who ever lived, the proof was invariably marshalled [q.v.] with a masterly elegance." Grant Gilmore, The Ages of American Law 75 (1977). Cf. cause lawyer.

caseload. Listed as two words in W3, this term is usually spelled as one word in American legal writing. E.g., "Cases are then grouped to mix the caseload (some civil, some criminal, some agency-administrative) and to spread the work load." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 174 (1988). Cf. case(-) law.

case of first impression – a legal situation that the courts in a given jurisdiction have never before addressed. E.g., "Let us suppose that this was a case of first impression, that is, a situation [that] is before an American court for the first time." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 81 (1963). Cf. the inferior LATINISM res nova, q.v.

case or controversy. This phrase is the buzzword for the rule that federal courts in the U.S. do not decide hypothetical cases, or legal questions presented in a vacuum. Instead, the questions must arise in a genuine case or controversy.

The phrase, interestingly, has its origins in poor constitutional drafting—that is, drafting that violates the Golden Rule by engaging in INELEGANT VARIATION. Article III, § 2 of the U.S. Constitution describes nine categories of matters that are within the judicial power of the U.S. The first three categories speak of "all Cases" and the next six refer simply to "Controversies." It is because of this that we join the two and say that a federal court can decide only a "case or controversy." State courts have no such inherent limitation—indeed, many state courts are free to decide matters that would not be a "case or controversy" as federal courts understand the phrase.

Historical considerations aside, the first word swallows the second in this DOUBLET: "a 'controversy,' if distinguishable at all from a 'case,' is distinguishable only in that it is a less comprehensive term, and includes only suits of a civil nature." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 53 (4th ed. 1983). See justiciability.

CASE REFERENCES. A. Short-Form References. For shorthand reference to a case already mentioned, the usual practice is to use the first name in the case style, or the more distinctive name if the first is fairly common or is a place-name (e.g., Board of Education, a state's name, United States, etc.). Hence Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, when shortened, is Erie, not Tompkins; but Marshall v. Mulrenin usually becomes Mulrenin, and National Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co. is shortened to Tidewater. Case names are not usually abbreviated when the parties' names are short; e.g., Roe v. Wade is rarely shortened to Roe.

It is a good idea to avoid using a shortened name attributively when it might seem to ridicule the court. Thus, one would not want to write the Seven Elves court or the Wolfish court when referring to the courts that decided Seven Elves, Inc. v. Eskenazi, 635 F.2d 396 (5th Cir. 1981), and Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). One judge, referring to the Petty court, felt obliged to write, "no pun intended." Welch v. State Dep't of Highways & Pub. Transp., 739 F.2d 1034, 1038 (5th Cir. 1984) (per Gee, J.). See (C) below.

B. Locatives with. In which, not where, is the better way of referring to what the facts were or what the court said in a given case. E.g., "Second, we rely . . . on this Court's decision in Lewis, where [read in which] Lewis, an employee of Timco, sued Atwood Oceanics, the vessel owner." See where (B).

C. As Attributive Adjectives. Some cases have become so well known to the courts that routinely apply them as precedents that these courts have come to use the shortened case names as adjectives. There is no harm in this habit, although case citations might be helpful to less well-informed readers. Rarely, for example, is Erie R.R. v. Tompkins cited with the phrase Erie-bound, q.v. Other adjectivally used case names appear in phrases such as these:

- Terry stop or Terry frisk (fr. Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)). See Terry* stop.
- Miranda warning (fr. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)). See Mirandize.
- Allen charge (fr. Allen v. United States, 164 U.S. 492 (1896)). See dynamite charge.
- Anton Piller order, referring to an order by a court in a civil case allowing a party to inspect and remove a defendant's documents, esp. when the defendant might destroy evidence (fr. Anton Piller K.G. v. Manufacturing Processes Ltd. [1976] Ch. 55; [1976] 1 All E.R. 779).
- Mareva injunction, referring to an interlocutory injunction to restrain a person from removing assets outside the jurisdiction in an attempt to frustrate litigation in England (fr. Mareva Compania Naviera S.A. v. International Bulk Carriers [1980] 1 All E.R. 213).

Citation to the full case is especially important when lesser-known cases are used as adjectival phrases, a practice not to be engaged in without restraint. E.g., "Langa contends that his counsel failed to move for a mistrial when the government elicited co-conspirator hearsay testimony without first securing a James ruling." The adjective James, which will draw a blank for most readers, refers to U.S. v. James, 590 F.2d 575 (5th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 917 (1979).

In some instances, the precedent itself is unimportant to the phrase, and the case name has merely been adopted to denote certain types of factual situations, as with Totten trust (fr. In re Totten, 71 N.E. 748 (N.Y. 1904)) and Mary Carter agreement (fr. Booth v. Mary Carter Paint Co., 202 So. 2d 8 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1967)). When, as in these phrases, the case name is used not to refer to precedent but to describe certain facts or denote types of transactions, citing the case is virtually always unnecessary. See CITATION OF CASES.

D. Hypallage with. It is unobjectionable to write that a certain case held something, rather than to say that the court, in that case, held such and such. This practice is an innocuous form of HYPALLAGE. E.g., "National Carbide held that the Tax Court had improperly failed to distinguish between 'agency' and 'practical identity' when it ruled the subsidiaries were true agents." But there is a fine line between this type of hypallage and the fallacious personification of cases discussed in (E): cases might hold something or other, but they probably do not cite or reason or argue.

E. Personification of Cases. This type of ANTHROPOMORPHISM characterizes hack-writing about judicial opinions—e.g.: "INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, in declining to apply the exclusionary rule to deportation proceedings, cited approvingly cases finding that the absence of Miranda warnings did not render otherwise voluntary statements inadmissible in deportation proceedings." The way to correct the problem, of course, is to write The court in INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, etc.

case-specific = patterned after or adjusted to the facts of a given case <case-specific instructions>. E.g., Johns, How the Zauderer Decision Impacted (q.v.) Case-Specific Solicitation in Lawyer Advertising, 26 Comp. Jurid. Rev. 107 (1989).

case stated = (1) historically, a procedure by which the Court of Chancery referred difficult legal questions to a common-law court—abolished in 1852; (2) in G.B., a criminal procedure in which the prosecution and the defendant, usu. in a test case, request that a magistrates' court prepare findings along with its decision, so that the parties may then obtain appellate review of a point of law by a three-judge Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division; (3) in G.B., a similar procedure in which the parties obtain review of a decision by a lands tribunal or (until 1979) an arbitrator; (4) in the U.S., a civil procedure in which the parties submit an agreed statement of the facts to a trial court so that they can obtain a decision on a point of law; or (5) the factual statement submitted for review under any of the procedures just described.

Fairly uncommon in the U.S., the procedure is used most frequently today in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. The usual idiom is upon a case stated—e.g.:

- "Upon a case stated, a decree was entered confirming a former ruling of the Attorney General that the executors would be entitled to a refund of any overpayment." Comptroller of the Treasury v. Davidson, 199 A.2d 360, 360 (Md. Ct. App. 1964). (The Maryland court rule providing for this procedure—Rule 329—was abolished in 1984.)
- "Upon this bill in equity . . . , the facts were agreed. A Superior Court judge properly treated the matter as presented upon a case stated." Moore v. Zoning Bd. of Appeals, 276 N.E.2d 712, 714 (Mass. 1971).
- "A judgment based upon a case stated is not appealable unless the parties expressly have reserved the right to appeal in the case-stated submission." McSwain v. City of Farrell, 624 A.2d 256, 257 n.2 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 1993).

As the last quoted example shows, when the phrase appears as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it should be hyphenated <case-stated procedure>.

case where is inferior to case in which, but the locution is hardly new: "The books are full of cases where [better: cases in which] a party has gone into equity only to find that he has mistaken the true theory of his case and must sue at law." castle doctrine; my home is my castle; every man's house is his castle. The first of these is the legal incarnation of the latter two, which are popular bywords in legal contexts. The so-called castle doctrine is an exception to the retreat rule, q.v. Under that rule, even the innocent victim of a murderous assault must retreat safely, if possible, instead of resorting to deadly violence unless the victim is in his or her "castle" at the time. See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 1133–35 (3d ed. 1982). "That every man's house is 'his castle' is a concept that has been echoed down through the ages and the social interest in the security of his 'castle' has its origin in antiquity; for just as an animal or a bird resents any intrusion into its place of abode, so no doubt did primitive man." Id.

As for the longer phrases, using the first person forestalls any objections on grounds of sexism, as one writer did in referring to the Fourth Amendment as "the 'my home is my castle' Amendment." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 347 (1962). See SEXISM (A) & MAXIMS.

casual. Because it is occasionally mistaken for causal (and vice versa), casual may at first seem wrong in certain contexts even when it is properly intended: "It was precisely this sort of casual evidentiary inference that Witherspoon expressly condemned: 'It cannot be assumed that a juror who describes himself as having conscientious or religious scruples against the infliction of the death penalty . . . thereby affirms that he could never vote in favor of it.'" The meaning apparently intended in that sentence is "offhand, cursory." But inferences are often causal in nature, hence the reader's initial expectation that causal would have been the right word; if the writer had chosen careless or desultory (or some other word) rather than casual, the careful reader's expectations would not be undercut. See SOUND OF PROSE, THE.

casus belli; casus fœderis. Casus belli (= an event that provokes war) is both a legal and a literary word—here the latter: "Sherry vomited in the defendant's taxicab on their way home, and this became the casus belli of this litigation." Noble v. Louisville Taxicab & Transfer Co., 255 S.W.2d 493, 494 (Ky. 1952). As a term in international law, it refers to a provocative act that, in the opinion of an offended power, justifies it in making or declaring war.

A casus fœderis, by contrast, is a provocative act by one state toward another, entitling the latter to call upon an ally to fulfill the undertakings of the alliance. See Ernest M. Satow, Guide to Diplomatic Practice app. 1 at 16 (5th ed. 1979) (noting that the two phrases are sometimes confused).

casus male inclusus denotes the all-too-common occurrence when legislation is overbroad and, unfortunately, covers a "case wrongly included." Like casus omissus, q.v., the LATINISM does not have a ready English substitute—nor, however, is the phrase very common in American legal writing. Here is a BrE example: "To extend a statute to a regrettably omitted case looks like legislation, whereas refusing to extend it to a casus male inclusus is more like imposing a provisional fetter on legislation." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 110 (11th ed. 1982).

casus omissus = a circumstance omitted or not provided for, as by a statute (and therefore governed by the common law) (W2). Since this LATINISM has a specific meaning not readily conveyed by a simpler phrase, one might be tempted to hail it as a useful addition to the legal vocabulary. It is common in British legal writing—e.g.: "The appellant, however, contends that the section does not apply because it provides that the disponer (i.e., the wife) shall 'be liable to be taxed': the wife, it is said, is not a taxable person and so this provision does not operate; there is a casus omissus." (Eng.)

Though unfamiliar to most American lawyers, the phrase does appear occasionally in American law reports—e.g.: "The federal courts have treated this as a casus omissus, and have divided on the question whether traditional rules of evidence require the exclusion of hearsay offered on direct examination of an expert as the basis of his opinion . . . ." McMunn v. Tatum, 379 S.E.2d 908, 912 (Va. 1989).

cataclysm; cataclasm. The meanings of these words are fairly close, esp. in figurative senses. A cataclysm is a tremendous flood or violent disaster. A cataclasm is a tearing down or disruption.

catalog(ue). Though librarians have come to use catalog with regularity, catalogue is still the better form. Cataloging makes about as much sense as plaging. "If the professionals decline to restore the -u- to the inflected forms," wrote Follett, "let them simply double the -g-." Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 97 (1966). The U.S. Supreme Court has used the more conservative form: "The cases we have reviewed show . . . the impossibility of resolution by any semantic cataloguing." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217 (1962).

catapult, in keeping with the metaphor, is best a transitive and not an intransitive verb. The correct use of this verb in the active voice demands an agent and an object, as in "The men catapulted stones over the wall." If an agent is omitted, the verb must appear in the passive voice: "He was catapulted to fame."/ "The victim was catapulted through the windshield." With such a construction, the means is implied. Yet a common blunder today is: "He catapulted to fame." This verb, even when used figuratively, so inevitably calls to mind its literal sense that, used intransitively, it is illogical. See METAPHORS.

catchword (BrE) = keynote (AmE). E.g., "At the head [of a case in the law reports] are what are called catchwords, indicating briefly what the case is about." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 38 (11th ed. 1982).

categorical question. See leading question.

categorically = without qualification. E.g., "Testimony of appellant and of appellant's witnesses of the agreement was by the respondent categorically denied." For a MALAPROPISM involving this word, see uncategorically.

causa causans. See CAUSATION (8).

causal; causative. These words have, unfortunately, been muddled by legal writers. The meanings should be kept distinct. Causal is the more common word, meaning "of or relating to causes; involving causation; arising from a cause." Causative = operating as a cause; effective as a cause. These two words share the sense "expressing or indicating cause," although causal is preferred for that sense.

In the following sentences, the words are correctly used: "A plaintiff may still recover attorneys' fees if he can show both a causal connection between the filing of the suit and the defendant's actions and that the defendant's conduct was required by law." (Causal connection and causal link are SET PHRASES.)/ "Plaintiffs are unable to show how any additional discovery could supply an inference of conspiratorial or causative conduct any stronger than that provided by the contracts themselves."/ "In Sohyde we found relevant to the jurisdictional analysis that all the causative factors could have as easily occurred on land and that the injury and damages were indistinguishable from those arising from land-based blowouts."

Here, causal is misused for causative: "Appellant's argument is that appellee was asked to pay only for those damages resulting from its defective product and thus was not charged with any injury attributable to other causal [read causative] faults [i.e., faults that would tend to cause the injury]."

In the following sentences, the opposite mistake appears: "The court's use of the words 'produced by' clearly reflects the causative [read causal] element of the Christie test."/ "The final type of cancer and mesothelioma evidence—Comstock's expert testimony on the causative [read causal] relationship between asbestos exposure and those diseases—is relevant to the issue of liability." See casual.

causal challenge = challenge for cause, q.v. The two-word phrasing allows legal writers a nice parallel for the other type of challenge, the peremptory challenge. E.g., "[T]he liberal allowance of causal challenges frequently exhausts the array or reduces it to the point where the trial cannot proceed until additional jurors have been summoned." 1 Burton R. Laub, Pennsylvania Trial Guide § 34.4, at 81 (1959)./ "[I]f the Kennedy affidavit is correct, appellant was prevented from intelligently exercising his peremptory and causal challenges because of the juror's intentional nondisclosure." U.S. v. Colombo, 869 F.2d 149, 151 (2d Cir. 1989). The phrase cause challenge sometimes appears, but causal challenge is preferable because it puts the adjective in the true adjectival form.

causality; causation. These words have a fine distinction. Causality = the principle of causal relationship; the relation of cause and effect. Causation = the causing or producing of an effect. In law, causation has long been given the additional sense "the relation of cause and effect," a sense best reserved to causality in nonlegal contexts.

Causation should not be used for cause, as here: "Under the facts of Kubrick, the plaintiff had actual knowledge of his injury and its causation [read cause]."

causa mortis (= in contemplation of one's death) is a LATINISM and TERM OF ART used primarily in the phrase gift causa mortis (or the thoroughly Latinate phrase donatio causa mortis). E.g., "The power of a donor, in a gift causa mortis, to revoke the gift and divest title of the donee is another clear example of the legal quantities now being considered."/ "A gift causa mortis must be made when the donor is in imminent peril of death and under such circumstances that the gift would not be made were it not for the peril." In BrE, the phrase is often written mortis causa.

causation. See causality.

CAUSATION is one of the subjects that have inspired legal writers to don their philosophers' caps and to work out any number of systems of analysis. The general principles of analysis have proved to be more or less universal in Anglo-American jurisdictions, but the terminology of that analysis does vary—hence the explanations in this entry.

As one writer aptly put it, "There are few words in the English vocabulary that have given rise to more legal problems than the words cause and causing." Note, 88 Law Q. Rev. 451, 451 (1972). Technically speaking, everything that contributes to a given result is, as a matter of fact, a cause of that result. Consider this illustration:

> In homicide by shooting, for example, while the mind turns first to the man who pulled the trigger, it was obviously impossible for him to have committed that homicide (by shooting) without a loaded weapon. As he did not, in all probability, make the gun himself, it is necessary to consider others, such as those who made and sold the weapon, and even the inventor of that particular kind of firearm. Others perhaps were connected with the result because they made the shell or the bullet or the powder, or assembled the finished cartridge. The mind gets lost in the labyrinth of contributory factors long before the possibilities are exhausted. As only a portion of the factors [that] actually contribute to such a result will receive > juridical consideration, it is neither necessary nor useful to exhaust the philosophical possibilities of actual causation.

> Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 771–72 (3d ed. 1982).

By contrast, though it would be desirable to exhaust the legal terminology of causation, this entry can do no more than discuss the very most common terms. The terminology illustrates the truth of Glanville Williams's observation: "The lawyer is interested in the causal parentage of events, not in their causal ancestry." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 328 (1978).

In the end, legal terminology reflects the fact that courts are concerned with determining "cause" from the standpoint of attaching liability, not of ascertaining physical or medical cause. For example, a lawyer might say that A's death was caused by B's negligent driving while a doctor would say it was caused by shock and loss of blood.

A. Proximate cause; legal cause; direct cause. All three terms are used synonymously. The term proximate cause has become an indispensable term in American tort law; it means simply "a cause that directly produces an effect; that which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new independent cause, produces an event, and without which the injury would not have occurred." (See but for.) The following definition—perhaps more direct—signals just how fuzzy the phrase is: "a cause of which the law will take notice." The Latin equivalent is causa proxima.

The CDL does not include an entry on proximate cause, since the term legal cause is more usual in BrE. That is likewise the term preferred by the American Law Institute. See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 9 (1965). Direct cause is now increasingly rare.

B. Immediate cause; effective cause; causa causans. These terms are used to denote the last link in the chain of causation (as, e.g., a supervening cause). Causa causans is little used except in BrE.

C. Producing cause; procuring cause. These terms are virtually synonymous with proximate cause but in some jurisdictions are used in particular contexts such as workers' compensation (producing cause) and real-estate brokerage (procuring cause [of a sale]). The choice of term is usually statutorily prescribed.

D. Intervening cause; supervening cause. These denote a cause that comes into active operation after a defendant's negligence, even if that cause does not break the chain of causation. The point is that intervening and supervening are used, then, in a purely temporal sense in reference to the chain of causation. Intervening is the better choice of term, for supervening cause is sometimes confused with superseding cause. See (E).

In BrE, the equivalent Latinisms novus actus interveniens and nova causa interveniens are commonly used. See LATINISMS.

E. Superseding cause; sole cause. These phrases denote an intervening cause that breaks the chain of causation. Thus if X shoots Y, who is then stabilized and recovering nicely but soon dies after poor medical treatment, that medical negligence will be held to be a superseding cause (a phrase more common than sole cause). The phrase supervening cause is also sometimes used in this sense, but it should be avoided because of its use also for intervening cause. See (D).

cause. A. And case. Both terms are used to describe litigated actions, despite some published nonsense to the contrary: "The legal theory of the party may be a cause of action. However, the lawsuit itself is not a 'cause.'" Irwin Alterman, Plain and Accurate Style in Court Papers 172 (1987). Case is more commonly used, to be sure, but cause (= lawsuit) has long been current in the speech and writing of lawyers. E.g., "Eventually it was decided that as from 1979 criminal causes in the House of Lords should be reported under the same title as in the court below." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 17–18 (11th ed. 1982). Indeed, the word cause has extended beyond law into popular writing: "It is not necessary here to plead the cause of truffles and sauteed mushrooms." P.J. Wingate, The Fungus Is Still Among Us, Wall St. J., 3 April 1989, at A12.

The peaceful coexistence of these terms need not be threatened by branding either one a NEEDLESS VARIANT. When writing or speaking for nonlawyers, however, case is the clearer term.

Black's notes that DIFFERENTIATION is possible between these terms, although if it does exist at all it is little heeded: "case not infrequently has a more limited signification, importing a collection of facts, with the conclusion of law thereon," whereas "cause imports a judicial proceeding entire, and is nearly synonymous with lis in Latin, or suit in English."

B. And action. Although cause and action are nearly synonymous, the legal idioms in which the phrases are used differ. Thus an action or suit is said to be 'commenced,' but a cause is not. Similarly, a cause but not an action is said to be 'tried.' Any substantive distinction between the words is subtle: broadly, action connotes legal procedure and cause denotes the merits of the dispute.

C. Disposition by Courts. Causes (or cases) are on dockets; they may be remanded (by an appellate court) or disposed of (by any court). But they may not be reversed or affirmed. E.g., "This is the keystone of the opinion below: If it is in error, the cause must be reversed [read judgment must be reversed]." See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT.

cause challenge. See causal challenge.

cause lawyer = a lawyer who is so deeply committed to a (usu. social) cause that he or she cannot objectively consider issues relating to that cause. E.g., " 'Cause' lawyers, they say, often lack an adequate understanding of their adversaries' positions, forcing the parties into rancorous, costly lawsuits when more amicable resolutions might be possible." Felsenthal, Lawyers Who Switch Sides Draw Ire with Big Checks, Wall St. J., 19 July 1990, at B1, B5. Cf. case lawyer.

cause-list is the BrE term corresponding to docket or calendar, qq.v., in AmE.

cause of action; right of action; ground of action. These terms "should not be confused . . . . They are not interchangeable." Swankowski v. Diethelm, 129 N.E.2d 182, 184 (Ohio App. 1953). Cause of action = (1) a group of operative facts, such as a harmful act, giving rise to one or more rights of action; or (2) a legal theory of a lawsuit. Writers on civil procedure prefer that the term be confined to sense (1). The acceptance of sense (2) by some courts actually caused the drafters of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to avoid the term altogether. See Fleming James, Civil Procedure § 2.11, at 87 (1965).

Sometimes cause of action is misused for prima facie case, q.v., as here: "Plaintiff failed to make out his cause of action [read prima facie case], and therefore his claim must fail."

Right of action has two senses: (1) "the right to take a particular case to court" (CDL); and (2) "a chose in action." Here sense (1) obtains: "The foundation of the right of action was a family relationship with the deceased." For chose in action, see chose.

Ground of action is an infrequent variant of cause of action—e.g.: "As a child so young was incapable of performing acts of service, the ground of action failed."

cause to be. A cartoon some years ago depicted a lawyer at a cocktail party talking with a friend and saying, "I met Joan in law school, where certain sparks were caused to be made." And certain idioms were caused to be learned as well, alas.

This one—cause to be—was born of a fear of not sufficiently expressing the idea that an agent may, as opposed to the principal, carry out an act. E.g., "The directors must cause books to be kept . . . ." J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 247 (4th ed. 1945). If the sentence said, The directors must keep books . . . , the result is not to disallow any delegation of bookkeeping matters. In most contexts, this phrase is noxious. See effect (A).

caution /kay-shən/, in civil (and esp. Scots) law, means "security." Cautionary /kay-shən-ree/ = a surety obligation. Cautioner /kay-shən-ər/ = a surety.

cautionary; cautious. Cautionary /kaw-shən-ar-ee/ = encouraging or advising caution. E.g., "This time we do not award damages but sound a cautionary note to those who would persistently raise arguments against the income tax that have been put to rest for years." Cautious = exercising caution.

caveat /ka-vee-aht/ (lit., "let him [or her] beware") means, in nonlegal speech and writing, merely "a warning," from the common phrase caveat emptor (= let the buyer beware). E.g., "The expression caveat emptor . . . still applies, and so long as the vendor does not actually mislead the purchaser, the purchaser has only himself to blame if he finds that the house is by no means what he thought it was." Anon., The Home Counsellor 207 (n.d. [London: Odhams Press, ca. 1940–1945]).

In legal prose, however, caveat often signifies a notice, usually in the form of an entry in a register, to the effect that no action of a certain kind—e.g., probate of a will—may be taken without first informing the person who gave the notice (the caveator, q.v.). E.g, "In the probate practice of many states, a will contest commences with the filing of a caveat or written objection setting forth the facts upon which the contest is based."/ "The question on this appeal is whether a judgment creditor of an heir may file and prosecute a caveat to a will of the ancestor of that heir, by which real property is devised to other persons."

caveat, v.t., is an AmE extension of the noun use described in the preceding entry. E.g., "The petition has no right or interest in the property or estate of the testator necessary to maintain a suit to caveat the last will and testament of the testator." The verb is inflected caveated /ka-vee-ə-təd/, caveating /ka-vee-ə-ting/.

caveator; contestant. A caveator is not one who warns, but one who has entered a caveat, i.e., one who challenges the validity of a will. The person whose interest is challenged is termed the caveatee. E.g., "The district court did require the defendant-caveatee to proceed first in order of proof with evidence of due execution. However, the ultimate burden of persuasion was put on the plaintiff-caveator." Curtis v. Curtis, 481 F.2d 549, 550 (D.C. Cir. 1973). Caveatrix is an obsolete form (see SEXISM (C)). See caveat.

Contestant is used in jurisdictions in which the procedure of filing a caveat is not used. E.g., "We now return to the statute that the contestant says was disregarded when George and the Gillises subscribed their signatures to the questioned instrument." See contestant.

cavil, beyond (= beyond even the most trivial objection) is a favorite expression of judges. E.g., "The fact of damage was established beyond cavil." cease is a FORMAL WORD for stop or end. E.g., "In a jurisdiction that bases the imposition of exemplary damages on general deterrence, the fact that the defendant has ceased the offending conduct is irrelevant, as the exemplary damages may be used as a future deterrent to others." Cf. desist.

cease-and-desist order (– an order from a governmental authority directing a person violating the law to stop doing so) should be hyphenated thus. (See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A).) Usually used in reference to administrative orders, this DOUBLET (cease-and-desist order) performs a useful function. Where the doublet functions as a verb phrase and not as an adjective (We order you to cease and desist), of course, the hyphens should not appear. The simpler expression stop order is confined to securities law.

The phrase cease-and-desist letter refers to an analogous demand letter, having no governmental authority behind it but threatening legal action. E.g., "Last November, Thoroughbred Racing sent cease-and-desist letters to several artists who had depicted Easy Goer, winner of last year's Travers Stakes at Saratoga." David Margolick, At the Bar, N.Y. Times, 23 Feb. 1990, at B11. See desist.

ceasefire. One word in both AmE and BrE.

cede; secede; concede. The distinctions are as follows. Cede = to give up, grant, admit, or surrender. "By the Treaty of October 4, 1864, the Klamath Indian Tribe ceded approximately twenty million acres of aboriginal land to the government of the United States." Secede = to withdraw formally from membership or participation in. Concede = (1) to admit to be true; (2) to grant (as a right or a privilege); or (3) to admit defeat in (as an election).

ceiling, used in the sense of "maximum," is in itself unobjectionable but can sometimes lead to unfortunate mixed metaphors. E.g., "The task force recommended a general increase in the ceilings." One raises a ceiling rather than increases it. An English writer on usage quotes a preposterous example about "a ceiling price on carpets." In using words figuratively, one must keep in mind their literal meanings. See METAPHORS. Cf. catapult.

celui qui trust. See cestui que trust.

censor; censure. To censor is to scrutinize and revise, to suppress or edit selectively. E.g., "The right of the superintendent in the exercise of a reasonable discretion to censor the ordinary mail written by a patient who has been adjudged insane is not challenged."

As a noun, censor = one who inspects publications before they are published to ensure that they contain nothing heretical, libelous, or offensive to the government. It would be nice to pronounce this use of the term obsolete, but in some countries the censors remain prominent.

To censure is to criticize severely, to castigate. E.g., "In 1978, the Alabama Court of the Judiciary censured a judge for merely associating with a former convict."/ "The SEC may remove from office or censure any officer or director of a self-regulatory organization if it finds that he has willfully violated the rules or abused his position." The noun censure means "an official reprimand" or "severe criticism." censor, n.; sensor. The first is one who suppresses; the second is something that detects.

censorious (= severely critical) is the adjective corresponding to the verb censure, not censor. E.g., "As to the manner in which Messrs. Wigmore and Kocourek have executed their task, it is very easy to be censorious . . . ." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 197 (1961).

censorship (= the institution or practice of suppressing ideas thought to be uncongenial to those in power), whose mention immediately implicates the First Amendment, is one of those politically charged VOGUE WORDS that people use irresponsibly: "[E]ver since the controversy over federal funding for exhibitions of Robert Mapplethorpe's brutalizing photographs of sadomasochistic behavior erupted a couple of years ago, little cries of 'censorship' have filled the air like the buzz of locusts wherever politically correct intellectuals congregate. Moreover, it soon became clear that this chorus was determined to construe 'censorship' so broadly that anyone denied government largesse could claim to be a victim of oppression." The PC Line on Censorship, New Criterion, Dec. 1991, at 2.

centennial; centenary. In all the anniversary designations (bi-, sesqui-, etc.), whether used as adjectives or as nouns, the -ial forms are preferred in AmE, the -ary forms in BrE.

center around for center on or in. Something can center on (avoid upon) or revolve around something else, but it cannot center around, as the center is technically a single point. The error is common—e.g.: "Bracton's discussion centres around [read centres on] the word 'heirs.'" Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 559 (5th ed. 1956)./ "Almost all of his [i.e., Puccini's] works center around [read center on or revolve around] the heroine." J.M. Balkin, Turandot's Victory, 2 Yale J. Law & Humanities 299, 315 (1990).

The PHRASAL VERB is frequently used when a straightforward BE-VERB would be preferable: "Perhaps the greatest concern to issuers considering junior stock centers around [read is] the accounting treatment of junior stock."

Center has been used of late as a transitive verb, perhaps to avoid the prepositional dilemma: "Computation of pecuniary damages recoverable for a barge's injury in a maritime collision centers [i.e., is at the center of] this cause." This phrasing is unidiomatic, however.

CENTURY DESCRIPTIONS. Some of us, apparently, forget from time to time that 20th century describes the 1900s, that 19th century describes the 1800s, and so on. Thus R.B. Collins's article entitled Can an Indian Tribe Recover Land Illegally Taken in the Seventeenth Century? 1984–1985 Preview of United States Supreme Court Cases no. 8, p. 179 (Jan. 18, 1985), which discusses land acquired by New York from the Oneida Indians in 1795. The title should refer to the 18th century, not the 17th.

What particular years make up the course of a century has also caused confusion. The Oxford Guide to English Usage points out that > strictly, since the first century ran from the year 1 to the year 100, the first year of a given century should be that ending in the digits 01, and the last year of the preceding century should be the year before, ending in two noughts. In popular usage, understandably, the reference of these terms has been moved back one year, so that one will expect the twenty-first century to run from 2000 to 2099.

> Oxford Guide 95 (1983).

One other point merits our attention. As compound adjectives, the phrases denoting centuries are hyphenated; but they are not hyphenated as nouns. Hence, "The 12th-century records were discovered in the 19th century." See ADJECTIVES (C).

ceremonial; ceremonious. The DIFFERENTIATION between these words lies more in application than in meaning; both suggest a punctilio in following the customs and trappings of ceremony. Ceremonial is the general word; it relates to all manner of ceremonies, and is used only of things. E.g., "Doubtless many divorced men disinherit their wives, some even with ceremonial bonfires and whoops of joy; what we are considering, however, is the probable intent of those divorced men who do not destroy their wills." Ceremonious, lightly disparaging, suggests an overdone formality, and is used of both persons and things.

cert, in AmE, is frequently used as a colloquial shortening of certiorari, q.v.: "As a result of this newfound determination to forge ahead with my 'cert' memos, I managed to finish several more that afternoon." William H. Rehnquist, The Supreme Court: How It Was, How It Is 38 (1987).

In nonlegal contexts, of course, cert can be a shortened form of certificate, certainty, or certify. In BrE, it appears frequently in the phrase dead cert (a complete certainty): "I found some of my American colleagues surprised that their reports of the visit, on a normal day dead certs for the front page, had been pushed aside by news of 'Maggie' and her departure." Christopher Hitchens, In Each Other's Pockets, Independent, 16 Dec. 1990, at 27.

certain can cloy as readily as almost any other word; said, q.v., surpasses it, but not by much: "[The plaintiff] was lawfully possessed of a certain donkey, which said donkey of the plaintiff was then lawfully in a certain highway, and the defendant was then possessed of a certain waggon and certain horses drawing the same." Davies v. Mann, (1842) 10 M. & W. 546, 546, 152 Eng. Rep. 588, 588. The OED labels this use of certain, as well as the phrase certain of <certain of his possessions> "somewhat archaic." The phrase certain of is here used: "She brought suit under section 1983 in the United States District Court against Rotramel and the city, alleging that their actions had deprived Tuttle of certain of his constitutional rights."

certainly. See clearly & obviously.

certainty; certitude. Certainty = (1) an undoubted fact; or (2) absolute conviction. Sense (2) is very close to that reserved for certitude, which means "the quality of feeling certain or convinced." E.g., "The only thing that gives us slight pause is the question how much certitude the agents must have that the premises they are entering, though not listed on the dealer's license as his place of business, really are such." Holmes stated, rather memorably, "Certitude is not the test of certainty. We have been cock-sure of many things that were not so." Oliver W. Holmes, "Natural Law," in Collected Legal Papers 311 (1920).

Occasionally, writers misuse certitude for sense (1) of certainty—e.g.: "History is a matter of probability, not certitude [read certainty]." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 130 (1963).

certificate = (1) a document in which a fact is formally attested; (2) a document certifying the status or authorization of the bearer to act in a specified way; (3) a writing made in one court, by which notice of its proceedings is given to another court, usu. by transcript.

A variation of sense (3) denotes one of the three methods of taking a federal case from the court of appeals to the U.S. Supreme Court: "The court of appeals may certify at any time any question of law in any civil or criminal case for which instructions are desired. The power is that of the court of appeals, and it has been said to be improper for the parties to move for certification. Certification is limited to questions of law, and the questions must be distinct and definite. The Court will dismiss a certificate in which the questions are so broad that in effect they bring up the whole case, although when a case has been certified the Court may itself require that the entire record be sent up for decision of the entire matter in controversy." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 777 (5th ed. 1994).

certificate of title. This AmE phrase denotes one of the four types of evidence of title, the other three being abstract and opinion, title insurance, and a Torrens certificate. The certificate of title—issued by a lawyer who has examined the public records—is used extensively in the eastern and southern parts of the U.S. certification. See certificate.

certiorari (L. "to be more fully informed") refers to a writ or order by which an appellate court comes to review cases of a certain type. The most troublesome aspect of the word is its pronunciation: /sərsh-ee-ə-rar-ee/ or /sərsh-ee-ə-rahr-ee/ or /sərsh-ee-ə-rar-ɪ/. See appeal (B) & review (A).

certitude. See certainty.

certworthy; certworthiness. These AmE legal NEOLOGISMS are used as JARGON by those who practice before, closely follow, or sit on the U.S. Supreme Court. Certworthy = (of a case) meriting Supreme Court review by grant of a writ of certiorari. E.g., "Accordingly, while I believe the case is not 'certworthy,' I would affirm the judgment below." Tipton v. Socony Mobil Oil Co., 375 U.S. 34, 38 (1963) (Harlan, J., dissenting)./ "From these circumstances emerges the 'certworthy' question whether the Fourth Circuit's Erie duty obliged it to certify the false imprisonment issue to the Florida Supreme Court." Robert L. Stern et al., Supreme Court Practice 843 (6th ed. 1986)./ "Scholars and the Court generally deem a case 'certworthy' when the underlying issue on which the lower courts disagree is, in some abstract sense, sufficiently important." Michael F. Sturley, Observations on the Supreme Court's Certiorari Jurisdiction in Intercircuit Conflict Cases, 67 Tex. L. Rev. 1251, 1252 (1989). For an insightful discussion of the term, see David J. Sharpe, The Maritime Origin of the Word "Certworthiness," J. Maritime Law & Comm. 667 (1993). Cf. enbancworthy.

cesser is a LEGALISM meaning "the premature termination of some right or interest" (CDL). It usually appears in the phrase cesser clause or cesser provision. E.g., "The oldest method of protecting the beneficiary from his own indiscretions is the cesser provision or forfeiture clause, which provides that the interest of the beneficiary ceases if he assigns or his creditors attempt to reach his interest by legal process." See -ER (B).

cession; session. Cession = a giving up, granting; the act of ceding. E.g., Michael J. Powell, Professional Divestiture: The Cession of Responsibility for Lawyer Discipline, 1986 Am. B. Found. Res. J. 31. It is used often of nations or peoples who cede land. Session = a meeting or gathering, and is used of deliberative bodies <court is in session>.

cestui* /sed-ee/ (= beneficiary) commonly appears as an elliptical form of cestui que trust, q.v. For example, "The only person who can object to the disposition of the trust property is the one having some definite interest in the property—he must be a trustee, or a cestui, or have some reversionary interest in the trust property."/ "If the cestui has the transaction with the trustee set aside, of course he must return any consideration paid by the trustee to him." As with the full phrase, beneficiary is a preferable term.

cestui que trust* /sed-ee-kee-trəst/ (originally, in Law French, cestui à que trust, lit., "that person for whose benefit" or "he who trusts") is a legal ARCHAISM that persists in AmE (in legal contexts only), but is obsolescent in BrE and unknown in Scotland. The phrase is inferior to the simple word beneficiary, which is far more widely understood. E.g., "No trustee can be compelled to produce (except for the purpose of identification) documents in his possession as such, which his client, the cestui que trust [read the beneficiary], would be entitled to refuse to produce if they were in his possession." (Eng.)

Other forms of the phrase, such as celui qui trust and cettui que trust, have appeared—see Sidney S. Alderman, The French Language in English and American Law, 7 La. B.J. 33, 37 (1959) (preferring celui qui trust)—but they are fairly obscure. The phonetic form settuki is more than just fairly obscure. See Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 576 n.2 (5th ed. 1956).

The plural has been variously formed cestuis que trust, cestuis que trusts, and cestuis que trustent. The last of these has aptly been called "hopelessly wrong." Note, 26 Law Q. Rev. 196, 196 (1910). Another writer has sorrowfully remarked: "[F]rom time to time, it must be regretfully admitted, the Law Reports have ascribed this deplorable version to one of His Majesty's judges." R.E. Megarry, Miscellany-at-Law 33 (1955). Scott and Fratcher explain the trouble: "It is not uncommon to say cestuis que usent or cestuis que trustent on the theory that the last word in each case is a verb that requires the ending of the French third person plural. Professor Maitland has shown, however, that these words are nouns, not verbs, that the term cestui que use is an ellipsis, [and] that the full expression is perhaps cestui a qui oes la terre est tenue, or something of that sort. If this is true, it is of course absurd to add the plural verb ending." 1 Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts § 3.2, at 52–53 (4th ed. 1987). The Latin ending in -ent, then, is a "hypercorrect" form. See HYPERCORRECTION (A).

The best plural form, in short, is cestuis que trust. On elliptical use of the phrase, see cestui*.

cestui que use* /sed-ee-kee-yoos/ (originally, in Law French, cestui à que use, lit., "that person for whose use") refers to the beneficiary of a use, q.v. Today the term appears primarily in historical contexts, inasmuch as uses have been abolished in England. E.g., "The cestui que use of a freehold estate had no action at common law to enforce his claim against the feoffee."/ "The person who enjoyed a use was known as the cestui que use; the feoffor to use and the cestui que use might be the same person or different persons." Some American jurisdictions retain the term, however; as with cestui que trust, beneficiary is a preferable term in modern contexts.

On the plural form cestuis que usent, see cestui que trust*. Oddly, Plucknett more or less acknowledges that cestuis que use is the better form, and then five pages later writes cestuis que usent. See Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 576 n.2, 579 [cestuis que use], 586 [cestuis que usent] (5th ed. 1956). Brian Simpson, another legal historian, calls cestuis que usent "an expression calculated to give a grammarian bad dreams." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 164 (1961; repr. 1964). See HYPERCORRECTION (A).

Still other historians, such as J.H. Baker, prefer the spelling cestuy que use, presumably because it was the more frequent spelling among medieval lawyers. See J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 285–86, 329 (3d ed. 1990).

ceteris paribus* /kay-tər-əs-par-ə-bəs/ (= other things being equal or the same) is an unnecessary LATINISM, since we have the common English phrase. E.g., "[T]he fact is, they don't knowingly take losers. Ceteris paribus [read Other things being equal], the trial lawyer spends his time on the winners. And if a client has a promising case, the lawyer will stake him to it out of sheer self-interest." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators xii (1989). Cf. mutatis mutandis.

chain of title = the recorded history of the title to a piece of realty—including all conveyances and encumbrances—from the time of the earliest records of ownership. The phrase draws upon the metaphor of links (i.e., successive periods of ownership) forming, through time, a connected chain.

chairman; chairwoman; chairperson; chair. Sensitivity to SEXISM impels many writers to use chair rather than chairman, on the theory that doing so avoids gender-bias. E.g., "Governor James Thompson, co-chair of the task force, urged that most of the recommendations to combat violent crime would be of no avail for a nation left with no place to put violent offenders because of a lack of safe, humane prison facilities." Certainly chair is better than chairperson, an ugly and trendy word.

Many readers and writers continue to believe, however, that there is nothing incongruous in having a female chairman, inasmuch as -man has historically been sexually colorless. In the federal judicial opinions issued in 1990, chairman outnumbered chairperson by more than ten to one.

Even so, the nonsexist forms are quickly gaining ground and are likely to prevail entirely within the next couple of decades. If we are to adopt a substitute wording, we ought to ensure that chair (which goes back to the mid-17th c.) and not chairperson becomes the standard term: "In so ruling, he ignored the uncontradicted testimony of Ms. Connie Mooney, coordinator and chairperson [read chair] of the Charleston Woman's Health Group . . . ." Doe v. Charleston Area Medical Ctr., Inc., 529 F.2d 638, 645 (4th Cir. 1975). See SEXISM (B).

One caveat: if we adopt a term such as chair, it must be used in reference to males and females alike. During the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s, there has been a lamentable tendency to have female chairs and male chairmen. That is no better than having chairwomen and chairmen; after all, in most circumstances in which people lead committees and the like, the sex of the leader is irrelevant. See SEXISM (B). challenge for cause (= a lawyer's striking of a veniremember on grounds of bias) is, in AmE, often collapsed into cause challenge or causal challenge, q.v. Of these two shortened forms, causal challenge is preferable: "When the judge has concluded the cause challenges [read causal challenges or challenges for cause], the lawyers have the right to exercise a given number of peremptory challenges—dismissals for no stated reason." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 110 (1990). The shorter form (causal challenge) corresponds more neatly than the longer form (challenge for cause) to the two-word phrase peremptory challenge.

challenged. See EUPHEMISMS.

chambers. This word refers to a judge's or magistrate's private office. In BrE, it additionally has the sense "the offices occupied by a barrister or group of barristers" (CDL). The word is always plural in form, regardless of the number of rooms denoted. Nonlawyers sometimes wrongly make the word singular, as in judge's chamber. See, e.g., Margaret Nicholson, A Dictionary of American-English Usage (1957), under camera.

The one use in which the singular chamber is correct is as an adjective: "During this period, however, other events not formally reflected in the record took place; these include chambers conferences [read chamber conferences or conferences in chambers], which were, of course, known to the district court."

CHAMELEON-HUED WORDS. "In any closely reasoned problem, whether legal or nonlegal, chameleon-hued words are a peril both to clear thought and to lucid expression." Wesley N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions 35 (1919; repr. 1966). More than one great legal mind has made this observation: "When things are called by the same name it is easy for the mind to slide into an assumption that the verbal identity is accompanied in all its sequence by identity of meaning." Lowden v. Northwestern Bank & Trust Co., 298 U.S. 160, 165 (1936) (per Cardozo, J.). "A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged, it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the time in which it is used." Towne v. Eisner, 245 U.S. 418, 425 (1918) (per Holmes, J.).

The English language, and therefore the language of the law, teems with words that have many different—sometimes strikingly different—meanings. There are at least two types of chameleon-hued words. The first type consists in words such as temporal, which has several distinct meanings: (1) of or relating to time <temporal relations of events>; (2) secular, not spiritual <temporal pastimes>; (3) chronological <temporal sequence>; or (4) of or relating to the temples on the side of one's skull <temporal lobes>.

Similar words abound in the language, and often they are the most important ones. For example, Frankfurter wrote, "I do not use the term jurisdiction because it is a verbal coat of too many colors." United States v. L.A. Tucker Truck Lines, Inc., 344 U.S. 33, 39 (1952) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). An English judge has said much the same thing about condition in contractual contexts. See The Varenna [1984] Q.B. 599, 618 (calling it "a chameleon-like word [that] takes on its meanings from its surroundings").

The second type consists essentially in words, usually adjectives, that are empty vessels, to be filled with meaning by the reader. Lawyers delight in such terms as reasonable, substantial, meaningful, and satisfactory. These terms are often usefully vague, allowing drafters to provide a standard for performance in unforeseen circumstances. It is worth the warning, however, to note that "a competent draftsman would not deliberately pick a word which instead of controlling the context is easily colored by it." In re Coe's Estate, 201 A.2d 571, 577 (N.J. 1964).

champertor; maintainer; barrator; embracer. The differences are concisely set forth in the following passage: "If a maintainer is one who stirs up vexatious suits to which he is not a party, if a barrator is one who makes a profession of doing so, if a champertor is one who does so for pecuniary gain and if an embracer is one who in the course of such proceedings seeks to influence or intimidate judge or jury, it must be admitted that in the minds of the lay public, the chief maintainers, barrators, champertors, and embracers of today are the members of the legal profession." Max Radin, Maintenance by Champerty, 24 Calif. L. Rev. 48, 66–67 (1935). The word champertor is mislabeled obsolete in the OED. See champerty, barratry & embracery.

champerty. A. And *maintenance. These words denote related but distinct offenses. Champerty—a subspecies of maintenance—is "an illegal proceeding in which a person (often a lawyer) not naturally concerned in a lawsuit engages to help the plaintiff or defendant to prosecute it, on condition that, if it is successful, that person will receive a share of the property in dispute." Maintenance is "the action of wrongfully aiding and abetting litigation; the act of sustaining a suit or litigant by a party who has no interest in the proceedings or who acts from an improper motive."

The element of pecuniary return is absent from the notion of maintenance. Pollock noted in the late 19th century that "[a]ctions for maintenance are in modern times rare though possible." Frederick B. Pollock, The Law of Torts 211 (1887). The same might now be said of champerty. Contingent fees, which fit within the traditional definition of champerty, are now common in the U.S.; they have been excepted from the prohibition of champerty and in most cases are proper under American ethical canons. See contingent fee.

Misconduct under either name—champerty or maintenance—is more likely to surface today as a defense to a civil action rather than as a criminal offense. See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 585 (3d ed. 1982). For an insightful discussion of the status of champerty and maintenance in American law, see Susan L. Martin, Syndicated Lawsuits: Illegal Champerty or New Business Opportunity? 30 Am. Bus. L.J. 485 (1992).

B. Pronunciation. The Law Student's Pronouncing Dictionary (1948) gives the pronunciation of champerty as /sham-pərty/. In AmE, however, the word usually has a hard -ch- sound, not an -sh- sound.

C. Adjectival Form. The adjective corresponding to champerty is champertous. E.g., "For an agreement to be champertous, the financier must have no [proper] interest in the litigation to be financed." U.S. ex rel. Balboa Ins. Co. v. Algernon Blair, Inc., 795 F.2d 404, 409 (5th Cir. 1986).

chancellor = (1) in England, the nominal head of the Court of Chancery and of the whole judiciary who is also Speaker of the House of Lords and a member of the Cabinet—properly called the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain; (2) in G.B., the single judge of the consistory court of a diocese; (3) the titular head of a university; (4) in the U.S., a judge in equity, or on any court denominated "chancery."

The title is not nearly as exalted in the U.S. as it is in G.B. Here are some examples of the term's use: "Plaintiff finally invokes the rule that findings of the chancellor on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed unless clearly and palpably against the weight of the evidence."/ "There is no claim of fraud or overreaching and the chancellor found that the agreement was not unfair or inequitable under the circumstances." See chancery, Keeper of the King's Conscience & Lord Chancellor.

chancellor's foot. John Selden, the 17th-century barrister and scholar, said, "Equity is a roguish thing. For law we have a measure, know what to trust to: equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. 'Tis all one as if they should make the standard for the measure, a Chancellor's foot. What an uncertain measure would this be! One Chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot; 'tis the same thing in the Chancellor's conscience." John Selden, Table Talk (1689) (as quoted in Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 74 (13th ed. 1924)).

The phrase has continued to stand for inequitable variability in court rulings. E.g., "[T]he defense of entrapment enunciated in these opinions was not intended to give the federal judiciary a 'chancellor's foot' veto over law enforcement practices of which it did not approve." U.S. v. Russell, 411 U.S. 423, 435 (1973). American courts, alas, have sometimes got the reference wrong: "Hundreds of years ago, likewise, equity chance-medley. One criminal-law text defines this quaint legal phrase as "an ordinary fistfight or other nondeadly encounter," suggesting that it would be a loose usage to speak of a homicide resulting from a chance-medley. See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 1121 (3d ed. 1982). But ever since it was first used in the 15th century, the phrase has referred primarily to deadly encounters—esp. in the longer phrase manslaughter by chance-medley. A chance-medley was excusable as opposed to justifiable homicide. See Barry, The Defence of Provocation, 4 Res Judicatae 129, 129 (1949).

There are two views on the etymology of the phrase. One traces the phrase from the Fr. chance medlée, meaning "mixed or mingled chance or casualty." In this view, medley is a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE, chance being the noun. As the OED notes, however, the phrase has been misused by those who took medley to be the noun and chance to be an adjective—as if the phrase meant "fortuitous medley." It does not. But in an alternative view, chance is in fact an adjective, the original having been chaude, indicating hot blood. Those who take this view trace the word from chaude mêlée (= a killing in the course of a spontaneous, heated quarrel). In support of this latter view, see J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 601 & n.40 (3d ed. 1990).

chancery; equity. Chancery = (1) the office of the Chancellor; (2) a court of equity; or (3) equity. Sense (1) is most usual in England, primarily as a historical usage: "The Chancery, in fact, readily abandoned any legal topic as soon as the common law mended its ways and provided a more adequate treatment." (Eng.) Sense (3) is today almost purely an American extension <principles of chancery>. E.g., "The general rule in Virginia is that a cestui que trust is not bound by a decree rendered against his trustees in a chancery suit to which he is not a party."/ "Before probating the second will it was not necessary to file a bill in chancery under the statute to set aside the probate of the former will."

Since the 19th century in AmE, chancery has also been synonymous with bankruptcy in some states. Thus Thoreau wrote about going into chancery, meaning "going bankrupt," in the middle of that century. Such locutions are no doubt restricted to states in which the state bankruptcy courts are called chancery courts. Formerly, American legists used bill in equity and bill in chancery interchangeably. Today in Delaware, the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction over insolvency and receiverships of corporations.

Equity has three basic senses that are relevant in comparison to chancery: (1) evenness, fairness, justice; (2) the application to particular circumstances of what seems naturally just and right, as contrasted with the application of a legal rule; and (3) the body of principles and rules developed since medieval times and applied by the Chancellors of England and the Courts of Chancery. Sense (1) is the general sense used by nonlawyers and lawyers alike; sense (2) is the commonest meaning in legal contexts; and sense (3), in the narrow definition given, is historical and generally British. Senses (2) and (3) are the senses in which chancery is sometimes used for equity, q.v.

chancy is colloquial for uncertain or risky. E.g., "Each party recognizes that it must make some response to the demands of the other party, for issues left unresolved will be submitted to the court, a recourse that is always chancy [read that always has risks]."

channelize; channel, v.t. The COD suggests some DIFFERENTIATION between these terms. Channel = (1) to form channels in, to groove; or (2) to guide. Channelize = to convey (as if) in a channel; to guide. Channel is the common term, to be used unless the connotations suggested by the definition of channelize are peculiarly appropriate.

channel(l)ed; channel(l)ing. These words take one -l- in AmE, two in BrE. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

chapter = (1) in G.B., an act of Parliament, each of which is a numbered chapter of the total legislation of the year; (2) a subdivision of a legislative act, comprising a number of sections; (3) the dean and clergy of a cathedral.

Chapter 11, in AmE, has become synonymous with corporate reorganization for the purpose of handling debts in a structured way, under the protection of a federal bankruptcy court. The phrase is often used attributively—e.g.: "The purpose of a Chapter 11 filing is to give a chief executive an opportunity to reorganize a financially troubled business by putting its creditors on hold. When the money problems have been straightened out and the company restored to health, it emerges from the protection of the bankruptcy courts and picks up where it left off." John Taylor, Bankruptcy Was a Disappointment, N.Y. Times, 10 Dec. 1989, § 7, at 11.

A common colloquialism nowadays is to go

Chapter 11: "Of course, Campeau's badly overextended retailing Empire would soon go Chapter 11 anyway, throwing thousands out of work and rippling damage through the U.S. economy." Book Note, American Way, Jan. 1992, at 78 (reviewing John Rothchild, Going for Broke (1991)).

character; reputation. These words are frequently used in the law of defamation and of evidence. Very simply, the semantic distinction is that character is what one is, whereas reputation is what one is thought by others to be.

charge, n. & v.t. A. In the Sense "accusation." To write that someone has been accused of a charge is a REDUNDANCY. E.g., "In announcing Mr. X's suspension, the [newspaper] management pointed out that 'Mr. X had neither been accused nor convicted of any charge (read had neither been charged nor convicted).'" (Ex. fr. Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 47 (1966).) See accuse.

B. Active and Passive Use. In charge of, Nicholson writes, may be used both actively and passively—e.g.: "The livestock were left in charge of the foreman; the foreman was left in charge of the livestock." The usual passive wording is in the charge of, which prevents any possible ambiguities. E.g., "The truck was in charge of [read in the charge of] Mack Free, who was instructed not to permit any person to ride upon or drive it." To one not accustomed to in charge of in the passive construction, subject and object appear to have been confused, i.e., the sentence seems to say that the truck had control of or authority over Mack Free. One more example: "It had been the practice in Texas to assign a Pullman conductor to trains with two or more sleeping cars, while in trains with only one sleeping car that car was in charge of [read in the charge of] a porter."

C. That-phrase Objects. It is permissible to write, "He charged that the prosecutorial misconduct was of constitutional dimensions," although in BrE charge generally takes a simple noun, either a person or a thing. E.g., "Count one charged the defendant that on or about October 27, 1969, being an undischarged bankrupt he had obtained credit to the extent of £451 13s. 9d. from Lloyds Bank Ltd without informing the said bank that he was then an undischarged bankrupt." Regina v. Hartley, [1972] 2 Q.B. 1.

Both simple nouns and that-phrase objects are common in AmE. Here is another example of the latter type: "The complainant further charged that the above-mentioned book was printed by defendant."

D. Charge the jury. When a trial judge charges the jury, or gives the jury its charge, the judge tells the jurors what the law is and explains that, if they believe one version of the facts, they must render their verdict for the plaintiff—but if they believe the other version of the facts, they must render their verdict for the defendant. E.g., "The trial judge, in charging the jury, required no less than this." The noun phrase is jury charge (= the judge's instructions).

E. And accuse. See accuse.

chargé d'affaires. Pl. chargés d'affaires. Pluralizing often begets error—e.g.: "Washington is full of chargé d'affaires [read chargés d'affaires]." Sidney S. Alderman, The French Language in English and American Law, 7 La. B.J. 33, 37 (1959).

chargee = (1) the holder of a charge upon property, or of a security over a contract (OED); or (2) one charged with a crime. Sense (1), though unrecorded in American dictionaries (apart from W2), appears more frequently in AmE than in BrE. E.g., "I prefer to regard the gift over as a charge coupled with an ancillary power of sale. The objections are that it is not formally such, and that it gives the trustee greater rights than a chargee would have." Boal v. Metropolitan Museum of Art, 292 F. 303, 305 (S.D.N.Y. 1923) (per L. Hand, J.)./ "[T]he critical distinction between trusts and charges for the purposes of resolution of the issues posed in this case is the absence of any fiduciary element in the chargee's duty toward the beneficiary of the charge." Gadekar v. Phillips, 375 A.2d 248, 255 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1977).

Sense (2), which most dictionaries do not record, appears infrequently. E.g., "She says that a charge of a crime in the vague language of the questioned statute does not apprise the chargee with notice of prohibited conduct . . . ." State v. Grinstead, 206 S.E.2d 912, 918 (W. Va. 1974)./ "An indictment performs the office of advising the chargee of the charge . . . ." People v. Addison, 220 N.E.2d 511, 513 (Ill. App. 1966).

charterer; affreighter. Both mean "a person to whom a vessel is chartered in a charterparty." Charterer is more usual. See the quotation under affreightment.

charterparty [fr. L. charta partita or carta partita "a writing divided"]. American dictionaries spell the phrase as two words (the CDL spells it as one), but American and English courts increasingly make it one. See, e.g., Scrutton on Charterparties and Bills of Lading (A. Mocatta et al. eds., 18th ed. 1974) (an English work). Of course,

"[d]ictionaries lag behind linguistic realities," Security Center, Ltd. v. First Nat'l Sec. Ctrs., 750 F.2d 1295, 1298 n.4 (5th Cir. 1985); no doubt most dictionaries will soon correctly list charterparty as a single word.

Charter should be avoided as an elliptical form of charterparty, because charter has so many other meanings that using it in this way may give rise to uncertainties, even if it may sometimes be unambiguous. The tendency to use charter is understandable if we view charterparty as two words; the solution is to spell it as one.

chary (= cautious), a FORMAL WORD close in meaning to wary, is a favorite word of some judges. "We have been extremely chary about extending the 'commercial speech' doctrine beyond this narrowly circumscribed category." The word sometimes implies "sparing, ungenerous" <chary of praise>.

chaste (– pure from unlawful sexual intercourse; virtuous, continent) is a word that applies to men and women alike. Unfortunately, however, a bias pervades its usual applications so that it almost always refers to women and girls. E.g., "One view is that a fallen woman who has fully reformed is chaste, while another is that chastity before marriage means physical virginity—a woman can be seduced only once. There is nothing unchaste about marital intercourse and hence, under either view, a widow or divorcee may be an unmarried female of previously-chaste character." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 463–64 (3d ed. 1982).

chasten; chastise. These words are close in meaning, but distinct. Chasten = to discipline, punish, or subdue. Chastise = to punish, thrash. In AmE chastise has also the dialectal sense "to castigate, criticize."

chattelize (= to treat as a chattel) began as a nonlegal word in the 19th century to describe human degradation, as in the phrase chattelized humanity. The word has since migrated into legal contexts, as here: "This would plainly be true as to ordinary chattels, and 'chattelized' property like securities should go by the same rule." Boston Safe Deposit & Trust Co. v. Paris, 447 N.E.2d 1268, 1271 n.3 (Mass. App. Ct. 1983)./ "[W]hen the intangible is chattelized in a document, the analogies to property predominate." Eugene F. Scoles & Peter May, Conflict of Laws § 19.27, at 758 (1982). See chattels.

chattel mortgage; conditional sales contract. The distinction between these two concepts is important when a buyer of goods cannot pay the entire purchase price at once. In such cases, the buyer makes a down payment, and the rest of the purchase price is payable in installments. Under a chattel mortgage, the seller transfers title to the buyer, who gives the seller a mortgage to secure the unpaid balance. Under a conditional sales contract, the buyer takes delivery, but the title remains in the seller until the entire purchase price is paid. The latter method, naturally, is more common in installment sales, which usually involve adhesion contracts. See mortgage.

In the context of real property, a conditional sales contract is often called a contract for deed.

chattels is commonly defined as "personal property," but this definition misleads. The proper definition is "any property other than freehold land"; a leasehold interest in land, having characteristics of both real and personal property, is termed a chattel real. E.g., "American courts have been much more liberal than the courts of England in recognizing future interests in chattels real."

Tangible goods or intangible rights, as in patents, stocks, or shares, are termed chattels personal. E.g., "Chattels personal may be consumable or nonconsumable, tangible or intangible." The distinction is best observed fastidiously; nevertheless, this terminology is falling into disuse. Chattel personal = chose, q.v.

cheat = a common-law misdemeanor involving a swindle perpetrated by means of a false token. This wrong—which thrived from the 17th to the 19th centuries—falls today under the rubric of false pretenses, q.v.

The origin of the word cheat is interesting. It derives from escheat, q.v. In the Middle Ages, the escheator was an officer who assessed the value of an escheat—that is, property reverting to the public treasury upon the death of the King's tenant-in-chief for lack of an heir. So corrupt and greedy were the escheators, however, that, by the 15th century, the modern sense of cheat and cheater had developed. Meanwhile, a century later, thieves began to refer to their stolen goods as cheat, as if the goods were escheated or confiscated. These two uses of the word coalesced into the modern sense.

check = an order for payment of money on demand, drawn on a banker, and expressed as being payable either to bearer or to (the order of) a named person. Cheque is the BrE spelling.

check, worthless; bogus check; cold check; false check; rubber check. What should we call an unaltered check that bears the drawer's genuine signature but is drawn on a bank in which the drawer has either no account or insufficient funds? Rubber check, which is slang, derives from the idea that the check "bounces"; the phrase suggests that the drawer's account has insufficient funds but not that the drawer has no account, so it is not as broad as the other phrases. False check and bogus check inappropriately suggest a forgery, which is a different idea altogether. Cold check, like rubber check, is slang. Worthless check is the least objectionable phrase, though it is slightly misleading because the check may finally have some value; despite that shortcoming, criminal-law scholars commonly use worthless check (which is not to say that they ever use worthless checks). See, e.g., Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 385 (3d ed. 1982).

cherry-picking is AmE legal slang for the modern law firm's practice of luring select lawyers from other firms with special inducements. E.g., "[T]heir lawyers will be easy prey in this age of cherry-picking and big-firm branching." Steven Brill, The End of Partnership? American Law., Dec. 1989, at 3./ "It's been an incredible decade marked by law firm collapses, mergers and cherry-picking." Rita H. Jensen, Firms Face the New Decade, Nat'l L.J., 25 Dec. 1989–1 Jan. 1990, at 1. The verb cherry-pick is a BACK-FORMATION: "Dell downplays the effect his attempts to cherry-pick will have on San Francisco's legal market." Audrey Duff, S.F. v. L.A.: Battling for Talent, American Law., May 1990, at 16.

chicane. See chicane(ry).

chicanerous (= engaging in or exhibiting chicanery) is a useful NEOLOGISM perhaps invented by Professor Arthur Miller of Harvard, the first known user: "[I]t was believed that a pleading containing inconsistent allegations indicated falsehood on its face and was a sign of a chicanerous litigant seeking to subvert the judicial process." 5 Charles A. Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1283, at 372 (1969) (section acknowledged as Miller's). Other uses swiftly followed—e.g.: "The trial judge grounded his dismissal on a finding that 'the United States Attorney's office actions in juggling this case back and forth . . . is [sic] vexatious, oppressive, chicanerous . . . .'" U.S. v. Jefferson, 257 A.2d 225, 226 (D.C. 1969).

chicane(ry). In contexts other than those involving horse racing and card games, chicane is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of chicanery (= trickery). "The lack of business ethics displayed by defendant invites and receives the condemnation of all who love fair play and scorn chicane [read chicanery] and deceit."/ "The ancient complaint about the attorney's chicane [read chicanery] was reinforced in the 16th century with the addition to the English language of the opprobrious 'pettifogger.'" chide > chided > chided are the preferred inflections in AmE and BrE alike. Chid is an AmE variant past tense and past participle. The variant past participle chidden should be avoided.

The gerund chiding acts as the noun <perhaps this chiding will have some effect>. With chidance, Rodell was surely punning on guidance: "But the thirty-year story of the Court under Holmes's chidance [read chiding] can best be told neither in strict chronological sequence nor in the specific records of specific Justices (other than Holmes) . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 191 (1955).

chief judge; presiding judge. On each U.S. Court of Appeals (since 1948), the chief judge is the senior active judge among those who (1) are not yet 65 years old, (2) have been circuit judges for at least one year, and (3) have never before served as chief judge. 28 U.S.C. § 45 (a)(1). The chief judge generally hears almost as many cases as other judges, acts as the circuit's administrative head, and schedules all court sittings. Before 1948, the position was called senior circuit judge.

A presiding judge is the senior active judge on a three-member panel that hears and decides cases. One may be a presiding judge one month and the most junior member on a panel the next month. Unlike chief judge, then, presiding judge is not a permanent title—it is a situational title.

Chief Justice of the United States. Though usage has varied over time, this is now the generally preferred title—not Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court or Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. But that was not always so, as Charles Warren explains with abundant historical evidence:

> The official title of the Chief Justice seems to have varied at different periods of the Court's history. Jay was commissioned under the title of "Chief justice of the Supreme Court of the United States," as were Rutledge, Ellsworth, Marshall, Taney, Chase and White. Fuller was commissioned as "Chief Justice of the United States." The Constitution mentions the office of Chief Justice only once; in Article One, Section three, relative to impeachments in which it is provided—"When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside." The Judiciary Act of Sept. 24, 1789, provided that the Supreme Court "shall consist of a chief justice and five associate justices." The Act of July 13, 1866, c. 210, for the first time officially used the term "Chief Justice of the United States" providing that "thereafter the Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice of the United States and six associate justices." The Act of April 10, 1869, c. 22, provided that the Court shall "hereafter consist of the Chief Justice of the United States and eight associate justices." The Revised Statutes, Section 673, and the Act of March 3, 1911, c. 231, codifying the laws relating to the judiciary, Section 215, refer to "a Chief Justice of the United States." On the other hand, the statutes relating to the salaries of the Court, viz.: the Act of March 3, 1873, c. 226, the Act of Feb. 12, 1902, c. 547, and the Act of March 3, 1911, c. 231, Section 218, all refer to "the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States." New England Historical and Genealogical Register (1895), XLIX, 275.

Charles Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 11–12 n.2 (rev. ed. 1928).

Both popular and legal writers use variations on the title—e.g.: "[T]he chief justice of the United States Supreme Court [capitalize Chief Justice], Mr. Rehnquist, has said that no rational person could equate a request for aid of counsel with a guilty mind." J. Gary Trichter, The Civil Law and DWI, 50 Tex. B.J. 1093, 1096 (1987)./ "The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, several years ago, was elucidating in the course of the Court's opinion a little point of law." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 119 (1939; repr. 1980).

Chief Justiceship; Chiefship. The former is more common, but the latter is admirably succinct: "But both Wilson, who had literally applied for the Chiefship, and Rutledge, whose friends had campaigned for him, were named Associate Justices." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 47 (1955).

child en ventre sa mere. See en ventre sa mere*.

child (of tender age or years); young person; juvenile; minor; pupil. In American law, a child of tender age or years has generally not reached his or her 14th birthday. In English law, child itself usually means one who is not yet 14, though some English lawyers, up to the mid-20th century, used child to refer to someone under 21.

In most American states, a juvenile—a 20th-century statutory word—is one who has not reached the age of 18. See Juvenile Delinquency Act, 18 U.S.C. § 5031 (1988). In England, juvenile denotes one who has not reached 17—i.e., either a child (as defined above) or a young person (meaning someone who has reached 14 but is not yet 17).

While minor (like infant) covers all these categories in most English-speaking jurisdictions, that is not so in Scotland, where minor has a more restrictive sense. In Scots law, minors are those 16 to 18 years old. Younger persons are called pupils. Scots lawyers typically use the word nonage to denote the status of pupils and minors.

Only lawyers could construct a system in which an infant can be older than child. See age of capacity, infant, infancy, minority & nonage.

childlike; childish. Childlike connotes simplicity, innocence, and truthfulness. Childish connotes puerility, peevishness, and silliness.

child-kidnap. See kidnapping (B).

child-slaying. See infanticide.

child-stealing. See abduction & kidnapping (B).

chill (= to inhibit, discourage <to chill a person's rights>) is now a common term in American legal JARGON. The standard phrase is chilling effect—e.g.: "The majority held that the waiting-period requirement is unconstitutional because it has a chilling effect on the right to travel."

The origin of this usage lies in the word's figurative sense, recorded by both the OED and W3, "to affect as with cold; to check, depress, or lower (warmth, ardour, etc.); to damp, deject, dispirit" (OED). All the examples quoted in the OED to illustrate this sense involve the chilling of something, usually an emotion, that is figuratively warm (enthusiasm, courage, admiration, zeal, etc.).

American lawyers have extended chill by applying it to rights and freedoms, to the exercise of rights and freedoms, and even to the persons exercising them. E.g., "The opinions emphasized that such thoughtlessly broad statutos affected not only the immediate litigants but the atmosphere of freedom generally, because they may 'chill that free play of the spirit which all teachers ought especially to cultivate and practice.'" Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 204 (1960)./ "Courts have said that the danger that the mere pendency of the action will chill the exercise of First Amendment rights requires more specific allegations than would otherwise be required."

The basic phrase chilling effect is sometimes jargonistically elaborated: "The purpose of this limitation is to prevent juries from giving excessive awards, and thereby imposing a pecuniary chill factor on the media." (See SET PHRASES.) Now used indiscriminately, chill(ing) and chilling effect have become legal CLICHÉS.

chimera. Pl. -as.

Chinese Wall = a screening mechanism that protects client confidences by preventing one or more lawyers within an organization from participating in any matter involving that client. A principal purpose of this mechanism is to allow a lawyer to move to a new law firm without the fear of vicariously disqualifying that firm from representing certain clients. Typically, the procedures used in erecting a Chinese Wall include prohibiting the lawyer in question from any contact with the case—no access to files, no share in any fees derived from the case, and sometimes even sequestration from those handling the case. See M. Peter Moser, Chinese Walls: A Means of Avoiding Law Firm Disqualification When a Personally Disqualified Lawyer Joins the Firm, 3 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 399, 400 (1990).

The metaphor derives, of course, from the Great Wall of China—not from any ethnic bias. Even so, some lawyers worry that the phrase might be understood in a derogatory sense; those who do tend to use a phrase such as ethical wall.

In conflict-of-interest cases, the phrase dates from about 1977. But earlier references appear in other legal contexts to evoke the idea of artificial insularity. E.g., "[S]ome of them had said the Corn Products Refining Company had built a Chinese wall against competitors and kept them in chains." U.S. v. Corn Prods. Refining Co., 234 F. 964, 979 (S.D.N.Y. 1916) (per L. Hand, J.)/ "But we do not think that the state may erect a Chinese Wall around itself by adopting regulations . . . ." Barnwell Bros., Inc. v. South Carolina State Highway Dep't, 17 F. Supp. 803, 815 (E.D.S.C. 1937). Today, however, the phrase almost invariably concerns legal ethics or complex financial transactions.

The phrase is sometimes written Chinese wall, but today the second word is usually capitalized.

Chip Smith charge. See dynamite charge.

chirograph = (1) a written deed, subscribed and witnessed; (2) such a deed in two parts, written head to head, divided by the word "chirographum" in capitals, and the two parts separated by an indented line through the word "chirographum," each party retaining one part. See party of the first part.

chit [fr. Anglo-Indian chitty letter, note certificate (c. 1673), borrowed from Hindi chitthī] = (1) a signed voucher for money received or owed, usu. for food, drink, etc.; or (2) a slip of paper with writing on it. Both meanings are common. Sense (1): "After each meal the Club member is presented with a chit upon which he subscribes his name. All chits signed during a month are consolidated and monthly statements are rendered . . . ." Baltimore Country Club, Inc. v. Comptroller of Treasury, 321 A.2d 308, 310 (Md. 1974)./ Sense (2): "[S]he was to make memoranda incident to her acts of prostitution, and . . . [w]ould transcribe thereon the amount of money collected from each customer, the time at which she started and finished each transaction, along with her professional identification as 'Pam.' These chits . . were placed . . . in a bag . . . ." Schweinefuss v. Commonwealth, 395 S.W.2d 370, 373 (Ky. 1965).

choate. Holmes wrote Pollock in 1878 that he had read in a legal text from California that "the wife on marriage acquires an inchoate right of dower which by the death of her husband becomes choate." Holmes–Pollock Letters 11 (Howe ed., 2d ed. 1961). Choate, a BACK-FORMATION from inchoate, is a misbegotten word, for the prefix in inchoate is intensive and not negative. (See EN- & NEGATIVES (B).) The word derives from the Latin verb inchoare "to hitch with; to begin." Yet, because it was misunderstood as being a negative (meaning "incomplete"), someone invented a positive form for it, namely choate (meaning "complete").

In AmE, the word has become more or less standard in the phrase choate lien, corresponding to inchoate lien. Justice Minton used the word in U.S. v. City of New Britain, 347 U.S. 81, 84 (1954): "The liens may also be perfected in the sense that there is nothing more to be done to have a choate lien—when the identity of the lienor, the property subject to the lien, and the amount of the lien are established." The three requirements mentioned in that quotation make up what has come to be known in the U.S. as the choateness doctrine, which means that "where a security interest arising under state law . . . comes into conflict with a federal tax lien, the state law security interest 'attaches' only when it becomes choate." J.D. Court, Inc. v. United States, 712 F.2d 258, 261 (7th Cir. 1983).

Although the word is etymologically misbegotten, it is now fairly well ensconced in the legal vocabulary. It has supplied a name for a fairly arcane legal doctrine, which is unlikely to be renamed. Choate is recognized in legal literature as "an illegitimate back formation" (William T. Plumb, Federal Liens and Priorities, 77 Yale L.J.

228, 230 (1967)), but it is used even by those who deprecate its origins.

Pollock heard of the word from Holmes, but otherwise the choate is virtually unknown in G.B. See inchoate.

choice of law; choice of jurisdiction. These terms, used in conflicts of law, are occasionally confused. Choice of law = the question of which jurisdiction's law applies. Choice of jurisdiction = the choice of the country that should exercise jurisdiction over a case. When either phrase is used attributively as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it should be hyphenated <Delaware's choice-of-law rules>. See conflict of laws.

choreograph and orchestrate, q.v., have become CLICHÉS when used figuratively. In the most jejune modern language, careers are choreographed and events are orchestrated. See VOGUE WORDS.

chose, n., is a Law French word meaning literally "a thing." In modern legal writing, chose = chattel personal, q.v. E.g., "There were four reasons why equity could not simply allow the assignee of a legal chose to sue the debtor in the Court of Chancery." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 578 (8th ed. 1991).

Traditionally, choses are of two kinds. Choses in possession are tangible goods capable of being actually possessed and enjoyed (e.g., books and clothes); choses in action are rights that can be enforced by legal action (e.g., debts or causes of action in tort). E.g., "If the chose in action is not embodied in a writing or evidenced thereby, delivery must be by a written assignment."/ "No particular formalities are required for a gift of a chose in action not represented by a so-called indispensable account." The phrase chose in action is sometimes anglicized thing in action. Cf. chattels.

chose jugée – a matter already settled, and therefore not open to further consideration. This phrase is an unnecessary French equivalent of res judicata, q.v.

Christian name; christian name. The phrase refers, of course, to one's forename or given name, as opposed to the surname, q.v. The first word is usu. capitalized—though Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes made it lowercase in George A. Ohl & Co. v. Smith Iron Works, 288 U.S. 170, 177 (1933).

church law. See canon law.

chuse, an archaic spelling of choose, appears in Article I, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution, and indeed throughout the document. The archaic spelling was commonly used in British opinions of the period: "[S]he did not chuse to expose herself to contempt again. The action then is to depend entirely on the nerves of the actress; if she chuses to appear on the stage again, no action can be maintained . . . ." Ashley v. Harrison, (1793) Peake 256, 258 (K.B.) (spelling modernized at 170 Eng. Rep. 148, 149).

chutzpah /huut-spə/ is a curious word, having both positive and negative connotations in AmE. On the one hand, it is said:

> Alan Dershowitz, the white knight of religious correctness, should have been a tad more judicious in his choice of a title for his book Chutzpah. Leo Rosten's book Hooray for Yiddish! defines chutzpah as "ultra-brazenness, shamelessness, hard-to-believe effrontery, presumption or gall"—traits that many Jews and Gentiles would hardly classify as desirable.
> Letter of Chloe Ross, New York, 16 Dec. 1991, at 6

On the other hand—and perhaps this says something about American culture—many consider chutzpah something desirable. W10 defines it first as "supreme self-confidence," but then unnerves us with "nerve, gall." The word sits uneasily on the fence that divides praise and scorn.

-CIDE. This suffix denotes either the act of slaying [fr. L. -cīdium "cutting, killing"] or one who slays [fr. L. -cīda "cutter, killer"]. Thus fratricide is either the killing of one's brother or someone who kills his or her brother. The more common words ending in this suffix are these:

homicide	= the act of killing a person = the killer of another person infanticide	= the act of killing a baby = one who kills a baby matricide	= the act of killing one's mother = the killer of one's own mother parricide	= the act of killing one's father = the killer of one's own father patricide	See the entry at parricide.
regicide	= the act of killing the king or queen = the killer of the king or queen suicide	= the act of killing oneself
	= one who kills oneself

Though a few others, such as fratricide and sororicide, are generally known, we also have many less common words ending in -cide. For example, famicide (= the destroyer of someone's reputation) was once used as a synonym for slanderer. Prolicide (= the act of killing offspring either before or soon after birth) is broad enough to subsume both feticide (see abortion) and infanticide. The coinages with this suffix, naturally, are no more sex-neutral than in any other corner of the language: the OED records uxoricide (= the slayer of one's wife), but mariticide (= the slayer of one's husband) is not recorded: it can only be deduced from the adjective maritícidal (= of or relating to one who murders her husband).

Scientists have developed algicides, fungicides, germicides, and insecticides (known also as pesticides, though this word can be used more broadly than insecticides).

To disinfect their combs and other utensils, American barbers commonly use a trademarked product ominously called "Barbicide." Hence this suffix, like -EE, is perhaps losing its literal force.

Naturally, wags have seized on this suffix for jocular purposes to make such words as suitorcide (a nonce-word meaning "fatal to suitors") and prenticecide (= the killing of an apprentice). Justice Holmes's father, the poet Oliver Wendell Holmes, invented a word that some dictionaries label jocular. Perhaps, however, this word ought to be taken seriously: verbicide—"that is," Holmes wrote, "violent treatment of a word with fatal results to its legitimate meaning, which is its life." Both "[h]omicide and verbicide . . . are alike forbidden." Oliver W. Holmes [Sr.], An Autocrat at the Breakfast-Table 10 (1859). One mission of this dictionary is to prevent verbicide in the legal context.

For entries related to this one, see murder (A) & parricide.

c.i.p. = continuation in part. In American patent practice, a c.i.p. application is a patent application filed during the lifetime of an earlier application by the same applicant, repeating a substantial part of the earlier application but adding to or subtracting from it. See Louis B. Applebaum et al., Glossary of United States Patent Practice 24 (1969).

Circuit Judge, U.S. This is the proper title for a federal appellate judge who sits on a U.S. Court of Appeals (not Circuit Court of Appeals). Journalists often incorrectly give the title as Judge of the Court of Appeals.

In England, by contrast, a circuit judge sits in a county court and hears civil matters.

circuit, to ride; to go on circuit; on circuit; at circuit. These phrases refer to the practice of having itinerant courts, similar in some ways to the Curia Regis of early common law. State and federal judges in the U.S. commonly rode circuit or went on circuit through the beginning of the 20th century. Various idioms have emerged from the practice—e.g.: "In contrast to the system in England, where judges went on circuit, most courts in the United States came to be permanently and locally fixed." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 427 (1962)./ "For English judges, [having judgments given in Welsh] can hardly have added to the attractions of going circuit in Wales . . . ." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 169 (1973)./ "[W]hile the justices of the Supreme Court were not relieved directly of the burden of circuit riding, the pressure of their other duties was such that increasingly the circuit court was held by a single district judge." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 38 (4th ed. 1983). For an interesting account of an English judge on circuit, see Frank Douglas MacKinnon, On Circuit: 1924–1937 (1941).

Lawyers, too, frequently rode circuit: "One of [Abraham Lincoln's] nominees was David Davis, a friend from Lincoln's days as a circuit-riding lawyer in Illinois." Donald Dale Jackson, Judges 333 (1974).

circumlocution is roundabout speech or language, or using many words where one or two would suffice. It is not the nominal form corresponding to circuitous, which means "winding, tortuous, anfractuous"—the noun for circuitous being circuity, and the adjective corresponding to circumlocution being circumlocutory.

CIRCUMLOCUTION. See BE-VERBS (B) & PERIPHRASIS.

circumscribable; circumscriptable; circumscriptible. The first of these three forms is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

circumspection = cautiousness; watchfulness; prudence <the judge exercised circumspection in disbelieving the interested witnesses>. This word is sometimes misunderstood as meaning "examination." E.g., "The circumstances surrounding the removal are far from typical and present what the court ascertains as a novel question, requiring almost a complete circumspection [read examination] of the removal provisions for its resolution."

circumstances. Some writers prefer in the circumstances to under the circumstances. The latter is unobjectionable, however, and is much more common. E.g., "Under the circumstances, we are of the opinion that the sole purpose for which the trust was created has become impossible of accomplishment and has been terminated." Fowler wrote that the insistence on in the circumstances as the only right form is "puerile."

circumstantial evidence; indirect evidence. The former is the more common phrase in both AmE and BrE for evidence from which the fact-finder may infer the existence of a fact in issue, but which does not directly prove the existence of the fact. E.g., "Susman told the jurors his case was going to involve mainly circumstantial evidence, a perfectly acceptable way for him to prove his case." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 279 (1989). See direct evidence.

circumvent; undermine. Circumvent may mean "to undermine"—e.g.: "Resort to judicial injunction to circumvent the decision of Board 2901 would subvert the purpose of the Railway Labor Act." But circumvent is connotatively a somewhat more neutral word than undermine. See obviate.

citation = (1) an official summons directing a person to appear before a court; or (2) an oral or written reference to a legal authority, usu. a case or statute. The term is used primarily in American and Scottish courts, as opposed to the English courts.

Perhaps that explains why the English authorities cannot agree about to whom a citation in sense (1) must be directed. Several say that it must go to a nonparty. See OCL; W.A. Jowitt, The Dictionary of English Law 376 (2d ed. 1959); Roger Bird, Osborn's Concise Law Dictionary 73 (7th ed. 1983). Another authority of repute, however, defines the word as "a summons to a party to appear." E.R. Hardy Ivamy, Mozley & Whiteley's Law Dictionary 80 (10th ed. 1988). Still others define the word as broadly as it is in AmE—so that it may be directed either to parties or to nonparties. See CDL; P.H. Collin, English Law Dictionary 44 (1986); Gavin McFarlane, The Layman's Dictionary of English Law 46 (1984). Because usage varies, the narrower definitions are really too narrow to describe BrE accurately.

CITATION OF CASES. The standard work in the field is The Bluebook: A Uniform System of Citation (16th ed. 1996). It has weathered recent competition from The Maroonbook (1989) better than might be expected, esp. since every new edition of the Bluebook seems much longer than the previous one. Still, it provides reliable guidance on hundreds of tricky citational problems, and the editors have tried to make it easy to use.

American writers have produced a number of ancillary aids for citing cases. Among the useful ones are these: Mary Miles Prince, Bieber's Dictionary of Legal Citations (3d ed. 1988); C.E. Good, Citing and Typing the Law: A Course on Legal Citation and Style (3d ed. 1992). For identifying obscure citations, esp. in historical materials, Marion D. Powers's Legal Citation Directory (1971) is useful.

For British form, nearest counterparts to the Bluebook are Derek French, How to Cite Legal Authorities (1996); Sweet & Maxwell, Guide to Law Reports and Statutes (4th ed. 1962); Donald Raistrick, Index to Legal Citations and Abbreviations (1981). For Canadian legal writers, the Canadian Guide to Uniform Legal Citation (2d ed. 1988) and Chin-Shin Tang's Guide to Legal Citation and Sources of Citation Aid: A Canadian Perspective (2d ed. 1988) are serviceable guides.

A few points not within the purview of those works merit our attention here, the most important being the last.

A. Beginning Sentences with Citations. It is stylistically poor to begin a sentence with a citation—e.g.: "26 U.S.C. § 7213 provides that it is unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States to willfully disclose to any person . . . tax returns or return information." A better method is to state the proposition and to place the citation at the sentence's end.

B. Mid-Sentence Citations. The legal writer's general preference should be not to cite cases in mid-sentence, for it is distracting to the reader, especially if that citation is longer than fifteen or so characters (as an appeals court case that was denied certiorari). Only occasionally does it seem appropriate—e.g.: "Our holding in Harrington v. Bush, 553 F.2d 190 (D.C. Cir. 1977), requires us to reject Senator Helms's arguments and to deny him standing."

Courts formerly tried setting off these mid-sentence citations in parentheses, but the results are little better than any other mid-sentence citations, and doing so does not conform to the general rules of legal citation. Here is an egregious example:

> The doctrine of incorporation by reference, even if applicable at all where an intent to incorporate in the usual sense is negatived (In re Estate of York, 95 N.H. 435, 437, 65 A.2d 282, 8 A.L.R.2d 611; Lauritzen, Can a Revocable Trust Be Incorporated by Reference, 45 Ill. L. Rev. 583, 600; Polasky, "Pourover" Wills and the Statutory Blessing, 98 Trusts & Estates 949, 954–955; compare Old Colony Trust Co. v. Cleveland, 291 Mass. 380, 196 N.E. 920; Bolles v. Toledo Trust Co., 144 Ohio St. 195, 58 N.E.2d 381, 157 A.L.R. 1164; Restatement [2d] Trusts, § 54, comments e–j, 1), could not import the nonexistent amendment
> Second Bank-State Street Trust Co. v. Pinion, 170 N.E.2d 350, 352 (Mass. 1960).

C. Incidental Use of Case Names. See CASE REFERENCES.

D. Citations in Text. Only the hardiest of stylists will own up to this difficult fact: in many types of legal writing—in briefs and memos, for example—the only sensible place for citations is in footnotes. Putting them in the body clutters the text, slows the reader, and hampers the writer's ability to construct a coherent paragraph. Few writing reforms would benefit the legal world more than adopting the following rules: (1) put all citations in footnotes; and (2) ban footnotes for all purposes other than providing citations.

citator, n., refers, in LEGALESE, not to a person, but to a book that helps lawyers determine the treatment of cases by courts subsequently considering them—whether on appeal or as precedents. By a system of code signs, citators show whether the later cases overrule, follow, limit, or distinguish a given case. Now that much of this information has been converted to electronic formats, citators have become somewhat outmoded.

cite, n. Using cite as a noun—in place of citation—is a casualism. Some excellent legal writers have used it in this way—e.g.: "[T]he see's and cfs. far outnumber the points that rest on a simple cite." Karl Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition: Deciding Appeals 491 (1960)./ "String cites are out of style among academic lawyers; for some legal theorists, reading cases is out of style." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule viii (1991). Even so, in certain phrases, such as cite omitted, the shorter form looks very lax. See, e.g., U.S. v. David, 662 F. Supp. 244, 245 (N.D. Ga. 1987) (twice using cite omitted). Cf. quote.

cite, v.t. A. General Senses and Use. Cite, v.t. = (1) to commend <the mayor cited him for his commendable pro bono work>; (2) to adduce as precedent or as binding law <counsel then cited the appropriate statutory provision>; or (3) to summon before a court of law <he was cited for contempt>.

In sense (2), the object of cite should be the precedent or statute cited, not the person to whom it is cited. The following loose usage is not uncommon in AmE: "A law dictionary such as this, . . . which cites the reader to leading treatises [read cites leading treatises] such as Wigmore on Evidence, . . . can easily instill the suspicion in a diligent patron of law that he has the makings of an advocate." E.J. Bander, Dictionary of Selected Legal Terms and Maxims v (2d ed. 1979)./ "We are cited to the case of [read We are asked to consider or The defense cites] Lovelady v. State . . . ." Smith v. State, 180 S.W.2d 622, 625 (Tex. Crim. App. 1944). See OBJECT-SHUFFLING

A related problem is using cite as an intransitive rather than as a transitive verb—that is, saying that the writer is citing to a case rather than citing a case. This looseness results perhaps from the noun form, citation to, as in: "Citations to both the U.S. Reports and the Supreme Court Reporter are included for ease of research."

B. And quote. Lawyers commonly differentiate between these words. To cite an authority is to give its substance and to indicate where it can be found. To quote is to repeat someone else's exact words and to enclose them in quotation marks. In legal writing, citations routinely follow quotations.

citizen. A. And resident. With U.S. citizens, the terms citizen and resident are generally viewed as being interchangeable in reference to state residency or citizenship. See Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 243–44 (4th ed. 1983) (noting that at least two circuit courts have held otherwise—that the terms are related but "not necessarily one and the same thing").

The words are not interchangeable when other political entities (e.g., cities) are the frame of reference, for citizen implies political allegiance and a corresponding protection by the state, whereas resident denotes merely that one lives in a certain place. E.g., "Plaintiff, a citizen of the State of Washington, seeks a declaratory judgment pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 400." (He is a citizen of Washington merely by virtue of being a U.S. citizen and residing in that state; yet he would be able to avail himself of the protections of state law—hence citizen is appropriate.) It is possible to be a citizen of the United States while being neither a citizen nor a resident of any particular state.

A corporation is not a citizen of any state—though it is treated as if it were for jurisdictional purposes. See Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 449 (4th ed. 1983).

With foreign citizens, the distinction between resident and citizen becomes acute, inasmuch as an alien remains a citizen of a foreign country but may be a resident of a state. For purposes of American diversity jurisdiction in federal courts, the alien's citizenship, rather than residency, controls, under the principle first laid down in Breedlove v. Nicolet, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 413, 431–32 (1833). See citizenship & domicil(e).

B. And subject. Subject (= a person subject to political rule; any member of a state except the sovereign [COD]) is not merely the BrE equivalent of the American citizen. A citizen is a person from a country in which sovereignty is believed or supposed to belong to the collective body of the people, whereas a subject is one who owes allegiance to a sovereign monarch.

citizenry; citizens. Both are acceptable plurals of citizen, -s being the more general. Two aspects of citizenry distinguish it: first, it is a COLLECTIVE NOUN (although it frequently takes a plural verb), emphasizing the mass or body of citizens; and second, citizenry is, as W2 notes, frequently used by way of contrast to soldiery, officialdom, or the intelligentsia. Here it is opposed to one part of officialdom (some might say intelligentsia): "The written Constitution lies at the core of the American 'civil religion'; not only judges but also the citizenry at large habitually invoke the Constitution."

citizen's arrest; private arrest. The former phrase is current in both AmE and BrE. The latter phrase is a primarily British variant.

citizenship; domicile; residence. "For purposes of federal diversity jurisdiction, citizenship and domicile are synonymous." Hendry v. Masonite Corp., 455 F.2d 955, 955 (5th Cir. 1972). For other purposes, however, the words are quite different. Citizenship denotes the status of being a citizen, with its attendant rights and privileges. In other words, citizenship "carries with it the idea of identification with the state and a participation in its functions. As a citizen, one sustains social, political, and moral obligation to the state and possesses social and political rights under the Constitution and laws thereof." Baker v. Keck, 13 F. Supp. 486, 487 (E.D. Ill. 1936). See citizen (A).

Domicile = residency at a particular place accompanied with positive or presumptive proof that the person intends to remain there for an unlimited time. Mitchell v. U.S., 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 350, 352 (1874).

Residence is, for legal purposes, usable in place of domicile, but is broader, inasmuch as in one sense it is a FORMAL WORD for "house, home." See domicil(e) & residence.

citizenship, diversity of. See diversity.

city lawyer. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

city part = (in the language of New York state courts) a trial court created to hear trip-and-fall and other personal-injury claims against the City of New York. The proliferation of such suits prompted the creation of a special division composed of various "parts" to dispose of them. See David B. Saxe, An Afternoon in a City Part, 17 Litigation 1, 1 (Winter 1991).

civil action. In so-called code states, this phrase replaced action at law and suit in equity upon the merger of law and equity in American courts. See 1 G.W. Field, Field's Lawyers' Briefs 1 (1884). Rule 2 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (1938) established the civil action as the "one form of action" in federal courts in the U.S.

Civil Code. See Napoleonic Code.

civil death, a LOAN TRANSLATION of mors civilis, was formerly opposed to natural death. At common law, a person who (1) was banished or outlawed, (2) was attainted of felony, or (3) had entered a monastery, was said to have suffered a civil death: "In one large department of law the fiction [of civil death] is elegantly maintained. A monk or nun can not acquire or have any proprietary rights. When a man becomes 'professed in religion,' his heir at once inherits from him any land that he has, and, if he has made a will, it takes effect at once as though he were naturally dead." 1 Frederick B. Pollock & Frederic W. Maitland, History of English Law 434 (2d ed. 1899).

Now obsolete in England, this FICTION is still applied in some American states in reference to prisoners. One commentator argues convincingly that the fiction is unnecessary and confusing in the modern world:

> For the sake of preserving the fiction of civil death, which satisfied the logic and rules of an earlier day, words are robbed of all ordinary meaning, yet nothing of technical sharpness results. As it is now, the rules that govern the civil rights of prisoners must still be spelled out in statute and case law. In the confusion over the metaphysics of civil death even earnest men find themselves wandering. Much simpler to drop the whole civil death business.
> David Mellinkoff, The Language of the Law 328 (1963)

The antonym, natural life, q.v., is a legal ARCHAISM that lives with us still, although its usefulness too is largely gone.

civil disobedience (= the refusal to obey laws as part of a political protest) originated in Henry David Thoreau's retitled essay of that name (1866), in which he wrote: "Under a government which imprisons any unjustly, the true place for a just man is also a prison." The idea behind civil disobedience was refined by Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr. The latter wrote: "I submit that an individual who breaks a law that conscience tells him is unjust, and who willingly accepts the penalty of imprisonment in order to arouse the conscience of the community over its injustice, has in reality the highest respect for the law." Martin Luther King, Jr., Why We Can't Wait 86 (1964).

civilian, n., = a lawyer in a civil-law, as opposed to common-law, jurisdiction. As an adj., civilian = civil-law. In the three sentences that follow, the first two uses of the word exemplify the noun, the last two the adjective. "'Jura realia' and 'personalia' are expressions occasionally used by modern civilians as adjectival forms of 'jura in rem' and 'in personam.'"/ "Albert Tate, Jr., a civilian scholar, then an intermediate appellate court judge, later a justice of the Louisiana Supreme Court, and now a member of this court, expressed the view that the 1912 Legislature amended 456, vastly expanding the items specifically covered."

Even in legal writing, of course, civilian (n. & adj.) appears also in its nonlegal sense (= [of or relating to] a nonmilitary person)—e.g.: "A civilian trial, in other words, is held in an atmosphere conducive to the protection of individual rights, while the military trial is marked by the age-old manifest destiny of retributive justice."/ "The Articles of War were revised to provide for military trial, even in peacetime, of certain specific civilian crimes committed by persons 'subject to military law.'" civil law. A. As Noun. The term civil law is ambiguous; legal writers should be careful to specify which meaning they attribute to the term. Civil law = (1) (to a common-law practitioner) private law, as opposed to criminal law, administrative law, military law, or ecclesiastical law <civil litigation>; (2) (to a legal historian) the civil law of Rome; (3) (to a comparative-law specialist within the common-law system) the civil-law tradition in civil-code countries; the entire legal system in nations falling within the civil-law tradition; (4) (to a civil-law practitioner) the fundamental content of the legal system (as opposed to public and commercial law)—of persons, of things, of obligations; and (5) (to an ethicist) the law imposed by the state; temporal as opposed to moral law.

Sense (5) is perhaps the rarest one—hence most in need of illustration: "A favorite theory with many of the philosophers is that ethics is an exposition of the moral law as distinguished from the civil law; the former being imposed by the conscience, the latter by the power of the state." George W. Warvelle, Essays in Legal Ethics 4 (1902).

B. Form of Adjective. Like its sibling common law, q.v., this term should be hyphenated when it is used as an adjective <civil-law jurisdiction>, and written as two words when used as a noun <the civil law of Louisiana>. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A).

civil-law method; canon-law method. These refer to methods of determining degrees of blood relationship. Under the civil-law method, commonly used in the U.S., you ascertain how closely related a person is to a decedent by counting up or back from the decedent to the nearest ancestor who is common to both the decedent and the relative in question. Then you count down from the ancestor to the relative in question, counting one degree for each generation.

Under the canon-law method, you count similarly in each line and the longer line to the common ancestor determines the degree.

civil lawyer (= civilian, q.v., as defined above) is the usu. form, not civil-law lawyer—e.g.: "Common lawyers tend to be much less rigorous about such matters than civil lawyers." John H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 26 (1969). But cf. common-law lawyer.

civil liberties. See civil rights.

civil offense. This phrase is a misnomer, offense properly referring to a criminal act. The better phrase is civil wrong. See offense.

civil remedy. See remedy.

civil rights; civil liberties; civic rights. Civil rights, an Americanism, refers generally to the individual rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and by the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Nineteenth Amendments, as well as by legislation such as the Voting Rights Act. These rights include especially the right to vote; freedom from involuntary servitude; the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property; privacy; due process; and equal protection of the law. Some of these rights, such as the right to vote, are restricted to citizens; others, such as the rights of due process and equal protection, apply equally to anyone within a jurisdiction.

Some writers distinguish civil rights from political rights, contending that the latter phrase embraces participation "in the management of government through such practices as voting." Jack Plano & Milton Greenberg, The American Political Dictionary 266 (8th ed. 1989). By this definition, then, the right to vote is not a civil right. But this discrepancy merely shows that the phrase civil rights is fuzzy at the edges.

The phrase civil liberties is more widely used than civil rights—that is, not just in AmE—to refer generally to the liberties guaranteed to all persons by law or custom against undue governmental interference. Civil rights is also sometimes used in this broader sense: "The subject was 'civil rights,' that is, the liberties of man as man and not primarily as an economic animal." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 170 (1960).

Civic rights is a much less common phrase. It sounds at once less weighty than the other two phrases and less idiomatic But it has appeared, probably generally as a NEEDLESS VARIANT of civil rights—e.g.: "Lincoln, unwilling to alienate a public opinion that everywhere in the North was implacably, savagely opposed to giving slaves movement or civic rights,' was, on one occasion in the debates, not above snarling 'nigger'" Alfred Kazin, A Forever Amazing Writer, N.Y. Times, 10 Dec. 1989, § 7 (Book Rev.), at 3.

civil suit. Does this phrase exclude all cases involving the government? Rodell suggests so: "Thus the two sides in what The Law would call a 'civil suit'—an ordinary case not involving the government—might be required to pick their own expert or experts to settle their dispute for them . . . ." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 175 (1939; repr. 1980). That parenthetical definition is puzzlingly wrong: government lawyers frequently refer to their involvement in civil suits or civil actions—indeed, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide expressly for civil actions in which the government is a party.

civil wrong is broader than tort or delict, embracing also breaches of contract and of trust, breaches of statutory duty, and defects in performing public duties. See civil offense & offense.

claim. A. Transitive Verb. Claim = (1) to take or demand as one's right; (2) to assert emphatically (something of questionable or questioned credibility). Sense (1) of claim often appears without an explicit object (i.e., with the object as an UNDERSTOOD WORD). E.g., "Plaintiffs are sisters of Mrs. Girard and claim as her heirs [i.e., claim her estate as her heirs]."

Sense (2), primarily an Americanism, is subject to SLIPSHOD EXTENSION when writers use claim to mean merely "to say," as in, "He claims [read states or says] the Supreme Court has never ruled on the point." But it is groundless to insist that this verb can properly mean only "lay claim to" or "demand as one's due," and not "assert, allege." Claim has long been used in the latter as well as in the former sense. E.g., "The police officer claimed that he had heard a rumor months earlier that the defendant would meet a drug buyer at some restaurant."/ "The defendant also claimed that there could be no rescission as restitutio in integrum was not possible, the plaintiffs having at a clearing sale disposed of the plant, machinery, and stock." (Aus.)

B. Noun. From sense (2) of the verb has grown the nominal sense "assertion, contention" <her claim that the immunity applies here>, in addition to the older sense "a right to something." To be avoided at all costs is the use of the term in different senses in a single context: "The government claims [read argues] that Sherlock's claim [read assertion] of fifth amendment privilege is moot." Either substitution eliminates the problem.

claimant. Ordinarily, the word refers to one who asserts a property right or makes a demand, but recently it has been extended to refer also to one who posits a legal claim such as a constitutional privilege, or even one who claims in the sense of "argues." E.g., "A person whose conduct is clearly within the constitutional scope of a statute may not successfully challenge it for vagueness . . . . The burden is on the claimant to show that in its operation the statute is unconstitutional to her in her situation . . . ." Lear v. State, 753 S.W.2d 737, 740 (Tex. App.—Austin 1988).

claim preclusion; issue preclusion. The first phrase is synonymous with res judicata (q.v.) in its strict sense, without being susceptible to the ambiguities of the LATINISM. The second phrase is synonymous with collateral estoppel (q.v.) in its strict sense. Professor Allan Vestal long argued—with considerable success—that courts should use the terms claim preclusion and issue preclusion; the Restatement (Second) of Judgments follows that usage. "[T]he principal distinction," explains Professor Wright, is that claim preclusion "forecloses litigation of matters that have never been litigated. This makes it important to know the dimensions of the 'claim' that is foreclosed by bringing the first action, but unfortunately no precise definition is possible." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 681 (4th ed. 1983).

claim quit. See quitclaim.

claim(s) agent; claim(s) adjuster. Claims is the standard form. See adjuster.

class is not interchangeable with kind or type. We may have a type or kind of thing, but a class of things. E.g., "In this class of case [read type of case or class of cases], the contract is executed by the promoter and the third party when both are aware that the corporation has not been formed."

class action = a lawsuit instituted by one or more parties on behalf not only of themselves but also of many other parties, when common questions of law and fact are involved. "The class action was an invention of equity . . . mothered by the practical necessity of providing a procedural device so that mere numbers would not disable large groups of individuals, united in interest, from enforcing their equitable rights nor grant them immunity from their equitable wrongs." Montgomery Ward & Co. v. Langer, 168 F.2d 182, 187 (8th Cir. 1948).

The phrase class-action suit is wordy for class action.

classic(al). Classical refers to anything relating to "the classics" (whether in Greek or Latin literature, English literature, or music); classic may also serve in this sense, although not in phrases such as classical education or classical allusions. Classic, an easily overworked word, has the additional sense "outstandingly authoritative or important."

class of, a. See SYNESIS.

clause. In grammar, of course, this word refers to any group of words that contains a subject and a verb. In law, clause generally refers vaguely to some unit of a legal instrument or statute—often a paragraph, subdivision, or section. It need not be restricted, in its application, to a single sentence, as some lawyers mistakenly believe.

In G.B., a clause in a bill before Parliament becomes a section when the bill is given Royal Assent.

clause of accrual (or accruer). See accrual.

claw back, v.t.; clawback, n. As a transitive PHRASAL VERB, claw back = (1) to take back money that has already been allocated; (2) (of a taxing authority) to take back previously granted tax relief. E.g., in sense (1): "Taxpayers' inability to claw back money if property declines in value does not persuade us that there is a problem in the logic of Pyle." Grimes v. I.R.C., 851 F.2d 1005, 1009 (7th Cir. 1988).

The noun clawback = (1) money taken back; or (2) the loss of previously granted tax relief.

Clawback provision = a penalty in the nature of a tax. E.g., "It could make it easier to sue for libel, by granting legal aid for litigants but with stiff clawback provisions to discourage frivolous writs." The Economist, 28 Jan.–3 Feb. 1989, at 18./ "A blocking statute is a law passed by the foreign government imposing a penalty upon a national for complying with a foreign court's discovery request. France and Britain have passed blocking laws aimed at discovery in American antitrust suits. These statutes are also known by the descriptive moniker: clawback provisions." In re Anschuetz & Co., 754 F.2d 602, 614 n.29 (5th Cir. 1985).

clean, v.t.; cleanse. Clean is literal, cleanse figurative. Hence cleanse is often used in religious or moral contexts, or, as here, in law: "[T]he court can take ex post facto measures to cleanse the error." Marine Coatings of Alabama, Inc. v. U.S., 792 F.2d 1565, 1568 (11th Cir. 1986).

clean hands is a metaphor from equity, derived from the maxim He who comes to equity must come with clean hands, i.e., must be free from taint of fraud. E.g., "The maxim that he who comes into equity must come with clean hands is far more than a mere banality."/ "The nature of the unclean-hands defense in patent and unfair competition litigation has not been clearly established." A memorable statement of the principle is: "He that hath committed Iniquity, shall not have equity." Richard Francis, Maxims of Equity 5 (1727).

cleanliness; cleanness. Cleanliness is used in reference to persons and their habits, cleanness in reference to things and places.

cleanse. See clean.

clear (= to exonerate) is a casualism common in JOURNALESE: "On Monday the jury cleared the defendants of charges that they tried to overthrow the Government by force . . . ." U.S. Won't Retry 3 in Bombings, N.Y. Times, 2 Dec. 1989, at 9.

clear and convincing clarity. Several state and federal courts have announced clear and convincing clarity as the standard for proving actual malice in defamation cases. The phrase is an unfortunate amalgamation of the two phrases clear and convincing and convincing clarity. See Thomas A. Woxland, Clear Clarity, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 143–44 (1990). Need it be said that the phrase is a redundant and wordy redundancy?

clear and convincing evidence. See preponderance of the evidence.

clear and present danger. This is the phrase Holmes coined to express his test of whether certain speech is protected by the First Amendment. See Schenck v. U.S., 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919). Rodell calls this famous formula Holmes's "greatest, and only major, judicial error. The pat phrase was first used in a case where an anti-war extremist, who had urged that young men dodge the draft, was jailed for thus committing a federal crime . . . . Little more than a year later, Holmes himself had cause to regret the 'clear and present danger' excuse for letting Congress curb freedom of speech, which he had handed his colleagues on the platter of his eloquence." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 210 (1955). The Supreme Court later widened the meaning of the phrase, giving, in Rodell's words, its "free-speech-sapping operations the protective cover of the words of Holmes." Id.

clear(-)cut, adj., should be hyphenated. "The testator, thus indicating a clearcut [read clear-cut] intention to postpone vesting until the termination of each trust, created a remainder contingent upon survival of the life beneficiary."

clearly. "[I]t seems to be a familiar joke among some ironic observers that when a judge (some other judge) begins a sentence with a term of utter conviction (Clearly, Undeniably, It is plain that . . .), the sentence that follows is likely to be dubious, unreasonable, and fraught with difficulties." Walker Gibson, Literary Minds and Judicial Style, 36 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 915, 925 (1961). This skepticism has grown from an abuse of these terms to express certainty. Where they are used merely to buttress arguments, they become WEASEL WORDS and weaken those arguments. They should be used only where one's bitterest opponent could not object.

Just how much clearly can weaken a statement is evident here: "Clearly, I am not to be convinced that this is a small matter . . . ." Stephen White, The Written Word 3 (1984). See obviously & doubtless(ly).

clearly erroneous. This phrase expresses the standard of review that, in many jurisdictions (such as the U.S. federal courts), an appellate court applies in judging a trial court's treatment of factual issues. A judgment is reversible if it resolves issues in a clearly erroneous manner.

cleave, v.t., has the opposite meanings (1) "to divide or separate" and (2) "to adhere to firmly." In sense (1), cleave yields the past tense cleft (or, less good, clove) and the past participle cleft (or cleaved, again not preferred). The past-participial adjective is cloven. Hence, "He cleft the Devil's cloven hoof with a cleaver."

In sense (2), the verb is inflected cleave > cleaved > cleaved. The COD sanctions, for BrE usage, cleave > clove > cloven for all senses, though cleft is used adjectivally in set phrases such as cleft palate or cleft stick. Luckily, the term is a literary one, so that generally only literary scholars must trouble themselves with these inflections.

clergyable; nonclergyable. Clergyable = (of an offense) susceptible to benefit of clergy. Nonclergyable = (of an offense) punishable without benefit of clergy. E.g., "Although originally those entitled to benefit of clergy were simply delivered to the bishop for ecclesiastical proceedings, with the possibility of degradation from orders, incarceration, and corporal punishment for those found guilty, during the 15th and 16th centuries the maximum penalty for clergyable offenses became branding on the thumb, imprisonment for not more than one year, and forfeiture of goods." McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 197–98 (1971). See benefit of clergy & neck verse.

The spelling clergiable, though listed as the primary spelling in the OED and in most law dictionaries, occurs less frequently than clergyable in legal texts.

clerk; law clerk; summer associate; extern; briefing attorney. The rather undignified term clerk is used in reference to an American law student who works for a law firm before receiving a law degree and passing the bar exam. In response to the meniality connoted by this term, some lawyers have borrowed extern from the medical profession, but its use is not widespread. For clerks who work with a firm during the summer months, lawyers have hit upon summer associate, which has gained currency throughout the U.S. among firms that recruit heavily.

Law clerk is used both as a synonym of summer associate and as a term describing a select graduate who spends a year or two as a judge's apprentice. Unlike law firms' law clerks, judges' law clerks have usu. already passed the bar exam and accepted a permanent position for the following year. Hence, although they are already lawyers, the apparent meniality of law clerk is especially ironic. Some courts therefore call their clerks briefing attorneys, but to one accustomed to the unpretentiousness of law clerk, this term seems inflated.

The best advice is to follow the practice of a particular firm or judge: at a firm that hires law clerks, they should not call themselves summer associates (though the reverse practice is unobjectionable); if a judge hires law clerks, they should not parade the name briefing attorney. The understated title law clerk is to be worn as a badge of honor.

clew. See clue.

CLICHÉS. Why is it that, in legal prose, common sense always dictates certain actions? That precedents are never to be lightly overruled? That to look at something a second time is invariably to revisit it? Why are trial judges whom appellate courts agree with always learned, but never wise or perspicacious or erudite? Why is any significant evidentiary hearing always termed full-blown? Too often in legal writing, parties strenuously object; judges write vigorous dissents; legal principles are never settled but that they are well-settled; trial judges always have sound discretion rather than mere discretion; exceptions are never created—instead, they are carved out; bad statutes are inevitably constitutionally infirm rather than invalid or, better yet, unconstitutional; opinions we agree with are invariably well reasoned, but almost never cogent or compelling.

Meanwhile, statutory words are not talismanic; we don't want to turn rules into paper tigers while wending our way through a statutory mosaic; as we examine the parade of horrors before us we fear that our opponents have a private agenda; going too far, they want to throw the baby out with the bathwater. So we respond, naturally: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

Clichés should generally be used sparingly in any writing, but especially in legal writing. Yet we are beset with hackneyed phrases inappositely employed in legal briefs and judicial opinions. To begin with, good writers have sensitized themselves to what a cliché is. Acquiring this sensitivity requires some literary taste, but mostly a background that includes wide reading. One need not read very many American judicial opinions to find, e.g., that We do not write on a clean slate (or on a tabula rasa) is a commonplace often repeated.

General English clichés are also common in legal writing. E.g., "It all started on a fateful day in December of 1981, when the Equity Shipping Corporation chartered its vessel to the GHR Energy Corporation."/ "In the hallowed days of yore, parties seeking to stay their proceedings in an action at law had to cross the street into a court of equity for an injunction." (The main clause manages to sound like a cliché without actually being one.) It would be easy to list hundreds of English-language clichés such as time is of the essence, crystal clear, proverbial snowball in hell, dire need, and flatly refused; but no purpose would be served. If one finds oneself writing or talking in ready-made phrases, it is time to draw back and frame the thought anew. The occasional cliché may be justifiable, to be sure; it is the habitual use of clichés that is stylistically objectionable. For a fuller discussion, see Eric Partridge, Dictionary of Clichés (1963) and James Rogers, Dictionary of Clichés (1985).

Finally, if one must use a cliché, do it straightforwardly. Slight variations on clichés are neither clever nor cute. E.g., "He wore his heresy on his sleeve." (Figuratively, only one's heart (or feelings) can be worn on one's sleeve.) Likewise, one should not change madding crowd to maddening crowd. See SET PHRASES.

One lawyer has written wittily about the dissolution of his partnership, citing in part "an occupational nervous affliction" that causes lawyers to spout clichés. The culminating altercation, this lawyer recalled, sounded like this:

> "You're being arbitrary and capricious!"
> "Well you're being willful and wanton!"
> "I'm going to seek affirmative relief."
> "Are you suggesting that in futuro we do business separate and apart?"
> "I'm telling you that you have been guilty of cruel treatment of me and have inflicted personal indignities upon me, rendering my life burdensome so that it is no longer possible for me to remain your partner!"
> "Does this mean that our agreement is null and void?"
> "It means that it's of no further force and effect."
> "In that event I will no longer be responsible for your debt, default or misdoings," he rejoined. "And I'll want the library for myself, free and clear of any encumbrances."
> Edward H. McKinlay, Legal Cliché Experts, 49 Fla. B.J. 444 (1975).

client; customer. The line of demarcation between these two words has shifted considerably in recent years. By the 1980s, Massachusetts bureaucrats had begun calling welfare recipients their "clients." See Keller, Massachusetts's Strange Protest Vote, Wall St. J., 20 Sept. 1990, at A14. Things have gotten worse in the 1990s. For example, The Sunday Times writes of two prostitutes: "Both women took clients to their flats." John Davison & Michael Durham, Prostitutes Go in Fear of London 'Ripper', Sunday Times, 18 Aug. 1991, at 1-5.

clientage. See clientele.

cliental = of or relating to a client. The OED labels this word "rare," but the Merriam-Webster dictionaries contain no such notation. Still, lawyers have little occasion to use it.

clientele; clientelage; clientage; clientry; clients. The last is the best: the least pretentious and most common. Clientele has degenerated somewhat in meaning, having been widely used in nonprofessional contexts. E.g., "The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are engaged in business as high-grade dressmakers under the name 'Boue Soeurs,' with the most exclusive clientele." Often when clientele appears in professional contexts, it is used in reference to the oldest profession. See client.

climactic; climacteric; climatic. Climactic is now established as the adjective of climax, though formerly it was thought to be inferior to climacteric, which, having lost the battle, is now to be avoided as a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Climatic is the adjective corresponding to climate; occasionally it becomes a MALAPROPISM for climactic.

clinch; clench. Similar in meaning, these words are used differently. Clench is applied to physical matters, and clinch is used figuratively. Hence one clenches one's jaw or one's fist, but clinches an argument or debate. E.g., "It was the good fortune of Professor W.H. Dunham to clinch the argument by discovering, and printing, two such slips." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 270 (5th ed. 1956).

The exceptions to this distinction occur in boxing, carpentry, and metalworking: clutching one's opponent in boxing is clinching, and fastening with a screw or a rivet is likewise clinching. Apart from these specialized meanings, clinch should be reserved for nonphysical contexts. Here it is used ill-advisedly: "After their speeches, Mr. Bentsen and Mr. Clinton clinched [read clenched] hands together with Gov. Ann Richards on the stage of the party's state convention as Deep in the Heart of Texas played over the loudspeakers." Sam Attlesey & Wayne Slater, Bentsen Strongly Endorses Clinton, Dallas Morning News, 6 June 1992, at 1A.

closely held corporation; close(d) corporation. These phrases are generally synonymous in denoting a company whose stock is not freely traded and is held by only a few people (often within the same family). Closely held corporation is perhaps the phrase that lawyers most commonly use, but close corporation is most common statutory phrase in AmE. In BrE, the term is generally closed corporation.

close of the evidence is the legal idiom denoting the end of the presentation of testimony in a trial. E.g., "At the close of all the evidence, the district court granted an instructed verdict in favor of appellee on nearly all the issues."

closing = the completion of a sales contract. On the closing date, the seller delivers the deed and the buyer pays the balance of the purchase price.

closing statement; settlement sheet. Both phrases are used in AmE to denote a statement, approved by both buyer and seller, listing all the credits and charges attributable to each one. The credits and charges listed are used to adjust or prorate items in the sales contract and result in a net amount due by the buyer and a different amount due to the seller (other parties, typically, being involved in the transaction).

closure; cloture. The general noun corresponding to the verb to close is closure. E.g., "The court held that closure of a trial must be necessitated by a compelling governmental interest." In AmE, cloture is preferred in but one narrow sense: "the procedure of ending debate in a legislative body and calling for an immediate vote." Closure is usual in BrE in this parliamentary sense.

clothe. In law, persons are frequently described metaphorically as being clothed with certain powers or privileges. E.g., "He was clothed with the apparent authority to enter into contracts for the corporation."/ "The will imposed no duties upon the trustee; it clothed her with no discretionary powers."/ "Mrs. Sterdahl, her innocence of wrongdoing established, stands before us clothed with the protection equity provides in favor of all bona fide purchasers of interests in property."/ "The Supreme Court under the Constitution and statutes of this state is clothed with the power to exercise both appellate and original jurisdiction." If sparingly used, this legal CLICHÉ might be tolerable; but it is sufficient to say merely that a person has the powers or privileges in question.

The noun clothing, too, was once common as a legal metaphor—e.g.: "He is an Emptor Familiæ, and inherits the legal clothing of the person whose place he begins to fill." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 220 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910).

cloture. See closure.

cloud on title; clog on the equity (of redemption). A cloud on title is a defect or potential defect in the owner's title to a piece of land arising, e.g., from a lien, an easement, or a court order. The phrase is generally an American one.

E.g., "[H]ave your contracts signed in the presence of a notary public, notarized and then recorded at your county courthouse. The reason for doing this is to create your own 'cloud on the title' of the property you have contracted to buy or option." Lucier, How to Make Money from Sale of Purchase Option Contracts, Daily Legal News [Cleveland], 17 Aug. 1989, at 1./ "Flint and others brought a bill to restrain appellee from proceeding further and for a declaration freeing their title from the cloud cast upon it by appellee's judgment."/ "The historical equity suit to remove a cloud on title suffered from some self-imposed handicaps; it could not be used to cancel an instrument constituting a cloud that was void on its face."

A clog on the equity (often written clog on the equity of redemption) is any condition or agreement that prevents a mortgagor from getting back the property free from encumbrance upon paying the debt or performing the obligation for which the security was given. The phrase is common in both BrE and AmE. E.g., "[T]he doctrine against the clog on the equity of redemption seems one of the striking examples of the great truth that the ethical standard of our law is often higher than the average morality of the commercial community." Bruce Wyman, The Clog on the Equity of Redemption, 21 Harv. L. Rev. 459, 475 (1908).

The metaphor is an old one in law: Richard W. Turner, in The Equity of Redemption 29 (1931), quotes a court that wrote, in 1639: "[I]n some cases . . . the mortgagee will suddenly bestow unnecessary costs upon the mortgaged lands, of purpose to clogg the lands, to prevent the mortgager's redemption" (quoting Bacon v. Bacon, Tot. 133). See METAPHORS (B).

clue; clew. Clue is the only current spelling for the sense "a hint; a bit of evidence." The spelling clew survives as a nautical term ("the lower corner of a sail") and as a sewing term ("a ball of thread").

CO-. A. Hyphenation with. Generally, this prefix—which means "together with" or "joint"—does not take a hyphen. Only when the hyphenated form is established (e.g., co-respondent, co-relation), when the unhyphenated form may lead the reader to mistake the syllables (e.g., co-citation, co-heir), or when the writer believes he is creating a new form (e.g., co-secretary) should the hyphen appear.

B. Attaching to Noun Phrase. This creates an awkward construction but is sometimes all but unavoidable, as in copersonal representative.

co-appellant; co-appellee. These terms are used to denote the relation of joint parties on appeal. E.g., "The appellant was a policeman in the City of Newport, and had executed a bond as required by law, with his codefendant and co-appellant, National Surety Co., as surety thereon."

co-citation is best hyphenated. This word, not uncommon in legal writing, is not listed in the OED or in W3. See CO- (A).

co(-)conspirator. Hyphenating the word indicates immediately to the reader what the primary word (conspirator) is. As the term becomes more common, though, coconspirator is likely to become established. See CO- (A).

Notably, a conspirator is one who plots with another; a "sole conspirator" is impossible. This point has led to some confusion about whether co-conspirator is redundant. William Safire writes: "[T]o me, a co-conspirator is as redundant as a co-equal." Let's Kill All the Copy Editors, N.Y. Times (Mag.), 6 Oct. 1991, § 6 at 16.

But like coequal, the word co-conspirator suggests a point of comparison—it is used only where we would otherwise say fellow conspirator, as in his co-conspirator (where we would not, indeed could not, say his conspirator).

For analogous examples, see codefendant, co-equal & coplaintiff. For a similar word with an important difference, see copartner (in which partner itself suggests the point of comparison, so that copartner is unnecessary).

cocounsel. So written—without a hyphen. E.g., "He turned the task over to students hired by S.C. Godha, the Indian cocounsel whom the Bhopal mayor had set up with the day before . . . ." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 71 (1989). See CO (A).

C.O.D. = (1) cash on delivery (COD & W3); (2) collect on delivery (COD & W3); (3) cash on demand (Black's); or (4) costs on delivery (OED). Whatever the abbreviation stands for, its effect is the same.

codal (= of or relating to a code), dating from the late 19th century, is an adjective used in some civil-law jurisdictions to refer to the civil code. E.g., "The Judge found that the broker's conduct was violative of two codal Articles of the Louisiana Law of Mandate." McCurnin v. Kohlmeyer & Co., 477 F.2d 113, 115 (5th Cir. 1973)./ "Professor Malone suggested that enterprise liability should be founded directly upon the basic codal language, 'Every act whatever of a man that causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it.' La. Civ. Code art. 2315(A) (West Supp. 1985)."

The word is sometimes (unnecessarily) capitalized: "[T]he Codal [read codal] provisions taken from the French . . . established the rights of the good faith parties in putative marriages." Cortes v. Fleming, 307 So. 2d 611, 615 (La. 1973).

The only adjectival form of code recognized by the dictionaries, however, is codical (= pertaining to, or of the nature of, a codex or code). It is not used by civilians in Louisiana.

Codd's Puzzle is the classic parody of inconsistent pleading. Codd, counsel for a defendant charged with stealing a duck, pleaded:

1. that his client had bought the bird;
2. that he had found it;
3. that it had flown into his garden;
4. that its owner had given it to him;
5. that some unknown person or persons had stuffed it into his pocket while he was asleep;
6. that the duck had not existed at any material time; and
7. that his client would if necessary make a full confession.

The lay jury is reported to have acquitted Codd's client. See Theo Ruoff, 30 Austral. L.J. 512 (1957).

code; codification. The word code, derived from Justinian's Codex of 534 A.D. (a collection of legislation), has been applied in several ways in Anglo-American law: (1) to a compilation of existing statutes; (2) to a systematic consolidation of statutory law; (3) to a revision of the whole law, both statutory and case law, reducing its principles to a clear and compact statement. Senses (1) and (2) are better termed consolidation.

Citing sense (3) as the primary one, Glanville Williams comments: "[F]or reasons that it would not be flattering to examine in detail English lawyers have always been hostile (or, at best, indifferent) to this." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 44 (11th ed. 1982).

Specialist lawyers frequently refer elliptically to "the Code" to mean whatever code they deal with most frequently, such as the Civil Code, the Bankruptcy Code, the Uniform Commercial Code, the Family Code, or the Code of Judicial Conduct. Depending on the jurisdiction, these codes may fit any one of the three senses of code just enumerated.

Codification, one of Jeremy Bentham's NEOLOGISMS, most properly refers to the process of codifying—e.g.: "Although his major aims—codification and complete simplification—have not been achieved, yet to him we owe numerous important legal reforms." Jerome Frank, Introduction to Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! xii (1939; repr. 1980). But the word often refers, in a transferred sense, to the finished product—the code itself.

Code Civil. See Napoleonic Code.

codefendant. This word, meaning "a joint or fellow defendant," is common; oddly, however, coplaintiff (q.v.) is comparatively rare. See CO-(A).

code law, a more specific term than statutory law, is sometimes contrasted, as here, with case-law: "It is written case-law, and only different from code-law because it is written in a different way." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 11 (17th Ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). Today, code law is preferably two words. Cf. case(-)law.

Code Napoléon. See Napoleonic Code.

code pleading; fact pleading; notice pleading; general pleading. The first two are synonymous phrases referring to the requirement, in some post-common-law pleading, that one allege merely the facts giving rise to the claim, not the conclusions of law necessary to sustain the claim. See Charles E. Clark, Handbook of the Law of Code Pleading 1–2 (2d ed. 1947). Code pleading (as it is usually known) developed originally in New York in the late 1840s, under the influence of David Dudley Field.

The idea of code pleading was to move beyond the formulary technicalities of common-law and equity pleading. The term first appeared in the late 19th century: "The only case arising under the modern code pleadings and bearing upon this question . . . is Fosgate v. Herkimer Mfg. & Hydraulic Co. . . . ." Gibbons v. Martin, 10 F. Cas. 292, 293 (C.C.D. Or. 1877) (No. 5,381)./ "[U]nder the system of code pleading, a technical variance between the allegations and the proof is not deemed material unless the adverse party is prejudiced thereby . . . ." Wilson v. Haley Live-Stock Co., 153 U.S. 39, 47 (1894).

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, code pleading led to gross overpleading. And lawyers came to realize the futility of the endeavor: " 'The facts as they actually existed or occurred,' 'the dry, naked, actual facts'—these and these only are to be stated. Can it be done? I think not; it has never been done and never will be done, either by a pleader or by anyone else. Philosophically, logically, it is an impossibility." Walter W. Cook, "The Utility of Jurisprudence in the Solution of Legal Problems," in 5 Lectures on Legal Topics 337, 369 (1928).

So, in 1938, the drafters of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure modified the pleading requirements still further so as to allow notice pleading or general pleading, which requires merely a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a). Up to that time, judicial glosses on code pleading had resulted in overpleading that caused "frightful expense, endless delay and an enormous loss of motion." Thomas E. Skinner, Pre-Trial and Discovery Under the Alabama Rules of Civil Procedure, 9 Ala. L. Rev. 202, 204 (1957).

code state; noncode state. These terms—current primarily in the early to mid-20th century—distinguished between states that had merged law and equity, and those that had not. E.g., "[I]n any code state in which law and equity have been merged in the same court and in which every action is both legal and equitable in that all rights of the parties, legal and equitable, must be adjudicated therein, the court has full power to give relief . . . [that] the nature of the case calls for, irrespective of whether it would have been classed as a case in equity or a case at law under the old order." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 367 (1930) (referring at pp. 102–03 to "non-code states in which equity is still administered as a separate system").

This terminology can be confusing because many readers would think of a code state as one having a Civil Code—i.e., Louisiana.

codex is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of code—and a pompous one—unless the writer is referring to one of the ancient European codes (e.g., Codex Theodosianus of 438 A.D.), a codex rescriptus (= a palimpsest, or written-over manuscript), or the like. Pl. codices.

codicil; will. Codicil = a testamentary supplement that varies or revokes provisions in a will. Will = a written or oral expression of one's intention regarding the disposition of one's property at death. See last will and testament & will.

codification. See code.

codifier; codist. Whereas a codifier is one who makes a code, a codist is one learned in legal codes, esp. in the civil codes of different nations.

codify is best pronounced /kod-i-fi/, not /kohd-i-fi/. This word, like codification, was one of Jeremy Bentham's NEOLOGISMS; it dates from ca. 1800.

codifying statute. See consolidating statute.

codist. See codifier.

co-employee is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of coworker. See CO- (A).

coequal, n. & adj., often means nothing that equal does not also mean; it should be rejected in such contexts. E.g., "All constitutional rights are co-equal [read equal] and must be harmonized with each other, no one such right being permitted to override or submerge another."

The word is useful only in implying the standard of comparison; for example, in a snippet quoted in the OED, "the co-eternal and co-equal Son," if only equal had been used, the reader would wonder, Equal with what? Co-equal implies the second and third things with which the Son is said to be equal. This nuance is rare, however; for most purposes, equal suffices. Still, it is simplistic to say, as William Safire does, that "[t]oday's usage frowns on co-equal as redundant." Send in Sovereign for Socialist, N.Y. Times, 6 Jan. 1991, § 6, at 8, 10. For a mini-tirade on the subject, see Robert C. Cumbow, The Subverting of the Goeduck, 14 Univ. Puget Sound L. Rev. 755 (1991) ("Not only does A equal B, and B equal A, but A and B equal each other! Imagine! They're both equal together!" [etc.]). Cf. copartner & co(-)conspirator.

coercible. So spelled. See -ABLE (A).

coercion, though originally applicable only to physical force, is now commonly used of moral and economic pressures. E.g., "It has never been held by this court that a labor union is without justification in fairly setting forth its claims by newspaper advertisements as a legitimate means of economic coercion." Such uses are a natural extension of the original sense ("the control by force of a voluntary agent or action").

In criminal law, coercion has historically had a more limited sense—compulsion being reserved for any action or restraint imposed upon one by another. In this context, coercion ordinarily refers specifically to such an action or restraint imposed by a husband on his wife. E.g., "Under the English 'rule of coercion,' the bare command of the husband was a complete defense to the wife, with a few exceptions such as treason or murder." Rollin cofelon (= a felon involved in the same crime as another felon) need not be hyphenated. See CO- (A). cofiduciary = joint fiduciary. The word is best made solid, without a hyphen. See CO- (A). cognate. See agnate.

M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 1062 (3d ed. 1982).

cognation; cognition. Cognition = thinking; use of the intellect. Cognation = a cognate relationship. In Roman law, cognation (specif., natural relationship by descent from a common ancestor, whether through males or females) was opposed to agnation (relationship through males only). See agnate.

cognisance. See cognizance.

cognisant. See cognizant.

cognition. See cognation.

cognitive; cognitional. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Cognitive = of or pertaining to cognition, or to the action or process of knowing. It should be avoided in its use as a jargonistic filler, as here: "The totality of the relevant facts supports the finding that the City of Apopka has engaged in a systematic pattern of cognitive acts and omissions, selecting and reaffirming a particular course of municipal services that inescapably evidences discriminatory intent." What the word means in that sentence is a minor mystery.

cognitor is an archaic word for attorney that derives from Roman law and existed in English only briefly.

cognizable; cognoscible. Cognizable /kog-ni-zə-bel/ = (1) capable of being known; perceptible; (2) capable of being, or liable to be, judicially examined or tried; within the jurisdiction of a court of law (OED). Sense (2) is common in the phrase cognizable claims: "Nor do I believe that a criminal suspect who is shot while trying to avoid apprehension has a cognizable claim of a deprivation of his sixth amendment right to trial by jury."

Cognoscible is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that appears in many older texts—e.g. (fr. 17th c.): "No external act can pass upon a man for a crime that is not cognoscible." 2 Jeremy Taylor, Works 313 (1835).

cognizance. A. And recognizance. Though superficially similar, these words have unrelated meanings. Cognizance = (1) knowledge, esp. as attained by observation or information; or (2) the action of taking judicial notice. Sense (2) is rarer now than it once was. See judicial notice.

Recognizance = (1) the bond by which a person engages before a court or magistrate to observe some condition, e.g., to keep the peace, pay a debt, or appear when summoned (COD); or (2) the sum pledged as a surety of this bond. See recognizance.

B. Pronunciation. Glanville Williams writes of cognizance, recognizance, and cognizable: "we refuse to 'take cognisance of' the intrusive 'g' in speaking, though we do in writing." Learning the Law 64 (11th ed. 1982). That may be so in the best speech of English lawyers /kon-i-zənz/ (etc.), but not in BrE generally or in AmE—in which the pronunciations are /kog-ni-zənz/, /ri-kog-ni-zənz/, and /kog-ni-zə-bəl/. Cf. cognoscente.

cognizant; cognisant. The -z- spelling is preferred in AmE and in BrE.

cognoscente, sing.; cognoscenti, pl. This word, almost always used in the plural (-ti), is misspelled only a little less frequently than it is used. E.g., "The criminal cogniscenti [read cognoscenti] will quickly learn that, when this judge's proffer is rejected, the defendant, if convicted, will pay a higher price; it is a denial of due process for the judge thus to stain his robes." That example illustrates an ironic use of the term; generally, experts or authorities will suffice, either one being easier to spell—not to mention to pronounce /kon-yə-shent-ee/ or /kog-nə-shent-ee/.

cognoscible. See cognizable.

COGSA; C.O.G.S.A.; Cogsa. This acronym, for the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, is generally rendered COGSA, though at least one well-written treatise makes it Cogsa. See Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, The Law of Admiralty 93–192 (2d ed. 1975).

cohabit, the verb for cohabitation, is analogous to inhabit. "To cohabit is to dwell together," says one treatise, "so that matrimonial cohabitation is the living together of a man and woman ostensibly as husband and wife." 1 Joel P. Bishop, Marriage, Divorce, and Separation § 1669, at 694 (1891).

Cohabitate is a misbegotten BACK-FORMATION "As more couples adopt this lifestyle, our courts will be called upon with increasing frequency to settle disputes over the legal rights of cohabitating [read cohabiting] couples."

cohabitant; cohabitor; cohabitee. Cohabitee, though increasingly common (esp. in BrE) for a person living with another as if married, is etymologically the poorest form. (See -EE.) It ought to be avoided—e.g.: "The issue in the case was whether section 1 of the Domestic Violence and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1976 conferred jurisdiction on a County court judge to order a man who was joint tenant of a council flat to vacate the premises on the application of the female cohabitee [read cohabitant] who had suffered horrifying violence at his hands." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 112 (4th ed. 1991).

Cohabitant, derived from the present participle of the Latin verb, is etymologically preferable. (See OED 2.) Cohabitor is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. For still another variant, see CUPOS.

cohabit(at)ive. The general rule is that, in Latinate nouns of this type, the adjectival form derives from the nominal form. Thus cohabitative is the correct form, following from the noun cohabitation.

cohabitee; cohabitor. See cohabitant.

co-heir (= a joint heir) is generally hyphenated thus, though the estimable Century Dictionary (1895) makes it coheir. (See CO- (A).) E.g., "A group of persons considered in law as a single unit, might succeed as co-heirs to the Inheritance." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 150 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910).

cohort(s). AmE legal usage, traditional and formal though it is, has given in to the modern sense (some would say corruption) of this word—e.g.: "Respondent and two cohorts were indicted for robbing a savings and loan." Traditionally, cohort has been a mass noun denoting "a band of warriors." "The extension of cohort to nonmilitary uses is natural enough," Follett writes, > but if the word is to retain its force it should observe two requirements: (1) it should designate members, too numerous to be conveniently counted, of some sort of united group, and (2) it should imply some sort of struggle or contest. No one of the candidates succeeded in completely marshaling his cohorts before the first ballot / To the legion of the lost ones, to the cohort of the damned—in such uses the sense of the word is preserved.

> Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 99 (1966).

This is a very conservative view of the word, especially given the fact that the sense "colleague, associate, companion" has been by far the most common in the last quarter century. E.g., "Senator Biden and his cohorts didn't hear, but it appears that thousands of others did." Mr. Bork's Book, Wall St. J., 8 Dec. 1989, at A10. Nevertheless, this newer meaning has remained a rather informal one for this respectable word, which in formal writing should retain its older sense.

Follett's sense (1) is common in phrases such as baby-boom cohort and birth cohort, the latter being defined as a "group, born in the same year, selected for study as the individuals march through time so that researchers can assess the nature and influence of factors affecting their behavior." See Dermot Walsh & Adrian Poole, A Dictionary of Criminology 22 (1983).

coif. The Order of the Coif is an organization of great distinction among those who excel in studying law in American universities. The name comes from the title given to serjeants-at-law or serjeants of the coif, the barristers of high standing in common-law courts. They took their name, through the linguistic process known as metonymy, from the linen headpieces they wore: "The coif (a close-fitting cap of white lawn) which the judges wore they wore as serjeants, and neither judge nor serjeant ever doffed his coif 'even in he presence of the king, even though he is talking to His Highness.'" Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 174 (1966). See Order of the Coif.

coin a phrase. To coin is to mint afresh, to invent, or to make current; it does not mean "to employ," as persons who commit the following error apparently think: "To coin an old phrase, we are guardedly optimistic." One cannot coin an old phrase.

Here something is truly coined: "It will be the age of, to coin a rather clumsy neologism, countrycules." Edwin M. Yoder, Jr., Strange New World: The Rise of the Modern Micro-State, Wash. Post, 24 June 1990, at C2.

Coke, Lord. The name is pronounced as if it were Cook. Getting it wrong is the mark of a legal novice.

cold blood. The metaphor derives from long-outmoded physiological theories about how human blood can boil or become very cold depending on one's passion, physical exertion, or excitement. It signifies what is done "coolly," with time for decision or even reflection.

Though the phrase is part of everyday speech, criminal-law commentators find it useful: "While it is true, to take a test from the homicide cases, that one may incite in the heat of passion what another carries out in cold blood, it is also true that one, acting with malicious premeditation, may instigate that which is perpetrated by another at once in the heat of passion." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 763 (3d ed. 1982).

cold check. See check, worthless.

coliseum; colosseum; Colosseum. For the amphitheater of Vespasian at Rome, Colosseum is the correct name. For any other large building or assembly hall, the word is coliseum (AmE) or colosseum (BrE).

collaborate. See corroborate (C). collapsible. So spelled. See -ABLE (A). collate. See collocate.

collateral, n., = (1) a person collaterally related to a decedent; or (2) security for a loan. See collateral kinship; see also ascendant (B) & collateralize (sense 2).

collateral estoppel. A. And issue preclusion; res judicata; claim preclusion. The lines of demarcation in meaning are distinct; yet these terms have long caused confusion among judges and advocates. Collateral estoppel and issue preclusion (= BrE issue estoppel) are synonymous; the latter phrase has sprung perhaps from a desire to be more descriptive in naming this legal doctrine. Collateral estoppel is the doctrine that prevents the relitigation of an issue that was actually litigated and was a critical and necessary part of the earlier judgment. The judgment on the issues litigated in the first action, then, is binding upon the parties in all later litigation in which those issues arise.

Res judicata—also called claim preclusion—is the same principle, but broader: when a matter has been finally adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction, none of the original parties may reopen or challenge that previous determination. Res judicata implies, then, that no further issues exist relating to the dispute, whereas with collateral estoppel there may be other adjudicable issues. The best way of remembering these doctrines clearly is to view collateral estoppel as a miniature of res judicata: the former applies to issues, the latter to entire claims or lawsuits.

One might cite any number of instances in which judges have written collateral estoppel when they meant res judicata and vice versa. E.g., "Although the court of appeals in our present case speaks in terms of res judicata . . . , the court actually applies principles of collateral estoppel in affirming the award of indemnity. . . . Collateral estoppel is narrower than res judicata. It is frequently [termed] issue preclusion because it bars relitigation of any ultimate issue of fact actually litigated and essential to the judgment in a prior suit." Bonniwell v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 663 S.W.2d 816, 818 (Tex. 1984). See Fleming James, Civil Procedure 549–50 (1965) (noting that res judicata "has been given a good many different meanings" and suggesting, further, that res judicata is the genus of which collateral estoppel is one species).

B. And direct estoppel. The Restatement of Judgments distinguishes between these two phrases in this way: collateral estoppel applies to later controversies involving some of the same facts but a different cause of action, whereas direct estoppel applies to later controversies involving the same cause of action (where the plaintiff's cause of action is not extinguished by the rules of merger and bar). See Restatement of Judgments 176 (1942). See merger (B). collateralize = (1) to serve as collateral for; (2) to make (a loan) secure with collateral. This word looks newfangled, and it is, having been recorded only as far back as 1931: "'[H]e found he did not have sufficient paper to collateralize the note . . . .'" Dealer's Finance Co. v. Coulter, 3 F. Supp. 114, 115 (W.D. Ark. 1931) (quoting testimony) (antedating W10's earliest citation by 10 years).

For real-estate lawyers (conveyancers, q.v.) and bankers, however, this Americanism is a useful word for summing up what otherwise would take several words. Both senses are common—e.g.: (Sense 1) "The property purchased collateralized the notes."/ (Sense 2) "It is significant that the bank realized that the loan was collateralized." collateral kinship; lineal kinship. These phrases denote the two types of kinship. Lineal kinship exists between persons connected in a direct line of descent—such as father and son, grandmother and granddaughter, and the like. Collateral kinship exists among those who descend from the same common ancestor but not from one another—such as sister and sister, or cousin and cousin.

collateral obligation; accessorial obligation. Both terms refer to the liability of a person, such as a guarantor, bound on another's debt. Collateral obligation has, in modern usage, supplanted accessorial obligation. Small wonder collateral order = an interlocutory order that is an offshoot from the principal litigation in which it is issued, and that is generally immediately appealable as a "final decision" without regard to whether the principal litigation is final. See Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 701 (4th ed. 1983).

collateral-order doctrine (= the doctrine, first laid down in Cohen v. Beneficial Finance Corp., 337 U.S. 541 (1949), that made some collateral orders appealable) is best hyphenated thus. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A).

collect is a verb sometimes used loosely, especially in the press. As every lawyer knows, being awarded damages is quite a different thing from collecting them: "Under Thursday's ruling, plaintiffs could collect [read seek or receive] damages from local governments only if they proved that discrimination resulted not from the act of an individual but from an official policy." William Choyke, High Court Backs DISD in Rights Suit, Dallas Morning News, 23 June 1989, at 1A. Perhaps most local governments would be good for most judgments, but to use collect in this way is sloppy thinking about the law. Receive, which sounds closely akin to collect, is actually quite different because it connotes a giver (the jury).

The mistake is surprising when it occurs in the prose of model legal writers—e.g.: "If an action in personam against the shipowner has been joined to the action in rem against the ship, there is no difficulty in collecting [read being awarded] the deficiency from [read against] the defendant in the in personam action." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 801 (2d ed. 1975).

collectible; collectable. The -ible spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

COLLECTIVE NOUNS. Consistency in the use of singular or plural is the main consideration in the skillful handling of collective nouns. A judge who in the beginning of an opinion writes the jury was should refer to jury as a singular noun throughout. A judge who wishes to emphasize the individual persons more than the body of persons may decide to write the jury were.

But switching back and forth between a singular and a plural verb is lamentably common: "Mark Pattison's Memoirs is not strictly speaking an autobiography . . . . His Memoirs do not so much tell the story of his life . . . . Mark's father, as the Memoirs make plain, dominated his son's early years . . . . The Memoirs describes clearly . . . ." V.H.H. Green, Introduction, Mark Pattison, Memoirs of an Oxford Don 1, 6 (1988).

Apart from the desire for consistency, there is little "right" and "wrong" on this subject: collective nouns take sometimes a singular and sometimes a plural verb. The trend in the U.S. is to regard the collective noun as expressing a unit; hence, the singular is the usual form. When the individuals in the collection or group receive the emphasis, the plural verb is acceptable. E.g., "[T]he law-of-nature school were not wholly in error . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era in American Law 63 (1938). But generally in AmE writing collective nouns take singular verbs, as in the jury finds, the panel is, the faculty demands, the board has decided, the Supreme Court is, and so on.

Just the opposite habit generally obtains in G.B., where collective nouns tend to take plural verbs. A text in BrE on statute-drafting has even attempted to enshrine this habit, though without giving reasons: "Though the practice varies, in legislative DRAFTING it is advisable to treat collective nouns as plural: that is, such nouns as authority or Board should be followed by a verb in the plural." Alison Russell, Legislative Drafting and Forms 86 (1938). The British tend to write, for example, "The board have considered the views of the judges of the appellate division." (Eng.)

BrE has gone so far in some contexts that many Americans would suspect a typographical error: "Oxford were the winners of the 136th University Boat Race, but many will say that Cambridge were the heroes." Richard Burnell, Oxford Hold Off Brave Light Blues, Sunday Times, 1 April 1990, at B1.

In the days soon after the American Revolution, not surprisingly, the American practice was closer to the prevailing British practice. E.g., "The House of Representatives shall chuse their [modernly, its] Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment." U.S. Const. art. 1, § 2./ "The Senate shall chuse their other Officers . . . ." U.S. Const. art. I, § 3.

The reversal in practice has become so firmly established in AmE that it is hardly wrong to say that, with certain collective nouns, singular verbs are preferred. One cannot be doctrinaire on this point of usage, however. The dilemma frequently occurs with nouns such as majority and press and faculty. E.g., "The press have [read (in U.S.) has] the same rights that the rest of the community have [read (in U.S.) has]."/ "Constitutionalizing basic welfare benefits for the poor will not happen as long as the middle class remain [read (in U.S.) remains] so conservative, so numerous, and so prosperous." (For examples with jury, see the entry under that word.)

These are questions more of local idiom than of correct or incorrect grammar. Majority can be especially troublesome for those seeking consistency. "The majority in their [read (in U.S.) its] footnote 6 allude [read alludes] to the testimony of Hinojosa." This preference for singular verbs with majority leads us down unidiomatic paths in sentences such as this, however, in which the noun best takes the plural verb: "A majority of the members of the committee are [rather than is] satisfied that the applicant is qualified for membership. See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

On the question whether to use a singular or a plural verb after constructions such as a number of people and a host of problems, see SYNESIS.

collectively termed. Lawyers frequently use, in definitions, a phrase such as herein collectively termed "———." A question that sometimes arises is whether that last word can be plural, as when the writer enumerates a number of specific railroads and then writes collectively termed Railroads. Grammar and common sense alike allow that phrasing. But common sense disallows herein, q.v.

collegial; collegiate. It would serve the purposes of DIFFERENTIATION, and would not run counter to educated usage, to reserve collegial as the adjective corresponding to colleague, and collegiate as the adjective for college.

collide. See allide.

collision; allision. Both are used, in the U.S. law of admiralty, in reference to vessels that meet each other unexpectedly. In an allision, one of the vessels is stationary. In a collision, usually both are moving, although collision does not necessarily imply force from each of the clashing objects.

Since we have this DIFFERENTIATION in the terminology of admiralty, however, we should observe the distinction, if only in this limited context. E.g., "The litigation before us arises out of a series of four collisions by ships over a two-month period." In the following sentence, allision would have been the better word: "This case arises out of a collision [read allision] that allegedly occurred between a tug owned by Dow and a boat docked alongside the plaintiff's shrimp boat." (The docked boat was stationary, presumably.) Even specialized authorities have used collision in this way, however: "The anchored vessel is almost, and usually quite, helpless to avoid collision, and moving vessels must keep clear of her." John W. Griffin, The American Law of Collision § 145, at 348 (1949). See allide.

Allision is most properly used only of two ships, and not, e.g., of a ship and a bridge or dock: "This case arises out of an allision [read collision or accident] that occurred after midnight in early 1982, when the Tug Beth, with two barges in tow, struck the closed lift span of the Galveston Railway Causeway Bridge."/ "The dock, on the bank of the Calcasieu River near Lake Charles, was struck by the barge on July 4; at some point before the allision [read collision or mishap], a socket had failed."

collocate; collate. Collocate = (v.t.) to arrange in place; to set side by side; (v.i.) to occur in tandem with something else. Collate = (1) to compare minutely and critically; (2) to collect and compare for the purpose of arranging accurately; or (3) to assemble in proper order <he collated the appendixes to the brief>.

Both terms are useful in legal analysis, collocate being perhaps more common, especially in the form of the noun collocation (= a distinct arrangement, esp. of words). E.g., "The element in intellectual productions that secures copyright protection is not the knowledge, truths, ideas, or emotions that the composition expresses, but the collocation of visible or audible points—of lines, colors, sounds, or words."/ "In considering the general question of property in news matter, it is necessary to distinguish between the substance of the information and the particular form or collocation of words in which the writer has communicated it."

collogue; colloque. Both are informal words meaning "to confer in private." Krapp labeled collogue—the more common word—"colloquial for talk confidentially." George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 152 (1927). Either would be useful as a verb corresponding to the noun colloquy, q.v., which is frequently found in legal prose. Because it is already more common, collogue is more likely to gain wide acceptance.

COLLOQUIALITY, within the bounds of modesty and naturalness, is to be encouraged in legal writing as a counterbalance to the frequent use of rigid and pompous formalities. Many people misunderstand the meaning of colloquiality, however. The term is not a label for substandard usages; rather, it means "a conversational style." The writer of this sentence demonstrates an understanding of the term's meaning: "The Federal Securities Act of 1933 and state statutes colloquially called 'blue sky laws' require corporations to register issues of securities with the SEC or state security commissions before they are sold publicly."

The best legal minds look kindly upon colloqui-ality: "[A]lthough there are no certain guides [in the interpretation of a statute], the colloquial meaning of the words of the statute is itself one of the best tests of purpose." Brooklyn Nat'l Corp. v. C.I.R., 157 F.2d 450, 451 (2d Cir. 1946) (per L. Hand, J.). "The courts will not be astute to discover fine distinctions in words, nor scholastic differentiations in phrases, so long as they are sufficiently in touch with affairs to understand the meaning which the man on the street attributes to ordinary English." Vitagraph Co. v. Ford, 241 F. 681, 686 (S.D.N.Y. 1917).

All this is to say that colloquiality is fine in its place. In formal legal writing, occasional colloquialisms may serve to give the prose more variety and texture; they may even be appropriate in judicial opinions in moderation. Still, the colloquial tone should not overshadow the generally serious tone of legal writing, and should never descend into slang.

Good writers would not always agree on where to draw that line. Some judges feel perfectly comfortable using a picturesque verb such as squirrel away: "This sufficed, in the absence of any record-backed hint that the prosecution . . . squirrelled [read squirreled] the new transcript away." U.S. v. Chaudhry, 850 F.2d 851, 859 (1st Cir. 1988). Others would disapprove. A stylist like Justice Jackson writes forcefully of blasting a party's marriage where nonstylists would probably refer to terminating the matrimonial relationship. See Rice v. Rice, 336 U.S. 674, 680 (1949) (Jackson, J., dissenting). Some, like Justice Douglas, would use pell mell: "The circuits are in conflict; and the Court goes pell mell for an escape for this conglomerate from a real test under existing antitrust law." Missouri Portland Cement Co. v. Cargill, Inc., 418 U.S. 919, 923 (1974) (Douglas, J., dissenting). Others would invariably choose a word like indiscriminately instead. Some, like Chief Justice Rehnquist, would use the phrase Monday-morning quarterbacking. See Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 435 U.S. 519, 547 (1978). Or double-whammy. See American Bankers Ass'n v. SEC, 804 F.2d 739, 749 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

For my part, I side with the colloquialists. In a profession whose writing suffers from verbal arteriosclerosis, some relaxation—and perhaps even some thinning of the blood—is in order. But progress comes slowly. The battle that Oliver Wendell Holmes fought in 1924 is repeated every day in law offices and judicial chambers throughout this country. Remember that Holmes wanted to say, in an opinion, that amplifications in a statute would "stop rat holes" in it. Chief Justice Taft criticized, predictably, and Holmes answered that law reports are dull because we believe "that judicial dignity require[s] solemn fluffy speech, as, when I grew up, everybody wore black frock coats and black cravats." 2 Holmes–Pollock Letters 132 (M. Howe ed. 1941). Too many lawyers still write as if they habitually wore black frock coats and black cravats.

colloquy; colloquium. The plural form of colloquy (= a formal discussion, as between a judge and counsel) is colloquies. Following is a typical use of the word: "The record from the state court contains no colloquy between appellant and the court with respect to this issue." (The old word in this sense was interview, common in the 19th c.) The verb corresponding to colloquy is collogue, q.v.

Colloquium (= an academic conference or seminar) is frequently misspelled colloquim. W10 prefers the plural -quiums, the (British) COD -quia. Many academicians seem to use colloquia (and even auditoria) merely to avoid possible criticism by colleagues, however unwarranted.

collude. Occasionally this word is misunderstood, primarily by nonlawyers, to mean "to collaborate," rather than (properly) "to collaborate in wrongdoing."

collusion = (1) an agreement between two or more persons to defraud another; (2) an agreement by which the defendant allows the plaintiff to sue so as to confer jurisdiction on the court; (3) in divorce proceedings (in the days before no-fault divorces), an agreement between husband and wife for one or the other to commit (or appear to commit) adultery or another marital breach in order to obtain a divorce. Collusion always has the flavor of fraud.

The mistake cited under collude—i.e., using collusion for collaboration—is fairly common: Fowler cites the example, "The two authors, both professors at Innsbruck, appear to be working in collusion [read collaboration]" (MEU2 95).

collusive; collusory. Collusive (= of, relating to, or involving a secret agreement or understanding for illegal or deceitful ends) is preferred; collusory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

color. In the phrase under color of state law, the word color = appearance, semblance, guise. The development of this bit of legal JARGON is instructive:

> Sometimes a party put in a plea designed to make what was really a point of fact appear to be a point of law, so as to transfer the decision from the jury to the judge: this was called colour. The expression was in due course applied to the title . . . in question. "If the defendant," wrote Blackstone, "in assise or action of trespass, be desirous to refer > the validity of his title to the court rather than to the jury, he may state his title specially, and at the same time give colour to the plaintiff, bad indeed in point of law, but of which the jury are not competent judges." Blackstone, Commentaries 309 (emphasis in original).

> Jocelyn Simon, English Idioms from the Law, 76 Law Q. Rev. 429, 440 (1960) (Part 2).

Alongside this sense of an apparent or prima facie title or right there has developed the modern expressions no color of title, no color of right, and no color of law, meaning without any sort of title or right.

colorable is used in law in the sense "having at least a prima facie aspect of justice or validity" (OED) .

The word has been extended to a broader sense, as if it were synonymous with ostensible or apparent: "Of the documents prepared by the attorneys themselves, none were even colorably prepared in anticipation of this or any other litigation." U.S. v. Davis, 636 F.2d 1028, 1040 (5th Cir. 1981). One might be tempted at first to brand this usage a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, but it is old—Justice Story used colorable in this way in charging a jury in 1814. See Odiorne v. Winkley, 18 F. Cas. 581, 582 (C.C.D. Mass. 1814) (No. 10,432) ("Mere colorable alterations of a machine are not enough . . . "). See color.

colore officii (= by or under color of office) is a LATINISM without redeeming value. "As a general rule, the corporation is not responsible for the unauthorized and unlawful acts of its officers, though done colore officii."

The English equivalent serves better, and most readers will not pass it over uncomprehendingly, as they will the Latinism. Further, the English phrase is common—e.g.: "Common-law extortion is the corrupt collection of an unlawful fee by an officer under color of office . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 443 (3d ed. 1982).

combination; confederacy; conspiracy. The first two are more neutral than the third. E.g., "Appellants announce their willingness to accept this definition of the boycott, substituting the word confederacy or combination for conspiracy." Combination = the banding together or union of persons for the pursuance of some common goal. The OED notes that it was formerly used synonymously with conspiracy, but it has appreciated in meaning. E.g., "A strike is one of the legal means to which parties have a right to resort to enforce a legal combination." Today combination is often used in antitrust contexts. Confederacy = a union by league or contract between persons, bodies of men, or states, for mutual support or joint action; a league, alliance, compact (OED). The OED states that in law this word has traditionally been given a bad sense, as if synonymous with conspiracy; no longer is such a meaning predominantly given to the word.

Both confederacy and combination may refer to an agreement by two or more persons to do an illegal act, but this sense is best reserved for a third word. Conspiracy = an agreement between two or more people to behave in a manner that will automatically constitute an offense by at least one of them (e.g., two people agree that one of them shall steal while the other waits in a getaway car) (CDL).

combine, n., is an American business colloquialism synonymous with combination, usually implying fraudulent or anticompetitive ends. Krapp disapproved of this use of the word in 1927, and Bernstein approved of it in 1965, but only as a casualism. So it remains. See combination.

come down is the intransitive PHRASAL VERB used of judicial decisions. E.g., "When the decision finally came down in October it was based upon more study than a case ordinarily receives in our court or in any other with an equally heavy docket." Cf. its counterparts in the active voice, hand down a decision.

come(s) now; now comes. Traditionally the standard commencements in pleadings, these phrases are falling into long-overdue disuse. During the late 1980s and early 1990s, judges in four American states (Florida, Louisiana, Michigan, and Texas) were polled on whether they preferred the legalistic opener (Now comes the plaintiff, John Jones, by and through his attorneys of record, and would show unto the court the following) as opposed to a plain-language version (Plaintiff complains of defendant and says). Not surprisingly, more than 80 percent of them preferred the shorter, more direct version. Yet many lawyers—most in Texas and probably elsewhere—stick to the tired old wordy forms.

The phrasing comes now is an example of archaic INVERSION. Comes now is the form for a singular, come now for a plural subject. It is not uncommon for modern pleaders to bungle SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT with inverted phrases of this kind, as in "Comes now the plaintiffs, Russ and Leslie Blanchard [read Come now the plaintiffs . . .]." The wording in a judicial order analogous to this phrase is "Came on for consideration the defendant's motion."

Comes now the plaintiff is occasionally mispunctuated—e.g.: "Comes, now, the plaintiff . . . ." The first comma in the phrase should follow plaintiff, after which the person's name acts as an APPOSITIVE. Placing a comma after the verb betrays the writer's misunderstanding of the inversion of subject and verb. This antiquated wording is sometimes modernized now comes.

come to court is the BrE equivalent of go to trial, q.v. E.g., "Among critics of the existing system is the woman at the centre of last week's trial, an American who waited a year for the case to come to court." Judges' Old Boy Network Under Fire After Rape Trial, Sunday Times, 15 April 1990, at A5. An American journalist writing that sentence would have phrased it go to trial, reach trial, or get to court./ "It took 12 years for the Jack Bernardent case to come to court." Melcher, Leuvre Accused Over "Theft" of Tapestries, The European, 13–15 July 1990, at 2.

comic(al); comedic. These words are confusingly similar. Comic and comical both mean "funny" or "humorous." Comic is generally used, however, of what is intentionally funny, and comical of what is unintentionally funny. Hence the latter term may mean "laughable" in a derisive sense. Comedic = of or pertaining to the form or nature of a dramatic comedy (as the opposite of tragic).

comingle. See com(m)ingle.

coming on for hearing. See came on for hearing.

comity = courtesy among political entities (as nations or courts of different jurisdictions). The term is often defined as if it were wholly a matter of international law, as here: "Comity, in the legal sense, is neither a matter of absolute obligation, on the one hand, nor of mere courtesy and good will, upon the other. But it is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience, and to the rights of its own citizens, or of other persons who are under the protection of its laws." Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113, 163-64 (1895). (On the lack of PARALLELISM between neither and nor in that sentence, see CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS (A).)

But comity applies also to political entities within a given country. E.g., "[T]he decision to extradite is a matter of comity between sister states." State v. Robbins, 590 A.2d 1133, 1138 (N.J. 1991)./ "While our research has not uncovered a reported case involving an attempt by a state or local government to prohibit its employees from contributing to partisan campaigns in other states, we suspect any such attempt would offend the principle of interstate comity . . . ." City of Cincinnati v. Ohio Council 8, 576 N.E.2d 745, 756 (Ohio 1991).

The word is sometimes—esp. in BrE—mistaken as meaning "league" or "federation," esp. in the phrase comity of nations. For example, Bertrand Russell spoke out in 1915 against World War I and said: "A month ago Europe was a peaceful comity of nations . . . " (as quoted in Differences of Opinion, Sunday Times, 8 Dec. 1991). Nearly 80 years later the usage persists, but primarily in British writing—e.g.: "What with . . . South Africa's readmission to the comity of nations . . . , this is far from fanciful." Ivo Tennant, Gatting Lobby Holds Out for Change of Heart, The Times (London), 18 April 1992 (sport section).

COMMAS. See PUNCTUATION (C).

COMMA SPLICES. See RUN-ON SENTENCES.

commemorative; commemoratory. The usual form is -tive; -tory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

commence; begin; start. Except in describing formal ceremonies or exercises, or legal actions, commence is usually unnecessarily stilted for begin, with which it is denotatively equivalent. The OED notes that "begin is preferred in ordinary use; commence has more formal associations with law and procedure, combat, divine service, and ceremon[y]." Commence is justified in the following sentences: "This action was commenced against the defendants under these circumstances, the father having died before the commencement of the action."/ "It is settled that a prevailing party may recover fees for time spent before the formal commencement of the litigation on such matters as attorney-client interviews."

Following are examples of the stilted commence: "Early in the year 1922 some newcomers commenced [read began] selling papers in a London area which, in the opinion of the London district council of the retail federation, was already sufficiently equipped with retail newsagents." (Eng.)/ "When the plane failed to return, a search was commenced [read started or begun]."/ "Ilsa then commenced [read began] living in California with her mother during the school year and spending vacations with her father." (One does not, idiomatically, commence to live somewhere.) See begin (B).

Commence has long been criticized by stylists when introducing an infinitive; begin is here preferable: "In most cases, the Mississippi statute commences [read begins] to run on the date of the wrongful act."

Definite nuances exist with start as opposed to begin or commence. Usually used of physical movement, start suggests an abruptness not present in begin; one starts to do something or engage in some activity (e.g., to run).

commencement. See introductory clause.

commendable; commendatory. The former means "praiseworthy, laudable," and the latter means "expressing commendation; laudatory." Like other differentiated pairs ending in the -able and -atory suffixes, these words are sometimes confused: "It is reprehensible . . . to write a brief primarily to express an uncomplimentary opinion of one's adversary; it is commendatory [read commendable] to write a brief for the purpose of advising the court; it is neither reprehensible nor commendatory [read commendable] to write a brief because the client insists—merely good business." Mortimer Levitan, Confidential Chat on the Art of Briefing, 1957 Wis. L. Rev. 59, 60.

commensurate; commensurable. In all but mathematical contexts, commensurable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of commensurate. Commensurable legitimately means "having, or reducible to, a common measure; divisible without remainder by the same quantity" (OED). Commensurate means: (1) "coextensive"; or (2) "proportionate." Here the rarer term, commensurable, is used where its sibling should appear: "The policy initially issued must be read to cover all the expenses arising from Gina's mental disability, commensurably [read commensurately (i.e., coextensively)] with coverage from other illnesses." comment(ate). Although the longer form is a BACK-FORMATION from commentator, it is an established one dating from the late 18th century. If commentate were only a NEEDLESS VARIANT of comment, its existence would be unjustified. But it has undergone DIFFERENTIATION, and today means "to give a commentary on" or "to expound persuasively or interpretatively." Meanwhile, comment implies brevity. Hence legal commentators typically commentate rather than comment when expounding the law. The word commentate is, of course, grandiose when used of television journalists who cover sporting events, though it is too late to object to their being called commentators.

commentator; commenter. In law, these ordinary words have special senses. Commentators are usually scholars who write within a particular field; commenters, in AmE, are those who send comments to an agency about a proposed administrative rule.

commerce. Formerly, commerce was usable in all the senses of intercourse; hence the phrase sexual commerce (= sexual intercourse) in many older legal writings (not necessarily involving prostitution). See intercourse.

commercial bribery. See bribery.

commercial domicile. See domicil(e) (C).

commercial law = (1) traditionally, the law merchant, i.e., a system of justice that merchants created to govern their affairs separately from the systems of civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical justice; or (2) in AmE, the substantive law dealing with the sale and distribution of goods, negotiable instruments, and the financing of credit transactions on the security of the goods sold. Sense (2), now the primary sense, has spread beyond AmE: "Today the term 'commercial law' has assumed a new meaning, a meaning [that] is new at least to Europe, but not so to the United States or to Louisiana. I refer, of course, to the meaning in which the term is used to describe a certain area of expertise in legal practice or learning, or that branch of the law . . . of special interest to business people. It is in this sense that the term is used in the United States in the title of the Uniform Commercial Code . . . ." Max Rheinstein, "Problems and Challenges of Contemporary Civil Law of Obligations," in Essays on the Civil Law of Obligations 10–11 (Joseph Dainow ed., 1969).

comminate; comminute. The former means "to denounce," the latter "to pulverize."

com(m)ingle. Commingle (= to mingle together) is now the accepted spelling. Comingle, though slightly older, has failed to become standard. "There has been a tendency to comingle [read commingle] the Full Faith and Credit Clause of the Constitution with the doctrine of comity by cross-citing various cases between the two principles." Mingle has also been used in reference to combining funds, but commingle is the more usual term. "The situation is analogous to one where a wrongdoer mingles his own funds with other funds he has misappropriated." Commingles would ordinarily appear in such a context.

comminute. See comminate.

commission. See commitment.

commissionee. See -EE.

commissioner; commissionor. The former spelling is standard.

commitment; committal; commission. Commitment and commission are common words that will here be discussed only to the extent that they are confusable with committal, which is in all but two specific senses a NEEDLESS VARIANT. In England, a committal in civil proceedings is a method of enforcing judgment by obtaining an order that a person be imprisoned. E.g., "The mode of enforcing decrees in the time of Henry VI down to the end of the reign of Charles I., where the party was taken, appears to have been by committal to the Fleet prison; for the Chancellor could not bind the right, he could only coerce the person." 1 George Spence, Equitable Jurisprudence 390 (1846)./ "The judge had inherent jurisdiction to make a committal order ex parte [committing a delinquent party to jail]." (Eng.) See committer.

Committal also has the sense "the action of committing the body to the grave at burial" (OED). E.g., "A decent committal of the body to the deep in accordance with the custom in such matters ordinarily discharges the duty which the law imposes."

In the sense "the action of committing an insane or mentally retarded person to the charge of another," commitment is the usual and the preferred term: "The broad rule generally prevails that a valid proceeding to commit a person to an insane asylum requires an opportunity for the incompetent to be heard before the order of commitment is issued."/ "At a proceeding before the Circuit Court of Albemarle County it was adjudged that the infirmities of Mary Thomas did not require the committal [read commitment] of her person to a guardian." Commitment is also the preferred term in the broad sense of "the action of entrusting, giving in charge": "Few men retain their money in their own custody but commit its care to others, both for the feeling of security that such committal [read commitment] engenders and the facility with which it may be transferred and paid out by means of checks."

Commission is preferred in the sense "the action of doing or perpetrating (as a crime)." The OED records examples of committal and even of commitment in this sense, but these are anomalous.

committable; committible. The first is preferred. See -ABLE (A). committal. See commitment.

committee (= a person who is civilly committed, usu. to a psychiatric hospital) is a splendid example of how lawyers take an ordinary English word and give it an alien sense and pronunciation /com-i-tee/. The usage invites double-takes from both lawyers and nonlawyers: "The civil commitment hearing does not address whether the committee has engaged in conduct that constitutes the elements of a crime; rather, that hearing focuses on whether a committee is mentally ill or dangerous . . . ." Benham v. Edwards, 678 F.2d 511, 538 (5th Cir. 1982). See Hickey v. Morris, 722 F.2d 543, 547 (9th Cir. 1983) (referring to the "differences between insanity acquittees and civil committees"). Of course, those who have had the privilege of serving on more than a few committees (in the usual sense) may see this usage as a logical extension of meaning. See acquittee.

Some writers have used the spelling commitee to differentiate the legal from the ordinary use of the word. That spelling, however, violates the principles of DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS and merely suggests that the writer possesses neither an ear for the language nor a computer with a spelling-checker.

Confusingly, committee has still another legal sense—esp. common in BrE—referring not to the psychiatric patient but to the guardian for the patient. E.g., "The appointment of a guardian or committee for the person and property of another is not conclusive evidence as to the mental capacity of such person to execute a deed."/ "[T]he 'committee' of a person of unsound mind was a single person to whom the care of such person was entrusted by the court, the stress being on the last syllable. Committees are no longer appointed." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 64 (11th ed. 1982).

committer; committor. These words constitute one of the few pairs with a clear-cut DIFFERENTIATION arising from these variable suffixes. Committer is the general word meaning "one who commits (e.g., a crime)." Committor is an uncommon legal term for "a judge who commits an insane or mentally retarded person to the charge of another." See -ER (A). commodatum; accommodatum. The usual spelling of this term from Roman law, meaning "a gratuitous loan (of something) for use without compensation" is commodatum.

common. A. And several. What is common is shared in some way; what is several (q.v.) is separate in some way. But the terms are vague enough that they cause problems when used in several common legal tests: "[T]he distinction between a common undivided interest and several and distinct claims is something less than clear. This is to be expected. Except in property law contexts, such terms as 'common' and 'several' are poor words for a test of jurisdiction—or anything else—since they 'have little or no clear and ascertainable meaning.'" Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 198 (4th ed. 1983) (quoting Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee, 81 Harv. L. Rev. 356, 380 (1967)).

B. And mutual. See mutual.

commonality; commonness; commonalty; commonage; commonty. The common character of these words may cause confusion. The ordinary words are commonality and commonness; although historically the two have overlapped, they are best kept separate, in accordance with the following definitions. Commonness, the general noun corresponding to common, may mean: (1) "the state or quality of being common" <the commonness today of fax machines>; (2) "the quality of being public or generally used" <the commonness of the thoroughfare>; (3) "the having of run-of-the-mill qualities" <the commonness of his writing>; or (4) "vulgarity" <the commonness of a sot>. Commonality = the possession of an attribute in common with another. The term is usual in class-action suits. E.g., "The district court denied class certification because it found that the petitioner had not satisfied the commonality and typicality prerequisite of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 [i.e., the class members having claims with factual and legal issues in common with one another]."

The remaining words are more easily distinguished. Commonalty = (1) commoners; the general body of the community (excluding nobility); (2) a municipal corporation (a sense to be avoided with this word, as corporation is the ordinary word); or (3) a general group or body. In the following sentence, by contrast, the writer may be using commonalty in sense (3)—a redundancy—or may have intended commonality: "The Alabama code stood as a statement of the rules of the game that a family of professionals . . . adhered to in recognition of their commonalty [read commonality?] and because it might, by forcing an affiliation, help keep them out of trouble." Jethro K. Lieberman, Crisis at the Bar 56 (1978).

Commonage = (1) the right of pasturing animals on common land; (2) the condition of land held in common; or (3) an estate or property held in common (OED). Commonty, in its existing uses, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of commonage.

commonhold (BrE), referring to condominium ownership, is a new system of tenure in G.B., allowing flats to be sold in freehold. E.g., "Commonhold, a new form of flat ownership, has been proposed in a Law Commission report published yesterday. Commonhold, another name for the US condominium, would provide an alternative to freehold and leasehold ownership, combining their advantages and removing some of the disadvantages." A.H. Hermann, Alternative to Leasehold of Flats Proposed, Fin. Times, 23 July 1987, at I-6./ "The system of commonhold, announced by the Government last month, could deal with many of the problems which long leasehold tenants and their landlords are experiencing, says a report published yesterday." New Lease of Life for Victims of Landlords, Daily Telegraph, 14 Aug. 1991, at 6.

common law. A. As Noun—in Broad Contrasts. In modern usage, common law is contrasted with a number of other terms. First, in denoting the body of judge-made law based on that developed originally in England, common law is contrasted by comparative jurists to civil law, q.v. Second, "with the development of equity and equitable rights and remedies, common law and equitable courts, procedure, rights, remedies, etc., are frequently contrasted, and in this sense common law is distinguished from equity" (OCL). Third, the term is similarly distinguished from ecclesiastical law. Fourth, it is occasionally used to denote the law common to the country as a whole—as distinguished from law that has only local applications. Finally, and perhaps most commonly within Anglo-American jurisdictions, common law is contrasted with statutory law <statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed>.

B. As Noun—Its Specific Senses. The phrase has at least seven senses—and "the precise shade of meaning in which this chameleon phrase is used depends upon the particular context, and upon the contrast that is being made." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 25 n.1 (11th ed. 1982). Among its senses are:

1. in historical England, the "immemorial slow-growing custom declared by juries of free men who gave their verdicts case by case in open court" (1 Winston Churchill, A History of the English Speaking Peoples 225 (1956; repr. 1983));

2. general law as distinguished from special law such as royal decrees and the local customary law of any district (see James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 43 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co. 1881) (discussing English common law as "common . . . to all parts of the kingdom, in distinction from the local usages"));—in this sense the phrase is analogous to Fr. droit commun & Ger. Gemeinrecht;
3. in comparative law, a body of law based on the English legal system, as distinct from a civil-law system;
4. "the set of rules that lawyers use to settle any dispute or problem to which no constitution or statute applies" (Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 20 (1939; repr. 1980);
5. the power of judges to create new law under the guise of interpreting it (Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 29–30 (11th ed. 1982);
6. modern judge-made law (see, e.g., Bernard Johnson, Inc. v. Continental Constructors, Inc., 630 S.W.2d 365, 370 n.4 (Tex. App.—Austin 1982) ("The defense of 'privity of contract' having been established by the common law, it obviously may be abolished by statute or by the common law."));
7. a widely adopted statute (e.g., "Carl Zeitz . . . said the judge's ruling appears to be a 'logical extension' of the common laws [dramshop statutes] that hold taverns partly responsible for damages incurred if they serve alcohol to a visibly intoxicated person." R.B. Smith, Casinos May Be Held Liable for Drunken Patrons [sic] Losses, Wall St. J., 23 June 1989, at B1).

Sense (7) is the nonlawyer's unfortunate MISCUE—nothing more. Sense (6) is arguably loose; one book, supporting this sense, states that common law is "[s]ometimes referred to as case law." Stephen Foster, Business Law Terms 17 (1988). But common law really encompasses much more than caselaw, q.v., which usually refers to a limited number of cases within a field. Still, drawing the line between caselaw and common law—esp. as used in a phrase such as federal common law—is a difficult, if not impossible, task.

In the U.S.—contrary to popular belief—the common law includes many early English statutes. For example, the crime known as false pretenses (q.v.), unknown to English common law, was made a misdemeanor by an English statute old enough to have been incorporated into the common law of American states. Of course, once adopted in the various American states, the common law has grown in a variety of directions, and only rarely does a question of modern American law depend on English common law. As Holmes once acutely observed, "The common law so far as it is enforced in a State, whether called common law or not, is not the common law generally but the law of that State existing by the authority of that State without regard to what it may have been in England or anywhere else." Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co., 276 U.S. 518, 533–34 (1928) (Holmes, J., dissenting). See generally Morris L. Cohen, The Common Law in the American Legal System, 81 Law Lib. J. 13, 18 (1989).

C. At common law. A LOAN TRANSLATION of the LAW FRENCH al common ley, this phrase is the legal idiom used to introduce statements of common-law doctrine—that is, in sense (1) outlined under (B) above. E.g., "At common law, the death of the injured person or of the tortfeasor, at any time before verdict, abated the action."/ " 'At common law,' says Sir W. Erle, 'every person has individually, and the public also have collectively, a right to require that the course of trade be kept free from unreasonable obstruction.' " (Eng.)

Writers and editors occasionally puzzle over whether to use the present or the past tense after this phrase. In the previous paragraph we see an example of each. The distinction lies here: If the doctrinal statement of immemorial law continues to hold true, the present tense is called for; if the statement is of historical interest and the doctrine long since obsolete, the past tense is appropriate.

Oddly, the preposition at is not used in any parallel idiom for civil law.

D. As Adjective. The phrase is hyphenated when it serves as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE but not when it serves as a noun. Both uses are illustrated in this sentence: "But these are all common-law cases, and the common law has its peculiar rules in relation to this subject." Cf. civil(-)law (B).

common-law cheat. See cheat.

common-law lawyer; common lawyer. The better form is common-law lawyer; the repetition of law is no cause for anxieties about REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "But there the court of appeal, the Privy Council, has been largely composed of common-law lawyers." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 27–28 (1881; repr. 1946). Several learned writers such as John Chipman Gray, Roscoe Pound, and Lawrence Friedman have used common-law lawyer.

But many others—mostly British—have used common lawyer, as in the title of Frederick H. Lawson's book, A Common Lawyer Looks at the Civil Law (1953). Consider: "On the whole the common lawyers used the device well, understanding the purpose for which the fiction was created . . . ." George W. Paton, A Textbook of Jurisprudence 58 (4th ed. 1972)./ "The common lawyer is pious and platitudinous about the insularity of English law." Samuel J. Stoljar, A Common Lawyer's French, 47 Law Lib. J. 119, 119 (1954). The OED, interestingly, contains examples of the phrase common lawyer dating from as early as 1588.

As if to avoid a MISCUE—as by reading common lawyer to be analogous to common strumpet—at least two eminent writers have taken to hyphenating the phrase: "Under either view, the common-lawyers seem significantly prominent in the creative days of early equity." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 180 n.4 (5th ed. 1956)./ "But the common-lawyers . . . were forced into the position of saying that the seisin . . . was in the lord . . . ." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 150 (1961; repr. 1964).

That urge to hyphenate is understandable, but the hyphen belongs in common-law lawyer and not in common lawyer.

common-law marriage has one meaning in the U.S., another in Scotland, and still another in England. In the U.S., it generally denotes an agreement to marry, followed by cohabitation and a public recognition of the marriage. Common-law marriages are valid in many states, such as Texas, though others have abolished the institution, as New York did in 1932.

In Scotland, the phrase denotes cohabitation for a substantial period with the acquisition of the reputation of being married (an agreement to marry not being necessary).

And in England, common-law marriage is now used only of a marriage celebrated according to a common-law form in a place where the local forms of marriage cannot be used (e.g., a desert island) or are morally unacceptable to the parties (e.g., a Muslim country) or where no cleric is available (OCL). Additionally—and more commonly in BrE—the phrase refers to an illicit union of some duration. As Sir Robert Megarry writes, "The so-called common-law marriage, little known in England save as a polite verbal cloak for fornication or adultery of the less ephemeral type, has a respectable ancestry in America." A Second Miscellany-at-Law 210 (1973).

In none of these jurisdictions is the phrase to be confused with its near-homophone common-law mortgage.

COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS. Until the Judicature Act of 1873, the pleadings allowed in English courts were as follows:

Plaintiff	statement of claim or declaration
Defendant	defence (BrE sp.) or answer
Plaintiff	reply or replication
Defendant	rejoinder
Plaintiff	surrejoinder
Defendant	rebutter
Plaintiff	surrebutter

Modern practice has been greatly simplified. In English practice today, the pleadings are generally the plaintiff's statement of claim, the defendant's defence, and (sometimes) the plaintiff's reply. In American federal practice, the pleadings are generally the plaintiff's complaint and the defendant's answer, both of which are commonly amended repeatedly. See pleading (C), EQUITY PLEADINGS & WORLD COURT PLEADINGS common-law wife is a misnomer of sorts: "No such woman was known to the common law, but [the phrase] means a woman who is living with a man in the same household as if she were his wife. She is to be distinguished from a mistress, where the relationship may be casual, impermanent, and secret." Davis v. Johnson, [1979] A.C. 264, 270 (per Lord Denning, M.R.). The OCL states that "the term common-law wife is sometimes applied [no doubt as a EUPHEMISM] to a concubine or mistress where the relationship is of some duration or stability." In AmE, this use of the term is properly considered a corrupt one. See common-law marriage.

common lawyer. See common-law lawyer.

commonness. See commonality.

common pleas, court of. At early common law, common pleas were actions over which the crown did not claim exclusive jurisdiction—as distinguished from pleas of the crown. Later, the phrase common pleas referred more specifically to civil actions between private citizens.

Through metonymy (as early as the 13th century), common pleas came to refer to the court hearing civil actions—a court that lasted in England until 1875, when it was merged into the newly established High Court. Several North American jurisdictions still have courts of common pleas, including the states of Connecticut, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and the province of Ontario.

commonsense, adj.; commonsensical; commonsensible. All three forms date from the 19th century. Commonsense should generally be preferred over commonsensical or commonsensible —though commonsense may cause a MISCUE if it does not immediately precede the noun it modifies. For example, if Rodell had used commonsense here instead of commonsensible, some readers might have hesitated: "Ten of the men under whom I took courses were sufficiently skeptical and common-sensible about the branches of law they were teaching so that, unwittingly of course, they served together to fortify my hunch about the phoniness of the whole legal process." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! xx (1939; repr. 1980).

The noun is two words: common sense.

commonty. See commonality.

commonweal; commonwealth. Commonweal = the general welfare or common good. E.g., "Testamentary conditions in general restraint of marriage are regarded as contrary to public policy and to the commonweal."/ "The sixteenth-century ideal of the 'commonweal'—what would now be called 'public policy'—is an originally Roman principle still invoked in the courts." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 236 (1966).

Commonwealth = a nation, state, or other political unit <the British Commonwealth>. For the distinction between this term and dependency and territory, see territory.

commorientes = persons who die at the same time, such as spouses who die in an accident. Although this LATINISM would seem to be useful in the context of simultaneous-death statutes, it is little used in the U.S. outside Louisiana. But it does occasionally surface in general American caselaw: "All of that evidence showed prima facie that husband and wife perished in a common disaster as commorientes . . . ." Cruson's Estate v. Long, 221 P.2d 892, 900 (Or. 1950)./ "Let me next refer for a moment to the general law governing successions from commorientes who perish in a common disaster." In re Fowles' Will, 158 N.Y.S. 456, 459 (Surr. Ct. 1916). See simultaneous death.

Presumably the term is more common in BrE, for it is included in the compendious CDL. And it appears in the work of respected British legists—e.g.: "By reason of the English rule relating to commorientes the husband was deemed to have died intestate . . . ." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 384 (7th ed. 1974).

In Louisiana usage, commorientes has undergone SLIPSHOD EXTENSION to refer not to the persons who die simultaneously, but to the rule of succession regarding such persons. Thus, one occasionally sees references to the doctrine of commorientes—e.g.: "Plaintiff suggests that the doctrine of commorientes . . . might have applied but for the assumption by the heirs that the deaths were simultaneous." Morelock v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 63 So. 2d 612, 614 (La. 1953)./ "I do not think it necessary to cope with the difficult problem of whether the doctrine of commorientes . . . is applicable to a wrongful death action." Chateau v. Smith, 297 So. 2d 268, 271 (La. Ct. App. 1974) (Schott, J., concurring).

communication is often used as a COUNT NOUN in the law of evidence. It refers to any writing or conversation from one person to another or between persons.

Partridge states, in reference to communicate and communication, that if all you mean by communicate is write or tell, or by communication a note or a letter, then say so. Eric Partridge, Usage and Abusage 77 (1973). As a general rule, that advice is well taken; but if the lawyer particularly wishes to emphasize the applicability of a rule of evidence relating to communications, use of the longer, broader word is certainly justified.

communicative; communicatory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

communitize, communitization. A. And unitize, unitization. These two sets of terms, from the American law of oil and gas, are sometimes used interchangeably but are usefully distinguished. The following definitions are based on those contained in Williams & Meyers, Oil and Gas Terms 652, 938 (6th ed. 1984). Unitization = the joint operation of all or some portion of a producing reservoir. E.g., "[S]uch leases contain no words of pooling or unitization." R.M. Myers, The Law of Pooling and Unitization 46 (1957). The verb unitize has been traced back to the mid-19th century, though then in a different context.

Communitize and communitization are legal NEOLOGISMS dating from the mid-20th century and recorded in no standard nonlegal dictionary. Communitization (known also as pooling) = the bringing together of small tracts sufficient for the granting of a well permit under applicable rules for the spacing of wells. E.g., "The Carter Oil Company's answer also alleged that there was an agreement between appellees and certain persons to communitize a certain other oil lease with that of plaintiff Rhodes." Rhodes v. Davis, 28 N.E.2d 113, 115 (Ill. 1940)./ "[T]here was no communitization as a matter of law because all of the royalty owners had not executed or ratified the lease." May v. Cities Serv. Oil Co., 444 S.W.2d 822, 827 n.4 (Tex. Civ. App.—Beaumont 1969).

B. And communize, communization. Interestingly, the earliest appearance of communitize (c. 1939) was preceded by a variant form—commu- nize (= to make classifiable as community property)—which was used during the 1920s through the 1950s. Professor Patrick H. Martin of Louisiana State University, in a letter of September 1989, observed that communitize displaced the shorter form because American farmers, especially in Oklahoma, probably did not want their activities in the 1940s through the 1960s being described as "communizing." Imagine the discomfort that the following sentences might have caused during the McCarthy era: "It is clear, then, that had the legislature attempted by the Community Property Law to transform property then owned by either spouse from separate into community property, such a provision could not have stood the test of constitutionality. But how is the situation different merely because, instead of a provision of that nature, the act communizes the future income from such property?" Willcox v. Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co., 55 A.2d 521, 526 (Pa. 1947)./ "The 1939 Community Property Act, discussed by the administratrix, is only of historical significance, and compliance therewith evidenced an intent by husband and wife to communize their property." Davis' Estate v. Oklahoma Tax Comm'n, 246 P.2d 318, 319 (Okla. 1952).

community charge (BrE) = poll tax (BrE), i.e., Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's controversial (and doomed) measure aimed at increasing government revenue. E.g., "The arguments in favour of a community charge are as strong as ever. The domestic rate which it replaces was an inequity founded on a fiction." Bruce Anderson, The Poll Tax Finds a Worthy Champion, Sunday Telegraph, 21 Jan. 1990, at 19./ "It must have seemed like a good idea when the Conservative Party proposed it in 1987: a 'community charge,' the same for every citizen, to cover part of the cost of local government services and replace most real estate taxes. Now, with what has since become known pejoratively as the 'poll tax' and is about to go into effect in England and Wales on April 1, even many of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's Conservative Party supporters wish that they had never heard of it." Craig R. Whitney, Violent Anger Rises in Britain as Date for 'Poll Tax' Nears, N.Y. Times, 10 March 1990, at 2.

community property; separate property. Community property = (1) a system of marital-property rights derived from the Spanish law and now existing in eight American states: Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, and Washington; under this system, spouses are co-owners of all real and personal property that either acquires during the marriage—apart from acquisitions by gift, by will, or by inheritance; (2) property held under this system.

When used attributively as a phrasal adjective, the phrase should be hyphenated thus: community-property state, community-property rules, etc. See ganancial.

Separate property = property that a married person can sell, give away, or leave to somebody by will without the spouse's consent, and that remains that person's undivided property upon divorce. In specific ways, the phrase carries different meanings in community-property jurisdictions and in common-law (or equitable-distribution) jurisdictions. In community-property jurisdictions, separate property refers to a married person's property that is (a) acquired before marriage; (b) acquired during the marriage by gift, by will, or with premarital holdings; or (c) acquired after permanent separation. For the other meanings of separate property, see separate property.

community service is an increasingly common penal sentence for those whose crimes have injured the community in some way, but who (it is thought) deserve only light punishment. E.g., "Before his brief declaration, his lawyer, Stephen E. Kaufman, asked Judge Lowe to impose a sentence of community service, saying that a jail term would serve no purpose." Stephen Labaton, GAF Fined; Executive Sentenced, N.Y. Times, 31 March 1990, at 17.

commute. A. And commutate. The latter is a technical term relating to electricity. Commute is the legal term meaning (1) "to exchange (a punishment or penalty) for one of less severity"; or (2) "to change (one kind of payment) into or for another; esp. to substitute a single payment for a number of payments, a fixed payment for an irregular or uncertain one, or a payment in money for one in kind (e.g., a tithe)" (OED). Today sense (1) of commute is more common <the governor commuted his prison sentence to sixty days of community service>.

B. And pardon. To commute a punishment or penalty is to reduce it, or to substitute in its place a milder punishment or penalty. To pardon one who has been convicted or punished is to excuse that person without exacting any penalty.

comp is AmE slang for compensation—used most often in the phrase workers' comp. E.g., "The House proposal . . . stands a better chance of controlling the worker comp drain than the Senate proposal ramrodded by trial lawyer and labor proponents." Comp Showdown, Dallas Morning News, 1 Dec. 1989, at 30A.

compact, n., adj. & v.t. The noun is accented on the first syllable, the verb on the second. The adjective is rendered both ways, preferably /kom-pakt/ except in reference to small cars.

compactible; compactable. The former is preferred. See -ABLE (A). company; corporation. At common law, the technical legal term for an entity having a legal personality was corporation. The word company could refer to a partnership or other unincorporated association of persons. In current usage, however, company almost always refers to an incorporated company—i.e., a corporation. See corporation.

company law is the British equivalent of the American phrase corporate law—e.g.: "My Lords, this appeal raises a question of some importance to those concerned with the niceties of company law." (Eng.)/ "The bill [the 1856 Joint Stock Companies Bill] was passed, and as consolidated in the giant Companies Act of 1862 is the basis of modern company law." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 376 (1966). See corporate law.

COMPANY NAMES are commonly given abbreviated forms in legal prose. Often writers go to absurd lengths to specify what the short form of the company name is in parentheses, e.g., Morgan Data Processing and Filming Co., Inc. (hereinafter "Morgan"). This habit becomes ridiculous after we have seen three or four parties with distinctive names treated in this way. The better practice in most legal writing is to give the full name when the party is first identified, and then to use the short form thereafter without parenthetical explanation. When companies named, in short form, Morgan and Stevens and Broadmoor and Datapoint are involved in litigation or are parties to a contract, nobody will confuse one with another if only these abbreviated names are used. Omitting the cumbersome hereinafter phrases also minimizes the somnifacient effects of LEGALESE

The exception to this advice, of course, occurs when a man named Morgan is sued in conjunction with his company Morgan, Inc. When names are confusingly similar, it is best to spell out exactly which abbreviation is used with which name, and then to use those forms consistently. This practice does not require hereinafter. E.g., "Plaintiff has sued both John Morgan ('Morgan') and Morgan Inc. ('the Company')."

comparable; comparative. The former is stressed on the first syllable, the latter on the second Comparable = capable of being compared; worthy of comparison <comparable salaries>. Comparative = (1) of or pertaining to comparison ; (2) involving comparison <the field of comparative law>; or (3) estimated by comparison <comparative distances>.

Occasionally comparative is used where comparable is called for: "A new system permits women members of staff to complain if they feel they are being paid less than men of comparative [read comparable] skill." Simon Hoggart, Observer, 22 Sept. 1991, at 22. Though the OED documents this use of comparative with four examples ranging from the early 17th to the early 19th century, it labels the usage obsolete.

comparative law. See jurisprudence (D).

comparative negligence; contributory negligence. In the U.S., a plaintiff's contributory negligence (= his own carelessness for his own safety or interests, which contributes materially to damage suffered by him as a result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of another person or persons [CDL]) has traditionally, in accordance with the common-law rule, acted as a complete bar to recovery. But most states have now adopted statutes providing for comparative negligence, which acts to reduce the plaintiff's recovery proportionally to his fault in the damage rather than to bar recovery completely. The terms contributory negligence and comparative negligence have remained quite distinct.

In G.B., however, the separate term comparative negligence is not used. The common-law rule of contributory negligence was altered by the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act of 1945, which provides that "if the plaintiff is partly in fault, his claim is not defeated, but the damages recoverable are to be reduced to such extent as the court or jury thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage" (OCL). Thus contributory negligence in G.B. means roughly what comparative negligence means in the U.S.; rather than devising a new term, the English have continued using the old term, but with a new meaning. See assumption of the risk.

COMPARATIVES AND SUPERLATIVES. A. Choice Between Comparative and Superlative. When two items are being compared, a comparative adjective should be used <the greater of the two>; when more than two are being compared, the superlative should be used <the greatest of the three>. The blunder of using the superlative adjective when only two items are compared is not at all uncommon: "That is only half the story, and not the most [read more] important half."/ "The table reveals that, as between closely held and public corporations, the closely held corporation is by far the most [read more] numerous."

B. Which to Use—Suffixes, or more and most? Apart from anomalies like good > better > best, comparatives and superlatives are formed either internally by the addition of the suffixes -er and -est (e.g., broader, broadest) or externally with the words more and most (e.g., more critical, most critical). A number of words have a choice of forms (e.g., commoner, -est or more, most common; tranquil(l)er, -est or more, most tranquil; stupider, -est or more, most stupid; naiver, -est or more, most naive). The terminational forms are usually older, and some of them are obsolescent; the choice of form in any given context will depend on which form sounds better. The variation in forms here is not to be stifled by absolute rules.

Still, if a word ordinarily takes either the -er or the -est suffix—and that formation sounds most natural—it is poor style to use more or most instead. E.g., "It was easy to generalize this as a contest between the individual and society, and it became more easy [read easier] to do so . . . ." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to Philosophy 21 (1922; repr. 1975)./ "The witness offer is an even more simple [read simpler] procedure than the tangible offer," John Kaplan & Jon R. Waltz, Cases and Materials on Evidence 56 (5th ed. 1984).

C. Swapping Horses. The form of a comparison cannot change once the construction has begun. One writes more . . . than, or as . . . as; but the two do not mix: "Nowhere else is there a greater need to substitute a panel of three experienced judges for a jury as [read than] in medical malpractice." See SWAPPING HORSES.

D. Be-Verbs Repeated After Comparatives. It is almost always unnecessary to repeat the verb to be before the second element of the comparison. The prolix and infelicitous construction seems to thrive more in legal than in other writing. E.g., "Such a law is less likely than is [omit the second is] the Texas education statute to qualify as the least onerous alternative."

comparator (= something with which something else is compared) "is a new bit of legalese. The word does exist, but is usually used in the scientific context [to denote] an instrument used for making comparisons." Hein v. Oregon College of Educ., 718 F.2d 910, 912–13 n.2 (9th Cir. 1983). But in legal contexts, it frequently appears in discussions of the Equal Pay Act, under which, for example, female plaintiffs contrast their remuneration with that of male comparators. See id. at 912. E.g., "At trial, the EEOC sought to prove that it was entitled to recover the pay of a comparator male employed by Smith Pontiac for the period commencing in December 1983 . . . ." EEOC v. Mike Smith Pontiac GMC, Inc., 896 F.2d 524, 527 (11th Cir. 1990). As the Ninth Circuit observed, "The use of 'comparator' in the context of the Equal Pay Act has convenience, if not elegance, to commend it." Hein, 718 F.2d at 913 n.2.

compare (with) (to). The usual phrase is compare with; this phrase means "to place side by side, noting differences and similarities between" <let us compare his goals with his actual accomplishments>. Compare to = to observe or point only to likenesses between <the psychologist compared this action to Hinckley's assassination attempt>.

Compare and contrast is an English teacher's tautology, for in comparing two things (one thing with another) one notes both similarities and differences.

COMPARISONS, FALSE. See ILLOGIC (A).

compartment(al)ize. The longer form is standard in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "Assuming that it makes sense to compartmentalize in this manner the diagnosis of such a formless 'disease,' tremendous gaps in our knowledge remain, which the record in this case does nothing to fill." Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514, 524 (1968). See -IZE.

compel; impel. Compel is the stronger word, connoting force or coercion, with little or no volition on the part of the one compelled. Impel connotes persuasive urging, with some degree of volition on the part of the one impelled. Compel is properly used when the legal process is brought to bear on people's actions: "The pleas are no more improperly compelled than is the decision by a defendant at the close of the state's evidence at trial that he must take the stand or face certain conviction."/ "He has not yet reached the age of 25 years, and he brings this bill to compel the trustees to pay to him the remainder of the trust fund."

In the following sentences impel is properly used, in the first two the object (court) being an UNDERSTOOD WORD: "Applying these notions to the present case impels [the court to] the conclusion that appellant's motion at the close of all the evidence should be read as a motion for a directed verdict."/ "Does a procedural merger of law and equity automatically impel [the court to] a modification of principles of equitable jurisdiction?"/ "With these principles in mind, we [the justices of the court of appeals] are impelled to agree with the probate court's decision that appellants violated the in terrorem clause of decedent's will."

But the courts have been less than punctilious about the distinction between compel and impel. Sentences like the following are common: "Our analysis compels the conclusion that FERC lacks the authority to suspend initial rate filings." Perhaps this use of compel stems from a desire for the court (again, the understood object) to suggest that it simply had no choice in its holding. The device is largely rhetorical and is so clichéd as to be ineffective. Lon Fuller—through the voice of a fictitious judge—subtly mocked the device in a famous article: "For us to assert that the law we uphold and expound compels us to a conclusion we are ashamed of . . . seems to me to amount to an admission that the law of this Commonwealth no longer pretends to incorporate justice." The Case of the Speluncean Explorers, 62 Harv. L. Rev. 616, 620 (1949). See impel.

compellable, primarily a legal term, has traditionally been used in the broad sense "that may be compelled (to do something)." E.g., "Both Plato and Aristotle approved abortion for this purpose, the latter suggesting that a mother should be compellable to commit abortion after she had borne an allotted number of children." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 148 (1957; repr. 1972).

Today the word is more widely used in the sense "subject to being compelled (to testify)." The term is far more common in BrE than in AmE. E.g., "[I]t is only within certain limits that husband and wife are competent, and within narrower limits that they are compellable, to give evidence against one another, in criminal proceedings." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 49 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984)./ "[N]ot until 1898 were accused persons made competent (but not compellable) witnesses at their trial." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 437 (5th ed. 1956).

compendious means "abridged, succinct," not "voluminous," as several federal judges mistakenly believe—e.g.: "Of course, Richmond could have built an even more compendious record of past discrimination, one including additional stark statistics and additional individual accounts of past discrimination." City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 547–48 (1989) (Marshall, J., dissenting)./ "We need go no further. Having attentively reviewed the compendious record in this long-running suit, we discern no reversible error." HMG Property Investors, Inc. v. Parque Indus. Rio Canas, Inc., 847 F.2d 908, 919–20 (1st Cir. 1988) (referring elsewhere to "the hoariness of the controversy and the girth of the record" [at 919]).

Perhaps the error stems from the idea that a compendium is, at best, a fairly comprehensive abridgment. But, properly speaking, the emphasis falls on abridgment, not on comprehensive. And some would say that the word does not at all suggest comprehensiveness: "But as a compendium of feminist art history . . . and a catalogue—commodious though not, of course, comprehensive—of women artists, this will be an enormously useful work." L. Hughes-Hallet, Book Rev., Sunday Times, 10 June 1990, at 8-10.

compensable. A. And compensatory. A nuance exists between these terms. Compensable damages = those damages capable of being recovered; damages for which compensation is available. Compensatory damages = those damages intended to make the plaintiff whole again; actual damages. Compensable damages are hypothetical; compensatory damages are those actually awarded or to be awarded to a party.

The form compensatable is an error for compensable: "[The] loss [is] compensatable [read compensable] by interest of not more than $405." Metz v. Tusico, Inc., 167 F. Supp. 393, 398 (E.D. Va. 1958). See -ATABLE.

B. Spelling. Compensable—not compensible—is the preferred form. The -ible spelling is incorrect; the frequency of its use is explained perhaps by a mistaken analogy to comprehensible. See -ABLE (A).

compensatable. See compensable (A).

compensate. A. Transitive or Intransitive. Compensate may or may not take for, and either way means "to make up for, to counterbalance." E.g., "When it is conceded that mental suffering may be compensated (for) in actions of tort, the right of the plaintiff to recover in this case is established." The modern tendency is to omit for, but the sound of a sentence may outweigh the interests of concision.

B. And recompense. These verbs are almost precisely synonymous <to recompense the victim

compensation = (1) remuneration; that which is given in recompense; (2) (in AmE) salary or wages; (3) (in BrE) consideration paid for expropriated land. For an early treatise devoted to compensation in sense (3), see Henry C. Richards & J.P.H. Soper, The Law and Practice of Compensation (n.d. [1898]); though nearly unknown in AmE, this BrE sense is not confined to lawyers, as witness the lyrics of Jethro Tull's popular song about compulsory purchase, "Farm on the Freeway" ("They say they paid me compensation/ That's not what I'm chasing, I was a rich man before yesterday.").

In sense (1), the phrase money compensation might at first appear to be a REDUNDANCY. But compensation can take forms other than money, as John Austin's quotation in the OED makes clear by referring to compensation in money or in kind. Here Geldart is contrasting money compensation with other kinds, such as strict performance in equity: "With few exceptions the only thing that Common Law can do is to give him money compensation." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 29 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

compensatory; compensative. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Cf. recompensive.

competence; competency. A. Of Persons. Though Fowler considered competency a NEEDLESS VARIANT, these terms have come to exhibit some DIFFERENTIATION, which should be further encouraged. Competence usually has the lay sense "a basic or minimal ability to do something." E.g., "An exhaustive study of the deficiencies of applying a mechanism originally developed to decide who owns title to Blackacre to the management of general disasters is beyond the competence and available time of its writer."/ "Incompetence of counsel is not necessarily established by omission of a claim."

Today competency is a NEEDLESS VARIANT in all but one sense. It is increasingly confined to the legal sense of "the ability to understand problems and make decisions; ability to stand trial." A severely mentally retarded person, an incompetent, is said to suffer from legal incompetency. Competency to stand trial is the usual phrase.

In referring to qualifications in general, as to witness a will or to testify in court, -ce is the usual form. E.g., "The common-law rules concerning the competence [i.e., the qualification to testify in court] of attesters were derived from the rules concerning the competence of witnesses in litigation."/ "Statutes in the United States tend to correlate the standard of competence to attest a will with the ability of the witness to comprehend and relate the facts." Only when the reference is clearly and solely to mental disability is -cy the preferred form.

Sometimes competency is confused with competence: "Where the station agent incidentally acts as the telegraph agent in many sparsely settled communities where the business will not permit the employment of a full-time telegraph agent, it is apparent that such competency [read competence] cannot be secured." And vice versa: "Appellants contend that their son lacks the mental competence [read competency] to waive his legal rights, and they maintain that he lacks the competence [read competency] to decide whether to pursue or to waive the benefits of 28 U.S.C. § 2254."

Writers should avoid the INELEGANT VARIATION of alternating between the two terms in a single writing: "Enriquez's competency challenge is twofold. First, he contends that he was denied due process because the state trial court did not . . . hold a hearing to determine his competence [read competency] to stand trial. . . . [T]he Supreme Court [has] held that a defendant has a procedural due process right to a competency hearing." Enriquez v. Procunier, 752 F.2d 111, 113 (5th Cir. 1984).

B. Used of Adjudicative or Rule-Making Bodies. Competence is frequently used for qualification or capacity of an official body to do something. E.g., "Before any court can enter a valid judgment or decree, it must have competence to do so."/ "Hardly anyone has ever doubted the competence of a legislature to enact a comparative negligence statute."/ "With respect to most crimes, the credibility of a witness is peculiarly within the competence of the jury, whose common experience affords sufficient basis for the assessment of credibility."

C. Of Evidence. In older legal writing, competence = admissibility. Thus references to the competence of evidence were once fairly common. Again, -cy is a NEEDLESS VARIANT in this context. Following is an example in the adjectival form: "Evidence of a conviction is only prima facie, and may be rebutted by competent evidence that impeaches the validity of the judgment." See incompetence & competent.

competent is used in archaic senses in the law. Generally the word is used only of persons, whereas in law it is used of courts, of evidence, and of cases. It is even used indefinitely: "It seems competent, if war exists, for the military authorities to use special military court machinery, and to impose any sentence, even death, without being disabled, in another case, from applying procedure of a more limited character." (Eng.) This use of the word, in the sense "proper, appropriate," was labeled obsolete by the OED. Yet it still appears in legal writing, albeit less and less frequently. E.g., "The general rule is that recital of a written instrument as to consideration is not conclusive, and it is competent to inquire into consideration and to show by parol evidence the real nature of the consideration."/ "In the present case it was competent for the plaintiff to recover for the intestate's pain, suffering, and disability during his period of life following the assault."

More frequently, competent = (1) (of a judge or court) having jurisdiction or authority to act <When a court of competent jurisdiction has obtained control of property, that control may not be disturbed by any other court>; (2) (of witnesses) having capacity; qualified to testify in court concerning the material facts <A will is void unless attested by the number of competent witnesses required by statute>; (3) (of a case) within the jurisdiction of the court; or (4) (of evidence) admissible. See competence & incompetent.

This word is still further complicated in legal contexts by its frequent appearance in its lay sense (= professionally adequate; properly qualified): "Omission of the testimony may have been so material as to deprive the proceeding of fundamental fairness, despite appellant's otherwise competent representation."/ "A jury could conclude that appellee failed to fulfill its dual obligation to provide a competent service engineer to supervise installation of the purchased equipment."

complacency; complacence. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

complacent; complaisant. The former means "self-satisfied; smug." The latter means "obliging; tending to go along with others."

complainant; complainer. Complainant is, both in AmE and in BrE (except Scotland), the technical term for one who enters a legal complaint against another. It is traditionally the term used in courts of equity, but by the early 20th century the equity courts had already adopted the term used in courts of law—plaintiff. See Walter C. Clephane, Equity Pleading vi (1926).

Some writers prefer complainant over prosecutrix, q.v., in the context of sexual offenses—e.g.: "In State v. Connelly, a turn-of-the-century Minnesota case, the complainant was a seventeen-year-old girl who testified that she had been raped by the priest who moved in with his family next door." Susan Estrich, Real Rape 44 (1987).

Complainer is the Scottish equivalent of complainant. E.g., "Seven months later there were served upon the complainer, not one, but five separate complaints." (Scot.)/ "In the heart of the Island of Lewis near the head of Loch Erisort there is a clachan called Balallan, in which the complainer keeps the local store, selling articles of clothing, provisions, and general merchandise." (Scot.) In the U.S., complainer is generally understood as meaning "one who habitually complains." Cf. pursuer. See plaintiff.

complainee has appeared as a correlative of complainer—e.g.: "The action is one seeking to recover concealed assets of the estate of Isabel S. Jones, deceased, which the complainant alleges to be in the possession of complainee." In re Jones' Estate, 122 N.E.2d 111, 111–12 (Ohio App. 1952). Perhaps it has something to commend it, but that something is hard to imagine. Proper names would surely be preferable. See -EE & PARTY APPELLATIONS.

complicitous; complicit, adj. The former is the standard term; the latter, in fact, is not recorded in the OED or W3. "Far from attacking racism at its root, Mr. [Monroe] Freedman charges, Finch was complicit [read complicitous] in it." David Margolick, Chipping at Atticus Finch's Pedestal, N.Y. Times, 28 Feb. 1992, at B1.

complicity, which derives from the idea of being an accomplice, has been extended "to include guilt based upon induced conduct of an innocent person." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 767 (3d ed. 1982). That broadening of sense is probably a desirable one because the conceptual subtlety involved is unlikely to give rise to a widely adopted verbal subtlety.

compliment; complement. These words are often confounded. The first means "to praise," the second "to supplement appropriately or adequately."

comply takes with, not to. E.g., "You have also asked whether the budget for Cameron County complies in form to [read with] the requirements of the county budget statutes."

compose; comprise. Correct use of these words is simple, but increasingly rare. The parts compose the whole; the whole comprises the parts; the whole is composed of the parts; the parts are comprised in the whole. Comprise, the more troublesome word in this pair, means "to contain; to consist of." E.g., "The evidence clearly showed that the committee comprised members from inside as well as outside the Bank."/ "Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition." (Eng.) A number of mistakes occur with comprise:

A. Erroneous Use of is comprised of. The phrase is comprised of is always wrong and should be replaced by either is composed of or comprises. E.g., "We also judicially notice that the 123d Judicial District Court of Shelby County is comprised of [read comprises] two counties, Panola and Shelby."/ "The law of the professional lawyer was comprised of [read comprised] rules derived from judges' dicta . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 134 (1966).

Sometimes the simplest of verb phrases is what is needed: "In the course of the search, the agents noticed that the ceiling of the barracks was comprised [read made up] of removable acoustical tiles." Following is the correct use of is composed of where the careless writer would put is comprised of: "The organization is composed of certain employees of the Chicago Railway Co."

B. Comprise for are comprised in. "Discriminatory tests are impermissible unless shown by professionally acceptable methods to be predictive or significantly correlated with important elements of work behavior that comprise [read are comprised in] the job for which the candidates are being evaluated."

C. Comprise for constitute. Comprise is more and more commonly used in a sense opposite its true meaning ("to contain, include, embrace"). It should not be used for compose or constitute. E.g., "To the extent that pension rights derive from employment during coverture, they comprise [read constitute] a community asset subject to division in a dissolution proceeding."/ "Cotenants comprise [read constitute] not a number of individuals, each owning an undivided interest, but a corporate entity."/ "With a joint tenancy, cotenants comprise [read constitute] a corporate unity."/ "The front and back of this Order comprise [read constitute] the entire agreement affecting this purchase."

D. Comprise for are. This is an odd error based on a misunderstanding of the meaning of comprise. E.g., "The appellants comprise [read are] nine of sixteen defendants convicted in the federal district court on one or more counts of an eleven-count indictment."

E. Correct use of comprise. E.g., "The advisory group, which comprises attorneys and representatives of major categories of litigants, will analyze the trends in case filings, the demands on the court's resources, and the principal causes of cost and delay in civil litigation." Theodore R. Tetzlaff, Federal Courts, Their Rules, and Their Roles, Litigation 1, 1 (Spring 1992)./ "Together, the first two volumes of 'The Years of Lyndon Johnson' comprise, with notes, 1,387 pages." Frank J. Prial, Author's Kind Word for Johnson, N.Y. Times, 31 March 1990, at 13.

F. Compose in the sense of compound. See composition.

composition means, at common law, (1) the act of adjusting a debt, or avoiding a liability, by compensation agreed to by the parties; or (2) the compensation paid as part of such an agreement. This noun corresponds to the verb to compound, q.v., and often means merely "a compounding." E.g., "This being by act of the creditor, since without his participation the composition would be ineffective to affect the debt, the surety is discharged." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 312 (1950) (corresponding to sense (2) of compound)./ "If a slave killed a freeman, he was to be surrendered for one half of the composition to the relatives of the slain man, and the master was to pay the other half." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 17 (1881; repr. 1946) (corresponding to sense (3) of compound).

Similarly, compose is sometimes used as a synonym for compound (in the legal sense): "It was . . . an attempt [by the defendant] to compose a dispute, . . . to find a mutually satisfactory middle ground between the two divergent conceptions of the original offer to sell." Frese v. Gaston, 161 F.2d 890, 891 (D.C. Cir. 1947) (per curiam).

compos mentis*. See non compos mentis*.

compound, v.t., has been the victim of a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION arising from its primarily legal sense. The word has three basic meanings: (1) "to put together, combine, construct, compose" <to compound sand and gravel>; (2) "to settle (any matter) by a money payment, in lieu of other liability" <to compound a debt>; and (3) "to forbear from prosecuting for consideration, or to cause (a prosecutor) so to forbear" <to compound a felony>. For senses (2) and (3)—the legal senses—the noun corresponding to this verb is composition, q.v.

Sense (3) has historically been the more common one—e.g.: "Among certain grizzled sea gossips . . . went a rumor perdue that the master-at-arms was a chevalier who had volunteered into the king's navy by way of compounding for some mysterious swindle whereof he had been arraigned at the King's Bench." Herman Melville, Billy Budd 28 (1891; repr. 1979).

The word has been sloppily extended because "nonlawyers have misapprehended the meaning of to compound a felony . . . . [The word] is now widely abused to mean: to make worse, aggravate, multiply, increase." Philip Howard, New Words for Old 19 (1977). Examples of this looseness of diction abound now even in legal writing. E.g., "This deliberate perpetuation of the unconstitutional dual system can only have compounded the harm of such a system." Green v. County School Bd., 391 U.S. 430, 438 (1968)./ "The elective share is further reduced in jurisdictions that compute the share on the basis of the net estate after taxes, thus compounding the loss of protection for the spouse."/ "With the expansion of equity jurisdiction, such problems have been enormously compounded."/ "The situation for the prosecution was compounded by the star witness's evasion of subpoenas by hiding in Ireland."

It is not quite true, then, at least in the U.S., that "to write 'he compounded the offence' (when what is meant is that he did something to aggravate the offence) is to vex every lawyer who reads the sentence, and to provoke numbers of them to litigious correspondence in defence of their jargon." Philip Howard, New Words for Old 20 (1977). Nevertheless, we may justifiably lament the fact that generations of young lawyers will not understand the phrase to compound a felony when they see it in the older lawbooks.

Notably, compound has also been used in civil cases to refer to a settlement (sense 2): "The parties compounded the case after completing discovery."/ "He compounded the case with the defendant for a cash payment." Whereas compounding a felony is a criminal offense, compounding a civil case is perfectly proper. In civil contexts, however, settle is by far the more common term.

compounder = (1) one who compounds for a liability, debt, or charge; (2) one who compounds a felony or offense; (3) one who pays a lump sum in discharge of a liability requiring recurrent payments; (4) one who, as a stranger to a dispute, tries to help parties settle their differences (an arbitrator with extensive equitable powers was formerly known as an amicable compounder); (5) one who knows of another's crime and agrees, for some reward received or promised, not to inform or prosecute.

compounding a crime = accepting something of value under an unlawful agreement not to prosecute a known criminal offender or to handicap the prosecution. Thus, the sense differs from that which many readers would intuitively (and mistakenly) attribute to the phrase (something like "adding to a crime"). See compound.

compound larceny. See larceny (B).

comprehend. In lay contexts, this word means, almost exclusively, "to grasp mentally"; in legal contexts, it frequently means "to include, encompass." E.g., "These instructions would comprehend damages for any disfigurement of the plaintiff's nose."/ "No judicial opinion can comprehend the protean variety of the street encounter, and we can only judge the facts of the case before us."/ "By confining herself to the use of the generic term, the present testatrix comprehended all the various religious, educational, benevolent, and humanitarian objects that the single word 'charity' connotes." See apprehend. Cf. embrace.

comprehensible; comprehendible. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

comptroller is pronounced identically with controller. To pronounce the -p- has traditionally been considered semiliterate. Comptroller is used especially of public offices; controller, however, means the same thing and is not deceptively spelled. Comptroller is more common in AmE than in BrE, where it is archaic.

The strange spelling of comptroller originated in the zeal of 15th-century Latinists who sought to respell medieval French loanwords on the "purer" Latin model. Thus account became accompt, and count became compt. Comptroller is one of the few survivals among such respellings, and it is also one of the bungles perpetrated by those ardent Latinists: the con- in controller was mistakenly associated with the word count, when in fact it is merely the Latin prefix (the true derivation being fr. L. contrā-rotulātor). Thus the respelling should never have been. But we are several centuries too late in correcting it.

compulsive; compulsory. Today, compulsive primarily means "of, pertaining to, resulting from, or suggesting psychological obsession." Although it was once commonly used in the sense "mandatory, coercive," that meaning is best denoted today by the word compulsory. In short, the two words have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. Therefore, in the following passage, compulsory is the better choice—if only to prevent a MISCUE: "Perhaps the most natural usage would take 'damages caused by a public vessel' to mean physical damages arising out of her operation. But there is nothing compulsive [read compulsory] about such an understanding." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 984 (2d ed. 1974).

compulsory counterclaim. See counterclaim.

compulsory purchase is the BrE term for expropriation or the exercise of eminent domain. Here the phrase appears in verb form: "Tophams also contended that, since the racecourse would in any event be closed down and left derelict, when it would be compulsorily purchased by the local authority for housing purposes, an injunction would be of no benefit to Lord Sefton." (Eng.) See eminent domain, condemn & compensation.

compurgator is stuffy for character witness, unless (as in the first two examples) the context is historical: "Although the historical origins of the 'voucher' rule are uncertain, it appears to be a remnant of primitive English trial practice in which 'oath-takers' or 'compurgators' were called to stand behind a particular party's position in any controversy." Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 296 (1973)./ "The old 'compurgators' have come to life in our present day 'character witnesses.'" Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 73 n.* (1943)./ "The Partin inquiries test the witnesses' capacity and competence; the instant ones place the psychiatrist in the posture of a compurgator [read character witness] . . . ." U.S. v. Wertis, 505 F.2d 683, 685 (5th Cir. 1974)./ "[A]ll but one witness, including one of appellant's two compurgators [read character witnesses], testified that appellant could receive a fair trial." James v. State, 772 S.W.2d 84, 93 (Tex. Crim. App. 1989) (en banc).

COMPUTERESE, the jargon of computer wizards, is making inroads into standard English. Thus access and format and sequence and interface have become verbs, input has enjoyed widespread use as both noun and verb, and on-line and user-friendly have begun to be used as a model for NEOLOGISMS (e.g., on-stream used of an oil well, reader-friendly used of well-written documents). No one can rightly object, of course, to the use of computerese in computing contexts, where it is undeniably useful. But many computer terms have come to have figurative senses, thereby invading the general language rather than remaining denizens of a restricted jargon. Careful users of language are wary of adopting any of these trendy locutions. Though some of them may remain and become standard, just as many may well become defunct as the technology of communication changes. And others may never lose the jargonistic stigma attaching to them.

computerize. See -IZE.

comstockery (often capitalized) refers to prudish censorship, or attempted censorship, of supposed immorality in art or literature. In 1873, the American Congress passed the so-called Comstock Law, a federal act to control obscenity, pushed through by one Anthony Comstock (1844–1915), who was a leader of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. George Bernard Shaw invented the word comstockery, pejorative from the first, when he wrote in the New York Times in 1905: "Comstockery is the world's standing joke at the expense of the United States."

conceal = (1) to keep from the knowledge of others; refrain from disclosing; or (2) to remove or keep out of sight or notice; to hide. In a statute defining the crime of an accessory after the fact, sense (2) obtains—the word conceal implies an act or refusal to act by which the person intends to prevent or hinder a crime's discovery—a mere failure to give information is not enough. See concede. See cede.

concededly. See reportedly, confessedly & -EDLY.

concensus. See consensus.

concept; conception. Both concept and conception may mean "an abstract idea." Conception also means "the act of forming abstract ideas." Fowler wrote that conception is the ordinary term, concept the philosophical term. (MEU1 at 88.) Often the latter is used as a high-flown equivalent of simpler words such as design, program, thought, or idea. When not used pretentiously for one of those simpler words, concept is likely to have negative connotations, as here: "Yet no concept, or combination of concepts, or rule built out of concepts—as all legal rules are built—can of itself provide an automatic solution to the simplest conceivable human problem." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 37 (1939; repr. 1980).

Wesley Newman Hohfeld used the more appropriate word in titling his Fundamental Legal Conceptions (1919). Similarly, the better ordinary use is illustrated here: "Such a holding would directly contradict fair-market-value standards and our conceptions of justice."

conceptual(istic); conceptive; conceptional. These words are very close. Conceptual and conceptional both mean "of or pertaining to a conception or idea"—conceptual being the usual term. Conceptive = of or relating to the process of mental conception (i.e., conceiving).

When not being used as a NEEDLESS VARIANT of conceptual, the word conceptional serves as the adjective corresponding to a different kind of conception (= the fertilization of an egg): "It is not easy to reconcile this attitude with the papal concession of some kinds of anti-conceptional measures." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 69 (1957; repr. 1972).

Conceptualistic = (1) of or relating to the philosophical or psychological doctrine of conceptualism (a nonlegal technical sense); or (2) employing or based on conceptions. In sense (2), conceptualistic is more than slightly pejorative: "Appellants put forth the conceptualistic argument that the promoter cannot be the corporation's agent when the corporation has not yet been formed."

concerned with, be. This verb phrase is weak: usually concern can be put into the active voice with a gain in directness. E.g., "The Green case was concerned with [read concerned] whether a violation that continued after a freedom-of-choice plan was initiated required affirmative action."/ "This appeal is primarily concerned with [read concerns primarily] orders of the district court directing that two public institutions of higher education be merged into a single institution." Cf. deal with.

concert = agreement of two or more persons or parties in a plan, design, or enterprise. E.g., "The Third Circuit reversed, finding direct and circumstantial evidence of concert of action tending to show that injurious concert also occurred." Steven A. Childress, A New Era for Summary Judgments, 116 F.R.D. 183, 185 (1987). This sense thrives in legal language but is all but defunct in lay language, apart from the adjective concerted, q.v., and the phrase in concert.

In concert = working collectively toward the same end. It does not mean merely "together," as here: "Individual symptoms of intoxication, when manifesting themselves alone instead of in concert [read instead of simultaneously or together], bear little relation to ascertainable criminal conduct." Here the phrase is correctly used: "The amended complaint alleges that defendant worked in concert with Cooke in illegally breaching the franchise agreement."

concerted means "unified, accomplished with the aid of others," not "strong" or "strenuous." Thus "He did not make a concerted effort to get to work on time" is an anacoluthon, inasmuch as one person cannot make a concerted effort. See concert.

concessionaire; concessioner. The former is standard, the latter a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

concessive; concessionary; concessional. Concessive = of or tending to concession . Concessionary = of or relating to concession or a concession <the concessionary company—i.e., the one with a concession>. Concessional is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of either of the previous two; here it appears where concessive would serve better: "Generous concessional [read concessive] treatment of debt-burdened African economies is essential if the continent's development crisis is to end." Aid and Reform in Nigeria, Fin. Times, 6 Jan. 1992, at 10.

conciliation. See mediation (B).

conciliatory; conciliative. Conciliatory = (1) tending to conciliate; or (2) of or relating to conciliation or mediation. Conciliative is a NEEDLESS VARIANT: "Both agencies have incentives to compromise . . . . This conciliative [read conciliatory] process could be initiated effectively by recognizing areas of common interest . . . ." Jerry W. Markham & Rita M. Stephanz, The Stock Market Crash of 1987, 76 Geo. L.J. 1993, 2030–31 (1988)./ "After conciliative [read conciliatory] efforts failed, plaintiff filed this action." Barnes v. Lerner Shops of Texas, Inc., 323 F. Supp. 617, 619 (S.D. Tex. 1971).

concision; conciseness. Drawing a fine distinction, Fowler wrote that "concision means the process of cutting down, and conciseness the cut-down state" (MEU2 304).

conclude, in law, has these special senses:

1. (of a treaty, convention, or contract) to ratify or formalize. E.g., "The comparative study of judicial intervention to change or modify a validly concluded contract is difficult." Jean-Louis Baudouin, "Theory of Imprevision and Judicial Intervention to Change a Contract," in Essays on the Civil Law of Obligations 151 (Joseph Dainow ed. 1969).
2. to bind. E.g., "The inconsistent statements may be evidentiary as admissions—convincing, persuasive or of little weight, . . . but in and of themselves, they will not conclude a party as a matter of law." Parkinson v. California Co., 233 F.2d 432, 438 (10th Cir. 1956).
3. to estop. This sense is archaic—Lord Coke once wrote that to conclude is "to determine, to finish, to shut up, to estoppe or barre a man to plead or claime any other thing." Sir Edward Coke, Institutes of the Laws of England 36b (1628; repr. 1823).

conclusion = (1a) the last part or section of a speech or writing, such as the summation to the jury or court; (1b) the final clause or section of a pleading; (1c) the concluding part of a deed or conveyance; (2a) a judgment or statement arrived at by reasoning; (2b) an inferential statement—often an allegation that is insufficiently supported by the underlying facts giving rise to the inference; (3) the concluding, settling, or final arranging (as of a treaty); or (4) an act by which one estops oneself from doing anything inconsistent with it.

conclusionary; conclusional. See conclusive.

conclusion of fact; conclusion of law. A conclusion of fact is an evidentiary inference—a factual deduction drawn from observed or proven facts. A conclusion of law is a legal inference—a judicial deduction made upon a showing of certain facts, no further evidence being required.

conclusive; conclusory; conclusionary; conclusional. Conclusive is the common word, meaning "authoritative; decisive." E.g., "The statements of individual legislators, even sponsors, are much less conclusive on the issue of congressional intent than are official committee reports."/ "Admissions are rarely conclusive of the facts stated."

Most general English dictionaries fail to list conclusory as a main entry; the few that do misdefine it. The OED, labeling it a variant of conclusive, calls it "rare." Yet the word is now quite common in American legal writing—and increasingly in British legal writing—and it does not coincide in meaning with conclusive. The DIFFERENTIATION is worth encouraging. Conclusory = expressing a factual inference without expressing the fundamental facts on which the inference is based. The word often describes evidence that is not specific enough to be competent to prove what it addresses. For example, the statement "She is an illegal alien" is conclusory, whereas "She told me that she is an illegal alien" is not.

Born in New York, the term has gained widespread currency since it first appeared in the 1920s. E.g.:

- "[T]he motion [is] granted, to the extent of directing the service of an amended complaint, omitting paragraphs 16, 17, and 30, and all conclusory matter of the nature pointed out herein." Ringler v. Jetter, 201 N.Y.S. 525, 525 (App. Div. 1923).
- "Facts in detail supporting conclusory statements herein are available in the record." People v. Hines, 29 N.E.2d 483, 487 (N.Y. 1940).
- "So accustomed are we to concentrating on reasons of policy and on the conclusory nature of legal categories that we tend to forget how channeled we are by nothing more than a conceptual structure." Joseph Vining, Legal Identity: The Coming of Age of Public Law 24 (1978).
- "Ultimately, this [plain-meaning approach to 19th-century boilerplate] produces a largely insensitive and conclusory historical inquiry . . . ." Oregon Dep't of Fish and Wildlife v. Klamath Indian Tribe, 473 U.S. 753, 787 (1985) (Marshall, J., dissenting).

Still, despite its currency—its appearance in tens of thousands of published sources—its absence from dictionaries gives some legal writers pause. The Wyoming Supreme Court in 1987 used the phrase conclusory affidavits, and stated in a footnote: "After painstaking deliberation, we have decided that we like the word conclusory, and we are distressed by its omission from the English language. We now proclaim that henceforth conclusory is appropriately used in the opinions of this court. Furthermore, its usage is welcomed in briefs submitted for this court's review. Webster's, take heed." Greenwood v. Wierdsma, 741 P.2d 1079, 1086 n.3 (Wyo. 1987).

Take heed, indeed. Gary W. Saltzgiver, a Michigan lawyer, has sent me a letter from the G.&C. Merriam Company dated 24 November 1976, in which the great dictionary company did not take heed; the letter says that conclusory was dropped from Merriam-Webster dictionaries because (1) it is extremely rare, and (2) it is a close synonym of conclusive.

Both of those conclusions—or "conclusory statements," we might say—are and were wrong. "A computer search of American judicial opinions, conducted in April 1988, revealed more than 21,000 cases in which conclusory appears. It has been used for more than sixty years in state and federal courts, including the United States Supreme Court." Bryan A. Garner, "The Missing Common-Law Words," in The State of the Language 235, 239–40 (Christopher Ricks & Leonard Michaels eds., 1990).

Some legal writers, apparently loath to use conclusory, have resorted to conclusional in the sense previously given: "[T]he allegations are vague, conclusional [read conclusory], or inartistically expressed." Sanders v. U.S., 373 U.S. 1, 22 (1963)./ "[T]he stricken portions of [the] affidavits contained conclusional [read conclusory] statements which neither the trial court nor this court may consider in passing upon motions for summary judgment." Public Utility Dist. v. Washington Pub. Supply Sys., 705 P.2d 1195, 1202 (Wash. 1985) (en banc)./ "While the moving papers contend [that] the employment of new counsel will entail additional expense, the application on this point is conclusional [read conclusory] and does not establish [that] the hiring would work a substantial hardship." In re Adler, 494 N.Y.S.2d 828, 830 (N.Y. Surr. Ct. 1985). The OED defines conclusional as "of or pertaining to the conclusion; final," and calls it not only "rare" but "obsolete" as well. W3 lists conclusional, however, and attributes to it the sense "constituting a conclusion," very nearly the sense here given to conclusory. Yet, in American law at least, conclusory has become so widespread that conclusional should be considered a mere NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Still another such variant is conclusionary, which was experimented with for a time and still occasionally appears—but it has lost the battle for supremacy and should be rejected: "[W]e are moreover impelled to adhere to the opinion, derived from our experience . . . , that conclusionary [read conclusory] evidence of this nature is immaterial to the issues." NLRB v. Donnelly Garment Co., 330 U.S. 219, 230 (1947)./ "The defendant's second numbered contention makes a broad conclusionary [read conclusory] statement . . . ." U.S. v. Boykin, 275 F. Supp. 16, 17 (M.D. Pa. 1967)./ "Frequently information is sought by way of discovery . . . which is susceptible of objective ascertainment and conclusionary [read conclusory] summarization without its usefulness being impaired." 2 R.M. Milgrim, Milgrim on Trade Secrets § 7.06[1], at 7-95 (1988).

Occasionally, conclusionary is used as a synonym for concluding or final, as in this vague passage, which ends with a confused parenthetical: "[T]he decision or disposition is the conclusionary [read final] action of a competent tribunal (the verdict)." John Murray, The Media Law Dictionary 29 (1978).

conclusive evidence; conclusive proof. These synonymous phrases have two very different senses. On the one hand, most writers use either phrase to refer to evidence so strong as to overbear any other evidence to the contrary—i.e., evidence that must, as a matter of law, be taken to establish some fact in issue and that cannot be disputed. An example is a certificate of corporation offered as evidence of a company's incorporation. E.g., "I have no doubt that the words 'conclusive evidence' mean what they say; that they are to be a bar to any evidence being tendered to show that the statements in the minutes are not correct." Kerr v. John Mottram Ltd., [1940] Ch. 657, 660.

On the other hand, some writers mean something less by these phrases: evidence that, though not irrebuttable, so preponderates as to oblige a jury to come to a certain conclusion. E.g., "The term 'conclusive proof' requires a claimant to sustain his burden merely by proof [that] is clear and convincing." Bun v. Central Pa. Quarry, Shipping & Constr. Co., 169 A.2d 804, 807 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1961). See preponderance of the evidence.

conclusory. See conclusive.

concord. A. And concordat. Concord is the FORMAL WORD generally meaning "an amicable arrangement between parties, esp. between peoples or nations; compact; treaty." In law the word has sometimes been used as a NEEDLESS VARIANT of accord or compromise in the senses outlined under accord and satisfaction.

The word concord also has two archaic legal senses: (1) an in-court agreement in which a deforciant (q.v.) acknowledges that the lands in question belong to the complainant; and (2) an agreement to compromise and settle a case in trespass.

Concordat = an agreement between church and state. E.g., "For decades, under a system affirmed by a 1929 Concordat between the Government and the Vatican, Italy's 40,000 priests have been paid in large part out of state funds." Clyde Haberman, Church Shares Pie with Caesar: How Big a Piece? N.Y. Times, 8 Dec. 1989, at 4. Usually, as in the preceding quotation, concordats involve agreements with the Catholic Church; one authority defines them as "agreements between the Roman Pontiff and the civil ruler concerning matters of mutual interest to both high contracting parties." Matthew Ramstein, Manual of Canon Law 42 (1948).

The word has been the subject of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, perhaps as writers have been seduced by inflated diction—that is, the possibility of calling a contract between important entities a concordat. E.g., "The case is far stronger for the reason that the purposes for which Temple is operated pursuant to the concordat between the University and the Commonwealth, which matured in the legislation of 1965, are public purposes." Schier v. Temple Univ., 576 F. Supp. 1569, 1577 (E.D. Pa. 1984).

The word concordat has also been used as a variant of concord, but is to be avoided in that sense as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

B. And accord, n. See accord.

CONCORD = grammatical agreement of one word with another to which it relates. Concord embraces number, person, case, and gender. It applies most often to (1) a subject and its verb; (2) a noun and its pronoun; (3) a noun and its appositive; and (4) a relative and its antecedent. Errors in concord are not at all uncommon.

A. Subject-Verb Disagreement. Errors in SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT are, unfortunately, legion in legal writing—e.g.: "Contracts for the sale of land have been enforced specifically in equity since the fifteenth century because damages is [read are] not an adequate substitute for the specific land to which the plaintiff is entitled under his contract." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 300 (1930)./ "The largest group of such cases arise [read arises] on motions for temporary restraining orders or preliminary injunctions." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 6 (1991)./ "As usual there seems [read seem] to be a million things happening around the Texas Law Center." Karen Johnson, What's Happening at the Texas Law Center? Tex. B.J., May 1992, at 514. See SYNESIS.

Are these merely symptoms of the decay of 20th-century English? Consider: "[T]he adequate narration may take up a term less brief, especially if explanation or comment here and there seem [read seems] requisite to the better understanding of such incidents." Herman Melville, Billy Budd 73 (1891; repr. Signet ed. 1979).

Quoting Melville is not to excuse lapses of this kind: every generation might be more vigilant than it is about its subjects and verbs. But we should not think of these problems as having been unthinkable two or three generations ago.

B. Noun-Pronoun Disagreement. Depending on how you look at it, this is either one of the most frequent blunders in modern writing or a godsend that allows us to avoid SEXISM. Where disagreement can be avoided, I recommend avoiding it; where it cannot be avoided, I recommend resorting to it cautiously because some readers (esp. speakers of AmE) may doubt your literacy. E.g., "Yet one can only teach a person something if that person can comprehend and use what is being taught to them [delete to them]." J.M. Balkin, Turandot's Victory, 2 Yale J. Law & Humanities 299, 302 (1990)./ "The prosecution contends that it has a right pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 607 to impeach its own witnesses; in addition, they assert [read it asserts] that a prior inconsistent statement of the witness may be admitted to attack his credibility." (Or use prosecutors . . . they.)/ "Neither party has waived their [read his or her or its] right to a jury trial."/ "The issue on this appeal is whether the district court abused its discretion in ordering each party to bear their [read his or her, or its] own costs and expenses in this litigation." See each (A) & every (A).

In BrE—to a surprising degree, and even when the purpose cannot be to avoid sexist usage—this type of disagreement in number is common. For example, Glanville Williams here makes a firm become they, not it: "[A]n all-round practice gives better training than a specialised one—but it may be well worth taking articles in a specialised firm if you are assured that they are [read it is] looking out for a bright young man/woman like you to be a partner." Learning the Law 209 (11th ed. 1982).

Even more startling examples abound in BrE—e.g.: "[I]t would indeed be rather surprising if it were the same crime to strike a blow at a person and then to lock them up and keep them in custody for six months." K.A. Aickin, Kidnapping at Common Law, 1 Res Judicatae 130, 130 (1935–1938)./ "Neither father nor mother can deprive themselves of their rights, except in the case of a separation agreement between husband and wife

. . . ." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 46 (D.C.M. Yardley 9th ed. 1984)./ "Anyone can set themselves up as an acupuncturist . . . ." Sarah Lonsdale, Sharp Practice Pricks Reputation of Acupuncture, Observer Sunday, 15 Dec. 1991, at 4./ "A starting point could be to give more support to the company secretary. They are, or should be, privy to the confidential deliberations and secrets of the board and the company." Ronald Severn, Protecting the Secretary Bird, Fin. Times, 6 Jan. 1992, at 8. And most startling of all: "Under new rules to be announced tomorrow, it will be illegal for anyone to donate an organ to their wife [read his wife or a spouse] . . . ." Ballantyne, Transplant Jury to Vet Live Donors, Sunday Times, 25 March 1990, at A3.

As this seeming sloppiness mounts—and bids fair to invade edited American English—the complaints mount as well. For example: "Columnist James Brady . . . noted on Page 38 that Richard F. Shepard was grammatically incorrect when he wrote, 'Nobody remembers a journalist for their writing.' Perhaps it was Mr. Shepard who wrote the headline for the AT&T ad that appeared on page 37 of the same issue: 'This florist wilted because of their 800 service.'" Letter of Jerry Galvin, Advertising Age, 4 Nov. 1991, at 26.

Why is this usage becoming so common? It is the most likely solution to the problems brought on by sexist language—the generic masculine pronoun. Advertisements now say, "Every student can own their own computer," so as to avoid saying his computer—a phrasing that would likely alienate some consumers. The Macmillan Dictionary of Business and Management (1988) defines cognitive dissonance as "a concept in psychology [that] describes the condition in which a person's attitudes conflict with their behavior" (p. 38). And the President of the United States, in his 1991 State of the Union address, said: "If anyone tells you that America's best days are behind her, then they're looking the wrong way." And one of the best-edited American papers allows this: "If the newspaper can't fire him for an ethical breach surely they [read it?] can fire him for being stupid." Michael Gartner, U.S. Law Says We Have to Kill Saddam Hussein the Hard Way, Wall St. J., 31 Jan. 1991, at A15.

C. One Result Wrongly Attributed to Two or More Subjects. Another common mistake—in AmE and BrE alike—is to attribute one result to two separate subjects, when logically a separate result necessarily occurred with each subject. E.g., "Barry Kendall Hogan and Mark Bradford Hogan appeal their conviction [read convictions] of importing marijuana and conspiracy to import and possession with the intent to distribute the drug."/ "Undocumented creditors who fail to prove their claim [read their claims] at the meeting on the 6th February, or such later date as is provided in the Scheme of Arrangement . . . ." Notice to Creditors (from Bank of Credit & Commerce (Botswana) Limited), Fin. Times, 6 Jan. 1992, at 10./ "In school, seats are not assigned, yet students tend to sit in the same seats or nearly the same each time, and sometimes feel vaguely resentful if someone else gets there first and takes 'their' seat [read seats]." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power 121 (1990).

The following sentence presents a close call: "The government argues that the stop of appellees' cars need be justified only by reasonable suspicion." Or should it be stops of appellees' cars? Not if government officers stopped several cars with one action.

concubine = (1) a woman who cohabits with a man without being his wife; or (2) a mistress or prostitute. Sense (2) is a loose usage—an example of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION.

concur, to a nonlawyer, means "to agree." To American judges it has two senses: (1) "to join in a judicial decision, adopting the reasoning and result as one's own"; (2) "to join in a judicial decision while not agreeing with the grounds expressed in the majority opinion supporting the decision." Concur takes in <concur in the opinion> or with <I concur with you>. See agree (A).

Sense (2) is really a form of to concur specially (= to write specially, q.v.), that is, to express one's concurrence in a separate opinion. E.g., "Lenroot, Associate Judge, specially concurs." In re Schnell, 46 F.2d 203, 211 (Ct. Cust. & Pat. App. 1931)./ "Two of the judges specially concur upon the ground that the starting of the car . . . was not improper." Ranous v. Seattle Elect. Co., 92 P. 382, 384 (Wash. 1907).

concurrence; concurrency. Concurrence = (1) accordance, agreement, assent; (2) a vote cast by a judge in favor of the judgment reached, often on grounds differing from those expressed in the majority opinion explaining the judgment; or (3) a separate written opinion explaining such a vote. Sense (1) is the general one, not peculiarly legal—e.g.: "[A]ll true legal rights are concurrent in equity, wherever such concurrence is material . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 94 (1930). Senses (2) and (3) are omitted from most general English-language dictionaries. But they are common in law—e.g.: (Sense 2) "Another variant is the concurrence dictated by a desire to produce a badly needed majority opinion instead of a plurality opinion." Bernard E. Witkin, Appel- late Court Opinions 224 (1977)./ (Sense 3) "There remain, however, two other types of opinion, the concurrence and the dissent, which any Justice is free to use at any time he desires." John P. Frank, Marble Palace 123 (1958).

Concurrency = (of a criminal sentence) the quality or fact of being concurrent in duration. E.g., "It is settled in this state that where no words of concurrency of sentences appear in the judgment entry, the sentences are deemed to be consecutive." Lee v. State, 349 So. 2d 138, 140 (Ala. Crim. App. 1977)./ "[H]e would then be returned to serve his California sentences, less time gained by concurrency." In re Cain, 52 Cal. Rptr. 860, 861–62 (Cal. App. 1966).

concurrent; consecutive; cumulative. See concurrent sentences.

concurrent interests; co-ownership; estates in community; interests in community. Each of these phrases may be used for the four types of co-ownership recognized by Anglo-American law: joint tenancy, tenancy in common, coparcenary, and tenancy by the entireties. See coparcenary, joint tenancy (distinguishing that term from tenancy in common), and tenancy by the entireties.

concurrent jurisdiction; pendent jurisdiction. These terms may confuse even experienced lawyers. Concurrent jurisdiction = overlapping jurisdiction; jurisdiction exercised by more than one court at the same time over the same subject matter and within the same territory, the litigant having the initial discretion of choosing the court that will adjudicate the matter. E.g., "[E]xceptional but important cases exist . . . which raise questions of conflict of laws, particularly in respect of the concurrent jurisdiction of two countries with regard to the same crime . . . ." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 5 (7th ed. 1974).

That much is well known about concurrent jurisdiction. But American caselaw has given the phrase an additional sense, having to do with physical boundaries—esp. rivers and other bodies of water. E.g., "It has been decided in many jurisdictions . . . that 'concurrent jurisdiction on the river' extends only to the water and floatable objects therein, not to bridges, dams or any other objects of a permanent nature." Roberts v. Fullerton, 93 N.W. 1111, 1112 (Wis. 1903)./ "The right to exercise concurrent jurisdiction over rivers forming state boundaries will be found discussed by Mr. Rorer in his work on Interstate Law." State v. Nielsen, 95 P. 720, 721 (Or. 1908).

Pendent jurisdiction = (in U.S.) exercise by federal courts of jurisdiction over matters falling under the purview of state law, on grounds that the state-law claims are so intertwined with the federal claims that they are best adjudicated in tandem. See jurisdiction.

concurrent negligence is an infrequent synonym of contributory negligence. For more on that term, see comparative negligence.

concurrent resolution = a legislative resolution that does not require the executive's signature and that does not ordinarily have the force of law, such as a measure to regulate Congress's internal affairs. E.g., "The Act was adopted as a temporary wartime measure, and provides . . . for its termination on June 30, 1943, unless sooner terminated by Presidential proclamation or concurrent resolution of Congress." Yakus v. U.S., 321 U.S. 414, 419–20 (1944). The phrase applies to many state legislatures as well—e.g.: "In March, 1873, the General Assembly of Missouri adopted a concurrent resolution reciting that grave doubts had arisen as to the constitutionality of the act of March 31st, 1868, just quoted." Woodson v. Murdock, 89 U.S. 351, 357 (1874).

concurrent sentences; consecutive sentences; cumulative sentences. These phrases are used in reference to more than one penal sentence assessed against a person. Concurrent sentences run simultaneously—i.e., the time served in prison is credited against two or more sentences. Consecutive sentences (known also as cumulative sentences) run one after the other—i.e., the prisoner begins serving the second sentence only after completely serving the first. E.g., "[L]egal usage shows that the phrase [cumulative sentences] denotes consecutive sentences, whether imposed under counts of the same indictment or under different indictments, as distinguished from concurrent sentences." Brosius v. Botkin, 114 F.2d 22, 23 n.2 (D.C. Cir. 1940). (For the sense of cumulative in corporate contexts, see the entry under that word.)

concussion; contusion. Concussion = (1) violent shaking; shock; or (2) injury to the head caused by a heavy blow. Contusion = a bruise; an injury resulting from a blow that does not break the skin.

condemn; contemn. To condemn, in one sense, is to render judgment against a person or thing <the court condemned the prisoner to life in prison>. E.g., "A criminal could not be condemned in his absence . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 121 (1966).

The word has mostly passed from legal usage into general usage in figurative senses <this looks condemn him>. E.g., "We would have serious doubts about this case if the encouragement of guilty pleas by offers of leniency substantially increased the likelihood that defendants, advised by competent counsel, would falsely condemn themselves."

In the U.S., condemn has the additional legal sense "to pronounce judicially (land, etc.) as converted or convertible to public use, subject to reasonable compensation. E.g., "To condemn land is to set it apart or expropriate it for public use." San Joaquin Land & Water Co. v. Belding, 35 P. 353, 356 (Cal. 1894)./ "A leasehold interest, of course, is a property interest and consequently may not be condemned for a public use without just compensation." In re Commonwealth, 447 A.2d 342, 344 (Pa. Commw. 1982).

To contemn is to hold in contempt, to despise. By far the rarer word, contemn is occasionally used in contexts of the legal sanction of contempt, q.v. More commonly, however, contemn is a literary word. In legal contexts, the related agent noun contemnor, q.v., is common. See contemn.

condemnation. See eminent domain & compulsory purchase.

condemnation money is not a familiar term to most modern lawyers, who would probably suppose it to mean "damages paid by an expropriator of land to the landowner for taking the property." In fact, at least one court has used the term in this way: "The heart of the controversy in this litigation is what disposition should be made of the condemnation moneys paid into the District Court by the United States as estimated just compensation for the taking of the Hotel Buckminster, the property of the debtor." John Hancock Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Casey, 141 F.2d 104, 107 (1st Cir. 1944).

But the phrase traditionally refers to something quite different: "damages that a losing party in a lawsuit is condemned to pay." E.g., "Since there was no judgment for plaintiff there was no 'condemnation money.'" Allen v. Hartford Accident & Indem. Co., 123 P.2d 252, 253 (Okla. 1942)./ "[T]he appellant will pay all condemnation money and costs [that] may be found against him." Maloney v. Johnson-McLean, 100 N.W. 423, 424 (Neb. 1904).

condemned, n., becomes awkward when used in the possessive. "I also believe that a ruling on a condemned's competency to waive federal collateral relief should not be cloaked by the hands-off deference of Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a)." The periphrastic possessive (of the condemned) is to be preferred where it is possible. Cf. accused, deceased & insured. See PLURALS (D) & POSSESSIVES (F).

condemnee, omitted from most English dictionaries, is an American legal NEOLOGISM meaning "one whose property is expropriated for public use or damaged by a public-works project." It dates from the late 19th century—e.g.: "Cases between a railroad company and a grantor or condemnee fall in the same class." Illinois Cent. R.R. v. Anderson, 73 Ill. App. 621, 627 (1898)./ "[T]he condemnee whose lands were flooded by the works was permitted to abandon in the appellate court the charge of negligence." State v. Dart, 202 P. 237, 239 (Ariz. 1921)./ "A tenant, therefore, is a condemnee . . . when its leasehold interest is taken, injured or destroyed." In re Commonwealth, 447 A.2d 342, 344 (Pa. Commw. 1982). See -EE.

condemner; condemnor. The -er spelling is preferred in the general sense of "one that disapproves." But in the U.S., -or predominates in the sense "a public or semipublic entity that expropriates private property for public use." E.g., "[T]he condemnor (i.e., the party condemning) need not wait for possession until the trial has been held." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 321 (1946; repr. 1950). See -ER (A).

condign = well-deserved. Today the word is generally restricted to forms of punishment, not of praise. To write of condign awards or laurels is to betray a deafness to modern idiom.

condition. A. And covenant. The distinction between these terms is especially important in the law of leases. A broken condition, which is a fundamental term of a lease, can be enforced by voiding the contract; a broken covenant, by contrast, merely entitles the wronged party to sue for relief, but the wronged party must continue to perform under the contract. See covenant & warranty (B).

Holmes defined condition as "an event, the happening of which authorizes the person in whose favor the condition is reserved to treat the contract as if it had not been made,—to avoid it, as is commonly said,—that is, to insist on both parties being restored to the position in which they stood before the contract was made." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 249 (1881; repr. 1963).

B. And limitation. A limitation specifies the time when an interest (such as a remainder, q.v.) vests—and how long it will last—whereas a condition cuts short the precedent estate and allows an entry for condition broken. See A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 199 n.2 (1961; repr. 1964). A condition benefits only the grantor, whereas a limitation may benefit a stranger.

conditional limitation is an ambiguous term in American property law, carrying either of two very different senses: (1) an executory interest such as an executory devise, springing use, or shifting use; or (2) a special limitation, i.e., conveyancing language that creates a determinable estate. See Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 190 (2d ed. 1988). See condition (B), special limitation & springing use.

conditional sales contract. See chattel mortgage.

conditioned that for on condition that is a loose usage that almost invariably leads to a MISPLACED MODIFIER (i.e., conditioned): "Defendant A.B. Co., Inc., as principal, and Big Insurance Co., as surety, obligate themselves to pay to Goode Bond, District Clerk, the sum of $1,000, conditioned that [on condition that] A.B. shall prosecute its appeal with effect and shall pay all costs." The phrase is analogous to provided that, q.v.

condition of repair is wordy for condition. E.g., "When the Texas Flag is in such a condition of repair [read condition] that it is no longer a suitable Emblem for display, it should be totally destroyed, preferably by burning, and that privately."

condition precedent; condition subsequent. A condition precedent is something that must occur before something else can occur. "The creditor's nonperformance of a condition precedent to the principal's duty discharges the surety." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 292 (1950).

A condition subsequent is something that, if it occurs, will bring something else to an end. See subsequent & POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

condole, v.i.; console, v.t. To condole is to express sympathy; one condoles with another on a loss. To console is to comfort (another), esp. in grief or depression.

condominium. Pl. -iums. A judge who used the correct plural once needlessly apologized: "To the purist who winces when Latin is misused, the plural of condominium is condominia." Hornstein v. Barry, 560 A.2d 530, 533 n.4 (D.C. App. 1989). But a stylist winces at condominia. See PLURALS (A) condonation; condonement; condonance. Condonation = the complete forgiveness and blotting out of a conjugal offense (even to the extent of surrendering all claim for damages against the adulterer), followed by cohabitation (Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, 4th ed.). E.g., "On any view, if the wife be right in her evidence, the intercourse which she had with her husband in the van in February 1966 amounted to condonation of the cruelty which she alleged." (Eng.) To a nonlawyer, the quoted sentence sounds bizarre (as if one condones cruelty by later giving in to sexual advances).

For the international-law sense of the word, see confederation.

The original sense of the word was much broader: "the pardoning or remission of an offense or fault; action toward the offender that implies his offense is passed over" (OED). E.g., "Every denunciation of existing law tends in some measure to increase the probability that there will be violation of it. Condonation of a breach enhances the probability." Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 376 (1927) (Brandeis, J., concurring). Today, in both AmE and BrE, the word is fairly rare—smacking of sesquipedality—and in law is usually confined to discussions of matrimonial offenses.

Condonance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Condonement is a technical term in certain card games.

conduce is often a better and shorter way of saying be conducive: "The people have an original right to establish such principles as shall most conduce to their own happiness."/ "Nothing conduces to brevity like the caving in of the knees" (Holmes, J., explaining his habit of writing opinions while standing). See BE-VERBS (B). conduit, a favorite legal metaphor, is pronounced /kon-doo-it/ in AmE, /kon-dit/ or /kan-dit/ in BrE.

confect = to prepare (something), usually from varied materials. It is a FORMAL WORD, unbefitting a mundane context in which it means merely "to draft": "The issue is whether summary judgment was appropriate where the language of the release in question was arguably ambiguous and there had been no discovery as to the intent of the parties in confecting [read drafting] the release."

confederacy. See combination.

confederate; conspirator. Whereas conspirator (= one engaged in a conspiracy) always carries negative connotations, confederate may be connotatively neutral. Its primary sense is "a person or state in league with another or others for mutual support or joint action; an ally" (OED). (See confederation.) But confederate also—primarily in legal contexts—has what the OED calls a "bad sense": "a person in league with another or others for an unlawful or evil purpose; an accomplice."

Sometimes the words are used interchangeably, as here, in an example of INELEGANT VARIATION: "A conspirator who had entered a plea of guilty and appeared as a witness against his two confederates, was convicted although a nolle prosequi was entered as to the others after two trials failed to reach a verdict." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 694 n.94 (3d ed. 1982) (using confederate for coconspirator).

confederation; federation; condominium; consociation; confiliation. These terms denote various constitutional arrangements for the distribution of political power within the borders of a nation-state. Each term denotes a different allocation or division of governmental functions between a central national government and regional governments or groups.

A confederation is a league or union of states, groups, or peoples—each of which retains some degree of sovereignty. The states, groups, or peoples may delegate their rights and powers to a central authority, but they do not delegate their sovereignty.

A federation is a similarly arranged system with a strong central authority and no regional sovereignties, though the individual states, groups, or peoples may retain rights of varying degrees.

The distinction between these two words is crucial but subtle. William Safire observes that, in 1789, the United States changed, in Northerners' minds, from a confederation to a federation. But to Southerners, the nation retained the characteristics of a confederation. Later, of course, in 1860, Southerners thought that the union could be dissolved. When the Southern states seceded, they chose the word confederation to describe their own grouping—though they did not put a right to secede in their own constitution, an ambiguity noted in the North. See William Safire, Confederacy Rises Again, N.Y. Times, 29 Sept. 1991, § 6, at 18.

A condominium is a joint sovereignty or joint rule by two or more states over a single territorial entity (e.g., the Anglo-Egyptian government of the Sudan, 1899–1955, or the New Hebrides, an Anglo-French colony until 1980).

A consociation is a political regime for power-sharing among competing groups within a given geographic area; it involves a coalition of political leaders from all segments of a pluralistic society. (The term consociation was coined by Arend Lijphart, the political scientist. See his two books, Power-Sharing in South Africa (1985) and Democracy in Plural Societies (1977).)

A confiliation preserves group rights within a nonfederal centralized state, members of each separate ethnic, religious, or linguistic group being afforded autonomy wherever they may be located within the state. For example, their laws of inheritance and marriage, as well as their school systems, are preserved against the operation of majority rule. See Albert P. Blaustein & Jay A. Sigler, "Confederation, Condominium, Consociation, Confiliation," in 3 The Guide to American Law 138–40 (1983) (these two authors having coined the term confiliation).

confer. In Latin, confer meant "to compare," whence the present meaning of the abbreviated form of compare, namely cf. The unabbreviated form confer no longer has this meaning; today it means (intransitively) "to come together to take counsel and exchange views" or (transitively) "to bestow, usually from a position of authority." In this latter sense, one confers something on, not in, another. E.g., "We cannot accept the proposition that appellant's acquiescence to Ilsa's desire to live with her mother conferred jurisdiction over appellant in [read on] the California courts in this action." See convey (B).

conferencee (= a conference participant) is a needless NEOLOGISM, a word that does further violence both to -EE and to conference, and an ugly bit of conference-goers' jargon. E.g., Conferencees [read Conferees] Strive to Define Goals of Professionalism, Dallas Bar Ass'n Headnotes, 15 Aug. 1991, at 4./ "Magnan obviously provided McClaskey and the rest of the conferencees [read conference-goers] with champagne service." Richard Rambeck, Larry Magnan: Staying at the Westin, Seattle Business, July 1989, at 1-8.

As the interpolations just above illustrate, either conference-goer or conferee, an Americanism dating from the late 18th century, suffices in place of conferencee.

conferencing. The OED records conference as a (rare) verb from 1846. The SOED and W3 omit it.

Though increasingly common among American lawyers, conferencing is a bloated NEEDLESS VARIANT of conferring. The word has also become rather widespread in the U.S. in the form teleconferencing, a favorite activity of some lawyers; it may survive in that MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY. See NOUNS AS VERBS.

conferment; conferral. Dictionaries suggest that the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT and that it ought to be treated as such. But caselaw suggests otherwise: in denoting the act of conferring, conferral appears in hundreds of federal cases—more than 20 times as often as conferment—and in hundreds of state cases—almost six times as often. Judicial usage, then, inclines dramatically toward conferral. E.g., "[A] distinct feature of our Nation's system of governance has been the conferral of political power upon public and municipal corporations for the management of matters of local concern." Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622, 638 (1980).

Conferment, on the other hand, appears almost twice as frequently in the popular press as conferral. E.g., "Over the years, Congress has tried to use the denial of MFN—or what might more accurately be called the conferment of LFN (least-favored-nation)—status as a stick to make countries behave." Strobe Talbott, America Abroad, Time, 3 Aug. 1992, at 53. And respected legal commentators use it—e.g.: "[T]he Acts prohibit the conferment on English courts of appellate jurisdiction over Scottish courts." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 60 (1983).

The question is a straightforward one: are we to model the noun after referral or deferment? Most linguistic questions like this one were settled hundreds of years ago, but confer is one of those verbs for which English speakers have less frequently needed a corresponding noun. Having both forms is wasteful and mildly confusing.

So the question ought to be settled—indeed, it is more important to settle the question than to settle it "correctly." I vote for the traditional form, here used by the U.S. Supreme Court: "The plaintiff here would force the Congress to choose between unconditional conferment of United States citizenship at birth and deferment of citizenship until a condition precedent is fulfilled." Rogers v. Bellei, 401 U.S. 815, 835 (1971).

confer(r)able. This word is spelled -rr- and is stressed on the second syllable.

conferral. See conferment.

confess (to). Generally, confessors confess crimes, charges, weaknesses, faults, and the like. Less commonly—though at least since the 18th century—confessors have confessed to these things. Euphony should govern the phrasing. In the following three examples, confess to sounds better than confess alone would have: "[D]id ever anybody seriously confess to envy?" Herman Melville, Billy Budd 39 (1891; repr. Signet ed. 1979)./ "I confess to never having attended a tractor pull . . . ." William Safire, Virile Women Target Tobacco Men, N.Y. Times, 11 March 1990, § 6, at 18./ "But worse, he was convicted even after the lead witness against him, Ivan F. Boesky, confessed to keeping millions of dollars in ill-gotten profits . . . ." Adding Insult to Injury, N.Y. Times, 15 July 1990, at 2F. Cf. admit to, for which see admit (A).

confessedly = (1) by general admission or acknowledgment; (2) by personal confession (OED). Follett too narrowly ruled that "the test of legitimacy for an adverb made from an adjective is that it fit the formula in [x] manner" (Modern American Usage 279 [1966]), a formula that confessedly does not fit. Follett's primary objection was to reportedly, q.v., the earliest recorded use of which was 1901. Confessedly has been used since at least 1640, however, and undeniably (or perhaps confessedly) is useful, especially in legal writing. Still, adverbs ending in -EDLY can be easily overworked.

Following are two typical—and unobjectionable—uses of confessedly: "As far as equitable rules differ from those of the law, they are confessedly more just and righteous, and their disappearance would be a long step backward in the progress of civilization."/ "No poll, no majority vote of the affected, no rule of expediency, and certainly no confessedly subjective or idiosyncratic view justifies a judicial determination." See -EDLY, allegedly & reportedly.

confession and avoidance = a pleading admitting the facts stated by the plaintiff but alleging other facts that destroy their legal effect, in whole or in part. Glanville Williams calls this the retort courteous and gives this example: "True, I negligently ran you down, but you were guilty of contributory negligence." Learning the Law 21 (11th ed. 1982).

confidant(e); confident, n. The forms confidant and confidante have an interesting history. Up to 1700 or so, the English word was confident (= a trusty friend or adherent), the correct French forms being confident and confidente. But early in the 18th century, English writers began substituting an -a- for the -e- in the final syllable, perhaps because of the French nasal pronunciation of -ent and -ente. Today the forms confidant and confidante predominate in both AmE and BrE, though confidante is falling into disuse because of what is increasingly thought to be a needless distinction between males and females. Despite the poor etymology, I confidently recommend using confidant for both sexes, as it is predominantly used in American caselaw. E.g., "[S]he testified . . . that she was a confidant of his." Spears v. State, 568 S.W.2d 492, 497 (Ark. 1978). See SEXISM (C).

confide in; confide to. The former phrase (= to trust or have faith in) is more common in general usage <to confide in one's friends>. Confide to (= to entrust [an object of care or a task], to communicate [something] in confidence) still commonly appears in legal prose. E.g., "Discretion was confided to the governing board."/ "The courts will not interfere with the exercise of discretion by school directors in matters confided by laws to their judgment."

confidence = (1) assured expectation; firm trust; (2) the entrusting of private matters; or (3) (under the Model Rules of Professional Conduct) information protected by the attorney-client privilege under local law.

Sense (2) has limited currency in general usage, as in the phrase to take another into one's confidence (i.e., to tell another private matters in trust). It is more generally used in law, as in this sentence from the Statute of Frauds, 29 Chas. II, c. 3 (1677), which illustrates a use of the word not uncommon today in legal prose: "And . . . from and after the said four and twentieth day of June all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party."

Sense (3) is almost unknown to nonlawyers, apart from the legally sophisticated. Even so, it occasionally appears in the press: "If Parliament does not legislate, judges will keep expanding the law of 'confidence' to stop embarrassing facts being disclosed." Economist, 28 Jan.–3 Feb. 1989, at 18.

confident, n. See confidant(e).

confide to. See confide in.

configuration. See constellation.

confiliation. See confederation.

confinee (= a person held in confinement), though it appears in RH2, is missing from most major English dictionaries, such as the OED and W3. Sometimes it looks suspiciously like a mere EUPHEMISM for prisoner—e.g.: "There's also plenty of recreational opportunities and commonly a rather sizable contingent of well-educated and formerly prominent confinees." Paul Galloway, Celebrity Cons Put Prisons on Guard, Chicago Tribune, 29 Oct. 1989, at 1C.

At other times, though, it performs the useful function of distinguishing between those confined for criminal offenses and those confined (perhaps temporarily) for other reasons—e.g.: "Thompson rejected a claim that Treatment Center patients were entitled to an annual review similar to the one afforded confinees under Chapter 123." Pearson v. Fair, 935 F.2d 401, 413 (1st Cir. 1991). See NEOLOGISMS confine(s). Modern usage mandates the plural when referring to boundaries or limits: "In the dark confine [read confines] of the cave there was just no method for saving lives."

confirmatory; confirmative. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. In the law of evidence, confirmatory is sometimes used as an equivalent of corroborative, q.v.

confirmer; confirmor. The general word for "one who confirms" is confirmer. The obsolescent legal term (meaning "one who confirms a voidable estate; the grantor in a deed of confirmation") is spelled -or. See -ER (A). confiscable; confiscatable. The latter is a malformed NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "Money is defined as confiscatable [read confiscable] contraband in the Inmate Handbook . . . ." Lowery v. Cuyler, 521 F. Supp. 430, 431 (E.D. Pa. 1981). See -ATABLE.

confiscatory is the adjectival form corresponding to the verb confiscate. It means "of the nature of, or tending to, confiscation" (OED). E.g., "The rate of return prescribed by the commission would have to be clearly confiscatory or outside the purview of the statute to permit judicial interference with the determination." Colloquially, it has been used in the sense "robbing under legal authority" <confiscatory landlords> (OED).

conflict, n., (= a lawyer's duty to a client whose interests prevent the lawyer from representing another client) is a slightly transmuted shortening of the phrase conflict of interest, q.v.

conflicted, adj., (= full of conflicting emotions) is psychological cant contributed to the English language by the 1980s. E.g., "Look who's 'conflicted' now: the psychiatrists." Pamela Sebastian, Psychiatrists Hold Mass Meeting as Oedipus Wrecks Mother's Day, Wall St. J., 11 May 1990, at B1./ "Much as seems to be the case in the Soviet Union now, the mid-1920's was a period of true flux, of mixed emotions, conflicted loyalties, wild uncertainties." Frank Rich, Life in Moscow After the Revolution, N.Y. Times, 11 May 1990, at B3./ "William Beard, . . . an adviser to the board of the Other Bar, admits he feels conflicted about not reporting illegal drug use by an attorney." Caroline V. Clarke, Management, Am. Law., March 1990, at 45.

conflict of interest. Today the phrase "ranges from being a euphemism for the result of outright bribery to describing a situation in which one subject to a duty takes a position inconsistent with that duty." John T. Noonan, Jr., Bribes 446 (1984).

conflict (out) = (v.i.) (of a lawyer) to be disqualified by virtue of a conflict between clients' interests; (v.t.) to disqualify (a lawyer) by virtue of a conflict among clients' interests. E.g., "His usual outside counsel . . . was conflicted out." William Horne, Inside Moves, Am. Lawyer, March 1990, at 37. See PHRASAL VERBS.

conflict of laws; choice of law. Graveson defines conflict of laws, sometimes more narrowly referred to as private international law, as "that branch of law [that] deals with cases in which some relevant fact has a connection with another system of law on either territorial or personal grounds, and may, on that account, raise a question as to the application of one's own or the appropriate alternative (usually foreign) law to the determination of the issue, or as to the exercise of jurisdiction by one's own or foreign courts." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 3 (7th ed. 1974).

Choice of law, a subset of conflict of laws, concerns the necessity that courts choose between differing substantive laws of interested states. See Robert A. Leflar, The Nature of Conflicts Law, 81 Colum. L. Rev. 1080 (1981).

conflicts (referring to the law of choice of law) is often used as a shortened form of conflict of laws. E.g., "The late Brainerd Currie spearheaded the drive to focus attention on the often overlooked key to intelligent conflicts analysis—the policies underlying the laws of different states in putative conflict."

conflictual (= of, relating to, or characterized by conflict) is documented in the OED from 1961. E.g., "As to the conflictual state of Alabama law arising out of Lee v. State, Brasher v. State, and Durham v. State, I consider that Brasher is the paramount authority on the narrow point therein decided . . . ." Kilpatrick v. State, 285 So. 2d 516, 524–25 (Ala. Crim. App. 1973) (Cates, P.J., concurring).

A California court has ill-advisedly flagged with a "[sic]" a psychiatrist's use of the word. See Shapira v. Superior Court, 224 Cal. App. 3d 1249, 1252 (1990): "[T]he diagnosis of organic encephalopathy is . . . inherently conflictual [sic] with numerous other aspects of this patient's situation."

Scholars writing in the field of conflict of laws have adopted the word in a more limited sense—e.g.: "The conflictual aspects of flight obviously arise only in those situations in which some relevant fact has a geographical connection with a foreign country." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 585 (7th ed. 1974).

confluence; conflux. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT conform takes the preposition to or with. Fowler objected to conform with, but most authorities find it quite acceptable. E.g., "Libya said the investigations conformed with international law and did not violate its sovereignty." Paul Lewis, Libya Offers Some Cooperation in Plane Bombings, N.Y. Times, 15 Feb. 1992, at A5.

conformable; conformably. These terms are today used almost exclusively in legal contexts. Conformable = according in form or character to. E.g., "The Court of Appeal altered its own order as not being conformable to the order pronounced." (Eng.)

Conformably to = in conformity with; in a manner conformable to. E.g., "Conformably to what has been said above, we are of opinion that the testatrix did not contemplate that the words 'contracts or debts' should apply to those natural obligations which a husband owes to his wife."/ "[I]f both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 178 (1803) (per Marshall, C.J.). The rarer phrase conformably with = in accordance with.

conformity; conformance. Conformity is the standard term, conformance being a NEEDLESS VARIANT that is not uncommon in legal prose. E.g., "I consider the disclosure not to be in conformance [read conformity] with section 171."/ "This holding is in conformance [read conformity] with the statute as well as with the federal regulations."

Like its corresponding verb, conformity takes either to or with: "Conformity to state procedure in actions at law . . . was reaffirmed in a permanent statute adopted in 1792." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 400 (4th ed. 1983)./ "The judge's discretion is not unbridled but is . . . to be exercised in conformity with the standards governing the judicial office." Id. at 629.

confront for present is now almost a VOGUE WORD among American judges. It is essentially hyperbolic, suggesting that the court comes "face to face with" the issues it decides. E.g., "This case confronts us with the question whether [read presents the question whether] a nonresident plaintiff asserting a cause of action based on a tort that occurred outside the state is exempt from these qualification requirements."/ "The court here confronts [read addresses or decides] issues no less difficult than those discussed in the court's recent opinion concerning the layoffs of firefighters."/ "When confronted [read presented] with a statute that is plain and unambiguous on its face, we ordinarily do not look to the legislative history as a guide to its meaning." In this last example confront is especially inappropriate because it connotes grappling or resistance, and an unambiguous statute gives no trouble to the interpreter.

confuror. See conjuror.

confusable; confusible. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

congeries is a singular noun. Congery and congerie are false singular nouns formed on the mistaken assumption that congeries (Fr. "a collection, aggregation") is the plural of such a noun. All forms but congeries, sing. & pl., should be avoided. E.g., "The analytic bent of most of those now so engaged leads them to reduce 'person' to a congerie [read congeries] of 'rights' . . . ." John T. Noonan, Jr., Persons and Masks of the Law xi–xii (1976).

The word is pronounced /kon-jə-reez/ in AmE, and /kən-jeer-eez/ or /kən-jeer-y-eez/ in BrE.

congratulatory; congratulative; congratulant. Congratulatory is the usual word. The other forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

Congress does not require an article. "The Congress [read Congress] has said that interest 'shall be calculated from the date of the entry of the judgment.'" Affiliated Capital Corp. v. City of Houston, 793 F.2d 706, 713 (5th Cir. 1986) (Higginbotham, J., concurring). The Congress is a quirk to be avoided.

The possessive form is Congress's.

congressional, like constitutional and federal, should be written with the lowercase -c-, even though the noun corresponding to the adjective is capitalized. See constitutional.

Congressperson is unnecessary for representative, congressional representative, Congressman, or Congresswoman. See SEXISM (B). congruent; congruous. These words are largely synonymous in meaning "in agreement or harmony; appropriate." Distinctions in use are possible, however. Congruous is the more widely used term, meaning "appropriate, fitting; marked by harmonious agreement." The negative form incongruous appears even more frequently than the positive form.

Congruent has legitimate uses in math and physics, and is also prevalent in the sense "coincident throughout; in accordance with." E.g., "The court has established procedures and standards for the admissibility of co-conspirator statements congruent with the Federal Rules of Evidence."

The corresponding nouns are congruence and congruity. Congruency is a NEEDLESS VARIANT conjoin generally provides no nuance not included in join or combine. E.g., "The lower court rejected appellant's contention that the terms of the will and the circumstances surrounding testatrix when it was executed conjoined [read joined or combined] to reflect an intention to exercise the power of appointment."

W10 defines conjoin as "to join together for a common purpose." Join together is, of course, a venial REDUNDANCY, just as conjoin is something of a one-word redundancy. But these phrases do slightly shade join. Perhaps on rare occasions when the precise nuance suggested by the W10 definition is desired, conjoin is the proper word.

conjurator. See conjurer.

conjure. In the sense "to supplicate, beseech," this verb is accented on the second syllable /kən-joor/; in the sense "to play the sorcerer," the first syllable is stressed /kon-jər/.

conjurer; conjuror; conjurator. Conjurator is an obsolete LEGALISM meaning "one joined with others by an oath; a co-conspirator." Conjurer is the preferred spelling for the word meaning "a magician; juggler."

connectible; connectable. The former is preferred. See -ABLE (A). connection; connexion; connexity. The spelling -tion is preferred in AmE; -xion is an almost obsolete spelling formerly preferred in BrE. The word means basically (1) "the act of connecting" <the connection of these loose ends>; (2) "the state of being connected" <the connection of these events>; or (3) "a connecting part" <the bridge's connection with the land>.

Lawyers use connexity in a distinct way, synonymously with connectedness (= the quality of being connected). E.g., "The more likely the public is to make an assumption of connexity between the providers of related services, the less similarity in the trademarks is needed for a finding that confusion is likely."

connection with, in. See in connection with.

connect together is a common REDUNDANCY. If the intended sense is "to connect with one another," interconnect is the appropriate word: E.g.,"A transaction is a group of facts so connected together [read interconnected] as to be referred to as a legal name, as a crime, as a contract, a wrong, or any other subject of inquiry that may be in issue." (Eng.) See together.

connexity. See connection.

connivance [fr. L. connivere to blink, wink at] is not, as popularly supposed, "conspiracy to act together for an illegal end," although it is a form of collusion. Connivance is passively allowing another to act illegally or immorally—silence and neglect when one should be vocal and monitory.

In England, connivance is usually confined to marital settings; the CDL defines it as "behaviour of a person designed to cause his or her spouse to commit a matrimonial offence." Cf. Stroud's Judicial Dictionary (4th ed.) ("the willing consent to a conjugal offence [in the sense of being an accessory before the fact], or a culpable acquiescence in a course of conduct reasonably likely to lead to the offence being committed").

connive = (1) to avoid noticing something that one should oppose or condemn; (2) to conspire or cooperate secretly. Sense (2) is loose, sense (1) being the original and the better one, as here illustrated: "An instance occurred in England during the last war, when a woman killed her newly born child and her own mother connived at the act." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 29 (1957; repr. 1972)./ "It is often the same citizen who originally supports the passage of such laws who later connives at their violation." Lon L. Fuller, The Anatomy of the Law 41 (1968).

connotate. See connote.

connotation does not mean "ramification" or "suggestion," as in these two statements by President Carter: "The political connotations [of the release of the American hostages in Iran] do not concern me."/ "Secretary of State Vance did not want any action with any connotation of military action." In the latter sentence, the word is used in the sense of "suggestion," which is close to a correct usage. But words connote; actions do not.

Connotations are the emotive nuances of words, including tone, flavor, and associational senses. Here the term is correctly used: "If, therefore, the title of this article suggests a merely philosophical inquiry into the nature of law and legal relations, the writer may be pardoned for repudiating such a connotation in advance."/ "Some authorities suggest that 'issue,' unlike 'children,' has a biological connotation."

Sometimes connotation has been confused with denotation (= the literal meaning of a term). E.g., "'Contest of a will' is a term of art, the connotation [read meaning] of which is made clear in the context of the appropriate Probate Code sections." See the two entries following.

CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION. Those sensitive to language understand not just the dictionary definitions of words and sentences (denotation), but the undercurrent of suggestions and implications that inheres in all language (connotation). This sensitivity is no less important to the judge interpreting a statute than it is to the literary critic. In a will, for example, connotations may be the real clues to the testator's intent where the literal meanings of words provide no clues.

But connotative sensitivity is also what informs great writing. When complimenting Lord Esher's style, Cardozo appreciated the effect of connotation: "What a cobweb of fine-spun casuistry is dissipated in a breath by the simple statement of Lord Esher in Ex parte Simonds, that the court will not suffer its own officer 'to do a shabby thing.' If the word shabby had been left out, and unworthy or dishonorable substituted, I suppose the sense would have been much the same. But what a drop in emotional value would have followed. As it is, we feel the tingle of the hot blood of resentment mounting to our cheeks." Benjamin N. Cardozo, Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 471, 480 (1939).

connote; denote. Connote = to imply in addition to the literal meaning; denote = to signify the literal meaning, to indicate. Denote is rarely if ever misused; connote, however, is becoming rarer by the day in its correct senses, here illustrated: "The essential characteristics of an estate, then, are three in number: first, an estate is always an interest in land; second, an estate is always an interest that is, will, or may become possessory; and third, the term always connotes ownership measured in terms of duration."

How is connote misused? It is frequently confused with denote, just as literally is often misused for figuratively. E.g., "The tendency of judges to adhere to concepts and doctrines familiar to past ages is hardly anywhere more evident than it is in the law relating to the relationships connoted [read denoted] by such terms as 'leasehold,' 'landlord,' and 'tenant.'"/ "'Cannot' connotes [read denotes], not unwillingness, but inability."/ "A plea is invalid if the defendant has not a full understanding of what the plea connotes [read means]."

Moreover, words connote, not acts: "The mere act of sending a child to California to live with her mother is not a commercial act and connotes [read suggests] no intent to obtain a corresponding benefit in the State." Nor do readers connote: "While we are accustomed to connote [read think of] the same ideas in morals and ethics, and while to a considerable extent the two words involve the same general notion, yet they are distinct in that morality represents existing facts, while ethics is the scientific hypothesis for the explanation of existing facts." See connotation.

In the following sentence, connote is used in the sense "to suggest; to lead to the conclusion of." With this example one can see just how mushy this word has become: "If such testimony must necessarily connote [read lead to the conclusion of] adultery on her part, then it cannot be said that the common law has otherwise closed its eyes to this fact of life." (The ANTHROPOMORPHISM in this sentence is unobtrusive and even effective.)

consanguineous; consanguineal; consanguinean; consanguine. The preferred legal adjective corresponding to consanguinity is consanguineous (= descended from the same parent or ancestor). E.g., "English judges . . . interpreted it as a general prohibition against the succession of the half-blood, and extended it to consanguineous brothers, that is to sons of the same father by different wives." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 125–26 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). Consanguineous is opposed to affinal. See affinity.

Consanguinean is the Roman law term meaning "having the same father." It is opposed to uterine (= having the same mother).

Consanguine and consanguineal have been taken up by anthropologists and linguists and given DIFFERENTIATION Thus consanguine = based on an extended group of blood relations esp. of unilinear descent and constituting the functional familial unit in a society (W3). Consanguineal, which shares this sense, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of consanguine.

consanguinity (= relationship by blood) is a lay as well as a legal term. Here is a classical legal use: "Neither of these two women was related to the testator either by marriage [i.e., by affinity] or by consanguinity, while the contestant was his nephew and his only heir at law." Degrees of consanguinity are determined differently by the various legal systems of the world.

Often consanguinity is used figuratively: "There is apparently no intimate consanguinity between the case sub judice and the proceeding that pends in an alien jurisdiction." Relation might be better than such bombastic uses of consanguinity, however. See affinity & kindred. See also degree.

conscience, v.t., has not been recorded in most dictionaries, but legal writers occasionally use it as if it were equivalent to contemplate: "The rule does not conscience [read contemplate] joinder."/ "The Fourteenth Amendment does not conscience [read allow or contemplate] discretion in such matters." Workman v. Cardwell, 338 F. Supp. 893, 901 (N.D. Ohio 1972). The only related use recorded in the OED is conscienced (= having a conscience) . For another use of conscience, see Keeper of the King's Conscience.

conscionable is not a mere NEEDLESS VARIANT of conscientious, though some dictionaries suggest it. As a positive correlative of unconscionable, it means "conforming with good conscience; just and reasonable" and is used of things as opposed to persons . E.g., "[I]mplied warranties may be limited in duration . . . if such limitation is conscionable." 15 U.S.C. § 2308(b) (1988). See unconscionable.

consecutive sentences. See concurrent sentences.

consensual; consentaneous; consentient. Consensual, the most common of these terms, means "having or expressing or made with consent." Consentaneous and consentient are both used in that sense, as well as two others: (1) "unanimous," or (2) "agreeing." When used for consensual, either of the other two words is a NEEDLESS VARIANT; when used in the other two senses, each is easily simplified—as the defining words above suggest.

consensus = a widely held opinion or generally accepted view. Hence two common phrases, consensus of opinion and general consensus, are prolix. E.g., "There was a general consensus [omit general] that to drink whisky is wrong and that to be a nurse is discreditable." In the following sentence, we are accosted by a double REDUNDANCY: "The general consensus of opinion [omit general and of opinion] seems to be that the gist and foundation of the right in all cases is the wrongful act."

Because consensus refers to the collective unanimous opinion of several people, a consensus of two is impossible: "An acceptance of an offer made ought to be notified to the person who makes the offer, in order that the two minds may come together; unless this is done, the two minds may be apart, and there is not that consensus [read agreement] which is necessary to the English law to make a contract."

Consensus is unrelated to census; confusion between the two causes some writers to lapse into the misspelling concensus—a form that has appeared several hundred times in American law reports.

consensus ad idem. See meeting of the minds & ad idem.

consent for concede is an odd error—e.g.: "He consented [read conceded] that he might also have had other reasons for buying the car." See assent.

consentaneous. See consensual.

consent decree (AmE) = agreed verdict (BrE).

consentient. See consensual.

consequent. A. And consequential. Consequent = following as a result. Consequential, a rarer and usually legal term, means "following as an indirect or secondary result" <consequential damages>. In its other proper sense, consequential may serve as an opposite of inconsequential, and hence mean "important," and occasionally "self-important." In the following sentence it means "important; of consequence," a sense prematurely labeled obsolete by the OED: "A few months' further delay pending determination on the governing issue in the District of Columbia litigation cannot be seriously consequential."

In all other senses, consequent is the correct term where the choice is between the shorter and longer forms. E.g., "The evidence tended to show that the plaintiff was very much excited, and that the happening of the accident and the consequent injury to the casket and the body occasioned her serious mental pain and suffering."/ "The registrar transferred the application to the Divorce Registry so that it might be heard in London; consequent upon that direction, the application came before Mr. Registrar Kenworthy." (Eng.)

B. And subsequent. Frequently, consequent is misused for subsequent (= later), perhaps partly because of the logical fallacy post hoc ergo propter hoc (= after this, therefore because of this), which snares persons who equate sequence with causation, thinking that if one event occurred after another, the second event must have been caused by the first. See subsequently (B).

consequentials, n., = consequential damages. E.g., "Had the parties excluded consequentials by contract, the court would have had to identify the value differential [q.v.] component of the buyer's total loss." This lawyers' colloquialism should be discouraged in formal legal writing. Cf. incidentals & exemplaries.

consequently. See consequent (A) & subsequently (B).

conserva(n)cy. The preferred spelling of this essentially BrE word is conservancy (= a commission or court having jurisdiction over a port or river, to regulate the fisheries, navigation, etc. [OED]). In all other senses, conservancy is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of conservation.

conservational; conservative; conservatory. These words are to be distinguished. Conservational = of or pertaining to conservation. Conservative = characterized by a tendency to preserve or keep intact or unchanged; believing in the maintenance of existing political and social institutions. Conservatory = preservative.

conservator; curator. Both are general as well as specific legal terms. Conservator is often used in the sense "a court-appointed guardian of an incompetent" <the conservator shall have the charge of the incapable person>. Primarily a civil-law term (used, e.g., in Scotland), curator has an identical meaning; this term has been adopted in a number of common-law jurisdictions, however, as in several American states.

conservatory, adj. See conservational.

consider (as) (to be). When followed by a noun, a noun phrase, or an adjective, consider as is never justified stylistically; many authorities consider it an error. "Such conduct has long been considered as solicitation [read considered solicitation]." "Furthermore, the grand jury is considered as [read considered] unnecessary, particularly in England, where the preliminary examination is considered sufficient." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 110 (1963).

Consider may, however, properly be followed by the infinitive to be, especially if the noun phrase after consider is at all long. "Ignoring our many precedents to the contrary, he considers the tax code, and especially that portion implementing the personal income tax, to be unconstitutional."/ "Prescott drove in his own car from Chelsea to Boston by way of the Mystic River Bridge, which he considered was [read considered to be; or delete was and omit to be] the most direct route."

The collocation of consider and as is acceptable when the phrase is followed by a participial phrase: "He is not considered as abandoning his objection because he does not submit to further proceedings without contest."

considerable used adverbially is a dialectal usage. "Bylaws usually may be amended with considerable [read considerably] more facility than the articles of incorporation."

consideration. A. Legal Sense. The law uses consideration in a technical sense generally unknown to nonlawyers: "the act, forbearance, or promise by which one party to a contract buys the promise of the other." Generally, a contractual promise is not binding unless it is supported by consideration (or made in a deed). This proposition has, since the 19th century, been known as the doctrine of consideration.

This word is one of the lawyer's basic TERMS OF ART, but even lawyers sometimes misconceive the word: "One must be careful not to think of 'consideration' as if it was synonymous with 'recompense'; rather the word [at common law] connoted some sound reason for the conveyance, and the payment of money by the feoffee was only one possible reason." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 167 (1961; repr. 1964).

B. As a Count Noun. In law, by virtue of the technical meaning explained under (A), consideration may be a COUNT NOUN whereas in general English usage it is not so used. E.g., "A basic principle of contract law is that one consideration will support multiple promises by the other contracting party." Nevertheless, the phrase other valuable consideration is used rather than other valuable considerations.

C. Idiomatic Constructions. Legal idiom requires in consideration of but as consideration for, in the sense of the word given under (A).

D. Valuable consideration and good consideration. The former phrase refers to an act, forbearance, or promise having some economic value; the latter refers to natural love or affection, or moral duty. To create an enforceable contract, valuable consideration is required. Good consideration is no good.

Still, deeds customarily recite a consideration of $1 or $10, plus other good and valuable consideration so as to obscure the true price. The DOUBLET is unnecessary, however, as other valuable consideration suffices. See and other good and valuable consideration.

E. Nominal consideration and inadequate consideration. See nominal consideration.

F. In consideration of the mutual covenants . . . . See in consideration of the mutual covenants herein contained.

G. In consideration of the premises. See in consideration of the premises.

H. Past consideration. This phrase, meaning "an act done or a promise given by a promisee before the making of a promise sought to be enforced," is an OXYMORON of sorts. For past consideration is no consideration, since it has not been given in exchange for the promise sought to be enforced.

consignatary; consignatory. For this civil-law term equivalent to consignee, Black's gives -tory, and W3 and OED give -tary. The OED lists consignatory only as a variant of cosignatory (= a joint signatory). Historical civilian usage seems to recommend consignatary.

consignation. See consignment.

consignee (= one to whom goods are consigned) is pronounced /kon-si-nee/ or /kon-si-nee/. Cf. consignor.

consigner. See consignor.

consignment; consignation. These words denote quite different things, though the root concept is the same. Consignment is the more usual term in common-law jurisdictions, meaning "the act of delivering goods to a carrier to be transmitted to a designated agent." Consignation, primarily a term from Scots and French law, means "the act of formally paying over money, as into a bank, or to a person legally appointed to receive it, often because it is the subject of a dispute."

consignor; consigner. Consignor is the technical correlative of consignee, q.v. A consignor dispatches goods to another in consignment. In Scots law, a consigner is one who makes a consignation of money in dispute. The two words are often pronounced differently: consignor /kon-si-nohr/ or /kən-sI-nohr/; consigner /kən-sI-nər/.

consistence is a NEEDLESS VARIANT for consistency. E.g., "[Two judges] voted to affirm the rule on institutional considerations, feeling that judicial consistence [read consistency] on these attachments was more important than the correctness of the attachment procedure itself." Podolsky v. Devinney, 281 F. Supp. 488, 492 n.7 (S.D.N.Y. 1968).

consistent with. A. Wrongly Made Adverbial. A common illiteracy in American law is to use this phrase adverbially rather than adjectivally. For adverbial uses, consistently with (= in a manner consistent with) is the correct phrase. In the following sentence, the first use is adverbial, whereas the second is (properly) adjectival: "Thereafter, all medical facilities will be equipped consistent with [read consistently with] these standards and all new construction of health care facilities will be consistent with the standards."

B. And not inconsistent with. When the U.S. Supreme Court reverses and remands a judgment of a federal court of appeals, it directs that the further proceedings be consistent with the Court's opinion. But when it reverses and remands a state-court judgment, it directs that the further proceedings be not inconsistent with the Court's opinion.

Why the difference? Because consistent with shows that the Court retains plenary power over the lower federal court. Not inconsistent with, by contrast, shows that the state court is much more independent to fashion its holdings on substantive law.

consist in; consist of. American writers too often ignore the distinction. Consist of is used in reference to materials; it precedes the physical elements that compose a tangible thing; cement, for example, consists of alumina, lime, silica, iron oxide, and magnesia. E.g., "The document admitted to probate consists of a single sheet of legal cap paper, folded in the middle in the usual way along the short dimension, making four pages of equal size."

Consist in (= has as its essence) precedes abstract elements or qualities, or intangible things, e.g., a good moral character consists in integrity, decency, fairness, and compassion. The proper use of consist in is illustrated in the following sentences: "And those who argue that the progress of civilization consists in raising our standards of conduct, even though that means increasing the number of criminals, are blandly begging the question." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 45 (1961)./ "The cruelty that consists in beating is unmistakable." Max Radin, The Law and You 62 (1962).

In the sentences that follow, consist of is wrongly used for consist in; the mistake is especially common in AmE: "The alleged negligence consisted of [read in] the act of a hospital nurse in injecting a foreign substance into plaintiff's left arm, causing pain and permanent injury."/ "In understanding any major political move, it is a mistake to focus only on the move itself. Understanding depends upon seeing all of the interrelations; the art of politics consists of [read in] using those interrelations."/ "Where the plaintiff's contributory negligence consists of [read in] being inattentive, and not discovering a risk he should have discovered, he will not be barred from strict liability recovery."

The opposite mistake—using consist in for consist of—is rare but does occur: "Typically [the bill of complaint in equity] consisted in [read consisted of] three parts: the narrative, the charging, and the interrogative parts." Fleming James, Civil Procedure § 2.4, at 64 (1965).

consociation. See confederation.

console. See condole.

consolidating statute; codifying statute. A consolidating statute collects the legislative provisions on a particular topic and embodies them in a single statute, often with minor amendments and drafting improvements. A codifying statute, by contrast, purports to be exhaustive in restating the whole of the law on a particular topic, including prior caselaw as well as legislative provisions. Courts generally presume that a consolidating statute leaves prior caselaw intact, whereas a codifying statute generally supersedes prior caselaw.

consolidation. See code, joinder (B) & merger (A).

consols (= [BrE] funded government securities with no maturity date) is invariably in the plural form, because it originated as an abbreviation for consolidated annuities. E.g., "In Standing v. Bouring, consols were transferred from the plaintiff's name into the joint names of herself and her godson, a person to whom, it was held, she was not in loco parentis." (Eng.) See consul.

consortium; society. In the phrases loss of consortium and loss of society, the two words are synonymous in the context of husband and wife. Society, however, is a broader term, describing other than marital relationships, such as father-child and brother-sister. Thus generally only a spouse may sue for loss of consortium (L. "partnership"—related to consort), whereas any close relation may sue for loss of society. Both terms refer to the nonpecuniary interests a person may have in the company, cooperation, affection, and aid of another. See society.

In England, where only a husband could sue for loss of consortium, the cause of action was abolished as a cause of action by the Administration of Justice Act of 1982. Consortium is pronounced /kon-sor-shi-əm/ or, more usually, in BrE, /kon-sor-di-əm/. The plural is -tia.

conspectus; prospectus. These terms are not synonymous. A conspectus is a comprehensive survey, summary, or synopsis. A prospectus is a document describing the chief features of something that is forthcoming.

conspiracy. See combination.

conspirative; conspirational. See conspiratorial.

conspirator (= one engaged in a conspiracy) finds a NEEDLESS VARIANT in conspiratorialist—e.g.: "He ordered Christic and its chief conspiratorialist [read conspirator], Daniel Sheehan, to pay $1 million toward the defendants' legal bills." L. Gordon Crovitz, Lawyers Make Frivolous Arguments at Their Own Risk, Wall St. J., 20 June 1990, at A17. Cf. confederate.

conspiratorial; conspirative; conspiratory; conspirational. The first is standard; the others are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

conspire together is a common REDUNDANCY. "The defendants conspired together [omit together] with persons unknown to import cannabis resin." (Eng.)/ "The defendants have conspired together [omit together] to conceal their tortious and fraudulent conduct." See together.

constellation, like configuration, is often used figuratively to describe a specific group of facts in a case. E.g., "The contrary is likely to be true if both parties have moved for summary judgment on different legal theories dependent on different constellations of material facts."

constitute is often an overblown substitute for make. And it is an ARCHAISM to give constitute, like make, a direct object followed by an objective complement. E.g., "No particular words, technical or otherwise, or form of expression in an instrument are necessary to constitute [read make] it a lease."/ "I deem it unnecessary to consider whether such an interest would constitute [read make] her a legal representative of J.P. Robertson after his death, as I do not believe she ever acquired such an interest."

To use constitute in the sense "to make up, compose" is more in accord with modern usage. E.g., "This system of classification is employed for convenience in describing the effect upon the operation of provisions in the will caused by changes in property constituting the estate after the will is executed." See compose (C).

constitution. The sense referring to a selection or collection of fundamental principles was not usual until the time of the American and French Revolutions. Only since the Americans declared in 1787—"We the people of the United States . . . do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America"—did the practice of having a written document containing the principles of governmental organization become established. At the same time, constitution took on what is now its most common meaning. See Kenneth C. Wheare, Modern Constitutions 3 (2d ed. 1966). Originally, the Latin word consitutiones referred to the law-making utterances of the Roman emperors, esp. as collected and abridged in the Theodosian and earlier codes.

When referring to the U.S. Constitution, writers customarily capitalize the word Constitution whether or not the word appears with the qualifying place name (U.S.).

constitutional should not generally be capitalized, though Constitution (in reference to the U.S. Constitution or any particular constitution) should be. Cf. congressional & federal.

The adjective has two meanings: (1) "of or relating to the Constitution" <constitutional rights>; and (2) "proper under the Constitution" <constitutional actions>. Thus sense (1): "The diversion of a job to a competitor is not an invasion of a constitutional right." And sense (2): "The Wisconsin statute, which is similar to the Norris-LaGuardia Act, has also been held constitutional." The opposite of constitutional in sense (1) is nonconstitutional, and in sense (2) unconstitutional. See nonconstitutional.

constitutionalism = (1) a constitutional system of government; or (2) adherence to constitutional principles. Sense (2) is now more common—e.g.: "Whatever one may think of Robert Bork's brand of constitutionalism, his willingness to defend that vision openly and forthrightly was admirable." Stephen Macedo, Stricter Senate Review, N.Y. Times, 23 Oct. 1991, at A11.

constitution(al)ist. The standard form of the term is constitutionalist (= [1] one who studies or writes on the Constitution; or [2] a supporter of constitutional principles).

constitutionality (= the quality or state of being constitutional) was originally an Americanism (dating from 1801 in the OED), but it is now common in BrE as well.

constitutionalize = (1) to provide with a constitution <to constitutionalize the new government>; (2) to make constitutional; to bring into line with the Constitution <plans to constitutionalize the currently segregated school district>; or (3) to import the Constitution into <the dissenter accused the majority of unnecessarily constitutionalizing its decision>. Senses (2) and (3) are relatively new and are unrecorded in the OED and W3. Here is an example of sense (3): "New York Times v. Sullivan was the first major step in what proved to be a seemingly irreversible process of constitutionalizing the entire law of libel and slander."

The (ungainly) noun is constitutionalization—e.g.: "I want to . . . discuss the constitutionalization of common law since 1937." Erwin Chemerinsky, The Constitution and the Common Law, 73 Judicature 149, 150 (1989).

constitutional law = body of law spawned by Marbury v. Madison, which declared the judiciary's power to construe the Constitution. Rodell explained it as "the cumulative efforts of the Supreme Court to explain, justify, or excuse the restrictions it lays down." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 48 (1939; repr. 1980). An infrequent synonym is fundamental law.

constitutionally has at least four senses in legal contexts: (1) "in a constitutional manner; in a way that comports with the Constitution" <constitutionally assembled> <constitutionally enacted>; (2) "under the provisions of the Constitution" <constitutionally deficient> <constitutionally impermissible>; (3) "so as to bear on the Constitution" <constitutionally speaking>; (4) "by the Constitution" <constitutionally prohibited>. Sense (1) is the only legal sense given by the OED and W3.

constrain = (1) to force; or (2) to confine forcibly. Sense (1) is the more common of the two. It is a favorite word of dissenting judges: "It is for such reasons that I am constrained to dissent."/ "I regret that I am constrained to dissent from the holding of the court in this case." Sense (2) is primarily literary.

construct for construe occurs frequently when nonlawyers write about legal subjects—e.g.: "In his historical interpretation of the Supreme Court's role in constructing [read construing] the United States Constitution, the late Robert G. McCloskey divided constitutional law into three periods . . . ." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle vii–viii (1988). See construction.

construction is the noun form of both construct and construe, in law usually the latter. A nonlawyer might think that construction of statutes is the business of legislatures, since they construct (i.e., build) statutes; but construction in that phrase means "the process of construing," which is the business of the courts. See interpretation.

The phrase construction of law means something slightly different—the "construing" of a statute to cover what it does not explicitly mention.

construction lien. See mechanic's lien.

constructive; constructional. These terms are not to be confused. Constructive is given a meaning in law that is unknown elsewhere; it "denotes that an act, statement, or other fact has an effect in law though it may not have had that effect in fact" (OCL). Thus we have the phrases constructive fraud and constructive trust (qq.v.) and other phrases describing legal FICTIONS. See actual.

Constructional = of or pertaining to the act or process of construing. E.g., "When the taker of a prior interest is one of several heirs of the designated ancestor at the ancestor's death, no constructional tendency is sufficiently definite to be capable of statement."/ "The constructional problem is complicated by a so-called rule of repugnancy." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 31 (2d ed. 1988).

constructive fraud; legal fraud. The former is the more common phrase denoting forms of unintentional deception or misrepresentation that are held to be fraudulent. It is also clearer: legal fraud might suggest to the unwary that the fraud is, e.g., presumed or sanctioned by law, rather than that it is considered in law to be fraud. For the difference between fraud in law and legal fraud, see fraud (C).

constructive seisin. See seisin (A).

constructive trust. A. Synonyms. The phrase constructive trust (= a trust that the law creates against one who has obtained property by wrongdoing) has various equivalents—trust de son tort, trust ex maleficio, involuntary trust, trust ex delicto—none of which is as common. Though the other phrases may have some advantages over the confusing phrase constructive trustee (see (B)), that term is so common that the others merit being labeled NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

B. And express trust. Properly speaking, constructive trust and express trust are not really antonyms because they exist on different verbal planes. As the Restatement of Restitution § 160, comment a at 641 (1937), explains: "The term constructive trust is not altogether a felicitous one. It might be thought to suggest the idea that it is a fiduciary relation similar to an express trust, whereas it is in fact something quite different . . . . A constructive trust does not, like an express trust, arise because of a manifestation of an intention to create it, but it is imposed as a remedy to prevent unjust enrichment. A constructive trust, unlike an express trust, is not a fiduciary relation, although the circumstances [that] give rise to a constructive trust may or may not involve a fiduciary relation."

C. And resulting trust. The phrase constructive trust is likewise distinguishable from a resulting trust (= a trust imposed by law when someone transfers property under circumstances suggesting that he or she did not intend the transferee to have the beneficial interest in the property). A resulting trust, then, arises because of the transferor's intention, while the law imposes a constructive trust to prevent the wrongful holder of property from being unjustly enriched. The resulting trustee is a genuine trustee—in a fiduciary relation to the beneficiary—while the constructive trustee has no such fiduciary relation.

construe (= to explain or interpret for legal purposes) applies happily to statutes, rules, and the like—but not to doctrines, as here: "Because it impedes full and free discovery of the truth, the attorney–client privilege is strictly construed [read applied]." Weil v. Investment / Indicators Research & Management, Inc., 647 F.2d 18, 24 (9th Cir. 1981).

For another mistaken usage, see construct.

construe, strictly. See strict construction.

consul; counsel; council. Consul = a governmental representative living in a foreign country to oversee commercial matters. Counsel = a legal adviser or legal advisers. (See counsel & attorney (A).) Council = a body of representatives. See council.

consulate; consulship. Consulate = the office, term of office, jurisdiction, or residence of a consul. Consulship = the office or term of office of a consul. Consulate is the more common and (therefore) the broader term. Consulship may be useful in conveying precisely one's meaning.

consult takes the prepositions with (documents or other persons), on or upon, or about (a matter). The verb may be used transitively <to consult the will itself> as well as intransitively, in combination with any of the prepositions previously named.

consultation. The English writer Philip Howard has stated that consultation > can mean a conference at which the parties, for example, lawyers or doctors, consult or deliberate. Modern legal usage confines this sense to meetings with more than one counsel present. You can have a consultation with your doctor on your own. But you must be able to afford the fees of at least two lawyers simultaneously before you can properly describe your meeting with them as a consultation.

>
> Philip Howard, Weasel Words 57 (1979).

The OCL defines consultation as "a meeting of two or more counsel and the solicitor instructing them for discussion and advice."

No such restrictive meaning is given the term in AmE. If you consult with your lawyer on a certain matter, then that act is consultation.

consult(at)ive; consult(at)ory. The forms ending in -ory are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Both consultative and consultive are old, the former recorded from 1583, the latter from 1616. Because the adjectival form of Latinate words in -tion follows from the nominal form, consultative is the preferable form: "Purely consultive [read consultative] experts are those not relied upon in whole or in part by testifying experts." See consultation.

consummate has two pronunciations as an adjective (either /kən-səm-it/ or /kon-sə-mət/), and still another as a verb /kon-sə-mayt/. For its sense, see inchoate.

contact, v.t. Though vehemently objected to in the 1950s, contact is now firmly ensconced as a verb. Brevity recommends it over "to get in touch with" or "communicate with"; it should not be considered stylistically infelicitous even in formal contexts. E.g., "These witnesses were recently contacted by petitioner's counsel and agreed to make new affidavits."

If, however, the writer means either call or write—as opposed to call or write—the specific verb is preferable.

contagious; infectious. These words are misused even by educated writers and speakers. A contagious disease is communicable by contact with those suffering from it. An infectious disease spreads by contact with the germs, e.g., in the air or in water. Some contagious diseases are not infectious, and vice versa.

contemn = to treat (as laws or court orders) with contemptuous disregard. E.g., "We find that jurisdiction exists based on both the inherent power of a court to reach those who knowingly contemn its orders and the minimum contacts analysis set out below." The OED notes that this word is "chiefly a literary word," but it is used just as frequently in legal as in literary contexts. See condemn.

contemner; contemnor. Most dictionaries list the spelling in -er as the predominant one; 19th-century BrE and AmE overwhelmingly preferred that spelling, which is still the better one. The -or spelling, now common in the U.S., remains inferior. See -ER (A) contemporary; contemporaneous. Both refer to simultaneity. Contemporaneous usually refers to either actions or things, contemporary to persons. Contemporary has the additional informal meaning "modern," but this sense should be avoided in contexts referring to past times, as in this example: "An anti-Jeffersonian charge by Justice Chase in 1803, reprinted in this collection, was one count in his impeachment by a Jeffersonian Congress; more contemporary items in the collection include papers by Justices Hugo Black and Robert H. Jackson." When no other time frame is mentioned, then we may infer "contemporary with us" (= modern), but not in historical contexts. Cotemporaneous is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of contemporaneous; likewise, cotemporary is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of contemporary.

Here contemporary is misused for contemporaneous, unless the writer meant to personify the statute mentioned (an unlikely intention): "As the court acknowledges, the 1924 statute must be examined in light of its contemporary [read contemporaneous] legal context."

Contemporaneous does not precisely mean "simultaneous"; rather, it means "belonging to the same time or period; occurring at about the same time." Thus the following sentences are correct, although simultaneous does not properly fit in each slot filled by contemporaneous: "Courts regard with particular respect the contemporaneous construction of a statute by those initially charged with its enforcement."/ "Where a conveyance in trust is made voluntarily, without solicitation or undue influence, and no fraud is shown prior to, or contemporaneous with, the execution of the deed, but consists in repudiating the agreement to reconvey, the case is not removed from the operation of the Statute of Frauds."/ "These uncertainties in proof by parol evidence are at least partially eliminated in the Uniform Probate Code by the requirement that the advancement be 'declared in a contemporaneous writing by the decedent or acknowledged in writing by the heir.'" contempt; contemptibility; contemptuousness. These words are quite distinct. Contempt = (1) (generally) the act or state of despising; the condition of being despised; (2) (in law) action interfering with the administration of justice. Contemptibility = the quality or fact of being worthy of scorn. Contemptuousness = the quality of being scornful or disdainful. See contumac(it)y.

contempt of court = action that interferes with the administration of justice by the various courts of law. There are several different types. Direct contempt is that which occurs in open court (e.g., foul language spoken to a judge). For example, in the 19th century, a drunken lawyer in Tombstone, Arizona, Allen English, upon being fined $25 for contempt of court, said to the judge, "Your honor, $25 wouldn't pay for half the contempt I have for this court." That statement was a direct contempt. By contrast, constructive contempt (sometimes called indirect or consequential contempt) results from actions outside court, such as failing to comply with orders.

Another dichotomy is that between civil and criminal contempt; the former consists in failing to do something ordered by the court for another litigant's benefit, whereas the latter consists in acts that obstruct justice.

contemptuous. A. And contemptible. The former means "expressing contempt," the latter "worthy of contempt or scorn." Both terms are disparaging, contemptible being the stronger of the two. See contempt.

B. And contumacious. See contumacious.

contemptuousness. See contempt.

contend. See allege & contest, v.t.

content(s). When referring to written matter or oral presentation, content = the ideas or thoughts contained in the words as opposed to the method of presentation. Follett disapproved the modern tendency to use content as well as contents for "what is contained," but the usage is old and is now common. E.g., "Since Justice Black did not define the content and scope of this exception, that critical task has fallen to the lower courts."

Contents refers to material and nonmaterial ingredients alike. E.g., "The bottles were securely and completely wrapped in paper and tied with a string so that the contents of the package could not be seen or observed."/ "The declarations of a deceased testator as to his testamentary intentions, and as to the contents of his will, are deemed to be relevant when his will has been lost, and when there is a question about what were its contents." (Eng.)/ "The testator who has revoked a previous will should not be fettered by the contents of that previous will when he sets about his new testamentary work." Still, content is now more common for the nonmaterial things contained in something (as in documents).

The word contents should never refer to human beings, as the callous sentence that follows demonstrates: "The impact and disintegration of the aircraft extended over several seconds before the aircraft and its human contents came to rest [read before the aircraft and those aboard came to rest]."

conterminous. See coterminous.

contest, n.; contestation; litiscontestation. These terms are to be differentiated. Contest = (1) debate; controversy; dispute <without contest> <will contest>; or (2) a friendly competition. Contestation = disputation or controversy, as between parties at law; verbal contention; keen argument (OED); (2) the contesting or disputing (of a point or claim) <assertions not open to contestation>; or (3) an assertion contended for <the appellant's contestation is untenable>. Litiscontestation, a legal term used primarily in Scots and civil law, means (1) "the formal entry of a suit in a court of law" (OED); or (2) "a legal process by which controverted issues are established and a joinder of issues arrived at" (W3).

contest, v.t.; contend. In the sense "to fight (for)," contest is almost always transitive <to contest a will> <to contest an election>, and contend is intransitive <to contend against an opponent>. Contend may be transitive when it means "to maintain, assert," and is followed by that <appellants contend that the notice was not timely filed>.

contestant; contestor. Contestant = (1) one who contests a will (caveator, q.v., being a synonym); (2) a participant in a sporting event. The word has been common only since the mid-19th century. Contestor is a NEEDLESS VARIANT for sense (1)—e.g.: "Appellant argues that the will contestors [read contestants] failed to introduce evidence to establish they were interested parties." Keener v. Archibald, 533 N.E.2d 1268, 1269 (Ind. Ct. App. 1989). See contestee.

contestation. See contest, n.

contested election, in AmE, means either (1) "an election the validity of whose results has been challenged," or (2) "a political race with more than one candidate." Sense (2) is the sole meaning in BrE. See candidacy.

contestee is a 19th-century Americanism listed in the OED as meaning "a candidate for election who is in the position of having his seat contested by another"—a sense recorded from 1870. Even earlier, though, lawyers had begun to use contestee in a sense corresponding to contestant or contestor, as here: "[T]he witness . . . proceeded to state what he had heard the contestee, Anthony Banning, Jr., say a few days after his father's death, in respect to his father's will . . . ." Banning v. Banning, 12 Ohio St. 437, 444 (1861)./ "[T]he secretary of the interior found from the evidence that the contestee was not a bona fide homestead claimant." Carr v. Fife, 44 F. 713, 713 syl. 3 (C.C.D. Wash. 1891).

Today the word appears fairly frequently in American legal writing, usu. paired against contestant—e.g.: "The contestants sought to raise various alleged violations of the Kentucky Corrupt Practices Act, the legality of support alleged to have been given the contestees by the school superintendent . . . ." Stearns v. Davis, 707 S.W.2d 787, 787–88 (Ky. Ct. App. 1985). See -EE & contestant.

contestor. See contestant.

context of, in the; in a . . . context. This phrase is often used superfluously. E.g., "The Commission's rationale for the mosaic that finally emerges [see METAPHORS (A)] with respect to principal transactions not only is interesting, but also may be helpful in the context of understanding [read but also may be helpful in understanding] the related issue of a dealer's obligation in principal transactions to charge prices reasonably related to the market price."/ "During the seventh century B C , Egypt was repeatedly though always briefly occupied by Assyrian armies and later infiltrated by Greek and other Aegean elements in a military and subsequently a commercial context [read infiltrated militarily and later commercially by Greek and other Aegean elements]."

contiguous means, not merely "close to" or "near," but "abutting." It is commonly misused in the phrase the forty-eight contiguous states, which is illogical: only a few states can be contiguous to one another. Contiguous to for next to is sometimes a pomposity. (See adjacent. Cf. adjoin.) This adjective should always be construed with to. E.g., "In this appeal, Mirador argues that it has a valid easement over Booker's lot, which is contiguous on the southern side to Mirador's landlocked parcel."

contingency; contingence. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT Contingency is sometimes used elliptically for contingent fee, q.v., as here: "Loftin, . . . who was working on a 40 percent contingency, played the role of the homespun Fort Worth boy: His shirttail hanging out, he sniffled from a head cold." Dana Rubin, Courting Costs, Texas Monthly, May 1992, at 52, 58.

contingent fee; contingency fee. The former is the preferred term. It denotes an agreement that no fee will be charged for the lawyer's services unless the lawsuit is successful or is settled out of court. Usually, a contingent fee calls for larger compensation to be paid than the lawyer would normally charge, often a percentage of the money recovered or the money saved, to compensate for the risk involved. See champerty (A) & no-win–no-fee system.

contingent-fee lawyer is a journalistic variation of plaintiff's lawyer—and a more specific one, since the two phrases are not always interchangeable. Note that contingent-fee is hyphenated when preceding lawyer as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE: "There was nothing new about contingent-fee lawyers' moving in when they smelled the kill, but here was an instance when the public at large might benefit from the economic self-aggrandizement of the trial lawyers." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 120 (1989; repr. 1991).

contingent remainder; contingent interest. Each phrase is used on both sides of the Atlantic, but the former is more common in both AmE and BrE.

The phrase contingent remainder has led to confusion between the interest subject to a condition precedent and a vested defeasible interest subject to a condition subsequent. Unlike a vested remainder, q.v., a contingent remainder is not an estate at all—it is a limitation whereby an estate will vest in interest when a contingent event happens, and then vest in possession when a prior estate ends.

To remedy this confusion, the Restatement of Property discarded the term and substituted in its place a more descriptive phrase remainder subject to a condition precedent. Even so, courts continue to use the older term. See remainder.

continual; continuous. Continual = frequently recurring. E.g., "The agents are continually acting in reliance upon the effectiveness of the survivorship provisions." Continuous = occurring without interruption. E.g., "Continuously since prior to May 28, 1906, Mrs. M.E. Skeen and J.C. Skeen have been . . . husband and wife . . . ." McClintic v Midland Grocery & Dry Goods Co., 154 S.W. 1157, 1157 (Tex. 1913).

The two words are frequently confused, most frequently with continuous horning in where continual belongs—e.g.: "Luckily Mandy liked dogs, for the C.J., in spite of his intelligence, loyalty and other endearing qualities, involved us in continuous [read continual] excitement." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 197 (1943)./ "Bar associations have continuously [read continually] tried to define the professional responsibilities of attorneys inside and outside the courtroom." Norman Dorsen & Leon Friedman, Disorder in the Court 136 (1973)./ "Minutes after the arrest, Wayne Forrest, a Deputy Attorney General helping prosecute the case, told the presiding judge, Charles R. DiGisi, that the sheriff's office had been engaged in a 'continuous [read continual] course of misconduct' in the Spath case." Robert Hanley, Courthouse Arrest Roils Trial of Officer in Teaneck Killing, N.Y. Times, 18 Jan. 1992, at A9.

continuance; continuation; continuity. Continuance has virtually opposite senses in lay and legal usage. Generally, it means (1) "keeping up, going on with, maintaining, or prolonging"; or (2) "duration; time of continuing." E.g., "Plaintiff is entitled to this higher salary during his continuance in defendant's employ."/ "The fact that any person was born during the continuance of a valid marriage between his mother and any man is generally conclusive proof that he is the legitimate child of his mother's husband." (Eng.)

But in American law, it means "postponement; the adjournment or deferring of a trial or other proceeding until a future date" <motion for continuance>. E.g., "There is no support in the record for the complaint that the district court failed to grant a continuance to the defense." See continue.

Continuation = continued maintenance; carrying on or resumption of (an action, etc.); that by which a thing is continued (COD). E.g., "The question whether a corporation is a continuation of a predecessor has been fermenting in the past decade."/ "During the continuation of the relation, the attorney, for most purposes, stands in the place of the client, who will be bound by whatever the attorney may do or say, in the regular course of practice, in the conduct of the cause."/ "Continuation of the use of the property as a municipal park carries out a larger share of Bacon's purpose than the complete destruction of such use by the decree we today affirm."

Continuity = connectedness; unbrokenness; uninterruptedness <the continuity of the litigation process was broken up by a number of continuances>.

continuation in part. See c.i.p.

continue; stay, v.t. "We are accustomed to continue an action in the sense of plodding on. But it was possible in Scotland and was once possible in England (and still is in legal language) to continue in the sense of knocking off or adjourning." Ivor Brown, I Give You My Word 112 (1964). It is this transitive use of continue (= to postpone) in legal contexts that yields the legal use of continuance, q.v.

Only in legal parlance is stay current as a transitive verb. Stronger than continue, stay means "to stop, arrest, delay, prevent (an action or proceeding)" <to stay the proceedings>. E.g., "I do order that until such indemnity be given all further proceedings be stayed." (Eng.) See stay.

continue liable is an old legal idiom—shorthand for continue to be liable. E.g., "[T]here are a number of Tennessee cases [holding] that the father continues liable for the support of his minor children even though there has been a divorce and award of custody to the mother." Livingston v. Livingston, 429 S.W.2d 452, 458 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1967)./ "[The] policy . . . must be regarded as subsisting in contemplation of law, and the insurer continues liable to a third-party claimant until relieved from its obligation . . . ." State Ins. Fund v. Brooks, 755 P.2d 653, 656 (Okla. 1988).

continue on is a minor but bothersome prolixity. E.g., "The pleader's standoffish 'one' continued on [read persisted] as meaningless rote."/ "The shift to a new continent cut off Americans from much of the change that continued on [read continued] in England."

continuity. See continuance.

continuous. See continual.

continuum. Pl. continuums or continua. The foreign plural should be avoided. See PLURALS (A). contorts, n., (= the overlapping domain of contract law and tort law; a specific wrong that falls within that domain) is Professor Grant Gilmore's NEOLOGISM—a PORTMANTEAU WORD (contract + tort) dating from the 1970s: "I have occasionally suggested to my students that a desirable reform in legal education could be to merge the first-year courses in Contracts and Torts into a single course [that] we would call Contorts." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 90 (1974)./ "Interestingly, Dean Prosser seems also to recognize this peculiar possibility and to identify it as an issue existing on the fringes of contract and tort law, the so-called 'contort' of recent renown." Schlange-Schoeningen v. Parrish, 767 F.2d 788, 793 n.3 (11th Cir. 1985).

contours is such a popular metaphor that it has become a VOGUE WORD among lawyers and judges. E.g., "The EEOC administrative regulations provide some basis for outlining the contours of the accommodation duty."

contra, n., adj., adv., & prep., is a LEGALISM for against, contrary, etc. Except as a signal in citations, it should be avoided in favor of its more common equivalents. E.g., "Partitions in kind as well as partitions by sale and division of the proceeds were sustained, although there was some contra [read contrary] authority invalidating a partition in kind."/ "These provisions of the Code are, of course, contra [read contrary] to the common-law rules that have discouraged use of powers of attorney."/ "That case is, on its surface, contra [read to the contrary], but the use of a questionnaire and its relationship to Rule 4(a) were not considered by the court."

contracept, v.i., is a BACK-FORMATION that is not included in the dictionaries. It is a jargonistic word popular among social workers. E.g., "Rather than become pregnant, our adolescents should learn about sex and, if they are to be active, contracept [read use contraception]."

contraceptionist. See contraceptor.

contraceptivism. In the days when contraceptives were illegal, this term referred to unlawful trafficking in contraceptives. See Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 108 (1957).

contraceptor; contraceptionist. What is the agent-noun corresponding to contraception? William Safire prefers contraceptionist. See On Language, N.Y. Times, 30 Dec. 1990, § 6, at 6. But contraceptor is five times as common, and usage suggests a worthwhile distinction: a contraceptor is one who uses contraception, while a contraceptionist is one who advocates its use.

contract, n. & v. A. Noun Senses. The word has many more senses than most dictionaries—even the OED and W3—acknowledge. In tackling the problem of defining this word, Patrick Atiyah acutely observes: "A definition of a contract presupposes that the law recognizes a single concept of contract. In fact it is doubtful if this is really the case. Certainly there is one very central and powerful concept in the middle of contract law . . . . But contractual obligations arise in such a very wide variety of circumstances, and are based on such a wide variety of grounds, that there is little relationship between cases on the outer extremities of contract law." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 30 (3d ed. 1981). Following are the six primary senses, with subsenses noted:

1. An agreement between two or more parties to do or not to do a thing or set of things; a compact—e.g.: "A contract in the popular sense of the word is an agreement between two or more parties." Lawrence Friedman, Contract Law in America 15 (1965).
2. a. An agreement between two or more parties creating obligations that are enforceable or otherwise recognizable at law—e.g.: "A contract is valid if valid under the law of the settled place of business or residence of the party wishing to enforce the contract." Russell Weintraub, A Defense of Interest Analysis in the Conflict of Laws [etc.], 46 Ohio St. L.J. 493, 498 (1985). b. A writing executed by the parties to evidence the terms of such an agreement—e.g.: "[T]he execution of the contracts was not a condition of employment." J.I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 332, 333 (1944). c. Arising out of or operating under such an agreement <contract rights> <contract work>. d. The legal relation resulting from such an agreement—e.g.: "[T]he contract is a subsisting relation, of value to the plaintiff, and presumably to continue in effect." Landess v. Borden, Inc., 667 F.2d 628, 631 (7th Cir. 1981) (quoting William Prosser, Torts 726 (2d ed. 1955). e. The task or assignment for which such an agreement has been entered into—e.g.: "The six contracts of the defendants, were assigned to, and completed in the name of the New Jersey Wood Paving Company." American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. City of Elizabeth, 1 F. Cas. 691, 699 (C.C.N.J. 1874) (No. 309). f. In futures markets, the smallest amount of a given commodity that can be exchanged by agreement of traders, i.e., the standard unit of sale—e.g.: "The normal trading unit is one contract consisting of 5000 bushels." Cargill, Inc. v. Hardin, 452 F.2d 1154, 1156 (8th Cir. 1971).
3. More broadly, any legal duty or set of duties not imposed by the law of tort; esp., a duty created by a decree or declaration of a court in the phrase contract of record, q.v.—e.g.: "An obligation of record, as a judgment, recognizance, or the like, is included within the term "contract." A bequest falls under the term "contract," and when the will is admitted to probate it is to be regarded as a contract of record." Quinn v. Shields, 17 N.W. 437, 442 (Iowa 1883). Cf. quasi-contract.
4. a. A promise or set of promises, by a party to a transaction, enforceable or otherwise recognizable at law—e.g.: "[T]he defendant agreed to let rooms to the plaintiff; and then, finding that the rooms were to be used for the delivery of blasphemous lectures, declined to carry out his contract." William R. Anson, Some Notes on Terminology in Contract, 7 Law Q. Rev. 337, 339 (1891). b. A writing that expresses such a promise—e.g.: "Alternative promises in bonds giving bondholders option to elect payment in dollars, guilders, pounds, marks or francs were not separate and independent contracts or obligations . . . ." Guaranty Trust Co. v. Henwood, 59 S. Ct. 847, 848 syl. 2 (1939).
5. The division or body of law dealing with contracts. Often cap. E.g.: "A general theory of contract asserts that there is at least a substantial body of rules which applies to all contracts in common." G.H. Treitel, An Outline of the Law of Contract 2 (5th ed. 1979).
6. The terms of a contract, or any particular term—e.g.: "[I]t does not appear whether there was any express contract as to when the money was payable." Civil Serv. Coop. v. Gen. Steam Navigation Co., 2 K.B. 756, 762 n.1 (1903)./ "A similar usage allows contract to be applied to . . . the terms or a particular term of a contract." R.M. Jackson, The Scope of the Term "Contract," 53 Law Q. Rev. 525, 536 (1937).

B. General Slipperiness. "One moment the word [contract] may be the agreement of the parties; and then, with a rapid and unexpected shift, the writer or speaker may use the term to indicate the contractual obligation created by law as a result of the agreement." Wesley N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions 31 (1919; repr. 1946). Legal writers should be sensitive to any such semantic change within a given context.

C. And promise. The distinction between these words (despite sense 4 above) has long been urged, and perhaps ought to be observed for conceptual clarity. An influential English writer felt the slippage even in 1845, the words in strictness signaling a losing battle: "There is in strictness a distinction between a promise and a contract; for the latter involves the idea of mutuality, which the former does not." 2 Henry J. Stephen, New Commentaries on the Laws of England 59 (1886).

D. And covenant. Contract is the general term. Covenant now applies (1) to agreements under seal, and (2) to undertakings contained in deeds or implied by law in deeds, as in the phrase covenant running with the land.

E. And agreement, bargain. See agreement & bargain.

F. Contract, v.; enter into a contract with. The tighter wording, to contract, is almost always preferable to the longer, to enter into a contract with.

G. Verbal contract. See verbal contract.

H. Illegal contract. See illegal contract.

I. Pronunciation. As a noun, contract is accented on the first syllable /kon-trakt/; as a verb, on the second /kən-trakt/. Cf. contrast & compact.

contract breach is inferior to breach of contract. E.g., "It is true, as plaintiffs contend, that the victim of the contract breach [read breach of contract] may recover damages that would place him in the same position he would have occupied if the defaulting party had performed." (Using victim in reference to one disadvantaged by breach of contract borders on OVERSTATEMENT.)

contract-breaker = breacher. E.g., "A contract-breaker can be charged with the amount of an expected gain that his breach has prevented, if, when the contract was made, he had reason to foresee that his breach would prevent it from occurring."/ "[T]he wicked contract-breaker should pay no more in damage than the innocent and the pure in heart." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 14–15 (1974). See breacher.

contractee (= a person with whom a contract is made) is attested in but one source (dated 1875) in the OED; it appears in neither W3 nor Black's. The word was infrequently used in the 19th century—as early as 1815—but fell into disuse in the 20th century, probably for two reasons. First, its meaning duplicates that of contractor, so that using the two as correlatives makes little sense. Second, the terminology offeror and offeree more sharply defines the relationships to be denoted.

Still, a few notable writers have fallen for this word—e.g.: "If a man is induced to contract with another by a fraudulent representation of the latter that he is a great-grandson of Thomas Jefferson, I do not suppose that the contract would be voidable unless the contractee [read contractor or maybe offeror] knew that, for special reasons, his lie would tend to bring the contract about." Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Common Law 255 (1881; repr. 1963). See -EE.

contract for sale; contract of sale; contract to sell; executory sale. A. Senses. These various phrases have traditionally been used in the law of sales. The newest of them is contract for sale, used in the Uniform Commercial Code to include both "a present sale of goods and a contract to sell goods at a future time." U.C.D. § 2-106(1). In G.B., contract of sale bears this meaning in the Sale of Goods Act 1893.

The other phrases are narrower because they relate to a future transfer. Contract to sell denotes "a contract whereby the seller agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a consideration called the price." 1 Samuel Williston, The Law Governing Sales of Goods § 1, at 2 (1948). Williston notes that this idea is also "not very happily called an executory sale." Id. at 3. The problem with executory sale is that it suggests that a sale has occurred when in fact it has yet to occur.

B. Criticism of contract for sale and contract of sale; Answer. The broadest of these phrases (contract for sale and contract of sale) have come under criticism because they include two types of transfers: present sales and future sales. Williston complained—unavailingly, in retrospect—that "it is unfortunate . . . to use the same term for two transactions, differing so vitally in their legal effect." 1 Samuel Williston, The Law Governing Sales of Goods § 1, at 4 (1948). His recommendation was that "[t]he unambiguous terms, 'contract to sell' and 'sale' should be used . . . to express the respective meanings." Id.

The consensus of modern scholarly opinion resists this criticism: "The distinction between exchanges that involve promises and those that involve only present transfers is not as sharp as might at first appear, since the law often attaches implied obligations of a promissory character to exchanges involving only present transfers (e.g., the seller usually makes implied warranties in the case of a present sale of goods). The Uniform Commercial Code avoids the distinction [by using the phrase] contract for sale . . . ." E. Allan Farnsworth, Contracts § 1.1, at 4 n.6 (1982).

contract implied in law. See quasi-contract & implied contract.

CONTRACTIONS are generally avoided in formal writing. Legal writers tend to feel uncomfortable with them—judges, say, in their judicial opinions; appellate lawyers in their briefs; business lawyers in their contracts; academic lawyers in their law-review articles; and all lawyers, even in the less formal context of their business correspondence. Perhaps contractions don't generally belong in appellate opinions, briefs, contracts, and law review articles.

But why shouldn't we use them in writing to clients or colleagues? Because we've become inured to stuffiness. It has become a natural tone for much of the legal profession. And many of us carry over our tone from one type of discourse (an appellate brief, say) to other types of discourse (chiding a five-year-old child: "Now comes your mother . . . .").

Some excellent legal writers use contractions to good effect, especially when driving home a powerful point in the modern idiom. E.g.:

- "What our forefathers said, they said. What they didn't say, they meant to leave to us . . . ." Charles P. Curtis, Jr., Lions Under the Throne 7–8 (1947).
- "Of course the bailee would have the action against the thief, if he could be found. But probably that wasn't worth very much." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 272 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).
- "You won't drive the nail properly if you don't hold it straight and so also you won't achieve an effective system of law unless you give some heed to what I have called principles of legality." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 200 (rev. ed. 1969).
- "Each of these three solutions is old-fashioned. But many lawyers use them and many lawyers who don't use them don't understand why they don't." Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 202 (2d ed. 1979).
- "This may seem rather curious today: why should a person be unwilling to answer questions properly put to him by duly authorized courts or officials? And if he is unwilling, isn't it likely that this is because he has something to hide?" P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 45 (1983).
- Of course, we do have our property taxes and our inheritance taxes. If we don't pay them, we can lose our land." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 18 (2d ed. 1984).
- "The only thing left to do is for the jury to engage in a densely textured judgment upon the defendant's conduct—either it was deviant or it wasn't." Bruce A. Ackerman, Reconstructing American Law 28 (1984).

Using contractions at every turn, of course, can make the writing seem breezy; for most of us, though, that risk is nil: a gentle breeze might refresh our readers. See cannot & SUPERSTITIONS (J). contract of deed. See chattel mortgage.

contract of lease. The courts sometimes use this phrase rather than lease alone, as if ignoring the fact that a lease is primarily a contract—not a conveyance. "[If] used at all," states one commentator, the phrase contract of lease "should be applied merely to the aggregate of the covenants into which the parties may have entered in connection with the making of the conveyance by way of lease." 1 Herbert T. Tiffany, The Law of Real Property § 74, at 111 (3d ed., B. Jones ed., 1939).

contract of record. This phrase, ironically, denotes "no contract at all, and has nothing whatever to do with the law of contracts." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 31 (3d ed. 1981). A contract of record is an obligation imposed by a judgment or recognizance of a court of record; the phrase came about merely because such a judgment or recognizance was enforceable in common-law procedure by the same type of action as was used for contractual cases. For other phrases using contract but not truly involving a contract, see void contract & unenforceable contract.

contractor. See independent contractor & contractee.

contract quasi. See implied contract & quasi-contract.

contracts—like its singular—denotes an entire legal field, as do other plurals such as torts and conflicts, qq.v. E.g., "The field of Law known as Contracts is one of the most settled, most venerable, and least politically complicated fields of Law." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 28 (1939; repr. 1980). Cf. sense (5) listed at contract.

contractual is sometimes erroneously written (or pronounced) contractural, with an intrusive -r-. The OED illustrates the blunder with quotations from such reputable publications as The New York Times and The Washington Post.

Alas, the word has invaded even higher ground: "There is no essential difference between contractural [read contractual] and statutory limitations." Kornberg v. Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc., 741 F.2d 1332, 1337 (11th Cir. 1984). The U.S. Supreme Court has sic'd this solecism on more than one occasion. See O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 727 (1987) (quoting a deposition); Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186, 191 (1977) (quoting a party's affidavit).

contract under seal. See seal (B). contractural. See contractual.

contradict. See gainsay.

contradictory; contradictive; contradictional; contradictious. Contradictory = opposite, contrary. Contradictious = inclined to contradict or quarrel; the word is applied to persons. Contradictive and contradictional are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of contradictory.

contradistinction; contrast. These words may be distinguished, if not contradistinguished. Contradistinction = distinction by opposition; contrast = dissimilarity (but not necessarily opposition). E.g., "The Seventh Amendment preserves the right to a jury trial not only for suits in which the right existed at common law, but also for suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those in which equitable rights alone were recognized, and equitable remedies were administered."/ "The word 'children' in its primary and natural sense is always a word of purchase and not of limitation; it is employed in contradistinction to the term 'issue.'"/ "[T]hese differences in phraseology . . . must not be too literally contradistinguished [i.e., be too literally made to seem opposites]." Brush v. I.R.C., 300 U.S. 352, 362 (1937).

Contradistinction should not be used where contrast suffices. E.g., "The term 'constitution' is ordinarily employed to designate organic law in contradistinction [read contrast] to the term 'laws,' which is generally used to designate statutes or legislative acts."

contraindicate began as a medical term meaning "to make (as a treatment) inadvisable." It has made its way into legal parlance, despite the contraindication of using such jargon. E.g., "The plan shall include provision for a system to ensure that no prisoner is assigned to do work that is contraindicated [read inadvisable] given his medical condition."

contra proferentem*. A. Sense. This TERM OF ART names the doctrine that, in interpreting documents, ambiguities are to be construed unfavorably to the drafter. E.g., "Faced with this ambiguity, the district court adopted the state law rule of contract interpretation contra proferentem in fashioning the federal common law . . . ." Phillips v. Lincoln Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 978 F.2d 302, 306 (7th Cir. 1992).

B. Spelled contra proferentes. The phrase is sometimes rendered contra proferentes, an alternative Latin form that is no longer current—e.g.: "The fact that the company appears and interposes a claim to the steamer does not change the legal nature of the proceeding from one in rem to one in personam, so as to bring it within the terms of the special contract on the back of the bill of lading, which are to be contra proferentes." Pacific Coast S.S. Co. v. Bancroft-Whitney Co., 94 F. 180, 186 (9th Cir. 1899)./ "I cannot adopt the suggestion that there is in this policy any ambiguous language to be construed contra proferentes." Re Stooley Hill Rubber & Chem. Co. v. Royal Ins. Co., [1920] 1 K.B. 257, 274.

contrary. A. Contrary to or contrary from. Contrary takes the preposition to; from is no longer standard.

B. On the contrary; to the contrary. On the contrary marks a contrast with an entire argument or position just mentioned <The respondent argues that we must dismiss the petition. On the contrary, we consider it well taken>. To the contrary marks a contrast with a specific noun just mentioned <Reynolds sought relief; Griffin, to the contrary, decided not to litigate>.

contrast. A. Prepositions with. One contrasts something with something else, not to; but it is permissible to write either in contrast to or in contrast with.

B. Compare and contrast. This is an English teacher's REDUNDANCY. See compare (with) (to).

C. Pronunciation. As a noun, contrast is accented on the first syllable /kon-trast/; as a verb, on the second /kən-trast/.

contravene. A. And controvert. These words, occasionally confused, should be distinguished. Contravene = (1) (of persons) to transgress, infringe (as a law); to defy; (2) (of things) to be contrary to, come in conflict with. E.g., "It is argued that the regulation, in limiting the amount of money any single household may receive, contravenes a basic purpose of federal law."/ "The court ruled that the statutory provision was a penalty and that allowing a wrongdoer to insure himself against it would contravene public policy."

Controvert = to dispute or contest; to debate; to contend against or oppose in argument. E.g., "Under the pleadings, when the issues were joined in fraud, undue influence, failure of consideration, and mistake, the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the controverted facts."/ "The appellant's counsel does not very seriously controvert the correctness of the answer finding the minor guilty of contributory negligence."

B. And "controvene." The form controvene is a misrendering caused by confusion between the two words discussed in (A). E.g., "The State's use of a jailhouse informant to elicit inculpatory information from Wilson controvened [read contravened] his right to counsel . . . ." Wilson v. Henderson, 742 F.2d 741, 748 (2d Cir. 1984). The same problem occurs in the noun form: "In fact, the Appellees argue that Appellant acted in direct controvention [read contravention] of their interests." Winfree v. Philadelphia Elec. Co., 554 A.2d 485, 488 (Pa. 1989).

C. And contravent. The form contravent is a misbegotten BACK-FORMATION innovated by writers who, reaching for the verb corresponding to contravention, forgot that contravene is the correct form. E.g., "[D]ecision appears to contravent [read contravene] clear legislative intent of IEEPA." Jules Lobel, Emergency Power and the Decline of Liberalism, 98 Yale L.J. 1385, 1417 n.175 (1989).

contravent. See contravene (C).

contravert. See controvert & contravene (A).

contributary. See contributory, n.

contribute for attribute is nothing less than a MALAPROPISM. But it is surprisingly common in the U.S.: "The great majority of these deaths can be contributed [read attributed] to misuse of smoking materials."/ "To what may we contribute [read attribute] the company's success on appeal?"

contribution; indemnity. These words frequently appear in tandem in the legal phrase contribution and indemnity, but many users of the phrase forget the individual significations of the words. Contribution is (1) the right to demand that another who is jointly responsible for injury to another contribute to the one required to compensate the victim, or (2) the actual payment by a joint tortfeasor of his share of what is due. It may entail an equal sharing of the loss, but in some jurisdictions entails a payment proportional to one's fault. Indemnity is (1) a duty to make good any loss, damage, or liability another has incurred, or (2) the right of an injured person to claim reimbursement for his loss. Whereas contribution involves a partial shifting of the economic loss, indemnity involves a complete shifting of the economic loss. See indemnity.

Rather than use the phrase contribution and indemnity imprecisely and indiscriminately, the party seeking recompense should decide whether he is entitled only to one or the other, and then use that term only.

contributory; contributive; contributorial; contributional. Each of these word forms has a different meaning. Contributory = (1) making contribution; that contributes to a common fund; or (2) bearing a share toward a purpose or result <contributory negligence>. Contributive = having the power of contributing; conducive <exercise is contributive to health>. Contributorial = of or relating to a contributor. Contributional = of or relating to (a) contribution. Contributary is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of contributory.

contributory, n.; contributary, n. In the sense "one who, or that which, contributes," contributory is now standard—e.g.: "The company cannot put the beneficiary on the list of contributories . . . ." J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 70 (4th ed. 1945)./ "The question was whether a person who was a member of the provisional committee on the formation of a joint stock company, and had accepted shares in the company, thereby became liable as a contributory when the second company failed." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 143 (1973).

As in its adjectival use, contributary is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

contributory negligence. See comparative negligence & assumption of the risk.

controller. See comptroller.

controvene. See contravene (B) & controvert.

controversion, a fairly uncommon word, is the noun corresponding to controvert—e.g.: "The fact that Austin's workers' compensation carrier filed a statement of controversion is also irrelevant." Archem Co. v. Austin Indus., Inc., 804 S.W.2d 268, 270 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1991)./ "The record establishes, without controversion, that the defendant was twice advised of his constitutional rights . . . ." People v. Kelland, 567 N.Y.S.2d 810, 812 (App. Div. 1991).

controversy. A. Misspelling. Controversy appears surprisingly often in the mangled form controversary—e.g.: "We feel that this long-standing controversary [read controversy] can be significantly reduced and perhaps eliminated . . . ." Evans v. Yankeetown Dock Corp., 491 N.E.2d 969, 974 (Ind. 1986).

B. Case or controversy. See case or controversy.

controvert. So spelled—not contravert, a misspelling that litters more than 150 pages of American caselaw: "To adopt this analysis would be to directly contravert [read controvert] an express holding of the Court of Appeals." Harper v. Harper, 472 A.2d 1018, 1021 (Md. Ct. App. 1984) See contravene (A) & (C). controvertible. So spelled. See -ABLE (A). contumacious; contemptuous. Both terms mean roughly "scornful," but the former is more frequently used as a legal term meaning "willfully disobedient of a court order." E.g., "Although certain money decrees are enforceable by contempt because they are not debts, imprisonment is nevertheless permissible only for contumacious behavior."/ "Finding that the record does not support a finding of contumacious conduct or a clear record of unexplained delay, we reverse the dismissal for plaintiff's failure to prosecute."

Here contumacious is used in the lay sense ("recalcitrant"), in which it is chiefly a literary word: "We should not encourage litigants to act contumaciously out of fear that otherwise their constitutional rights will evaporate."/ "Despite respondent's adamant—even contumacious—refusal to cooperate with Hotchkiss or to take the stand as Hotchkiss advised, Hotchkiss succeeded in getting a 'hung jury' [q.v.] on the two most serious charges at the first trial."

Contemptuous is the more usual term among nonlawyers as the adjective for contempt, but it is used also in legal contexts, which usually favor contumacious: "Ordinarily purpose or intent is irrelevant in determining whether an offensive act is contemptuous; the nature of the act itself is determinative." Ex parte Krupps, 712 S.W.2d 144, 154 (Tex. Crim. App. 1986)./ "The NLRB petitioned this court for an adjudication of civil contempt against the company for violating an order of this court; the company's allegedly contemptuous conduct consists in maintaining an overbroad rule prohibiting employee solicitation and distribution of materials, including union campaign materials." See contemptuous (A).

contumac(it)y; contumely. Contumacity is a long NEEDLESS VARIANT for contumacy (= willful contempt of court). Contumacy, then, is a particular kind of contempt of court, q.v. E.g., "In case of contumacy, the Chancellor would order the arrest of the defendant, and his imprisonment for contempt." (Eng.) The adjectival form is contumacious, q.v.

Contumaciousness should be reserved for the sense "the quality of being contumacious," and should not be used as a longer variant of the preferred noun: "While we do not wish to understate the significance of this omission, we find it to be more a matter of negligence than of purposeful delay or contumaciousness [read contumacy]."

Contumely, easily confused with contumacy, is a literary word meaning "rude and haughty language." Thus Shakespeare wrote, in Hamlet, of "the proud man's contumely."

contusion. See concussion.

conundrum. Pl. conundrums. E.g., "Not surprisingly, the drafting of the earliest statutes gave rise to a host of judicial conundrums." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 230 (1966)./ "In order to avoid conundra [read conundrums] of this sort it is necessary to abandon the simple dichotomy of 'proprietary' and 'possessory' . . . ." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 35 (1961; repr. 1964). See PLURALS (A). conusance —in the OED's words, "an early form of cognizance, retained to recent times in legal use"—is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

convener; convenor. The first is the preferred form. See -ER (A) convention. See treaty.

conventione(e)r. Today the usual term for one attending a convention is conventioneer.

conversable. See conversible.

conversation(al)ist. The standard term is conversationalist. Older authorities preferred conversationist, but the word is little used.

conversation, criminal. See criminal conversation & EUPHEMISMS.

converse; reverse; obverse; inverse. These words denote various types of opposition. Converse = a statement derived from another statement by transposing important antithetical members (e.g., equitable support without legal foundation, legal foundation without equitable support). Obverse = the inference of another proposition with a contradictory predicate by changing the quality of the original proposition (e.g., no men are immortal, all men are mortal) (COD). Inverse = the inference of another proposition in which the subject term is the negative of the subject of the original proposition and the predicate is unchanged (e.g., no colorable challenge of this trial could be entirely frivolous, some noncolorable challenge of this appeal could be frivolous). Reverse, the broadest of these terms, means simply "the contrary."

Conversely = in the converse manner or order; by conversion. E.g., "Words that are libelous per se do not need an innuendo, and, conversely, words that need an innuendo are not libelous per se." Here the word is nonsensically used: "Subadditivity means that it is always cheaper to have a single firm produce whatever combination of outputs is supplied to the market, and conversely [read and it is more expensive to have several firms produce whatever output is supplied to the market]."

conversible; conversable; convertible. Conversible is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of convertible (= capable of being exchanged or otherwise converted). Conversable = easy to talk with. See -ABLE (A). conversion means, in tort law, "the wrongful disposition of another's tangible property (other than land) as if it were one's own." It does not include mere acts of damage or even a taking that does not equate with denying the owner's right of property—it does include, however, acts such as taking possession, refusing to give up the goods on demand, giving them to a third person, or destroying them. This legal sense is virtually unknown to nonlawyers. The adjectival form of the word is conversionary.

convertible. See conversible.

convey. A. And conveyance, v.t. The latter, hypothetically "to accomplish the conveyance of," does not exist except as implied in the form of the agent noun conveyancer and the gerund conveyancing, q.v. This verb denotes what the lawyer does. Convey denotes what the seller does (usu. through a lawyer). See conveyor (B).

In the phrase convey away, away is unnecessary. See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

B. For confer. This is an inexplicable lapse. E.g., "Appellee's and appellant's respective citizenships of France and Georgia therefore conveyed [read conferred] diversity jurisdiction on the federal courts." See confer.

conveyance, n. A. Legal Senses. In law, the noun conveyance refers not only to the actual transfer of an interest in land, but also to the document (usually a deed) by which the transfer occurs.

B. For car or automobile. Conveyance is sometimes used as a FORMAL WORD for car. It should be avoided when possible. E.g., "The negligence of a driver of a private conveyance [read car] was not imputed to the guest." The only context in which it might be justified is that in which the writer intends to be so broad as to cover any vehicle, vessel, or aircraft.

C. And conveyal. Conveyance is the better noun corresponding to the verb to convey; conveyal is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

conveyance, v.t. See convey (A). conveyancer. See conveyor (B).

conveyancing, a term more common in BrE than in AmE, is often understood in a sense analogous to that of conveyance (= the document by which land is purchased). E.g., "Lawyers have been doing basically the same things—conveyancing property, drawing up wills, and so on—for a long time." (Eng.) Actually, however, it can have a wider import; conveyancing comprises the drafting and completion of all kinds of legal instruments, not just those having to do with the transfer of land. E.g., "Even in those statutes, the same objectives in administering trusts can be obtained by proper conveyancing techniques."

Still, in modern usage, conveyancing more and more commonly takes on a more restricted sense: "The law of conveyancing is essentially the law relating to the creation and transfer of estates and interests in land." I.R. Storey, Conveyancing 3 (2d ed. 1987).

conveyee (= one to whom property is conveyed) is a legal NEOLOGISM not recorded in dictionaries. E.g., "Since seisin passed to the feoffee at the time of feoffment, or not at all, there could be no springing freehold estate to arise in the conveyee out of the estate of the conveyor at a future time." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 163–64 (2d ed. 1988)./ "[S]ometimes the conveyor produced a knife, which he used to dig a clod of earth from the land or to cut a twig from a tree on the land, and the clod or twig was then handed to the conveyee together with the knife." Peter Butt, Land Law 455 (2d ed. 1988). See -EE.

conveyor. A. And conveyer. In legal contexts, the -or form predominates. Outside law, conveyer is the general spelling for "one that conveys." In mechanical uses, however, as in conveyor belt, the -or spelling is standard.

B. And conveyancer. These two terms are distinct. A conveyor is the person who transfers or delivers title to another. E.g., "The conveyance shall be given effect according to the intention of the conveyor."/ "After the English Chancellor began to enforce uses it was contended that a use for the conveyor or the person furnishing the consideration for the conveyance was presumed if no consideration was furnished by the conveyee and no use was expressed for the conveyee." See -ER (A) & convey.

A conveyor must usually have a conveyancer, that is, a lawyer specializing in real-estate transactions. E.g., "The practice of conveyancers—lawyers whose business it is to draw up conveyances, wills, and other legal documents—is sometimes valuable evidence of what the law is." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 15 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). See the English law journal entitled The Conveyancer. See conveyancing.

convict, n. For a NEEDLESS VARIANT, see convictee.

convict, v.t. In the legal idiom, one is convicted of crimes but on counts. See conviction.

convictable; convictible. The former is preferred. See -ABLE (A). convictability, a late-20th-century American NEOLOGISM, refers to the likelihood that a prosecution will result in conviction. Lawyers refer to the convictability of cases as well as defendants—e.g.: "The reform effort did not lead more women to report rapes, nor did it change the way prosecutors assessed the 'convictability' of cases." Susan Estrich, Real Rape 88 (1987).

convicted. A. Meaning. A person pleads guilty to a felony and receives probation. Has that person been convicted? The question matters because, in some states, being convicted means that you lose your voting rights. A California court has held that a man who had pleaded guilty, served 90 days in jail, and then withdrawn his guilty plea—whereupon the case was dismissed—had not been "convicted." See Truchon v. Toomey, 254 P.2d 638, 644 (Cal. App. 1953).

B. Prepositions with. A person is convicted of a crime or convicted for the act of committing a crime, but is not convicted in a crime: "A Palestinian suspected in the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 was convicted today along with three co-defendants in [read for] a series of attacks in northern Europe four years ago." Pan Am Bombing Suspect Convicted in Other Attacks, N.Y. Times, 22 Dec. 1989, at A3.

convictee. Omitted from most dictionaries, convictee is a legal NEOLOGISM and, what is worse, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the noun convict. E.g., "We respectfully suggest that the legislature give consideration to amending the probation statute to eliminate optional rejection of probation by a convictee [read convict]." State v. Migliorino, 442 N.W.2d 36, 48 (Wis. 1989)./ "[The] view that inmate violence is to be expected in a maximum security prison that houses violent convictees [read convicts] has little if any relevance to the instant case." Madison County Jail Inmates v. Thompson, 773 F.2d 834, 849 (7th Cir. 1985) (Flaum, J., concurring in part & dissenting in part). Cf. acquittee. See -EE.

convictible. See convictable.

conviction, it may surprise some readers to know, is used in reference to misdemeanors as well as to felonies. See convict, v.t.

conviction-prone. See guilt-prone.

convince; persuade. Generally, the word convince is properly followed by an of-phrase or a that-clause <he convinced the jury of his client's innocence> <he convinced the jury that his client was innocent>. Persuade is usually followed by an infinitive. It is a fall from stylistic grace to write "He convinced her to go through with the crime [read persuaded her to go through with the crime; or better: persuaded her to commit the crime]." See persuade.

co-opt = (1) to select as a member; or (2) to assimilate; absorb. The preferred noun form is co-optation, not co-option; the preferred adjectival form is co-optative, not co-optive. See CO- (A).

co-ownership (= title giving two or more persons concurrent possession and enjoyment of property) is hyphenated thus. (See CO- (A).) Traditionally, co-ownership has taken three forms: coparcenary, tenancy in common, or joint tenancy.

The first of these is now a defunct tenancy. On the others, see joint tenancy.

copacetic; copesetic. The former spelling is preferred for this tongue-in-cheek term meaning "okay; satisfactory." The word is informal and jocular.

coparcenary, though looking like an adjective, is usu. a noun, meaning "an estate in land descended from an ancestor to two or more persons who possess equal title to it"—as when a tenant in tail (q.v.) died intestate and left two female heirs. The OED notes that a rarer form, ending -ery, is "more etymological"; it is also more recognizable as a noun. But this form, like two others—coparceny and parcenary—is now classifiable only as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

The estate was abolished in England in 1925. In the U.S., coparcenary came into use in the mid-19th century, mostly in the Northeast and the Midwest. E.g., "It is contended, that the distinction is merely technical, and does not affect the enjoyment of the estate, whether held in coparcenary or in common, as in Maryland there is very little, if any difference . . . ." Gilpin v. Hollingsworth, 3 Md. 190, 196 (1852). Surprisingly, the estate remains current in some jurisdictions, such as Ohio, which declares by statute: "When a person dies intestate having title or right to any personal property, or to any real estate or inheritance, in this state, the personal property shall be distributed, and the real estate or inheritance shall descend and pass in parcenary . . . ." Ohio Rev. Code § 2105.06 (1988).

coparcener. A. And parcener. Dating from the 13th century, parcener has become a NEEDLESS VARIANT of coparcener, which did not appear until the 15th century. The prefix co- emphasizes the jointness in the term's meaning "a joint heir." Cf. copartner. See CO- (A).

B. And copartner. According to one etymological theory, coparcener and copartner were originally the same word, partner having been a corrupt spelling of—a scribal error for—parcener in the 13th century. That is unlikely, however, since many 14th-century manuscripts spelled the word parsener, thus belying the idea that medieval scribes merely confused the -c- for a -t-, without any sense-association. In any event, DIFFERENTIATION between the words is so complete that few would now associate the two words. See the following entry.

copartner need not exist alongside partner. The joint relationship (i.e., that the existence of one partner implies the existence of one or more other partners) is clear to all native speakers of English. (That jointness is not clear in parcener—see coparcener.) Because copartner adds nothing to the language of the law, it should be avoided. E.g., "The same form of relief was given at law in cases of contribution between cosureties and copartners [read partners]." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 90 (1930). See NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

copartnership is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of partnership—e.g.: "Although, in a strict sense, not a copartnership [read partnership], a joint venture generally is governed by rules and principles applicable to partnership relationships." Austin P. Keller Constr. Co. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 379 N.W.2d 533, 535 (Minn. 1986).

copending is an adj. used to describe two or more applications that are simultaneously on file and active in the Patent Office. See Louis B. Applebaum et al., Glossary of United States Patent Practice 26 (1969). E.g., "Peerless' argument that the application recited the existence of the copending application is misplaced." Gardco Mfg., Inc. v. Herst Lighting Co., 820 F.2d 1209, 1215 (Fed. Cir. 1987).

copesetic. See copacetic.

coplaintiff, though infrequent, is not the nonce word that the OED suggests it is. E.g., "[The] stockholder['s] application was one for intervention as coplaintiff." Auerbach v. Bennett, 393 N.E.2d 994, 995 syl. 5 (N.Y. App. 1979). The word should not be hyphenated after the first syllable—e.g.: "Daughter to Sir Edward Poole and afterwards wife to and co-plaintiff [read coplaintiff] with Sir Ralph Dutton." C.H.S. Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law 425 n.9 (1949). See CO- (A). For the corresponding term, see codefendant.

copulable derives from couple, v.t., not from copulate.

COPULAS, ADVERBS OR ADJECTIVES AFTER. See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (C).

copulate. See fornicate.

copy, v.t., in the sense "to send a copy to" <He copied me with the letter>, is a voguish casualism to be avoided. It is fast becoming standard American lawyer's JARGON. E.g., "It is therefore legitimate to copy [read send a copy to] the recipient's boss." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 138 (1984).

copyeditor. One word

copyleft is a NEOLOGISM jocularly formed as a counteragent to copyright. The brainchild of Richard Stallman, a computer hacker, copyleft is a form of copyright that obliges software users to distribute source code for no more than the cost of reproducing it. E.g., "Stallman's main worry was that some company would take the operating system he wrote, make some changes, and then say that their 'improved' programs were separate inventions and proprietary. To prevent that, he invented a new kind of licensing agreement, the 'Copyleft,' which lets people do anything they want with the software except restrict others' right to copy it." Simson L. Garfinkel, Programs to the People: Computer Whiz Richard Stallman Is Determined to Make Software Free, Tech. Rev., Feb.–Mar. 1991, at 52. copyright. See intellectual property.

copyright, v.t. This verb has existed since the early 19th century. Hence the adjective copyrightable. For a mistaken form, see copywrite.

copyright(ed), adj. For the sense "secured or protected by copyright," copyrighted is the better and by far the more usual form. As an adjective, the form copyright is uncommon enough that it does not sufficiently announce what part of speech it is playing—e.g.: "Thanks and appreciation for the use of copyright [read copyrighted] material." Jefferson D. Bates, Writing with Precision xviii (rev. ed. 1985; repr. 1988).

copywrite is a not infrequent mistake for copyright, v.t. E.g., "[O]wnership of a copyright is something distinct from ownership of a physical object in which the copywritten [read copyrighted] work is embodied." Nika Corp. v. City of Kansas City, 582 F. Supp. 343, 367 (W.D. Mo. 1984). A similar mistake is seen in playwriting for playwrighting.

coram (lit., "in the presence of") begins many of the LATINISMS known to the law. Coram nobis (= before us; the court of King's Bench, originally) was the name of a writ of error directed to a court for review of its own judgments and predicated on alleged errors of fact. E.g., "This is an appeal from a judgment denying this appellant's petition for writ of error coram nobis." Coram vobis (= before you) gave its name to the writ of error by an appellate court to a trial court for correction of the latter's error of fact. These phrases are obsolescent if not obsolete in most jurisdictions.

Two other phrases in which coram appears are coram judice (= in the presence of a judge) and coram populo (= in public). Both are unjustifiable LATINISMS. See coram non judice.

coram non judice = (1) outside the presence of a judge; or (2) before a judge but not the proper one, or one who cannot take legal cognizance of the matter. This is the one LATINISM beginning with coram that is still fairly frequently used. E.g., "When a judge acts in the clear absence of all jurisdiction, the proceeding is coram non judice."/ "If a judge issues a pretended process, one unknown to the law, the proceeding is coram non judice and the judge is liable in trespass to the party injured." See LATINISMS & coram.

corespondent; correspondent. There is an important difference between these terms. In jurisdictions in which appellees are called respondents, corespondent = co-appellee. This word has a more specific legal meaning, however; in divorce suits, when adultery was commonly a ground for divorce, the corespondent was the man charged with the adultery and sued together with the wife, or respondent. E.g., "The judge clearly disbelieved the corespondent, who was the key witness on the issue of adultery." (Eng.)/ "The corespondent cited in the supplemental petition was called and gave evidence of adultery which was completely denied by the wife." (Eng.)

A correspondent, of course, is a letter-writer, an on-location news-gatherer, or a business representative.

corollarily, having appeared in a dozen reported American decisions, may (one hopes) never live more than a shadow of an existence. The OED notes that the adjectival use of corollary is "rare"; the adverbial use is not mentioned, but here it is: "Tenneco corollarily [read also] contends that the trial court erred when it struck affidavits filed by it opposing the motion for summary judgment." Hanover Petroleum Corp. v. Tenneco, Inc., 521 So. 2d 1234, 1236 (La. Ct. App. 1988)./ "Corollarily [read As a corollary], it would follow that such an extent of actual application may occur as to provide substantial probativeness of the reasonableness of the understanding and belief engaged in . . . ." United Medical Labs., Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting Sys., Inc., 404 F.2d 706, 708 (9th Cir. 1968). See SENTENCE ADVERBS.

coroner; coronator. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

corpora. See corpus.

corporal; corporeal. These terms have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. Corporal = of or affecting the body <corporal punishment>. The meaning is unclear here: "He participated in four corporal lineups."

Corporeal = having a physical material body, substantial <corporeal beings, as opposed to spiritual ones>. E.g., "Ancient German law, like ancient Roman law, sees great difficulties in the way of an assignment of a debt or other benefit of a contract; men do not see how there can be a transfer of a right unless that right is embodied in some corporeal thing."

In the following sentence, corporeal is used for corporal: "The court may punish corporeally [read corporally] by imprisonment." The OED calls this usage obsolete, but it persists in odd places—e.g.: "it involves idea [sic] of punishment, corporeal [read corporal] or pecuniary . . . ." Black's Law Dictionary 1133 (6th ed. 1990). See corporeal.

corporate law; corporation law; company law. The usual term in the U.S. for the law of corporations is corporate law. The equivalent in G.B. is company law, q.v. Corporation law is a variant phrase occasionally used. See corporate lawyer.

corporate lawyer; corporation lawyer. There is a subtle distinction. A corporate lawyer is either (1) an office practitioner specializing in corporate law (q.v.), or (2) in-house counsel to a corporation. The phrase is colorless. Corporation lawyer, by contrast, is usu. connotatively charged, referring to a lawyer, usu. a litigator, who represents major corporations and who makes a name as a "mouthpiece" for profitable ventures that may harm the environment, society, or individuals. In other words, those who use the phrase are not, generally speaking, well disposed to the person referred to—e.g.: "[N]o more than any other President did Lincoln look to merit alone; indeed, his first appointment was one of the worst ever made to the Court, for Noah Swayne of Ohio—named as a barefaced sop to certain business interests who were supporting the war for less than idealistic reasons—was a corporation lawyer, as successful as he was callously unethical, who was not to change his spots or his spottiness throughout his long judicial career." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 137 (1955).

corporateness now has only the sense "the quality of being a body corporate [i.e., a corporation]." E.g., "The name of a corporation must contain a word indicating corporateness." Formerly it meant "corpulence" and "bodiliness" as well.

corporation, in the U.S., refers to "an entity (usu. a business) with authority under law to act as a single person, with rights to issue stock and exist indefinitely." In England, corporation (or body corporate, q.v.) is defined more broadly as "an entity that has legal personality, i.e., that is capable of enjoying and being subject to legal rights and duties" (CDL). Often, in G.B., where company is the more usual term, corporation is used elliptically to mean a municipal corporation (= the authorities of a municipality that carry on civic business). See company, corporation sole & juristic person. See also firm.

corporation aggregate. See corporation sole.

corporational is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of corporate. E.g., "A judgment adverse to the plaintiffs on count 2, involving charges that excessive compensation had been paid to the individual defendant as a corporational [read corporate] officer, was affirmed . . . ." Saigh v. Bush, 403 S.W.2d 559, 561 (Mo. 1966).

corporation law. See corporate law.

corporation sole; corporation aggregate. A corporation sole is "an individual, being a member of a series of individuals, who is invested by a fiction with the qualities of a [c]orporation." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 155 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). By a "series of individuals," Maine meant that a continuous legal personality is attributed to successive holders of certain monarchical or ecclesiastical positions, such as kings, bishops, rectors, vicars, and the like.

A corporation aggregate is merely the full name for what we generally know as a corporation; the full phrase generally appears only when a writer contrasts it with a corporation sole.

corporatization. See -IZE.

corporeal; incorporeal. The early common law adopted the Roman distinction between corporeal (= tangible) and incorporeal (= intangible) property, reasoning that land—a material "thing"—has physical substance, whereas a right of way—which is not material—does not. Peter Butt comments that "[m]odern jurisprudence, more familiar with the nature of rights, regards this distinction as unsatisfactory, for incorporeal 'things' are simply rights. A right of way, for example, is simply a right over land, and becomes a 'thing' only by a more or less convenient figure of speech. But the medieval lawyers of England preferred to deal with 'things' and so accepted the Roman classification." Peter Butt, Land Law 302 (2d ed. 1988). See corporal & hereditament(s).

corporeal hereditaments = land and fixtures. The defining words are preferable to this highfalutin LEGALISM, the precise meaning of which is unclear even to some seasoned lawyers. See hereditament(s).

corpus; principal; res; trust property; trust estate; subject matter of the trust. These are the various terms used in reference to the property held by a trustee. Principal, q.v., trust property, and subject matter of the trust are perhaps most comprehensible to nonlawyers and might be preferred on that account. The five terms are widely used in legal writing, however, and it is unlikely that any of them will disappear completely in the next few decades.

Still, the more widely accessible terms may be on the rise. The influential Restatement of Trusts uses trust property in preference to res because the drafters "felt it unnecessary to drag in a Latin word when English words are available and quite sufficient." 1 A.W. Scott & W.F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts § 3.1, at 52 (4th ed. 1987). See res.

Corpus is the Latin word meaning "body." It usually denotes an abstract collection or body . In the following sentences, corpus is used in its most usual legal context, involving trusts: "The corpus of the trust was composed of securities."/ "The trustee was authorized to distribute trust income or corpus to the beneficiaries."/ "The power to pay out trust corpus necessarily involves a power to terminate the trust in whole or in part."

The plural form is corpora. E.g., "[T]he corpora of the trusts were [held] not . . . taxable to the settlor's estate . . . ." State St. Trust Co. v. United States, 263 F.2d 635, 637 (1st Cir. 1959).

Occasionally it is misrendered corpuses—e.g.: "She will have at least $1,500,000 in assets left after the property distribution orders, and current assets and trust corpuses [read corpora]." Weinstein v. Weinstein, 561 A.2d 443, 450 n.4 (Conn. Ct. App. 1989)./ "[D]ifferent aspects of an article may be protected by different corpuses [read corpora] of law." David Bender, Protection of Computer Programs, 47 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 907, 914–15 (1986). The plural is corpora even in the phrase habeas corpus, q.v. See PLURALS (A).

corpus delicti —meaning "the body of a crime" and emphatically not "dead body"—is generally outmoded as a variant of actus reus, q.v. The general sense of corpus delicti is "the nature of the transgression." E.g., "The confession in evidence was an extrajudicial confession—voluntary and without pressure, after caution and after the corpus delicti had been established." McDaniel v. Commonwealth, 32 S.E.2d 667, 670 (Va. 1945).

In cases of feloninus homicide, the corpus delicti is usu. evidence of a death and of a criminal agency as its cause. Thus, corpus delicti "has traditionally been established by proof of the dead body and evidence of an unnatural cause of death." State v. Allen, 197 N.W.2d 874, 876 (Mich. App. 1972). But the dead body is not necessary to establish a corpus delicti. "Despite clarification of the early confusion about the meaning of the Latin idiom . . . as used in homicide cases, there remains, among many laymen at least, some lingering misunderstanding that the corpus delicti in such cases refers to the body of the deceased. It does not, of course, and refers instead to the body (corpus) of the wrong (delicti), 'the loss sustained.'" People v. Williams, 373 N.W.2d 567, 571 (Mich. 1985). See overt act.

The phrase is sometimes misspelled corpus delecti, a sort of macabre etymological double entendre. See delecti.

corpus juris (= the body of law; the law as the sum of laws) is a generic term derived ultimately from the Corpus Juris Civilis, the original name of Justinian's code (534 A.D.). E.g., "The maritime law is not a corpus juris—it is a very limited body of customs and ordinances of the sea." Southern Pacific Co. v. Jensen, 244 U.S. 205, 220 (1917) (Holmes, J., dissenting).

The term remains well known to American lawyers because of the treatise entitled Corpus Juris Secundum; in general contexts, however, it is best to write body of law. See LATINISMS correctable; correctible. The former is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

correctional; corrective. Correctional = of or pertaining to correction, usu. penal correction <correctional institution>. E.g., "He demonstrated by his plea that he is ready and willing to admit his crime and to enter the correctional system in a frame of mind that affords hope for success in rehabilitation." Corrective = tending to correct <corrective measures>.

correctitude; correctness. Correctitude is a PORTMANTEAU WORD or blend of correct and rectitude. It refers to what is proper in conduct or behavior, and has moralistic overtones. E.g., "[T]he local political allies of the west tend to be unrepresentative, dissolute or repressive rulers . . . . Against them Islam seems to provide certainty of belief and correctitude of behaviour." Godfrey Jansen, The Soldiers of Allah, Economist, 27 Jan. 1979, at 45.

Correctness serves as the noun of correct, adj., in all its other senses. E.g., "The correctness of the decision is maintained, with an able and elaborate discussion of reasons and authorities, in Langdell on Contracts."

correctness. See correctitude.

CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS, or conjunctions used in pairs, should frame structurally identical sentence-parts, sometimes called "matching parts." Simple nouns never cause problems: both lions and wolves. When we use constructions with noun phrases and even clauses, however, PARALLELISM may become a problem. Following are examples with some of the more common correlative conjunctions.

A. Neither . . . nor. "The jury may have concluded that the entrance was neither negligently constructed nor maintained [read nor negligently maintained] by the Investment Company."/ "Finding neither error of law or fact [read neither error of law nor error of fact, or error neither of fact nor of law], we affirm."

B. Either . . . or. "Easements can be of either an affirmative or negative nature [read can be either affirmative or negative in nature]." See either (A).

C. Both . . . and. "Both teachers and students have pressed their first amendment rights of free speech to both assign and read materials and to discuss topics of their choice." Using both . . . and twice in one sentence should be avoided. In this sentence note also that students have not pressed to assign materials—only teachers have. One must be certain that all that follows modifies both subjects, not just one. Further, the splitting of the infinitive here adds to the reader's burden; "to both assign" should read "both to assign . . . and to discuss topics of their choice."

D. Although . . . yet. "Although the rule is apparently otherwise in a majority of the other American jurisdictions, yet we hold that statutes of limitation run as well between spouses as between strangers." This construction, like the one illustrated in (E), occurs in formal prose; it has become less and less common to use both although and yet.

E. Notwithstanding . . . yet. "Notwithstanding that the interests may be adverse, yet if they are to be amicably adjusted there may be no impropriety in having each side represented by the same counsel." See (D).

F. Other Correlatives. Some of the other correlatives in English are:

- although . . . nevertheless;
- as . . . as;
- if . . . then;
- just as . . . so;
- not only . . . but also;
- since . . . therefore;
- when . . . then;
- where . . . there;
- whether . . . or.

correspondent. See corespondent.

corrigendum; erratum. These words are used synonymously to note errors made in printing discovered only after the work has been printed. Corrigendum (lit., "correction") is perhaps technically more accurate (inasmuch as a correction is being made). But erratum (lit., "error") is older in English and more common. The plurals are corrigenda and errata.

corroborate. A. Senses and Uses. Corroborate = (1) to support (a statement, argument, etc.) with agreeing statements; to provide or be additional evidence for; to confirm; or (2) to confirm formally (a law, etc.). Sense (1) is more usual: "[T]he evidence of an accomplice must be corroborated." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 157 (1957; repr. 1972).

In either sense, this verb should be transitive <the last witness corroborated the testimony of other witnesses>. The intransitive use ("to give confirmation," in contrast with "to give confirmation to") should be avoided. Thus one writes, "The circumstances corroborate his presence in the city when the crime was committed," not, "The circumstances corroborate with his presence in the city when the crime was committed." In other words, corroborate with is inferior to corroborate.

B. Pronunciation. In October 1991, during Justice Clarence Thomas's confirmation hearings, Senator Biden and other members of the Senate Judiciary Committee consistently pronounced this word as if it were cooberate—in other words, cooperate with a -b- instead of a -p-. The correct pronunciation is /kə-rob-ə-rayt/.

C. And collaborate. The word corroborate is occasionally used where collaborate (= to work jointly with [another] in producing) belongs, as here: "The two scholars corroborated [read collaborated] for more than three years in writing the book."

corroboration = (1) the confirmation of (a statement) by additional evidence; or (2) the formal confirmation of (a law, etc.). Sense (1) is much more common—e.g.: "Because the testimony of a settlor seeking to revoke a trust is likely to be unreliable, and because solemn written instruments are not to be lightly overturned, strong corroboration of the settlor's testimony is required in order to warrant the granting of relief."

corroborative; corroboratory. The former is standard, -tory being a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

corrodible; corrosible. The former is preferable because with it the underlying verb, corrode, is more readily apparent. See -ABLE (A).

corrupter; corruptor. The -er spelling is preferred. See -ER (A). corruptible. See -ABLE (A).

cost-effective and cost-efficient are the current jargonistic adjectival phrases for economical. Cost-effective is more than three times as common as cost-efficient. See VOGUE WORDS.

cost, insurance, and freight is commonly abbreviated C.I.F. For the distinction between it and F.O.B., see F.O.B.

costomal. See custumal.

costs, in the sense of "charges, expenses," is obsolete except in law—the specific definitions of the word being either (1) the charges or fees "taxed" by the court, such as filing fees, jury fees, courthouse fees, and reporter fees; or (2) the expenses of litigation, prosecution, or other legal transaction, especially those allowed in favor of one party against the other. In England—under the English Rule, q.v.—sense (2) applies: costs include not only court charges but also a litigant's attorney's fees. American lawyers sometimes call these litigation costs, as opposed to court costs (or costs of court), which is a more explicit way of using costs in sense (1).

cosurety. So spelled—without a hyphen. See CO- (A). cotemporaneous; cotemporary. See contemporary.

cotenancy; cotenant. The words are so spelled—without a hyphen. (See CO- (A).) The most common types of cotenancies are joint tenancy, q.v., tenancy by the entireties, q.v., and tenancy in common (explained under joint tenancy).

coterminous; coterminant; coterminate; coterminal; conterminous. Conterminous is the oldest and the basic term meaning "having or enclosed within a common boundary." Coterminous, an altered form of the original term, shares the meaning of conterminous but also means "coextensive in extent or duration." For the sake of DIFFERENTIATION, coterminous should be confined to this figurative or metaphorical sense, and conterminous reserved for physical and tangible senses. E.g., "A proprietor whose full rights of ownership extend up to a common terminal with those of the petitioner is an immediately conterminous [read coterminous] proprietor." (Eng.)/ "It cannot be seriously argued as a general matter that the constitutional limits of congressional power are coterminous with the extent of its exercise in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries."

Coterminant, coterminate, and coterminal are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

cotortfeasor is inferior to co-tortfeasor, because the length of the word deceives the eye; in addition, cotort (suggesting cohort) wrongly seems at first to be the primary word rather than tortfeasor. See CO- (A).

couch fee (= sexual favors taken by a lawyer instead of a monetary fee) is a flippant term to denote a serious ethical breach. E.g., "I had heard sotto voce comments about 'couch fees' from other lawyers (and not all of them divorce specialists, either), but this Chicagoan was the first to boast about taking sex from a client in lieu of money." Joseph Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 31 (1978).

could. See should.

could not help but. See cannot help but.

council; counsel. Council (= a deliberative assembly) is primarily a noun. Counsel (= to advise) is primarily a verb, but in legal writing it is used commonly as a noun in the sense "a legal adviser or legal advisers." See counsel & consul.

councillor; counselor. The former is a member of a council, the latter one who gives advice (usu. legal advice). See attorney (A).

councilmanic is an unfortunate adjectival form of councilman, which itself is objectionable to writers who try to avoid SEXISM. The nonsexist council member can substitute for councilman—in which case the manic adjective need not intrude.

counsel. A. Scope of Term. In BrE, counsel is used only of barristers (litigators), whereas in AmE it is frequently used of office practitioners (e.g., general counsel) as well as of litigators. See attorney (A), consul, council & of counsel.

B. Number. Counsel may be either singular or plural; in practice it is usually plural. But examples of the singular use are common enough: "[T]here is no excuse for a counsel who has obtained a thorough understanding of the case at bar . . . presenting to the court a statement [that] has no definite plan, which mingles material and immaterial facts, and which is verbose and discursive." William M. Lile et al., Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 370 (3d ed. 1914)./ "Counsel arguing a case is permitted to assert that a precedent has had unhappy consequences . . . ." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 239 (2d ed. 1985)

More typically, counsel is used as a plural. In 1819, for example, the court reporter in McCulloch v. Maryland wrote: "The Court dispensed with its general rule, permitting only two counsel to argue for each party."

Counsels is sometimes mistakenly used as a plural of counsel—esp. when nonlawyers are writing about the law: "[T]his might seem a strange approach for counsels [read counsel] responsible for representing not just Valeo and Henshaw but the interests of their employers, the U.S. House and Senate as well." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 73 (1988)./ "[F]our lawyers were named Nov. 25 to serve as legal counsels [read counsel] for the transition." Clinton's Justice Review Team Named, Nat'l L.J., 7 Dec. 1992, at 2.

C. For of counsel. See of counsel.

counsel fees. See attorney's fees.

counselless. So spelled in both AmE and BrE. In the wake of Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963) (holding that an indigent criminal defendant must be provided counsel even in a noncapital case), the word is often used in a phrase illustrating HYPALLAGE: counselless convictions. See, e.g., U.S. v. Coyer, 732 F.2d 196, 200–01 (D.C. Cir. 1984) ("the sentencing court had relied upon counselless convictions rendered nugatory by Gideon v. Wainwright"). It is not the convictions that are counselless, of course, but the convicts.

counsel(l)or; counsel(l)ing; counsel(l)able. The preferred spellings are counselor, counseling, and counselable in AmE, and counsellor, counselling, and counsellable in BrE. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS & attorney (A). counselor. See councillor.

count, n. In addition to its use in criminal indictments and informations—in which it means "a part that details or charges a distinct grievance or offense"—this word is used in patent practice to mean "a claim made by the parties to an interference [q.v.]." See Louis B. Applebaum et al., Glossary of United States Patent Practice 28 (1969).

countenance, give . . . to is usually an unnecessary PERIPHRASIS for countenance, v.t. E.g., "Courts have indeed used language that seems to give countenance to [read seems to countenance] the notion that, if a plot is worked out, it cannot be copyrighted."

COUNTER- (= done, directed, or acting against, in opposition to, as a rejoinder or reply to another thing of the same kind already made or in existence [OED]) is a common prefix in law because of our adversary system. About half the modern examples in the OED are unhyphenated; the better practice nowadays is not to hyphenate such a prefix. Among the law words, both nouns and verbs, beginning with this prefix are these:

counteraccusation	counternotice
counteraffidavit	counteroffer counteraffirmation	counterperformance counterappeal	counterpetition countercondemnation	counterplea counterdeclaration	counterpromise counterestoppel	counterproof counterexplanation	countersign counterfactual	counterstatement countergift	countersue
counterinterpretation	countertitle counterlaw	countersuggestion counterlegislation	countervindication

Sometimes the prefix is doubled up: "And if, by any chance, the boss had come back at Tony with 'How about fifty-five?', that would have been a counter-counter-offer involving an Implied, etc." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 30 (1939; repr. 1980).

counterclaim is one word, unhyphenated. See COUNTER-. For the meaning of counterclaim, see cross-claim.

counterfactual, n., is, like its better-known synonym hypothetical, an attributive noun. E.g., "The 'but for' standard requires the factfinder to address a counterfactual: whether a prosecutor would have struck the challenged Afro-American jurors if his decisions had not been clouded by impermissible racial considerations." Wilkerson v. Texas, 493 U.S. 924, 926 (1989) (Marshall, J., dissenting)./ "The last counterfactual is the easiest." Shelton v. Office of Workers' Compensation Programs, 899 F.2d 690, 692 (7th Cir. 1990).

The word sometimes remains an adjective—e.g.: "This type of statement is a counterfactual conditional statement, i.e., it is conditional in form and runs counter to fact." Maddocks v. Bennett, 456 P.2d 453, 460 n 11 (Alaska 1969).

Whether as a noun or as an adjective, though, counterfactual is unusual enough to be slightly pompous in place of hypothetical. See COUNTER-.

counterfeiting; forgery. These words overlap to some degree. To counterfeit (lit., to imitate) means to unlawfully make false money that passes for the genuine. Before the advent of paper money, the distinction between counterfeiting and forgery was clear because it referred only to the making of false metallic coins. To forge (lit., to falsify or fabricate) is to fraudulently make or alter a document in a way that harms another's rights. In reference to paper money, then, the two words are virtually interchangeable. See forgery.

countermand, n. & v.t. This word is most commonly a verb meaning (1) "to annul (an earlier command or action) by a contrary command" <the partner countermanded the previous assignment>; or (2) "to recall by a contrary order" <countermanding that shipment>. Sense (1) is most usual—e.g.:

- "The day before the Indianapolis hearing, the judge called Mr. Atanga and, countermanding his earlier entry, ordered Mr. Atanga to be in Lafayette the next day." In re Atanga, 636 N.E.2d 1253, 1258 (Ind. 1994) Sullivan, Jr., dissenting).
- "In fact, Brown's employees testified that they had the authority to countermand Fontenot's orders to perform personal work if Freeman was needed at the store." Hebert v. Gigna, 637 So. 2d 1221, 1225 (La. Ct. App. 1994).
- "In May 1989, Brownlow countermanded an order for a piece of equipment that Jones had placed with a dealer on behalf of the Corporation." Cecil Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. Jones, 644 A.2d 529, 532 (Md. Ct. App. 1994).
- "The order must be signed by a party, received by the financial institution prior to death, and not countermanded by other written order of the same party prior to death." Jordan v. Burgbacher, 883 P.2d 458, 463 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1994) (synopsizing a statute).

But sense (2) also occurs in legal contexts—e.g.: "The court distinguished Chan Siew Lai on the basis that when a bank issues a cashier's check the check becomes the primary obligation of the bank and the purchaser has no authority to countermand a cashier's check because of fraud allegedly practiced on the purchaser by the payee." Godat v. Mercantile Bank of Northwest County, 884 S.W.2d 1, 4 (Mo. Ct. App. 1994) (en banc).

As a noun, countermand refers to either (1) a contrary command or order that revokes or annuls an earlier one; or (2) an action that nullifies something previously executed. Sense (2) is the more specific legal one, but sense (1) predominates in both legal and nonlegal contexts—e.g.: "So far as the record shows, there was no countermand of the direction in the telegram and no effort on the part of Dyches or his attorney to have the appeal brought before the appellate court . . . ." Dyches v. Ellis, 199 S.W.2d 694, 697 (Tex. Civ. App.—Austin 1947).

Countermandment, labeled "obsolete" in the OED, really ought to be so. But because it still lives, it could be more aptly described as a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "The Bank contends, however, that in some circumstances a cashier's check should be subject to countermandment [read countermand], like a certified check, where the issuance is a result of error or fraud and the rights of no other party have intervened." Foreman v. Martin, 286 N.E.2d 80, 82 (Ill. App. Ct. 1972).

counteroffer; cross-offer. In the law of contract, a counteroffer is an offeree's new offer that varies the terms of the original offer and that therefore constitutes a rejection of the original offer. (See COUNTER-.) A cross-offer, by contrast, is an offer made to another in ignorance that the offeree has made the same offer.

counterproof, n. The OED prematurely calls this word, meaning "evidence in opposition to other evidence," obsolete. American lawyers continue to find it useful—e.g.: "If the proof and counterproof on the issue depend upon the credibility factors or inferences to be drawn from conflicting evidence, the question is one of fact for the jury." U.S. v. Martinez, 429 F.2d 971, 976 (9th Cir. 1970)./ "A fair rule either would afford this chance or would restrict the prosecution's counterproof in the same way his own is limited." Michelson v. U.S., 335 U.S. 469, 493 (1948) (Rutledge, J., dissenting). See COUNTER-.

countersignature = a second signature attesting to the authenticity of the instrument on which it appears. The OED traces this word back to 1842, but in fact it appeared some 35 years earlier in AmE: "The act, as to the countersignature by the secretary and recording the same, is directory . . . ." Philips v. Erwin, 19 F. Cas. 500, 500 (C.C.D.N.C. 1807) (No. 11,093). Countersign is the verb. See COUNTER-.

countersue is a nontechnical way of saying counterclaim, v.t. E.g., "Mr. Aboud countersued, claiming he had losses of $200,000 because casino employees had given him free drinks." R.B. Smith, Casinos May Be Held Liable for Drunken Patrons [sic] Losses, Wall St. J., 23 June 1989, at B1. See COUNTER-.

countervail = to counterbalance; to compensate for. This word is probably used 100 times in legal writing for every time it appears in nonlegal writing. E.g., "The interests of nonminorities in not taking another test do not sufficiently countervail these needs."

The word most often appears as a participial adjective. E.g., "Vidrine filed no countervailing affidavits."/ "Nevertheless, countervailing policy considerations have been evident ever since the Statutes of Mortmain, restricting the amounts of wealth that may be transferred out of the normal channels of social organization." There is nothing inherently wrong with the word, but countervailing considerations is on the verge of becoming a legal CLICHÉ.

countez was, at common law, the Law French term that the court crier used in numbering the jury, but it was soon corrupted into count these, as Blackstone explained: "Of this ignorance [of Law Latin and Law French] we may see daily instances in the abuse of two legal terms of ancient French; one, the prologue to all proclamations, 'oyez, or hear ye,' which is generally pronounced most unmeaningly, 'O yes'; the other, a more pardonable mistake, viz. when the jury are all sworn, the officer bids the crier number them, for which the word in law-french is 'countez'; but we hear it pronounced in very good English, 'count these.'" 4 William Blackstone, Commentaries 334 n. (1769). See oyez.

countless applies only to COUNT NOUNS. E.g., "Porters recently have been carrying countless baggage to and from passengers' cars." One may have countless bags but not countless baggage. See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS. Count nouns are those that denote enumerable things, and that are capable of forming plurals (e.g., cases, parties, settlements, offers); mass (noncount) nouns are often abstract nouns—they cannot be enumerated (e.g., mitigation, courage, mud). Many nouns can be both count ("He gave several talks") and mass ("Talk is cheap"), depending on the sense. These are few, however, in comparison to the nouns that are exclusively either count or mass. Use of these two types of nouns may implicate problems with NUMBER, especially when the use of count nouns strays into a use of mass nouns or vice versa. See PLURALS (B).

A. Fewer and less. A good rule of thumb is to use fewer to modify plural nouns (calories, soldiers) and less to modify singular nouns (unemployment, discrimination). A beer may have fewer, but not less, calories. See less (A).

B. Treating a Mass Noun as a Count Noun. One may have a "congeries of negligent acts," but not a "congeries of negligence." Some writers mistakenly treat mass nouns as if they were countable—e.g.: "For every violence [read every act of violence], there is a victim."/ "A compliance with [read Compliance with] the demand would have exposed defendant to danger of bodily harm." For a similar example, see miscellaneous. See also PLURALS (B). On a related point, see COLLECTIVE NOUNS.

country. In the 12th through the 14th centuries, a jury was a body of neighborhood witnesses summoned to decide by their sworn verdict (q.v.) a dispute between litigants. The controverted facts were said to be tried by the country (L. patria, Fr. pays), which came to be the equivalent in law to "jury." To this day—though somewhat archaically—a litigant demanding a jury sometimes puts himself (or herself) upon the country (L. ponit se super patriam). So it was in medieval times: "The normal administration of justice was restored in 1218, and the justices found the gaols full of criminals whom they could not try—unless they allowed the accused to 'put themselves upon their country' (a jury of neighbours), on the general question of guilt or innocence; and that was the solution adopted." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 61 (1966).

country lawyer (= a rural lawyer, usu. a general practitioner, who knows the ways of the people). Unlike city lawyer, the term country lawyer carries a connotation that is sometimes neutral, sometimes positive, sometimes negative. E.g., (Neutral) "The testator was a country lawyer who had acquired a large estate, both real and personal." McClellan v. MacKenzie, 126 F. 701, 702 (6th Cir. 1903)./ (Positive) "The Judge having been a country lawyer himself took a fatherly interest in my career . . . ." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 52 (1943)./ (Negative) "The rule of reason . . . should now allow one to put an antitrust theory of liability or justification into terms that a country lawyer can understand." Lawrence A. Sullivan, The Viability of the Current Law on Horizontal Restraints, 75 Calif. L. Rev. 835, 847 (1987). Cf. city lawyer.

county, n., in 20th-century American lawyers' slang, is a shortening of county detective. E.g., "Directly opposite on the same corridor was a large room given over to process servers known as 'county detectives' or 'counties.'" Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 87 (1943).

coup de grace. This GALLICISM is sometimes mispronounced /koo-də-grah/, as if the last word were spelled gras (as in pâté de foie gras). The correct pronunciation is /koo-də-grahs/.

COUPLED SYNONYMS. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM STRINGS.

coupled with, like together with, q.v., results in a singular and not a plural verb when it couples two singular nouns—e.g.: "The absence of crude petroleum and iron ore, coupled with limited indigenous supplies of coal and natural gas, ensures [not ensure] that Japanese industry must import to survive." Roger Buckley, Japan Today 67 (2d ed. 1990).

couple (of) dozen, hundred, etc. It is slipshod to omit the of in such a construction as this: "Is a used toilet seat worth $1 million? Or even a couple [read couple of] hundred thousand dollars?" Lindsey Gruson, Is It Art or Just a Toilet Seat? Bidders Will Have to Decide, N.Y. Times, 15 Jan. 1992, at B1.

coupon should be pronounced /koo-pon/. The first syllable is distressingly often sounded as /kyu/. This pronunciation betrays an ignorance of French and of the finer points of English.

course, as (a matter) of. See as of course & of course.

court. A. Metonymy. Court is frequently used as a metonymic substitute for judge. E.g., "The court himself, possessed of a countenance and bearing elsewhere commanding, appeared little more than a pygmy here, in spite of his elevation on the bench." (Ex. fr. H.W. Horwill, Modern American Usage 88 (1935).)/ "The district court again stated the opinion that he disagreed with the circuit court and its conclusion bearing on the sufficiency of evidence."/ "In our opinion, it would seriously restrict the trial court's ability to partition the community estate fairly if he had no power to direct the named insured of title to life insurance policies that are an integral part of the community estate." This usage has sometimes bemused nonlawyers: "In the sometimes-strange jargon of jurists, the words court and judge were often synonymous." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 155 (1989; repr. 1991).

B. As a Collective Noun. Today court is used in AmE as a COLLECTIVE NOUN taking a singular verb. In BrE, the plural verb usually appears with this noun when more than one judge sits on the court: "The court of appeal have concurred." (Eng.) Long ago, this construction was common even in the U.S.: "The Court were unanimously of opinion, that writs of error to remove causes to this court from inferior courts, can regularly issue only from the clerk's office of this court." West v. Barnes, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 401, 401 (1791) (mem.).

C. Open court, in. See open court, in.

court costs. See costs.

court crier. See crier.

court, go to; come to court. The former is the usu. AmE phrase, the latter the usu. BrE phrase. See come to court.

courthouse. One word.

court-made is frequently used as an equivalent of judge-made—e.g.: "Although it is commonly said that when the United States sues, it comes into court on an equality with private litigants, in fact it enjoys a number of advantages, both statutory and court-made . . . ." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 114–15 (4th ed. 1983). See judge-made.

court-martial is hyphenated both as noun and as verb. The OED lists the verb as colloquial, an observation now antiquated. As to spelling, in AmE, the final -l is not doubled in court-martialed and court-martialing, although in BrE it is. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS. The plural of the noun is courts-martial.

In older texts, the term is sometimes rendered martial court—e.g.: "[A] martial court must needs in the present case confine its attention to the blow's consequence . . . ." Herman Melville, Billy Budd 66 (1891; repr. [Signet ed.] 1979). See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

court of appeal(s). Both forms appear, but appeals is more common in AmE, whereas appeal is the only form in BrE. The correct form is the statutorily prescribed or the customary form of a given jurisdiction. Following is an example of the less usual American form: "In 93 Cal. App. 2d 43, the Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment."

For the proper possessive form with court of appeals, see POSSESSIVES (G).

Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. This American court, created in 1909, no longer exists, having been merged in 1982 into the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit.

court of first instance = (1) a court in which any proceedings are initiated; or (2) the trial court as opposed to an appellate court. The CDL marks sense (2) as a loose usage, but the great historian Theodore F.T. Plucknett appears to have used it in this sense: "There was thus one court of appeal and one court of first instance." A Concise History of the Common Law 211 (5th ed. 1956). See first instance.

Court of International Trade. Originally this court, created in 1909, was known as the Board of General Appraisers, then as the Customs Court, and, since 1980, as the Court of International Trade. It hears cases involving customs and duties.

court of justice is a solemn and slightly antique equivalent of court of law. E.g., "Men go from a court of justice, after witnessing a severe contest, and in reporting their opinion of the arguments, they will say that one of the advocates had no fault that they can precisely define, and yet there was a prevailing heaviness or a want of impressiveness." Edward T. Channing, "Judicial Eloquence," in Lectures Read to the Seniors in Harvard College 98, 103 (1856; repr. [Dorothy I. Anderson & Waldo W. Braden eds.] 1968).

court of law, formerly used in contrast with court of equity, is now a formal phrase for court, which suffices in ordinary legal contexts. E.g., "The word 'say' is important in this context, because when a document is under scrutiny in a court of law, attention will be paid only to what, as a piece of natural language, it appears actually to declare." (Eng.) Today court of law often merely emphasizes the dignity of the judicial institution referred to; but in a few jurisdictions, and certainly in historical contexts, it may usefully distinguish a lawcourt from a court of equity or from some other type of court. Cf. court of justice. See lawcourt.

court, open. See open court.

Court-packing plan. This phrase refers to President Franklin D. Roosevelt's plan, presented to Congress on February 5, 1937, to appoint six new justices to the U.S. Supreme Court. It would have enabled him to appoint a new judge to supplement any judge who, upon reaching 70, did not retire. With more than six sitting judges over that age, the plan would have ensured that Roosevelt could win judicial approval of the New Deal program. "The bitter fight that led to the defeat of this 'court-packing' plan," writes the leading scholar on federal courts, "has given the notion of a nine-man Court such sanctity that it is unlikely that the size will again be changed." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 13 (4th ed. 1983).

court papers = all papers that a party files with the court, including pleadings. Technically, pleadings has a restricted sense—referring to complaints, answers, counterclaims, cross-claims, and the like, but not to motions, notices, petitions for leave, and other court papers. American lawyers frequently use pleadings loosely as if it were synonymous with court papers (known also as suit papers)—e.g.: "That record . . . is made up of all the 'suit papers,' the pleadings in the case . . . ." John Kaplan & Jon R. Waltz, Cases and Materials on Evidence 1 (5th ed. 1984). See pleadings (B).

The phrase court papers is often shortened to papers—e.g.: "The papers filed today by the prosecuting team . . . were in response to the motion of Mr. Barry's lawyers." B. Drummond Ayres, Capital Mayor Used Drugs Many Times, Court Is Told, N.Y. Times, 21 April 1990, at 8.

court reporter. Before 1900, this phrase usually denoted a set of books, as in Superior Court Reporter. By the late 19th century, however, it had taken on a new sense: "one, usu. a stenographer, who records and transcribes court proceedings, depositions, and the like." E.g., "A court reporter, though a sworn public officer, receiving a fixed salary for his labors, is not, in the absence of a statute, deprived of any privilege of taking out a copyright, which he would otherwise have." Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U.S. 617, 617 (1888). For more on the term reporter, see report (A).

In journalism, the phrase court reporter commonly refers to a journalist whose beat is a royal court—e.g.: "The book by Mr Whitaker, the Daily Mirror's court reporter, is the most gripping. Charles, he reveals, slept with his mistress, Camilla, two nights before he married Di." Westenders, Economist, 19 June 1993, at 94.

courtroom. So spelled—without a hyphen.

Court Street lawyer = a disreputable, wheeling-and-dealing New York lawyer practicing in Brooklyn near Court Street, where many state and federal courts are located. E.g., "Newfield countered the report by writing that the author of the report was a 'Court Street' lawyer 'with ties to the Brooklyn clubhouses' and had interviewed only the plaintiff in preparing the report." Rinaldi v. Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 366 N.E.2d 1299, 1304 (N.Y. 1977)./ "[I]f Mr. Halpern was not a Wall Street lawyer, nor was he a Court Street lawyer, at least not as that term is usually used—a synonym for ambulance chaser, fast talker, exploiter of the miserable." David Margolick, At the Bar, N.Y. Times, 9 Feb. 1990, at B11. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A) court suit (BrE) = lawsuit. E.g., "The legal challenges, involving more than 40 court suits, are still far from over." Towering Troubles, Economist, 30 Sept.–6 Oct. 1989, at 26.

cousinhood; cousinage. Cousinage has the disadvantage of possible confusion with cozenage (= fraud); thus cousinhood might be considered preferable.

couth, a BACK-FORMATION from uncouth, has never been accepted by authorities as a proper word.

covenant, n., = (1) a promise made in a deed; or (2) an obligation burdening or favoring a landowner. Sense (1) is the strict one, sense (2) being less fastidious but probably more common. For example, in referring to the various covenants that are implied by law into a lease in the absence of an agreement—such as the covenant for quiet enjoyment and the covenant against encumbrances – the word covenant is synonymous with term, q.v. See condition (A), restrictive covenant & warranty (A), (B).

Commentators frequently remark how much covenant has slipped from its traditional moorings—e.g.: "In equity, . . . an equitable right in rem arises in favor of the covenantee, his heirs and assigns, when the parties intended that the restriction should bind the estate of the covenantor or promisor for the benefit of the land of the covenantee or promisee. The use of the term 'covenant' in these cases is hardly justified, because the promise may be without seal or by parol." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 456 (1930).

covenant, v.i. & v.t. To covenant is to enter into a covenant or formal agreement, to agree or subscribe to by promise under seal. E.g., "A father covenants to transfer an estate to his daughter and her husband-to-be."/ "Other claims made by the appellant in respect of dispositions made by himself were allowed but the claim to deduct Mrs. Reynolds's covenanted payments was disallowed." (Eng.) Nonlawyers are unaccustomed to the legal uses of the word; ordinarily, in modern contexts, the better practice is to write agree. See contract (D).

covenant and agree is a needless doublet common in DRAFTING. Agree suffices in virtually every context in which the phrase appears. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS covenantee = the person to whom a promise by covenant is made. E.g., "And the use thus raised would be executed by the Statute of Uses, thereby transferring the legal estate to the covenantee." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 186 (2d ed. 1988)./ "A restraint is only valid if it goes no further than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee's interest." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 406 (8th ed. 1991). (On the position of only in the last-quoted sentence, see only.) See -EE.

covenant not to compete. See noncompetition covenant.

covenant of seisin; covenant of good right to convey. These phrases are synonymous. In a deed, either phrase assures the grantee that the grantor is, at the time of the conveyance, the lawful owner with power to convey the land.

covenantor; covenanter. This agent noun, meaning "the person who makes a promise by covenant," is preferably spelled -or. See -ER (A).

coverages. This plural of what has traditionally been a mass noun is now common—e.g.: "Mr. P. is being paid a salary of approximately $61,000 per year including certain insurance coverages." See PLURALS (B) & COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

covert; overt. Covert is best pronounced like covered, except with a -t- at the end /kəv-ərt/. Still, /koh-vərt/, nearly rhyming with overt (but for the accented syllable), is the more common pronunciation in AmE nowadays. See discovert.

coverture = the condition or position of a woman during her married life, when she is by law under the authority and protection of her husband (OED). The word reeks of SEXISM, although it is unobjectionable in historical contexts. Traditionally used only in reference to wives, this word has recently been applied to husbands as well: "In community-property jurisdictions, with some exceptions, the spouse has an interest during coverture in the community fund."/ "At common law, dower attached only to an estate of inheritance of which the husband was seised at some time during coverture."

Usually, in contemporary contexts, some phrase such as during marriage will suffice in place of the legalistic during coverture. E.g., "Community property is a system of regulating rights and obligations of husband and wife during coverture [read during marriage]."

coworker. So spelled—without a hyphen. See CO- (A) & co-employee.

cozen is a literary and archaic word meaning "to cheat." The word has never been used as a specific legal term, and is generally to be avoided in legal writing. See cousinhood.

cozenage. See cousinhood.

-CRACY. See GOVERNMENTAL FORMS.

cramdown, a late 20th-century term now common in bankruptcy law, refers to a reorganization plan that creditors are required to accept as long as the plan attains minimum standards established by the Bankruptcy Code. E.g., "Section 1129(b)(1) of the bankruptcy code [11 U.S.C.] provides that a debtor may 'cram down' its plan over the objection of a creditor 'if the plan does not discriminate unfairly, and is fair and equitable with respect to each class . . . .'" In re D & F Constr., Inc., 865 F.2d 673, 675 (5th Cir. 1989).

creator is a somewhat exalted name for one who establishes a trust. E.g., "The second type of statute provides that where the creator of such trust reserves to himself for his own benefit a power of revocation, a court, at the suit of any creditor of the creator, may compel the exercise of such power of revocation so reserved, to the same extent and under the same conditions that such creator could have exercised them." See settlor.

creature. Legal idiom has developed a peculiar kind of taxonomy, in which legal doctrines or principles are described as creatures. E.g., "Adoption, in this country, is entirely a creature of statute and is unknown at common law."/ "The cause of action is wholly a creature of equity." The OED quotes the following English example from 1855: "The railway and the rights of the railway are the creatures of the Act of Parliament." A useful phrase, creature of etc. should not be so overworked as to become another tiresome legal CLICHÉ.

credal. See cre(e)dal.

credible; credulous; creditable. Credible = believable; credulous = gullible, tending to believe; and creditable = worthy of credit, laudable. See incredible.

credit (= to give credence to) for believe, now almost peculiar to legal writing, is an acceptable though slightly pretentious legal idiom: "Black and Danley contradicted each other in their testimony, and the court credited Danley."/ "It may be that the court below did not consider such evidence substantial or did not credit its validity, but we are unable to determine from a silent record the thought processes of the court below."/ "The trial judge was entitled to credit her testimony."

creditable; credulous. See credible.

credulity (= gullibility) should not be confused with credibility (= believability), as it is in the phrase it strains credulity—e.g.: "It simply strains credulity [read credibility] for the Court to assert that 'propaganda' is a neutral classification." Meese v. Keene, 481 U.S. 465, 490 (1987) (Blackmun, J., dissenting)./ "[I]t strains credulity [read credibility] to argue that Congress simply assumed that one view rather than the other would govern." Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 93 (1983) (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

cre(e)dal. The preferred spelling is creedal; the spelling credal is a nonstandard variant.

crevice; crevasse. These two words are often confused. A crevice is a narrow crack or break, as in a sidewalk or a wall. A crevasse is a large split or rupture, as in a levee, glacier, or embankment. E.g., "It is a fundamental principle that no damages lie against federal or state government, or local agencies, on account of an accidental crevasse in the levees."

Crevice is pronounced /krev-is/, and crevasse /krə-vas/.

crier (= a court officer who calls the court to order) has the variant spelling cryer, which is to be eschewed. Today the bailiff usually acts as crier; hence bailiff has almost supplanted the term crier, which sometimes appears in the phrase court crier: "Adam Johnson testified that he was a deputy marshal, and was court crier on April 17, 1902, and was in court when the order was made for the open venire . . . ." Richards v. U.S., 126 F. 105, 107 (9th Cir. 1903). See hear ye, oyez & *countez.

crim. con. See criminal conversation.

crime = any social harm that the law defines and makes punishable. Broadly speaking, this term is to be distinguished from civil wrong or tort. An important point for the novice is to avoid trying to distinguish the two on the basis of the act giving rise to the crime or civil wrong, because the same act may be both a crime and a civil wrong. For example, a murder may be both criminal and tortious—including such torts as assault, battery, and wrongful death. The act may give rise both to a criminal prosecution (seeking punishment) and to a civil suit for damages (seeking redress).

Interestingly, this distinction is a modern one. In the early days of the common law, criminal law was also the law of torts, so that, as Plucknett put it, "the modern distinction between crime and tort is . . . one of those classifications [that] it is futile to press upon mediaeval law." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 422 (5th ed. 1956). See criminal offense.

crime against nature. See EUPHEMISMS crime, infamous. See infamous crime.

crimen falsi (lit., "the crime of falsifying") has gradually grown from describing crimes such as perjury and forgery to include any crime involving dishonesty, fraud, or corruption. It is a handy phrase—not a pointless LATINISM—because a paraphrase uses up many more words and is more cumbersome to repeat again and again. E.g., "This case presents the question whether a district court has the discretion . . . to prohibit the impeachment of a witness with a conviction for a crime involving dishonesty or false statement (a crimen falsi)." U.S. v. Toney, 615 F.2d 277, 278 (5th Cir. 1980).

The plural form is crimina falsi, which is the form that should have appeared here: "[T]he House Committee on the Judiciary amended the bill to permit admission only of prior convictions of crimen falsi [read crimina falsi]." James McMahon, Note, Prior Convictions Offered for Impeachment in Civil Trials, 54 Fordham L. Rev. 1063, 1071 (1986).

The phrase is commonly written with the words reversed (falsi crimen). Either version is good Latin—and falsi crimen better approximates English word-order—but crimen falsi is slightly more common.

crime of passion. See crime passionnel.

crime passionnel; crime passionel. The English phrase crime of passion is perfectly serviceable. If the GALLICISM must appear, however, the better form is with two ens (-nn-) in the second word criminal = (1) of or relating to crime <criminal justice>; or (2) constituting a crime <criminal activities>. The adjective is analogous, then, to grammatical, which of course is proper in the phrase grammatical error (grammatical here meaning not "complying with grammar" but "relating to grammar"). It is quite proper—and hardly risible—to speak of a criminal judge, a criminal lawyer, or the criminal bar, just as it is to speak of the criminal law.

criminal abortion. See abortion.

criminal action—as opposed to criminal prosecution—is, strictly speaking, considered a solecism in BrE, in which action is reserved for civil lawsuits. See Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 4 (11th ed. 1982) ("'Criminal action' . . . is a misnomer"). In AmE, though, the phrase is quite common and quite unobjectionable.

criminal attempt. See attempt (A).

criminal conversation = (1) unlawful sexual intercourse with a married person; or (2) a tort action based on such unlawful intercourse. The idea of using conversation in this way is not merely modern euphemizing. In the Renaissance, conversation fairly routinely referred to sexual intercourse or intimacy. In modern law, then, this phrase—commonly abbreviated crim. con.—is an ARCHAISM more than a EUPHEMISM.

At common law, the tort action could be maintained by a husband but not by a wife. In the several American jurisdictions in which it remains a cause of action today, that double-standard has been erased, so that wives as well as husbands may sue. Criminal conversation was abolished in England in 1857.

To the extent that it can be differentiated from alienation of affections, the distinction is this: criminal conversation might result, for example, from a one-time act of adultery that does not affect the wayward spouse's affections, whereas an alienation of affections occurs when the wayward spouse's emotions are affected in such a way as to deprive the other of consortium.

criminal damage. See malicious damage.

criminal intent is used in a variety of ways: (1) to refer to the intent to do wrong; (2) to refer to the intent to break a specific law; (3) to serve as the equivalent of mens rea, q.v., being the mental element requisite for guilt of the offense charged; (4) to serve as a synonym for criminal negligence. Surveying the semantic confusion, Rollin Perkins has suggested a tidy distinction: "Some other term such as mens rea or guilty mind should be employed for more general purposes, and 'criminal intent' be restricted to those situations in which there is (1) an intent to do the actus reus [q.v.], and (2) no circumstance of exculpation." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 834 (3d ed. 1982).

criminality = the quality or fact of being criminal. E.g., "But the use, until 1963, of the M'Naghten Rules to excuse insane cruelty and refuse divorce on that ground shows that unfortunate hints of criminality still attach to a divorce suit (there is generally too much talk of the 'innocent' and the 'guilty' party)." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 403 (1966). This term has the NEEDLESS VARIANTS criminalness and criminalty, neither of which should appear in modern legal writing.

criminalize, an Americanism coined in the 1950s, means "to make illegal; to outlaw." E.g., "Relying on . . . Iowa Code § 721.2 . . . , which criminalizes subornation of perjury, the Iowa court concluded that . . . Robinson's actions . . . were required." Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 162 (1986)./ "Many experts believe that restricting abortion would prove about as successful as Prohibition, when a small but vocal minority managed to criminalize liquor." The Battle Over Abortion, Newsweek, 1 May 1989, at 30. See -IZE.

criminal law, a phrase that often includes the entirety of what we know as the administration of criminal justice, can encompass several legal fields: substantive criminal law, criminal procedure, law enforcement, and penology. Generally, however, a lawyer who speaks of criminal law means the substantive criminal law. See civil law (A). criminal lawyer. See grammatical error.

criminally = (1) in a criminal manner <he acted criminally>; or (2) under criminal law <criminally liable>. Sense (2) is largely confined to lawyers' writing—e.g.: "[T]he wrongdoer may be prosecuted criminally." J.N. Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence § 1051, at 114–15 (Symons ed., 5th ed. 1941).

criminal mischief. See malicious mischief.

criminalness; criminalty. See criminality.

criminal offense; crime. In distinguishing between these expressions, the U.S. Supreme Court has suggested that the former is broader because it includes petty offenses: "[W]hen the change [in Article III of the Constitution] was made from 'criminal offenses' to 'crimes,' and made in the light of the popular understanding of the meaning of the word 'crimes,' . . . it is obvious that the intent was to exclude from the constitutional requirement of a jury the trial of petty criminal offenses." Schick v. U.S., 195 U.S. 65, 70 (1904). Whether this distinction would hold today is doubtful—criminal offense seeming to be nothing more than a verbose synonym of crime.

criminal protector. See perpetrator.

criminate; incriminate. Incriminate is now the more usual form in both AmE and BrE, although 100 years ago criminate was the more common of the two. Today it is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "The constable told the prisoner that he need not say anything to criminate [read incriminate] himself, but that what he did say would be taken down and used as evidence against him." (Eng.)/ "This Act qualifies the rule that a witness is not bound to answer questions that criminate [read incriminate] himself by declaring that he is not excused from answering questions that fix him with a civil liability." (Eng.)/ "In the law of evidence, the privilege against self-crimination [read (today) self-incrimination] signifies the mere negation of a duty to testify." (Hohfeld)/ "In trials of contested elections, . . . no person shall be permitted to withhold his testimony on the ground that it may criminate [read incriminate] himself . . . ." Colo. Const. art. 7, § 9. See incriminate.

criminative; criminatory. These are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of incriminatory, q.v. See criminate.

criminous = (1) of the nature of a crime; (2) accusing of a crime; or (3) (of a person) guilty of a crime. Although the historical term criminous clerks is quite proper in reference to those who at common law availed themselves of the benefit of clergy, q.v., the word criminous is a pompous ARCHAISM when used as a NEEDLESS VARIANT of criminal—e.g.: "Mr. Fischl's intentions were quite sufficient, in our view, to make his conduct criminous [read criminal]." U.S. v. Fischl, 797 F.2d 306, 311 (6th Cir. 1986)./ "This belief goes beyond the assumption that many suspects are criminous [read criminal] by nature or profession." Marc

crit; critter. These are slang words referring to an adherent of Critical Legal Studies. E.g., "Harvard may no longer be 'the Beirut of legal education,' as one Crit denied tenure charged, but it's still full of land mines." Ken Emerson, When Legal Titans Clash, N.Y. Times, 22 April 1990, § 6 at 26, 28./ "This is a piece about the crits for people who do not like them." John D. Ayer, Not So Fast on the Crits, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 45 (1990). See Critical Legal Studies.

criterion is the (orig. Gk.) singular, criteria the plural. Oddly, a number of writers somehow believe the word ends in -ium and therefore use the mistaken form criterium—e.g.:

- "The record, at present, does not indicate which, if any, of the individuals named as defendants may meet this criterium [read criterion]." Heller v. Bushey, 759 F.2d 1371, 1375–76 (9th Cir. 1985).
- "But no matter how much people made it, it was still subjective, and made on a subjective criterium [read criterion]." Wallace v. Department of the Air Force, 879 F.2d 829, 837 (Fed. Cir. 1989) (Skelton, J., dissenting).
- "So far as the fourth service plan criterium [read criterion], the court found a hint of change, where cleanliness around the home seemed to pick up . . . ." In re J.M., 858 P.2d 118, 122 (Okla. Ct. App. 1993).
- "Finally, Montgomery's fourth criterium [read criterion] is difficult to apply to the instant case because the State was not requested to explain it's [read its] proffer of the injured patrons [sic] evidence." Duncantelle v. State, 877 S.W.2d 859, 862 (Tex. App.—Beaumont 1994).

This word is troublesome in various other ways. For example, one infrequently sees—though not infrequently enough—the double-plural form criterias. And the plural criterions was tried for a time but failed to become standard.

Writers often want to make criteria a singular—e.g.: "The determining criteria [read criterion] is the function of the attorneys' fees in the litigation process."/ "Appellant contends that the trial court used an improper criteria [read criterion] and denied appellant due process by basing its decision on its prior belief." Cf. phenomena.

Criterion has even been mistaken as a plural, perhaps because criteria is so frequently misused as a singular: "In Johnson, a panel of this court noted that it was appropriate to carefully review the basis upon which the district court made its award, upon finding that improper criterion [read criteria] were utilized." See PLURALS (A).

critter. See crit.

Critical Legal Studies describes a vaguely defined movement involving lawyer-intellectuals—mostly with leftist leanings—who have tried to posit a new method of discussing law by borrowing from deconstructionist philosophy and Marxist rhetoric, among other disparate sources. Adherents generally call themselves crits (q.v.), critters, or CLSers. For the most part, their writings are characterized by a newfangled vocabulary and ABSTRACTITIS. See Mark Kelman, A Guide to Critical Legal Studies (1987); Roberto Unger, The Critical Legal Studies Movement (1983); Louis B. Schwartz, With Gun and Camera Through Darkest CLS-Land, 36 Stan. L. Rev. 413 (1984). See crit.

cross, in lawyers' verbal shorthand, refers to cross-examination, q.v. E.g., "There's no way you can do a first-rate cross if you don't speak the other guy's language." Joseph Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 287 (1978) (quoting an anonymous N.Y. lawyer). Cf. direct.

cross-claim; counterclaim. In most American jurisdictions, counterclaim, q.v., refers to a claim by a defendant against the plaintiff used as an offset against the original claim; and a cross-claim is a claim by one coparty against another, as by one defendant against a codefendant. Each word has been used for the other, but this DIFFERENTIATION should be encouraged and fastidiously followed in practice. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 13. Cross-claim is now often spelled in the U.S. as one unhyphenated word.

In BrE, counterclaim is defined as "a cross-claim brought by a defendant in civil proceedings that asserts an independent cause of action but is not also a defense to the claim made in the action by the plaintiff" (CDL). Cross-action is frequently used in BrE for cross-claim. These terms are somewhat less restricted in BrE than in AmE, for cross-claim may refer either to (1) an action brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, or (2) an action brought by a defendant against a codefendant in the same suit.

cross-complain, v.i., is a variant of cross-claim—e.g.: "The defendant cross-complained under the same contract."

cross-examination is hyphenated; direct examination, q.v., is not. See cross.

cross-national should always be hyphenated, just as cross-cultural should be. Many social scientists drop the hyphens to form single words. Cf. transnational.

cross-offer. See counteroffer.

cross-question = a question on cross-examination. The hyphen is important because the best cross-questions are not cross questions. E.g., "Certainly it would ordinarily be unfair for a trial court to require an offer of proof during cross-examination. [But] enough must be done to show that the sustaining of an objection to a cross-question was error. The cross-question must on its face be proper." John Kaplan & Jon R. Waltz, Cases and Materials on Evidence 52 (5th ed. 1984).

cruel and unusual punishment. The Eighth Amendment states: "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." U.S. Const. amend. VIII. The U.S. Supreme Court has construed the phrase cruel and unusual punishment to include not just barbarities such as torture but also punishment that is excessive for the crime committed. See Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584, 598 (1977) (stating that a death sentence was a disproportionate punishment for rape because "rape . . . in terms of moral depravity and of the injury to the person and to the public . . . does not compare with murder, which does involve the unjustified taking of human life").

cubiclize. See -IZE.

culpa is a civil-law term meaning "actionable negligence." The English words fault and negligence are far preferable in English contexts. Pl. -ae.

culpability. See guilt.

culpable; inculpable; culpatory; culpose. Culpable = guilty, blameworthy. (See blameworthy (A).) Inculpable is a troublesome word to be avoided, for it may be interpreted as meaning either "able to be inculpated [i.e., guilty]," or "not culpable [i.e., innocent]." The latter sense has historically been attributed to the word.

Culpatory and culpose are rare terms, the former meaning "expressing blame," the latter "characterized by criminal negligence." Neither has anything to recommend it; one who uses either term in discussing Anglo-American law, or inculpable for that matter, is culpable of a stylistic infelicity.

culprit has one of the most interesting of all legal etymologies. "According to the legal tradition, found in print shortly after 1700," explains the OED, "culprit was not originally a word, but a fortuitous or ignorant running together of two words (the fusion being made possible by the abbreviated writing of legal records), viz. Anglo-Fr. culpable or L. culpabilis 'guilty', abbreviated cul., and prit or prist = OF. prest 'ready'. It is supposed that when the prisoner had pleaded 'Not guilty', the Clerk of the Crown replied with 'Culpable: prest d'averrer nostre bille,' i.e., 'Guilty: [and I am] ready to aver our indictment'; that this reply was noted on the roll in the form cul. prist, etc.; and that, at a later time, after the disuse of Law French, this formula was mistaken for an appellation addressed to the accused." In short, culprit is quintessentially a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY.

Nevertheless, the word still appears in legal contexts to denote a wrongdoer—e.g.: "Some Forces exclude the question of punishment altogether, the Chief Constable refraining from prosecution if the culprit has parents or friends or even the Salvation Army to go to and is willing to be looked after; on the other hand there will be prosecution if the culprit declares that he is going to do it again." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 278–79 (1957; repr. 1972).

cultiv(at)able. The shorter form is preferred. E.g., "[T]he remaining 200 acres is cultivatable [read cultivable] land." Sell v. Cohen, 293 F. Supp. 684, 685 (E.D. Ky. 1968). See -ATABLE.

cultured; cultivated. Correctly, the former is used of the person, the latter of the mind. A cultured person has refined tastes; a cultivated mind is well trained and highly developed.

cumbrance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of encumbrance, q.v.

cum testamento annexo. See administrator.

cumulate. See accumulate.

cumulative, in its general lay sense, means "composed of successively added parts; acquiring or increasing in force or cogency in successive additions" <cumulative effect or argument>. The term has various specific legal senses. The most complex of these, used now chiefly in the corporate field, relates to a system of voting developed originally in 19th-century British school-board elections. Cumulative voting = a system of voting, still in use, by which each voter has a number of votes equal to the number of representatives (usu. corporate officers) to be elected, and may either concentrate all his or her votes on one person or distribute them among the candidates.

Cumulative is used of evidence in the sense "tending to prove the same point that other evidence has already been offered to prove." In the context of wills, cumulative is sometimes used of legacies in the sense "given by the same testator to the same legatee."

In criminal law cumulative sentences are the same as consecutive sentences. See concurrent sentences.

CUPOS is an ACRONYM of recent vintage meaning "a cohabiting unmarried person of the opposite sex." E.g., "Her reason for leaving home is that she prefers her own life style of living with this young boy as a CUPOS (cohabiting unmarried person of opposite sex)." Jackman v. State Dep't of Social & Health Serv., 643 P.2d 889, 890 (Wash. Ct. App. 1982). See cohabitant. See also NEOLOGISMS.

curable. In general English usage this word is used only of diseases; in legal usage, it is used in reference to any defects or deficiencies. Here curable = remediable, correctable: "We are confident that the deficiencies in the affidavits are readily curable."/ "Whatever harmful inferences might have been drawn from these questions were of the curable type and were removed by the court's instructions." See cure.

cur. adv. vult is the abbreviation of Curia advisari vult (= the court wishes to consider the matter). It appears at the end of the written arguments reproduced in British law reports and indicates that the judgment of the court was delivered (as Americans might always expect) on a date later than the hearing, rather than extemporaneously at the conclusion of the hearing, as is common in England. Such a "reserved" judgment carries additional weight as an authority.

An alternative abbreviation is C.A.V. or (less commonly) c.a.v. And an alternative (and now defunct) spelling is curia advisare vult—given by several old law dictionaries such as John Bouvier, Bouvier's Law Dictionary (Francis Rawles ed., 3d ed. 1914) and Thomas Tayler, The Law Glossary (1877).

curative; curatory; curatorial. For the meaning "of or relating to the cure of diseases," curative is preferred. Curative is also used in the legal sense "corrective" <curative instructions to the jury>. (See cure & curable.) Curatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Curatorial = of or relating to a curator.

curator. See conservator.

curatory; curatorial. See curative.

cure = to correct. In general usage, cure is used only in reference to diseases, literal or metaphorical; but in law it is used, as legal JARGON, in reference to any defect or deficiency. Thus incurable error means "error at trial that cannot be corrected by the judge." E.g., "The plan proposed to cure a prepetition default and acceleration on a debt on Grubb's principal residence." See curable.

curfew began as an Anglo-Saxon custom and only in the 1800s came to refer to an official order or regulation to keep off the streets at certain hours. In the 14th century, corfu referred to the ringing of a bell every evening at a fixed hour as a signal to cover the fires [OF. couvre feu "cover the fire"]. Even after the ritual of putting out the fires discontinued, the bell-ringing continued as a signal to clear the streets after dark.

curriculum. Pl. -a or -ums. The Latin plural is slightly more common, but the Englished version may be gaining ground. E.g., "Universities multiplied rapidly, first in Italy and then elsewhere, many of them starting as law schools and later broadening their curriculums . . . ." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 195 (1962). See PLURALS (A).

cursory; cursorial. Cursory = perfunctory; superficial. Cursorial = of or pertaining to running.

curtail means "to cut back," not "to stop completely." Therefore, it is difficult to ascertain what distinction the writer of this sentence intended: "Irrigation has cut down on, if not curtailed, water production of springs that once fed it."

Here curtail is correctly used: "Although a testator has broad power to dispose of his property by will, his power is curtailed to a limited degree by the operation of certain statutes and collateral common-law rules."

CURTAILED WORDS. See BACK-FORMATIONS

curtesy; dower. These medieval common-law terms, which are defunct in England (the rights they represent having been abolished in 1925), live on in several American jurisdictions. The words denote correlative rights. At common law, curtesy = the right of a husband, on his wife's death, to a life estate in the land that his deceased wife owned during their marriage. The husband has this right only if a child was born alive to the couple. The word began as a variant spelling of courtesy (tenancy by the courtesy of England). Several jurisdictions that retain the terms have abolished the requirement of a child born alive and have reduced the amount from all land to half the land. Dower = the right of a wife, on her husband's death, to a life estate in a third of the land that he owned, of which, with few exceptions, she cannot be deprived by any alienation made by him. "Today in most states an elective share, supplanting or supplementing dower and curtesy, has evolved." See dower.

Inchoate dower and curtesy initiate are the terms denoting the spouse's interest in the other spouse's estate while both are living and after the birth of issue capable of inheriting. "Inchoate dower once prevented the husband from transferring realty during his life to defeat his wife's dower; the common-law marital right together with his curtesy initiate ensured his interest in the wife's realty."/ "Such a scheme to defraud the spouse was impossible when wealth consisted of realty, and either inchoate dower or curtesy initiate operated to bar conveyance without consent." See initiate tenant by curtesy.

curtilage (= the land around a house and within an enclosure) is sometimes misspelled curtilege, perhaps on the mistaken analogy of privilege.

The term is used in the U.S. and in England but not in Scotland. For police searches under the Fourth Amendment, the curtilage is the area within which police may not, in most cases, search without a warrant: "[C]ourts have extended Fourth Amendment protection to the curtilage; and they have defined the curtilage, as did the common law, by reference to the factors that determine whether an individual reasonably may expect that an area immediately adjacent to the home will remain private." Oliver v. U.S., 466 U.S. 170, 180 (1984). Cf. messuage.

cushion, v.t., = to condition (jury interrogatories) by placing an instruction between two in order to prevent the second from appearing to presume a given answer to the first.

custodial interrogation = police questioning begun after a person has been taken into custody or had his or her freedom otherwise curtailed. See Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 444 (1966) ("By custodial interrogation, we mean questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way").

custodian. In the legal sense, this word means "guardian" or "protector." It is used euphemistically in lay contexts to mean "janitor."

custody; possession. Whereas one may have custody of both persons and things, one may have possession of things only. But a further distinction is possible in criminal law: "The distinction between possession and custody . . . was gradually developed in a long line of decided cases . . . . In general it is important to distinguish between servants and others, because usually a servant who has control of a chattel belonging to his master has custody only (and not possession), whereas the actual control of a chattel by one not a servant is usually possession." Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 196 (1957). See possession (C).

customer. See client.

custumal; costomal. The former is the usual spelling for "a written collection of a city's customs."

customary law = practices and beliefs that are so vital and intrinsic a part of a social and economic system that they are treated as if they were laws. Customary law is handed down for many generations as unwritten law, though it is usu. collected finally in a written code. See unwritten law.

Customs Court. See Court of International Trade.

cut against; cut in favor of. These idioms are favorites of the legal profession; they should be used sparingly lest they become full-fledged CLICHÉS. "Although we do not find Murdoch particularly relevant here, it cuts, if at all, against RSR's position."/ "In any event, we find that the first factor cuts in favor of the mother and against the father." In re Marriage of Haslett, 629 N.E.2d 182, 188 (Ill. App. Ct. 1994).

cut-and-dried case is a CLICHÉ that, when used, needs to be hyphenated thus. E.g., "Take one of the coldest, cut-and-dried cases imaginable, a sane man deliberately kills another man in the sight of several reliable witnesses." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 105 (1939; repr. 1980).

cut in favor of. See cut against.

cutting edge is a legal CLICHÉ and a VOGUE WORD E.g., "By and large, the gains made in the safe and efficient administration of our prisons may be attributed to the anonymous professionals who daily toil at the cutting edge of our efforts to improve, while at the same time securing, our penal institutions." In the cant of our day, every law review seeks to be on the cutting edge of the law.

CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF refers to eliminating excess words. It is not an easy task; indeed, verbosity and obscurity are usually the result of facile and slapdash writing. Judges occasionally confess as much about their own writing. For example: "This opinion is too long. I apologize for its length but I simply didn't have time to write a shorter one." U.S. v. Price, 448 F. Supp. 503, 503 (D. Colo. 1978).

Many recurrent phrases are mere deadwood. For example, Speaking for myself, I think . . . , aside from being redundant, adds nothing to the sentence when we know who is speaking and have intelligence enough to deduce that the speaker is stating an opinion. Some courts have written of reasonable-minded defendants, as if there might be reasonable-footed or reasonable-chested defendants; reason is only in the mind.

The following are wordy sentences with more concise alternatives supplied: "In a large part [in large part is idiomatic], it was our anticipation of this type of claim which [read that] cautioned us for so long against abrogation of the immunity rule." [Better: Our foresight of such claims long cautioned us against abrogating the immunity rule.]/ "It was a package of small size . . . [read It was a small package . . .]."/ "The economist's goal in formulating normative rules is that of [delete that of] 'efficiency' [note that efficiency needs no quotation marks]."/ "A will is ambulatory in character and subject to change at any time." [Read A will is ambulatory or A will is always subject to change (while the testator lives).]

The unfortunate legal predilection for nouns over verbs, for gerunds over verbal participles, is the cause of much deadweight. E.g., "The defendants had the duty to take reasonable care to protect her, including probably the giving of a warning to her or to the plaintiff [read including, probably, warning her or the plaintiff]." See VERBOSITY, REDUNDANCY (A), FLOTSAM PHRASES & SUPERFLUITIES.

cy(-)pres. This LAW FRENCH term, denoting the doctrine that written instruments should be construed as near to the parties' intention as possible, is predominantly spelled as two words. The British hyphenate the phrase and use an accent grave thus: cy-près. Meaning "as near as" and pronounced /si-pray/, cy pres (originally si près, ici-près or aussi-près) is used in the context of charitable gifts.

This phrase carries different senses modernly and at common law.

> At common law . . . , the Crown exercised its prerogative power to apply funds given for a charitable, but illegal, purpose to some valid charitable purpose without regard for the settlor's intention. Property otherwise given for a particular charitable purpose which became incapable of fulfillment was directed by the chancellor under the doctrine of cy pres to another charitable purpose which fell within the general charitable intention of the settlor.
>
> The prerogative power, of course, does not exist in this country. The cy pres doctrine applied in the United States is a rule of judicial construction designed to approximate as closely as possible the desires of the settlor.
>
> La Fond v. City of Detroit, 98 N.W.2d 530, 534 n.1 (Mich. 1959).

Today, however, the sense is the same in G.B. as in the U.S., the court being bound by this doctrine to make a scheme for the funds to be applied to a charitable purpose as close as possible to the original one.

The state of Georgia has a statute with the following explanation: "When a valid charitable bequest is incapable for some reason of execution in the exact manner provided by the testator, donor, or founder, a court of equity will carry it into effect in such a way as will [as] nearly as possible effectuate his intention." Ga. Code Ann. § 108-202 (1959).

damage, adj., corresponds to damages, n.; that is, damage claim = claim for damages. This use of damage, dating from the late 19th century, is omitted from most general English-language dictionaries but is common in law. E.g., "If a damage claim is within the scope of the arbitration, the arbitrators at common law . . . may depart from the rules of law." Charles T. McCormick, Handbook on the Law of Damages § 4, at 19–20 (1935)./ "[A]lternative safeguards . . . reduce the need for a private damage action [= action for damages]." Forrester v. White, 792 F.2d 647, 658 (7th Cir. 1986)./ "Nader's damage action for fraudulent misrepresentation had exposed the industry's deliberate practice of over-booking to maximize profits." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 62 (1988).

Sometimes, however—esp. in BrE—the plural form damages is used adjectivally. E.g., "[T]he Sun paid £1m in an out-of-court damages settlement to the singer Elton John." The Independent, 13 Dec. 1988, at 4./ "A permanent injunction . . . can translate into more real financial benefit than a damages judgment [read, in AmE, damage judgment]." Michael Tigar, Book Review, 17 Litigation 49, 49 (Winter 1991).

damage, n.; injury. There is a modern tendency to refer to damage to property, but injury to the person. It is not an established distinction. Blackstone did not observe it, having titled one section of his great treatise Injury to Property, and neither the English nor the American courts have consistently observed it. One could not be faulted for restricting one's usage in this way, but neither could one be faulted for writing damage to persons or injury to property.

damage feasant. See feasant.

damage(s), n. A. Generally. "[T]he word damage, meaning 'Loss, injury, or deterioration,' is 'to be distinguished from its plural,—damages—which means a compensation in money for a loss or damage.'" American Stevedores, Inc. v. Porello, 330 U.S. 446, 450 n.6 (1947) (quoting Black's). In the following sentence, the two terms are correctly used: "After actual damage is shown it is unnecessary to show its money extent to sustain a judgment for exemplary damages."

Often, however, the words are misused: "In Massachusetts exemplary damages are not recoverable in an action for libel; only actual damage [read damages] may be recovered."/ "The tornado caused an estimated $20,000,000 in damages [read damage]."/ "Where the chattel is unique, . . . money damage [read damages] will be inadequate . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 307 (1930). See money damages.

In the following sentence, two senses are incorrectly conflated; one recovers damages but suffers damage: "Ferranti International Signal plans imminent legal action to recover as much as possible of the damages it has suffered as a result of an alleged £215m fraud." Hugo Dixon & Charles Leadbeater, Ferranti Plans Legal Action, Fin. Times, 18–19 Nov. 1989, at 1. This error bears the technical name ZEUGMA.

An English writer assesses this linguistic situation pessimistically: "It is a melancholy example of the poverty of the language of English Law that it can find no better word than 'damages' for the compensation [that] it awards in civil cases . . . ." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 207 (P.B Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). But, in the upshot, he is correct: "[T]he confusion between 'damage,' i.e. the loss [that] is the cause of the award of 'damages,' and 'damages' themselves, is an endless source of perplexity to students of . . . law. But it would be hopeless now to try to alter the practice." Id.

B. Damages in the Context of Restitution. A leading English authority on the law of contract holds that "[a] claim for restitution may not, strictly speaking, be one for 'damages'; its purpose is not to compensate the plaintiff for a loss, but to deprive the defendant of a benefit." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 832 (8th ed. 1991). Although this limit on the use of the word damages might promote analytical rigor, American lawyers routinely refer to any money acquired by way of judgment—in any type of action—as damages.

C. Other Terms. For the distinction between general damages and special damages, see general damages. For other types, see hedonic damages, liquidated damages & punitive damages, as well as consequentials & incidentals.

Dame Grand Cross (or Dame Commander) of the Order of the British Empire (O.B.E.). Men who are appointed to the High Court and higher courts are invariably knighted, whereas women are made Dames Commander of the Order of the British Empire. Abbreviation: D.B.E. The mode of salutation is my lady. See my lord.

damn, adj. & adv., for damned—as in that damn case—though attested from the 18th century, remains a casualism. E.g., "An attentive study of the four illustrations will lead any analyst to the despairing conclusion, which is of course reinforced by the mysterious text of § 90 itself, that no one had any idea what the damn [or, less casually, damned] thing meant." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 64–65 (1974).

damnatory. Though this word might appear to be related to damnum and damnify, qq.v., the relation is etymological only. This is not a legal term per se, but a general word equivalent to condemnatory, which is more comprehensible. E.g., "If the person sued is proved to have allowed his view to be distorted by malice, it is quite immaterial that somebody else might without malice have written an equally damnatory criticism." (Eng.)

damned, adj. See damn.

damnify (= to inflict injury upon) is generally an unnecessary LEGALISM for injure. The OED notes that this word was common in the 17th century but is now rare. One might excuse the word's use in the second example below, but not in the first: "I am satisfied that the injured person is damnified by having cut short the period during which he had a normal expectation of enjoying life." (Eng.) (The writer did not want to repeat injure—this use smacks of INELEGANT VARIATION.)/ "Where the principle of damnum sine injuria applies, the person damnified has no right of action against the person responsible for causing the loss because the latter has not, in causing or allowing the harm to befall, been in breach of legal duty to him." (Eng.) (It would make no sense to say the person had been injured when we have just stated that that same person was sine injuria [= without wrongful act].) See damnum.

The antonym is much better known: indemnify. Though it has the same etymology as damnify with a negative prefix (in- "not" + damnum "loss, damage"), the vowel shifts to -e- in the negative form. See indemnify.

damnosa h(a)ereditas = an inheritance more onerous (e.g., because burdened with debts) than profitable. Generally the term is spelled haereditas. Originally a Roman-law term, damnosa haereditas has been extended by modern legal writers to refer to anything one acquires that turns out to be disadvantageous.

damnous = of, relating to, or causing a damnum (q.v.). Usually, the term means "causing loss or damage." The word is obsolescent legal JARGON, not a TERM OF ART. "They have injuriously, as distinguished from damnously, affected the plaintiff's rights." See damnum absque injuria.

damnum = damage suffered. E.g., "The loss, damnum, is capable of being estimated in terms of money." (Eng.) This term is hardly justified in any context not involving the doctrine of damnum absque injuria (q.v.). In the sentence quoted it adds nothing. See damnum infectum.

damnum absque injuria; damnum sine injuria. These synonymous LATINISMS may both be translated damage without wrongful act. They denote damage for which there is no legal remedy. A 19th-century commentator stated that damnum sine injuria, "standing alone as a sort of compound noun, seems hardly good Latin. English lawyers, however, have so used it since the fifteenth century at the latest." Note, 2 Law Q. Rev. 117, 117 (1886).

Still used with some frequency in British legal writing, the phrases are comparatively rare in American legal prose. E.g., "If disturbances or loss come as a result of competition or the exercise of like results by others, it is damnum absque injuria unless some superior right by contract or otherwise is interfered with." (Eng.)/ "He says that it is damnum absque injuria, intimating that the acts of the defendant, who justifies a libelous publication, do not constitute a wrong in its legal sense, and then proceeds to observe that this is agreeable to the reasoning of the civil law." Cf. injuria absque damno.

damnum infectum = loss not yet suffered but only apprehended. This LATINISM is more a hindrance than an aid to analysis, for most readers must look it up.

damnum sine injuria. See damnum absque injuria.

DANGLERS are ordinarily unattached participles, either present participles (ending in -ing) or past participles (ending usu. in -ed), that do not relate syntactically to the nouns they are supposed to modify. In effect, the participle tries to sever its relationship with its noun or pronoun. Gerunds may also dangle precariously (see (C)). Usually, recasting the sentence will remedy the incoherence, AMBIGUITY, or ILLOGIC.

Danglers are of two types, the majority being unacceptable and a few being acceptable because of long-standing usage. In the normal word order, a participial phrase beginning a sentence (Running by the lake,) should be followed directly by the noun acting as subject in the main clause (I saw the two defendants). When that word order is changed, as by changing the verb in the main clause to the passive voice, the sentence becomes illogical or misleading: Running by the lake, the two defendants were seen. It was not the two defendants who were running, but the witness. This is the unacceptable type of dangling modifier.

Examples of acceptable danglers are easy to come by. We all know that there is nothing wrong with Considering the current atmosphere in the legislature, it is unlikely that the legislation will pass. Several other examples are discussed in (D) below.

A. Danglers Ending in -ing. In the sentences that follow, mispositioned words have caused grammatical blunders. Perhaps the most common legal sentence containing a dangling participle is this: "Finding no error, the judgment of the district court is affirmed." Literally, this sentence says that the judgment found no error; the proper subject, namely the court, remains unmentioned. [A possible revision: Finding no error, we affirm the judgment of the district court.] This is the type of problematic dangler cited at the outset: an active participle is followed by a main clause in the passive voice.

The classic example occurs when the wrong noun begins the main clause, that is, a noun other than the one expected by the reader who has digested the introductory participial phrase. E.g., "Accepting for present purposes the showing made, the facts of the claim were as follows." [A possible revision: We accept for present purposes the showing [that was] made and find the facts to be as follows." (It is not the facts that accept: it is the writer who accepts (and finds). The error seems to have resulted from the writer's fear of FIRST PERSON.)]/ "Having reached that conclusion [read, e.g., Since we have reached that conclusion], all that remains is to choose an appropriate remedy and to frame the appropriate relief."/ "Viewing the record [read If we view the record] in the light most favorable to appellants, the most that can be said is that Yellow Cab secured from the city an exclusive concession whose anticompetitive effects stem primarily from a valid municipal policy."

The error occurs also when the main clause begins with an EXPLETIVE (e.g., it or there) after an introductory participial phrase:

- "Applying those principles to the facts in the case at bar, it is clear that plaintiffs cannot recover." [A possible revision: If we apply these principles to the case at bar, it becomes clear that . . . .]
- "Reviewing the theories of judicial decision current in the last century, it will be seen that we began with a creative theory [that] was used to make an American common law . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 116–17 (1938). [A possible revision: Reviewing the theories of judicial decision current in the last century shows that . . . .]
- "Being in derogation of the common law, it is often said that the statute of frauds should be strictly construed." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 117 (1950). [A possible revision: Being in derogation of the common law, the statute of frauds is often said to require strict construction.]
- "Turning to England, it ought to be noted first that that country, though late in doing so, participated fully in the medieval development sketched above." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 8 (2d ed. 1975). [A possible revision: Though England was late to do so, it participated fully in the medieval development sketched above.]
- "Looking at the passage as a whole, it is by no means clear that Lord Atkin meant to confine manslaughter to cases of recklessness in the subjective sense." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 226 (3d ed. 1990). [A possible revision: The passage as a whole does not make clear whether Lord Atkin meant . . . .]

Midsentence danglers are just as bad but are harder for the untrained eye to spot. E.g., "It is the purpose of this note to re-examine the existing law, placing emphasis upon [read to emphasize] the interests to be protected, and to draw some conclusions as to its adequacy in protecting them." (This is poor writing because it could be included as boilerplate in almost any lawnote imaginable; the writer should craft the language specifically for the case at hand, generalizing, to be sure, but not making it so general that it is well-nigh universal. Further, the writer should have been aware of the natural triad lurking in the sentence, i.e., the infinitive phrases: to re-examine; to place [to emphasize]; to draw.)

B. Past-Participial Danglers. These are especially common when the main clause begins with a possessive—e.g.: "Born on March 12, 1944, in Dalton, Georgia, Larry Lee Simms's qualifications . . . ." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 79 (1988). (Simms's qualifications were not born on March 12—he was.) [A possible revision: Born on March 12, 1944, in Dalton, Georgia, Larry Lee Simms had qualifications that . . . .]

But the problem also sometimes appears when a run-of-the-mill noun begins the main clause—e.g.: "Applied to the situation at bar, the likelihood that a barge will break from her fasts, and the damage she will do, vary with the place and time . . . ." U.S. v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169, 173 (2d Cir. 1947) (per L. Hand, J.). [A possible revision: When those principles are applied to the situation at bar . . . .]

C. Dangling Gerunds. These are close allies to dangling participles, but here the participle acts as a noun rather than as an adjective:

- "In handling this problem the satellite concept of illicit commodities developed." Edward H. Levi, An Introduction to Legal Reasoning 62 (1949). [A possible revision: In handling this problem, the courts developed the satellite concept of illicit commodities.]
- "In considering whether conduct is intentional, it is unnecessary to ascertain whether the party knew of the rule of law . . . ." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 44 (2d ed. 1961). [A possible revision: In considering whether conduct is intentional, the court need not ascertain whether . . . .]
- "[I]n construing a criminal statute, the prisoner must be given the benefit of the doubt . . . ." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 40 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). [A possible revision: In construing a criminal statute, the court must give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt . . .]
- "In gauging the force of this argument it should be recalled that in many contexts punishments and reward will appear as opposite sides of the same coin." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 51 (1968). [A possible revision: In gauging the force of this argument, one should recall that . . . .]
- "In discussing the definition of contract given in the American Restatement it was pointed out that . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 42 (3d ed. 1981). [A possible revision: In discussing . . . , one commentator pointed out . . . .]

D. Acceptable Danglers or Disguised Conjunctions. Any number of present participles have been used as conjunctions or prepositions for so long that they have lost the participial duty to modify specific nouns. In effect, the clauses they introduce are adverbial; they stand apart from and comment on the content of the sentence. Among the commonest of these are according, assuming, barring, concerning, considering, judging, owing, regarding, respecting, speaking, taking (usu. account of, into account). E.g., "Speaking geographically, the Atlantic seaboard with a few gaps allows these unions, which become more and more wicked as we cross the Appalachians." Max Radin, The Law and You 42 (1948)./ "Assuming its maritime nature, almost any type of service claim will today be held within the Lien Act . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 659 (2d ed. 1975).

E. Ending Sentences with. Traditionally, grammarians frowned on all danglers, but during the 20th century they generally loosened the strictures for participial constructions at the end of a sentence. Early-20th-century grammarians might have disapproved the following sentences, but they have long been considered acceptable—e.g.: "Robert stepped to the door, seeking his companion."/ "Tom's arm hung useless, broken by the blow."

Usually, as in the first of the two examples just quoted, the end-of-the-sentence dangler is introduced by a so-called coordinating participle: seeking is equivalent to and sought. Similarly:

- "Vexed by these frequent demands upon her time, she finally called upon her friend, imploring him to come to her aid." (Imploring = and implored.)
- "The New Orleans-bound steamer rammed and sank the freighter ten miles from its destination, sending her to the bottom in 10 minutes." (Sending = and sent.)
- "She predeceased him leaving a husband and two children." Anthony R. Mellows, The Law of Succession 515 (3d ed. 1977). (Leaving = and left.)

A few editors would consider each of those participles misattached, but in fact they are acceptable as coordinating participles. As for the few who object, one wonders what they would do with the following sentence: "The boy ran out of the house crying." daresay. So spelled, generally, as one word.

DASHES. See PUNCTUATION (D)

data, technically the plural of datum, has, since the 1940s, been increasingly often thought of as a mass noun taking a singular verb. But in formal contexts it is preferably treated as a plural—e.g.: "If new data do not fit, either the system must be modified to accommodate them, or they must be modified to fit the system." John H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 67 (1969).

Many writers lapse, however:

- "There is no data [read There are no data] available on the number of pesticide containers recycled in the state."
- "No finger was lifted to ascertain whether some of the data was [read data were] available . . . ." Boreri v. Fiat S.P.A., 663 F.2d 17, 23 (1st Cir. 1985).
- "I believe plaintiff's data raises [read data raise] a rational basis for evaluating the response of the prison."
- "It was equally apparent that the data gathered on Law and Psychology was [read data . . .

were] not amenable to such categorization." Elizabeth V. Gemmette, Law and Literature, 23 Valparaiso U.L. Rev. 267, 268 (1989).

The Oxford Guide allows the singular use of data in computing and allied disciplines (see COMPUTERESE); whether lawyers own computers or not, they should use data as a plural.

In one particular context, though, data is invariably treated as a plural: when it begins a clause and is not preceded by the definite article. E.g., "Data over the last two years suggest that the rate at which gay men get AIDS has finally begun to flatten out." Lawrence K. Altman, Who's Stricken and How: AIDS Pattern Is Shifting, N.Y. Times, 5 Feb. 1989, at 1.

Datum, the "true" singular, is still used when a single piece of information is referred to: "The latter statement merely states that a certain datum has not been located in records regularly made and preserved." U.S. v. Yakobov, 712 F.2d 20, 26 (2d Cir. 1983)./ "This was not a case [in which] some 'presumptively prejudicial' datum, like an attempted bribe, had come to light." Neron v. Tierney, 841 F.2d 1197, 1203 (1st Cir. 1988).

Because data is a count noun, many data is correct—e.g.: "Numerous expert and representative interests are consulted, and many data assembled, often over a long period . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 433 (7th ed. 1964)./ "But much [read many] of the data in present personnel files is [read are] highly subjective." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 21 (1970). (In that book, Justice Douglas twice used data as a plural on page 19.) See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

As a historian of the English language once put it, "A student with one year of Latin [knows] that data and phenomena are plural." Albert C. Baugh, The Gift of Style, 34 Pa. B. Ass'n, 101, 105–06 (1962).

database. One word.

DATES. A. Order. One may unimpeachably write either May 26, 1984, or 26 May 1984. The latter—the primarily BrE method—is often better in prose, for it takes no commas.

Of the American method—May 26, 1984—the first editor of the OED said: "This is not logical: 19 May 1862 is. Begin at day, ascend to month, ascend to year; not begin at month, descend to day, then ascend to year." Sir James A.H. Murray, as quoted in Hart's Rules for Compositors and Readers at the OUP 18 n.1 (39th ed. 1983).

B. Month and Year. February 1986 is better than February of 1986. There is no need for a comma between the month and the year.

C. As Adjectives. Our generation has taken to making adjectives out of dates, just as it has out of PLACE-NAMES. E.g., "This matter arises out of a September 1980 divorce decree." Today this occurs even in formal legal prose. The more traditional rendering of the sentence just quoted would be, "This matter arises out of a divorce decree of September 1980." Although occasionally using dates adjectivally is a space-saver, the device should not be overworked: it gives prose a breezy, journalistic look.

And it is particularly clumsy when the day as well as the month is given—e.g.: "The court reconsidered the July 12, 1994 privilege order." Stylists who use this phrasing typically omit the comma after the year—and rightly so: in the midst of an adjective phrase (i.e., the date), it impedes the flow of the writing too much.

D. Written Out. Although the validity of a legal document almost never depends on its being dated, lawyers often go to extreme lengths to express the date in words; 1 January 1988 becomes the first day of January, One thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight." A waste.

E. In Contracts. To avoid litigation on the question whether until December 31, 1986 includes all of that day, the drafter should state explicitly that an option, e.g., will expire at noon Central Standard Time on a certain day.

For another common problem relating to dates in contracts, see later of [date] or [date].

datum. See data.

day. Three legal conventions relate to this word. First, when given as the period of a notice, and prescribed as a necessary interval between two acts or events, day excludes the day of the notice and the act to be performed. Hence the full number of days prescribed intervenes, unless the law provides otherwise.

Second, when used as a period of time, day means the period of 24 hours, beginning at the stroke of midnight.

Third, when used in contrast to night, the word ordinarily denotes the period beginning at half an hour before sunrise and ending half an hour after sunset.

day in court is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the Law French jour en banc, which, by the 17th century, had been translated (partly) to jour in court. Whereas the plaintiff ordinarily wants a day in court, the defendant ordinarily wants—in legal parlance—to "go hence without day." (See go hence without day & sine die.) E.g., "[T]he principal [suggestion] is that the plaintiff was not made a party to the proceeding, and has not had his day in court, in opposition to the final decision [that] ordered the sale." Howard v. Railway Co., 101 U.S. 837, 847 (1879)./ "[I]f a party fails to ask for and to secure all relief, both legal and equitable, to which he is entitled in the action, he cannot, after final disposition of the case, bring another action on the same facts for further relief. He has had his day in court." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 38 (1930)./ "Many attorneys said one big effect of the two decisions may be to deprive middle-income and lower-income employees of their days in court because attorneys will be less inclined to bring cases where compensatory damages are relatively small." Richard B. Schmitt, California Court Further Restricts Right of Fired Workers to Sue Ex-Employers, Wall St. J., 26 May 1989, at A3. Cf. one bite at the apple.

deadbeat (= a person who evades debts), a 19th-century coinage, is a favorite word of American lawyers trying to collect on judgments. Some use it tendentiously for any judgment debtor, and often the epithet is apt. Even courts use the word in published opinions—e.g.: "The Court's decision is indefensible. It permits a deadbeat husband to use the Bankruptcy Code's grace for honest debtors as a slick scheme for euchring his former wife out of her 'sole and separate property' in one-half of the benefits he receives under a pension plan." Bush v. Taylor, 893 F.2d 962, 967 (8th Cir. 1990) (Bowman, J., dissenting).

deadly; deathly. The former means "able to cause death." (See lethal.) The latter means "like death." The CLICHÉ is properly rendered deathly dull, not deadly dull.

dead man's statute; dead-man statute. The usual form is the possessive dead man's statute. When the phrase first appeared, in the late 19th century, it referred to a statutory requirement that all claims against a decedent must be brought within a fixed time (such as two and a half years) from the date when the executor is officially qualified. By the early 20th century, however, the phrase had taken on its modern sense: "a law that makes a decedent's declarations inadmissible as evidence in certain circumstances, as when the witness seeks to support a claim against the estate." E.g., "The first section of the Act forbade the exclusion of witnesses, 'by reason of incapacity from crime or interest'; it also contained a 'dead man's statute' proviso." Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570, 576 n.5 (1961).

Of course, the phrase dead man has yielded a variety of terms in the English language, including plant names such as dead man's fingers (a type of orchid) and dead man's hand (variously an orchid, a fern, or a type of seaweed), as well as dead man's switch or handle (an automatic shut-off device installed on machinery to protect an operator who releases the controls).

Still, since the early 1980s, some writers have rejected dead man's statute on grounds of SEXISM, preferring instead dead person's statute: "She argued the 'dead person's statute' bars Mr. Crowley's testimony because that testimony would be unfair to her." Ellis v. William Penn Life Ins. Co., 873 P.2d 1185, 1187 (Wash. 1994) (en banc). See Viscito v. Fred S. Carbon Co., 636 So. 2d 194, 195 n.1 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1994) (exhorting the legislature to amend the statute by changing man to person). The use of person in this context is certainly less vivid than man, but the phrase dead person's statute may soon seem as natural as reasonable person (in place of reasonable man). See SEXISM (B) & reasonable person.

dead pledge. See mortgage.

deal with; deal in. People in business deal in what they buy and sell <she deals in stocks and bonds>, but they deal with other persons. Deal should not be used transitively where deal in is intended. Although one deals cards, one does not (except in street slang) deal drugs; one deals in drugs (if one is utterly reprobate). "The principal witness for the government was S., an undercover detective who had been assigned to investigate allegations that C. was dealing [read dealing in] drugs."

Deal with is a vague PHRASAL VERB for which there is almost always a better, more specific substitute. E.g., "This commentary will deal with [read discuss] a variety of matters, including problems of judicial jurisdiction and constitutional limitations on choice of law."/ "We do not deal with [read discuss] various objections to the plan of merger filed after this appeal was taken." (Cf. concerned with, be.) Where, however, deal with is roughly equivalent to handle, it is unobjectionable: "The court held that state courts dividing community property in divorce proceedings could not deal with nondisability military retirement benefits."

dearth = scarcity. It is commonly misunderstood, however, as meaning "lack." E.g., "There is a complete dearth of [read lack of, or There is no] authority on the application of the words 'cause or permit' consequent upon the absolute conveyance of the freehold." (Eng.)

death; demise; decease, n.; surcease. Death is the common word, the other three being FORMAL WORDS (in order of increasing formality) that act almost as EUPHEMISMS. There is nothing wrong with the word death, although it has inherently unpleasant connotations. But that is the nature of the subject, and writing decease or surcease in legal contexts is only a little less ridiculous than writing going to meet his Maker. See demise, deceased & surcease.

death case (sometimes death action), as used by the federal courts, commonly means "a criminal case in which the death sentence has been imposed." In criminal cases, then, the phrase has nothing to do with wrongful death—e.g.: "The measure of an individual's competency under Rees to waive federal habeas review in a death case is informed by considerations very different from those underlying the standard for competency to stand trial."/ Peter Applebome, Death Cases: The Law Is Reluctant to Start Over, N.Y. Times, 28 Aug. 1988, at E6 ("But beneath that immediate dilemma is a question at the heart of a number of death-row cases.").

But in tort contexts, lawyers frequently say and write death case as a shorthand form of wrongful-death case. E.g., "In death cases, the law should allow juries to award money as compensation only for what can reasonably be compensated for by money." Randal R. Craft, Jr., Put Limits on Death Compensation, N.Y. Times, 8 Oct. 1989, at 2F.

deathly. See deadly.

death penalty; death sentence. A phrase dating from the late 19th century, death penalty is a plain-speaking alternative to the euphemism capital punishment, q.v. Death sentence—as opposed to death penalty—usually refers to a particular convict's punishment. "The prisoner was convicted, but the death sentence (still the penalty for treason) was commuted, and he was released later." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 153 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

death-qualified jurors are jurors who cannot be disqualified for serving on a jury under the test set forth in Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 510 (1968); in other words, death-qualified jurors have been selected because they have no absolute ideological bias against the death penalty. A death-qualified jury, then, is held fit to decide cases involving the death penalty. E.g., "Appellant argues that more recent studies provide stronger empirical evidence that death-qualified jurors are biased in favor of conviction and tend to belong to certain discrete groups."

death row is an Americanism dating from the early 1940s (though W10 dates it only from 1950). E.g., "A. I was put in death row. That's in a line of cells running crossways, east and west, on the death row. Q. How far was that, approximately, from the electric chair?" Daugherty v. State, 17 So. 2d 290, 294 (Fla. 1944) (en banc) (Chapman, J., dissenting) (quoting testimony). Though the phrases in that quotation are in death row and on the death row, the usual phrase today is on death row.

To most speakers of AmE, the term still refers concretely to the area of a prison where those who have been sentenced to death are confined. But there is a tendency to use the term more abstractly in reference to anyone who has been senteced to death—regardless of the location in a prison.

death sentence. See death penalty.

death statute; survival statute. In the context of wrongful-death cases, these phrases must be distinguished. A death statute protects the interests of the decedent's family and other dependents, who may recover in damages what they would have received from the decedent if the death had not occurred. A survival statute, by contrast, protects the decedent's own interest: the estate recovers for the decedent's pain and suffering before death, medical expenses, lost wages, and (sometimes, oddly) funeral expenses.

The ideas represented by these phrases are a popular subject of law reform: "Historically death statutes came first in most jurisdictions and were later supplemented by survival statutes. The end result of this secular legislative process will no doubt be that both interests will be protected in all jurisdictions; while the process continues each state must be looked on as a law to itself." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 360 (2d ed. 1975).

debar. See bar.

debark. See disembark.

debarkation; debarcation. The former is the preferred spelling.

debate, v.t. & n. In BrE, the verb debate equates to AmE argue, and the noun debate to AmE argument. Thus British lawyers typically use debate when American lawyers would write oral argument or argue. E.g., "Since the matter has been debated, it may be desirable for me to say that I accept counsel's view that the test of practicability is that of workability." (Eng.)/ "I would refer first to contracts for the sale of goods which were touched on in the course of the debate." (Eng.) See oral argument.

debauch; debouch. These words are liable to confusion. The former means "to defile; to seduce away from virtue; to corrupt"; the latter means "to emerge or cause to emerge; to come out into open ground." The nouns are debauchery and debouchment. Debauch is pronounced /di-bawch/, and debouch /di-boosh/.

de bene esse /də-ben-ay-es-ay/ (lit. "of well-being") denotes a course of action that is the best that can be done under the circumstances, or in anticipation of the future. Though this LAW LATIN phrase is of unknown origin and does not appear in Classical Latin, it serves as useful JARGON in the age-old phrase deposition de bene esse (sometimes written de bene esse deposition). Such a deposition is taken when the witness will likely be unable to attend a scheduled court hearing. Unlike most depositions, a deposition de bene esse is not a so-called "discovery deposition" but a deposition to preserve testimony.

Formerly, the phrase appearance de bene esse was used as a variant of special appearance. Today, this substitution is not recommended. One court has even ridiculed it: "[The defendant] is no longer required at the door of the federal courthouse to intone that ancient abracadabra of the law, de bene esse, in order by its magic power to enable himself to remain outside even while he steps within." Orange Theatre Corp. v. Rayherstz Amusement Corp., 139 F.2d 871, 874 (3d Cir. 1944). Cf. esse & *in esse.

During the 20th century, the phrase took on another sense in American and British legal writing, namely, "for what it is worth." This use seems pretentious.

debenture; bond. Debenture = (1) a writing that acknowledges a debt; (2) a bond secured by nothing more than the credit and financial reputation of the issuer, as opposed to a lien on property; or (3) a customhouse certificate providing for a refund of money paid on duties for imported goods when the importer reexports the goods rather than selling them in the country in which they were imported.

In BrE, debenture denotes any security issued by a company other than its shares, including what in AmE are commonly called bonds. In AmE, debenture generally denotes an instrument secured by a floating charge junior to other charges secured by fixed mortgages; more specifically, it means a series of securities secured by a group of securities held in trust for the benefit of the debenture holders. Sometimes a debenture is no more than a corporation's unsecured promissory note bearing a fixed rate of interest.

debility; debilitation. Debility = weakness; feebleness. Debilitation = the action of making weak or feeble.

debitum, an ARCHAISM and a NEEDLESS VARIANT of debt, is still sometimes used by Scottish lawyers in traditional phrases such as debitum fundi (= a debt of the estate).

de bonis asportatis. See trespass.

de bonis non. See administrator.

debouch. See debauch.

debrief, used chiefly in military or espionage operations, means (1) "to interrogate (e.g., a spy) to obtain valuable information"; (2) "to instruct someone not to reveal any classified information after that person leaves a sensitive position"; or (3) "(colloquially) to obtain information from (a person) on the completion of a mission or after a journey" (OED). Here sense (1) applies: "Driver asserts that the government knew from its 'debriefing' of the coconspirators pursuant to their plea agreements which of the hundreds of calls were made by Benton to other drug sources." U.S. v. Driver, 798 F.2d 248, 251 (7th Cir. 1986).

Some law firms apparently fancy themselves involved in the espionage business. One, in its firm résumé, states: "Feedback is an important part of a summer associate's experience at the firm; in addition to regular informal contact, we have periodic debriefings for each summer associate throughout the summer, and one at the conclusion of the summer associate's stay." Even in a figurative sense, this use of debrief fails, for the associate no doubt is primarily the recipient, not the source, of the transfer of information; hence, brief (= to give important information to) is the correct verb.

debt = (1) a specified sum of money due under a contract or otherwise; (2) a nonmonetary thing that one person owes another, such as goods or services; or (3) at common law, a writ that lay for the recovery of a liquidated sum. See indebtedness & indebtment.

debut. This word, when used as a verb, is disapproved by 97 percent of the usage panel for the AHD, for what that is worth. The forms debuted and debuting are certainly ugly to the philologist. The OED, surprisingly, records examples as far back as 1830. For the moment, however, the verb debut has taken on the character of a VOGUE WORD and should be avoided on that account.

decarceration, a word included in none of the major English-language dictionaries, refers to the state-sponsored shutting down of all substandard asylums, prisons, and reformatories, so that those who would ordinarily occupy such institutions are either discharged or denied admission. E.g., "Those who espoused rehabilitation as the primary purpose of imprisonment included both those who enthusiastically approved of imprisonment and those who favored decarceration." Franklin E. Zimring & Gordon Hawkins, Dangerousness and Criminal Justice, 85 Mich. L. Rev. 481, 485 (1986).

decease, n. See death.

decease, v.i. = to die. "He deceased without issue." This verbal use of decease is even more pompous than the nominal use. The straightforward die is almost always better. Cf. death.

deceased, n.; decedent. When these terms are used in the possessive case, no one would argue that deceased's is more euphonious than decedent's. Yet the term deceased's appears frequently in legal prose, esp. in BrE, in which decedent is obsolete. The awkwardness of -ed's can be overcome either by resort to decedent's or by writing of the deceased (which is, unfortunately, not possible in all contexts). Cf. accused & insured. See PLURALS (D) & POSSESSIVES (F).

We may find no solace in our unhappy dilemma between these words, for even decedent sounds especially legalistic; it is common, however, in American legal writing. E.g., "Appellant was under no duty to speak or inquire concerning detail of decedent's wealth."

deceit = (1) the act of giving a false impression; or (2) a tort arising from a false statement of fact made knowingly or recklessly with the intent that another person should act on it, with the result that the person who acts on it suffers damage. Within this broad definition, deceit is capable of sharing in the first four senses of fraud, q.v.

deceive; defraud. To deceive is to induce someone to believe in a falsehood. The deceiver may know the statement to be false or may make it recklessly. To defraud is to cause some kind of injury or loss by deceit. Defrauding leads a person to take action, whereas deceiving merely leads a person into a state of mind. But see sense (2) of deceit.

deceptive; deceptious. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

decide on is usually prolix for decide. E.g., "The meaning of 'defect' is for the courts to decide on [read decide]." See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

decimate. Originally this word meant "to kill one in every ten," but this etymological sense, because so uncommon, has been abandoned except in historical contexts. Now decimate generally means "to cause great loss of life; to destroy a large part of." Preferably, the word should not be used of a complete obliteration or defeat. Nor should it be used lightly of just any defeat.

decision; opinion; judgment. Technically, in the U.S., judges are said to write opinions to justify their decisions or judgments; they do not write decisions or judgments. E.g., "Last July, Judge Scalia wrote a majority decision [read opinion] that subjects defendants who claim insanity to examination, without requiring that their lawyers be present, by government psychiatrists, who may testify against them." See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT & opinion. Cf. speech.

decisional. See decisive.

decision(al) law. The preferred form of this American equivalent of case law is decisional law. E.g., "The rule of our decision law [read decisional law] puts upon the bailee the burden of proving that the loss did not result from his negligence."/ "Present decisional law would seemingly entitle plaintiff to relief under section 1983."/ "The weight of decisional law is now to the effect that when a married man makes provision in his will for his wife, and is thereafter divorced, with a property settlement between them, such change in condition and circumstances of the parties impliedly [q.v.] revokes the previously executed will in favor of the wife."/ "The statutes have produced a respectable body of decisional law."/ "Apart from the statute, the plaintiff is entitled to interest as a matter of decisional law." Cf. organic law. See case(-)law & jurisprudence (B). See also decisive.

decisioning for deciding or decision-making is an example of abhorrent social-science cant.

decision-making, n., is a generic term for deciding and, though useful in some contexts, is much overworked in current legal writing. The word smacks of sociological cant, and is often merely a grandiloquent way of saying deciding: after all, when one makes decisions, one decides.

It is now frequently spelled as one word, even by the U.S. Supreme Court. And the word is so spelled in Paul Brest's book Processes of Constitutional Decisionmaking (1975). One sees the same one-wordism tendency at work in the term budget-making, q.v. These compounds are too bulky to look like anything but jargonistic English; a simple hyphen does a lot.

decisive; decisional. Decisive, frequently used in the sense "determinative" in legal writing, refers to things as opposed to persons. In lay contexts, of course, decisive almost always refers to persons and means "resolute." Following are examples of the legal usage. "It is this last-mentioned omission in our statute that is decisive against the contention of the defendants that the law of this Commonwealth has been changed in their favor."/ "The determinative facts presented in the case at bar are, however, few, and the decisive principles are established."/ "The fact that the contractors are forced to do what they do not want to do is not decisive of the legality of the labor union's acts."/ "Although the facts in that case are wholly dissimilar from the facts in the case at bar, the principle thus broadly and tersely stated is one that should be decisive of this case."

Decisional = of, or of the nature of, deciding or a decision. The OED notes that decisional is "rare." It may have been rare in the 19th century, but today it is common in American legal writing. E.g., "This court's decisional process would not be significantly aided by oral argument."/ "Moreover, the employees had, as part of their decisional process, examined copies of the work-rules agreement in effect in Texaco's Louisiana plant." See decisional law.

declaim; disclaim. The former is what lawyers do in court, the latter what manufacturers do in warranties. To declaim is to speak formally in public (whence the adjective declamatory); this word is frequently misused for disclaim, meaning "to make a disclaimer, disavow, repudiate."

declamatory. See declarative.

declarant, esp. in the context of hearsay evidence, has long been the law's agent noun corresponding to the verb to state or to say. A declarant does not "state vehemently," as the association with declare might suggest. E.g., "Alaska Rule of Evidence 803(3) carves out an exception to the hearsay rule when a statement is not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted but is offered to prove the declarant's state of mind." State v. McDonald, 872 P.2d 627, 642 (Alaska Ct. App. 1994).

declaration = (1) at common law, the pleading by which a plaintiff formally presents a claim for relief in a civil action; (2) in the law of evidence, an unsworn statement made by someone having knowledge of facts relating to an event in dispute; (3) in a few American jurisdictions (such as California), a formal written statement resembling an affidavit and attesting, under penalty of perjury, to facts known by the declarant; (4) a U.S. Customs form on which anyone entering the U.S. must record the value of the goods and cash that he or she is bringing into the country; or (5) a document that governs legal rights to certain types of realty, such as a condominium or a residential subdivision.

Sense (3) remains unrecorded in most legal and nonlegal dictionaries. For more on sense (1), see statement of claim, treaty & COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS.

declaration of trust; trust deed; trust agreement. These terms are variously used to name the instrument creating a trust.

declarative; declaratory; declamatory. In grammar we have declarative sentences, but in law we have declaratory judgments, statutes, and acts. Both words mean "having the function of declaring, setting forth, or explaining"; their DIFFERENTIATION lies in established uses, not in meaning. For virtually all legal contexts, declaratory is the word. E.g., "In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Roman law was taken to be declaratory of the law of nature." (Roscoe Pound)

Declamatory, which is sometimes confused with declaratory, means "haranguing; of or pertaining to declaiming oratorically."

declarator is not an agent noun, but an old-fashioned equivalent of declaratory-judgment action (= a lawsuit in which a legal right or status is declared without the plaintiff's seeking further relief). The form declarator remains common in Scots law. See -ER (B). declaratory. See declarative.

declaratory-judgment action. Because the first two words form a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, they are hyphenated thus.

declaratory precedent. See precedent (D).

declare. In the context of Anglo-American caselaw, this verb often fosters the legal FICTION "that courts do not 'make' law but only 'discover' or 'declare' it . . . ." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 88 (1967). As Fuller suggests, discover is equally misleading when used in reference to a court's pronouncements on the law.

declination; declinature; declension. All three words are used in denoting the act of courteously refusing, but declination now far outstrips the other two in frequency of use. In referring to the act of declining, declinature and declension ought to be considered NEEDLESS VARIANTS of declination.

decline, v.i. & v.t. This verb, which has two distinct senses, yields two noun forms. Declination derives from decline in the sense "to refuse," and decline, n., derives from decline in the sense "to go downhill." See declination.

deconstruction (= a method of reading by which one finds the subtext beneath the text and inverts their relative importance) for destruction is an odd error that might be considered a telling slip of the tongue—e.g.: "Fire is an extremely fast and effective means of deconstruction. All urban fires are in some sense man-made . . . ." Thomas Hine, Don't Blame Mrs. O'Leary, N.Y. Times, 15 July 1990, § 7, at 13.

decorous is pronounced with the primary accent on the first syllable: /dek-ə-rəs/.

decree; judgment. Traditionally, judicial decisions are termed decrees in courts of equity, admiralty, divorce, and probate; they are termed judgments in courts of law. E.g., "Such a testamentary trust may be terminated only by a decree of a court of equity, regardless of any stipulation by all parties in interest."

Nevertheless, in modern usage decree is broad enough to refer to any court order, whether or not the relief granted or denied is equitable in nature. E.g., "[T]he [Supreme] Court's decrees are backed only by its own prestige and ultimately by the willingness of the President to help enforce them." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 57 (1960). See judgment (C).

decree, v.t. = (1) to command by decree; or (2) to award judicially; to assign authoritatively. Here sense (2), undifferentiated in most dictionaries, applies because it is construed with a direct object and a to-phrase: "But the probate court did not decree the estate to the widow, and then make her a constructive trustee of such estate for the benefit of the parents."

decree absolute; decree nisi. These phrases, more usual in G.B. than in the U.S., are very similar. Decree nisi = a conditional court decree that will become absolute unless the adversely affected party shows the court, within a specified time, why it should be set aside. In England, a decree nisi ordinarily relates to divorce, annulling a marriage, or decreeing that a missing spouse is presumed dead. E.g., "In March she commenced proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights, and on July 30 she obtained a decree nisi." (Eng.)/ "A child had been born to the wife petitioner between petition and the decree nisi and the court was not informed of its birth." (Eng.)

Decree absolute = a ripened decree nisi, that is, one whose time limit has passed, so that the court's decree has become unconditional. In England, a decree absolute is ordinarily a decree of divorce, nullity, or presumption of death that ends a legal marriage and enables the parties to remarry. The (conditional) decree nisi becomes a (final) decree absolute after a time (usu. six weeks) if there is no contrary reason.

Rule absolute and rule nisi are often used as equivalents of decree absolute and decree nisi. See nisi.

decretal /di-kree-təl/ = of or relating to a decree. E.g., "The decree is modified on the law by striking from the first decretal paragraph the following words . . . ." Decretorial, decretory, and decretive are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

Decretal may also be a noun—e.g.: "The precedents of compulsion to accomplish governmental decretals are found rather in the Court of the Star Chamber, of unhappy memory." Decrees would actually be the better word in that sentence, for decretals specifically are "letters containing a papal ruling, particularly one relating to matters of canonical discipline, and most precisely a papal rescript in response to an appeal" (OCL).

decriminalize (= to reclassify [an activity] so that it is no longer considered a crime) is a NEOLOGISM dating only from 1969. Today it is commonplace—e.g.: "As a legislator in Arizona, O'Connor once voted to decriminalize abortion." All Eyes on Justice O'Connor, Newsweek, 1 May 1989, at 34.

decry; descry. Decry = to disapprove of; to disparage. E.g., "In 1908 Roscoe Pound decried decision-making from first principles—a process described in Germany as Begriffsjurisprudenz—and warned against the law becoming too scientific."

Descry /*di-skrI/ = to see in the distance, to discern with the eye. Here it is used figuratively: "In the foregoing paragraphs we have endeavored, by the relations and facts that may be gathered and by the words used by the testator, to descry the testator's intention."

de cursu. See of course.

dedicatory; dedicative; dedicatorial. The first form is preferred; the other two are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

deduce; deduct. The former means "to infer"; the latter "to subtract." Deduct is sometimes misused in place of deduce. Here deduce is wrongly used: "We deduce [read glean?] from approved authorities the following principles as pertinent to this case." See adduce & deducible.

deducible; deductible. The former means "inferable." E.g., "The government agents relied on evidence not otherwise known or deducible by them."/ "I believe the governing principles to be deducible from the terms of the pertinent statutes."

Deductible, a favorite word of tax specialists, means "capable of being (usu. lawfully) subtracted." It is sometimes misspelled deductable. See deduce.

deduct. See deduce.

deductible. See deducible.

deed. A. As Noun Referring to an Instrument. At common law, deed referred to any written instrument that was signed, sealed, and delivered. In BrE, this broad sense still applies. In AmE, however, the narrower sense of a writing by which land is conveyed is almost uniformly applicable. See signed, sealed, and delivered.

B. As Verb. Deed, v.t., is an Americanism dating from the early 19th century. Now commonplace in AmE, this verb seems never to be used in BrE, in which solicitors are said to convey or transfer by deed. The verb deed is considerably more economical—e.g.: "On December 23, 1952, he deeded to Geneva that half of the homestead upon which the improvements had been made." Green v. Green, 113 F. Supp. 697, 697 (D. Alaska 1953)./ "[Several factors] sufficiently explain the decedent's motives in deeding the property back to her grantor." Daniels v. Cummins, 321 N.Y.S.2d 1009, 1013 (Sup. Ct. 1971).

deed of crime. See mens rea.

deed of trust; trust deed. The classical form of this term is deed of trust, meaning "a deed conveying property in trust, and usu. evidencing a mortgage." But either form suffices, and the latter has the advantage of using one-third fewer words. See of (A).

de-emphasize. This word should always be hyphenated, for the reader may at first see deem. See PUNCTUATION (F).

deem = to treat [a thing] as being something that it is not, or as possessing certain qualities that it does not possess. It is a FORMAL WORD often used in legislation to create legal FICTIONS; that is, a statute may provide that something is or is not to be deemed something else, or, with a significant difference, that this something is to be deemed not something else.

But in general usage, deem is archaic for consider, think, judge, or esteem—e.g.: "I deemed it expedient [read thought it best] to conduct a number of stress tests at various loads to prove the different effects of the bolting." (Can.)/ "Questions regarding the way Yudof handles the preliminary stages of the lawsuit should therefore not be deemed as [read considered or seen as] irrelevant in determining his fitness for office." New President Must Not Let Discrimination Hurt UT, Daily Texan, 5 Oct. 1992, at 4.

deemster. See dempster.

deep-seeded is a misbegotten metaphor—a MALAPROPISM—for deep-seated.

de facto. A. And de jure. The use of either phrase implies the question whether something exists merely in fact (de facto) or by right or according to law (de jure).

De facto /di-fak-toh/ sometimes signals that there is some formal defect that makes the thing described voidable, as in the phrases de facto contract and de facto marriage. At other times it denotes pure illegitimacy, as in de facto government (i.e., one that has displaced the rightful legal government).

De jure /di-joor-ay/ may be opposed not only to de facto, but also to de gratia (= by grace or favor), in opposition to which de jure means "as a matter of right."

Both phrases were traditionally POSTPOSITIVE

ADJECTIVES, but they now commonly precede the nouns they modify <de facto segregation> <de jure corporation>.

B. And in fact. Although the terms convey the same notion, their uses are well distinguished. De facto is used prepositively, whereas in fact is used after the noun it modifies <de facto segregation, attorney in fact>.

C. Two Words, Not One. Some writers have tried to solidify the phrase, but it remains two words—e.g.: "The uniform equality of all as subjects of the state was, for Kant, consistent with defacto [read de facto] inequalities of a physical, mental, or material nature." Cornelius F. Murphy, Jurisprudence and the Social Contract, 33 Am. J. Juris. 207, 218 (1988).

de facto segregation. See segregation, de facto.

defalcate. A. And peculate; embezzle. These three words are broadly synonymous, all three meaning "to misappropriate money in one's charge." Defalcate and peculate, the latter being slightly more common and referring to public moneys, are FORMAL WORDS that are neutral in color. Embezzle is the popular word that is more highly charged with negative CONNOTATIONS. See defalcation, defalcator, embezzle & peculation.

B. Pronunciation. Several pronounciation guides suggest that it is acceptable to stress this word on the first syllable: /def-al-kayt/ or /def-al-kayt/. See, e.g., John B. Opdycke, Don't Say It: A Cyclopedia of English Use and Abuse 236 (1939). Others suggest that the corresponding noun may be pronounced /def-al-kay-shən/. See, e.g., William H. Phyfe, 20,000 Words Often Mispronounced 244 (1937).

But these pronounciations have a problem. Anyone who hears them is likely to think of defecate and defecation. Therefore, if one must utter these words at all, the safest course is to use the following pronunciations, which all pronunciation guides accept as standard: defalcate /dee-fal-kayt/ or /di-fal-kayt/; defalcation /dee-fal-kay-shən/.

defalcation may refer either to the act of embezzling or to the money embezzled. E.g., "No one would venture to expose corporate defalcation [i.e., the act] if every word and sentence, and every fact and every inference, had to be justified by unquestionable legal evidence."/ "Evidence was adduced tending to show that the defalcation [i.e., the money embezzled] was wasted on horse racing and other forms of gambling." See defalcate & peculation.

By SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, some writers have misused defalcation when referring merely to a nonfraudulent default or to any failure to meet a duty. To be a defalcation, a deficiency in money matters must be fraudulent, and it must be by someone put in trust of the money.

For the pronunciation of defalcation, see defalcate (B).

defalcator is the agent noun corresponding to defalcate—e.g.: "[O]ne will not on this basis soothsay that . . . if the defalcator be only 'agent' for A but happens to be 'trustee' for B, there will be a difference in result . . . ." Karl Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition: Deciding Appeals 442 (1960). See defalcate.

defamacast (= a defamatory broadcast) is a PORTMANTEAU WORD and a recent NEOLOGISM that has enjoyed a limited success within law—e.g.: "In this category, defamation by broadcast or 'defamacast' is actionable per se." American Broadcasting–Paramount Theatres, Inc. v. Simpson, 126 S.E.2d 873, 879 (Ga. Ct. App. 1962)./ "Judge Homer C. Eberhardt of the Georgia Court of Appeals coined a new word, now in general use, which is quite descriptive of being defamed by television, to wit 'defamacast.'" Montgomery v. Pacific & Southern Co., 206 S.E.2d 631, 634 (Ga. Ct. App. 1974)./ "Since a 'defamacast' . . . is not considered 'slander,' the usual rules of respondeat superior are applicable, as with libel." Williamson v. Lucas, 304 S.E.2d 412, 415 (Ga. Ct. App. 1983).

The leading American book on tort law suggests that defamacast, a "barbarism," was born of a desire to avoid calling defamation by radio or television either slander or libel. See William L. Prosser & W. Page Keeton, Prosser & Keeton on Torts § 112, at 787 (5th ed. 1984).

defamation; libel; slander. These three terms are distinguished in English and American law. Defamation = an attack upon the reputation of another. It encompasses both libel (in permanent form, esp. writing) and slander (in transitory form, esp. spoken words). See libel.

In Scots law, however, libel and slander are equivalent to (and therefore interchangeable with) defamation.

defamatory; defamative. Defamatory is the usual word; defamative is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

default, n. & vb. A default is a failure to act when an action is required, esp. the failure to pay a debt—either interest or principal—as it becomes due.

As a verb, default may be either transitive or intransitive. Usually it is the latter <she defaulted on the loan>, but the transitive uses are not unusual in legal writing <she defaulted the loan>—e.g.: "Further, if the mortgage is later defaulted [many would write defaulted on], the mortgagee may find that he is not insured if he cannot deliver clear title to the FHA." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 191 (1946)./ "The Government advocates untenably that plaintiff should have accepted this offer in order not to default the contract, regardless of disproportionate cost." Aerodex, Inc. v. U.S., 417 F.2d 1361, 1364 n.3 (Ct. Cl. 1969).

The agent noun is defaulter.

default judgment; judgment by default. The latter is somewhat wordy.

defeasance = (1) the rendering null and void (of a previous condition); (2) a condition upon the performance of which a deed or other instrument is defeated or made void, or a contractual provision containing such a condition.

Sense (1) is more usual—e.g.: "The provision in the will that the interest was to be divided among 'them' every year necessitates the construction that the testatrix intended the gift of income also to be subject to defeasance by not surviving until the respective dates of distribution."

But sense (2) is not uncommon—e.g.: "In absence of a clause of defeasance, or one providing for a change of beneficiaries, the beneficiary in an ordinary policy of life insurance has a vested interest, which the insured cannot divest at his mere volition."

defeasible. The antonym to this word (indefeasible) is known to learned nonlawyers, but defeasible itself is almost exclusively a legal term, meaning "capable of being made void." E.g., "The law enforced the mortgage deed literally as a defeasible conveyance to the mortgagee." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 88 (1930). For the phrase fee simple defeasible, see fee simple (E).

defective; defectible; deficient. The primary difference to be noted is between the words defective (= faulty; imperfect; subnormal) and deficient (= insufficient; lacking in quantity). Defectible, the least common of the three terms, means "likely to fail or become defective."

The same basic distinction holds for the nouns defect and deficiency. In the following sentence, deficiency is misused for defect: "The trial court failed to submit to the jury an issue inquiring whether the multipiece wheel was defective due to a design deficiency [read had a design defect] that would cause the wheel to separate explosively during foreseeable uses." The blunder may have been caused by an attempt at INELEGANT VARIATION.

defence. See defense.

defendant. A. Pronunciation. Defendant is sometimes pronounced, esp. it seems by law school professors, with a strong accent on the last syllable, rhyming with ant. Presumably, this pronunciation helps legal neophytes remember how to spell the word. Apart from this pedagogically affected pronunciation, the correct way to pronounce the word is /di-fen-dənt/.

B. As a Postpositive Adjective. The adjective defendant is commonly placed after the noun it modifies when that noun is party. E.g., "The plaintiff chose both the forum and the parties defendant . . . ." (Harlan, J.). Some writers use this construction with other nouns, the result being an example of ARCHAISM: "Chief Judge William H. Becker . . . dryly noted that auto companies defendant in such situations 'have been unusually evasive and loath to make discovery.'" Joseph Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 287 (1978). See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

C. And prisoner. In criminal-law contexts, defendant is regarded as less prejudicial—and therefore as generally more appropriate—than either the accused or the prisoner. But accused is said to be the norm in Scots law. See John A. Beaton, Scots Law Terms and Expressions 30 (1982). See prisoner & accused.

defendant in error = respondent, appellee. See error (A) & plaintiff in error.

defendant in person. See pro se.

defender is used in Scotland for defendant, as the name of the party opposite a pursuer, q.v., in civil actions.

Elsewhere, the word takes on other senses. Sometimes it appears in reference to one who uses self-defense—e.g.: "Such a defender, not being entirely free from fault, must not resort to deadly force if there is any other reasonable method of saving himself." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 1121 (3d ed. 1982). At other times it refers to defense counsel in a criminal case—e.g.: "In many other respects the basic duties of professionalism of prosecutor and defender are the same." David Mellinkoff, Lawyers and the System of Justice 543 (1976). In still other contexts, it refers more broadly to anyone who defends an ideal: "Any such power as that authorizing the federal judiciary to entertain suits by individuals against the states had been expressly disclaimed, and even resented, by the great defenders of the Constitution whilst it was on its trial before the American people." Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1, 12 (1890).

defense; defence. A. Spelling. Defence is the BrE, defense the AmE spelling. Yet the British spelling was used by American courts through the early 20th century; Judge Learned Hand, for example, used the -ce spelling in Sinram v. Pennsylvania R.R., 61 F.2d 767, 769 (2d Cir. 1932). Today, however, the British spelling is best avoided in the U.S., lest one's writing seem affected.

B. In Criminal Law. Some writers worry that this word can lead to misunderstandings because it is used in different ways. Ordinarily, a defense is something that the defendant has the burden of proving. But that is not true of the doctrines of justifiable force, alibi, mistake, and self-defense: "If there is evidence, usually raised by the defendant, that the conduct may have been justifiable, the prosecution bears the burden of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the conduct was not justifiable or lawful. Thus, justifiable force is a defence, in the sense that it may lead to an acquittal, but the defendant does not have to establish its elements—the prosecution has to negative them." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 110–11 (1991).

Glanville Williams, though, considers these worries pedantic: "A 'defence' is any matter that the defendant will in practice raise, whether he is legally obliged to do so or not. If the word were confined to matter the burden of proof of which rests on the defendant, there would be virtually no 'defences' at common law." Textbook of Criminal Law 114 n.3 (1978).

defer; defer to. Defer, meaning "to postpone," yields the nouns deferment, q.v., and its NEEDLESS VARIANT deferral. Defer to, meaning "to give way to," yields the noun deference.

deferential. See differential (C).

deferment; deferral. Deferral is less good than deferment as the noun corresponding to the verb to defer. "The filing of the state action mandates deferral [read deferment] of our decision." See defer.

defer(r)able. The preferred form is deferrable. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

deferral. See deferment.

deficiency. See defective.

deficient. See defective.

definite; definitive. These words are increasingly confused. Definite = fixed, exact, explicit. Definitive = authoritative; conclusive; exhaustive; providing a final solution. E.g., "Usually the standard of 'certainty' is applied definitively by the trial judge in passing upon the admissibility of evidence and in deciding whether the case is to be submitted to the jury at all."/ "The trial court raised, but did not rule definitively on, the timeliness question."

The most frequent error is misuse of definitive for definite. E.g., "The ALJ erred in not setting forth, in definitive [read definite] language, his assessment of the relative credibility of the evidence."

DEFINITIONS. The best advice is to be a minimalist, for "a definition . . . often creates more problems than it solves." Brutus v. Cozens, [1972] 3 W.L.R. 521, 525 (per Lord Reid). Yet legal writers—especially drafters of documents—use definitions abundantly, so some guidance is in order.

A. When to Use. The best legal writers and drafters use definitions only when they are necessary—i.e., where there is a gain in clarity and precision. Poor writers and drafters frequently define terms that they either never use again or use perhaps once or twice after the definition. See PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

If a commonsense shortened name presents itself, use that shortened form. For example, if there is a law firm called Brown, Underwood, Smith, Tennison & Osgood, call it the Brown firm or Brown, Underwood. But don't invent the acronym BUSTO for this purpose. That approach will mire your writing in INITIALESE.

B. Lexical and Stipulative Definitions. Lexical definitions are like dictionary definitions; they purport to give the entire meaning of a word ("'Litigation' means . . ."). Stipulative definitions, by contrast, rely on the ordinary meaning of the word and merely expand a word's meaning ("'Litigation' includes mediation") or contract a word's meaning ("'Litigation' does not include prefiling investigations"). As an English writer put it in the context of statutes, "when an interpretation clause states that a word or phrase 'means . . . ,' any other meaning is excluded, whereas the word 'includes' indicates an extension of the ordinary meaning [that] continues to apply in appropriate cases." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 103 (1976).

When using stipulative definitions—which can be extremely helpful to the drafter—one must be careful not to use counterintuitive definitions, as by saying that the word dog is deemed to include all horses. Reed Dickerson made this point authoritatively: "it is important for the legal draftsman not to define a word in a sense significantly different from the way it is normally understood by the persons to whom it is primarily addressed. This is a fundamental principle of communication, and it is one of the shames of the legal profession that draftsmen so flagrantly violate it." Fundamentals of Legal Drafting § 7.3, at 144 (2d ed. 1986).

The reason for this admonition, of course, is plain: "whenever we define a word . . . in a manner that departs from current customary usage, we sooner or later unwittingly fall back on the common use and thus confuse the meanings of our terms." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 77 (1961). This confusion may occur either in the writer or in the reader. Either way, the result can be dangerous.

Still, some specialists engage in this type of overstipulation. For example, the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act defines vessel not only as any vessel "upon which or in connection with which" an injury or death may have occurred, but also as "said vessel's owner, owner pro hac vice, agent, operator, charter [sic], or a bareboat charterer, master, officer, or crew member." 33 U.S.C. § 902 (21) (1988).

C. Inept Definitional Terms. The best practice is to use means for a complete definition, includes for a stipulated expansion in meaning, and does not include for a stipulated contraction of meaning.

Yet many drafters fall into unfortunate forms, such as the following:

1. Bears the meaning. Use the tighter means instead.
2. Means and includes. Use means if that is what you mean. The expressions means and includes "should not be used because complete and incomplete meaning cannot be stipulated at one and the same time." G.C. Thornton, Legislative Drafting 166 (2d ed. 1979).
3. Includes only. Use means instead.
4. Shall mean. "[D]o not say that the defined words 'shall mean' something or other, as though you were ordering them to do so, or as though you were directing the definitions to go into effect at some later time." Barbara Child, Drafting Legal Documents 116 n. (2d ed. 1992). Also in this category are the wordy phrases shall have the meaning and shall mean and refer to.
5. Is where; is when. Reword the definition entirely. These phrases are inappropriate ways to introduce definitions. See is when.

D. "Stuffed" Definitions. Readers are entitled to assume that definitions—and definitional sections of documents—contain nothing more than definitions. Yet many contractual definitions, such as those in badly drafted insurance policies, contain substantive provisions. Such definitions are called "stuffed" definitions.

E. Placement. When more than a few definitions appear, the drafter is faced with choosing an appropriate place for them within the document. Some drafters place them in a schedule at the end; others collect them at the beginning; still others define them as they appear; and some use a combination of these methods.

It is impossible to frame an absolute recommendation, but a caution is in order against one common practice: putting page after page of definitions at the beginning of a document. If you need more than, say, 10 definitions, a schedule at the end is probably a better solution than using the opening pages in this way.

F. Signaling Defined Terms in Text. Drafters' habits vary. The most common way to tell the reader that a term is defined is by using initial capitals—a practice that is not so bad if you keep definitions to a minimum. Others have experimented with boldfacing or italicizing defined terms whenever they appear in text, but this practice can lead to unsightly text. Still others don't signal in any way that a particular word is a defined term, but most legal readers find this practice unacceptable. Drafters who typeset their materials sometimes use running footers to tell the readers which words on a given page are defined in the schedule at the end—a time-consuming and costly practice.

G. When to Compose. There are two advantages to defining terms late in the drafting process. First, you'll be less likely to have a defined term with more than one meaning, because you'll be familiar with the entire document. Second, you won't define terms that aren't used much—or never appear at all.

definitive. See definite.

deforce = (1) to keep (lands) from the true owner by means of force; (2) to oust another from possession by force; or (3) te detain (a creditor's money) unjustly and forcibly. Here, the writer apparently mistook deforce as a correlative of enforce: "One may maintain an action to enforce a lien against another who has deforced it."

deforciant; deforcer. In all but Scots law, deforcer is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of deforciant (= one who deforces). That is unfortunate, since deforcer might be more readily understood to anyone who began to learn what the verb deforce means. See deforce.

defraud. See deceive.

defraudation; defraudment. Lawyers seldom have occasion to use a noun formed from the verb defraud, perhaps because the noun fraud itself usually suffices. When they find the occasion, however, the word is defraudation—e.g.: "[B]enefits obtained by a contracting party subsequent to his defraudation are not admissible on the issue of damages . . . ." Philip Chang & Sons Assocs. v. La Casa Novato, 222 Cal. Rptr. 800, 803 (Cal. Ct. App. 1986)./ "It was a matter of legal interpretation whether Dauphin County had jurisdiction to try a case involving defraudation of a Commonwealth agency." Commonwealth v. Keenan, 530 A.2d 90, 94 (Pa. Super. 1987). Defraudment is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

defraudulent is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of fraudulent.

degenerative; degeneratory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

degradation (= a lowering in dignity, character, or quality) is a MALAPROPISM when used for derogation (= an abrogation or violation), as here: "Immunity from suit is in degradation [read derogation] of this common-law principle and must therefore be strictly construed." Bush v. Bush, 231 A.2d 245, 249 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1967)./ "The court concluded . . . that the rebate and veto provisions of the settlement agreement . . . deprived [the third parties], in degradation [read derogation] of the strong policy favoring settlements, of a chance themselves to compromise Bass' claims against them." Bass v. Phoenix Seadrill/78, Ltd., 749 F.2d 1154, 1158 (5th Cir. 1985). But the words degradation and derogation do share one sense: "detraction from the honor or reputation of; lowering or lessening in value or estimation" (OED). See derogation of, in.

de gratia. See de facto (A).

degree is the word used in law for various classifications and specifications, as for steps in consanguinity, q.v., and grades based on the seriousness of crimes. Today most American jurisdictions differentiate first-degree from second-degree murder on the basis of the gravity of the offense (gauged, e.g., by premeditation and purpose), whereas at common law first- and second-degree felons were principals and accessories, respectively. See murder (A).

dehors is a pompous little LAW FRENCH word (meaning "outside of; beyond the scope of") that should generally be avoided. The plethora of examples, selected from writings of the 1980s and 1990s, indicates the prevalence of this nasty-sounding term /di-hohr/. It serves absolutely no purpose but to sound legalistic—e.g.:

- "For present purposes, . . . statutory words [that] are 'ambiguous' are not 'unequivocal,' and judicial ingenuity to resolve the ambiguity, dehors [read outside or beyond] the statute, is inappropriately exercised." U.S. v. John C. Grimberg Co., 702 F.2d 1362, 1378 (Fed. Cir. 1983) (Nichols, J., concurring).
- "Adopting the controlling state-law rule in this diversity case, we find that the court erred in excluding all evidence dehors [read outside] the contract . . . ." Haeberle v. Texas Int'l Airlines, 738 F.2d 1434, 1436 (5th Cir. 1984).
- "Appellants argue that the circuit court erred in reversing HIPERB's decision because the court improperly considered evidence adduced in the Ryan case which is dehors [read outside] the record in this case." Ariyoshi v. Hawaii Pub. Employment Relations Bd., 704 P.2d 917, 924 n.10 (Haw. Ct. App. 1985).
- "[T]his document, assuming it exists, is dehors [read outside] the record and the Gordons' reliance on such information is improper." Gordon v. Wisconsin Health Org. Ins. Corp., 510 N.W.2d 832, 834 (Wis. Ct. App. 1993).

The term was formerly spelled as two words—e.g.: "These bills are open to the same defenses as other bills; . . . by answer if the objection is for matter de hors the record." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 64 (1916)./ "A misdescription cannot be rectified by affidavit or evidence de hors (from outside the document) . . . ." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 40 (P.W. French ed., 10th ed. 1951).

DEICTIC TERMS (e.g., this, that, it, the) are "pointing words," that is, words that try to point directly at an antecedent. Etymologically, deictic means "capable of proof," and conjures up the notion of pointing to conclusive evidence.

A pointing word such as this or these should always have an identifiable referent. But in the sentence that follows—an all too typical example—the word these does not point to one: "Officials at checkpoints that are judicially deemed the functional equivalent of a border have been granted increasingly intrusive power in connection with the search of vehicles at these checkpoints, without any requirement of probable cause or reasonable suspicion. These include the power to stop and question occupants about aliens and to search in automobile cavities that could conceal aliens." U.S. v. Oyarzun, 760 F.2d 570, 577 (5th Cir. 1985) (Hill, J., concurring). We can deduce, of course, that the writer meant powers, though the singular noun power is used in the first sentence.

Some writers believe that, in the rule stated at the outset of the preceding paragraph, the phrase "an identifiable referent" means a specific noun. They say that you should never use this or these without a noun following it. But most grammarians take a more relaxed position: "The antecedent of this and that may be any single noun . . . . This and that may also refer to a phrase, clause, or sentence, or even to an implied thought. Reference of this kind must, however, be immediately clear and apparent; otherwise the thought will be obscure." James G. Fernald, English Grammar Simplified 40 (Cedric Gale ed., rev. ed. 1979). Fernald is not alone: "This, like that, is regularly used to refer to the idea of a preceding clause or sentence: 'He had always had his own way at home, and this made him a poor roommate.'/ 'The company train their salesmen in their own school. This [More formally: This practice] assures them a group of men with the same sales methods.'" Porter G. Perrin, Writer's Guide and Index to English 794 (rev. ed. 1950) (bracketed language in orig.). Perrin's notation in his second example accurately describes the difference between this and this practice: it is a question of formality, not of correctness.

Actually, the grammarians' rule against vague reference is just that: a rule that forbids ambiguities of the kind listed here: "The most important activity is the editing of a college newspaper. This has grown with the college." (Ex. drawn fr. Richard Summers & David L. Patrick, College Composition 129 (1946).) What has grown with the college? Editing? The newspaper? The importance of editing the college newspaper? You simply cannot tell what the writer intended—if indeed the writer knew.

All one needs in good writing, then, is a sensitivity to antecedents, whether explicit or implicit. Good writers routinely use pointing words to refer to something that, although clear, is less specific than a particular noun—e.g.:

- "In civilized society men must be able to assume that they may control, for purposes beneficial to themselves, what they have discovered and appropriated to their own use, what they have created by their own labor, and what they have acquired under the existing social and economic order. This is a jural postulate of civilized society as we know it." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 108 (1922; repr 1975).
- "Courts of Quarter Sessions also have the power to make an order that barristers shall have exclusive audience; this is usually done in those Sessions where a sufficient number of barristers practice regularly." Pendleton Howard, Criminal Justice in England 364 (1931).
- "The inference is that if a given law aims at the common good, it is law, but if it does not achieve its aim there is no moral obligation to obey it. If, however, it does not even aim at the common good, it is not law at all; it is not even legally binding. No lawyer would accept this." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 12 (1945).
- "It is said that one cannot delve into the mind but must judge a man on his outward acts. This is a half-truth." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 91 (2d ed. 1961).
- "If the trial were nothing but the battle [that] in some respects it resembles, each party would want to leave his opponent guessing about the shape of his array. To some extent this is permitted, but not to the point where the opponent would be taken by surprise." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 56 (1979).
- "Normally, the corporation is accountable for a person only if he was an officer, director, or managing agent at the time the deposition was taken. This is to protect the party from the admissions of disgruntled former officers or agents . . . ." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 568 (4th ed. 1983).
- "[T]he rule is simply that courts do not use the contempt power to coerce the payment of money. This is an important rule for choosing among remedies, but it has nothing to do with irreparable injury." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 17 (1991).

The test for knowing when the word this is acceptable in such a context is this: ask yourself, This what? If an answer immediately comes to mind, the word this is probably fine. If none comes immediately to mind, you may need to add a noun.

But a word of warning: in each of the examples in the bulleted list above, a noun would have marred the style. One way to spoil such sentences is to insert, after this, an abstract noun or noun phrase such as fact, idea, practice, or state of affairs.

For a related problem with the relative pronoun which, also a deictic term, see REMOTE RELATIVES.

de jure has three senses: (1) "of right; lawful"; (2) "as a matter of right"; and (3) "by law." In sense (1) it is contrasted with de facto (= in fact, but usually unlawfully so) <de facto as opposed to de jure segregation>. In sense (2), it is contrasted with de gratia (= as a favor gratuitously bestowed). And in sense (3) it is opposed to de aequitate (= by equity).

Sense (1), illustrated in the following sentence, is the most usual: "That issue will have to be determined in light of the fact that the United States recognizes the West German Government as the de jure government over the territory it controls but does not recognize the East German Government." See de facto (A).

de jure segregation. See segregation, de facto.

delapidation. See dilapidation.

del credere* agent (= an agent who guarantees the solvency of the third party with whom the agent makes a contract for the principal) is one of the few Italianisms to have earned a place in Anglo-American law. Del credere (It. "of belief or trust") began as an Italian mercantile phrase that English writers borrowed in the 18th century.

delecti for delicti is a misuse that occurs in several LATINISMS, such as corpus delicti and lex loci delicti. For an example of the latter, see the following sentence: "Most of the numerous inadequacies inherent in lex loci delecti [read lex loci delicti] also exist in the other traditional lex loci rules." Duncan v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 665 S.W.2d 414, 421 (Tex. 1984). See corpus delicti* & *lex loci delicti.

delegable is the word, not delegatable. Many writers mistakenly use the latter form—e.g.: "[H]e . . . had a wide range of responsibilities not delegatable [read delegable] to his subordinates." Holt v. Gamewell Corp., 797 F.2d 36, 38 (1st Cir. 1986). See -ATABLE.

delegate. See relegate.

delegatee (= one to whom a debtor's matter is delegated) is not, despite its appearances to the contrary, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of delegate (= one who represents or acts for another or a group of others). See -EE.

delegatus non potest delegare. See MAXIMS. deliberate; deliberative. These words have clear DIFFERENTIATION. Deliberate = (1) intentional, fully considered; or (2) unimpulsive, slow in deciding. Deliberative = of, or appointed for the purpose of, deliberation or debate (COD).

Deliberative is misused for deliberate in both sense (1) and sense (2). Here is an example of the former: "The express revocation of a will is a deliberative [read deliberate] act and operates as an immediate revocation of the will to which it refers."

deliberate speed. See with all deliberate speed.

deliberative. See deliberate.

delict; delictum; deliction. The preferred term is tort. Delict (= an offense against the law) is the more common of the two variants here to be discussed, but both are inferior in Anglo-American contexts to the usual word (tort). E.g., "A child of tender years [read a young child] may be incapable of committing a legal delict [read tort] because of his lack of capacity to discern the consequences of his act."/ "Thus recovery of a sum of money by way of penalty for a delict [read tort] is the historical starting point of liability." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 75 (1922; repr. 1975)./ "The simple fact that one delict [read tort] has already occurred is in no way indicative of the likely merits of subsequent claims." Procup v. Strickland, 792 F.2d 1069, 1081 (11th Cir. 1986) (Johnson, J., dissenting).

Delictum is a Latinate variant used primarily in discussions of Roman law—e.g.: "There was another class of obligations, to be looked at presently, which had their origin in a delictum (a delict or delinquency), a wrong, unlawful act done by one party to the other." James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 237 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co. 1881)./ "Bateman Eichler contends that the respondents' delictum [read delict or tort] was substantially par to that of Lazzaro and Neadeau for two reasons." Bateman Eichler, Hill Richards Inc. v. Berner, 472 U.S. 299, 312 (1985).

Additionally, deliction, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of delict, is not recorded in the dictionaries—e.g.: "[The] common-law status of the plaintiff's case is accentuated by the statutory element of deliction [read delict]." Schnackenberg v. Delaware, L. & W. Ry., 98 A. 266, 266 (N.J. 1916)./ "The individuals whose alleged deliction [read delict] caused the death were not sued . . . ." Garber v. Prudential Ins. Co., 22 Cal. Rptr. 123, 131 (1962) (Files, J., dissenting)./ "A suit for damages instituted as a result of a proprietor's violation of the obligation . . . is not a tort action in the sense that deliction [read delict] in its usual connotation is a necessary element." Hero Lands Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 310 So. 2d 93, 97 (La. 1975).

delictal; delictive. See delictual.

delictu for delicto, a mistake unknown in English law, has occurred in many dozens of American cases. See in flagrante delicto, ex delicto* & *in pari delicto.

delictum. See delict.

delictual; delictal; delictive. The preferred form is delictual, assuming this word is to be used advisedly in place of its near-equivalent, tortious. In civil-law contexts, of course, it is the normal word—e.g.: "The Louisiana Supreme Court held that Article 2971 limited only the innkeeper's contractual, not his delictual, responsibility."/ "I would like to raise the question whether we are justified to speak of a general law of obligations including the categories of contractual, delictual, quasi-contractual, and quasi-delictual obligations, or should we, perhaps, approach each category of obligations separately?" A.N. Yiannopoulos, "Comments and Questions," in Essays on the Civil Law of Obligations 45 (Joseph Dainow ed. 1969).

Delictual may be more useful than its sibling delict, for it signifies "of or relating to a tort," whereas tortious signifies either "relating to a tort" or "constituting a tort" <tortious conduct>. See tortious (A).

Delictal, recorded in the OED as appearing in only one source (in 1913), is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of delictual. E.g., "An obscure text suggests that where the delictal [read delictual] action aimed merely at compensation . . . , they were quite distinct." W.W. Buckland, A Text-Book of Roman Law 711 (1921)./ "Such a postulate is the basis of delictal [read delictual] culpa, using culpa in the narrower sense, and of our doctrine of negligence." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 86 (1922; repr. 1975)./ "[W]e think the rules heretofore set out relating to the right to legal subrogation in conventional debts apply also to delictal [read delictual] obligations." A.O. Smith-Inland, Inc. v. Union Carbide Corp., 547 F. Supp. 344, 347 (M.D. La. 1982).

Still another NEEDLESS VARIANT is delictive—e.g.: "Fault (culpa) involves delictive [read delictual] conduct of an affirmative or voluntary nature." Colmenares Vivas v. San Alliance Ins. Co., 807 F.2d 1102, 1109 (1st Cir. 1986).

delictum. See delict.

delimit(ate). Delimit, the preferred form, is not merely a fancy variation of limit (= to restrict the bounds of), as many seem to believe. E.g., "The manufacturer may possibly delimit [read limit] the scope of his potential liability by use of a disclaimer in compliance with the statute."/ "The court held on several occasions that certain congressional attempts to delimit [read limit] its jurisdiction were unconstitutional attempts to invade the judicial province."

Properly, delimit means "to define; delineate," as here: "If the challenged conduct of respondents constitutes state action as delimited by our prior decisions, then that conduct was also action under color of state law and will support a suit under § 1983."

delineate, (lit. "to draw or sketch") means figuratively "to represent in words; to describe." It is sometimes misused for differentiate. E.g., "A corporate seal is probably desirable since it helps to delineate [read differentiate] corporate transactions from individual transactions."

delinquent, in AmE, can apply to either things or people <delinquent taxes> <juvenile delinquents>. In BrE, it applies only to people.

delirium tremens. This word denotes a mental disease characterized by violent mania, with tremors and hallucinations, induced by a sudden abstinence from alcohol or another drug after one has used it excessively over a prolonged period. The phrase should not be used, as it sometimes is, to describe mere frenzied drunkenness, which is something else entirely.

deliverance, when used for opinion, is somewhat grandiose; it is an extension of the Scots law sense "a judicial or administrative order." E.g., "In days not far remote, judges were not unwilling to embellish their deliverances with quotations from the poets." Benjamin N. Cardozo, Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 471, 484 (1939)./ "Fully aware of Mississippi's imprimatur on § 6 we might—by piecing together some of our own deliverances and the District Court opinions dutifully following them—come up with a fair prediction of what Mississippi would hold in this case, but we do not think this would be a wise course." See delivery (A) & opinion.

delivery. A. And deliverance. Delivery is the more usual word to describe a transfer or conveyance (of something), an utterance , or giving birth. In the law relating to deeds, delivery "does not mean transfer of possession, but conduct indicating that the person who has executed the deed intends to be bound by it." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 145 (8th ed. 1991). Thus "it is perfectly possible for the grantor to 'deliver' the deed and yet keep possession of it." Id. Such a delivery is termed constructive delivery.

Deliverance is a legal and religious term usu. meaning "rescue, release," although at one time it overlapped with delivery in almost every sense. In law, deliverance can mean (1) "a jury's verdict"; (2) "in an action of replevin, the delivery of goods unlawfully taken"; or (3) "a judicial opinion or a judgment that a judge delivers." See deliverance.

B. And livery. The word livery has a number of obsolete and archaic senses, but in law has been used in the sense "the legal delivery of property into a person's possession," as in the phrases livery of seisin and to take (or have) livery of. The student can better understand livery by reading it mentally as "delivery." See livery of seisin.

C. Cant Uses. It has become voguish in some circles to use delivery of where providing or provision for would normally appear, esp. in reference to services. Like any other trendy expression, it ought to be avoided. E.g., "It is irrational to equate the cost of total confinement with the alleged harm resulting from a change in method of the delivery of [read providing] dental services." See VOGUE WORDS.

delusion. See hallucination & illusion.

delusive; delusory; delusional. Delusive = (1) tending to delude, deceptive; or (2) of the nature of a delusion. Usually sense (1) applies. Delusional is the more usual term for sense (2). E.g., "Defendant acted under a completely delusional perception of reality." Delusory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

demagoguery; demagogy. Demagoguery (= the practices of a political agitator who appeals to mob instincts) is the usual word, demagogy being a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

demandant. Formerly, in real actions (i.e., lawsuits over land), the plaintiff was called the demandant and the defendant the tenant. See real action.

demarcation; demarkation. The former is the preferred spelling.

demean; bemean. Formerly, authorities on usage disapproved of demean in the sense "to lower, degrade," holding that instead it properly should be used reflexively in the sense "to conduct (oneself)." For example, an early usage critic wrote that "demean signifies 'to behave' and does not mean debase or degrade." Frank H. Vizetelly, A Desk-Book of Errors in English 62 (1909). The meaning "to behave," now somewhat archaic, is used infrequently in legal contexts—e.g.: "The oath of office now generally administered in all the states requires the lawyer to uphold the law; to demean himself, as an officer of the court, uprightly; to be faithful to his trust." See Fed. R. App. P. 46(a) ("I . . . do solemnly swear . . . that I will demean myself as an attorney and counselor of this court . . . .").

Yet the more common lay sense is now widespread even in legal prose, and has been with us since at least 1601. E.g., "Nowhere in the common-law world—indeed in any modern society—is a woman regarded as a chattel or demeaned by denial of a separate legal identity and the dignity associated with recognition as a whole human being."/ "This illogical result demeans the values protected by the Confrontation Clause." Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200, 212 (1987) (Stevens, J., dissenting).

Meanwhile, the word with which demean was confused in arriving at its popular meaning, bemean (= to debase), has become virtually obsolete.

demesne (= at common law, a lord's land held as his absolute property and not as feudal property through a superior) is pronounced either /di-meen/ or /di-mayn/. Today, unless the word appears in a historical context, it is ordinarily figurative—e.g.: "Collins, without authorization from the directors, ruled the corporation as a personal demesne for the benefit of himself and his son." Jackson v. Nicolai-Neppach Co., 348 P.2d 9, 20 (Or. 1959).

de minimis. A. The Maxim. De minimis is a shortened form of the Latin maxim de minimis non curat lex (= the law does not concern itself with trifles). E.g., "Perhaps this is still true today, but if so this area of procedure has become so shrunken as to fall within the maxim de minimis." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 272 (4th ed. 1983). Though most legal writers find it legitimate and useful, in practice there is something to Ephraim Tutt's quip that "[n]o one knows exactly what it means." Yankee Lawyer 356 (1943).

De minimis non curat lex is a sentence in itself. When invoking the maxim by declaring something to be a mere trifle, one writes that it is de minimis. The entire maxim should not be inserted when only the "trifling" portion is called for: "The testimony regarding the landscaping in the common areas was unsatisfactory, but this insufficiency is considered to be de minimis non curat lex." The sentence is grammatically nonsensical. If an entire maxim is used, it should fit into the sentence syntactically. But here we have, in translation, "this insufficiency is considered to be [the law does not concern itself with trifles]." The writer should have ended the sentence with de minimis. See MAXIMS.

B. The Phrase. Lawyers often use the phrase not as a shortened version of the maxim, but in the sense "so insignificant that a court may overlook (it or them) in deciding the issue or case." E.g., "Winter maintains that his unauthorized sales of non-Carvel products were de minimis and cannot possibly be deemed to have a sufficient effect on interstate commerce." Franchised Stores of N.Y., Inc. v. Winter, 394 F.2d 664, 670 (2d Cir. 1968)./ "[T]he dictum that plaintiff's injury must pass some threshold of seriousness, more than de minimis, makes no sense at all." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 74 (1991).

The phrase sometimes appears, as in the following sentences, to act merely as a fancy substitute for minimal: "The amount of advertising by plaintiff was de minimis [read minimal], as it had been in business only a matter of months."/ "To require TWA to bear more than a de minimis cost in order to give Hardison Saturdays off is an undue hardship." Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison, 432 U.S. 63, 84 (1977).

Sometimes the phrase is used as an attributive noun (meaning "something that is de minimis"): "CPI may be barred from asserting its trademark rights nationwide because of its failure to challenge what it may have considered a de minimis."

demise, vb. & n. The meanings of the verb demise are (1) "to convey by will or lease"; (2) "to pass by descent or bequest"; or (3) "to die."

The corresponding definitions of demise as a noun are (1) "the conveyance of an estate by will or lease, or the lease itself"; (2) "the passing of property by descent or bequest"; and (3) "death."

The popular sense of demise, of course, is as a noun: "death." Because most nonlawyers understand the word in this sense, the legal senses are likely to bewilder them. The popular meaning is an extension of the legal meanings, for historically the transference of property usually resulted from a sovereign's death. Hence the change of focus from conveyance to death. Sometimes even in legal contexts demise carries its nominal lay meaning: "Equating isolated instances of lawyer misconduct with the demise of legal ethics would be as foolhardy as ignoring the problem."/ "Mrs. Byrd's will was drawn by a Virginia practitioner two months after her husband's demise." See death.

Sense (1) of the verb and noun is illustrated in the following sentences. Because even sense (1) contains two quite distinct meanings, a more specific word might be better: "If land is demised [read leased] for the term of 100 years or more, the term shall, as long as 50 years thereof remain unexpired, be regarded as an estate in fee simple."/ "A chargee by way of legal mortgage is to be deemed to have a charge by way of subdemise [read sublease], and therefore a legal estate in the property charged." (Eng.)

The adjective is demisable: "Because this tenure derived its whole force from custom, the lands must have been demisable by copy of court roll from time immemorial . . . ." W.A. Jowitt, The Dictionary of English Law 491 (1959) (s.v. copyhold).

democracy. This term, meaning literally "government by the people," is often employed loosely, often tendentiously, often vaguely, and sometimes disingenuously (as when the post–World War II U.S.S.R. was referred to as a "democracy"). Originally a Greek term, democracy was understood by the Greeks in a very different sense from the current understanding: Greek democracy was a limited institution—limited to clan members, who were citizens; a huge population of slaves and other subordinated classes were disfranchised. The same, of course, might be said of the U.S. before the abolition of slavery and before women gained the right to vote. Notions of democracy change over time, mostly as notions of who are "the people" change. Throughout history, the term has come gradually to be more and more inclusive.

demonstrable /di-mon-strə-bəl/ is the word, not demonstratable, a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "Such an inference clearly cannot be supported absent a demonstratable [read demonstrable] nexus between the defendant and the act sought to be introduced against him." State v. English, 383 S.E.2d 436, 438 (N.C. Ct. App. 1989).

demonstrative legacy. See legacy.

dempster; deemster. These are variant forms of the same word, which for most purposes has only historical significance. Both mean basically "a judge." Dempster was formerly used in Scotland, and deemster is still used on the Isle of Man. The OED notes that deemster "has been used in the general sense as a historical ARCHAISM by some modern writers"; the temptation to do so should be resisted.

demur, n. See demurrer.

demur, vb.; demure. Demur, v.i., = to file a demurrer, which effectively admits the truth of a fact stated but denies that the complainant is legally entitled to relief. E.g., "Defendant demurred to each count."

Demure is the adjective meaning (1) "sober, grave, serious"; or (2) "coy in an affected way."

demurrable = that may be demurred to. Lawyers have traditionally spoken of demurrable allegations, demurrable indictments, and the like—e.g.: "There is authority for the position that the indictment must be specific in charging the burglarious intent, and is demurrable if it merely alleges an intent to commit 'a felony.'" Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 266 (3d ed. 1982).

demurrer; demurral; demur, n.; demurrage. A demurrer was a common-law pleading that stated that even if the other party's allegations were proved, the other party would not be entitled to succeed, and therefore that the demurring party was entitled in law to succeed on the facts alleged and admitted by the other. E.g., "The court was right in sustaining the demurrer." Today, demurrers are obsolete in England (since 1883) and in most if not all American jurisdictions. But they are still used in states such as California, Connecticut, Nebraska, Oregon, and Pennsylvania, among others. See -ER (B).

Idiomatically speaking, demurrers were said to be interposed: "The circuit court of Cook County sustained a demurrer interposed by appellants to a bill for injunction filed by appellees and entered a decree dismissing the bill for want of equity."/ "A demurrer can be interposed only to a bill." Walter C. Clephane, Equity Pleading and Practice 191 (1926).

Demur, n., is the archaic nonlegal word for "the act of demurring; an objection raised or exception taken to a proposed course of action" (OED). The word is now chiefly literary. Demurral is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of demur.

Demurrage is a maritime-law word meaning "a [liquidated] penalty imposed on a charterer of a vessel, or in some instances the consignee of the vessel's goods, for delays in loading or unloading the ship's cargo." Trans-Asiatic Oil, Ltd. v. Apex Oil Co., 804 F.2d 773, 774 n.1 (1st Cir. 1986). It is usually used in the plural, demurrages.

denial of justice, an important phrase in international law, has been the object of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION: "The term . . . is sometimes loosely used to denote any international delinquency towards an alien for which a state is liable to make reparation. In this sense it is an unnecessary and confusing term. Its more proper sense is an injury involving the responsibility of the state committed by a court of justice . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 226–27 (5th ed. 1955).

denization (= the action of making a person a denizen, i.e., a resident alien), a legal term dating from 1601, is sometimes incorrectly rendered denizenation.

denote (= to mean; stand for) for denominate (= to give a name to; call) is a not uncommon error—e.g.: "The issue can reasonably be denoted as [read denominated, or better, called] one of procedure."/ "M.Y.J. promised to pay $5,000 to Allegheny College by a writing denoted [read denominated] an Estate Pledge." See connote.

denouncement. See denunciation.

de novo, adv. & adj. This LATINISM, usually an adjective <de novo review>, as an adverb means "anew." E.g., "We review a summary judgment de novo." denunciation; denouncement. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

deny (= to declare untrue; repudiate; to refuse to recognize or acknowledge) is frequently misused for other words.

A. For refuse. These words are synonymous in certain constructions <He was denied (or refused) this>. But in modern usage refuse properly precedes an infinitive, whereas with deny this construction is an ARCHAISM: "The Federal Judge ordered the Governor to testify, but he denied [read refused] to do so."

B. For deprive: "The cumulative effect of the errors denied them of a fair trial [read either denied them a fair trial or deprived them of a fair trial]."

depart, a FORMAL WORD meaning "to go" or "to leave," may be a transitive verb, and often is in legal prose, although in lay usage it is almost always intransitive. Hence legal writers state that someone departed the premises, whereas the nonlawyer would probably say that someone departed from the premises. The better phrasing—in either a legal or a nonlegal context—would be to say that the person left.

depart from, in the context of discussing precedents, is sometimes a euphemism for overturn or overrule. When a court says that it departs from a precedent, it in effect overturns the precedent, usu. without expressly so stating. The expression is more appropriate in referring to mere persuasive authority, as opposed to what would ordinarily be considered binding authority.

dépeçage, n. /dep-ə-sahj/, is a mid-20th-century borrowing from French law. It derives from the French verb dépecer (= to cut up, dismember), and it means "choice of law issue by issue; the practice of applying rules of different jurisdictions to different issues in a legal dispute"—e.g.: "For a long time, courts and writers agreed that a choice-of-law involved a choice of a 'governing' legal system rather than of an individual rule. Much of this ideology remains intact in the language of the courts. But it is increasingly recognized that it is always a rule rather than a legal system to which we are referred . . . . [T]he implementation of this finding has been called depecage or scission." Albert Ehrenzweig, Conflicts in a Nutshell 219 (2d ed. 1970)./ "Depecage occurs where the rules of one legal system are applied to regulate certain issues arising from a given transaction or occurrence, while those of another system regulate the other issues. The technique permits a more nuanced handling of certain multistate situations and thus forwards the policy of aptness." Arthur T. von Mehren, Special Substantive Rules for Multi-State Problems, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 347, 356 n.24 (1974).

dependence; dependency. These variants have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. Dependence is the general word meaning (1) "the quality or state of being dependent"; or (2) "reliance." Dependency is a geopolitical term meaning "a territory under the jurisdiction of, but not formally annexed by, a nation." (See territory.) These words are commonly misspelled -ance, -ancy.

dependent, n.; dependant, n. The older spelling is -ant. The OED notes: "from the 18th c. often (like the adj.) spelt dependent, after L.; but the spelling -ant still predominates in the [noun]." W10 countenances -ent over -ant. The COD continues the Oxonian preference for -ant, noting that -ent is chiefly American. Certainly the British DIFFERENTIATION in spelling between the adjective (dependent) and the noun (dependant) is a useful one; but American writers cannot be faulted for using the -ent spelling for the noun.

dependent relative revocation. "The doctrine of dependent relative revocation is basically an application of the rule that a testator's intention governs; it is not a doctrine of defeating that intent." This phrase, common in the American and British law of wills, confuses all but specialists in wills and estates. It has nothing to do with revoking one's dependent relatives; rather, it means "revocation of a will by a testator who intends to replace it by another, effective will" (CDL). The law regards as mutually dependent the acts of destroying one will and of substituting another in its place, when both acts are parts of one plan. The two acts are thus "related," or relative.

We might wish for a less monstrous phrase, such as conditional revocation: "The name of this doctrine [dependent relative revocation] seems to me to be somewhat overloaded with unnecessary polysyllables. The resounding adjectives add very little, it seems to me, to any clear idea of what is meant. The whole matter can be quite simply expressed by the word 'conditional.'" In re Hope Brown, [1942] P. 136, 138 (per Langton, J.).

deplane. This word, like inplane and reinplane, is characteristic of airlinese, a relatively new brand of JARGON. Careful writers and speakers stick to time-honored expressions like get off, get on, and get on again.

depone. See depose.

deponee. See deponent.

deponent (= one who testifies by deposition) is sometimes incorrectly rendered deponee, deposee, and even deposer—e.g.: "It is ordered that each deponee [read deponent] produce at his deposition only those items in his custody and described in the subpoena duces tecum."/ "The Superior Court's decision was silent as to plaintiff's questions to both deposees [read deponents] . . . ." Matheson v. Bangor Publishing Co., 414 A.2d 1203, 1205 (Me. 1980)./ "We find no error in the trial judge's ruling that excluded from being read to the jury . . . his own introductory comments during the deposition proceeding. In fact, their inclusion would have, it seems to us, given inordinate weight and buttressed the deposer's [read deponent's] testimony . . . ." State v. Harriston, 253 S.E.2d 685, 688 (W.V. 1979). See affirmant.

deport; disport. The latter word is sometimes confused with the former, which means (1) "to behave (oneself)"; or (2) "to banish, remove." The latter is a reflexive verb meaning "to display oneself sportively."

deportation; deportment. Both derive ultimately from L. deportare (= to carry off, convey away), but to say that these words have undergone DIFFERENTIATION is a great understatement. Deportation = the act of removing (a person) to another country; the expulsion of an alien from a country. Deportment = the bearing, demeanor, or manners of a person.

deportee. See -EE.

deportment. See deportation.

depose; depone. In legal contexts, to depose (v.i.) is to bear witness or testify, or (v.t.) to take a deposition of someone. Depose also has the historical meaning "to dethrone or kill (a king)." Depone, a relatively rare word meaning "to testify," ought to be considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Krapp recorded depose as being used in legal contexts for "to state"—e.g.: "The witness deposes that he has seen . . . ." George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 188 (1927). Actually, today that sense survives in AmE only in the doublet deposes and states or deposes and says, a common phrase in affidavits. But in BrE it has more currency—e.g.: "[T]he manufacturer's secretary was called and deposed that in the previous six years the manufacturer had treated by a similar process 4,737,600 of these garments . . . ." Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills Ltd., [1936] A.C. 85, 95 (per Lord Wright).

But the more common use today is the transitive one—e.g.: "The defendant's attorney then deposed the plaintiff." As that example illustrates, American lawyers today almost invariably say that the lawyer deposes the witness, not that the deponent deposes. In the following sentence, then, a lawyer would have put the verb into PASSIVE VOICE: "If [the witness] has not deposed [read been deposed], the other lawyer won't be able to emphasize his pain and suffering by reading the questions and answers to the jury." Joseph C. Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 107 (1978).

For lawyers, the nonlegal sense ("to dethrone") occasionally causes MISCUES—e.g.: "President George Bush . . . again urged that President Saddam Hussein be deposed, saying 'It's only terror that's keeping him in power.'" Marines Replace Iraqis in North, Int'l Herald Tribune, 27–28 April 1991, at 1. That is so especially in contexts involving trial preparation—e.g.: "The judge in the drug and racketeering trial of Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega privately questioned an important prosecution witness this afternoon to determine whether the witness lied when he testified against the deposed Panamanian leader last fall." Larry Rohter, Judge Examines Truthfulness of Noriega Witness, N.Y. Times, 26 March 1992, at A8.

deposee. See deponent.

deposer. See deponent.

depositary; depository; depositee. Most authorities on usage have agreed through the years that depositary is the better term in reference to persons with whom one leaves valuables or money for safekeeping, and that depository is preferred in reference to places. The Uniform Commercial Code, however, contains the term depositary bank, and this phrase has therefore become common. E.g., "Depositary banks rely on a strict set of rules to know when a check has been accepted or dishonored." Following is an example of the traditional use of depositary: "The depositary in escrow . . . has the absolute duty to carry out the terms of the agreement." In re Missionary Baptist Found., 792 F.2d 502, 504 (5th Cir. 1986).

Depository has continued to be used consistently of places. E.g., "The Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 . . . is a comprehensive statute providing for the establishment by the Department of Energy of a geologic depository for the disposal of high-level radioactive waste."

Depositee is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of depositary—e.g.: "A depositee [read depositary] who made away with the thing was liable ex deposito . . . ." W.W. Buckland, A Text-Book of Roman Law 709 (1921).

deposition. A. As Verb. Deposition should not be used as a verb in place of depose. E.g., "After they were depositioned [read deposed], they were asked to come forward with the relevant discoverable documents." See depose.

B. As Noun. In its legal senses, as the noun corresponding to depose, the word deposition – (1) a witness's out-of-court testimony that is recorded by a court reporter and reduced to writing for later use in court; (2) the session at which such out-of-court testimony is recorded; or (3) in ecclesiastical law, a penalty by which a member of the clergy may be divested of a patronage or other dignity. Deposition serves as the noun for both depose and deposit. "The landfill sites were physically unsuitable for hazardous-waste deposition [= the act of depositing]."

C. Oral deposition. This phrase is not a REDUNDANCY because, under most court rules, it is possible to take a deposition upon written interrogatories (sometimes called a deposition on written questions).

depository. See depositary.

depravity; depravation. The former is the condition of being depraved or corrupt; the latter is the act or process of depraving or corrupting. Cf. deprivation.

deprecate; depreciate. The former is increasingly misused for the figurative senses of the latter, whereas the latter is too often confined to its literal meaning. Deprecate = to disapprove regretfully. E.g., "[O]ne of the earliest and most uncompromising advocates of unlimited sovereignty, Bodin, deprecated any attempt to make laws unrepealable." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 469 (7th ed. 1964).

The phrase self-deprecating is, literally speaking, an unlikely description except perhaps for those suffering from extreme neuroses. Depreciate, transitively, means "to belittle, disparage"; and intransitively, "to fall in value" (used of securities or investments). Thus self-depreciating, with depreciate in its transitive sense, is the correct phrase—e.g.: "But in him modesty is not an expression of shyness or self-depreciation or self-distrust." Felix Frankfurter, "Calvert Magruder," in Of Law and Life and Other Things 136, 138 (Philip B. Kurland ed., 1967).

In the following sentence, the U.S. Supreme Court nodded: "We do not deprecate [read depreciate] Fourth Amendment rights. The security of persons and property remains a fundamental value which law enforcement officers must respect." Alderman v. U.S., 394 U.S. 165, 175 (1969).

The intransitive use of depreciate (= to decline in value), primarily financial and legal, has evolved into the transitive sense "to claim tax deductions (for) on the basis of depreciation" <he depreciated his house>. This use of the word is colloquial, and should be avoided in formal legal contexts.

depreciatory; depreciative. Both mean "disparaging." In BrE, depreciatory is the predominant term; in AmE, the two forms are used almost equally often. Still, depreciative might reasonably be labeled a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

deprivation; privation. Both mean "the action of depriving or taking away." The words share that general sense as well as specific senses relating to the depriving of an office, position, or benefice. Deprivation is the ordinary word; privation is more literary. Cf. depravity.

depute, v.t.; deputize. To depute is to delegate <these responsibilities she deputed to her attorney-in-fact>, and to deputize is to make (another) one's deputy or to act as deputy <the sheriff then deputized four people who had offered to help in the search>.

deraign, v.t., a legal ARCHAISM still often referred to, means "to settle (a dispute or claim) by combat or wager." A right-minded folk etymologist might conclude that the word was arrived at by metathesis of derange.

dereliction = abandonment, esp. through neglect or moral wrong, as in dereliction of duty. E.g., "By hypothesis he has committed the gravest dereliction possible—a complete repudiation of the trust he expressly assumed." The OED notes that in legal prose dereliction is still used in the neutral sense of physical abandonment; if this sense persists at all in current legal usage, it is obsolescent.

derisive; derisory; derisible. Derisive = scoffing; expressing derision . Derisory = worthy of derision or of being scoffed at <that argument is so bad that judges would consider it derisory>. Though derisive and derisory at one time overlapped and were frequently synonymous, the DIFFERENTIATION is now complete, and using the two as synonyms is erroneous. Derisible is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of derisory.

derivative action = "a suit by a beneficiary of a fiduciary to enforce a right running to the fiduciary as such." Goldstein v. Groesbeck, 142 F.2d 422, 425 (2d Cir. 1944). Synonymous phrases include derivative suit and (somewhat more narrowly) shareholder derivative suit.

derogate is regularly used in two quite distinct senses in legal prose: (1) transitively, it means "to disparage" <we do not derogate these values, however, if we are unable to find them to be protected by the Constitution>; and (2) intransitively, it is used with the prep. from and means "to detract" <the court's position derogates from the highly sensitive discretion that is inherent in the parole function>.

derogation of, in. This phrase is used 99 times in legal contexts for every one use in nonlegal contexts. It means "in abrogation or repeal of (a law, contract, or right)." Hence the maxim: Statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed. In a sense, that maxim is senseless, for, as Grant Gilmore once quipped, "what statute is not?" The Ages of American Law 62 (1977). E.g., "The district court found that the intervenor's position would effectively give the employer control of the settlement process in derogation of the policy that settlements are favored in the law."

Derogation from is another idiom, meaning "prejudice, destruction (e.g., of a right or grant)." E.g., "It is an established rule that a grantor cannot be permitted to derogate from his grant."/

"If the perpetrator of this fraud is the counsel in the case, then, as an officer of the court he has offended and may be punished for a derogation from professional integrity." See degradation.

descend, v.i.; distribute. In the legal idiom relating to intestacy, real property is said upon death to descend (= to pass) to the heirs. E.g., "If it is a remainder in fee simple it will descend on the death of the remainderman intestate to his heirs." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 139 (2d ed. 1988). Personal property, by contrast, is distributed to the intestate's next-of-kin. Hence the phrase statute of descent and distribution contains no REDUNDANCY. See descent (B). For more on heirs, next-of-kin, and distributees, see heir (C).

descendant. In proper usage, only a decedent is said to have descendants—a live parent does not. See ascendant.

descender. See -ER (B).

descendible, not descendable, is the preferred form. See -ABLE (A). descent. A. And *purchase. These words are distinguished in the law of property. Descent refers to the acquisition of property by act of law (as by inheritance), whereas purchase is acquisition of property by the act of oneself or another (as by will or gift). In legal contexts, then, purchase is much broader than the general lay sense of "buying." E.g., "These incidents did not accrue if the property was acquired through purchase, and, in order to obviate this means of curtailing the payment of incidents, title by descent was declared to be more worthy than title by purchase; if a gift over might pass to an heir by descent rather than by gift [i.e., purchase], he took his title through inheritance." See purchase, buy & words of purchase.

B. And distribution; inheritance. At common law, intestate real property passes by descent and intestate personal property passes by distribution. Both heirs (who take by descent) and distributees (who take by distribution) may properly be said to inherit or take by inheritance. In the U.S., the Uniform Probate Code has simplified the historical terminology, supplanting all these specific terms with the general phrase intestate succession. See descend & succession.

descry. See decry.

desegregation; integration. No distinction between a legal requirement of integration and a legal requirement of desegregation is ordinarily observed in legal usage, but the distinction may be important in understanding the constitutional law of race and the schools. Certainly it would be useful, in reference to schools in the U.S., if we distinguished between court-ordered desegregation (= the abrogation of policies that segregate races into different institutions and facilities) and court-ordered integration (= the incorporation of different races into existing institutions for the purpose of achieving a racial balance).

deserts. See just deserts.

deshabille. See dishabille.

desiderata (= things wanted or needed) is the plural form of desideratum. Although the plural is more common, the singular has many appropriate uses—e.g.: "The first desideratum of a system for subjecting human conduct to governance of rules is an obvious one: there must be rules." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 46 (rev. ed. 1969).

designatee. See designee.

designedly, in criminal law, is sometimes used synonymously with—but is not as good as—intentionally.

designee; designatee. Designee (= a person designated), a word dating from 1925 and commonly used by lawyers, is sometimes displaced by designatee, a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "[T]he commissioner, or a competent designatee [read designee], is required to inspect and approve all construction work." Ross v. Consumers Power Co., 363 N.W.2d 641, 669 (Mich. 1984). See -EE desirable; desirous. Desirable is used in reference to things (or members of the opposite sex), desirous in reference to people's emotions. What is desirable is attractive and worth seeking; the word applies to anything that arouses a desire. Desirous = impelled by desire.

The phrase be desirous of is usually a circumlocution for the verb desire or want. E.g., "The appellant was desirous of securing [read desired (or wanted) to secure] the property immediately."/ "Plaintiff's brother and sister, his cobeneficiaries under the trust, were not desirous of terminating it [read did not want to terminate it]."/ "In these cases, the plaintiffs ask equity to enjoin white property owners who are desirous of selling [read who want to sell] their houses to Negro buyers simply because the houses were subject to an original agreement not to have them pass to Negro ownership." See BE-VERBS (B).

desist is a FORMAL WORD for stop or leave off. E.g., "If he desists from the act of signing because of weakness or for some other reason, the partial signature may not be the signature that the statute requires." See cease-and-desist order. Cf. cease.

de son tort, JARGON from LAW FRENCH (lit. "by his own wrongdoing"), means "wrongful." It is typically used in the two phrases executor de son tort (= wrongful executor) and trustee de son tort (= wrongful trustee). The phrase denotes the breach of a fiduciary duty.

An executor de son tort is a person who, without legal authority, takes it on himself to act as executor or administrator as by acting or dealing with any of the decedent's property, apart from acts necessitated by humanity or necessity (OCL). Usually an executor de son tort acts to the detriment of beneficiaries or creditors of the estate.

A trustee de son tort acts similarly in respect of a living person's property. E.g., "Plaintiff contended that when the first trust was consolidated with the Union Trust Co., the office of trustee, under the terms of the will, thereby automatically became vacant and that the successor, from that time on, acted as trustee de son tort." See ex maleficio.

despatch. See dispatch.

despite; in spite of. The two are interchangeable. The compactness of despite recommends it.

despiteous; dispiteous. Despiteous = with despite; despiteful; scornful. Dispiteous = pitiless.

despoilation for despoliation (= pillaging, plundering) is a not uncommon blunder that surprises primarily because it occurs in otherwise highly literate writing. The word is also a NEEDLESS VARIANT of spoliation, q.v.

destination. See ultimate destination.

destructible; destroyable. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Destructible, as well as its corresponding noun destructibility, is frequently used in the law: "There is ample justification for a search of the arrestee's person and the area within his immediate control—construing that phrase to mean the area from within which he might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence."/ "The destructibility of contingent remainders posed a threat to the stability of English family settlements of land and the conveyancing bar set to work to circumvent the destructibility rule." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 137 (2d ed. 1988).

desuetude /de-swə-tyood/ (= disuse) has, in law, become the name of a doctrine whereby if a statute is left unenforced long enough, it will no longer be regarded by the courts as having any legal effect even though not repealed. It has a limited application in American law, and little if any application in English law: "English law, unlike Roman and Scots law, has never admitted that an Act of Parliament may be repealed or cease to have effect by obsolescence." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 105 (3d ed. 1955). E.g., "There is no doctrine of desuetude in English law, so a statute never ceases to be in force merely because it is obsolete." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 3 (1976).

detainal. See detention.

detainee (= a person held in custody) is a 20th-century NEOLOGISM that has proved useful in legal contexts. E.g., "The detainee must be promptly brought before a magistrate for a probable cause determination." See -EE.

detainer. See detention & -ER (B).

detainment; detainer. See detention.

detectable; detectible. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A). detector; detecter. The former spelling is preferred. See -ER (A) detention; detainment; detainal; detainer. Detention = holding in custody; confinement; compulsory delay. Detainment and detainal are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Detainer is a specialized legal term meaning (1) "the action of detaining, withholding, or keeping in one's possession"; (2) "the confinement of a person in custody"; or (3) "a writ authorizing prison officials to continue holding a prisoner in custody." See -ER (B).

determent. See deterrent.

determinable = (1) terminable; or (2) able to be determined or ascertained. Sense (1) is common in the law <determinable fee>, but it generally ought to be avoided in deference to the more universally understandable terminable. In a few SET PHRASES, it should be allowed to remain. E.g., "A possibility of reverter is the future interest left in one who creates a fee simple conditional or a fee simple determinable." (See fee simple (F).)

But in other contexts, it ought to be simplified, for it is merely an unnecessary LEGALISM: "The award constituted the employment as one that was determinable [read terminable] on a day's notice." (Aus.)

The following sentences illustrate sense (2): "The applicant has a determinable physical impairment that can be expected to result in death."/ "To have standing under the Clayton Act, an antitrust plaintiff must demonstrate that the extent of his injury is determinable and not speculative."/ "This court affirmed the dismissal of the federal claims, but held that the validity of the state-law claims was a matter of state law best determinable by the state courts."

determinacy, the correct form, is sometimes incorrectly rendered determinancy. E.g., "A number of jurisdictions have increased markedly the determinancy [read determinacy] with which sentences are set."

determinant. See determiner.

determinate, adj., = having defined limits; definite; conclusive. Determinate sentencing came in response to the phrase indeterminate sentencing, which denotes a practice that was common in the U.S. up until the early 1970s (no specific time being set for prison sentences, e.g., "10 to 20 years"). E.g., "A determinate jail sentence for disobedience of a negative injunction is usually considered to be improper in civil contempt actions." The adverb determinately is sometimes confused with determinedly (= with determination).

determination of whether. The preposition of is unnecessary. See whether.

determine. A. Archaic Sense. Used without a direct object, determine in legal prose is an ARCHAISM in the sense "to terminate; bring or come to an end." E.g., "He had a determinable [q.v.] estate; it was never determined; he died owning it, and now after the determination of the trust it is part of the intestate estate, to be distributed as such."/ "If no issue of her body then survive, then all the principal of said estate then remaining shall be divided among my heirs-at-law in proportion to their heirship and upon the principal of said fund being distributed in accordance with the directions of this clause, then said trust shall cease and determine." Nonlawyers are likely to be confused by this legalistic usage; hence a simpler wording might often be called for—e.g.: "The trust shall terminate [or end]."

On the use of the verbese phrase cease and determine, see DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

B. Determine (whether) (if). Determine if is now regarded as inferior to determine whether in formal writing. The latter phrase is five times more common in American judicial opinions.

determiner; determinant. Both mean "that which determines." Preference might be given to the Anglo-Saxon suffix -er, but one could not be faulted for using either term: euphony should be the determiner. E.g., "Much has been written about the determinants of foreign policy in the new states of Africa." Only determiner suffices when the word is an agent noun meaning "a person who determines."

deterrent, n.; deterrence; determent. A deterrent is that which deters, that is, inhibits or discourages. Deterrence is preventing by fear. Determent is the act or fact of deterring.

dethrone; disenthrone. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

detinet. See detinuit.

detinue; replevin; trover. Detinue and replevin are common-law remedies for the specific recovery of personal property. Detinue developed from the writ of debt to provide for the return of wrongfully detained goods (even if not wrongfully taken). The losing defendant had the option, at common law, of returning the property or paying the plaintiff an amount equal to its value, as determined at trial. Detinue still exists in many American jurisdictions but was statutorily abolished in England in 1977 (and replaced by the tort of wrongful interference with goods).

Replevin originated as an action to test the legality of another's seizure of goods (distraint, q.v.). In England, it has been restricted to this particular situation, whereas in the U.S. replevin has become an available remedy for any case of wrongful taking of chattels.

Trover is a common-law remedy for compensatory damages for conversion of personal property. See conversion.

detinuit; detinet. These common-law actions have deceptively similar names. Detinuit (lit., "he has detained") = an action of replevin in which the plaintiff already possesses the goods sued upon. Detinet (lit., "he detains") = an action alleging simply that the defendant is wrongfully withholding money or chattels.

detoxicate; detoxify. Detoxify is prevalent in AmE, detoxicate in BrE.

detractive; detractory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of detractive (= tending to detract; defamatory).

detrimental reliance = reliance [usu. on another's promise or representation] that turns out to be disadvantageous or to cause a loss. Though it is now a fundamental term in contract law, it did not begin appearing in legal discourse until the mid-20th century. Today, of course, it is commonplace—e.g.: "For detrimental reliance seems to be the key to promissory estoppel, and it is also, of course, one of the twin legs of the doctrine of consideration." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 125 (3d ed. 1981)./ "Detrimental reliance by the promisee can therefore give rise to a proprietary estoppel even though no benefit is conferred on the promisor." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 126 (8th ed. 1991).

deuterogamy. See bigamy.

devastavit; devisavit. These terms are easily confusable; they call for explanation in modern contexts. Devastavit (L. "he has wasted") = the failure of a personal representative to administer a decedent's estate promptly and properly. E.g., "The writ may be used to enforce the personal liability of an executor or administrator, where a devastavit has been committed." See waste.

Devisavit is invariably used in the phrase devisavit vel non (L. "he devises or not"), which in former practice was an issue sent from an equity or probate court to a court of law to determine the validity of a purported will. E.g., "One may, upon an issue of devisavit vel non, prove that a part of the executed instrument was not the testator's will." See vel non.

deviance; deviancy; deviation. The general term for "an act or instance of deviating" is deviation  <deviation from orthodox religion>. E.g., "Pioneer contends that, in proceedings under section 10207, a charitable corporation must be given an opportunity to correct its deviation from its articles, as it would if the proceedings were quo warranto." Deviation is more neutral in connotation than deviance, which means "the quality or state of deviating from established norms, esp. in social customs." Deviancy is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

deviant; deviate. A. As Adjectives. Deviant is normal. The first edition of the OED (1928) labeled both of these adjectives "obsolete" and "rare." The OED Supp. (1972) deleted the tag on deviant and cited many examples in the sense "deviating from normal social standards or behavior." The word is common in legal writing: "The government failed to present the expert testimony necessary to establish that the photographs would appeal to the prurient interest of a clearly defined deviant group."

W3 records deviate as an adjective, and it is, unfortunately, common in American legal prose: "The hospital and morgue staff all testified that no deviate sexual intercourse was performed on complainant while she was under their care and control." Even so, deviate (adj.) is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of deviant, the preferred adjective.

Deviant is often used in figurative senses; for example: "Deviant rulings by circuit courts of appeals, particularly in apparent dicta, cannot generally provide the justified reliance necessary to warrant withholding retroactive application of a decision construing a statute as Congress intended it."

B. As Nouns. Both deviate and deviant are used as (generally pejorative) nouns meaning "a person who, or thing which, deviates, esp. from normal social standards or behavior; spec., a sexual pervert" (OED). Deviate, which is slightly more common, ought to be accepted as standard. A few writers use deviationist, but that word is uncommon enough to be labeled a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

deviation. See deviance.

devil, in BrE usage, has an interesting sense: "a junior legal counsel working for a principal" (SOED). E.g., "The term 'devil' is a regular and serious name [in England] for a young barrister who, in wig and gown, serves without compensation and without fame, often for from five to seven years, supplying a junior with ammunition." Henry S. Drinker, Legal Ethics 18 (1953).

The term is also used as a verb, usu. in the phrase to devil for (a principal). E.g., "He devilled for his uncle, was made counsel to the Commissioners of Customs in 1840, and soon got a good practice on circuit and at Westminster." 16 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 155 (1966)./ "Judges and advocates who were trained in those days . . . had to spend four years gaining an honours degree, followed by two years unpaid work apprenticed to a solicitor and 'devilling' for an advocate." Robert Porter, Fraud Case Fuels Rumour in Gay Scandal, Sunday Telegraph, 21 Jan. 1990, at 2.

devisability; divisibility. The former means "the capability of being devised or bequeathed"; the latter means "the capability of being divided."

devisavit. See devastavit.

devise, n.; bequest; legacy. These words denote types of clauses in wills, each having acquired through DIFFERENTIATION a more or less generally accepted sense among lawyers. A devise traditionally disposes of real property (only in legal usage is this word a noun). In the U.S. this tradition has been changed by statutes (see the next entry), but the traditional wording is strongly rooted, and most legal writers confine devise to contexts involving real property: "The court, to conform to the testator's true intent, included part of lot 16 in this devise."/ "In Matter of Champion, the testator executed a will containing a devise of land 'now in my occupation.'"

A bequest disposes of personal property other than money, although the modern tendency is to include testamentary gifts of money as well as gifts of other personalty. Legacy is the more proper term for a clause disposing of money. Each of the terms may refer not only to the clause in the will, but to the gift itself. See will & bequest.

devise, v.t.; bequeath. In the traditional legal idiom, one bequeaths personal property and devises real property. E.g., "Apple's intention to devise him a mere life estate in the property would have severely hindered his real estate development scheme." The restriction to real property has not always obtained, however; the OED quotes an Englishman who in 1347 devised his gold ring to a lady companion. Similar usages appeared up to the 18th century.

Under both the Restatement of Property and the Uniform Probate Code (in the U.S.), neither of which distinguishes in terminology between real and personal property, to dispose of any property by will is to devise it, the recipients being devisees even if the subject of the disposition is personal property. In England, however, devise is said to refer properly only to dispositions of real property (OCL & CDL).

It should not escape our attention that the simple verb give almost always suffices as well as, and with less confusion than, bequeath or devise. See give, devise, and bequeath.

The general nonlegal sense of devise (= to plan or invent) is also used in legal contexts: "The Rule in Shelley's Case was devised in feudal times."/ "The old real actions such as writs of right and writs of entry, dating back to the Norman Conquest, were devised to provide for the specific recovery of real property." See bequeath.

devisee; legatee; heir. These words have traditionally been distinguished, although in practice devisee and legatee are often used interchangeably. A devisee is the recipient of a devise, q.v. Devisee of land would once have been considered redundant, but arguably is not redundant in light of the extended meaning in the U.S. of devise. E.g., "A devisee of land is usually regarded as receiving his title at the instant of the testator's death."/ "We are of the opinion that this case falls within the general rule, and that the property in question passes to the residuary devisees."

A legatee is one who receives a legacy. It is sometimes opposed to devisee. E.g., "Where partial revocation by physical act is permitted, there can be no partial revocation of the words of a will if the effect is to change the construction of the remainder clause or to increase a provision made for someone other than the residuary legatee or devisee."/ "Neither a legatee nor, in most states, a devisee, can establish his rights against third parties until the will under which he takes is probated."

An heir takes by inheritance (or descent, q.v.) rather than through a will or gift (by purchase); thus heir is not properly used of a devisee or legatee.

deviser; devisor; divisor. A deviser is one who invents or contrives. A devisor is one who disposes of property by will (usu. real property). E.g., "The will must be subscribed and attested in the presence of the devisor by three or four credible witnesses, or else it will be utterly void and of no effect." Divisor is a mathematical term referring to the number by which another number is divided. See testator (B).

devoid, a variant of void, adj., is current only in the idiom devoid of: "The case was totally devoid of evidence that any such crime had been committed." This phrase, a favorite of hyperbolists, should be used cautiously.

devoir /di-vwahr/ is a far-fetched, fanciful term when used in place of duty, responsibility, or burden. E.g., "The ALJ's findings were reasonable, responsive to the proof (or the lack thereof) as adduced at the hearing, and consistent with the allocation of the devoir [read burden] of persuasion." Migneault v. Heckler, 632 F. Supp. 153, 159 (D.R.I. 1985)./ "The objectors . . . must carry the devoir [read burden] of persuasion." F.T.C. v. Standard Fin. Management Corp., 830 F.2d 404, 411 (1st Cir. 1987).

devolution; devolvement. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. In the first two specimens that follow, devolution means "the passing of the power or authority of one person or body to another" (OED); in the third, it means "the causing of anything to descend or fall upon (anyone)" (id.). "It may be convenient to deal first with the devolution of that appointive power."/ "The circumstance that the settlor specifically reserved a power to appoint a taker means, if it means anything, that she wanted to affirm and emphasize that she desired to retain control of her property up to the time of her death and to direct its devolution thereafter."/ "The reasoning for so deciding is that devolution of property of a decedent is controlled entirely by the statutes of descent and distribution."

devolutive; devolutionary. The former is the preferred adjective corresponding to the noun devolution, q.v. "The Viators took a devolutive appeal from the judgments against them in the trial court." (La.) Devolutionary is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

devolve = (1) v.t., to pass on (duties, rights, or powers) to another; or (2) v.i., to pass to another by transmission or succession. In sense (2), the verb takes the preposition on, upon, or to. E.g., "Where a person has been held to answer a criminal charge it devolves upon [or on or to] the state's attorney to duly prosecute the charge regardless of his personal views." See bequeath (A).

devolvement. See devolution.

devotee. See -EE

dext(e)rous; dextral. Dexterous (the preferred spelling in AmE is with the -e-) means "clever, adept, skillful, artful." In BrE the term is spelled dextrous. Dextral = on the right; right-handed.

diagnose. See BACK-FORMATIONS.

diagnosis; prognosis. Courts recognize the important distinction between these words. A diagnosis is an analysis of one's present bodily condition with reference to disease or disorder. A prognosis is the projected future course of a present disease or disorder. E.g., "As to the diagnoses and prognoses of the physicians, they are not so clear and consistent as to validate removing the issue of arbitrary and capricious denial of the maintenance and cure from the jury." See prognosis.

diagram(m)ing. See program(m)er & DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

dialectal; dialectic(al). These words are frequently confused. The adjective for dialect (= a regional variety of language) is dialectal. The wrong word appears in the following sentence: "The court stated that the word 'opry' is a dialectical [read dialectal] variation of 'opera,' which has been in common use from the eighteenth century to the present, and that 'opry' has been and is now used to describe a show consisting of country music, dancing, and comedy routines."

Dialectical = of or relating to logical argument, historical development, or the resolution of contradictory ideas. The term is usually confined to philosophical contexts. As an adjective, dialectic is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of dialectical.

Of course, dialectic is useful as a noun in several senses related to the following core meaning: "a technique of reasoning or arguing by juxtaposing and then resolving contradictory ideas or positions."

dialog(ue); duologue. Dialogue = (1) a conversation between two or more persons; or (2) the exchange of ideas. The longer spelling is preferred. (Cf. catalog(ue).) Duologue, a rather uncommon term, means "a conversation between two persons only."

dicta. See dictum.

dictatrix. See SEXISM (C).

diction = (1) enunciation, distinctness of pronunciation; or (2) word-choice. Often sense (2) is overlooked. This book addresses in large measure problems of legal diction.

dictum. A. Full Phrase. Dictum is a shortened form of obiter dictum (= a nonbinding, incidental opinion on a point of law given by a judge in the course of a written opinion delivered in support of a judgment). The full phrase still occasionally appears: "The principle of stare decisis impliedly imposes upon the writer of the opinion the obligation to refrain from obiter dicta and to confine himself to the precise questions involved." Judge Posner has aptly defined dictum as "a statement in a judicial opinion that could have been deleted without seriously impairing the analytical foundations of the holding—that, being peripheral, may not have received the full and careful consideration of the court that uttered it." Sarnoff v. American Home Prods. Corp., 798 F.2d 1075, 1084 (7th Cir. 1986).

British legal texts use dictum as well as obiter as the shortened form of obiter dictum. E.g., "In considering the dicta cited to us from the cases to which we referred[,] we bore in mind the importance of interpreting judicial pronouncements in the context of the questions which the court had to decide." (Eng.)/ "The view of Lord Tenterden C.J. in Collier v. Hicks, although obiter, has always been accepted as authoritative on this aspect of the law." (Eng.) See obiter dictum.

B. Types Other Than obiter dictum. Obiter dictum is not the only type of dictum. Black's notes also simplex dictum (= ipse dixit, q.v.) and gratis dictum (= a statement made by a party, but not obligatorily). One can safely assert that dictum as used in modern legal writing almost never stands for either of these highly specialized terms.

Still another type—an important one—is judicial dictum, which refers to an opinion by a court on a question that is directly involved, briefed, and argued by counsel, and even passed on by the court, but that is not essential to the decision. See Cerro Metal Prods. v. Marshall, 620 F.2d 964, 978 n.39 (3d Cir. 1980). Thus judicial dictum differs from obiter dictum because it results from considered controversy, whereas obiter dictum is more in the nature of a peripheral, off-the-cuff judicial remark. See Peter J. Bonani, Note, Judicial Dictum Versus Obiter Dictum, 16 Temple U.L.Q. 427, 431 (1942). And judicial dictum carries more weight: "Judicial dictum has been held binding precedent even by modern day 'liberal courts.' Obiter dicta [read Obiter dictum] on the other hand . . . is not binding authority though it may be persuasive." Wolf v. Meister-Neiberg, Inc. 551 N.E.2d 353, 355 (Ill. App. Ct. 1990).

C. Number. Dictum is the singular form of dicta, which in law are "remarks made in a judicial opinion that are not binding law." The plural form dicta is frequently misused as a singular noun—e.g.: "[T]his was dicta [read dictum]." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 446 n.78 (1930)./ "The above-quoted dicta [read dictum] in Stack v. Boyle is far too slender a reed on which to rest this argument." U.S. v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 753 (1987).

Able writers generally have no difficulty getting the number correct—e.g.:

- "[T]he numerous dicta in this case were repeated some years later and gained force in the repetition." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 467 (5th ed. 1956).
- "Pioneer contends that the Constitution of the United States compels us to follow here the dictum in the College of California case; it is settled, however, that judicial decisions may be overruled and dicta disapproved without violating either the due process clause or the contract clause of the Constitution." In re Los Angeles County Pioneer Society, 257 P.2d 1, 9 (Cal. 1953) (per Traynor, J.)
- "Fully considered dicta in the House of Lords are usually treated as more weighty than the ratio of a judge at first instance in the High Court." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 135 (1983).
- "Later dicta, as well as a decision at first instance, support Romer L.J.'s view . . . ." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 893 (8th ed. 1991).

D. Articles with. In the legal idiom, dictum generally does not take an article unless the article is acting as a DEICTIC TERM. E.g., "The dictum in the principal case is derived from the treatment of mistakes in revocation." Usually, however, the article is unnecessary: "The court of appeals correctly identified a dictum [read dictum] in Brown v. United States as the source of what has become known as the 'substitute facilities doctrine.'" / "Counsel inform us that this court has never answered the question, and that they are confident in asserting that the point has not been directly passed upon in the United States and that any reference to this question of law in any case is pure dictum." In short, the word is sometimes a COUNT NOUN but is usually not.

E. Lay Sense. In general nonlegal contexts, dictum often means (1) "a statement of opinion or belief held to be authoritative because of the dignity of the person making it"; or (2) "a familiar rule." In these lay senses, dictum takes an article. E.g., in sense (2): "It is a familiar dictum that the law will scrutinize with jealous care all transactions between parties who stand in confidential relations."

dictum page. See pinpoint citation.

dietitian; dietician. The former spelling is preferred.

die without issue. This phrase is ambiguous: does it mean to die without ever having had issue, or to die without having surviving issue? Further, of course, the word issue is itself the source of much AMBIGUITY. See issue (E).

differ (from) (with). To differ from is to be unlike, whereas to differ with is to express a divergent opinion. E.g., "With respect to legacies out of the personal estate, the civil law, which in this respect has been adopted by courts of equity, differs in some respects from the common law in its treatment of conditions precedent."

difference. See differential (A).

different (from) (than). Different than is often considered inferior to different from. The problem is that than should follow a comparative adjective

(e.g., larger than, sooner than, etc.), and different is not comparative—though, to be sure, it is a word of contrast. Writers should generally prefer different from. Than implies a comparison, i.e., a matter of degree; but differences are ordinarily qualitative, not quantitative, and the adj. different is not strictly comparative. E.g., "Minors are treated differently than [read from] adults in the criminal justice system."

Still, it is indisputable that different than is sometimes idiomatic, and even useful insofar as different from frequently is not interchangeable with it, as here: "Corporate residency is different for venue than for diversity purposes." Also, different than may properly begin clauses, where attempting to use different from would be so awkward as to require another construction: "The record establishes that Wakefield is a different person mentally and emotionally than he was before his loss of hearing."

Where, however, from nicely fills the slot of than, it is to be preferred: "The fact that the injury occurred in a different manner than [read from] that which might have been expected does not prevent the chauffeur's negligence from being in law the cause of the injury." Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R., 162 N.E. 99, 104 (N.Y. 1928) (Andrews, J., dissenting)./ "If the testator makes a gift of property that is of a different nature than [read from] that of the property bequeathed, an application of the doctrine of ejusdem generis gives rise to a presumption that he did not intend to adeem." The Oxford Guide (p. 102) notes that when the adverb differently is used, than is "especially common . . . and has been employed by good writers since the seventeenth century." E.g., "A civil-rights suit is to be treated no differently than any other civil action."

Different to is a common British construction, unobjectionable when used by British writers: "He may say that the other has wholly failed in performance and given him a thing different in kind to that which was bargained for, or of no substantial value." (Eng.)

Not infrequently, writers will use different superfluously with other than: "The right of the district court to require the commissioners' court, by mandamus, to place a different [delete] valuation on the property of the railway company other than the value theretofore placed on said property by the commissioners' court is discussed in the case of Dillon v. Bave." differentia (= a distinguishing mark or characteristic) is a technical biological term that was long ago appropriated by legal writers, although often it is used merely to mean "a distinction." The term is more common in BrE than in AmE. E.g., "The only differentia that can exist must arise, if at all, out of the fact that the acts done are the joint acts of several capitalists, and not of one capitalist only." (Eng.)/ "The question in every case is whether the tribunal in question has similar attributes to a court of justice or acts in a manner similar to that in which such courts act. This is of necessity a differentia that is not capable of precise limitation." (Eng.) The plural is differentiae. Cf. distinguish.

differentiable. See -ATABLE.

differential. A. For difference. The OED records the noun differential only in specialized mathematical and biological senses. As a popularized technicality, it was extended to mean "a difference in wage or salary." E.g., "[P]ayment [may be] made pursuant to . . . a differential based on any other factor other [sic] than sex." Equal Pay Act, 29 U.S.C. § 206(d) (1) (1988) (emphasis added).

The intrusion of this word into the domain of difference should stop there, however. The following use of differential was ill advised: "Most of the foreign news reaches this country at the City of New York, and because of this, and of time differentials [read differences] due to the earth's rotation, the distribution of news matter throughout the country is principally from east to west."

B. As Adjective. Differential, adj. = (1) of, exhibiting, or depending on a difference; or (2) constituting a specific difference. The adjective is not nearly as often misused as the noun (see (A) above): "Differential treatment of parties who are similarly situated raises questions about whether the agency is administering its program in a fair, impartial, and competent manner."/ "I am unhappily aware that this ruling will create anomalies through differential recognition of the acts of judges appointed respectively before and after U.D.I." (Eng.)/ "This tactic enables the court to characterize state goals that have been legitimated by Congress itself as improper solely because it disagrees with the concededly rational means of differential taxation selected by the legislature."

C. And deferential. These near-homophones sometimes trip up semiconscious writers and speakers. Deferential = showing deference; respectful.

differentiate. See delineate.

DIFFERENTIATION is the linguistic process by which words of common etymology gradually diverge in meaning, each taking on a distinct sense. An appreciation of this linguistic virtue is essential to the true stylist. Meanwhile, that appreciation can lead to a continual disenchantment with the forces that are exerted on language.

Richard Grant White, a 19th-century usage critic, extolled the virtue of differentiation while condemning the vice of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION: "The desynonymizing tendency of language enriches it by producing words adapted to the expression of various delicate shades of meaning. But the promiscuous use of two words each of which has a meaning peculiar to itself, by confounding distinctions impoverishes language, and deprives it at once of range and of power." Richard G. White, Words and Their Uses, Past and Present 161 (2d ed. 1872).

Legal scholars, too, have warned of what happens when writers lose any sense of differentiation: "If two words have each a precise sense the one including the other, as sanctions are a class of motives, to confuse them is to impoverish the language." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 89 (1945).

differently than. See different (from) (than).

different than. See different (from) (than).

difficult of, an archaic construction, is common still in legal prose. E.g., "The complications that can arise when divorces are invalid are difficult of solution." Formerly this phrasing was seen in literary as well as in legal writing. See of (C).

digamy. See bigamy.

digital is commonly used as the adjective corresponding to finger in contexts such as the following: "[T]he issue of digital rape was raised at trial." State v. Roden, 380 N.W.2d 669, 670 (S.D. 1986)./ "William Caldwell [argues] . . . that . . . officials subjected him to a digital rectal search that violated his fourth, fifth, and eighth amendment rights." U.S. v. Caldwell, 750 F.2d 341, 342 (5th Cir. 1984).

dignitas is a preposterous LATINISM in place of the ordinary word dignity. E.g., "I accept the fact, therefore, that the applicant has suffered an injury to his dignitas [read dignity] by the respondent's actions." (Rhod.)

dignity exists in law in a sense obsolete in nonlegal contexts. It is used to mean "rank; magnitude," esp. in the phrase of constitutional dignity. E.g., "A statute and a constitution, although of unequal dignity, are both laws, and rest on the will of the people."/ "The constitutional requirement of substantial equality and fair process can be attained only where counsel acts in the role of an active advocate in behalf of his client, as opposed to that of amicus curiae; the no-merit letter and the procedure it triggers do not reach that dignity."/ "The duty that Botkin owed defendant, in making those payments, was of a dignity with, if not superior to, any that he owed to plaintiff."

dijudicate. See adjudge.

dilapidation. So spelled; delapidation is a common misspelling.

dilat(at)ion. The better noun form of the verb to dilate, from an etymological point of view, is dilatation. But dilation is common in AmE medical contexts. In other senses, dilatation (= [1] speaking or writing at length; or [2] expansion) is better—but it is a bookish term.

As for the medical term, there is a misconception afoot that dilation of the eyes means "constriction or narrowing of the pupils," when in fact just the opposite is meant. To dilate on a subject is to expand on it, and for one's pupils to dilate (e.g., from being in the dark or from the use of certain drugs) is likewise for them to enlarge.

dilatory (= tending to cause delay) is commonly used by lawyers <dilatory pleas or exceptions>, but is little known to nonlawyers.

dilemma = a choice between two unpleasant or difficult alternatives. This word should not be used by SLIPSHOD EXTENSION for plight or predicament. Originally a Greek word meaning "two horns," the word often appears in the CLICHÉ horns of a dilemma, but at least the cliché shows ETYMOLOGICAL AWARENESS—e.g.: "I think that Judge Hand would agree that often—though not always—both branches of the antinomy can be served and the horns of the dilemma avoided by eschewing a woodenly logical reading of the written law . . . ." Archibald Cox, The Role of the Supreme Court: Judicial Activism or Self-Restraint? 47 Md. L. Rev. 118, 124 (1987). Cf. Hobson's choice.

The adjective is dilemmatic.

dilutee = an unskilled worker added to a staff of skilled workers. See -EE.

diminished, n., in BrE, means "a criminal defense—recognized at common law in Scotland from 1867 and introduced into English law in 1957—that allows one who is on the borderline of insanity to receive a comparatively light sentence." The word is short for diminished responsibility—e.g.: "The defence of 'diminished' (as it is sometimes abbreviated in informal speech) has the superficial attraction of offering an escape from the mad–bad dichotomy." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 624 (1978).

diminution; diminishment. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT "Another consequence of the slide of our adversary system into the police inquisition has been the diminishment [read diminution] of defence activity." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 74 (1979). Diminution /dim-i-nyoo-shən/ or /noo-shən/ is often mispronounced /dim-yoo-nish-ən/, by metathesis, and sometimes is erroneously spelled dimunition.

diminutive, meaning "small" is not pronounced /di-min-ə-tiv/, but rather /di-min-yə-tiv/, with a liquid -u-. diplomat; diplomatist. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT sometimes (but less and less often) used in BrE.

direct is often used as an ellipsis for direct examination. E.g., "His testimony on direct did not relate to any inculpatory or exculpatory comments by Mr. P." Cf. cross & redirect.

direct cause. See CAUSATION (A).

directed verdict; instructed verdict. The phrases are synonymous. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure use directed verdict. Both phrases exemplify HYPALLAGE, inasmuch as the jury, and not the verdict, is what is directed or instructed.

direct estoppel. See collateral estopped (B).

direct evidence; original evidence. Both of these phrases are used as antonyms of hearsay evidence and circumstantial evidence (or indirect evidence). Direct evidence is more common. As an opposite of hearsay, it means "a witness's statement that he or she perceived a fact in issue by one of the five senses or that he or she was in a particular physical or mental state." As an antonym of circumstantial evidence, the phrase direct evidence means "evidence that proves a fact without any inference or presumption."

It would be helpful by way of DIFFERENTIATION to use original evidence as an antonym of hearsay evidence, and direct evidence as an antonym of circumstantial evidence.

direct examination; examination-in-chief. The latter is a variant, chiefly BrE, of the former. Though cross-examination is hyphenated thus, direct examination, by convention, is not hyphenated. See direct & cross-examination.

direction. See jury instruction.

directional. See directory.

DIRECTIONAL WORDS. A. Ending in -ward(s). BrE has an affinity for -wards words—e.g.: "There was a taxicab proceeding westwards whose driver was called as a witness." (Eng.) In AmE -ward is the preferred form across the board. Hence toward is preferred in the U.S., towards in G.B.

B. Verbose Constructions. Use of such words as easterly and northerly in phrases like in an easterly direction is prolix. In fact, the simple word for the direction (east) usually suffices in place of the words ending in either -erly or -wardly. "The appellee was riding his bicycle northwardly [read north] on 29th Street just before the accident; appellant was driving his car in a southerly direction [read south] on Jackson Street." The one useful distinctive sense that southwardly and southerly convey is "in a direction more or less south."

C. Capitalization. The words north, south, east, and west should not be capitalized when used to express directions; they are properly capitalized when they denote regions of the world or of a country (e.g., Midwest, Far East, the South).

directorial, not directoral, is the adjective corresponding to director—e.g.: "[T]he rule's detractors recognize that it is not a complete bar to judicial review of directoral [read directorial] decision-making." Julia V. Parry, Special Litigation Committees and the Business Judgment Rule, 14 Conn. L. Rev. 193, 198 (1981).

directors' and officers' insurance. So written, with the possessives. The phrase is often, in speech and writing, shortened to D & O insurance.

directory; imperative. These words are distinguished for purposes of statutory interpretation: "Mandatory provisions [in a statute] have . . . frequently been classified as either imperative (when failure to comply renders all subsequent proceedings void) or directory (when the subsequent proceedings are valid, though the persons failing to carry out the action enjoined [i.e., mandated] by Parliament may sometimes be punishable) . . . ." F. v. F., [1971] P. 1, 11. E.g., "It has been held that a violation is a substantial and not a mere technical error, since such a statute is imperative and not directory."

In the U.S., frequently, the distinction is rather different: directory is opposed to mandatory and is only a little stronger than precatory, q.v.: "Statutes that regulate and prescribe the time in which public officers shall perform specified duties are generally regarded as directory only."

In the following sentence, directional (= of or relating to, or indicating, spatial direction) is wrongly used for directory: "The sentence is a directional [read directory] provision indicating when and how she is to receive the payments." Coker v. Coker, 650 S.W.2d 391, 395 (Tex. 1983) (Spears, J., dissenting).

directress; directrix. See SEXISM (C).

dirt lawyer is a jocular, self-effacing dysphemism in AmE for a real-estate lawyer.

disability. A. And liability; inability. These words, which overlap only slightly but are sometimes confounded, are best sharply distinguished. Disability = (1) the lack of ability to perform some function; or (2) incapacity in the eyes of the law. Liability = (1) probability; (2) a pecuniary obligation; (3) a drawback; or (4) a duty or burden <liability for military service>. Inability = the lack of power or means.

B. And disablement. Disablement = (1) the action of crippling or incapacitating; or (2) the imposition of a legal disability. Here sense (1) applies: "Under a credit insurance policy the beneficiary is the creditor and, upon the death or disablement of the insured, the benefits or proceeds of the policy automatically accrue to the creditor for the purpose of discharging the debtor's financial obligations."

disabling statute (= a statute that curbs or limits certain rights) is an antonym of enabling statute only in the older sense of the latter phrase—i.e., a statute that grants certain rights. See enabling statute.

disadvantage, v.t., appears regularly in legal writing, but generally only the past participial form disadvantaged appears in lay writing, usu. functioning as an adjective <disadvantaged student>. Following are examples of typical legal usage: "The statute disadvantages those who would benefit from laws barring racial, religious, or ancestral discrimination."/ "The state may no more disadvantage any particular group by making it more difficult to enact legislation in its behalf than it may dilute a person's vote."

disaffirmation; disaffirmance. For the word meaning "repudiation," the distinction drawn at affirmance (q.v.) would recommend the form disaffirmation. The COD recommends -tion, but W10 records only -ance, a common form in AmE. Try as we might for consistency, we are unlikely to achieve it here: disaffirmation is better, but disaffirmance cannot be strongly criticized. E.g., "[A] guarantor for a minor remains bound although the minor principal may be discharged by disaffirmance." Gervis v. Knapp, 43 N.Y.S.2d 849, 850 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1943)./ "[T]he defense of fraud at law was ineffective in cases where there was nothing to return unless a rescission or disaffirmance of the contract was established." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 497–98 (1930).

disappoint (of) (in). Disappoint is used in legal contexts in a sense rare in lay contexts, namely, "to deprive; to frustrate in one's expectations." E.g., "A court of equity will then sequester the benefits intended for the electing beneficiary, to secure compensation to those persons whom his election disappoints."/ "The courts will not disappoint the interest of those for whose benefit the party is called upon to exercise the power."

Usually the term disappointed refers to heirs who take neither an intestate share of an estate nor a share by will. E.g., "Under such circumstances, the gift to the class is implied, and the testator could not have intended the objects of the power to be disappointed of his bounty by the failure of the donee to exercise such power in their favor." To be disappointed in a thing, as opposed to of it, is to have received or attained it but to consider it as not measuring up to one's expectations.

Often disappointed is used as a past-participial adjective: "He is known in the law as a disappointed legatee, and the doctrine of acceleration of remainders should be adopted at the expense of disappointed legatees."

disapprobation is an especially FORMAL WORD meaning "disapproval." It is perhaps allowable in weighty contexts: "On the opening of the cause, Lord Kenyon expressed his disapprobation of the action; but his lordship permitted the cause to proceed." (Eng.) But in ordinary prose, this noun—like so many other BURIED VERBS ending in -tion—leads to topheaviness: "Employees may feel the need to sign the petition in order to curry favor with or avoid disapprobation [read disapproval] by company officials." See approbation.

disapprove, like approve, q.v., may be transitive as well as intransitive—and is used transitively far more often in legal than in nonlegal writing—e.g.: "We disapprove the dicta in that case."/ "Congress not only retained the legislative veto but expanded it to allow either house to disapprove any portion of a rule the body concluded was a 'single separate rule of law.'" Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 69 (1988).

disassemble. See dissemble.

disassociate; dissociate. Though common, disassociate is inferior to dissociate, of which it is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "This gives the law a twist [that] disassociates [read dissociates] it from morality and, I think, to some extent from sound sense." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 24 (1968). Eleven years after writing that sentence, Lord Devlin did better: "In the course of their work judges quite often dissociate themselves from the law." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 4 (1979). See dissociate.

disastrous is so spelled—not disasterous, a fairly common misspelling.

disbar. See bar.

disbark. See disembark.

disbarment; disbarring. Both mean "the action of expelling a lawyer from the bar." Disbarment is the more common noun in AmE. E.g., "The effect of a disbarment is the utter extinction of professional character."/ "But it would stretch fairness to impose a prison term when the usual penalty, according to experts in legal ethics, is disbarment." Dorothy J. Samuels, Behind Mel Miller's Downfall, N.Y. Times, 21 Dec. 1991, at 14.

In BrE, the gerund in -ing is common: "Disbarring may be imposed by the benchers as the ultimate punishment on a barrister guilty of conduct unbecoming the profession." (Eng.) See bar.

disbelief; unbelief; nonbelief; misbelief. Disbelief is the mental rejection of something after considering its plausibility; it results from active, conscious decision. Unbelief denotes the state of doubt, of not having made up one's mind. Nonbelief is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of unbelief. "Nonbelief [read Unbelief] of the prosecutor in the guilt of the person charged with crime is evidence of want of probable cause for the prosecution." A misbelief is an erroneous or false belief.

disburse; disperse. Disburse is used only in reference to distribution of money <the directors disbursed dividends to the stockholders>. Disperse is used in reference to distribution of all other things, such as crowds or diseases.

disc. See disk.

discernible; discernable. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (B).

discharge = (1) to pay a debt or satisfy some other obligation <Jones discharged all the debts>; (2) to release (a bankrupt) from monetary obligations, upon adjudication of bankruptcy <Jones was discharged from those debts>; (3) to dismiss (a case) <case discharged>; (4) to cancel the original provisional force of an injunction or other court order <the T.R.O. was then discharged>; (5) to free (a prisoner) from confinement <the offender was granted a conditional discharge>; (6) to relieve (a jury) of further responsibilities in considering a case <at 6:00 p.m. that Friday, the jury was discharged>; or (7) to fire (an employee) <employers may hire and discharge when they please>. In sum, discharge is a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD.

disciplinary; disciplinatory. Disciplinary = (1) related to discipline; or (2) carrying out punishment. In the following sentence, sense (2) applies: "The special master considered the company's disparate enforcement of its no-solicitation policy to be mitigated by the legality of the warning, apology, mistake, or failure to result in disciplinary action." Disciplinatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

disclaim. See declaim.

disclaimer. See -ER (B).

disclose; expose. There are important differences. Disclose = to reveal (any factual matter). Expose = (1) to lay bare or unmask (something bad); or (2) to place in a perilous condition.

disclosee (= one to whom information is disclosed) is a NEOLOGISM unrecorded in most English-language dictionaries—e.g.: "Being duly sworn [disclosee] pursuant to interposition states . . . ." 2 Roger M. Milgrim, Milgrim on Trade Secrets § 7.06[1], at 7-105 (1988) (bracketed interpolation in original). See -EE disclosural, a newly formed adjective corresponding to the noun disclosure, is a potentially useful NEOLOGISM—e.g.: Bridget Mast, Disclosural Privacy in Florida—Drawing the Line After Doe v. State, 22 Stetson L. Rev. 283 (1992).

discomfit(ure). Discomfit (= to frustrate, disconcert) is best used only as a verb. The preferred noun is discomfiture. Ill-trained writers use phrases such as much to his discomfit, in which either discomfort or discomfiture is intended.

Discomforture is incorrect for either discomfort or discomfiture—e.g.: "How does a court determine whether a defendant is in fact maintaining a nuisance on his property to the discomforture [read discomfort or, more likely, discomfiture] of his neighbors?" C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 105 (1963).

discomfort. See discomfit(ure).

discommend is the opposite of recommend, not of commend.

disconcertion; disconcertment. The preferred noun corresponding to the verb to disconcert is disconcertion.

discontinuation; discontinuance; discontinuity. See continuance.

discover, v.t., is generally obsolete in the sense "to uncover, reveal," except in legal JARGON—e.g.: "This rule does not protect a defendant from discovering facts indicating moral turpitude on his part unless they amount to a punishable offense . . . ." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 23 (1916). The verb now generally means "to find, detect." See discovery.

For the use in which judges are said to "discover" the common law, see declare.

discoverable, in American law, means "subject to pretrial discovery" <discoverable documents of the corporation>. This sense goes beyond the general meaning of "ascertainable."

discovert is not an opposite of covert as ordinarily used—overt is. Discovert means "unmarried, whether widowed, divorced, or never having married," or, more technically, "not subject to the disabilities of coverture." Acceptable in historical contexts, the word is now obsolete because there are no "disabilities of coverture" (i.e., legal disabilities resulting from a woman's being married). See covert.

discovery, as a term of legal JARGON, means "disclosure by a party to an action, at the other party's instance, of facts or documents relevant to the lawsuit." E.g., "The English invented discovery while casting about for a substitute for torture for parties unwilling to reveal facts at issue in a lawsuit. Their idea was a good one; but the way it is carried out causes the litigants less torment only in the sense that their agony is mental, not physical." William B. Spawn (ABA president), in a speech before the North Carolina State Bar in 1977 (as quoted in Joseph C. Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 286 n. (1978)). See discover.

discovery abuse is a broad term that covers many disparate things: "Thus it is useful to subdivide 'abuse' into 'misuse' and 'overuse.' What is referred to as 'misuse' would include not only direct violation of the rules, as by failing to respond to a discovery request within the stated time limit, but also more subtle attempts to harass or obstruct an opponent as by giving obviously inadequate answers or by requesting information that clearly is outside the scope of discovery." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 542 (4th ed. 1983).

"Discovery overuse," by contrast, refers to "asking for more discovery than is necessary or appropriate to the particular case." Id. And the term overuse "can be subdivided into problems of 'depth' and of 'breadth,' with 'depth' referring to discovery that may be relevant but is simply excessive and 'breadth' referring to discovery requests that go into matters too far removed from the case." Id.

discrete; discreet. The former means "separate, distinct," the latter "cautious, judicious." Discreet is most commonly used in reference to speaking or writing. The usual error is to misuse discreet, the more common term in nonlegal language, for discrete—e.g.: "Although Texas has moved away from a system of submitting discreet [read discrete] fact questions on each element of a claim or defense, Texas still employs broad form issues in virtually every case and does not allow the jury to be informed of the effect of its answers . . . ." Frank Cicero, Jr. & Roger L. Taylor, Verdict Strategy, 17 Litigation 41, 42 (Summer 1991).

In the following quotations, though, the opposite blunder is committed: "Consider again Pound, ante, p. 64, Hierarchy of Sources and Forms in Law. Compare Keeton's discussion of overruling precedents—rules vis-à-vis principles—ante, pp. 839–40, with Pound. Is the average opinion writer this discrete [read discreet]?"/ "Mr. Bradshaw said almost everything the group did locally was discrete [read discreet]." Peter Applebome, Bloody Sunday's Roots in Deep Religious Soil, N.Y. Times, 2 March 1993, at A8.

Discrete is sometimes used meaninglessly: "The prosecution apparently made the strikes simply in an effort to procure, from among those summoned and not disqualified, a jury that, under the discrete [read peculiar?] facts of this particular case, would be least likely to be partial to Leslie." In the following sentence, it is correctly used: "The petitioner made no suggestion below that any discrete portion of the work product from the administrative proceedings was work that was both useful and of a type ordinarily necessary to advance the civil-rights litigation to the stage it reached before settlement."

discretion is traditionally a mass noun, not a COUNT NOUN. Thus references to "the exercise of a sound discretion" and to a court's having "a large discretion" are unidiomatic. See 6 James W. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice ¶ 54.70[5], at 54-344, 54-348 (2d ed. 1988) (using the phrases quoted).

discriminant. See discriminatory.

discriminate, v.i., cannot properly be used transitively, as here: "Blacks are discriminated [read discriminated against] in that city." The same problem crops up in the past-participial adjective—e.g.: "[T]he Secretary's action bars a private suit by the discriminated employee [read employee who has been discriminated against]." Marshall v. Sun Oil Co., 605 F.2d 1331, 1338 n.8 (5th Cir. 1979).

discriminated, adj. See discriminate.

discriminatee = a person unlawfully discriminated against. None of the dictionaries record this term, but it is increasingly common in American legal writing. E.g., "[I]t appears advisable to make disposition of that portion of the Board's order which directs the company and the Unions 'jointly and severally to make the discriminatees whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them . . . .'" Progressive Mine Workers v. N.L.R.B., 187 F.2d 298, 306 (7th Cir. 1951)./ "In the instant case, back seniority . . . is just as necessary to make discriminatees 'whole' under Title VI." Guardians Ass'n v. Civil Serv. Comm'n, 466 F. Supp. 1273, 1287 (S.D.N.Y. 1979)./ "The NLRB routinely awards backpay to restore discriminatees to the economic position they would have enjoyed absent the unfair labor practice." Warehouse & Office Workers' Union v. N.L.R.B., 795 F.2d 705, 718 (9th Cir. 1986). See -EE.

discriminating. See discriminatory.

discrimination has not traditionally been considered a COUNT NOUN. Thus one should not write discriminations for discriminatory practices or instances of discrimination. See PLURALS (B). discriminatory; discriminative; discriminating; discriminant. Of these, only discriminative is ambiguous, it being a NEEDLESS VARIANT of both discriminatory (= applying discrimination in treatment, esp. on racial or ethnic grounds) and discriminating (= keen, discerning, judicious). Discriminant is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of discriminating.

Because discriminatory has extremely negative connotations, and discriminating quite positive connotations, the noun discrimination suffers from a split personality, sometimes brought to the surface in judicial writing: "The majority's fallacy lies in using the word discrimination as a synonym for discrimination on the basis of race. Such usage may suffice in common parlance, but for purposes of analyzing the proof in a [42 U.S.C.] § 1981 suit it is, if I may not be misunderstood in so expressing it, too undiscriminating." Carter v. Duncan-Huggins, Ltd., 727 F.2d 1225, 1247 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

discussable is poor when used as a pseudo-softener for debatable, as here: "It is discussable [read debatable] whether such a policy was wise." disease of the mind. See mental illness.

disembark is generally considered preferable to debark or disbark.

disenable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of disable. See disabling statute.

disenact, which the OED notes as being "rare," is an unnecessary word, inasmuch as we have repeal, revoke, set aside, abolish, and various other more specific words.

disenfranchise. See disfranchise.

disentail = to bar the entail (on an estate) and convert (the estate) into a fee simple. See entail.

disenthrone. See dethrone.

disentitle takes the preposition to, not from. E.g., "At this third intermediate stage, the delay will not be a repudiation but will disentitle the responsible person from [read to] specific performance." (Eng.)/ "Although the husband and the wife agreed that their financial position was such that only a nominal order could be made against the husband, they wished to have determined the issue whether the wife's conduct disentitled her to an order for maintenance." (Eng.)

disfranchise; disenfranchise. Though the latter is increasingly common, the former remains the preferred form of this word, meaning "to deprive of the right to exercise a franchise or privilege, esp. to vote." E.g., "In a memorandum opinion, the district court found that . . . there had not been a showing that provisions disenfranchising [read disfranchising] those convicted of crimes were based upon the racism present at the constitutional convention."/ "In Toney, the registrar of the same parish misapplied Louisiana election statutes in purging voter lists, resulting in the disenfranchisement [read disfranchisement] of many more blacks than whites."/ "A path-breaking extension of effective legal personhood into the ranks of hitherto disfranchised minors?" Neil MacCormick, With Due Respect, TLS, 22 Jan. 1993, at 3.

disfunctional. See dysfunctional.

dishabille /dis-ə-beel/ is so spelled.

disherison; disinherison. Disherison (= [1] the act of disinheriting, [2] the state of being disinherited), labeled obsolete in Black's, still enjoys limited currency. It ought to be treated as a NEEDLESS VARIANT of disinheritance, which is a simpler word that far more readers and listeners will understand—e.g.: "Disherison [read Disinheritance] of a child invites contest of the will. When a child is disinherited a trial judge is likely to submit the will to a jury on an issue of mental capacity, fraud, or undue influence." John Ritchie et al., Decedents' Estates and Trusts 142 (1971)./ "Posthumous avarice leading to disherison [read disinheritance] is bad; living greediness is bad too."

Disinherison, a term generally used in civil law, is likewise a NEEDLESS VARIANT in common-law contexts—e.g.: "The power of disinherison [read disinheritance] he [Bracton] explains here in the same way as in the case of the fee simple . . . ." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 62 (1961).

disherit; disheritance; disheritor. These are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of disinherit, disinheritance, and disinheritor. E.g., "She was the sister who had been disherited [read disinherited] by her mother." Stonesifer v. Swanson, 146 F.2d 671, 673 (7th Cir. 1945)./ "[T]here is also an almost equally strong presumption against virtual disheritance [read disinheritance] of testatrix'[s] sole distributee . . . ." In re Vetroock's Will, 230 N.Y.S.2d 485, 500 (N.Y. Surr. Ct. 1962).

disincentive; nonincentive. The former provides an incentive not to do something; the latter is no incentive at all.

disinformation; misinformation. These words are not synonyms. Disinformation = false information deliberately created and spread <Soviet disinformation of the 1960s>. Misinformation = incorrect information.

disinherison. See disherison.

disinherit. See disherit.

disinheritance. See disherison & disherit.

disintegrative; disintegratory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

disinterest(ed); uninterest(ed). Disinterest is impartiality or freedom from bias or chance of financial benefit—e.g.: "An inherent qualification for a quasi-judicial decision-maker is disinterest in the result." Central Life Ins. Co. v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 466 N.W. 2d 257, 261 (Iowa 1991). Thus, disinterested means "impartial."

Uninterest (recorded fr. 1952) means "lack of concern or attention" and uninterested "having no concern or care (about something)." E.g., "If Orenstein believed that Erb knew or would surely find out about paragraph 34, it was not dishonest or opportunistic to fail to flag that paragraph, . . . especially given the uninterest . . . that Erb fairly radiated." Market Street Assocs. Ltd. v. Frey, 941 F.2d 588, 598 (7th Cir. 1991).

Traditionally, though, the DIFFERENTIATION between these words was not as marked as it might have been: disinterest has, in addition to its primary meaning of impartiality, denoted "lack of concern or attention" (i.e., as a synonym of uninterest). Given the overlapping nouns, writers have found it difficult to keep the past participial adjectives entirely separate, and many have given up the fight to preserve the distinction between them.

Nevertheless, the distinction is still best recognized and followed, especially in the law, where the sense of interest that gives rise to disinterested (as in "interested party") still commonly appears. E.g., "Any other rule would make important questions of the title to real estate largely dependent upon the uncertain recollection and testimony of interested parties."/ "In each case 'due process of law' requires an evaluation based on a disinterested inquiry pursued in the spirit of science." (Frankfurter, J.) Because it is a virtue for judges to remain disinterested, we had better not forget what that word means: "The district court thus rejected the not totally disinterested testimony of the family members on the issue of fraudulent transfer."/ "No disinterested person reading the article can come to the conclusion that it was printed in a spirit of fair criticism or designed for the public good."

Disinterested is frequently misused for uninterested—e.g.: "Many people are disinterested [read uninterested] in politics and do not vote." Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 3611, at 511 (1984)./ "The son of a lawyer who practiced here, he grew up removed from politics, and today he remains totally disinterested [read uninterested] in politics—to the point of never voting."

disinvestment; divestment. Defined as "consumption of capital," in W9, disinvestment has come to mean "the withdrawal of investments, esp. for political reasons" (as acknowledged in W10). E.g., "The arguments opposing disinvestment [from South Africa] fall into two categories."/ "About half of the 200 American companies in Kenya have disinvested and unemployment is growing." Andrew Hogg, Frightened Moi Vows He Will Cull Democratic "Rats," Sunday Times, 8 July 1990, at 1-20. Divestment is also used in this sense. See divest(it)ure.

disjoinder (= the undoing of the joinder of [parties, actions, etc.]) is a useful NEOLOGISM omitted from most legal and nonlegal dictionaries. E.g., "[T]he question of disjoinder is not embraced in the present procedure." People v. Nickel, 69 N.Y.S.2d 791, 794 (King's County Ct. 1947)./ "Authority for this disjoinder of the 'force, violence, or fear' and the 'color of official right' phrases of § 1951(b)(2) was said to be found in [several cases cited]." U.S. v. Cerilli, 603 F.2d 415, 428 (3d Cir. 1979) (Aldisert, J., dissenting). See joinder. Cf. misjoinder.

disk; disc. Disk is the more usual spelling in all but three specific meanings. Disc is the spelling used for the senses (1) "a phonograph record"; (2) "a videodisc"; and (3) "a tool making up part of a plow." Otherwise, disk is the preferred spelling for general reference to thin circular objects, intervertebral disks, celestial bodies, and computer disks.

dismissal; dismission. The much older word dismission (1547) has given way almost completely to the upstart dismissal (1806), considered a mere variant less than a century ago. Today, dismission is, except in some highly specialized contexts, an obsolete and NEEDLESS VARIANT.

dismissible. So spelled. See -ABLE (A). dismission. See dismissal.

disorderly conduct is a vague term embracing an array of petty violations of public decency and order—from the paid-for conduct at a disorderly house (a EUPHEMISM for brothel) to fomenting political division—e.g.: "If opposition to the national government should arise from the disorderly conduct of refractory or seditious individuals." The Federalist No. 16, at 117 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

The Constitution contains a variant phrase, disorderly behavior: "Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behavior, and with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member." U.S. Const. art. I, § 5.

disorderly house. See bawdy house.

disorganized; unorganized. The former means "in confusion or disarray; broken up"; the latter means "not having been organized" merely in the negative, but not in the pejorative, sense.

disorient(ate). The longer form is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the shorter—e.g.: "But people elect not to answer questions for many reasons, starting with the possibility that they are disorientated [read disoriented] by the experience of being arrested and accused of serious crime of which they are innocent, and simply do not know how to respond." David Rose, To Be Silent Will Imply Guilt, Observer Sunday, 15 Dec. 1991, at 16. See orient.

disparaging (= slighting, insulting) for disconcerting or discouraging is a MALAPROPISM. E.g., "The plight of the Mexican national in the United States has been disparaging [read discouraging]." See MALAPROPISMS dispatch; despatch. The former spelling is preferred in both AmE and BrE.

dispatent. King's Counsel or Queen's Counsel are appointed to that rank by a so-called patent. To be stripped of that rank is, in BrE, to be dispatented—e.g.: "He practised for a while in London, but in 1929 he had himself disbarred in England and Ireland, and dispatented." R.E. Megarry, Miscellany-at-Law 14 (1955). In a footnote, Megarry adds: "The term 'desilked' has mercifully yet to be used . . . ." Id. See silk.

dispel. So spelled—not dispell.

disperse. See disburse.

dispiteous. See despiteous.

dispone is a term from Scots law meaning "to convey formally or in legal form." From the verb are derived the terms disponer (= grantor), disponee (= grantee), and disponible (= capable of being assigned). E.g., "Such disponer shall, nevertheless, during the period of the minority of such minor, be liable to be taxed in respect of the sums so payable as if such disposition had not been made." (Scot.)/ "It is implicit in the ordinance that the husband and no one else may dispose of the wife's income; the husband therefore is the only possible disponer." (Scot.)

disport. See deport.

disposal; disposition. Both mean generally "a getting rid of," but disposal has more often to do with trash or inconsequential items, whereas disposition is used of assets given to relatives and friends by will. Disposition connotes a preconceived plan and an orderly arrangement. Disposal, by contrast, bears derogatory connotations—more so in AmE than in BrE.

dispose for dispose of. "In the past, pesticide wastes disposed [read disposed of] in the ground have contaminated groundwater used for drinking and irrigation."

disposition. See disposal.

dispositive; dispository. In BrE and AmE alike, dispositive may mean "conclusive, determinative." In this sense, the word is extremely useful to lawyers—e.g.: "The court's resolution of this case would be greatly simplified if it ruled only on either of these dispositive issues." Dispository is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "This negative type of evidence is not dispository [read dispositive] of the guilt issue . . . ." Riley v. Sigler, 437 F.2d 258, 260 (8th Cir. 1971).

In AmE and Scots law, dispositive is the usual word used in reference to testamentary plans, dispository again being a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "The relevant dispository [read dispositive] provisions of the decedent's will gave two million dollars in real estate, securities or other property to the Hofheinz Family Trust No. 2 . . . ." Hofheinz v. U.S., 511 F.2d 661, 662 (5th Cir. 1975). In England, neither word is used in this way.

dispository. See dispositive.

disproportionate; disproportional. See proportionate.

dispunishable (= not punishable) was a common legal term through the mid-19th century. Today, however, it is uncommon enough that most readers would consider it needlessly obscure.

dispute; disputation. These words should be differentiated. Dispute = controversy <goods in dispute>, whereas disputation = formal argument or debate.

disqualified; unqualified. These words have quite different senses. Unqualified = not meeting the requirements. Disqualified = disabled; debarred. An unqualified judge should not be a judge. A disqualified judge must withdraw from hearing a case when one of the parties is, for example, a close relative.

disqualify. See recuse.

disquiet is used in law in the sense of disturbing a person's possession of property. E.g., "If the buyer is disquieted in his possession, he may suspend the payment of his price until the seller has restored him to quiet possession." See quiet.

disrobe, which ordinarily means "to undress," should not be used in the sense "to remove a judge from the bench"—unless jocularity is clearly intended. In the following example, one cannot say with confidence that humor is intended: "But as of July 1968, no attorneys have been disbarred, no judges disrobed and none of the 'excessive' fees dislodged." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 323 (1970).

dissatisfied; unsatisfied. Some DIFFERENTIATION exists between these words. To be unsatisfied is to be less than completely satisfied, whereas to be dissatisfied is to be positively bothered by the lack of satisfaction. In law, when one is in arrears, one's debts remain unsatisfied.

disseise; disseize. The preferred form of this legal word, meaning "to dispossess wrongfully," is disseise. See seise.

disseisor; disseisee. These are the correlative terms for the parties involved in disseisin (= dispossession of a person of estates). E.g., "The disseisee of goods, as well as the disseisee of land, has a right in rem."/ "The dispossessed owner of land, as we have seen, could always recover possession by an action; though deprived of the res, he still had a right in rem. The disseisor acquired only a defeasible estate."/ "The equitable beneficiary of a restrictive covenant has rights even against wrongful possessors, or disseisors, of the servient land that they shall not act contrary to the terms of the restrictive agreement." See seisin.

disseize. See disseise.

dissemble; disassemble. The former means "to present a false appearance," the latter "to take apart."

dissent, n.; dissension; dissention. Dissent refers to a difference of opinion, whether among judges or others. A dissent, as opposed to dissent as an uncountable noun, refers to a dissenting judicial opinion—e.g.: "Justices Frankfurter and Roberts concurred in this dissent." Samuel Bader, Coerced Confessions and the Due Process Clause, 15 Brook. L. Rev. 51, 62 (1948)./ "The dissent regards the interest in maintaining our nation's adherence to long-standing principles of international law as not compelling." Finzer v. Barry, 798 F.2d 1450, 1464 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

Dissension (the -sion spelling is preferred) refers to contentious or partisan arguing. E.g., "The contract terms had already been substantially executed when the dissension arose among those jointly interested in the venture."

Dissention is a mistaken form of dissension—e.g.: "A sudden dissention [read dissension] among those who have gathered lawfully may proceed to violence without amounting to more than an affray . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 484 (3d ed. 1982).

dissent, v.i., takes from or against, not to or with. E.g., "I must dissent to [read from] the majority's holding that appellant's detention and ensuing search and seizure were lawful."/ "Because of the waste of time, resources, and effort of the criminal justice system that will ensue, I must dissent to [read from] what the majority does in this cause."/ "Scalia . . . dissented with [read from] the court when it ruled that judges must instruct the jury to consider evidence favorable to the defendant when deciding whether to impose the death sentence." Kobayashi, Mercy Is Not Always Dispensed Justly, Scalia Says, Honolulu Advertiser, 8 Aug. 1989, at A-3.

The preposition against is idiomatic but relatively uncommon. E.g., "But three of Taney's Democratic colleagues violently dissented against their Chief's apparently aberrational veto of a state law in order to protect vested rights of a non-agrarian kind . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 126 (1955).

dissenter; dissentient, n. Dissenter is the standard term in AmE for "one who withholds assent, or does not approve or agree"; dissentient is the more usual form in BrE, because the term dissenter (usu. with an initial cap.) has a special religious and social meaning in British history ("i.e., one who dissents or refuses to conform—specif., from the 17th c. on—to the tenets and practices of the Church of England"). E.g., "Lewis J., one of the former dissentients, had become C.J." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 140 (1973)./ "The real difference between the majority and the dissentients in Maunsell v. Olins was over the question whether there was an ambiguity." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 145 (1976).

dissenting; dissentient, adj.; dissentious. Dissentient is sometimes used in BrE where dissenting would ordinarily appear in AmE. E.g., "The agent was appointed to execute an instrument of transfer on a dissentient shareholder's behalf." (Eng.)/ "In the court of appeals the judge delivered a dissentient judgment in favor of the appellants." (Eng.) The word is not unknown in American legal writing: "Without retracting or in any way departing from our former dissentient views, I concur in the action taken by the majority on the instant appeal. . . ." In re King's Estate, 66 A.2d 68, 72 (Pa. 1949) (Jones, J., concurring). One ambiguity that may be caused by use of dissentient is that readers might interpret it as a derogatory word opposite to sentient; the true opposite of sentient (= feeling), however, is insentient. Dissentious = given to dissension; quarrelsome.

dissimilar takes the preposition to rather than from. E.g., "The facts in that case are wholly dissimilar from [read to] the facts in the case at bar." Here the preferable collocation is illustrated: "Those cases were decided under facts dissimilar to those existing in the present case." Cf. disentitle.

dissociate; disassociate. Dissociate is the preferred term; disassociate is a NEEDLESS VARIANT Dissociate takes the preposition from. E.g., "Disassociated with [read Dissociated from] the subject thereof, whatever it may be, a title or a name composed of ordinary words cannot acquire the status of property, as all who speak or write have the inherent right to use any and all words in the English language."/ "Austin . . . answers that this is to dissociate sanction from command altogether, confusing sanction and motive." W.W.

Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 89 (1945). See disassociate.

dissolution. See marriage dissolution & divorce (B).

distil(l). The spelling distill is preferred in AmE, distil in BrE.

distinct; distinctive. The first means "well defined, discernibly separate" <distinct speech>, and the second means "serving to distinguish, set off by appearance" . Distinct speech is well enunciated, whereas distinctive speech is idiosyncratically accented, different from that of surrounding speakers. Distinctive is sometimes misused for distinguished (= notable; famous).

distinguish can be used either transitively, in the sense "to note a difference" <that fact distinguished the first case from the second>, or intransitively, in the sense "to make a distinction" <the court distinguished between premeditated and spontaneous acts>.

In legal contexts, the transitive use appears frequently in the phrase to distinguish a case, meaning to provide reasons for deciding a case under consideration differently from a similar case cited as a possible precedent. E.g., "[A]n apparent precedent may be evaded by 'distinguishing' the facts, which are never identical in any two cases. Distinguishing may either be genuine or strained." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 124 (3d ed. 1955). Cf. differentia.

distrain, vb., = (1) to seize goods by a legal remedy known as "distress," which entitles a rightful possessor to recover personal property wrongfully taken; or (2) to force (a person, often a tenant), by the seizure and detention of personal property, to perform some duty (such as paying overdue rent). Today sense (2) is the more common one—e.g.: "In most states the landlord has the right . . . to seize and sell certain of the tenant's personal property in order to satisfy unpaid rent. This right exists either by virtue of the landlord's right to distrain for rent due or by virtue of the landlord's lien . . . ." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 306 (1946)./ "Three days later he seized the furniture because he had heard that the plaintiff's landlord intended to distrain it for arrears of rent." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 106 (8th ed. 1991). See distraint.

distrainor; distrainer. The OED states that -or is "a more technical form than distrainer, and correlative to distrainee." Of course, distrain itself is a technical word; it may as well have a technical Latinate agent-noun suffix (-or). See -ER (A).

distraint; distress. In legal contexts, both mean either "the seizure of goods as security for the performance of a duty" or "the legal remedy authorizing such a seizure." Distraint would seem to be the better term, for it looks like the verb from which it derives (Fr. distraindre, fr. L. distringere) and does not, like distress, have an ordinary English meaning. But distress is the prevalent term for this sense. See distrain.

Though not widely accepted, a possible DIFFERENTIATION appears in one historian's use of distress for the legal remedy and distraint for the exercise of that remedy: "In practice the remedy of distress might not be so effective, for the tenants of the land might be poor men, unable to perform the service, and distraint to compel them to do so would be a waste of effort." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 50 (1961).

distress. See distraint.

distribute. See descend.

distributee. See heir (C).

distribute out is prolix for distribute—e.g.: "No income is distributed out [omit out] (or is deemed to be distributed out [omit out] under the DNI rules) to the residuary beneficiaries." See out & PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY

For the difference between property descending and being distributed, see descend.

distribution. See descent (B).

divergence; divergency. The form divergency is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of divergence.

divers; diverse. These words have distinct meanings. Very simply, divers implies severalty, and diverse implies difference. Divers (= various, sundry) remains a part of the language in the U.S. only as a curiosity. Formerly it meant not only "various," but "several" as well: "[T]he rent was behind for divers years . . . ." Sir Anthony Sturlyn v. Albany, Cro. Eliz. 67, 78 Eng. Repr. 327 (Q.B. 1587). Today it is an ARCHAISM, and its only accepted meaning is "various," as in Frankfurter's phrase "divers judicially inappropriate and elusive determinants." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 268 (1962) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). Other modern examples follow: "Defendant is possessed of large means and is engaged in the business of a banker in said village of Howard Lake, at Dassel, Minnesota, and at divers other places."/ "Defendants inserted the said notice as an advertisement in divers local and other newspapers." (Eng.)/ "Two months later he was indicted in Florida for conspiring there and in divers other districts."

Diverse means "markedly different; unlike." It takes the preposition from. E.g., "Each case incorporated state-law tort claims against manufacturers of protective respiratory equipment, all of whose citizenship was diverse from that of the plaintiff."

Frequently it is used in AmE, without a preposition, to denote a difference in citizenship that gives rise to federal jurisdiction: "We granted the motion because the record otherwise evidences a substantial likelihood of diverse citizenship." See diversity.

diversity. As a noun in American legal writing, diversity often appears as a shorthand form of the phrase diversity of citizenship—e.g.: "Gearench . . . had no burden to prove diversity between the original parties or between it and its third-party defendants . . . ." Molett v. Penrod Drilling Co., 872 F.2d 1221, 1228 (5th Cir. 1989).

As an adjective in American legal writing, diversity is frequently used as a shortened form of the PHRASAL ADJECTIVE diversity-jurisdiction—e.g.: "In a diversity case in this circuit, federal courts apply a federal rather than a state standard."

divest(it)ure; divestment. The standard noun corresponding to the verb to divest is divestiture. E.g., "It is agreed that the history and language of the laws for control of monopolization properly permit the application by the courts of orders requiring divestiture of properties of an existing monopolist in order to prevent the continuance of the evil." Divesture is an obsolete variant.

The other variant, divestment, not at all uncommon, might seem to be a NEEDLESS VARIANT; yet it appears in a number of SET PHRASES in property law, such as vested interest subject to divestment. E.g., "Many courts hold that the beneficiary takes a vested interest subject to divestment upon change of beneficiary in accordance with the provisions of the policy."/ "The registration of stock ownership on the books of the corporation in appropriate statutory language is sufficient to vest legal title, subject to divestment if the circumstances surrounding the transaction warrant it." See disinvestment.

dividable. See divisible.

dividend; interest. In corporate law, these terms signal an important distinction. Interest (= a charge one pays for getting a loan, usu. measured as a percentage of principal) is payable out of the company's assets generally. But a dividend (= a share of profits distributed to a shareholder) is a voluntary distribution by the company and does not become a debt until after the company has declared it. Dividends can be declared only out of the assets legally available—especially the company's earnings or profits, but not its general assets.

divide up. See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

divisibility. See devisability.

divisible; dividable. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

divisional court. For an explanation of the divisional courts of the (English) High Court, see high court.

divisor. See deviser.

divorce. A. And annulment. A divorce recognizes the existence of a valid marriage, whereas an annulment treats the marriage as if it had never existed. Even so, in most jurisdictions the "nonexistence" of the marriage is not considered absolute: any children produced by such a void or voidable marriage are traditionally considered legitimate.

B. And dissolution of marriage. In the 1970s, the word divorce was struck from many statutes and replaced by the EUPHEMISM dissolution of marriage or marriage dissolution. See marriage dissolution.

C. Idiom. One gets a divorce from a spouse, not from a marriage—e.g.: "Another suit . . . commenced . . . by the defendant for a divorce from a marriage with the plaintiff [read divorce from the plaintiff] . . . was . . . removed to this court." Sharon v. Hill, 26 F. 337, 338 (C.C.D. Cal. 1885).

D. No-fault divorce. See no-fault divorce.

E. Divorce a mensa et thoro. See a mensa et thoro*.

divorcement is now obsolete for divorce in the sense "the dissolution of the marriage tie," although it persisted in this sense through the early 20th century. E.g., "[I]n the event of the death or divorcement of the wife before the decease of the husband, he shall have the right to designate another beneficiary." Mo. Rev. St. § 7895 (1906). David O. Selznick directed Katharine Hepburn in the 1932 film "A Bill of Divorcement."

Divorcement survives in the general figurative sense "the severance or complete separation of any close relation" <the divorcement of church and state in the U.S.>. divulgence; divulgation; divulgement. Even though the latter two date from the early 17th century, divulgence, which dates from the mid-19th century, is now the preferred noun corresponding to the verb to divulge.

do. See as (B) & ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE (A).

dock, in British legal writing, means "the enclosure in a criminal court in which the prisoner is placed during trial"—e.g.: "Before he died, the little doctor at least had the comfort of knowing that Ethel Le Neve had left the dock a free woman." Stanley Jackson, The Life and Cases of Mr. Justice Humphreys 85 (n.d. [1951]).// "Even where the old rule that a man is to be presumed innocent till proved guilty has not been abrogated by statutes placing on the defence the burden of proving innocence, it may be subtly undermined by the terms used to refer to the man in the dock—not 'Mr Smith,' but 'Smith' or 'the accused.'" Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 419 (1966). See dock brief.

American writers sometimes mangle the set phrase in the dock—in the following example with a MALAPROPISM: "For the judiciary, then, to say to the sovereign that only judges know what the law is, is one thing. . . . For the judiciary to say this to a man in the docket [read in the dock] or to a woman sued in tort is quite another." Mary J. Morrison, Excursions into the Nature of Legal Language, 37 Clev. State L. Rev. 271, 285–86 (1989).

dock brief; docker. A dock brief, in former English practice, was a brief handed in court directly to a barrister selected from among those present by an indigent criminal defendant in the dock (instead of through the agency of a solicitor), the effect of which was that the barrister then represented the defendant, who was known as a docker. See dock.

docket, in AmE, means "a schedule of cases pending." In BrE, it means "a register of judgments issued by the court."

Docket may be used as a verb in both BrE and AmE. E.g., "The case was docketed and tried shortly thereafter."// "Thereafter he has either 60 or 90 days in which to docket the case with the Supreme Court . . . ." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 755 (4th ed. 1983). See calendar & cause-list.

dockominium, a PORTMANTEAU WORD made from combining boat dock with condominium, refers to an idea originated in the early 1980s of selling boat slips, as opposed to renting them. E.g., "Such projects, known informally as 'dockominiums,' have become very popular in many waterfront communities throughout the metropolitan area, and the developers of many projects are finding more than they expected are being lived in year-round." Anthony DePalma, Styling Vacation Homes for All Seasons, N.Y. Times, § 8, at 1.// "The recreational boating system may well be headed toward a system of individual ownership of slip spaces. Just as rental apartments can be converted for sale as condominiums, rental slip spaces can be converted for sale as dockominiums." Mark Cheung, Dockominiums: An Expansion of Riparian Rights That Violates the Public Trust Doctrine, 16 B.C. Envtl. Aff. L. Rev. 821, 821 (1989).

doctrinal; doctrinaire; doctrinary. The first is the neutral term, meaning "of or relating to a doctrine." E.g., "The doctrinal commentary upon Taddeo thus far has been unanimously favorable." Doctrinaire = dogmatic; slavishly, impractically adhering to dogma. Doctrinary is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of doctrinaire.

Doctrinaire is sometimes misspelled doctrinnaire, on the apparent analogy of questionnaire—e.g.: "[T]he Black–Douglas position was too doctrinnaire [read doctrinaire] . . . ." Maurice Kelman, The Forked Path of Dissent, 1985 Sup. Ct. Rev. 227, 257.

doctrine of original intent. See original intent, doctrine of.

document; instrument. These terms are similar in meaning, but document is slightly broader. Document refers to anything written, whereas instrument (q.v.) usually refers to a legal document with a specific legal import.

documentary; documental. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

DOCUMENT DESIGN. Traditionally, lawyers have been relatively unconcerned with the look of their documents—even the lawyers who consider themselves stylists. This failing (and it is a serious one) did not have such horrible consequences in the days of typewriters, when the primary design choices were the width of the margins and the amount of underlining and capitals.

With the advent of word processing, document design has become much more important as writers are presented with all kinds of new printing options. Failing to use these options knowledgeably puts the writer at a disadvantage because most readers have become accustomed to well-designed documents. In short, it has become highly desirable to know something about typography and design.

In this space, of course, it is impossible to offer even the simplest primer on the subject. But a few points deserve mention:

A. A Readable Typeface. For text, a readable typeface probably means a serifed typeface, such as the one used throughout this text (New Century Schoolbook), as opposed to a sans-serif (/san-ser-iff/) typeface made up of only straight lines. A serif is a short stroke that projects from the ends of the main strokes that make up a character.

This is a serifed typeface: Trump Medieval.
This is a sans-serif typeface: Optima.

Although sans-serif typefaces often work well in headings and the like, they can be difficult to read in text. Among the better serifed typefaces are Bookman, Caslon, Garamond, Palatino, and Times Roman. The one typeface to avoid at all costs still predominated in American legal writing in the mid-1990s: Courier. It is an eyesore.

B. White Space. Ample white space makes a page more inviting. The primary ways to create white space on the page are to use generous margins (for letters and briefs, for example, margins greater than one inch), to use headings and subheadings, and to enumerate items in separate paragraphs, subparagraphs, or bulleted lists.

C. Headings and Subheadings. Artfully employed, headings and subheadings make a document much easier to follow. Not only do they serve as navigational aids for readers; they also help writers organize thoughts more logically than they might otherwise. See PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

D. Avoiding All Caps. See CAPITALIZATION (A)

E. Avoiding Underlines. Generally, italicizing is preferable to underlining, which was traditionally nothing more than a (poor) substitute for italics. The effect of underlining is to take up white space between lines and therefore to make the lines harder for readers to discern.

F. Listing. Enumerate items by breaking down lists into paragraphs and subparagraphs. Using a tabulated list allows the writer not only to display the points better, but also to improve the sentence structure. Ensure that the list falls at the end of the sentence—not at the beginning or in the middle. See ENUMERATIONS & PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

G. Bullets. When you don't mean to imply that one thing in a list is any more important than another—that is, when you're not signaling that there is a rank order—and there is little likelihood that the list will need to be cited, you might use bullet dots. They draw the eye immediately to the salient points and thereby enhance readability. Examples appear throughout this book.

There is a notable difference, however, between how the bullets appear in this book and how they ought to appear in most documents. Although here the bullets fall at the left margin, they should generally be indented further than a paragraph indent. They are not indented here because a double-column format does not allow it.

H. Hanging Indents. In most texts, when you indent an item to be listed—whether it's a bulleted item or an entire paragraph—ensure that the second line of the item does not begin at the left margin. The second line of text should begin just below the first one, as here:

- The managing general partner must send notice to the bankrupt partner before the 180th day after receiving notice of the event that causes the bankruptcy.
- The bankrupt partner and the managing partner must agree on a fair market value for the sale of the interest.

I. A Ragged-Right Margin. Many readability specialists insist that unjustified right margins are more readable than justified ones. In letters, contracts, briefs, and the like, an unjustified right margin is often desirable.

J. Citations in Footnotes. Citations tend to clutter the text; you can easily minimize this cluttering by moving citations to footnotes (and avoiding footnotes for other purposes). See CITATION OF CASES (D).

K. Characters Per Line. Ideally, a line of type should accommodate 45 to 70 characters, but the "fine print" that characterizes so many legal documents often spans 150 characters to the line. In text of that kind, the reader's eye tends to get lost in mid-line or in moving from the end of one line to the beginning of the next. One way to improve a document with a large block of text—and, typically, small margins on each side—is to use a double-column format. That design can be extremely helpful, for example, in consumer contracts such as residential leases.

Doe, John; Richard Roe. The fictitious names John Doe and Richard Roe regularly appeared in actions of ejectment, q.v., at common law. Doe was the nominal plaintiff, who, by a FICTION was said to have entered land under a valid lease; Roe was said to have ejected Doe, and the lawsuit took the title Doe v. Roe. These fictional allegations disappeared upon the enactment of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852. Meanwhile, though, John Doe—which began as a LEGALISM—had become a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY.

Beyond actions of ejectment, and esp. in the U.S., John Doe, Jane Doe, Richard Roe, Jane Roe, and Peter Poe have come to identify a party to a lawsuit whose true name is either unknown or purposely shielded.

DOG FRENCH. See LAW FRENCH

dogma. Pl. dogmas, -mata. The English plural is preferred—e.g.: "[A] number of scholastic and, as it seems to me, unprofitable dogmas have grown up [that] tend to obscure the real function of precedent in our legal reasoning." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 268 (7th ed. 1964).

dolus (= fraud, deceit, or intentional aggression) is a civil-law term that appears frequently in discussions of general legal principles. E.g., "The typical delict required dolus—intentional aggression upon the personality or the substance of another." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 78 (1922)./ "Liability for damage caused by intention (dolus) or negligence (culpa) was a general principle in Roman law, as it is in Scots law, Roman-Dutch law and French law." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 226 (3d ed. 1955).

Domesday Book; Doomsday Book. The former is the accepted spelling in modern texts of the name for the great census or survey of England's landholdings, buildings, people, and livestock that was ordered by William the Conqueror and completed (except for several districts in the North) in 1086.

domesticate; domesticize. See domiciliate.

domicil(e). A. Spelling. Domicile is spelled both with and without the final -e, but the better and more common spelling is with it.

B. And residence. The two words are often "confused as synonymous." In re Lemen, 208 F. 80, 82 (N.D. Ohio 1912). They are not: "Residence comprehends no more than a fixed abode where one actually lives for the time being. It is distinguished from domicile in that domicile is the place where a person intends eventually to return and remain." Catalanotto v. Palazzolo, 259 N.Y.S.2d 473, 475 (1965).

More specifically, domicile means "the place with which a person has a settled connection for certain legal purposes, either because his home is there, or because that place is assigned to him by the law." Restatement (First) of Conflict of Laws § 9, at 17 (1934).

In England, domicile means "the country that a person treats as a permanent home and to which he or she has the closest legal attachment." See citizenship.

C. Domicile of origin; domicile of choice; commercial domicile. Domicile of origin = the domicile that is imposed by operation of law on every person at birth. Domicile of choice = a domicile chosen by a person having full age and capacity.

Commercial domicile, known also as quasi-domicile, "is in no sense true domicile. It is a legal concept used merely as a test of enemy character in time of war. It attaches to any person or firm voluntarily resident or carrying on business in enemy territory or even in enemy-occupied territory. . . . It has chiefly been used to determine the liability of property to seizure, and in a number of cases property itself has been said to possess a commercial domicile." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 221 (7th ed. 1974).

domiciliary is both adjective ("of or pertaining to domicile") and noun ("one belonging to a domicile").

domiciliate; domesticate; domesticize. Domiciliate = to establish a domicile or home. Domesticate = (1) to tame; or (2) to make a member of the household. Sense (1) here applies: "Before the jury retired, Colonial intimated that it intended to request the court to take judicial notice of the domesticated Oregon judgment." Domesticize is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of domesticate.

dominance; domination. Dominance = the fact or position of being dominant. Domination = the act of dominating; the exercise of ruling power.

dominant; servient. These terms are usually used in reference to estates or tenements in the law of easements. A dominant estate has the benefit of a servitude or easement over the servient estate.

domination. See dominance.

dominion is a FORMAL WORD used in legal contexts, esp. in AmE, to mean "control, possession." E.g., "Alford argues that the evidence presented as to that count failed to demonstrate that she had any dominion over any marijuana in the Western District of Texas."

dominium is the Roman-law term for absolute ownership. In some contexts it can be "particularly confusing, since in medieval times it is also the word for lordship." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 255 (3d ed. 1990).

donate, a BACK-FORMATION from donation, was formerly considered a vulgar equivalent of give. Today, however, it is a more FORMAL WORD than give that is frequently used of charitable bequests.

donatio mortis causa is an unjustified LATINISM for the slightly less Latinate gift causa mortis. Pl. donationes mortis causa. See causa mortis.

donative; donatory. As an adjective, the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. "This evidence is far short of the clear and convincing proof necessary to rebut the presumption of donative intent." For the nominal sense of donatory, see donee.

donator. See donor.

donee; donatory, n. Donee (= one to whom something is given) is the usual term. E.g., "Where the inconsistency lies in a gift of the same thing to two persons both donees will take some interest in that thing." Anthony R. Mellows, The Law of Succession 161 (3d ed. 1977). Donatory is a little-used equivalent. See donor & -EE.

donor; donator. The latter is a problematic word, meaning either (1) "donor" or (2) "donee." It should be avoided in favor of donor or donee, q.v. See settlor.

Doomsday Book. See Domesday Book.

doomster; doomsman. These are both variants of deemster or dempster, q.v.

dotal, adj., = (1) at common law, relating to a dower, q.v.; or (2) in civil law, relating to a dowry.

doth for does, though archaic and obsolete, still occasionally appears in judicial pronouncements, such as this, by the Mississippi Supreme Court in 1981: "[T]his Court having sufficiently examined and considered the same and being of the opinion that the same should be denied doth order that said motion be and the same is hereby denied." Order quoted in Jones v. Thigpen, 741 F.2d 805, 809 (5th Cir. 1984). Methinks, forsooth, that we should throw over this term, as well as the rest of the LEGALESE verily immortalized in that sentence.

The word is also used in orders of the English courts. E.g., "This court doth declare that there was a valid and binding contract." (Eng.) See -ETH.

double entendre originally referred to any verbal expression giving rise to more than one meaning. Now, however, it also connotes that one of those meanings is indecent or risqué.

double jeopardy; former jeopardy. These terms are not precisely the same. Double jeopardy is the fact of being prosecuted twice for substantially the same offense. A plea of former jeopardy informs the court that one has previously been prosecuted for the same offense. E.g., "This precise point was addressed in a case in which, the defendant having been indicted for perjury and having filed a plea of former jeopardy, it was held that subsequent falsehoods on the same trial under the same oath did not make new perjuries, but only exhibited additional ways in which the perjury was committed."/ "Conditioning an appeal of one offense on a coerced surrender of a valid plea of former jeopardy for another offense exacts a forfeiture in plain conflict with the constitutional bar against double jeopardy."

DOUBLE NEGATIVES. See NEGATIVES (B).

DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS. Amplification by synonym has long been a part of the English language, and especially a part of the language of the law. In the English Renaissance, this habit was a common figure of speech called synonymia. It is often supposed that the purpose of these paired or strung-along synonyms was etymological, that is, that writers in the Middle Ages and Renaissance would pair a French or Latinate term with an Anglo-Saxon approximation as a gloss on the foreign word. Thus we have, as survivals in legal language, acknowledge and confess (Old English and Old French), act and deed (Latin and Old English), and goods and chattels (Old English and Old French).

The philologist George Philip Krapp argued against this explanation. He saw the purpose of this mannerism as "rhetorical or oratorical rather than etymological." George P. Krapp, Modern English: Its Growth and Present Use 251 (1909). He pointed out that such doubling occurred abundantly in Old English, when no substantial foreign element existed in the language, and that it often occurs in later writings without regard for etymology. Although Krapp was undoubtedly correct to emphasize the rhetorical importance of doubling, he was wrong to assume that the figure did not take on a utilitarian significance as well in Middle and early Modern English. The purpose of doubling was dual: to give rhetorical weight and balance to the phrase, and to maximize the understanding of readers or listeners.

Still another explanation has emerged for the particular fondness that lawyers have for this stylistic quirk. It is a cynical one: "This multiplication of useless expressions probably owed its origin to the want of knowledge of the true meaning and due application of each word, and a consequent apprehension, that if one word alone were used, a wrong one might be adopted and the right one omitted; and to this something must be added for carelessness and the general disposition of the profession to seek safety in verbosity rather than in discrimination of language." 1 Charles Davidson, Precedents and Forms in Conveyancing 67 (3d ed. 1860).

The phrases most obviously inspired by rhetorical concerns are alliterative. Rhetoricians call them reduplicative phrases—e.g.: aid and abet; have and hold; part and parcel; trials and tribulations; rest, residue, and remainder; laid and levied; mind and memory. Many others, in addition to conveying no nuance in meaning, have no aesthetically redeeming qualities, but even informed opinions on a point of this kind are likely to diverge. Following are two lists, the first containing common doublets in legal writing, the second containing some of the common triplets. Any number of variations, as by inversion (or, with triplets, by reordering), are possible.

One commentator recommends avoiding virtually all coupled synonyms. See David Mellinkoff, Legal Writing: Sense and Nonsense 189–90 (1982); The Language of the Law 349–62 (1963). At least one writer has taken issue with this recommendation on grounds that doublets are a prosodic feature of English and many other languages. He argues: "Since coupled synonyms are by definition redundant, they do not increase the density of ideas contained within a sentence; therefore, they rarely endanger its clarity. Since coupled synonyms add beauty to writing without sacrificing clarity, I see nothing sinful in their moderate use." Robert P. Charrow, Book Review, 30 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 1094, 1102 (1983).

The primary problem with such arguments, on either side of the issue, is that they fail to identify the types of writing in which doublets may appear or should not appear. In DRAFTING documents to be interpreted, for example, the legal effects of this stylistic mannerism must be considered. Stroud's Judicial Dictionary (4th ed. 1971), under contiguous, q.v., states that contiguous is "as nearly as possible" synonymous with adjoining, but points to a case in which the phrase adjoining or contiguous was read by the court as if it were adjoining or near to, "so as to give contiguous a cognate, but not identical, meaning with adjoining." If the drafter of that phrase meant contiguous when writing contiguous, then coupling it with adjoining caused trouble. (Cf. adjacent.) The problem stems, of course, from the fundamental canon of construing legal documents that states that every word is to be given meaning and nothing is to be read as mere surplusage. In drafting, then, doublets may be given unforeseen meanings by clever interpreters. This danger, however, is more likely to appear with less common doublets and triplets: no judge would interpret rest, residue, and remainder as referring to three discrete things.

A second context to be considered is ritual language, as in the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, a resounding phrase that conveys the gravity and majesty of the oath being taken. Last will and testament, q.v., may also properly be placed under the heading of ritual language, which is always directed to a lay rather than to a legal audience, the purpose being as much emotive as it is informational.

A third context in which doubling occurs is that of legal commentary and judicial opinions. Here the coupling of synonyms can rarely be said to "add beauty," as the writer quoted above suggested; rather, it is almost always a blemish. For in this context, legal style most nearly approximates literary style, and amplification by synonym has been out of rhetorical fashion for hundreds of years. Although one might well title a client's will Last Will and Testament, if one were to write an opinion construing that document, it would be better to begin, "In this appeal we are called upon to construe the disposition of realty in John Doe's will" rather than John Doe's last will and testament.

Yet one might well write vague and indefinite in patent practice, in which that doublet is generally considered a TERM OF ART describing a patent application that lacks particularity and distinctness. See Louis B. Applebaum et al., Glossary of United States Patent Practice 126 (1969). The inclusion of both words is widely thought to add a nuance. That is the test in ordinary legal prose: Is a shade of meaning supplied by the second or third synonym, or is it just so much deadwood?

DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS. Unaccented syllables in inflected words are sometimes spelled differently in AmE and in BrE. Americans generally do not double a final -l- before the inflectional suffix, whereas the British generally do. Thus:

AmE	BrE
canceled, canceling	cancelled, cancelling dueled, dueling	duelled, duelling funneled, funneling	funnelled, funnelling initialed, initialing	initialled, initialling labeled, labeling	labelled, labelling marshaled, marshaling	marshalled, marshalling parceled, parceling	parcelled, parcelling signaled, signaling	signalled, signalling totaled, totaling	totalled, totalling traveled, traveling	travelled, travelling unraveled, unraveling	unravelled, unravelling

The split between AmE and BrE is seen also in words like jewel(l)er, pupil(l)age, and travel(l)er, the British preferring two *-l-*s rather than the one used by Americans. But there are exceptions: British writers use the forms paralleled and paralleling—just as Americans do—presumably to avoid the ungainly appearance of four *-l-*s in quick succession.

The British always double the final consonant after a full vowel in words such as kidnapped, -ing and worshipped, -ing. In AmE, kidnapping is preferred over kidnaping (see kidnapping (A)) as an exceptional form (cf. formatted, formatting), though worshiped, -ing follows the general American rule. Programmed and programming are the preferred spellings on both sides of the Atlantic, the single -m- spellings being secondary variants in AmE; for the probable reason underlying this American inconsistency, see program(m)er.

Writers and editors should make themselves aware of these minor transatlantic differences in spelling and avoid inserting sic (q.v.) when quoting a foreign text.

Apart from words ending in -l- and exceptions noted (kidnapping, programming, and worship(p)ed), all English-speaking countries follow the same rules on doubling. When a suffix beginning with a vowel is added, the final consonant of the word is repeated only if (1) the vowel sound preceding the consonant is represented by a single letter (hence bed, bedding but head, heading); or (2) the final syllable bears the main stress (hence oc-'cur, oc-'curred but 'of-fer, 'of-fered).

Among the more commonly misspelled words not already mentioned are these: biased, busing (see bus), combated, focused, benefited, and transferred.

doubt. A. Doubt that; doubt whether. The former is used primarily in negative sentences and in questions. E.g., "We do not doubt that, had the time spent in federal prison not been credited to any sentence, appellant would be entitled to have that prison time credited against his state sentence." Doubt whether is used in positive assertions. E.g., "We doubt whether such conduct falls within the ambit of appellant's duties as supervisor."

B. Followed by a Negative. Doubt can be a confusing word when followed by a negative, as in: "I doubt whether the court will not take the further step when necessary." This sentence merely states that the writer thinks the court will take the further step referred to.

C. And misdoubt. See misdoubt.

doubtful torts; doubtful wrongs. These phrases express a useful nuance in the law of torts. Doubtful torts are injuries that are no doubt unlawful wrongs of some sort, but of which we cannot say with certainty that they are torts. Doubtful wrongs, by contrast, are injuries that, if they are unlawful, are torts, but are probably not unlawful. See T.E. Lewis, Winfield on Tort (6th ed. 1954).

doubtless(ly). Doubtlessly is incorrect for doubtless (a mild expression of certainty), no doubt (a stronger expression of certainty), or undoubtedly (the strongest of these three expressions of certainty). The word doubtless is itself an adverb <the Framers doubtless feared the executive's assertion of an independent military authority unchecked by the people>; therefore, doubtlessly is unnecessary. E.g., "Had Zellars been driving in the wrong lane he would doubtlessly [read doubtless] have had a little more time and a better chance to avoid striking the child."/ "While it is not impossible to say precisely when men first arrived in North America, doubtlessly [read doubtless] the original Americans emigrated from Asia at least fifteen thousand years ago and entered the continent during the Pleistocene epoch, or Ice Age, by way of the Bering Land Bridge." See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (D), HYPERCORRECTION (D), clearly & obviously.

doubt of is unidiomatic for doubt about. E.g., "The language of the statute leaves no doubt of [read about] its intent." On the other usage question raised by that example—that of a statute having intent—see HYPALLAGE.

doubt that; doubt whether. See doubt (A).

dowable = (of a widow) entitled to dower. (See dower.) E.g., "A wife is dowable in equity of all lands in which her husband possessed a beneficial interest at the time of his death."/ "According to the early English common law, the widow of a trust beneficiary was not dowable in the trust property . . . ."

dowager; doweress. Dowager (= a landowner's widow who possesses her dower interest in her deceased husband's land) is now slightly derogatory in nonlegal usage, in the sense "an elderly woman with social standing."

Doweress, according to the OED, has long been considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Nevertheless, it has occurred in good legal writing: "And consequently, a doweress [read dowager] could not demand dower unless she handed over her late husband's charters . . . ." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 365 (5th ed. 1956).

dower; dowry. These waning terms are related etymologically (fr. L. dot-, dos "gift, marriage portion"), but they are best kept distinct in modern usage. Dower = the widow's legal share during her lifetime of the real estate owned by her deceased husband—at common law dower was only a life estate, but in many American jurisdictions dower (or the elective share) has been expanded into a fee. E.g., "In a few states the widow has dower only when the husband was trust beneficiary at his death." See curtesy.

Dowry is occasionally used as a synonym of dower, but doing so muddles the DIFFERENTIATION between the words. In the best usage, dowry means "the money, goods, or real estate that a woman brings to her husband in marriage."

doweress. See dowager.

down payment. Two words.

downplay, v.t , is not the best usage, play down being preferred. E.g., "[E]ach side also tends to discuss only that role occupied by Wynn favorable to its position and downplays [read plays down] the other." Mills Land & Water Co. v. Golden West Ref. Co., 230 Cal. Rptr. 461, 466 (Cal. Ct. App. 1986). Both expressions are colloquial.

dowry. See dower.

draconian; draconic. Draconian (the usual form) is derived from the name Draco, a Greek legislator of the 7th century B.C. who drafted a code of severe laws that included the death penalty for anyone caught stealing a cabbage. Today, Draconian (usually capitalized) refers to any harsh aspect of law, not necessarily just legislation.

And sometimes the word is the victim of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION; that is, it is used in reference to what, in comparison to the cabbage example, can only be considered mild impositions—e.g.: "Phil Seelig, president of the Correction Officers Benevolent Association, said his organization would appeal the decision to the State Court of Appeals on the ground that random drug testing was unnecessarily draconian [better: Draconian] and violated constitutional protection against unlawful searches." Court Upholds Drug Testing of Correction Officers, N.Y. Times, 13 Oct. 1989, at 10.

Draconic is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "A general 'control' of the Common Law over statute . . . does not amount to a right to resist even the most Draconic [read Draconian] statute . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 456 (7th ed. 1964).

draft; draught. See drafter.

drafter; draftsman; draughtsman. Drafter is a neutral, nonsexist equivalent preferred by those wary of terms ending in -man. Draftsperson is a wholly unnecessary NEOLOGISM. See SEXISM (B).

Draughtsman is the older BrE spelling of draftsman. E.g., "The ingenuity of equity draughtsmen was under that system greatly exercised in drawing answers in such a form that it was impossible to read part of them without reading the whole." (Eng.) In American writing, that spelling smacks of pedantry—e.g.: "He [Samuel Tutt] was thoroughly read in the law, an expert pleader and draughtsman [read draftsman or, if the book were being written today, drafter], reveled in technicalities and, in preparing a case for trial, left no point uncovered." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 313 (1943).

DRAFTING is a specific type of legal writing dealing with legislation, instruments, or other legal documents that are to be construed by others. Statutes, rules, regulations, contracts, and wills are examples of legal drafting. The style is considerably different from that of other legal writing, such as in judicial opinions and legal commentary. Many of the worst mannerisms of LEGALESE pervade legal drafting, for the MYTH OF PRECISION has traditionally been one of the drafter's tenets.

A 19th-century English practitioner delineated the specific characteristics of drafting. The style of good drafting, he wrote, > is free from all colour, from all emotion, from all rhetoric. It is impersonal, as if the voice, not of any man, but of the law, dealing with the necessary facts. It disdains emphasis and all other artifices. It uses no metaphors or figures of speech. It is always consistent and never contradicts itself. It never hesitates or doubts. It says in the plainest language, with the simplest, fewest, and fittest words, precisely what it means. These are qualities which might be used to advantage more frequently than is common in literature, and unfortunately they are not to be found in many legal compositions, but they are essential to good legal composition, and are not essential to literary composition.

draftsmanship; draughtsmanship. The only nonsexist equivalent of these terms is drafting, which (unfortunately) refers not only to the art but also to the product.

It is a mistake for American writers to use draughtsmanship, the BrE spelling, which appears in Kenneth H. York & John A. Bauman, Remedies 182 (1973).

dramshop = a business selling alcoholic drinks; a bar. Of 18th-century origin, the term appears today only in the phrases dramshop suits, dramshop claims, and dramshop statutes. Dramshop claims involve allegations that liquor establishments serving underage or obviously intoxicated patrons should be held liable for consequent drunk-driving accidents.

draw. Only in the legal idiom does draw retain the sense "to frame (a writing or document) in due form" (OED), as a synonym of draft <to draw a will>. E.g., "While the petition has been drawn, with obvious meticulous care, to avoid the semblance of seeking mandatory relief, in essence and effect it presents no other objective." American Nat'l Bank v. Sheppard, 175 S.W.2d 626, 628 (Tex. Civ. App.—Austin 1943)./ "[I]t takes time and knowledge to draw a statute carefully." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 203 (1960).

More casually—and in nonlegal as well as legal writing—draw is coupled with the particle up, for a PHRASAL VERB. E.g., "[O]f all the many business contracts and legal agreements of every sort that are drawn up and signed every day, only a very small fraction are eventually carried to court." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 115 (1939).

drawee = payor <drawee bank>. Because lawyers understand drawee and payor to be synonymous, the coupling of the two in the phrase drawee/payor makes little sense—e.g.: "A payee or other true owner of an instrument that is cashed under a forged endorsement may sue directly the drawee/payer [read either the drawee or the payor] bank."

drink-driving. See drunk driving.

droitural; droiturel. Droitural [fr. F. droit "a legal right"]—the more common spelling of this uncommon word—means "relating to an ownership right in property, as distinguished from mere possession." E.g., "The law may . . . bar the owner from asserting his rights by a droitural action and thus leave these rights suspended in a state of unenforceability . . . ." Marian P. Opala, Praescriptio Temporis and Its Relation to Prescriptive Easements in the Anglo-American Law, 7 Tulsa L.J. 107, 107 (1971)./ "As a result of these changes, the assize became a 'droitural' action—that is, it tried right rather than recent possession—and by 1400 the writs of right and entry had been largely driven out of use . . . ." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 270 (3d ed. 1990).

Maitland's habitual spelling, droiturel, is a variant that is all but obsolete.

drought; drouth. The latter is archaic in BrE, but still frequently appears in AmE texts. Still, drought is the preferred form in both linguistic communities.

drug for dragged is a nonstandard dialectal form common in the southern U.S.: "He then drug [read dragged] the body into the house."

drumhead court. The original phrase, drumhead court-martial, was an early 19th-century term denoting a military tribunal held around an up-turned drum to deal summarily with offenses during military operations. The phrase quickly took on figurative senses, first in reference to any summary court-martial—e.g.: "In the face of the enemy, it is permitted to try an alleged spy summarily before a drumhead court-martial, and execute him if found guilty . . . ." Filbin Corp. v. U.S., 266 F. 911, 917 (E.D.S.C. 1920).

The phrase was later extended to refer to any tribunal with loose procedures that result in questionable justice. In this extended sense, the phrase is sometimes drumhead court, sometimes drumhead court-martial—e.g.: "It is the protection from arbitrary punishments through the right to a judicial trial with all these safeguards which over the years has distinguished America from lands where drumhead courts and other similar 'tribunals' deprive the weak and the unorthodox of life, liberty and property without due process of law." Barenblatt v. U.S., 360 U.S. 109, 162 (1959) (Black, J., dissenting)./ "One of the attorneys in United States v. Hoffa was convicted of contempt for saying that the court was conducting a 'drum head court martial' [read 'drumhead court-martial'] and 'a star chamber proceeding.'" Norman Dorsen & Leon Friedman, Disorder in the Court 150 (1973).

drunk; drunken. "In older and literary usage," the Oxford Guide notes, drunk and drunken were "the predicative and attributive forms respectively; now usually allocated to distinct senses, namely 'intoxicated' and 'given to drink.'"

We do, however, have the idiom drunken driving, defined by the CDL as "driving while affected by alcohol." Drunken here means "exhibiting or evidencing intoxication." E.g., "England in the mid-1980s still regulates licensing hours (though not perhaps for much longer) and the age at which people can lawfully buy alcohol, while drunken driving is a criminal offence." Simon Lee, Law and Morals 1–2 (1986). Because drunken implies a habitual state, the phrase drunk driving is preferable. See drunk driving.

drunk driving (AmE) = drink-driving (BrE). The American form—drunk driving—exemplifies HYPALLAGE because it is the driver, not the driving, that is drunk. On the less acceptable form—drunken driving—see drunk.

To American eyes, though, the BrE form looks extremely odd—e.g.: "A drink-driving offender will probably be charged with one of the specialised offences . . . rather than with careless driving, since the penalty for the former is higher (and can be imprisonment)." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 271 (1978)./ "In the West Midlands, 30 officers have been convicted of drink-driving in the last two years." Mazher Mahmood, Drink-Driving Immunity—The Police Force "Perk," Sunday Times, 11 Dec. 1988, at A3.

dual is sometimes misspelled duel—e.g.: "The trial court erred in holding that a cause filed against an individual, who occupies a duel [read dual] status . . . , is a matter incident to an estate." Speer v. Stover, 711 S.W.2d 730, 735 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 1986).

dubious distinction has the dubious distinction of being one of our most overworked CLICHÉS.

dubitante = doubting. The term is used in law reports of a judge who is doubtful about a legal proposition but is loath to declare it wrong. E.g., "Mr Justice Rutledge acquiesces in the Court's opinion and judgment dubitante on the question of equal protection of the laws."

This term is sometimes used after a judge's name, as an analogue to concurring or dissenting. It signals that the judge had grave doubts about the soundness of the majority opinion, but not so grave as to spark a dissent. E.g., "The Court decided to do so, Baggallay L.J. dubitante but not dissentiente [i.e., doubting but not dissenting]." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 493 (7th ed. 1964). See OPINIONS, JUDICIAL (C)

due. Traditionally, this word has contained an ambiguity, since it could mean either (1) "payable; owing; constituting a debt"; or (2) "immediately enforceable." Sense (1) relates to fact of indebtedness, sense (2) to the time of payment. Today, sense (2) is almost invariably the applicable one, as illustrated in an early-20th-century edition of Bouvier: "[Due] differs from owing in this, that sometimes what is owing is not due: a note payable thirty days after date is owing immediately after it is delivered to the payee, but it is not due until the thirty days have elapsed." 1 John Bouvier, Bouvier's Law Dictionary 946 (Francis Rawle ed., 3d ed. 1914).

Because a debt cannot be due without also being payable, the doublet due and payable is unnecessary in place of due. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

due process of law. When applied to judicial proceedings, this phrase—often shortened to due process—traditionally "mean[s] a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our system of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714, 733 (1877).

By the late 19th century, the U.S. Supreme Court had built general substantive principles around the phrase, which scholars came to call substantive due process. Rather than forbidding only unfair procedures, the due-process clause was held to forbid certain actions no matter how they might be carried out. Substantive due process is today a limited doctrine that, for example, bars most curtailments of free speech (by state governments) and such encroachments into the right of privacy as statutes prohibiting abortions.

Fred Rodell once called the phrase due process "that lovely limpid LEGALISM." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 51 (1939). It may be lovely, but it is not "limpid" (i.e., clear or transparent). More accurately, Atiyah says: "The fact is that this concept is probably the greatest contribution ever made to modern civilization by lawyers or perhaps any other professional group." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 42 (1983).

As a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it is hyphenated—e.g.: "They came close in a couple of cases challenging the due-process propriety of laws passed by two Western states . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 201 (1955)./ "The early due-process legislation was chiefly aimed against irregular or inferior jurisdictions." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 538 (3d ed. 1990).

due to should be used to mean "attributable to," and often follows the verb to be (sometimes understood in context). But the stylist may wish to avoid even correct uses of the phrase, which one writer calls a "graceless phrase, even when used correctly," adding: "Avoid it altogether." Lucile V. Payne, The Lively Art of Writing 148 (1965).

The phrase is commonly misused as a conjunctive adverb for because of, owing to, caused by, or on grounds of—e.g.:

- "The trial was lost due to [read because of] his damaging admissions."
- "Due to [read Because of] the close interrelation between these two rights, we believe that Wiggins's petition fairly raised the issue of his right to counsel."
- "Because the state court did not specify whether it denied habeas relief on the merits or due to [read on grounds of] procedural default, we must interpret the state court's silence."
- "Due in part to [read In part because of] the widespread enactment of pretermitted heir statutes, the majority of the courts have been unwilling to hold that birth of issue alone revokes a will."

In the following examples, the phrase due to is used correctly; but, as Payne notes, the sentences might be improved by eliminating it. E.g., "We conclude that the failure of the government due to clerical error or oversight does not violate the statute." [A possible revision: "We conclude that the government's failure from clerical error or oversight does not violate the statute."]/ "A distinction must be drawn between cases in which the difficulties are due to uncertainty as to the causation in which questions of remoteness arise, and those which are due to the assessment of damages that cannot be made with any mathematical accuracy." (Eng.) [A possible revision: "A distinction must be drawn between cases in which the difficulties arise from uncertainty about what caused the damage and those in which difficulties arise from the impossibility of assessing damages accurately."]

Due followed by an infinitive is not a form of the phrase due to, although it looks deceptively similar. E.g., "Because 'security center' is a generic term not entitled to service mark protection, the district court decision is due to be reversed."

duplicate, n., = (1) a reproduction of an original document having the same substance and often the same validity as the original; or (2) a new original of a document, often made to replace one that is lost or destroyed. Because sense (2) is slightly misleading, the fuller phrase duplicate original is more accurate.

duplicitous; duplicative; duplicatory. Duplicitous is a late-19th-century coinage generally understood to mean "deceitful." American and British legal writers have latched onto the word in the sense of doubleness, from the old legal meaning of duplicity (= double pleading). A nonlawyer would likely be confused by the following uses of the word:

- "An information charging a conspiracy to commit burglary is not duplicitous because it alleges that the conspiracy was to commit two or more different burglaries." Hamilton v. People, 51 P. 425, 425 syl. 4 (Colo. 1897). (The specimen just quoted antedates the earliest known use [1928] given in W10.)
- "The allegation in a single count of a conspiracy to commit several crimes is not duplicitous." Braverman v. U.S., 317 U.S. 49, 54 (1942).
- "If an offence can be committed intentionally or recklessly, the information or indictment may charge it in those terms. The fact that the mental element is stated in the alternative does not make the charge 'duplicitous.'" Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 80 (1978).
- "A duplicitous indictment is one charging two separate crimes in the same count." U.S. v. Ellis, 595 F.2d 154, 163 (3d Cir. 1979).
- "Acosta argues further that the indictment was duplicitous because it joined separate conspiracies into one count." U.S. v. Acosta, 763 F.2d 671, 696 (5th Cir. 1985).

Duplicitous should not be extended beyond its sense of doubleness in pleading, indictments, etc., as it is here: "There is a suggestion that some of the work performed by counsel for Baxter was duplicitous [read duplicative] because of a change in counsel during the preparation stages of the litigation." Baxter v. Savannah Sugar Ref. Corp., 495 F.2d 437, 447 (5th Cir. 1974).

Duplicative, which one might have preferred in the sense given to duplicitous, has been adopted for other uses in the law. "[A]s between federal district courts, . . . the general principle is to avoid duplicative litigation." Colorado River Water Conserv. Dist. v. U.S., 424 U.S. 800, 817 (1976)./ "Recent Supreme Court decisions have emphasized the risk of duplicative recoveries and other factors without mentioning antitrust standing as a distinct inquiry."/ "The policy of minimization of duplicative enforcement might well prevail over concerns of centralization."/ "We realized at the time of the decision that unifying school systems often would cause elimination of duplicative jobs." Duplicatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. See multiplici(t)ous (B).

duplicity is frequently used in law for duplication. E.g., "The defendant suggested that the 340 billable hours resulted from a duplicity of time spent by the plaintiff's attorney and his five associates."/ "The county prosecutor was even heard boasting to a member of the press that he had a 'duplicity' of evidence!" Mark McKinnon, "South Toward Home," in Texas, Our Texas: Remembrances of The University 145, 146 (Bryan A. Garner ed. 1984).

Those uses of the word are poor. They derive from the true legal meaning "the pleading of two (or more) matters in one plea; double pleading" (OED), properly illustrated here: "Pleading had long since ceased to convey any true information, though the rules against 'duplicity' might require a party to admit all but one of his opponent's falsehoods." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 332 (1966). The word should not, by SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, be used of other types of doubleness. See duplicitous.

The nonlegal sense of duplicity (= deceitfulness, double-dealing) is also quite common in legal contexts: "When a lawyer's falsehood and duplicity is established he becomes a professional outcast."/ "The trial judge stated that he doubted the plaintiff's veracity; but the right of a party to have his own statement is not diminished when the district court suspects duplicity."

duress; durance. Duress = (1) the infliction of hardship; (2) forcible restraint; illegal imprisonment; or (3) compulsion illegally exercised to force a person to perform some act. Durance is an archaic LEGALISM sharing sense (2) of duress, for which it is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

duteous. See dutiful.

dutiable = subject to the levy of a duty, i.e., a tax on goods. E.g., "The dual purpose of the search is to ascertain whether an illegal alien is seeking to cross the border and whether contraband or dutiable property is being smuggled."

dutiful; duteous. The usual term is dutiful. Although formerly in good use, duteous is an archaic NEEDLESS VARIANT.

duty = (1) that which one is required to do or refrain from doing, esp. as occupant of some position, role, or office; or (2) a complex of rights and standards of care imposed by a legal relationship. Sense (2) appears primarily in tort law, in which writers use duty only to mean that there could be liability. See obligation.

duty(-)bound. This term from legal JARGON, a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE corresponding to the age-old phrase bounden duty, is written sometimes as two words and sometimes as one. The best practice is to hyphenate it <those are rights that federal courts are duty-bound to protect>.

duty, nondelegable. See nondelegable duty.

dwelling-house; dwelling; usual place of abode. Legal writers have traditionally used the quaint terms dwelling and dwelling-house to denote "a structure in which human beings sleep." These terms named the subject of common-law burglary, which could take place only in a dwelling-house and not in a business building. Burglary statutes have, of course, broadened the scope of buildings included within the definition of burglary.

As between dwelling and dwelling-house, the former is more current in the general language; but the latter predominates in legal writing, perhaps because lawyers may fear creating a MISCUE (i.e., if dwelling were read as a participial verb and not as a gerund).

The phrase usual place of abode often appears in the alternative alongside dwelling-house in rules about serving legal papers. The DOUBLET is doubtless justified, since some homeless people cannot be said to live in a dwelling-house but can certainly be said to have a usual place of abode.

dynamic, n., is a VOGUE WORD generally best avoided. E.g., "In the first case, a negotiation is stipulated. In the second, the dynamic leads almost inevitably in that direction [read a negotiation is almost inevitable]."

dynamite charge; shotgun instruction; nitroglycerine charge; Allen charge; Chip Smith charge. Each of these phrases refers to a supplemental jury instruction given by the court to encourage a deadlocked jury, after prolonged deliberations, to reach a unanimous verdict. The legality of such a jury instruction was upheld in Allen v. U.S., 164 U.S. 492 (1896)—hence the phrase Allen charge. See CASE REFERENCES (C).

What is perhaps the most widely used phrase today, dynamite charge, originated in the mid-20th century. It contains a clever pun—as PUNS go in legal terminology—and has appeared in a wide range of legal writings—e.g.: "The jurors were then excused until Monday morning, September 10, 1973. At 11:15 that morning, the judge gave the jury the Allen or 'dynamite' charge without any admonition that the majority re-examine its position." Gray v. Martindale Lumber Co., 515 F.2d 1218, 1219–20 (5th Cir. 1975).

Chip Smith charge is the Connecticut version, deriving from State v. James ("Chip") Smith, 49 Conn. 376 (1881). E.g., "It is settled that a 'Chip Smith' charge is an acceptable method of assisting the jury to achieve unanimity." State v. Wooten, 631 A.2d 271, 286 (Conn. 1993). The other forms are likewise regional variants; they are exquisite enough that it would be a grave mistake to brand them NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

each. A. Number. Each takes a singular verb, and pronouns having each as an antecedent must be in the singular. E.g., "Each is entitled to benefits under this program."/ "Persuasive arguments exist that each of the first two criteria is satisfied."/ "[This balancing of rights] is done by recognizing that each have [read each has] rights over the whole . . . ." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 16 (1968).

Sometimes each is mistaken as the subject in a sentence in which it acts in apposition, as here: "The mortgagor and mortgagee each has [read each have] an insurable interest." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 138 (1946)./ "JR's four Tokyo commuter lines each has [read have] its [read their] own color." Peter McGill, The American Express Pocket Guide to Tokyo 13 (1988). See APPOSITIVES (A)

Still another problem occurs with phrases such as each of us who. The word who is in apposition to us and therefore takes a plural verb, but many writers want to make it singular because they mistakenly think that each is the subject of the verb—e.g.: "Neither is the practice of law fully intelligible without reference to the inner mind of each of us who engages [read engage] in law practice." Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. & Susan P. Koniak, The Law and Ethics of Lawyering xxi (1990). For a similar error, see one of those ——s who (or that).

B. Delimiting the Application of each. Especially in contexts in which all appears before each, it may be important to use defining words after each. E.g., "[S]uppose a statute required all directors to take an oath of secrecy, and imposed a penalty on each director in the event of a violation. If half the directors took the oath and half failed, could they all be prosecuted or only those who failed?" Elmer A. Driedger, The Composition of Legislation 78 (1957). The remedy lies, of course, in writing that the penalty is imposed on each director who fails to take the oath, assuming that is the intended meaning.

each and all. This LEGALISM is no more helpful or necessary than each and every, q.v. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

each and every. This trite phrase should generally be eschewed, and especially it should not be plugged in where only one of the adjectives properly modifies what follows. E.g., "Plaintiff has performed each and every of his obligations under the contract." Each works fine here, but not every, for one cannot say, "He has performed every of his obligations." One who insists on being bromidic should write: "Plaintiff has performed each and every one of his obligations under the contract." Cf. and/or & if and when. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

each other; one another. The former phrase is used of two persons or entities; the latter is best confined to contexts involving more than two. E.g., "One of us would turn to the foregoing comment and find that the two terms cancel one another [read each other]."/ "Horrible noise on the one hand; money on the other. How do you relate them to one another [read each other]?" Richard A Lanham, Revising Prose 109 (1979).

In using these phrases, one must know precisely what is being compared. In the following sentence, elements constituting the basis of damages are being compared, although the writer mistook causes of action as the units of comparison: "Having examined the jury instructions and the special verdict in this case, we find that the elements constituting the basis of damages of each of the two causes of action were not sufficiently distinguished from one another [read from those of the other] to ensure that there was no double compensation." The use of each before one another is what caused the problem; the writer was guilty of SWAPPING HORSES from each other to one another.

early on is not the odious locution that some people think. Slightly informal, it is perfectly idiomatic in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "My pupil master told me early on of the client's complaint: 'I want your opinion and not your doubts' . . . ." Lord Denning, The Discipline of Law 7 (1979) earnest (= something given or done beforehand as a pledge or a sign of good faith, esp. a partial payment of the purchase price of goods sold or a delivery of some of the goods themselves, for the purpose of concluding an agreement) generally appears in the phrase earnest money. But in Scotland the word is commonly used alone—e.g.: "[E]arnest is to be held merely as evidence of the completion of the bargain . . . . Earnest is in no case essential to the completion of the bargain." R. Bell, Dictionary and Digest of the Law of Scotland (7th ed. 1890) (s.v. earnest).

earwitness (= a witness who testifies about something that he or she heard) is formed on the analogy of eyewitness, q.v. Both words date from the 16th century.

easement. A. Positive and Negative Easements. An easement is a legal or equitable right acquired by the owner of one piece of land to use another's land for a special purpose. Positive easements give rights of entry upon another's land, as to cross through to reach one's own land or to discharge water. Negative easements consist in the right to prevent the landowner from doing something such as blocking sunlight or erecting buildings that would prevent the use of a runway on nearby land. For avigational easement, see aviate.

B. Types. An easement by prescription arises by adverse use over some specified period, such as 20 years. An easement in gross (a rarity) is a personal right benefiting someone who need not—and usu. does not—own any land adjoining the servient tenement (q.v.). An easement of necessity arises by reservation (either express or implied) when a landowner sells part of his or her land and leaves no outlet to a highway. An easement appurtenant is one created for the benefit of another tract of land.

C. And right of way. The terms are not synonymous; right of way (= the right to pass over another's land) is often a type of positive easement. But not always: a right of way may be granted by license (to the person) as well as by easement (inuring to the land)—see (D). See right of way.

D. And license. An easement is a property right; a license is a revocable permission to commit some act that would otherwise be unlawful. An easement is usu. created by written instrument; a license is often created orally. An easement is a more or less permanent right; a license is temporary. An easement usu. changes ownership as the ownership of the land to which it belongs changes; a license is a purely personal right that cannot be sold. See licence (B).

eastwardly; easterly. See DIRECTIONAL WORDS.

easy judge (= a judge who sentences criminal defendants leniently) is an AmE antonym of hanging judge—e.g.: "[T]he judges develop and decide cases in very different ways . . . . Some have become known as 'easy' judges, others as 'hanging' judges. There seems [read seem] to be more 'easy' judges than 'hanging' judges, however." Stieberger v. Heckler, 615 F. Supp. 1315, 1388 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) (quoting Senator Bellmon)./ "The Court: Has anybody told you that you don't have to worry, that this is an easy judge? The Defendant: No, sir." Stokes v. U.S., 366 F. Supp. 879, 886 n.3 (D. Md. 1973) (quoting testimony).

ecclesiastical law; canon law. Although these generic terms overlap a great deal, ecclesiastical law broadly covers all laws relating to a church, whether from state law, divine law, natural law, or societal rules; canon law is more restricted, referring only to the body of law constituted by ecclesiastical authority for the organization and governance of a Christian church. See canon law.

economic; economical. Economical means "thrifty," or, in the current jargon, "cost-effective." Economic should be used for every other meaning possible for the words, almost always in reference to the study of economics. Hence we have economic studies and economic interest but economical shopping. See uneconomic(al).

edict = (1) in Roman law, an intimation by a magistrate (urban or peregrine praetor) stating what actions and defenses would be allowed, and, in the course of time, a settled body of such rules (esp. the Praeterian Edict); (2) a law promulgated by the sovereign and applying either to the entire state or some of its divisions, but usu. relating to affairs of state; (3) in Scottish ecclesiastical law, an official notice from the pulpit to the congregation; or (4) any formal decree, command, or proclamation. When modern courts refer to their "edicts" (sense 3), they do so usu. with a subtle self-mockery, the word edict connoting that the issuer is all-powerful.

Though the noun edict dates from the 13th century in English, the corresponding adjective, edictal, dates only from the early 19th century. It corresponds to sense (1) of edict—e.g.: "The Edictal law would therefore enforce the dispositions of a Testator, when, instead of being symbolised through the forms of mancipation, they were simply evidenced by the seals of seven witnesses." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 175 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910).

EDITORIAL "WE." See FIRST PERSON (B).

-EDLY. Words ending in this way are more pervasive in law than elsewhere. For example, Blackstone wrote that "if one intends to do another a felony, and undesignedly kills a man, this is also murder." 4 William Blackstone, Commentaries *200–01. Lawyers write of premeditatedly committed crimes, of mitigatedly committed crimes, and of the Warren Court's "unwarrantedly sweeping readings of constitutional guarantees . . . ." Jan Deutsch, Chiarella v. United States: A Study in Legal Style, 58 Tex. L. Rev. 1291, 1300 (1980).

With words formed in this way, the classic adverbial formula in a . . . manner does not work with these words; thus allegedly does not mean "in an alleged manner," purportedly does not mean "in a purported manner," and admittedly does not mean "in an admitted manner." Rather, the unorthodox formula for these words is it is . . . -ed that, i.e., allegedly (= it is alleged that) and so on. Instead of bewailing the unorthodoxy of these words in -edly, we should welcome the conciseness they promote and continue to use them (if only sparingly). We have many of them, such as admittedly, allegedly, assertedly, concededly, confessedly, reportedly, and supposedly. See allegedly, confessedly & reportedly.

Nonetheless, a form ending in -edly ought to be avoided if a ready substitute exists: "[A] bank may indeed be liable for unauthorizedly revealing [read liable for revealing without authorization] the state of a depositor's accounts to his creditors." Schuster v. Banco de Iberoamerica, S.A., 476 So. 2d 253, 255 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985) (Schwartz, J., dissenting). See qualifiedly.

educ(at)able. The shorter form is correct. See -ATABLE & educible.

education(al)ist; educator. Educationist (the preferred form) = an educational theorist. In the U.S., the term has acquired negative connotations. In G.B., it has come to be used in the sense of educator, which in the U.S. means "a teacher; one engaged in educational work."

educational; educative; educatory; educable. Educational = (1) having to do with education <educational issues>; or (2) serving to further education <educational films>. Educative = tending to educate; instructive <educative lectures>. Educatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of educative. Educable = capable of being educated <educable pupils>.

educator. See education(al)ist.

educe, vb., (= to elicit; evoke) should be distinguished from the verb adduce (= to bring forward for analysis) and from educt, n. (= something educed). E.g., "In the present case, the factual showing thus educed [i.e., developed, brought out] does not so unequivocally point to a borrowed employee relationship as to permit a summary judgment." Here the sense is correct, but the word is matched with the wrong subject: "We need not reach this issue, because no factual showing was educed [read either no showing was made or no facts were educed] by the defendant to negate the allegations of her complaint that the failure to re-employ her resulted from gender-based discrimination." See adduce.

educible; educable. The former means "capable of being educed, or drawn out." The latter means "capable of being educated." See educational.

-EE. A. General Principles. This suffix (fr. French past participial -é) originally denoted "one who is acted upon"; the sense is inherently passive. Thus:

acquittee	=	one who is acquitted arrestee	=	one who is arrested conscriptee	=	one who is conscripted detainee	=	one who is detained educatee	=	one who is educated (by an educator) ejectee	=	one who is ejected enrollee	=	one who is enrolled expellee	=	one who is expelled inauguree	=	one who is inaugurated indictee	=	one who is indicted invitee	=	one who is invited liberee	=	one who is liberated permittee	=	one who is permitted returnee	=	one who is returned selectee	=	one who is selected separatee	=	one who is separated shelteree	=	one who is sheltered smugglee	=	one who is smuggled telephonee	=	one who is telephoned

The suffix has also a dative sense, in which it acts as the passive agent noun for the indirect object. This is the sense in which the suffix is most commonly used in peculiarly legal terminology:

abandonee	=	one to whom property rights are relinquished advancee	=	one to whom money is advanced allocatee	=	one to whom something is allocated allottee	=	one to whom something is allotted consignee	=	a person to whom something is consigned covenantee	=	one to whom something is covenanted deliveree	=	one to whom something is delivered disclosee	=	one to whom something is disclosed grantee	=	one to whom property is granted indorsee	=	one to whom a negotiable instrument is indorsed lessee	=	one to whom property is leased patentee	=	one to whom a patent has been issued pledgee	=	one to whom something is pledged referee	=	one to whom something is referred remittee	=	one to whom something is remitted trustee	=	one to whom something is entrusted vendee	=	one to whom something is sold

At least one word ending in -ee has both a normal passive sense and a dative sense. Appointee = (1) one who is appointed; or (2) one to whom an estate is appointed. Sense (2), of course, is primarily legal.

The suffix -ee, then, is correlative in sense to -or, the active agent-noun suffix: some words ending in -ee are formed as passive analogues to -or agent nouns, and not from any verb stem. Examples are indemnitee (= one who is indemnified; analogue to indemnitor) and preceptee (= student; analogue to preceptor).

These are the traditional uses of the suffix; there is a tendency today, however, to make -ee a general agent-noun suffix without regard to its passive sense or the limitations within which it may take on passive senses. Hence the suffix has been extended to PHRASAL VERBS, even though only the first word in the phrase appears in the -ee word. Thus discriminatee (= one who is discriminated against) and tippee (= one who is tipped off). Then other prepositional phrases have gradually come into the wide embrace of -ee: abortee (= a woman upon whom an abortion is performed); confiscatee (= one from whom goods have been confiscated); depositee (= one with whom goods are deposited). Some -ee words contain implicit possessives: amputee (= one whose limb has been removed); breachee (= one whose contract is breached); condemnee (= one whose property has been condemned). In still other words, -ee does not even have its primary passive sense:

asylee	=	one who seeks asylum benefitee	=	one who benefits (or, possibly, "is benefited") escapee	=	one who escapes standee	=	one who stands

Adjudicatee, oddly, has no direct relation to its verb; in civil law, it means "a purchaser at a judicial sale." Finally, the suffix is sometimes used to coin jocular words such as cheatee (= one who is cheated).

The upshot of this discussion is that -ee has been much abused and that writers must be careful of the forms they use. For active senses we have -er, -or, and -ist at our service; we should be wary of adopting any new active forms in -ee, and do our best to see that standee, escapee, and similar forms wither and die or else remain odd exceptions. Otherwise we risk wasting any sense to be found in this suffix. It was with justifiable concern for the language and for logic that Fowler noted: "the unskilled workers used to 'dilute' skilled workers in time of war should have been called diluters instead of dilutees; the skilled were the dilutees" (MEU2 146). See -ER (A).

B. Word Formation. The principles applying to words in -ATABLE apply also to agent nouns in -ee. Thus we have inauguree, not inauguratee; subrogee, not subrogatee (though the latter is sometimes used mistakenly for the former). See subrogee.

C. Stylistic Use of. Stylists know that -ee agent nouns are often inferior to more descriptive terms. They sometimes objectify the persons they describe, though the writer may intend no callousness—e.g.: "On October 19, 1966, a jury convicted Enriquez of capital murder of Kay Foss, the abductee [read the woman he abducted], and imposed the death penalty."

Furthermore, the endings -or and -ee can be easily transposed by mistake. As a general matter, therefore, good drafters prefer buyer and seller over vendee and vendor; buyer and seller over bargainee and bargainor; and, in appropriate circumstances, borrower and lender over mortgagor and mortgagee. The stakes are often so high that it makes little sense to use forms that increase the possibility of error. See vendee & vendor.

effect, v.t. A. Generally. This verb—meaning "to bring about" or "to make happen"—though increasingly rare in English generally, abounds in legal writing. E.g., "This classification process effected by the maximum grant regulation produces a basic denial of equal treatment."

One writer calls it a "little word whose uses are insufficiently praised." Richard Wincor, Contracts in Plain English 33 (1976) True, it can be an effective way of avoiding the awkward contract-drafter's ritual, remove or cause to be removed or produce or cause to be produced, so as to include agents. (See cause to be.) One merely requires the party to effect removal or to effect production, so that the party may arrange with third parties to do whatever is required. This can undoubtedly aid anyone engaged in DRAFTING.

Often, however, using effect as the verb merely spawns wordiness. The verb tends to occur alongside BURIED VERBS, such as settlement and improvement. E.g., "Appellant petitioned to effect a final settlement of the estate [read settle the estate]."/ "The Act, which has been adopted in some other parts of the Commonwealth, has undoubtedly effected a great improvement in practice [read improved practice]." (Omitting great or greatly does the sentence no damage, as undoubtedly adequately conveys the intended sense.)

B. And affect. Effect (= to bring about) is often misused for affect (= to influence, have an effect on): "The fact that findings and conclusions under Rule 296 are not titled separately from the judgment does not effect [read affect] their validity."/ "[E]ven a revocatory clause [that] is immaterial because testator had disposed of all his property in the will, [does] not effect [read affect] the will." Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 306 (2d ed. 1953). See affect.

C. And effectuate. Most dictionaries define these words identically, but their DIFFERENTIATION should be encouraged. Although both mean "to accomplish, bring about, or cause to happen," stylists have generally considered effect the preferable word, effectuate a NEEDLESS VARIANT. No longer need this be so.

The growing distinction—common esp. in law—is that effect means "to cause to happen, to bring about" <effect a coup>, whereas effectuate means "to give effect to, to bring into effect" <effectuate the testator's intentions>. E.g., "[P]erhaps nothing more discreditable is involved than an unwillingness to acknowledge in the words of the statute itself the element of discretion that must be exercised in effectuating its purposes." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 42 (1968).

Of the three confusable terms—affect, effect, and effectuate—the last is the least common. Ordinarily in legal contexts, effectuate means "to give effect to" and not "to bring about." Thus it is not, despite what some think, synonymous with effect: "The board also ordered the following affirmative action which it was found would effectuate [i.e., 'give effect to,' not 'bring about'] the policies of the administration."/ "The rule has been read by courts in a manner that effectuates its function of timely notice without creating technical traps for the unwary."/ "A court of equity will effectuate the gift by declaring his heir to be a constructive trustee."

Effect is sometimes misused for effectuate—e.g.: "We properly must inquire beyond those minimal historical safeguards for securing trial by reason to ensure that the commands of justice are effected [read effectuated (i.e., 'given effect')]." The opposite error occurs here: "In this case, nurses from around the country have earned law degrees to effectuate [read effect] changes in the health care system." John Katzman, Heal the System, Tex. B.J., May 1992, at 474.

In practice, effectuate is not trouble-free. Some writers use it fuzzily—e.g.: "If the statutory authority is nothing more than a pretext for effectuating personal hostility, an award of monetary damages will be upheld." Mark M. Grossman, The Question of Arbitrability 109 (1984). Erroneous forms, too, such as affectuate, have popped up (and need to be stamped on): "Notice of release by appellant in and of itself certainly is sufficient notice to affectuate [read effectuate] a valid release." See affect.

effective. See effectual.

effectively = (1) in an effective manner; well <to speak effectively>; (2) in effect, actually <the plaintiff is effectively barred from exercising the powers of her office>; or (3) completely <he repudiated the contract just as effectively as if he had explicitly stated his intention>. Sense (2) is common in legal writing—e.g.: "The United States Courts of Appeals are effectively [i.e., in effect] courts of last resort."

Effectually is incorrect for sense (3) of effectively: "Such property is withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the courts of the other authority as effectually [read effectively] as if the property had been entirely removed to the territory of another sovereignty."/ "He was damaged by appellant's willful trespass just as effectually [read effectively] as if he were the real owner of the bridge." The same is true of sense (2): "Effectually [read Effectively], since this carpet measures only 54 inches in width, there are many more seams than would be necessary in a standard 12-foot carpet." See effectual.

effectual; effective; efficacious; efficient. All these words mean generally "having effect," but they have distinctive applications. Effective = (1) having a high degree of effect (used of a thing done or of the doer) <the court's power to fashion an effective equitable remedy>; or (2) coming into effect <effective June 3, 1994>. Efficacious = certain to have the desired effect (used of things) <efficacious drugs>. Efficient = competent to perform a task; capable of bringing about a desired effect (used of agents or their actions or instruments) <an efficient organization>. Efficient increasingly has economic connotations in law that are evident, e.g., in the phrase cost-efficient, q.v.

Effectual, perhaps the most troublesome of these words in practice, means "achieving the complete effect aimed at"; it is used apart from the agent. E.g., "I think that unity of organization is necessary to make the contest of labor effectual." (Holmes)/ "If that were so, every imperfect security, however invalid as a real right, would be effectual as a trust." (Eng.) On the use of effectually for effectively, see effectively.

effete does not mean "effeminate" or "sophisticated and snobbish." Rather, it means "worn out, barren, exhausted."

efficacious; efficient. See effectual.

effrontery (= shameless insolence) for affront (= an open insult) is a MALAPROPISM. E.g., "To overturn the judge's denial of the motion to recuse would be an effrontery [read affront] to his character."

effulge. See BACK-FORMATIONS.

e.g., the abbreviation for the Latin phrase exempli gratia (= for example), introduces representative examples. In AmE, it is preferably followed by a comma (or, depending on the construction, a colon) and unitalicized. In their fine book on admiralty, Grant Gilmore and Charles L. Black (or their publishers) pedantically put a space between the two letters (e. g.), sometimes without a comma following. See The Law of Admiralty 10 (2d ed. 1975). In BrE, the periods as well as the comma are sometimes omitted—e.g.: "The problem with seeking a legislative cure for the ethical disease is that most of the perceived outrages are either already illegal (eg, Pentagon officials taking bribes) or beyond the reach of the law (politicians' sexual adventures)." Washington on an Ethics Kick, Economist, 28 Jan.–3 Feb. 1989, at 19. To American eyes, eg looks like egg misspelled.

Using the abbreviation etc. after an enumeration following e.g. creates a superfluity, since one expects nothing more than a representative sample of possibilities. But etc. might be required after i.e. (L. id est "that is") to show the incompleteness of the list.

In two editions, Black's (5th & 6th) misused i.e. for e.g. in its entry for layman: "One who is not of a particular profession (i.e. non-lawyer)." The abbreviation should be e.g., not i.e., because under the definition a nondoctor as well as a nonlawyer would be a layman; the parenthetical nonlawyer is intended only to provide an example.

One should clearly indicate what the signal refers to: "Out-of-pocket losses include medical expenses, lost earnings, and the cost of any labor required to do things that the plaintiff can no longer do himself (e.g., a housekeeper)." But "things the plaintiff can no longer do himself" are not exemplified by a housekeeper. (Or does the writer mean be a housekeeper?) In any event, wherever readers encounter an e.g. they rightly expect a sampling of appropriate items—not an ambiguous or an all-inclusive listing. In the example given, it might be, e.g., keep house, drive a car, tend the garden. See i.e.

egality is the anglicized form of the French égalité (= equality). The OED pronounces it obsolete, and so it should be, in deference to equality. E.g., "Is this a sign of greater egality [read equality], inverted snobbery, or simple confusion?" Robert Harris, The Way We Were, Sunday Times (Books), 22 July 1990, at 8-1.

egoism; egotism; egocentrism; egocentricity; egomania. Egoism is a legitimate philosophical term meaning "a doctrine that self-betterment is the guiding method of existence, or that self-interest is the primary motive in all one's actions." The use of egoism in the sense "selfishness" is a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION. Egotism = arrogance; an exaggerated sense of self-importance; self-praise. Egocentrism and egocentricity are synonymous, with perhaps a slight nuance. Egocentrism = the quality of being self-centered and selfish; looking only to one's own feelings and needs. Egocentricity = the quality of being egocentric, individualistic, or self-centered. Egomania is extreme egocentrism.

egregious /i-gree-jəs/ formerly meant merely "outstanding," but has been specialized in a pejorative sense so that it now means "outstandingly bad."

egress; ingress. Egress = the right or liberty of going out. Ingress = the right or liberty of going in. The correct prepositions are illustrated here: "The company breached its duty to furnish Rivers with a safe means of ingress to and egress from the vessel."

The legal phrase ingress, egress, and regress = the right to enter, leave, and reenter. Courts and lawyers have sometimes mistaken the import of these terms. Black's (1st–6th eds.) erroneously defines ingress, egress, and regress as "the right (as of a lessee) to enter, go upon [read leave], and return from [read return to] the lands in question." The same dictionary states that egress is "often used interchangeably with the word access," apparently confusing egress with ingress.

eight corners. See four corners of the instrument.

either. A. Number of Elements. Most properly, either . . . or can frame only two alternatives, and no more: "He testified that in the last few years terrazzo had been used more extensively in entranceways than either marble, tile, cement, or asphalt [omit either]." See CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS (B).

B. Singular or Plural. Nouns framed by either . . . or take a singular verb when they are both singular, or when only the latter is singular. E.g., "There was no evidence that either DeGraft or his corporation were [read was] under the control of defendants."

The same principle applies to nouns that should agree in number with the subject: "The situation should not be viewed in terms of whether the Constitution somehow makes a teacher or librarian the proper selectors [read selector] of a curriculum or books."/ "If either had been a male they [read the couple or she] would have been prohibited from intermarrying." See CONCORD & SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT (E).

C. Not . . . either. This phrasing should be a neither . . . nor construction. E.g., "Other states do not require either a notice or registration [read require neither notice nor registration], although they may require filing of a report of sale."

D. Either or both. This phrase denotes the meaning generally assigned to and/or, q.v., but neither phrase finds a place in good legal writing. E.g., "One must plead either or both that [read either that] the state has established a procedure that itself is constitutionally deficient or that it has provided no adequate remedy for aberrational [q.v.] departures by the servants from proper procedures [add a comma, and then: or both]."/ "Judicial sanctions in civil contempt proceedings may, in a proper case, be employed for either or both of two purposes [read for either of two purposes]." (If both rationales exist, then no one would seriously argue that the sanctions are unavailable.)

E. Either . . . and/or. This construction is illogical: "Plaintiff states that she has no responsive documents that she is withholding from Defendant under any claim of either the attorney-client and/or the work-product privileges [read under the attorney-client or work-product privilege]." See and/or.

ejaculate can no longer be used in sober writing as a synonym for "exclaim."

ejectee. See -EE.

ejectment; ejection; ouster. These terms are deceptively similar but have important differences. Ejectment and ejection are names of actions at law, whereas ouster is a legal wrong. Ejectment = (1) ejection of a tenant or occupier from property; or (2) trespass to try title—a legal action in which a person ejected from property seeks to recover possession and damages. This action was abolished in England in 1852 but persists in some American jurisdictions. E.g., "We think it is clear in this case that the complainants in this bill might have brought ejectment for the land against the tenants in possession." Ejection is the term for a similar action in Scots law.

Ouster is something different: "the act of wrongfully dispossessing someone of any kind of hereditament, such as freehold property" (CDL).

ejusdem generis is a canon of construction providing that when general words follow the enumeration of persons or things of a specific meaning, the general words will be construed as applying only to persons or things of the same general class as those enumerated. For example, in the Sunday Observance Act 1677, the language no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer or other person whatever was held not to include a coach proprietor, a farmer, a barber, or a real-estate agent; the general words or other person whatever were held confined to persons with similar occupations to those specifically listed—despite the breadth of whatever. Similarly, if a lease forbade the tenant to keep kerosene, camphene, burning fluid, or any other illuminating material, the general language at the end would not include a light bulb, though it is indisputably an "illuminating material" if the language is taken literally.

The phrase is often used adjectivally—e.g.: "The assembly of machinery is not ejusdem generis with 'cleaning, lubricating, and painting.'" Sometimes it functions as an adverb—e.g.: "The general words at the end of the perils clause have been construed ejusdem generis with the preceding enumerated perils." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 74 (2d ed. 1975).

The term is pronounced /ee-joos-dəm-jen-ə-ris/, /ee-yoos-dəm/, or (BrE) /ee-jas-dəm/, and is occasionally spelled eiusdem generis (the classical way, which is Latin but not English).

eke out. Journalists often misuse this PHRASAL VERB by writing, for example, that Smith eked out a victory over Jones in the election (as if the phrase meant, in colloquial terms, "squeaked by Jones"). Eke out properly means "to supplement, add to, or make go further or last longer." Here the phrase is correctly used: "There have been many cases in which there was nothing in the way of context or other laws in pari materia by which to eke out a statute where the provisions were so obscure that a court, with best of intention, could not ascertain and declare its proper meaning." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 68 (1938)./ "It was considered possible to solve all legal problems by deduction from the actual rules of English law, eked out [i.e., supplemented] perhaps by careful borrowing from the Roman jurists."

One may eke out one's income by working nights as well as days. But one does not, properly, eke out an existence: "Appellant claimed to have brought more than $70,000 with him from Vermont, when his testimony showed that during his period there he was barely able to eke out an existence [read barely able to make ends meet, or some other CLICHÉ]." Nor does the phrase mean "to acquire by difficulty or drudgery."

elaborate, v.i. & v.t., is commonly intransitive in nonlegal contexts <to elaborate on a point>, and transitive in legal contexts <to elaborate a point>. E.g., "A well-known passage in Blackstone's Commentaries elaborates the so-called fourfold unity of a joint tenancy." Although both to elaborate and to elaborate on may mean "to work out in detail," the former suggests "to produce by labor," and the latter suggests "to explain at greater length." Awareness of this nuance allows one to choose the apter phrasing.

elder; eldest. These are variants of older and oldest, with restricted uses: one refers to an elder brother or sister, or to the eldest son or daughter, but elsewhere the form is out of place. Older and oldest may always substitute for elder and eldest.

elect is a LEGALISM meaning "to choose deliberately." A FORMAL WORD generally followed by an infinitive in legal prose, elect should not be used where a simple choose will suffice. E.g., "The petitioner elected [read chose] to declare the entire indebtedness to be immediately due and payable."/ "It is suggested that he does not have the mental capability to elect [read choose] to continue further judicial examination of his conviction."/ "With the consent of the trustees, he may elect [read choose] to take his benefits in a lump sum, or part lump sum and part annuity." The changes here suggested are stylistic merely; elect cannot be said to be wrong—it is merely symptomatic of LEGALESE.

electee (= [1] one chosen or elected; or [2] one to whom the law gives a choice about status) is recorded in the OED and supported by a single quotation, from 1593. One might suppose that because electee is omitted from most unabridged dictionaries, it was a 16th-century nonce word that is long since defunct. So prudent writers would suppose; yet the word has been successfully revived. E.g., sense (1): "Petitioners would enjoin the electees from acting." Littig v. Democratic County Comm. 38 N.Y.S.2d 214, 216 (Sup. Ct. 1942). Whether this word will gain currency as a correlative of elector it is too early to say.

Sense (2) is an illogical use of the -EE suffix, since the electee is the person put to the election—the elector, in effect: "A section 411 electee . . . is qualified to make an election to have his retired pay computed under section 402(d)." Aflague v. U.S., 298 F.2d 446, 449 (Ct. Cl. 1962).

elective. This term is used primarily in relation to political elections. Elective = appointed by election; subject to election. In legal writing, however, elective is used more broadly of legal choices: "The widow took her elective share of the estate."

elector = (1) esp. in BrE, a legally qualified voter; or (2) in AmE, a member of the electoral college chosen by the states to elect the president and vice president. Sense (1) appears occasionally in AmE, esp. in older works—e.g.: "The first view to be taken of this part of the government relates to the qualifications of the electors and the elected." The Federalist No. 52, at 325 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961). Sense (2) is more usual in modern AmE—e.g.: "[T]he President held office for four years and then had to be given—or denied—a second term by electors picked by the people." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 44 (1955).

electorial is a common error for electoral (= of or relating to electors). E.g., "The new district would be divided into electorial [read electoral] subdistricts utilizing the current community college district boundaries." Liddell v. Board of Educ., 733 F. Supp. 1324, 1327 (E.D. Mo. 1990).

eleemosynary /el-ə-mos-ə-ner-ee/, related etymologically to the word alms, is a FORMAL WORD for charitable. It is more common in legal than in nonlegal prose. E.g., "The church seeks and obtains the eleemosynary contributions of the laity, not for private gain, but for the aid of pious institutions and objects of every nature."/ "The court held the cy-pres statutes inapplicable because the trust was not for a charitable, benevolent, or eleemosynary purpose."

ELEGANT VARIATION. See INELEGANT VARIATION.

elemental; elementary. Elemental is the more specific term, meaning "of or relating to the elements of something; essential." E.g., "We do what elemental justice and fundamental fairness demand under the necessitous circumstances." Elementary means "introductory; simple; fundamental." E.g., "It is elementary that an executory contract, in order to be enforceable, must be based upon a valuable consideration."

eligible may be equally well construed with either for or to (an office). Eligible for is more common today than eligible to, but the latter has unimpeachable credentials: "No person except a natural born citizen . . . shall be eligible to the office of president." U.S. Const. art. II, § 1./ "No judge of any court . . . shall during the term for which he is elected or appointed, be eligible to the legislature." Tex. Const. art. III, § 19.

elisor /ə-lī-zər/, omitted from W3 but generally included in unabridged dictionaries, means "a person appointed by a court to return a jury, serve a writ, or perform other duties of the sheriff or a coroner in case of his disqualification" (W2). Though comparatively rare, the term is still used in some American jurisdictions. E.g., "In view of our holding that the elisor was an interested person, we do not reach a determination as to the validity of the service of process under Bahamian law." Wakeman v. Farish, 356 So. 2d 1323, 1325 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1978). The form eslisor is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

ELLIPSES. See QUOTATIONS (E).

elocution; locution; allocution. Elocution = style in speaking; the art of speaking persuasively. Locution = a word or phrase. For allocution, see allocution.

eloi(g)n is an archaic legal term meaning "to convey or remove out of the jurisdiction of the court or of the sheriff" (OED). Generally the word is spelled eloign rather than eloin.

elope. The OED and many other dictionaries define this term as if it had historically been a "sexist" one in law: "a. Law. Of a wife: To run away from her husband in the company of a paramour. b. In popular langnage also (and more frequently) said of a woman running away from home with a lover for the purpose of being married" (OED). These definitions suggest that only women can elope, but legal contexts have long made men as well as women elopers—e.g.: "[I]f evidence was admitted to show that House had armed himself, and was hunting for Steadman under the impression that the latter had eloped with his wife, and was secreting himself in that vicinity, it is difficult to see upon what principle his threats in that connection were excluded." Alexander v. U.S., 138 U.S. 353, 356 (1891)./ "James Campbell had eloped with the wife of one Ludlow . . . ." Adger v. Ackerman, 115 F. 124, 130 (8th Cir. 1902).

else's. Such possessive constructions as anyone else's and everybody else's are preferred to the obsolete constructions anyone's else and everybody's else. See POSSESSIVES (G).

elude. See allude.

elusive; elusory; illusive; illusory. Elusive (rather than elusory) is the usual adjective related to elude; illusory (rather than illusive) is the usual adjective related to illusion. Here illusive has almost certainly been misused for elusive: "The discussion almost inevitably returns to the illusive [read elusive] subject of what the Supreme Court really held. . . ." B-U Acquisition Group, Inc. v. Utica Mut. Ins. Co., 52 B.R. 541, 544 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1985). See illusory.

EM-, IM-. See EN-.

emanate = (1) to flow forth, issue, originate from a person or thing as a source; or (2) to proceed from a material source (OED). Sense (2) applies to physical senses. E.g., "The use of a human investigator was a factor involved in State v. Groves, where an airplane pilot's detection of an odor emanating from luggage he was unloading led to a sniff of that luggage by a trained police dog."

The word is coming to be overworked in sense (1), rising almost to the level of a VOGUE WORD. Its use in the law is old: "In discussing this question, the counsel for the State of Maryland have deemed it of some importance, in the construction of the constitution, to consider that instrument not as emanating from the people, but as the act of sovereign and independent States." McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 402 (1819) (per Marshall, C.J.).

Judges today seemed enamored of the word, which is fast becoming another legal CLICHÉ: "Moreover, there are other suggestions such as that emanating from Dean Wigmore at a time when the question whether the parol evidence rule was proper subject-matter for evidence or contracts had not been decided."/ "It appears that the first advancement statute was based on the custom of London and York, and that the custom must have emanated from the Roman (or civil) law principle of collatio bonorum, requiring a bringing into hotchpot [q.v.]."/ "Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of bank robbery charged in an indictment emanating from the District of Minnesota."

emancipate = to set free (as a minor or a slave) from legal, social, or political restraint. In modern legal contexts, one most frequently encounters this term in reference to minors—e.g.: "Plaintiff Adele Gelbman was the passenger in an automobile owned by her and operated by her unemancipated 16-year-old son." Gelbman v. Gelbman, 245 N.E.2d 192, 192 (N.Y. Ct. App. 1969).

emancipation; mancipation. The former means "the act of freeing from slavery," the latter "the act of enslaving."

emasculate means literally "to castrate," but has come figuratively to mean "to deprive of strength and vigor, to weaken." The word is a favorite of judges in dissent. E.g., "More important in the long run than this misreading of the federal statute, however, is the court's emasculation of the equal protection clause as a constitutional principle applicable to the area of social welfare administration."/ "Under the majority's emasculation of the Act, no determination need be made whether the substantial question is likely to be determined favorably on appeal." Cf. eviscerate.

embarrass. Only in legal contexts is this word today used in the sense "to encumber, hamper, impede." E.g., "Even in Tucker Act cases the problem of joinder should not be embarrassed by any doctrine of sovereign immunity." (The Tucker Act allows certain persons to sue the government.)/ "We think that the arguments of the parties are considerably embarrassed by factors not touched upon by the parties." Most nonlawyers would find puzzling these uses of embarrass. See EUPHEMISMS embassador. See ambassador.

embassy; legation. Often assumed to be synonymous, these words should be distinguished. An embassy is under an ambassador, and a legation is under a minister, envoy, chargé d'affaires, or some other diplomatic agent.

embezzle; misappropriate; steal. Embezzle (= to fraudulently convert personal property that one has been entrusted with) is now always used in reference to fiduciaries. Misappropriate means "to take for oneself wrongfully" and may or may not be used of a fiduciary. Steal, like misappropriate, is generally a broader term than embezzle; it has the same meaning as misappropriate, but much stronger negative connotations. See defalcate, misappropriate, peculation & steal.

emblements (= [1] crop production, or profits from crops produced by the cultivator's labor, or [2] a common-law doctrine giving the planter of crops ownership rights in those crops after the planter has unexpectedly lost possession of the land before harvest) is a Law French term [fr. OF. emblaer "to sow with wheat or oats"] that persists in modern legal writing—but it is surely preferable to its Latin alternative, fructus industriales. E.g., "The duration of a life estate being uncertain, the law encourages the life tenant to cultivate the land by giving him the right to 'emblements.' This is the right of the legal personal representatives of a deceased life tenant . . . to enter the land after the life estate has come to an end and reap the crops which the life tenant has sown." Peter Butt, Land Law 111 (2d ed. 1988). The word is anglicized in pronunciation: /em-bli-mənts/.

embrace, in figurative senses, may mean either (1) "to include" or (2) "to adopt." Here sense (1), largely a legal sense, applies: "Personal liberty or the right of property embraces the right to make contracts for the sale of one's own labor and the employment of one's individual and industrial sources."/ "There is no support in the record for the proposition that Bombay's business and goodwill could be protected only by a restrictive covenant embracing almost all of the North American continent."/ "The general article was interpreted to embrace only crimes the commission of which had some direct impact on military discipline."

Sense (2), used in legal and nonlegal contexts alike, is exemplified in this sentence: "While appellants try to argue that dilution cases involve a mixed question of law and fact not governed by the clearly erroneous standard, we cannot embrace this argument."

embracee. See embrace(o)r.

embrace(o)r. This term, meaning "one guilty of embracery [= the offense of influencing a jury illegally and corruptly]," is best spelled embracer, preferred by the OED and the AHD. W3 and Webster's New World Dictionary include their main entries under embraceor, with the ill-formed suffix.

Some writers use the NEOLOGISM embracee as the correlative of embracer—e.g.: "If it takes the form of a bribe and is accepted, both the embracer (giver) and embracee (taker) are guilty of bribery." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 551 (3d ed. 1982).

embracery; imbracery; bracery. The first form is standard for this word, which denotes the offense of attempting to corrupt or instruct a jury to reach a particular conclusion by means other than evidence or argument in court, as by bribing or threatening jurors. The popular term for this offense is jury-tampering. See jury-packing.

Imbracery and bracery are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

emend. See amend.

emigrant; émigré. There is a latent DIFFERENTIATION between these words. An emigrant is one who leaves a country to settle in another. Émigré has the same sense, but applies especially to one in political exile. The first acute accent is often omitted (emigré) in AmE.

emigrate. See immigrate.

émigré. See emigrant.

eminence (= loftiness, prominence) is misused in the following sentence, but whether the desired word is imminence (= the quality or state of being ready to take place) or immanence (= inherence) is unclear: "The phrase 'imminent danger,' for example, suggested immediacy, inherence, and eminence [read imminence or immanence, either one of which would create a REDUNDANCY]." Edward H. Levi, An Introduction to Legal Reasoning 27 (1949; repr. 1972).

eminent. See imminent.

eminent domain; condemnation; expropriation. The 17th-century civilian Grotius coined the term eminens dominium, from which our phrase derives. In BrE, eminent domain is primarily a term of international law. In AmE, it refers to the power of federal and local governments to pronounce judicially (land, etc.) as converted to public use. The usual BrE term for this sense is expropriation. Condemnation, an Americanism, has virtually the same sense: "judicial assignation (of property) to public purposes, subject to reasonable compensation." E.g., "This is a condemnation proceeding brought by the County of Matagorda to condemn four parcels of land." See compulsory purchase.

emote. See BACK-FORMATIONS.

empanel; impanel. Empanel (= to swear a jury to try an issue [CDL]) is now the preferred spelling in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "The cause came on for trial with a jury duly empaneled." Impanel was formerly a common spelling, used, e.g., in Franklin v. South Carolina, 218 U.S. 161, 166 (1910).

empathy; sympathy. Empathy is the ability to imagine oneself in another person's position and to experience all the sensations connected with it. Sympathy is compassion for or commiseration with another.

emphasis added; emphasis supplied. These citation signals are both used to indicate that, in quoting another's words, the writer has italicized some of them. There is no distinction in meaning between the phrases, as some writers occasionally assume. Emphasis in original is used to indicate that the italics appear in the original material as here quoted.

emphyteusis (= the right of a person who is not the owner of a piece of land to use it as his or her own in perpetuity, subject to forfeiture for nonpayment of a fixed rent) is a civil-law term that appears sometimes in Anglo-American legal writing. E.g., "This is the Emphyteusis, upon which the Fief of the middle ages has often been fathered, though without much knowledge of the exact share which it had in bringing feudal ownership into the world." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 248 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910)./ "[A]lthough the Romans used the term 'dominium,' the holder of land by emphyteusis was also treated in many ways as an owner." Butler v. Baber, 529 So. 2d 374, 381 (La. 1988). The corresponding adjective is emphyteutic.

empiricize, not in the dictionaries, has made an appearance in an American law report: "Just as experienced physicians render diagnoses on the basis of symptoms they sense, but often cannot empiricize [= confirm or verify by testing] or articulate, so too, we are told, can those who work among prisoners develop 'senses' concerning the potential for impending disobedience or unrest." Abdul Wali v. Coughlin, 754 F.2d 1015, 1018 (2d Cir. 1985).

empirics is not in good use for empiricism. Cf. esoterics.

emplead. See implead.

employe(e). Although employé, the French form, might logically be thought to be better as a generic term, employée (which in French denotes the feminine gender) is so widespread (without the accent mark) that it is not likely to be uprooted. The Wall Street Journal and a few other publications remain staunch adherents to the form employe (minus the acute accent on the final -e); but employee is standard.

It did not always have such a stronghold, however. Employe was once common in English. E.g., "We need hardly repeat the statement . . . that in the Employers' Liability Act Congress used the words 'employé' and 'employed' in their natural sense, and intended to describe the conventional relation of employer and employé." Hull v. Philadelphia & R.R., 40 S. Ct. 358, 359 (1920) (spelled employee at 252 U.S. 475, 479). See independent contractor.

employer and employee; master and servant. The former phrase seems to be supplanting the latter, which at best sounds antiquarian and, to many, derogatory. Also, employee is more transparently distinguishable from agent than servant is. See agent.

empty-chair defense is an Americanism referring to a common tactic of defendants: when one defendant has settled before trial, the remaining defendant can try to put all fault on the absent one (i.e., the one not occupying a chair at trial).

emulate; immolate. The former is to strive to equal or rival, to copy or imitate with the object of equaling. The latter is to kill as a sacrifice.

Emulate is frequently misused, as, e.g., here for adopt: "I cannot believe that a company trying to estimate the effect of a marketing tool would emulate [read adopt] the methods that lawyers use in taking depositions."

EN-, IN-. No consistent rules exist for determining which form of the prefix to use before a given word. In AmE at present, the spellings entrust, enclose, inquire (= to ask), and increase are standard. The BrE spellings are entrust, enclose, enquire (= to ask), and increase, but the variants intrust and inclose still appear with some frequency. Especially troublesome to writers are word-pairs with varying prefixes according to inflection: encrust but incrustation; engrain (= to dye in the raw state) but ingrained (= deeply rooted). For a discussion of in- as both privative and intensive, see NEGATIVES (B).

enabling statute. This phrase was perhaps first used specifically in reference to the act (32 Hen. VIII. c. 28) by which tenants-in-fee and certain others were "enabled" to make leases (OED). Now the phrase is used in reference to any statute conferring powers, and in the U.S. usually to a congressional statute conferring powers on executive agencies to carry out various tasks delegated to them. E.g., "Procedural uniformity seems to be weakening, as the Congress has become increasingly willing to prescribe detailed codes of procedure in enabling legislation." See disabling statute & disenable.

enact. The platitude is that courts adjudicate, rather than legislate. Some judicial decisions seem to belie this principle; still, it is unidiomatic to refer to a court as enacting doctrines: "The Supreme Court has enacted [read enunciated or some other word] a 'public safety' exception to Miranda." enactment = (1) the action or process of making (a legislative bill) into law <enactment of the bill>; or (2) a statute . The word is best not used by legal writers in sense (2), although it has been so used almost from its beginning in the early 19th century. Still, to use enactment in sense (2) is to add an unneeded synonym and to muddle a useful distinction. The plural almost always manifests this stylistically poor use: "Congressional enactments [read Congressional acts or Federal statutes] come to this court with an extremely heavy presumption of validity." See act (C).

Nevertheless, sense (2) is so pervasive that we can do little else but avoid it in our own writing; criticism of its users (as opposed to its use) is unfair, given its pervasiveness. The OCL and CDL define enactment only in sense (2): "a statute or Act of Parliament, statutory instrument, by-law or other statement of law made by a person or body with legislative powers" (OCL). Likewise, it is used in sense (2) in the Assimilative Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 13 (1982), which states that certain acts or omissions are "not made punishable by any enactment of Congress." Perhaps the use of the term in the last-quoted example arose from the mistaken notion that act in acts and omissions might be confused with act of Congress. Even were that true, federal statute would suffice in place of act of Congress.

en banc; in banc; in banco; in bank. A. Spelling and Pronunciation. W3 lists only en banc (= in full court; F. lit. "on the bench"), the predominant form in English-speaking countries. In banc and in bank also appear in a few jurisdictions, but these are not widespread. The Arizona courts use in banc—as in Spur Industries, Inc. v. Del E. Webb Development Co., 494 P.2d 700 (Ariz. 1972) (in banc)—and so do the Maryland courts, though the commentators wonder why: "There is no justification for the spelling in banc other than the fact that it was used by the drafters of the Maryland Constitution." Paul V. Niemeyer & Linda M. Richards, Maryland Rules Commentary 339 (1984).

Unfortunately, the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, as well as statutes addressing appellate procedure, use the spelling in banc. Judge Jon O. Newman, of the Second Circuit, reluctantly acquiesced to in banc in an article discussing en banc proceedings: "Grudgingly, I accept the spelling of 'in banc' adopted by the pertinent statute, 28 U.S.C. § 46(c) (1982), and the federal rule, Fed. R. App. P. 35. Use of the term as it appeared in Old French, 'en banc,' seems preferable." In Banc Practice in the Second Circuit, 50 Brooklyn L. Rev. 365, 365 n.1 (1984).

The Supreme Court of California, meanwhile, uses in bank. See, e.g., In re Los Angeles County Pioneer Society, 257 P.2d 1 (Cal. 1953) (in bank). In banco is listed in Black's (6th ed.) but is rarely if ever used.

En banc being now the usual spelling, the burden falls on English-speaking lawyers to pronounce the word correctly. Certainly the anglicized pronunciation /in-bank/ is unexceptionable; the French approximation /on-bonk/ is also common, though some may consider it precious. And reporters are likely to misspell the phrase—e.g.: "'In fact there had been a fair degree of unanimity on this until last September, when the Fifth Circuit sitting en banque [read en banc] took their renegade path,' said Mr. McDuff." Ronald Smothers, Challenges to Judicial Elections Revive, N.Y. Times, 22 June 1991, at 9.

B. Adjective or Adverb. The phrase en banc may be either adjectival <en banc proceedings> or adverbial <the court heard the case en banc>. Chief Justice Rehnquist has even used the phrase as a SENTENCE ADVERB: "En banc, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed." Crawford Fitting Co. v. J.T. Gibbons, Inc., 482 U.S. 437, 439 (1987) (per Rehnquist, C.J.). enbancworthy (= worthy of being considered en banc) is a term concocted by, and still generally confined to, the judges of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. As legal JARGON formed on the model of words like seaworthy and airworthy, it is useful shorthand, though odd-sounding. E.g., "This opens up a whole array of influences which for nearly all cases [affect] . . . whether the case is enbancworthy." Allen v. Johnson, 391 F.2d 527, 532 (5th Cir. 1968) (per Brown, C.J.)./ "As one who shares his misgivings, I feel obligated to state concisely my reasons for believing that the present case is enbancworthy." Becker v. Thompson, 463 F.2d 1338, 1339 (5th Cir. 1972) (Brown, C.J., dissenting)./ "Briefs and oral arguments on rehearing en banc lead the Court to conclude that this case is not enbancworthy." McLaurin v. Columbia Mun. Separate Sch. Dist., 486 F.2d 1049, 1050 (5th Cir. 1973)./ "Although standing alone, this problem would hardly be enbancworthy, we conclude that action by us is appropriate rather than letting stand the panel's analysis of third-party beneficiary." Hercules, Inc. v. Stevens Shipping Co., 698 F.2d 726, 736 (5th Cir. 1983). Cf. certworthy.

The corresponding noun is enbancworthiness, and the antonym is unenbancworthy—e.g.: "I would agree that this case would be unenbancworthy if the panel had avoided the Chambers question on any one of the several grounds suggested . . . ." Maness v. Wainwright, 528 F.2d 1381, 1381 (5th Cir. 1976) (Goldberg, J., dissenting).Cf. unenbanc.

enclose; inclose. The former spelling is now preferred in all senses. E.g., "The complaint alleged that certain statements in the publication (those inclosed [read enclosed] in brackets) were false." See EN-.

enclosed herewith and enclosed herein are unnecessary for enclosed; in beth phrases, the first word conveys the idea redundantly expressed by the second. See enclosed please find.

enclosed please find is archaic deadwood in lawyers' correspondence for enclosed is or I have enclosed. Whether the phrase was originally commercialese or LEGALESE, it has been cant since its creation.

In referring to a variant form of this phrase—please find enclosed—a 19th-century commentator aptly remarked: "A more ridiculous use of words, it seems to me, there could not be." Richard G. White, Every-Day English 492 (1880).

enclosure; inclosure. The former spelling is preferred in all senses. See EN-.

encomium. Pl. -iums, -ia. The English plural is preferred—e.g.: "In truth, the book is in no sense a law book, and some of the most enthusiastic encomiums of it that I have heard have come from gentlemen who have never opened a law book." C.C. Langdell, Dominant Opinions in England During the Nineteenth Century, 19 Harv. L. Rev. 151, 153 (1906). See PLURALS (A).

encrease is an obsolete spelling of increase used, e.g., in the U.S. Const., art. I, § 6. See EN-.

encrust; incrust. See EN-.

encumber. See incumber.

encumbrance; incumbrance; cumbrance. The preferred spelling of this word, meaning "a claim or liability that is attached to property and that may lessen its value," is encumbrance in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "The court erred in holding that the shares of stock to Lillian Conway Fine are free and clear of liens and encumbrances." Yet incumbrance is the spelling used in the British Finance Act of 1975. Cumbrance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. See liens and encumbrances.

encumbrancer (= a person who holds an encumbrance) is a slightly archaic word that can often be replaced by lienholder. (See lienor.) A variant spelling to be avoided is incumbrancer.

endeavor is a FORMAL WORD for attempt or try. E.g., "No such clemency can be extended to an attorney who deliberately and persistently endeavors to submit evidence that is clearly incompetent and that, as a lawyer, he is presumed to know is incompetent."

The same is true of endeavor as a noun: "To attempt to limit English competition in this way would be as hopeless an endeavour as the experiment of King Canute." (Eng.)

On the difference between the AmE and the BrE spelling, see -OR.

endemic. See epidemic.

end(ing). End, not ending, is the proper correlative of beginning. E.g., "The turnover of the Sinai is a beginning, not an ending [read end]." Obviously, the writer was trying for parallel -ings.

endnote. See footnote.

endorse; indorse. The usual spelling in nonlegal contexts is endorse. That is the only acceptable spelling of the word when used figuratively to mean "to express approval of." In legal senses relating to negotiable instruments, indorse predominates in the U.S., and the word is so spelled throughout the Uniform Commercial Code. This latent DIFFERENTIATION ought to be encouraged. In Great Britain, however, endorse is the more frequent spelling, even in the context of commercial paper.

Indorse on the back is a REDUNDANCY; the root dors- means "back."

endorsee. See -EE.

endowment has two quite different senses: (1) "the assignment of a wife's dower"; or (2) "the bestowal of money, income, or property to some person or institution."

end product is usually a REDUNDANCY for product. Cf. end result.

end result is a REDUNDANCY for result. Safire calls it "redundant, tautological and unnecessarily repetitive, not to mention prolix and wordy." William Safire, Peace-ese, N.Y. Times, 17 Nov. 1991, § 6, at 22. E.g., "The end result [read result] of the Supreme Court's labors was that many maritime workers . . . could recover full damages in the unseaworthiness action . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 411 (2d ed. 1975). Cf. final result & final destination.

endue. See indue.

ends and objects. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

enervate; innervate. The former means "to drain the vigor out of," the latter "to supply with energy."

enfeoff; infeoff. See feoff.

enforce; inforce. A. Spelling. The latter is an archaic spelling whose only vestige appears in reinforce. See EN-.

B. "Enforcing" a Contract. Lawyers continually speak of enforcing contracts, though this term is not apt unless one is seeking specific performance. Usually, the law merely specifies a remedy for breach of contract—damages—and does not compel performance.

enforceable; enforcible. Enforceable is the preferred, standard spelling in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "A contract is enforcible [read enforceable] even though it does not specify the type of deed to be given." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 83 (1946).

enfranchise. See franchise.

English rule, the. American lawyers speak of the English rule in many contexts in which English law differs from American law. But throughout the 1980s, the phrase increasingly denoted only one rule: that the losing party in litigation must pay the winner's costs and attorney's fees. E.g., "Most American lawyers abhor the English rule. It requires the losing side in a civil suit to pay the winning side's attorneys' costs. This approach would discourage weak or frivolous suits, while encouraging defendants to settle strong suits against them. More generally, it would promote new and less costly ways of resolving conflicts aside from litigation." Robert J. Samuelson, I Am a Big Lawyer Basher, Newsweek, 27 April 1992, at 62./ "I would think real, real seriously about adopting the English Rule. You lose, you pay." Michele Galen, Guilty! Too Many Lawyers and Too Much Litigation, BusinessWeek, 13 April 1992, at 60, 65 (quoting Scott Turow). A synonymous phrase—and a sharper one—is the loser-pays rule.

engraft; ingraft. The word is best spelled engraft. See EN-.

engrandize. See aggrandize.

engross, ingross; enrol(l), inrol(l). The preferred spellings are engross and enroll (AmE), enrol (BrE). Both words have to do with the preparation of legal documents. To engross a legal document (as a deed) is to prepare a fair copy ready for execution. To enroll it is to enter it into an official record upon execution. See enrol(l)ment.

enjeopard. See jeopardize.

enjoin (from) (upon). Enjoin has two basic meanings, each the exact opposite of the other. In sense (1), which is positive in intent, enjoin means to prescribe, to mandate, or to order that something be done. This sense, used most frequently in BrE (though not wholly unknown in AmE), occurs with either of two prepositions: upon or to. E.g., "In France and Germany, for example, equity has been a clearly recognized element in the administration of justice, and enjoined upon the judge, but assigned to no special jurisdiction." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 414 (7th ed. 1964)./ "Courts are ill-suited to resolve hypothetical issues and are constitutionally enjoined to decide only concrete cases." (Eng.)

In sense (2), which is negative in intent, enjoin means to prohibit, to forbid, or to restrain someone by court order from doing a specific act or behaving in a certain way. In this second meaning, the verb takes the preposition from—not to or upon. E.g., "The court enjoined the company from selling any further cargoes of Nigerian oil to buyers other than the plaintiff."

In the sense "to prohibit by injunction," enjoin is preferable to the BACK-FORMATION injunct, dated in the OED from 1872. See enjoinder & injunction enjoining.

enjoinable (= capable of being prohibited by injunction), dating from the late 19th century, is contained in no major English dictionary but has proved useful to American judges—e.g.:

- "[A]ll such activity would be properly enjoinable insofar as it advocated a strike by public employees." In re Berry, 436 P.2d 273, 285 (Cal. 1968) (en banc).
- "Spur's operation was an enjoinable public nuisance." Spur Indus., Inc. v. Del E. Webb Dev. Co., 494 P.2d 700, 706 (Ariz. 1972) (en banc).
- "[W]e find that appellees' use of the house and adjoining premises as a church constitutes a clear and enjoinable violation of the restriction in issue here." Kessler v. Stough, 361 So. 2d 1048, 1050 (Ala. 1978).
- "That secondary picketing is unlawful and enjoinable today in almost every other industry is none of our business." Burlington N. R.R. v. Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, 793 F.2d 795, 802 (7th Cir. 1986).

enjoinder; enjoinment; injunction. The words of the Fowler brothers are as apt today as they were at the turn of the 20th century:

> As rejoin rejoinder, so enjoin enjoinder. The word is not given in the [OED], from which it seems likely that Dickens ["Merely nodding his head as an enjoinder to be careful."] invented it, consciously or unconsciously. The only objection to such a word is that its having had to wait so long, in spite of its obviousness, before being made is a strong argument against the necessity of it. We may regret that injunction holds the field, having a much less English appearance; but it does; and in language the old-established that can still do the work is not to be turned out for the new-fangled that might do it a shade better, but must first get itself known and accepted.
> H.W. Fowler & F.G. Fowler, The King's English 53 (3d ed. 1931; repr. 1978)

The OED contains two illustrative examples of enjoinder, but injunction still generally "holds the field" in both positive and negative senses of enjoin, q.v.

Yet enjoinder has become more common than it was in Fowler's day in the sense of "a command, esp. one that prohibits." E.g., "But the constitutional enjoinder against waste does not mean that the riparian owner must . . . clear all water-consuming native growth . . . ." Allen v. California Water & Tel. Co., 176 P.2d 8, 18 (Cal. 1946) (en banc). Through SLIPSHOD EXTENSION it has been used as an equivalent of admonition, as here: "[Bishop] is also reputed to have written that classical enjoinder, 'Hard cases make bad law.'" Horsley v. State, 374 So. 2d 375, 377 (Ala. 1979) (Beatty, J., dissenting).

Enjoinment, labeled archaic in W3 and missing from W2, is recorded in the OED from the 17th century in the sense "the action of enjoining." Today this word might almost be considered common in law; certainly, in denoting the action itself rather than the result of the action (an injunction), it is useful. E.g., "[I]t in and of itself constitutes a sufficient basis for the enjoinment of defendant's continued picketing." Baldwin v. Arizona Flame Restaurant, 313 P.2d 759, 765 (Ariz. 1957).

In the following sentence, enjoinder is used where enjoinment would be more apt: "The trial court's restraint and enjoinder [read enjoinment] of defendants from interfering in the liquidation is mooted and reversed by virtue of our ruling." Heard v. Carter, 285 S.E.2d 246, 249 (Ga. Ct. App. 1981).

enjoy is frequently used in legal writing in the sense "to have, possess." E.g., "This covenant ensures that the tenant shall enjoy the possession of the premises in peace and without disturbance by hostile claimants." The word fails, however, in reference to having or possessing something undesirable, as in "He enjoys failing health," labeled a catachrestic use by the OED. (That sentence actually looks more jocular than catachrestic.) Occasionally a clever writer recognizes the ironic possibilities of the word: "With a couple of rare exceptions, required by the Constitution, the Justices for the past thirty years have enjoyed—and the verb is accurate—the power to refuse to enjoyment (= the exercise of a right) occurs now only in legal contexts. E.g., "The right of enjoyment implies rights of user, and of acquiring the fruits or increase of the thing, as timber, the young of cattle, or soil added to an estate by alluvion." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 210 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937)./ "[A] man has no right of light for his windows unless such a right has been acquired by grant or by long enjoyment . . . ." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 144 (D.C.M. Yardley 9th ed., 1984).

enlarge has figurative senses (extend or broaden) in legal writing that it lacks in other contexts. Thus it is used of abstractions like powers and even time. In references to powers, rights, and the like, the metaphor conveyed by enlarge is entirely natural—e.g.: "The enlarged property right that the legislature intended to confer is only an expectant interest dependent upon the contingency that the property to which the interest attaches becomes part of a decedent's estate."/ "An agent cannot enlarge or qualify the testator's express instructions even when acting bona fide." (Eng.)

But in references to time, extend is preferable to enlarge, which strikes most nonlawyers as unidiomatic—e.g.: "We hold that the enlarged [read extended] visitation time would be in the best interest of the child."

enlargement, in the legal idiom, often means "extension." E.g., "The company had filed a request with this Court for a thirty-day enlargement of time in which to file an appellate brief." See enlarge.

Enoc(h) Arden law. This phrase contains one of the few LITERARY ALLUSIONS that have given names to legal doctrines. "Enoch Arden," a poem by Tennyson, tells the story of a man who, lost at sea for many years, returns home to find his wife married happily to his former rival for her affections; broken-hearted, he resolves that they shall not know of his return until after his death. Thus Enoch Arden law = a statute providing for divorce or exempting from liability a person who remarries when his or her spouse has been absent without explanation for a specified number of years, usu. seven. The term first appeared in American caselaw in the 1920s—e.g.: "The 'Enoch Arden law,' so-called . . . , is an anomaly in the legislative history of the State, and a strict compliance with its terms is required before such extraordinary relief may be granted." Frankish v. Frankish, 200 N.Y.S. 667, 668 (App. Div. 1923) (quoting the uncited opinion of Schubert v. Schubert).

enormity; enormousness. The historical DIFFERENTIATION between these words should not be muddled. Enormousness = hugeness, vastness. Enormity = outrageousness, ghastliness, hideousness. For example, on 10 July 1989, President Bush was buoyed and cheered by what he called "the enormity of this moment," which he said presented a historic challenge to reform the Polish economy.

Plucknett typifies the careful writer's usage: "The plaintiff has been beaten, wounded, chained, imprisoned, starved, carried away to a foreign country, and has suffered many 'enormities.'" Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 465 (5th ed. 1956).

But misuse of enormity is all too frequent: "Third, if by chance the jury had discovered the penalty sections of appellant's pleadings, these too were relevant to offset appellant's argument about the enormity of the excess charge." (In this sentence the writer no doubt intended to refer to the magnitude [enormousness] of the excess, not its wickedness [enormity].)/ "The enormity [read enormousness] of the problem was indicated by Congress's extended hearings." (The correction assumes that the writer intended to refer to the extent of the problem, rather than to its moral implications, an assumption borne out by the context from which the quotation was pulled.)

enounce. See announce.

enquire. See inquire.

enquiry is the regular British form for the word equivalent to question; inquiry, in BrE, means "an official investigation." In AmE, inquiry serves in both senses. See ENen re is downright wrong for in re, but it has occurred in otherwise good prose. See in re.

enrichment. See impoverishment & unjust enrichment.

enroll. See engross.

enrollee. See -EE.

enrol(l)ment (= the official registration of a document) is spelled -ll- in AmE and -l- in BrE. See engross.

en route. Two words. The en is best pronounced like "on," an approximation of the French pronunciation; /en/ is acceptable, but /in/ should be avoided.

This term is now voguish in figurative senses: "En route to its conclusion, the court rejected the defendant's argument that under the now-repealed Youth Corrections Act, any probation imposed upon a defendant eligible for YCA treatment had to be imposed under the Act rather than under the adult probation provision."

In route is a solecism: "Since the truck was departing from Florida in route [read en route] to New Orleans on November 12, appellant required that appellee's products be in Miami in time to be loaded on appellant's truck."

ensample is an ARCHAISM for example.

ensue; insue. The former spelling is standard. E.g., "This was an assault, although no harm ensued to the plaintiff."/ "If the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act that is actionable if injury ensues from it."

ensurance. See assurance.

ensure. See assure.

entail, n. & v.t. The transitive verb entail – (1) (in general usage) to make necessary, to involve; or (2) (in legal usage) to provide that an estate may pass only to the grantee and the heirs of his body, so that none of the heirs can give it away or sell it. Specifically, an entailed interest is an equitable interest in land under which ownership is limited to a person and the heirs of his body (either generally or those of a specified class) (CDL). E.g., "A devise followed by a direction that the property should be 'closely entailed' was cut down to a tenancy for life, remainder to the issue." (Eng.) See disentail.

In addition to sense (2) of the verb, the general nonlegal sense often appears in legal writing: "An unprivileged falsehood need not entail universal hatred to constitute a cause of action."/ "The district court's analysis did not entail sufficient scrutiny of the particular negligent acts that were found to have been committed."

There are two noun forms. The noun entail (= a fee limited to the grantee's issue or a class of his issue) corresponds only to sense (2) of the verb. E.g., "Johnson spoke well of entails, to preserve lines of men whom mankind are accustomed to reverence." (Eng.) (See fee tail (A).) The noun entailment corresponds to sense (1) of the verb.

enter for enter into. Idiomatically speaking, one enters into a contract with another; one does not merely enter a contract. E.g., "It was the intent of appellant and appellee at the time the contract was entered [read entered into] that appellant was obligated to provide insurance necessary to cover its indemnity obligations."/ "At the time the contract is entered [read entered into], the agreed-upon payment must be a reasonable forecast of just compensation for the harm that would be caused by a breach." Even so, to enter into a contract with is usually prolix for to contract with. See enter in.

enter in is a REDUNDANCY for enter. E.g., "With his presently appealed claims to tens of millions of dollars in punitive damages against defendants enjoying immunity to all such claims, to attorneys' fees when he at all times acted pro se, and the like, we stand at the gate of the realms of fantasy; we decline to enter in [read enter]."/ "Defendant's agents entered into Texas [read entered Texas] on several occasions for the purpose of financing the constitution." On an idiomatic use of enter into in law, see enter.

entering judgment. See rendition of judgment.

enter into. See enter & enter in.

entertain = to give judicial consideration to. E.g., "Under Pennhurst II, the court below had no power to entertain Kitchens's contract claim regardless of the existence or fate of her other causes of action."/ "The court held that since Hanzl's payments were voluntary and received innocently by the defendants, there was no jurisdiction to entertain the suit."

enthral(l); inthral(l). The spelling enthrall is standard in the U.S., enthral in G.B. The in- spellings are to be avoided.

enthuse is a widely criticized BACK-FORMATION avoided by writers and speakers who care about their language. E.g., "He enthused [read stated enthusiastically, or perhaps gushed] that she was remarkable shortly after meeting her." Enthused, adj., is always inferior to enthusiastic.

entitled to, is. See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (G).

entirety; entireties. See tenancy by the entireties.

entrance; entry. Both entrance and entry may refer to the act of entering. In reference to structures, entrance connotes a single opening, such as a door, whereas entranceway and entry suggest a longer means of access, as a corridor or vestibule.

entrapment. As several writers on criminal law acknowledge, this term is an inaccurate one—but it is so well established that it is unlikely to be changed. The problem is that entrap connotes merely setting a trap, and doing so is not just legal but desirable in bringing to justice those bent on crime, as long as the trap-setter does not instigate the crime. But, confusingly, the legal term entrapment denotes what occurs when officers themselves instigate the crime.

entrust, not intrust, is now the usual and preferred spelling. The latter is often seen in legal opinions of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. See EN-.

entry. See entrance.

entry of judgment. See rendition of judgment.

enumerable; innumerable. Though close in pronunciation, these words have opposite meanings. Innumerable = unable to be counted. Enumerable = countable. The words should be pronounced distinctly, lest those listening misunderstand.

ENUMERATIONS. A. *First(ly), second(ly), third(ly); one, two, three. The best method of enumerating items is the straightforward first, second, and third. The forms firstly, secondly, and thirdly have an unnecessary syllable, and one, two, and three seem especially informal. E.g, "This leaves but two possible effects of the service mark's continued use: One [read First], no one will know what CONAN means. Two [read Second], those who are familiar with the plaintiff's property will continue to associate CONAN with THE BARBARIAN." See firstly.

B. Comma Before the Last Member. "How to punctuate . . . enumerations," wrote Follett, "is argued with more heat than is called forth by any other rhetorical problem except the split infinitive." Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 397–98 (1966). Fashions in public-school textbooks and journalists' manuals come and go, but only one method is ironclad in avoiding unnecessary ambiguities: inserting a comma before the final member. Thus a, b, and c rather than a, b and c. The problems arise with members containing two or more items, as a and b, c and d, e and f, and g and h. The last two members are muddled if the comma is omitted. See PUNCTUATION (C)(2).

C. Bullets. See DOCUMENT DESIGN (G).

D. As a Method for Enhancing Readability. See PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

enunciate (= to state publicly) is often used of judicial pronouncements, especially where legal doctrines are concerned. E.g., "The validity of petitioner's larceny conviction must be judged not by the watered-down standard enunciated in Palko, but under this court's interpretations of the Fifth Amendment double-jeopardy provision."/ "We approve of the majority rule as enunciated in the cases appearing in the note quoted above." See announce.

enure. See inure.

envelop is the verb ("to wrap or cover"), envelope the noun ("wrapper, covering").

en ventre sa mere (= in utero) is an unnecessary LEGALISM. Instead of child en ventre sa mere, write fetus, unborn child, or child in the mother's womb. E.g., "[A] life in being includes a person en ventre sa mere [read child in the mother's womb] at the time when the will or settlement takes effect." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 41 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). Cf. venter.

enviable; envious. That which is enviable is worthy of envy or arouses envy. A person who is envious suffers from envy. Envious usually takes the preposition of <she was envious of her sister's success>, but may take also against or at. See jealousy.

Some writers confuse the two words—e.g.: "Mr. Strauss's financial disclosure statement . . . details what is already widely known. the 72-year-old lawyer is a power broker of abundant wealth and envious [read enviable] political and corporate connections." Stephen Labaton, Strauss to Forgo $4 Million in Pay to Take Moscow Post, N.Y. Times, 13 July 1991, at 3.

envisage; envision. The former has been used since the early 19th century, whereas the latter was born in the early 20th century. Today envision is more common in the U.S., envisage being somewhat literary. Both mean "to visualize," but there is perhaps an incipient DIFFERENTIATION under way. As suggested by W10, envision means "to picture to oneself," whereas envisage means "to contemplate or view in a certain way." Thus: "We conclude that orders denying appointment of counsel to litigants who cannot afford counsel fall into the class of order envisaged by Cohen."/ "Who is it that is envisaged by the instrument as an object of the possible bounty of the bank?" (Eng.)/ "The constructive trust as envisaged by the court in Elliott is a hybrid remedy."/ "In some of the older authorities it seems to have been envisaged that there were only two possible outcomes—either the transaction was void or it was valid." (Eng.)

Envisage seems more appropriate when inanimate objects are the subject; hence envision, which denotes a more human process, seems inapposite in this sentence: "The UCC clearly envisions [read envisages] that a contract came into being under the facts of this case." Yet it seems quite defensible here: "But there is no doubt that the Senate envisioned no role for the states on Indian lands."

envy. See jealousy & enviable.

eo instante; eo instanti. The dilemma in spelling is best resolved by writing at the very instant, instantly, or immediately. E.g., "To avoid the rule that a dead man could not be a felon, a suicide was to be counted a felon eo instante [read at the instant] he killed himself."/ "When the contract is made, the existing, binding law, whatever it may be, being the obligation on promisor to perform his undertaking, eo instanti, attaches [read attaches immediately]."/ "The judgment of the appellee attached eo instante [read instantly] on the intestate's death."

epic. See epochal.

epidemic; endemic. A disease is epidemic that breaks out and rages in a community, only to subside some time afterward. A disease is endemic that is constantly with a certain population or region.

epilog(ue). The longer spelling is customary and preferred. Cf. prolog(ue).

epithet; expletive. Epithet = (1) an especially apt adjective, whether the quality described is favorable or unfavorable; or (2) an abusive term. Sense (2) is slowly driving out sense (1), a trend to be fought against. Expletive = (1) an interjectory word or expression (esp. a profane one); (2) in grammar, a dummy word that fills the syntactic position of another (most commonly it or there), as in It is difficult to describe how . . . or There are three . . . . See EXPLETIVES.

epoch = (1) a date of an occurrence that starts things going under new conditions; or (2) "a period of history." Some stylists object to sense (2) as an example of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, but that extension occurred in the 17th century, and the best writers today use the word in that sense: "Some historians have said that a meaningful history of humankind could be written around epochs, with each epoch having its own pervasive characteristics, and that the pervasive characteristic of the age in which we live is technological change." (Page Keeton) epochal; epic(al). The former means "marking an epoch, or a new period in chronology." The word should not be used lightly. "Five devastating epochal floods have visited the valley since the establishment of the commission." (Only if the writer intended to convey that five epochs had passed since the establishment of the commission—an unlikely meaning—would epochal have been correct.)

Epical is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the adjective epic, meaning (1) "of or relating to an epic [= a long heroic narrative]," or (2) "surpassing what is ordinary or usual."

equable. See equitable.

equally. This word should not be used with both, as it is here: "Both magistracies [read "The two magistrates] are equally independent in the sphere of action assigned to handing down sentences of fine and imprisonment." Both . . . equally is redundant. See equally as (C).

equally as is almost always incorrect. The exceptions are noted under (E).

A. Equally as . . . as. This phrasing is incorrect for as much . . . as or as . . . as. E.g., "The evidence is insufficient where it merely establishes that it is equally as [omit equally] probable that the requisite connection between the injury and the employment exists as that such connection does not exist."

B. As equally as. This is a variant of the usual blunder illustrated under (A). "To hold otherwise would be to succumb to a nominalism and a rigid trial scenario as equally [omit equally] at variance as ambush with the spirit of our rules."

C. Both . . . equally as. This is a double REDUNDANCY. "Both appeals are equally as frivolous."

[Read The appeals are equally frivolous.] See equally.

D. Inversion. The phrase is sometimes inverted and rendered as equally after NEGATIVES; still it is wrong. "No valid reason is apparent why the aforesaid categories are not as equally [read not equally] applicable to convictions for crimes in other states." See INVERSIONS, GRAMMATICAL.

E. Permissible Uses. If the words equally as simply appear together, but are really parts of other constructions, all is well—e.g.: "I love you equally as a nephew and as a friend."/ "If the deceased, in his lifetime, has done anything that would operate as a bar to recovery by him of damages for the personal injury, this will operate equally as a bar in an action by his personal representatives after his death."

equate takes the preposition with, not to.

equitable; equable. Equable = even; tranquil; level. Equitable derives from equity, q.v., and has associations of justice and fairness, or of that which can be sustained in a court of equity. To nonlawyers it generally means "fair," whereas to lawyers it may mean "fair" but just as often means "in equity" <equitable jurisdiction> <equitable remedies>.

Even though law and equity have been merged into unified courts in most American jurisdictions, we continue to speak of equitable rights, titles, and remedies, because they had their origins in equity. Such distinctions are useful, and they give parity to legal and equitable rights: after all, "[n]o one suggests that legal rights be called 'equitable' merely because they have been merged with equity." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 98 (1930).

equitable estoppel. See estoppel (B).

equity is a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD whose senses have never before been adequately broken down. The primary dichotomy is between sense (1), the popular sense, and sense (4), the lawyer's usual sense. When, under sense (4), lawyers contrast law with equity, they are contrasting the common law with equity; the reader or listener must remember that equity is law. The word has more than a dozen senses, including subsenses:

1. a. In ordinary language, the quality of being equal or fair; fairness, impartiality; even-handed dealing—e.g.: "In ordinary parlance equity is an abstract term, connoting natural justice." Wilbur Larremore, Continental Regulation of Contempt of Court, 13 Harv. L. Rev. 615, 621 (1900). b. What is fair and right in a given instance; something that is fair and right—e.g.: "The essence of equity is the power to do equity. It is a blend of what is fair and what is just." In re Gloria Mfg. Corp., 65 B.R. 341, 347 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1985). c. Equal or impartial treatment of parties with conflicting claims—e.g.: "[Equity de]notes equal and impartial justice as between two persons whose rights or claims are in conflict." Demers v. Gerety, 595 P.2d 387, 395–96 (N.M. Ct. App. 1978).
2. The body of principles constituting what is fair and right; natural law—e.g.: "The term equity may also be used in a wider sense to cover the whole of the field of natural justice, i.e., good conscience." Cenydd I. Howells, Equity in a Nutshell 1 (1966).
3. a. The recourse to principles of justice to correct or supplement the law as applied to particular circumstances—e.g.: "The qualities of mercy and practicality have made equity the instrument for nice adjustment and reconciliation between the public interest and private needs as well as between competing private claims." Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U.S. 321, 329–30 (1944). b. The construing of a law according to its reason and spirit—e.g.: "'Equitie' is a construction made by the judges that cases out of the letter of a statute, yet being within the same mischief or cause of the making of the same, shall be within the same remedy that the statute provideth." Coke, Institutes, Bk. 1, 24b (1628).
4. a. The system of law or body of principles originating in the English Court of Chancery and superseding the common and statute law (together called "law" in the narrower sense) when the two conflict—e.g.: "[E]quity [is] in essence, a system of doctrines and procedures which developed side by side with the common law and statute law." L.B. Curzon, Equity 4 (1967). b. Any system of law or body of principles analogous to Anglo-American equity, such as the praetorian law of the Romans—e.g.: "Equity, meaning any body of rules existing by the side of the original civil law, founded on distinct principles and claiming incidentally to supersede the civil law in virtue of a superior sanctity inherent in those principles." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law ii (1861; repr. 1870).
5. a. An equitable right or interest, i.e., one recognizable by a court of equity. Often pl. E.g., "Often, however, the term 'balance of equities' is used to denote only a balancing of private and public interests." Zygmunt J.B. Plater, Statutory Violations and Equitable Discretion, 70 Cal. L. Rev. 524, 535 (1982). b. The ownership interest of shareholders in a corporation—e.g.: "She now has equity in the professional corporation." c. A speculative right or interest in property—e.g.: "[P]rofits realized from the purchase and sale . . . of an equity security within a period of less than 6 months are recoverable by the corporation." Chenery Corp. v. SEC, 128 F.2d 303, 308 (D.C. Cir. 1942).

6. The right to relief in a court of equity, or the reasons for deserving such relief; equitable merit—e.g.: "Where there is equal equity in two contending parties, it is always an unpleasant task to decide between them." Graff v. Smith's Adm'rs, 1 U.S. (1 Dall.) 481, 484 (Pa. Common Pleas 1789).
7. A matter that can or must be decided in a court of equity. Usu. in phr. equity reserved—e.g.: "[U]pon the equity reserved under and by the said interlocutory order, it is further ordered, decreed and adjudged, that the injunction heretofore granted in this cause be . . . perpetuated." U.S. v. Nourse, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 470, 484 (1832).
8. The meaning, intent, or general purpose (of a statute)—e.g.: "These cases thus out of the letter, are said to be within the Equity of an Act of Parliament." 3 William Blackstone, Commentaries *431 (1765)./ "'[W]ithin the equity,' means the same thing as 'within the mischief' of the statute." Shuttleworth v. Le Fleming, 19 C.B.N.S. 703 (1865). Today, this sense is said to "have disappeared as a term of art or as an element of our [modern] jurisprudence." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 456 (7th ed. 1964).
9. An equitable remedy—e.g.: "Nor is there any equity against the Plaintiff in error." Clarke v. Russel, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 415, 421 (1799)./ "A remedy in a court of equity is frequently called an equity." Harrison v. Craddock, 178 S.W.2d 296, 301 (Tex. Civ. App.—Galveston 1944).
10. Civ. law. Where positive law is absent or ambiguous, the method of deciding cases by natural law or the inferred intent of the legislature—e.g.: "[E]quity in the sense that writers in Continental Europe and Latin and Scandinavian countries use it in observing that ideas of equity are the basis of law and are consequently supplementary law." Vilhelm Lundstedt, 25 Tul. L. Rev. 59, 59 (1950)./ "[T]he equity of the statute . . . seems to be a continental notion . . . . When the courts spoke of the equity of a statute they meant only that adjustment of detail which is necessary when applying a general rule to a specific case." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 334–35 (5th ed. 1956).
11. The right to decide matters in equity; equity jurisdiction; equitable power—e.g.: "[Equity] describes the power belonging to the judge—a power which must . . . be exercised according to his own standard of right." John N. Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence § 45, at 46 (1881; repr. 1892).
12. a. The amount by which the value of a property or an interest in property exceeds secured claims or liens—e.g.: "'[E]quity' . . . is the value, above all secured claims against the property, that can be realized from the sale of the property for the benefit of the unsecured creditors." In re Mellor, 734 F.2d 1396, 1400 n.2 (9th Cir. 1984). b. In accounting, the paid-in capital plus retained earnings.
13. A share in a public company quoted on the stock exhange. E.g., "On the other hand, investment in shares of public companies quoted on the Stock Exchange ('equities') introduced the risk of dependence upon the fortunes of the company selected . . . . Investment in equities involved risk." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 86 (D.C.M. Yardley 9th ed. 1984).

The term is used in several phrases. A countervailing equity is an equitable right or interest that clashes with another. A latent equity is an equitable claim that has been concealed from one or more interested parties. (The phrase secret equity is synonymous with latent equity.) A natural equity is that which a conscientious person would consider fair or just in the absence of legal guidance. A perfect equity is the interest that a buyer of real estate has after fulfilling all obligations in the purchase, but before receiving the deed. See chancery.

equity abhors a forfeiture; the law abhors a forfeiture. The first is the traditional (and correct) maxim. The second has arisen only since the merger of law and equity—e.g.: "The law abhors forfeiture unless it is plainly intended by the legislature." E.H. Crump Co. v. Millar, 391 S.E.2d 775, 778–79 (Ga. Ct. App. 1990).

EQUITY PLEADINGS. There were seven distinct forms of pleadings in equity:

- The bill (or information).
- The demurrer.
- The plea.
- The answer.

- The cross-bill.
- The disclaimer.
- The replication.

See COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS & WORLD COURT PLEADINGS.

-ER. A. And -or. These agent-noun suffixes can be especially vexatious to the legal writer. The historical tendency in the law has been to make the Latinate -or the correlative of -ee (q.v.), hence indemnitee / indemnitor, obligee / obligor, transferee / transferor, offeree / offeror, donee / donor. Often, however, the choice of suffix seems based on caprice. In the famous contracts case Household Fire & Carriage Accident Ins. Co. v. Grant, [1879] 4 Ex.D. 216 (C.A.), Lord Justice Thesiger used the spellings acceptor and offerer, whereas the modern trend is to write accepter and offeror in legal contexts.

Attempts to confine -er to words of Anglo-Saxon origin and -or to those of Latin origin are fruitless because so many exceptions exist on both sides of the aisle. Nevertheless, it may fairly be said that Latinate words usually take -or, though there are many exceptions—a few of which appear below in the -er column:

-er	-or
adapter	abductor
conjurer	abettor
corrupter	collector
digester	corrector
dispenser	distributor
eraser	ejector
idolater	impostor
indorser	purveyor
promoter	surveyor

Sometimes there is a distinction in meaning between variant forms of the same word with these two suffixes, as with bargainer and bargainor, q.v., or latent distinctions, as with bailer and bailor, q.v.

B. Suffix -er Misleadingly Suggesting Agent Noun in Law Words. In many legal words, the suffix -er might seem to signal an agent noun when actually it denotes some nonhuman object or abstract idea. The result, for the less-than-alert legal reader, is a MISCUE. Most such words are LAW FRENCH infinitives that came into use as English nouns invested with technical legal meanings. Among the most common examples are these:

cesser = (1) the neglect to do something; or (2) the premature ending of a term (as of an estate). See cesser.

demurrer = a defending party's pleading alleging that, even if the complaining party's allegations are true, there is no reason why the case should proceed further. See demurrer.

descender = hereditary succession.

detainer = detention; the action of keeping a person against his or her will, or of keeping property from its owner.

disclaimer = a disavowal or renunciation.

impleader = a procedure by which a litigant brings a new party into the litigation because that party may be liable on a pending claim. See impleader.

interpleader = an equitable proceeding in which the court determines which of two or more rival claimants owns property in dispute—the property often being held by a neutral third party called a "stakeholder." See interpleader.

nonuser = neglect to use a right. Cf. user.

rebutter = in COMMON-LAW PLEADING, the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's surrejoinder. See rebutter.

rejoinder = in COMMON-LAW PLEADING, the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's reply or replication. See rejoinder.

repleader = a court's allowance of a party to plead anew when the original pleading failed to raise a material issue.

reverter = a reversionary interest that arises when a grant is limited so that it may come to an end. See reversion.

surrebutter = in COMMON-LAW PLEADING, the plaintiff's answer to the defendant's rebutter.

surrejoinder = a pleading by which a plaintiff answers to a defendant's rejoinder. See rejoinder.

user = the continued use, exercise, or enjoyment of a right. See user.

C. And -re. Words borrowed from French generally arrived in English with the -re spelling. Most such words have gradually made the transition to -er. A few words may be spelled only -re, such as acre, chancre, massacre, and mediocre, because of the preceding -c-. Still others—the great majority—have variant spellings, the -er ending usually being more common in AmE and the -re ending normal in BrE. The following words have variants subject to this distinction: accouter, -re; caliber, -re; center, -re; goiter, -re; liter, -re; louver, -re; luster, -re; maneuver, -re; meager, -re; meter, -re (in BrE, meter = the measuring device as well as the measure); miter, -re; niter, -re; reconnoiter, -re; scepter, -re; sepulcher, -re; somber, -re; specter, -re; theater, -re.

ergo, a slightly archaic equivalent of therefore, is occasionally useful for its succinctness. E.g., "The United States Supreme Court does not recognize the vicarious exclusionary rule; ergo, Daan cannot assert the illegality of Bryan's intention and the seizure of the marijuana cigarettes." But, because ergo is no longer a part of everyday language, its effective use depends almost entirely on the audience to whom it is directed.

Erie*-bound = (of a federal court in the U.S.) required to apply the holding in Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938). This term is frequently used by American federal courts, which must follow the teachings of Erie v. Tompkins: where federal laws are not involved, a federal court exercising diversity jurisdiction (and therefore applying state law) must follow the common law of the state in which it sits. Erie-bound is fast becoming a CLICHÉ, because the proposition is so well established that ordinarily there need be no invocation of Erie v. Tompkins every time a federal court applies state law. Following are two typical examples of use of the phrase: "In this diversity case, we are Erie-bound to follow the substantive law of Mississippi."/ "The result we think a Louisiana court would reach, and the one we are Erie-bound to follow in this diversity case, was reached by the district court." See CASE REFERENCES (C).

The Erie case has spawned some less-well-accepted NEOLOGISMS too, including a whimsical nonce-word originating in the Second Circuit: "My senior colleague Judge Learned Hand has a way of startling counsel in these 'erieantompkinated' days by saying, as they approach that inevitable citation: 'I don't suppose a civil appeal can now be argued to us without counsel sooner or later quoting large portions of Erie Railroad v. Tompkins.'" Charles E. Clark, State Law in the Federal Courts: The Brooding Omnipresence of Erie v. Tompkins, 55 Yale L.J. 267, 269 (1946).

ermine (the fur of a weasel-like animal) has come to be used figuratively with reference to the ermine in the official robes of judges in England. The word evokes rather grand notions of a judgeship. This use of the word occurs even in the U.S., where ermine is not used in judges' robes. E.g., "A judge loses none of his social instincts by assuming the ermine, and while his position is changed he is still a lawyer."/ "From such liability, the justice cannot hide behind his judicial ermine." Cf. woolsack.

erodible; erodable; erosible. The best form is erodible. See -ABLE (A).

err, one of the most commonly mispronounced words in legal contexts, should properly rhyme with purr. It is incorrect, from a strict point of view, to mouth it like air. See error (C).

errant = (1) traveling <knight errant>; (2) fallible, straying from what is proper. Sense (2) overwhelmingly predominates: "The February 14 order neither granted nor denied an order of any such character or effect; at best the court errantly issued an 'advisory opinion' over which it retained the power of revision."/ "Instead, the Supreme Court instructs, the proper recourse is an objection to the trial judge and prompt action from the bench in the form of corrective instructions to the jury, and when necessary, an admonition to the errant advocate."

Errant is properly used of persons or their actions; it is not synonymous with erroneous, as one writer apparently thought: "Appellant argues that the district court failed to consider the evidence urged as being 'newly discovered'; this errant [read erroneous] conclusion is based on a misinterpretation of the district court's opinion." See arrant.

errata. Like addenda and corrigenda, the plural form errata should be used only when one is listing more than one item. If there is only one, the heading should be erratum. The English plural erratums is not used. See corrigendum.

erroneous mistake is a REDUNDANCY. E.g., "the Magistrate further found that Plaintiff adequately pled the third element by alleging that it operated under an erroneous mistake [read a mistake] of fact . . . ." Captial Factors, Inc. v. Heller Fin., Inc., 712 F. Supp. 908, 915 (S.D. Fla. 1989).

erronious is an erroneous spelling of erroneous.

error, n. A. General Senses. Error = (1) a mistake of law in a court's judgment, opinion, or order; (2) an appeal; or (3) in Scots law, a mistaken belief by one or both parties about some matter of fact or law material to their bargain—i.e., as an equivalent of the Anglo-American legal term mistake. See mistake (B) & mutual mistake.

To illustrate sense (2), proceedings in error are not the same as erroneous proceedings, as a nonlawyer might think. In fact, the official name of the highest court in Connecticut is the Supreme Court of Errors. The report in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 317 (1819), contains the heading "Error to the Court of Appeals of the state of Maryland." This sense developed as an elliptical form of writ of error—e.g.: "There was a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals affirming a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error." See plaintiff in error & defendant in error.

B. For in error or erroneous. This use, though fairly old and increasingly common in AmE, should be avoided, for it wrongly makes error adjectival. E.g., "[I]t was error [read erroneous] to direct a verdict." Soule v. Bon Ami Co., 195 N.Y.S. 574, 577 (N.Y. Sup. 1922) (Rich & Kelly, JJ., dissenting)./ "Defendants argue that this instruction was error [read erroneous] because it allowed the jury to determine the admissibility of the hearsay statements of co-conspirators."/ "Hauser contends that this holding is error [read is in error], asserting that the defendant was not entitled to a reasonable time in which to place flares when the emergency was created by the defendant's negligence."

C. For err, v.i. This mistake commonly appears in appellate briefs. If we were inclined to be generous to the lawyers who err in this way, we might attribute the mistake to secretaries who misunderstand dictation. Yet the fault cannot rightly be laid on the secretaries. The court in Stolte v. Mack Fin. Corp., 457 S.W.2d 172, 174 (Tex. Civ. App.—Texarkana 1970), subtly highlighted this error in an advocate's brief in three successive points of error. Here is a typical misuse: "Justice Stevens . . . held that the district court errored [read erred] in granting retroactive relief in Manhart." Pamela S. Anderson, Gender-Based Determination of Retirement Benefits, 19 Tulsa L.J. 755, 762 (1984). Correctly pronouncing err, q.v., would reduce the frequency of this blunder.

error, writ of. See writ of error.

erstwhile; quondam; sometime; whilom. Each of these terms means "one-time, former, at a former time." By far the most common in AmE and BrE is erstwhile (called "literary" in the OED). The least common are quondam and (even rarer) whilom—e.g.: "Gerald Asher, the whilom wine merchant and distinguished wine writer, was in town recently to talk about . . . Chardonnay clones." Frank J. Prial, Wine Talk, N.Y. Times, 25 April 1990, at C11. The word sometime (q.v.), an invitation to a MISCUE, is often misused as if it meant "occasional, from time to time."

We need one of these words in English—probably erstwhile—because former and one-time do not always suffice. Our embarrassment of riches, with four synonyms for one sense, is exceeded only by most writers' embarrassment at having to use any one of them in addressing a less-than-learned audience.

escalate, in the sense "to increase in seriousness or intensity," is voguish. E.g., "The encounter with the suspect did not escalate into an arrest." See VOGUE WORDS.

escape. A. Legal Senses. In law, the word refers to an unlawful departure from legal custody without the use of force; it does not properly refer to a suspect's avoidance of capture.

In older writings, escape was the name of the offense committed by a law-enforcement officer (esp. a jailer) who somehow allowed a suspected criminal to escape, either through inadvertence or because he or she had been bribed. So a jailer convicted of escape was one who had been at fault in a prisoner's successful departure from custody. Two modern commentators note that this usage "seems inappropriate." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 560 (3d ed. 1982). To be sure, if one asked a group of lawyers (much less nonlawyers) just who had been guilty of escape, almost none today would point to the jailer.

B. Escape (from). As an intransitive verb construed with from or out of, escape means "to gain one's liberty by fleeing, to get free from detention or control" <he escaped from prison>. As a transitive verb taking a direct object, the verb means either (1) "to succeed in avoiding (something unwelcome)" <they escaped suspicion>, or (2) "to elude (observation, search, etc.)" <its significance had previously escaped me>.

escapee (= one who escapes) should more logically be escaper or escapist. (See -EE (A).) The OED suggests that escapee is waning in use and that escapist is emerging as the standard BrE agent noun. American writers seem to prefer escaper. As long as escapee is displaced, it might seem to matter little which alternative prevails. But escaper might be better for two reasons. First, escapist suggests Houdini, i.e., one who makes a living putting on "escapes" from difficult predicaments (also known as an escapologist); second, it has irrelevant figurative uses, as in escapist fiction (i.e., as the adjective corresponding to escapism).

One writer defines escapee as "one who has been caught after escaping, or while preparing to escape." Paul Tempest, Lag's Lexicon 75 (1950). Perhaps that is how a lag (= a convict sentenced to penal servitude) understands the term, but being caught is not really necessary to the definition. Most writers and speakers of English would find nothing wrong with saying, "The escapees were never caught"—they would merely find something wrong with the fact of their not being caught.

escheat may be both noun and verb. As the former, it means "the lapsing of land to the state (in G.B., to the Crown) upon the death of the intestate owner without heirs." A Law French word originally meaning "inheritance," it came to apply at common law to the lord's succession to a tenant's fief when the tenant died seised without heir. From the perceived unfairness of the system—once the lords had begun to abuse it—evolved the aphaeretic form cheat, q.v.

Escheat is used more commonly as a verb than as a noun in legal writing, as here: "The lands of a person convicted of petty treason . . . or felony escheated (i.e. reverted) to his lord." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 233 (2d ed. 1979). But the noun use is hardly uncommon—e.g.: "The court would be less concerned with the influencer's motive in a contest between him and the state claiming an escheat than it would be in a contest between him and the donor's surviving spouse." Escheatment and escheatage are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

Originally applied in feudal land law to instances of "failure of title" (when there was no titleholder), escheat has been extended—grossly some would say—in AmE. Since World War II, with the enactment of the Uniform Disposition of Unclaimed Property Act in various states—the act itself not using escheat—the word is now popularly used by nonlawyers as a verb referring to what happens to abandoned and unclaimed personal property. To the real-property purist, this usage, resulting from both SLIPSHOD EXTENSION and POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY, is irksome. Cf. bona vacantia.

eschew; eschewal, n. The second syllable of both words is pronounced just as the word chew is pronounced, /es-choo/. For some reason, many seem to believe that the esch- sequence in this term is pronounced esh-. It is not. The pronunciation with an esh- sound sounds like a sneeze.

escrow has three noun senses: (1) "a deed delivered but not to become operative until a future date or until some condition has been fulfilled"; (2) "a deposit held in trust or as security" <in escrow>; or (3) "an escrow holder." Sense (1) is the traditional one. Sense (2), labeled "a perversion" by Black's (4th ed.), was a 19th-century American coinage that is now current in both AmE and BrE. Sense (3), a result of HYPALLAGE, has brevity on its side but little else: it is likely to cause MISCUES.

The verb uses of escrow, recorded from 1916, are now common in American legal writing. As a verb, escrow means "to put into escrow [sense (2)]." E.g., "The cognizant officials of FDIC consented to the sale and to the escrowing of proceeds of sale with the rights of all claimants to follow those proceeds." In re Jeter, 48 B.R. 404, 409 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1985)./ "By escrowing the funds for the purpose of improving municipal services in the black community, the court took the first step toward ensuring that the unconstitutional disparities would be corrected rather than perpetuated." Today it is common in American real-estate law to speak of escrowing all types of documents—that is, holding them with the understanding that they will not be released until some condition is met. This use corresponds to sense (1) of the noun.

escrowee (= the depositary of an escrow) is a curious term, there being no correlative agent noun in -er or -or. Recorded in W3 but ignored in the OED, the term is not uncommon in modern AmE. E.g., "[T]he assignment from Avon to the escrowees was recorded in the Patent and Trademark Office." Haymaker Sports, Inc. v. Turian, 581 F.2d 257, 262 (C.C.P.A. 1978) (Baldwin, J., dissenting). Even so, the phrases escrow holder or escrow agent—both being precise equivalents—are more widely understandable.

eslisor. See elisor.

esoterics is, strictly speaking, incorrect for esoterica. But it is almost as common in AmE, and, in some plain-spoken contexts, esoterics sounds natural where esoterica would seem precious—e.g.: "The same easy strength is there, and the same earthy approach to the esoterics of law." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 331 (1955). Cf. empirics.

especial; special. Traditionally speaking, especial (= distinctive, significant, peculiar) is the opposite of ordinary. E.g., "The public press is entitled to peculiar indulgence and has especial rights and privileges." Special (= specific, particular) is the opposite of general <the jury answered special issues>, though increasingly it has ousted especial from its rightful territory.

Especial is so rarely used in AmE today—even in learned and legal prose—that some might term it obsolescent. But it does occasionally appear, most often modifying a noun made from an adjective; that is, a writer who might otherwise refer to something that is especially harsh would refer to its especial harshness, as in this BrE example: "Conduct of the type last named with regard to goods constitutes the tort of conversion, which bears with especial harshness on one who has, in all good faith, bought goods from one who had no title to them." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 132 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

In the following sentence, especial is wrongly used for special, used in contrast to general: "Positive laws either contain general principles embodied in the rules of law or for especial [read special] reasons they establish something that differs from those general principles."

espouse = (1) to marry or give in marriage; or (2) to adopt or support (as a doctrine or cause). Sense (1), the literal sense, is rarely seen today even in legal writing, but it does occur: "She was accused afterward of being depressed because she had discovered that there were thirty other persons whom she could not legally espouse even if they did ask her."

Espouse in sense (2) is often misused. In the following sentence, it is used as if it were synonymous with endorse (applied to persons as well as things): "In defeating plaintiff, we do not decry him, nor do we espouse [read endorse] his adversary." And here it is incorrectly used for expound or set forth: "Having espoused [read expounded] our view of the intent of Congress, we are nonetheless bound by the prior decisions of this circuit." (The court obviously did not espouse a view if it could not follow it.)

The proper use of the word in sense (2) appears here: "Some people see in the conduct of lawsuits something more than mere forensic battles waged by paid champions ready to espouse either side of an argument."

Esq., in AmE, "is often used as a title signifying that the holder is a lawyer . . . ." R.D. Rotunda, Professional Responsibility 396 (2d ed. 1988). The mild honorific is used nowadays with the names of men and women alike; it is incorrect, however, to use this title with any other title, such as Mr. or Ms. In BrE, of course, esquire is used of any man thought to have the social status of a gentleman. See FORMS OF ADDRESS (F).

One law review has devoted several pages to an article on whether women attorneys should use esquire. See Richard B. Eaton, An Historical View of the Term Esquire as Used by Modern Women Attorneys, 80 W. Va. L. Rev. 209 (1978). As to the title and purpose of that article, however, it is worth noting that "Esq. is . . . not used on oneself, e.g. neither on a card (which bears Mr.) nor on a stamped-and-addressed envelope enclosed for a reply (which has merely A-B.X—or A.B.X.—without prefix)." Alan S.C. Ross, "U and Non-U: An Essay in Sociological Linguistics," in Noblesse Oblige (Nancy Mitford ed., 1956). But somehow, the idea has gotten out that Esq. is something you put after your own name—e.g.: "[T]hese [lawyers] assembled here are not ordinary litigators. Instead of appending a mere 'Esq.' after their names, they are 'Fact]'—Fellows of the American College of Trial Lawyers." David Margolick, At the Bar, N.Y. Times, 10 March 1989, at 23.

The real question in AmE is not whether women should append Esq. to their own names, but whether others should append it to women attorneys' names. The answer: this practice is perfectly acceptable and extremely common. Anyone who is bothered by this practice should pretend that Esq., when used after a woman's name, stands for esquiress (recorded in the OED from 1596). See SEXISM (C).

esse (= essence, essential nature) is a pedantic LATINISM. E.g., "This appeal forces us to acknowledge a lumbering, antediluvian concept that remains embedded in the judicial esse." Coastal (Bermuda) Ltd. v. E.W. Saybolt & Co., 761 F.2d 198, 200 (5th Cir. 1985). Cf. in esse* & *de bene esse.

essence, time is of the. See time is of the essence.

essoi(g)n, n. & v. Essoin /e-soin/ is the preferred spelling for both noun and verb; essoign is a variant spelling of the noun only. The word (meaning "an excuse for not appearing in court at the appointed time") is used only in BrE. E.g., "But one cannot wait for ever; that would be unfair to the other party; so a great deal of law is evolved as to the excuses for non-appearance, in technical language the essoins, that a man may proffer." F.W. Maitland, The Forms of Action at Common Law 20 (1909; A.H. Chaytor & W.J. Whittaker eds. 1971).

estate = (1) all that a person owns, including both heritable and movable property <she has a modest estate, even if one includes her stock>; (2) the degree, quantity, or nature of a person's rights in land <leasehold estate>; or (3) the land itself <the Biltmore estate>.

estate for years. See term of years.

estate planning, though now a commonplace phrase in American law, is an odd EUPHEMISM that may help lawyers avoid confronting their clients too starkly with the dread subject of dying. At least one writer has set his face against the phrase: "An occasional client . . . is probably justified when he calls his personal aggregation of material things an 'estate,' if he wants to call it that. But it is wildly inaccurate to represent that he or anyone else planned it, or that a mere lawyer is going to 'plan' it for him—whatever that means—now that he has it. What is being planned for is death and the fact that one's things go the way of one's mortal coil. 'Estate planning' is an evasive, fawning, pretentious phrase, and I propose to begin by refusing to be associated with it." Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 1 (2d ed. 1979). Shaffer and several other writers use property settlement instead of estate planning. Shaffer adds: "I regret . . . the connotation the phrase [property settlement] has taken from divorce practice." Id. at 2 n.1.

estimate, n.; estimation. A distinction should be observed. Estimate = an approximate calculation or judgment. Estimation = the process of approximately calculating or judging.

estop (= to stop, bar, hinder, or preclude) is now a legal term only. It may be construed either with an infinitive or with from [verb + -ing]. Thus: "The licensee of a trademark is estopped to deny the mark's validity."/ "The trust company is estopped from disputing the effect of the decree."

This verb may also be reflexive, in the sense "to be precluded by one's own previous act or declaration from doing or alleging something" (OED). E.g., "While the case ostensibly presents the question whether a common carrier by water may ever estop itself by inequitable conduct from exacting the full measure of the shipper's obligation to pay tariff charges, the true nature shows it to be something quite different." Here, again, the construction with from [verb + -ing] occurs.

estoppel. A. Spelling. The word estoppel (*es-top-al) is so spelled. The word is sometimes misspelled estoppal, as in Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1974, 2104 (1985), under agency by estoppal and authority by estoppal. For the difference between estoppel and waiver, see waiver (C).

B. Estoppel; estoppel by representation; estoppel in pais; equitable estoppel; promissory estoppel. Most broadly, estoppel denotes a bar that precludes a person from denying or contradicting something that he or she has said before or that has been legally established as true. Traditionally, the only real distinction between any of the terms listed above turns on whether the party's statement relates to a present fact or to future conduct.

Estoppel, estoppel by representation, and estoppel in pais all relate to a party's saying something about an existing matter of fact. The most usual term today is estoppel alone—a shorthand form of estoppel by representation.

Promissory estoppel and equitable estoppel both relate to a party's saying something about his or her intentions to do something in the future. The phrase promissory estoppel has "gradually won out over the term 'equitable estoppel,' which had been used with some frequency in the earlier cases." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 129 n.145 (1974).

Indeed, the term equitable estoppel is extraordinarily fuzzy and ought therefore to be avoided. G.H. Treitel criticizes an English decision that "somewhat puzzlingly seems to distinguish between 'promissory' and 'equitable' estoppel. Terminological difficulty is compounded by the occasional use of the phrase 'equitable estoppel' to refer to true estoppel by representation . . . ." The Law of Contract 109 (8th ed. 1991). See promissory estoppel.

estray is an ARCHAISM used in law for "stray animal." See waifs and (e)strays.

estrep(e)ment. The longer spelling of this word, which means "waste of land caused by a tenant," is more usual—e.g.: "[A] touchstone . . . is afforded by supposing an attempt at removal by the tenant and a writ of estrepement issued or bill in equity filed by the landlord to restrain the removal as the commitment of waste." In re Ameri- can Pile Fabrics Co., 12 F. Supp. 86, 88 (E.D. Pa. 1935).

et al. is most commonly the abbreviated form of the Latin phrase et alii (= and others), though it may also be the masculine singular (et alius), the feminine singular (et alia), or the feminine plural (et aliae). It is used only of persons, whereas etc. is used of things. American lawyers commonly write et al, et. al., or et. al—all of which are wrong.

The abbreviation does not fit comfortably alongside possessives: "Clifford T. Honicker's chilling account of Louis Slotin's, S. Allan Kline's et al. encounter [read and others' encounters] with the Nuclear Age is as horrific as it is emblematic . . . ." Letter of Glenn Alcalay, N.Y. Times, 10 Dec. 1989, § 6, at 14. Cf. etc.

etc. A French proverb states, "God save us from a lawyer's et cetera." The point is well taken. More than 400 years ago, John Florio wrote: "The heaviest thing that is, is one Etcetera." It is heaviest because it implies a quantity of things too numerous to mention. These are some of the most sensible words ever written on etc.:

> Every writer should be on his guard against the excessive use of etc. Instead of finishing a thought completely, it is easy to end with an etc., throwing the burden of finishing the thought upon the reader. If the thought is adequately expressed, etc. is not needed. If the thought is not adequately expressed, etc. will not take the place of that which has not been said. The use of etc. tends to become a slovenly habit, the corrective for which is to refrain from using etc. except in the dryest [read driest] and most documentary kind of writing.
> George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 229 (1927).

Lawyers should generally—in pleadings, for example—attempt to be as specific as possible rather than make use of this term. Still, it would be foolish to lay down an absolute proscription against using etc., for often one simply cannot practicably list all that should be listed in a given context. Hence, rather than convey to the reader that a list is seemingly complete when it is not, the writer might justifiably use etc. (always the abbreviation).

And etc. is an ignorant error, et being the Latin and. Etc. differs from et al. in that it refers to things and not to people. (See et al.) The -t- in the first syllable of etc. should never be pronounced as a -k-. On the use of etc. with e.g. and i.e., see e.g.

etched in stone. See stone, etched in.

-ETH. At its fringes, legal language retains a few words ending this way—e.g., deposeth, sayeth, and witnesseth. None is a TERM OF ART. None is even useful. Up to the 17th century, the -eth suffix was merely an alternate third-person singular inflection for an English verb; used primarily in southern England, it had, by the end of that century, become obsolete. She calls and he answers took the place of she calleth and he answereth.

Perversely, these obsolete forms continue to haunt legal contexts, never with happy results. When using words with this ending, lawyers have long been inconsistent in their approach; for example, a late 19th-century verification stated, "W.J. Bound . . . deposeth and says . . . ." Dorman v. Crozier, 14 Kan. 177, 177–78 (1875) (quoting a verification). Why not deposeth and sayeth?

More to the point, modern lawyers commonly mangle tenses when -eth crops up, often by thinking that -eth signifies a past tense: "E.W. Kelley, being first duly cautioned and sworn, deposeth and said that one Paul De Golyer . . . ." City of Cincinnati v. De Golyer, 270 N.E.2d 663, 664 (Ohio Ct. App. 1969). Modern lawyers also misuse witnesseth at the outset of a contract as if it were imperative instead of present-tense indicative. The careful legal writer junketh the ending. See doth, saith & witnesseth. See also hath & further affiant (A).

ethicist; ethician. Ethician is more than two centuries older—dating from the early 17th century—and is therefore given precedence in most English-language dictionaries. Even so, ethicist so overwhelmingly predominates in modern usage that ethician ought to be labeled a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "Ethicists and moral theologians offer a variety of explanations for the duty to keep promises . . . ." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 255 (1991).

ethics; ethos. The distinction escapes many writers, but it is plain. Ethics = the field of moral science. Bentham defined ethics as "the art of directing men's actions to the production of the greatest possible quantity of happiness, on the part of those whose interest is in view." Jeremy Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation 310 (1823; repr. 1948). The singular form ethic means "a set of moral principles."

Ethos = the characteristic spirit and beliefs of a community, people, system, or person. Here the nicety keenly appears: "We introduce here no new or radical ethic since our ethos has never given moral sanction to piracy." E.I. duPont deNemours & Co. v. Christopher, 431 F.2d 1012, 1016–17 (5th Cir. 1970).

etiology for cause is unnecessary and pompous. "What was the etiology [read cause] for his withdrawal from the position?" This use apparently stems from the medical use: "There are several diagnostic tests a physician may perform to determine the etiology of a painful back condition." Aetiology is the BrE spelling whereas aitiology is a secondary spelling to be avoided.

ETIOLOGY. See CAUSATION et seq. When citing a statute, it is better to give the reader an end point as well as a beginning one. Otherwise, the reader is left to conjecture just how many sections are encompassed in 29 U.S.C. §§ 621 et seq. Hence the phrase et seq. (short for et sequentes = the following ones) should be used sparingly if at all. The problem is exacerbated by the fact that et seq. serves also as the abbreviation for the singular et sequens (= and the following one), though presumably few users of the phrase know that.

-ETTE. See SEXISM (C).

et ux. See ux.

ETYMOLOGICAL AWARENESS is developed only by increased reading and a conscious sensitivity to words and their origins. Ignorance of etymologies can easily lead writers astray, as when a journalist gave the label holocaust (Gk. "burnt whole") to a flood. Following are sentences in which writers wandered into etymological bogs:

- "The right to exclude or to expel aliens in war or in peace is an inherent and inalienable right of every independent nation." (Here the root alien- causes problems, when we say a country has an inalienable right to exclude aliens.)
- "What we are concerned with here is the automobile and its peripatetic [= able to walk up and down, not just itinerant] character." (Automobiles can hardly be said to walk.)
- "This is a result which, if at all possible consonant [lit., "sounding together"] with sound judicial policy, should be avoided."

In the first and third specimens, a senseless repetition of the root sense occurs; in the second, the writer has insensitively abstracted and broadened a word still ineluctably tied to its root sense. Cf. VERBAL AWARENESS.

Euclidean; Euclidian. The -ean spelling is standard.

EUPHEMISMS are supposedly soft or unobjectionable terms substituted in place of harsh or objectionable ones. The purpose is to soften; the means is usually indirection. To discerning readers, of course, some euphemisms are objectionable because unnecessarily mealy-mouthed.

We euphemize if we say, not that someone is drunk, but inebriated or intoxicated; not that someone is a drug addict, but (much more vaguely) that the person is impaired; not that someone has died, but passed away; not that someone is mentally retarded, but exceptional or special.

In some contexts, to be sure, you might prefer a euphemism. If plain talk is going to provoke unnecessary controversy—if talk about illegitimate children or sodomy will divert attention from your point by offending people—then use an established euphemism.

Indeed, the phrase illegitimate children exemplifies the need sometimes to throw over old forms of expression. West Publishing Company's keynote system of indexing legal topics has gone from Bastards in the Eighth Decennial Digest (1966–76) to Illegitimate Children in the Ninth Decennial Digest (1976–81) to Children Out-of-Wedlock in the Federal Digest 3d (1985). Some legal writers use nonmarital children to convey the idea. The point, of course, is that we shouldn't scar innocent children with ugly epithets.

Other euphemisms, however, are roundabout and clumsy. Some writers use rodent operative or extermination engineer in place of ratcatcher. We see pregnancy termination rather than abortion; sexually ambidextrous rather than bisexual; armed reconnaissance rather than bombing; permanent layoff rather than firing. Whatever the unpleasant or socially awkward subject, there are several euphemisms available. In law, unnatural offense (or crime) against nature is not uncommon in place of homosexuality. Indeed, Arthur Leff gives abominable and detestable crime against nature as a "rather enthusiastic euphemism . . . found in many 19th-century (and some current) statutes, referring to a not fully specified range of sexual crimes." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1866 (1985). The problem that courts encounter—now more than in yesteryear—is deciding what constitutes a crime against nature and the like, and whether any criminal statute using such a phrase is so vague as to be unconstitutional. See David Abbott, Crimes Against Language and Nature, 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 149 (1992).

Euphemisms are often subtle. Thus incident appears in place of accident in a U.S. statute limiting total liability to $200 million for a single "nuclear incident," presumably because incident sounds vaguer and less alarmist. Today revenue enhancement (= tax increase) and investment (= increased government spending) are commonly used by American politicians who are reluctant to call things by their more understandable names.

In the mock-heroic style that was popular in the 19th century—and even up to a few decades ago—euphemisms were quite common. In the following sentence, for example, a judge uses an elaborate euphemism for the hymen: "[The statute] further says to the libertine, who would rob a virtuous maiden, under the age of 18 years, of the priceless and crowning jewel of maidenhood, that he does so at his peril." Bishop v. Liston, 199 N.W. 825, 827 (Neb. 1924).

Some subjects call out for euphemisms or circumlocutions. Explicitness or directness would be undesirable to almost everyone here: "Due process concerns were not offended when a prison inmate was subjected to an attempted digital rectal search, based upon a reliable informer's tip." (Advocate's description of U.S. v. Caldwell, 750 F.2d 341 (5th Cir. 1984)). Still, the final phrase might advantageously be changed, because tip verges on losing its metaphorical quality in that particular context. See digital.

In a sense, euphemisms are at war against logical accuracy and clarity. Indeed, they reflect basic human impulses that oppose logical accuracy and clarity: "There are . . . unpleasant truths from which we turn away our minds almost as instinctively as we cover our eyes or turn away our heads from too strong a light or from a horrible sight. And when we cannot but admit such truths, we do not like to speak of them except through euphemisms." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 14 (1961). Cohen calls this tendency "a fruitful source of legal fictions." Id. See FICTIONS euthanasia; mercy killing. These synonyms are widespread, the former perhaps being more connotatively neutral.

euthan(at)ize = to subject to euthanasia. If we must have such a word, the longer version might seem the better candidate because it is properly formed, strictly speaking, and is older, dating in the OED from 1873. But in modern legal writing, euthanize predominates to such an extent that it ought to be accepted as standard—e.g.: "[T]he Circuit Court of Monongalia County . . . reinstated the magistrate's order to euthanize appellant's dog." State v. Molisee, 378 S.E.2d 100, 100 (W. Va. 1989) (per curiam)./ "Dr. Ennulat told Ms. Lambiotte that the horse needed to be euthanized, and Ms. Lambiotte called her director . . . ." State v. Talley, 429 S.E.2d 604, 606 (N.C. Ct. App. 1993). See -IZE (A).

evacuee. See -EE (A).

evanescence is sometimes used incorrectly to mean "departure" or "disappearance." E.g., "Upon his aunt's evanescence [read departure], he continued to drive the mower, still in first gear."

Here the adjective evanescent is correctly used in the sense "tending to vanish away": "The evidence in Cupp, to be sure, was highly evanescent; but no less so is any evidence that an alerted suspect can dispose of if the police should wait to act until they have obtained a warrant."/ "Interests of beneficiaries of private express trusts run the gamut from valuable substantialities to evanescent hopes."

evangelical; evangelistic. Today the older term evangelical (fr. ca. 1531) is so closely tied with fundamentalist, proselytizing Christians that it should not be applied more generally. Evangelistic (fr. ca. 1845), though also redolent with Christian associations, may be used more broadly to mean "militantly zealous."

even date for the same date originated in commercialese but has infected lawyers' writing as well. The best practice is to name the date a second time or to write the same date. E.g., "The court did not rule on either the request for preliminary injunction or the motion to dismiss until January 30, 1984, at which time [read when] the court dismissed the case with prejudice for the reasons set forth in the court's memorandum and order of even date [read of the same date]."

event, in the. The AmE phrase is invariably in the event that [+ clause]—an equivalent of if. BrE generally favors in the event of [+ noun phrase] (usu. a BURIED VERB)—a locution that appears also in AmE, sometimes without the of. Either phrase is inferior to if. See in the event of & in the event that.

In BrE, in the event also means "in (the) result," a usage likely to result in a MISCUE for American readers—e.g.: "Allowing the appeal, the Court of Appeal stated that although the Swiss were sensitive about their banking secrecy laws by court order from other countries, that by itself would not be a ground for interfering with the order. However, in the event, although the documents might prove relevant at a later stage of the proceedings, that was an insufficient ground for upholding the judge's order . . . ." Bank of Crete v. Koskotas, Fin. Times, 31 May 1991, at 8.

The phrase in the eventuality is especially pretentious. E.g., "The statutes provide that, in that eventuality [read in that event], the named person shall be deemed to have died immediately after the testator."

eventuality is a needless pomposity for event. E.g., "Bobbitt would be amply protected from this eventuality [read event]." Hospital Consultants, Inc v. Potyka, 531 S.W.2d 657, 665 (Tex. Civ. App.—San Antonio 1975). See event, in the.

eventuate is "an elaborate journalistic word that can usually be replaced by a simpler word to advantage." George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 231 (1927). E.g., "It is quite plain that the Fourth Amendment governs 'seizures' of the person that do not eventuate [read result] in a trip to the station house and prosecution for the crime."/ "Their final argument is that their Fifth Amendment rights were not adequately protected by the grant of use immunity by the state court, since it would not protect them from use of their compelled testimony in a federal prosecution, should one eventuate [read ensue or occur]."/ "As a general proposition, one who executes a will believes that the testament covers all contingencies that might eventuate [read occur or happen]." (Note the INELEGANT VARIATION of will and testament in the final specimen.)

every. A. Every-: Singular or Plural? Today it is standard BrE to write, "Almost everybody now seems to be a 'victim' of something—of society or their own weaknesses." Susan Crosland, The Aftershock of Anger, Sunday Times, 22 Oct. 1989, at B2./ "[T]he compilation of the OED made it possible for everyone to have before them the historical shape and configuration of the language . . . ." Robert W. Burchfield, Unlocking the English Language 169 (1989).

But most Americans continue to think of this usage as slipshod, everybody requiring a singular; after all, they reason, nobody would say everybody think instead of everybody thinks. An early usage critic remarked insightfully (while disapproving): "[T]he use of this word is made difficult by the lack of a singular pronoun of dual sex . . . . Nevertheless, this is no warrant for the conjunction of every and them." Richard G. White, Every-Day English 420–21 (1884). Many Americans now take the same stand, thereby making a happy solution elusive. See CONCORD (B) & SEXISM (A).

B. Each and every. See each and every.

C. Every . . . not. This construction often results in an error in logic. Literally, every one is not means "none is." But rarely is that what the writer means—e.g.: "[E]very important case is not reported [Read Not every important case is reported . . . .], or at all events not reported in those places where we might reasonably expect to find it . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 374 (7th ed. 1964). Cf. all (B) & everyone . . . not.

every day, adv.; everyday, adj. One tries to accomplish something every day; but an everyday feat would hardly be worth accomplishing. The two are occasionally confused—e.g.: "But what of the phrase 'per stirpes,' symbolic here of the hundreds of Latin and law French words still used everyday [read every day] by fully modernized American lawyers whose penchant for foreign languages probably extends no further?" Richard Weisberg, When Lawyers Write 99 (1987).

"But if richness needs gifts with which everyone is not endowed [read not everyone is endowed], simplicity by no means comes by nature." W. Somerset Maugham, "Lucidity, Simplicity, Euphony," in The Summing Up 321, 322 (1938). Cf. all (B) & every (C).

everyone . . . them. See every (A), CONCORD & SEXISM (A) everyplace should be avoided as a vulgarism: everywhere is the proper word.

evict. Whether to lawyers or nonlawyers, this word generally means "to expel (a person, esp. a tenant) from land or a building, usu. by legal process." But in law it also means "to recover (property or title to property) from a person by legal process."

evidence, n. A. And testimony. These words overlap but are not always interchangeable. Testimony is a species of evidence; it refers only to evidence received through the medium of witnesses. Evidence, on the contrary, includes all means by which a fact in issue is established or disproved; thus, evidence may include documents and tangible objects. The word evidence has also long been used in the sense "the law of evidence." See James B. Thayer, Presumptions and the Law of Evidence, 3 Harv. L. Rev 141, 142 (1889).

B. And proof. Strictly speaking, the two words are not synonymous. Unlike evidence, the word proof should be applied "to the effect of the evidence, and not to the medium by which truth is established." 1 Simon Greenleaf, A Treatise on the Law of Evidence 3 (I.F. Redfield ed., 12th ed. 1866). See proof.

C. As a Count Noun. Evidence is not generally taken to be a count noun; hence the plural form is unusual at best. E.g., "Yet in spite of all these evidences of judicial humility in these areas, it would be an error to assume that the judiciary had lost self-confidence altogether as a result of its chastening experience in the 1930's." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 190 (1960). See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS (B).

D. Other Phrases. See forensic (last par.), give evidence & put on.

evidence, v.t.; evince. These words, which are lawyers' favorites, are often inferior to show or express or indicate. Properly, to evidence something is to be the proof, or to serve as evidence, of its existence or happening or truth. Here it is correctly used: "If the owner of an interest in land declares himself trustee of the interest for the benefit of another, the writing evidencing the trust may be signed by the declarant before, at the time of, or after the declaration."/ "Admittedly the distinction between acts evidencing a continuing conspiracy and acts constituting further agreements or fresh conspiracies is a fine one." (Eng.)

More often than not, however, it is used loosely for show, demonstrate, or express: "Texas asserts, without support, that the Bus Act evidences [read shows] an intent not to grant the ICC jurisdiction over intrastate charter operations and charges that the legislative history of the statute further evidences [read demonstrates] Congress's intent to provide for the preemption of intrastate regular-route transportation and not of intrastate charter transportation."/ "Even the majority opinion evidenced [read showed] a subtle but potentially powerful shift in the law."

Evince properly means "to show, exhibit, make manifest," but has been objected to as "a bad word and unnecessary . . . a favourite with callow journalists." Eric Partridge, Usage and Abusage 113 (rev. ed. 1973). It is greatly overworked in legal writing, as the cornucopia of specimens evinces: "The court in that opinion evinced even more reluctance to compare the worth of unequal jobs."/ "Although the testator may not have intended that Charles share as legatee or devisee under his will, he evinced no intention that he was to be excluded as next of kin, through operation of the laws of intestacy."/ "Had the petitioners challenged the underlying convictions and requested an opportunity to replead, the court stated, the cases would not have been moot; the court thus evinced a tendency to favor specific requests for relief in habeas petitions."/ "As in the 93d and 94th Congresses, at no time did the 95th Congress evince an intent to afford states reclamation authority on non-reservation Indian lands."

evidenciary is wrong for evidentiary. See evidentiary.

evidential. See evidentiary.

evidentiarily is the adverb corresponding to evidentiary, adj. It is often used—somewhat clumsily—as a SENTENCE ADVERB in the sense "in terms of evidence." E.g., "It turns out, however, that evidentiarily we do not now have such a case before us." McLaurin v. Columbia Mun. Separate Sch. Dist., 486 F.2d 1049, 1050 (5th Cir. 1973) (Coleman, J., concurring). See ADVERBS (B).

evidentiary; evidential. It would be convenient to pronounce evidential a NEEDLESS VARIANT and be done with it, but that (older) form seems to predominate in BrE (see OED & COD). Even so, the -ary form—a NEOLOGISM innovated by Jeremy Bentham—also appears in BrE. We might, however, brand evidential a NEEDLESS VARIANT in AmE, in which evidentiary far outstrips evidential in frequency of use. E.g., "There is a kind of evidential [read evidentiary] estoppel." Holly Hill Citrus Growers' Ass'n v. Holly Hill Fruit Prods., Inc., 75 F.2d 13, 17 (5th Cir. 1935)./ "If, therefore, the unaltered document is produced for inspection, the facts thus ascertained must, as regards the alleged contractual agreement, be purely evidential [read evidentiary] in character."

Still, evidential has been useful to some legal theorists, like Hohfeld, in meaning "furnishing evidence" as opposed to "of or relating to evidence" (the sense in which evidentiary predominates). If we could enhance this latent DIFFERENTIATION, the language of the law of evidence would be richer for it. Following are two examples from Wesley N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions (1919): "An evidential fact is one which, on being ascertained, affords some logical basis—not conclusive—for inferring some other fact."/ "The facts important in relation to a given jural transaction may be either operative facts or evidential facts."

eviscerate (= to disembowel) has become a VOGUE WORD among legal writers in its metaphorical applications. Because of its strong meaning, it is not to be used lightly. "Clearly eviscerating the Tenth Amendment's restrictions on the accretion of power by the United States Government, Garcia offered the conservative wing of the court an opportunity to express its displeasure at the majority's rejection of 'almost 200 years of the understanding of the constitutional status of federalism.'"

Here eviscerate approaches meaninglessness: "To permit any complainant to restart the limitations period by petitioning for review of a rule would eviscerate the congressional concern for finality embodied in time limitations on review." The metaphor of eviscerating does not work with a gossamer object like concern, even if it is said to be "embodied." Cf. emasculate.

evoke (= [1] to call forth; or [2] to bring to mind) is a near-MALAPROPISM when misused for invoke (= [1] to call upon; or [2] to cause). E.g., "If Rumbaugh is incompetent to waive his right to federal habeas review, his parents have standing to evoke [read invoke] a next-friend proceeding."

ex-, when meaning "former," should be hyphenated: "A bitter exemployee [read ex-employee] can do great harm . . . . [W]hen people feel they have been fired 'fairly' . . . they will be reluctant to bad-mouth their excompany [read ex-company]." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 199 (1984).

exact from sometimes signals a wordy construction—e.g.: "In the present case, however, the compelled production of the journal was exacted from defendant's attorneys [read the defendant's attorneys were compelled to produce the journal]." State v. Barrett, 401 N.W.2d 184, 191 (Iowa 1987). For the reasons why production should be made into the present infinitive of the verb produce, see BURIED VERBS exalt; exult. To exalt is to raise in rank, place in a high position, or extol. To exult is to rejoice exceedingly.

Exalt is rather frequently misspelled exhalt or exhault—e.g.: "The serjeant might perform military duties rather less exhalted [read exalted] than those of a knight . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 32 (1966)./ "It would be exhalting [read exalting] form over substance to require the Committee . . . to amend its complaint. . . ." Committee on Professional Ethics & Conduct v. Munger, 375 N.W.2d 248, 251 (Iowa 1985). For a similar misspelling, see exorbitant.

examination-in-chief. See direct examination.

example; exemplar; exemplum; exemplification. Example is the general term. Exemplar = an ideal or typical example. E.g., "The Court of Appeals found critical significance in the fact that the grand jury had summoned approximately 20 witnesses to furnish voice exemplars [i.e., typical specimens]." U.S. v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 12 (1973) (per Stewart, J.)./ "A testator of sound mind may prefer a prodigal son or even an unrepentant sinner to a son who has been an exemplar [i.e. an ideal example] and pattern of virtue." Exemplum, except in specialized literary senses, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of example. Exemplification – (1) (in law) an attested copy of a document <an exemplification is a copy of a record set out either under the Great Seal or under the Seal of the Court>; (2) the act or process of serving as an example <by way of exemplification>; or (3) a case in point.

example where is always inferior to example in which. See where (B). Cf. case where.

ex ante; ex post. These LATINISMS, which may act either as adverbs or as adjectives, are likely to confuse most readers. Ex ante – based on assumption and prediction; subjective; prospective. Ex post = based on knowledge and facts; objective; retrospective. In the following sentences, prospectively and retrospectively would lead to greater comprehensibility with no loss in the sense: "Judges should be aware that their decisions create incentives influencing conduct ex ante [read prospectively] and that attempts to divide the stakes fairly ex post [read retrospectively] will alter or reverse the signals that are desirable from an ex ante [read a prospective] point of view."/ "Attorneys general were generally effective in determining ex ante [read in predicting] the policy orientation of future judges." See ex post facto.

ex cathedra; ex officio. Ex cathedra = (1) (adv.) from the chair; with authority; (2) (adj.) authoritative. Following is a literal adverbial use: "In expressing this view, both in legal literature and ex cathedra, he was, in effect, reverting to the standpoint of Lord Mansfield, who regarded quasi-contract as being essentially an equitable institution." (Eng.) Increasingly today, ex cathedra has connotations of a peremptory attitude—e.g.: "The Attorney General's letter asserts ex ca- thedra and without citation of a single authority that . . . ." Peter Shane & Harold Bruff, The Law of Presidential Power 205 (1988).

Ex officio (= by virtue of one's office) may likewise be both adj. and adv. <the chair is an ex officio member of all standing committees> <the chair became a member ex officio>. Ex officiis is a NEEDLESS VARIANT Ex officio should be neither hyphenated nor spelled as one word.

exceed. See accede.

exceedingly is hyperbolic when used for quite or very. E.g., "Newspaper prices seldom change; the prices of chewing gum, flashlight batteries, and chloroform are exceedingly [read quite] stable."

excel. So spelled; excell is an infrequent misspelling.

except. A. As Verb. Except = (1) to exclude, omit <present company excepted>; (2) = to object, take exception <I except to that statement>. The latter is the more frequent legal meaning: "The court overruled the objection, and the defendants excepted." Sense (2) has given rise to the special legal sense of the word, "to appeal." E.g., "Verdict was for plaintiff in each action, and defendant excepts."

B. As Preposition and Conjunction. When except begins a noun phrase rather than a clause (i.e., a phrase with a verb), it is a simple preposition not followed by the relative pronoun that <all persons except farmers owning fewer than 500 acres>. But when, as a conjunction, except introduces a clause, it should be followed by that, which is here incorrectly omitted: "The corporate existence shall be deemed to have continued without interruption from the date of dissolution, except [read except that] the reinstatement shall have no effect upon any issue of personal liability of the directors."

C. As Conjunction. Except for unless is an ARCHAISM that persists only as a vulgarism. Here is the archaic use: "I devise this land to A and her heirs forever, except she should die without heir born of her own body." Will quoted in Roach v. Martin's Lessee, 1 Har. 548, 28 Am. Dec. 746 (1835). And here is the modern vulgarism: "Wheat produced on excess acreage may be neither disposed of nor used except upon payment of the penalty, or except [read unless] it is stored as required by the Act or delivered to the Secretary of Agriculture." See (E), (G), (H).

D. Excepting. This word should not be used as a substitute for except, except in the phrase not excepting. E.g., "The majority of the cases dealing with the problem, excepting [read except] two, have applied the ruling to the case which resulted in the abolition of the doctrine of sovereign immunity."/ "He further provided that the property should under no circumstances be sold or alienated or at any time devoted to any other purpose or use excepting as far as herein specifically authorized [read other purpose or use than is herein authorized]."

E. Except as. In DRAFTING, unless is preferable to except as when referring to a future action—e.g.: "Except as [read Unless] otherwise stipulated or directed by the court . . . ." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(2)(B).

Except as may be appropriate when referring to something that an existing rule or statue does—e.g.: "Except as otherwise provided in Rule 26(b) . . . ."

F. Except that. This phrase is generally inferior to but or some other, more pointed term—e.g.: "[T]he parties may by written stipulation . . . modify other procedures . . . , except that [read but] stipulations extending the time provided in Rules 33, 34, and 36 for responses to discovery may . . . be made only with the approval of the court." Fed. R. Civ. P. 29.

G. Except when. The word unless is usually much preferable—e.g.: "Except when [read Unless] a federal statute or these rules provide otherwise, ..." (Cf. except as.) Even with the slightly improved wording, however, this type of wide-open exception makes DRAFTING less easily comprehensible: the reader must research all of federal law to find out whether the exception applies. Such a provision is therefore antithetical to principles of PLAIN LANGUAGE.

H. Except with. This phrase, usually followed by a noun phrase, is ordinarily inferior to unless (usually followed by a subject and verb)—e.g.: "Except with the written consent of the defendant, [read Unless the defendant consents in writing,] the report [must] not be submitted to the court . . . ." Fed. R. Crim. App. 32(b)(1). except as. See except (E).

except as otherwise provided. See notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained herein.

exception takes the preposition to, not from. E.g., "Application of foreign law must be analytically understood as an exception from [read to] the basic rule calling for the application of the lex fori."

exceptionable; exceptional. The first is sometimes misused for the second. Exceptionable = open to exception; objectionable <she was admonished for her exceptionable behavior>. Excep- tional = out of the ordinary; uncommon; rare; superior <an exceptional achievement>.

exception proves the rule, the. This phrase is the popular rendering of what was originally a legal maxim, "The exception proves (or confirms) the rule in the cases not excepted" (exceptio probat regulam in casibus non exceptis). Originally exception in this maxim meant "the action of excepting"—not, as is commonly supposed, "that which is excepted"—so that the true sense of the maxim was that by specifying the cases excepted, one strengthens the hold of the rule over all cases not excepted.

At least two spurious explanations of the exception proves the rule exist. One is that because a rule does not hold in all instances (i.e., has exceptions), the rule must be valid. This misunderstanding of the phrase commonly manifests itself in the discourse of those who wish to argue that every rule must have exceptions. A more sophisticated, but equally false, explanation of the phrase is that prove here retains its Elizabethan sense (derived from the Latin) "to test," so that the sense of the phrase is that an exception to a rule "tests" the validity of the rule. This erroneous explanation appears, of all places, in Tom Burnam, A Dictionary of Misinformation 79 (1975).

exceptor (= one who excepts or objects) was formerly used in some jurisdictions as an equivalent of appellant. E.g., "Exceptors place considerable stress on the case of Marshall v. Frazier." See plaintiff & except (A).

except that. See except (F).

except when. See except (G).

except with. See except (H).

excess of, in (= beyond the confines of) is a LEGALISM used in the context of actions ultra vires, q.v. The phrase is unobjectionable per se. E.g., "The district court ruled that the regulations had been promulgated in excess of the EPA's authority under the Clean Air Act."/ "It is contended that the minister acted in excess of his jurisdiction." (Eng.)

Exchequer is so spelled. Some writers have tried to make it Exchequor—e.g.: "This work required a law court in the modern sense made up of a small number of judges of education and ability skilled in the law which sat regularly term after term, generally at Westminster, often at the Exchequor [read Exchequer]." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 3 (1930).

excise. There are two unrelated verbs excise: (1) "to remove"; and (2) "to impose an excise tax [q.v.] on." Here sense (1) applies: "The jury had been selected at the time the sealing was entered; therefore, excising the documents and releasing them to the public was an alternative to sealing that should have been considered." To illustrate sense (2), the OED quotes Blackstone as follows: "Brandies and other spirits are now excised at the distillery." The OED labels this sense obsolete, but W3 and W10 suggest that it lives on.

excise tax has two quite distinct meanings: (1) "a tax imposed on specific commodities that are produced, sold, or transported within a country—for example, liquor and tobacco"; or (2) "a tax imposed on a license to pursue a specified trade or occupation."

exciseman; excisor. In view of the modern trend of avoiding needless SEXISM in language, excisor is to be preferred.

excludable; excludible; exclusible. The preferred form is excludable. See -ABLE (A). exclusionary = tending to exclude, or characterized by exclusion <exclusionary rule>. This word, recorded first (fr. 1817) in the works of Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832), began as a peculiarly legal word and has remained so.

exclusive means "with no exceptions" and should be used carefully. An ill-advised use appears in 28 U.S.C. § 1346: "The district courts . . . shall have exclusive jurisdiction of civil actions on claims against the United States." This is not so, since circuit courts and the Supreme Court may also properly have jurisdiction on appeal. What was meant is "exclusive original jurisdiction." See OVERSTATEMENT.

exclusive federal jurisdiction. See preemption, federal.

ex contractu; ex delicto. The phrases in contract and in tort are much preferable to these LATINISMS. E.g., "Doubtless this is the rule of law today in all ordinary actions, either ex contractu or ex delicto [read in contract or in tort]."/ "Appellee maintains that it is entitled to attorneys' fees and costs incurred in the successful defense against appellant's ex delicto claim [read tort claim]."/ "Precise classification of rights as ex contractu or ex delicto [read as being in contract or in tort] was no more characteristic of 15th-century English legal thought than it is today."/ "Any one of various possible groups of specific operative facts would suffice, as far as the defendant's obligation ex delicto [read in tort] is concerned." See delictual.

exculpate; exonerate. Whereas the former has the primary sense "to free from blame or accusation," the latter means literally "to free from a burden," and only by extension is synonymous with the former. See exonerate & inculpate.

exculpatee (= one who has been exculpated) is an AmE NEOLOGISM—e.g.: "An exculpatory clause covers the risk of harm sustained by the exculpator that might be caused by the exculpatee." Weaver v. American Oil Co., 261 N.E.2d 99, 102 (Ind. Ct. App. 1970). Though rarely heard, the word should—if it must be pronounced at all—be pronounced /ek-skəl-pə-tee/. See -EE exculpatory; exculpative. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

excusal; excusation. In reference to prospective jurors, the correct phraseology is, e.g., excusal for cause from the venire panel. Excusation is an obsolete word meaning "the action of offering an excuse" (OED).

excuse; justification. In many areas of the law, these terms are used interchangeably. But they have undergone DIFFERENTIATION in criminal law.

An excuse is a defense that arises because the defendant is not blameworthy for having acted in a way that would otherwise be criminal. Traditionally, the following defenses were excuses: duress, entrapment, infancy, insanity, and involuntary intoxication.

A justification, by contrast, is a defense that arises when the defendant has acted in a way that the criminal law does not seek to prevent. Traditionally, the following defenses were justifications: the defendant's choice of a lesser harm or evil, consent, defense of others, defense of property, self-defense, the use of force to make an arrest, and the use of force by public authority.

ex delictu is a mistaken form of ex delicto caused by confusion with the ending of ex contractu—e.g.: "An examination of her pleadings only reinforces the ex delictu [read ex delicto] nature of Ms. Williams' claim." Page v. U.S. Indus., Inc., 556 F.2d 346, 352 (5th Cir. 1977). The reason for the difference is that delictum is a second-declension Latin noun whose ablative singular is delicto, not delictu, whereas contractus is a fourth-declension noun whose ablative singular is contractu. See ex contractu.

execute. A. Senses. Execute (= to sign and deliver; to make valid by observing certain required formalities) is lawyers' JARGON used in reference to completing legal documents <she executed her will>. In this sense the word means "to go through the formalities necessary to the validity of (a legal act)—hence, to complete and give validity to (the instrument by which such an act is effected) by performing what the law requires to be done" (adapted fr. OED). But the word sign is often preferable, especially in communicating with nonlawyers.

Execute also has several other senses in law: (1) "to carry into effect ministerially (a law, a judicial sentence, etc.)"; (2) "to perform or carry out the provisions of a will" (i.e., what the executor does—this use of the term is now somewhat rare) see (c); (3) "to perform acts of (justice, e.g.) or give effect to a court's judgment"; or (4) "to levy execution on (property of a judgment debtor)" <when the judgment became final, the prevailing plaintiff's attorney had the marshal execute on defendant's nonexempt property>. Sense (4) appears to be peculiar to AmE, and is given in none of the standard unabridged dictionaries. But it falls logically under the second broad sense listed in the OED: "to do execution upon."

B. For issue. Though legal instruments and the like are executed, writs, warrants, and the like are said to issue from (or be issued by) courts or other official bodies—e.g.: "The bureau [the Federal Bureau of Investigation] said search warrants were executed [read issued] Thursday on five locations in the Washington area and suburban Atlanta to look for evidence of a wide-ranging criminal conspiracy." Steve McGonigle, U.S. Treasurer's Home Searched in FBI Influence-Peddling Probe, Dallas Morning News, 31 Oct. 1992, at 1A./ "If the trial court's action is abusive, mandamus will execute [read issue] to cure it." See issue.

C. Used in Reference to Wills. Although the testator executes (i.e., performs an action necessary to validate) a will by signing it, the (aptly named) executor is also said to execute it when carrying out the will's provisions. This latter use occurs infrequently—e.g.: "Name an executor who is both able and willing to do the job. Executing a will can be time-consuming and labor-intensive." G.W. Weinstein, Planning Your Estate, Investment Vision, July/Aug. 1990, at 50.

executed contract. See executory contract.

executer. See executor.

execution-proof, adj See judgment-proof, adj.

executive agreement. See treaty.

executor; executer. The -er spelling is obsolete. An executor is (1) "one who does or performs some act"; (2) "one who, appointed in a testator's will, administers the estate"; or (3) in American patent practice, one who represents a legally incapacitated inventor. In senses (2) and (3), the accent falls (familiarly) on the second syllable /ig-zek-yə-tər/; in sense (1), the accent is on the first syllable /ek-sə-kyoot-ər/. See administrator.

executory; executorial. Executory = taking full effect at a future time <an executory judgment> <executory contract>. Executorial = of or pertaining to an executor.

executory contract; executed contract. An executory contract is one that remains wholly unperformed or for which there remains something still to be done on both sides. An executed contract is one that has been entirely performed on one side.

executory limitation. See special limitation.

executory sale. See contract for sale.

executrix; executress. Executrix (pl. -trices) is the usual feminine form of executor, which may itself serve as a neuter form covering both sexes. Though legal writers have traditionally distinguished between the sexes by suffix, executor is now the preferable term for men and women alike. See SEXISM (C).

exegesis; epexegesis; eisegesis. Knowledge of these terms is useful to anyone having to interpret writings. Exegesis = explanation or exposition (as of a word or sentence). E.g., "[I]n interpretation of federal statutes and Congressional intent . . . semantic exegesis is not conclusive." International Union v. Marshall, 584 F.2d 390, 397 (D.C. Cir. 1978). Epexegesis = the addition of a word or words to convey more clearly the meaning implied, or the specific sense intended, in a preceding word or sentence (OED). Eisegesis = the interpretation of a word or passage by reading into it one's own ideas (OED).

exemplar. See example.

exemplary has two almost contradictory connotations: exemplary damages make an example out of a wrongdoer, whereas exemplary behavior is model behavior. Exemplary is sometimes misunderstood as meaning "severe" in phrases such as exemplary punishment.

exemplaries (= exemplary damages) is an attributive noun in AmE—a common part of trial lawyers' JARGON. Cf. punitives & punies. See punitive damages.

exemplary damages. See punitive damages.

exemplification. See example.

exemplum. See example.

exempt appears commonly in the U.S. as an ellipsis for tax-exempt. Usually this usage occurs in contexts in which the reader has already learned that the subject at hand is tax exemptions, and not other types of exemptions. Following is a typical specimen: "An exempt organization has the privilege of preferred second- or third-class mailing rates." Craig Weinlein, Federal Taxation of Not-for-Profit Arts Organizations, 12 J. Arts, Mgmt., & Law 33, 33–34 (Summer 1982).

exequatur [fr. L. exsequor "let him perform"] – (1) originally, a temporal sovereign's act in authorizing a bishop to perform—under authority of the Pope—the clerical and administrative duties of a diocese; later, a sovereign's right either to so empower a bishop or to permit the publication of a papal bull; (2) in international law, a receiving state's authorization by which the head of a consular post is admitted to the exercise of his or her functions; or (3) in international law, the executive judgment or order by which a foreign judgment or an arbitral award is made locally enforceable. See Clive Parry & J.P. Grant, Encyclopedic Dictionary of International Law 123 (1986).

exercise for existence is a puzzling error. E.g., "A presumption of undue influence arises from proof of the exercise [read existence?] of a confidential relation between the testator and such a beneficiary, coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will." (A confidential relation is not exercised.) exertive; exertional. Exertive = tending to exert or rouse to action (OED) <resolve is an exertive emotion>. Exertional, though recorded in none of the Oxford or Merriam-Webster dictionaries, has appeared (usu. in the negative form) in American law cases in the field of social-security disabilities. Exertional = of or pertaining to physical effort. E.g., "[H]e is unable to return to his past relevant work and suffers from a nonexertional impairment." Warmoth v. Bowen, 798 F.2d 1109, 1110 (7th Cir. 1986)./ "[W]henever a nonexertional impairment is presented the Secretary must introduce a vocational expert to testify that jobs in the workplace exist for a person with

ex facie (-- in view of what is apparent, lit., "from the face") is not justified as a legal LATINISM, inasmuch as so many ordinary English words, such as evidently, apparently, or on its face, suffice in its stead. "Ex facie [read Patently] those transfers would be the same in form and in effect precisely as the instrument of transfer now before us." (Eng.) Here the phrase is wrongly made adjectival: "The Companies Act of 1948 brought into being that which was ex facie [read evident] in all its essential characteristics." (Eng.) See face, on its.

ex gratia; a gratia. Ex gratia means "as a favor, not by legal necessity" <ex gratia payment>. E.g., "[T]his punishment is not directly or mainly beneficial to the person injured, though a scheme whereby the State pays compensation ex gratia to victims of violence was started in 1964." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 146 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). A gratia is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

exhorbitant is a misspelling of exorbitant, q.v.

ex hypothesi is a needless LATINISM meaning hypothetically or hypothetical. E.g., "[H]ow can there be a price for what is, ex hypothesi [read hypothetically], a gratuitous transaction?" P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 121 (3d ed. 1981).

exigency; exigence. The form in -cy is standard; the other is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

exige(a)nt. Exigeant is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the standard form, exigent (= requiring immediate action).

existing. Legal drafters should use this ambiguous word cautiously. It may mean "existing at the time of the writing" or "existing at some time after the writing," if not specifically put within a time frame.

exit has been an acceptable verb since the early 17th century. Those who object to it on grounds that one does not "entrance" a building have a misplaced prejudice.

exlex; ex lege. Good legal writers have little or no use for these terms. Still, it is well to know their meanings: exlex is an adjective meaning "outside the law, without legal authority" <an exlex government>, whereas ex lege is an adverb meaning "by virtue of law; as a matter of law" <property forfeited ex lege>.

ex maleficio = (adv.) by malfeasance; (adj.) tortious. There is no reason why this phrase should not be Englished. E.g., "We do not find these allegations sufficient, either on authority or on principle, to establish a constructive trust ex maleficio [read resulting from malfeasance]."/ "In the character of a trustee ex maleficio [read by virtue of malfeasance], he shall be held to make good the things to the person who would have the property." See de son tort.

ex necessitate (= of necessity) is a Latinistic pollutant. E.g., "They argue that adoption of the doctrine would be a nullification of the rule that executory limitations are void unless they take effect ex necessitate [read of necessity] and in all possible contingencies within the prescribed period." See LATINISMS.

exodus, a much abused word, refers to the simultaneous departure of many people. It is not the term to describe one lawyer's leaving a firm: "Likewise, negotiations failed on whether Poindexter's ex-firm was entitled to reimbursement of several thousand dollars in costs expended on the Nicol case upon Poindexter's exodus [read exit] or upon the conclusion of the case." Occasionally exodus is mistakenly thought to be the equivalent of influx, which is actually an antonym.

Exodus should be avoided as a verb: "Poor people have no ability to exodus from [read leave en masse] an impoverished state for richer ones."

ex officio. See ex cathedra.

exonerate, in the sense "to free from responsibility," should be used only in reference to people. E.g., "Contracts to exonerate the plaintiff from the payment of debts or demands assumed by the defendant are enforced for a like reason expressed in a different form." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 317 (1930).

Hence the following use, which refers to a rocket booster as opposed to a person, is erroneous: "Held, affirmed for DuPont since there was no evidence that the booster [a component in an explosive device] was responsible for the explosion, and the evidence offered by plaintiff tended to exonerate [read rule out] the booster." Cf. exculpate.

In its sense "to free from encumbrances," of course, exonerate is used in reference to burdened property. E.g., "We find that the decedent did not expressly signify any intention not to exonerate the property here from the mortgage lien." Whereas acquit takes of, exonerate takes the preposition from: "We affirm the lower court's holding that it was the intention of the testator that this legacy be exonerated from all liens." See subrogation (C).

ex'or is an archaic abbreviation of executor, q.v.

exorbitant (lit., "having departed or deviated from one's track [orbita] or rut") is sometimes mistakenly spelled exhorbitant—perhaps because it is confused with exhort. E.g., "Daon's own appraiser agreed that this price was exhorbitant [read exorbitant]." Foster v. Daon Corp., 713 F.2d 148, 149 (5th Cir. 1983). Cf. the misspellings exhalt and exhault: see exalt.

exordium. See introductory clause.

expandable; expandible; expansible. The first is the preferred form. See -ABLE (A).

ex parte. A. And *inter partes. These correlative terms—legal JARGON, both—are familiar enough to all lawyers to be useful; they should be simplified for the lay audience, however.

An ex parte proceeding involves only one party since the basic meaning of this Latin phrase is "from or on behalf of only one side to a lawsuit." E.g., "Because appellee declined to participate in the proceeding, the arbitration was conducted ex parte."/ "Petitioner maintains that the judge was unduly and falsely influenced during an allegedly ex parte conversation with the prosecution."

In an inter partes proceeding, more than one party is involved, since inter partes means "between (and among) parties; involving all sides to a lawsuit." This term is used less frequently than ex parte. E.g., "In other states these courts may conduct inter partes proceedings if the contestant files a caveat after the ex parte proceeding has begun." See inter partes.

B. Misused for sua sponte. Ex parte is sometimes ignorantly misused for sua sponte, a term meaning "spontaneously; on one's own motion or initiative without prompting from others." E.g., "The court was not free to deny plaintiff's motion to vacate judgment under Rule 60(b)(2) based upon its ex parte [read sua sponte] determination that to do otherwise would be somehow contrary to the public policy of bringing disputes to a conclusion." See sua sponte.

expatiate; expatriate. Expatiate means (1) "to wander"; or (2) "to discourse on (a subject) at length." Expatriate means (1) "to leave one's home country to live elsewhere"; or (2) "to banish; exile."

expect is informal or colloquial for think or suppose, as here: "I expect that it will take three weeks," instead of, "I think it will take three weeks." Most properly, expect means "to look forward to and rely on." See anticipate.

expectancy. A. And *expectant estate. Expectancy = (1) the possibility that an heir apparent or presumptive or a presumptive next-of-kin will acquire property by succession on intestacy; or (2) the possibility that a presumptive legatee or devisee will acquire property by will. Expectant estate = a reversion, a remainder either vested or contingent, or an executory interest. See Lewis M. Simes & A.F. Smith, The Law of Future Interests § 2, at 5–6 (2d ed. 1956).

B. And expectation. We have the idioms life expectancy and meet one's expectations, but aside from distinguishing uses in these phrases, most lawyers would be hard put to set out the distinction. Despite an overlap in actual use, there is a clear-cut DIFFERENTIATION that ought to be observed with care. For expectancy, see (A). Expectation = the action of mentally looking for someone to come, forecasting something to happen, or anticipating something to be received (OED). E.g., "The statute creates a presumption that parole release will be granted, which in turn creates a legitimate expectation of release absent the requisite finding that one of the justifications for deferral exists."/ "Perhaps the most common recovery sought in contract cases is a reimbursement for damage to what is known as the plaintiff's expectation interest."

Here idiom is violated by life expectation: "By the wrongful injury his normal life expectation [read expectancy] had been shortened." The opposite error here occurs, expectancy for expectation: "Punishment of the contract-breaker is so subordinated to the main goal of fulfilling the injured party's expectancy [read expectation] of gain that it has received practically no recognition as a remedial consideration."

Writers who misguidedly favor INELEGANT VARIATION are especially drawn to these terms. E.g., "The district court considered the balance due on Todd's repair contract in computing Auto's damages solely in order to ensure that Auto received no more than its expectation. Because the repairers were obligated in solido to pay this expectancy [read pay the amount of this expectation], the district court correctly subtracted the balance due under the contract from the amount of their total liability."

expectant heir. See heir (B). expectation. See expectancy.

expediency; expedience. The former is usual; the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

expeditious; expedient; expediential. Expeditious = quickly accomplished, prompt <an expeditious decision>. Expedient = (1) desirable, advantageous ; or (2) based on self-interest . Expediential is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

The word expedient was once synonymous with expeditious, but this use of the word has long been considered obsolete. Oddly, however, it persists in legal contexts in which expeditious would be the better word—e.g.: "In addition, the intent of the Declaratory Judgment Act is to promote the simple, expedient [read expeditious] trial of cases where the nature of the questions involved lend themselves readily to trial without the usual formalities to the end that resolution may be speedily achieved." Gulotta v. Cutshaw, 258 So. 2d 555, 559 (La. Ct. App. 1972)./ "The Court notes plaintiff's motion of August 9, 1982, for expedient [read expeditious] trial, and has kept in mind 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(D) . . . ." Fiumara v. Higgins, 572 F. Supp. 1093, 1098 (D.N.H. 1983)./ "Similarly, a defendant should not be permitted to frustrate the trial court's efforts to conduct an orderly, fair and expedient [read expeditious] trial, and then benefit from an alleged error by the court which he invited through his own conduct." People v. Johnson, 518 N.E.2d 100, 108 (Ill. 1988). (For a discussion of the problem that the word which caused in this last example, see REMOTE RELATIVES.)

expend is a FORMAL WORD for spend; it is not always appropriate in ordinary contexts. E.g., "Generally speaking, students have no constitutional right to expend [read spend] classroom time on a subject unrelated to what they are supposed to be learning."

expense, v.t., = (in bookkeeping) to charge or record as an expense. E.g., "The telephone system will last for quite some time; it is appropriate, therefore, to expense the $300 over the period of time the telephone system will last."

experimentalize is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of experiment.

expiration; expiry. The word end is best where it will suffice. Expiry is the usual word for "termination" in BrE, whereas in AmE expiration is far more common. Thus: "There could be no difficulty here about the date of performance; it was on the expiry of the two years." (Eng.)/ "The district court denied reinstatement to Marchelos, reasoning that Marchelos had no security interest in his job because he had no reasonable expectation of continued employment beyond the expiration of his contract on August 31, 1979."

expire. See run (A).

explanatorily. See SENTENCE ADVERBS

EXPLETIVES. In general usage, expletives are understood to be curse words or exclamations. This sense was fortified in AmE during the Watergate hearings, when coarse language was omitted from the White House tapes with the phrase expletive deleted. In grammar, however, expletives are words that have no special meaning, but stand (usu. at the beginning of a clause) for a delayed subject. (See epithet.) The two most common expletives are it and there when beginning clauses or sentences.

A. With Passives. When used after verbs in the passive voice, expletives often give the misimpression that they have antecedents. E.g., "The burial was to take place at Highgate, and it was intended to take the body by train from Winooski to Cambridge Junction over the defendant's road and thence over the connecting road to Highgate." (The full passive is it was intended (by someone) to take the body; yet, on first reading, it appears to refer to burial.)/ "Despite her prediction that the economic recovery will be slow, it is expected that the company will flourish during the next few quarters." (It seems at first to refer to economic recovery when in fact it is merely an expletive.) See MISCUES.

B. Number. The INVERSION occasioned by expletives sometimes confuses writers about the number of the subject. "There remains for trial these issues [read There remain . . . these issues] raised in respondent's counterclaim." See SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT (J).

C. Expletive it Alongside Pronoun it. The expletive it should not be used in the same immediate context as the pronoun it. "It is concluded that it [i.e., the plaintiff corporation] is entitled to interest." [Read We conclude that it is entitled to interest.] See it.

explicate; explain. The terms are synonymous, but are used in different contexts. Explain is the ordinary term. Explicate (lit., "to open up pleats; to unfold") is more learned and connotes formal, orderly presentation or justification. Oddly, the adjectives explicable and inexplicable are more frequently used than the verb to explicate.

explodable; explosible. The former is preferred.

exploitative; exploitatory; exploitive. The second and third forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

explosible. See explodable.

exportize is an abomination for export, v.t. See -IZE.

expose. See disclose.

exposé should have the acute accent on the final letter (-é) to prevent confusion with the verb to expose. E.g., "Investigative reports, following in the tradition of the muckrakers, are always looking for an expose [read exposé]."

ex post. See ex ante.

ex post facto is slightly pompous but fairly common when used for after the fact. The phrase does have legitimate uses in the sense "retroactive," as in ex post facto laws. E.g., "Application of the newly enacted burden to this defendant runs afoul of the ex post facto prohibition [i.e., the prohibition against enacting laws that punish retroactively]." An English writer once called this use, which appears in the U.S. Constitution and in Blackstone, "a grotesque misuse of the expression." Note, 34 Law Q. Rev. 8, 9 (1918). His was the grotesque error.

Ex post for ex post facto is an odd ellipsis without literary legitimacy. "As a rule, therefore, courts will not engage in ex post inquiries [read ex post facto inquiries] regarding the substantive fairness of contract terms." Maureen B. Callahan, Note, Post-Employment Restraint Agreements, 52 U. Chi. L. Rev. 703, 704 (1985). (On the technically correct sense of ex post, see ex ante.) Yet another strange shortening is post facto: "[C]hanges may not be instituted now in the expectation of post facto [read ex post facto] ratification at some indeterminate future time." Henderson v. Graddick, 641 F. Supp. 1192, 1202 (M.D. Ala. 1986).

The phrase was formerly spelled ex postfacto on occasion, but this spelling is archaic. Some writers hyphenate the phrase when it functions as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE <ex-post-facto reasoning>, but the hyphens are unnecessary in this SET PHRASE.

expound; propound. The former means "to explain," the latter "to set forth; put forward for consideration." Expound is often misused. E.g., "Perhaps a sixteen-year-old boy would choose to refrain from sex in fear of the druggist's calling his father; then males as well as females would be virgins when they are married, as traditional views would expound [read encourage or favor]."/ "The board considered the wearing of the black arm band in class a political act expounding [read conveying?] to the students only one side of a controversial issue and, as such, constituting an unethical practice by a member of the teaching profession."

Expound is best used transitively: one expounds an idea or doctrine; one does not need to expound on it. Likewise, one propounds evidence. See propound & proponent.

express(ed). Sometimes within the same writing will be found references to "express and implied contracts" and to "expressed and implied contracts." The preferred adjective in the sense "specific, definite, clear" is express. E.g., "The decision depends in no way on an agreement, expressed [read express] or implied." (Eng.) See implied.

Occasionally, the transitive verb express functions as a correlative of imply—e.g.: "There are multifarious occasions on which persons who act or speak in the name of a state do acts or make declarations which either express or imply some view on a matter of international law." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 61 (5th ed. 1955).

expressible; expressable. The former is preferred. See -ABLE (A). expressio unius est exclusio alterius. See inclusio unius est exclusio alterius.

express trust. See constructive trust (B).

expropriate. See appropriate.

expropriation. See eminent domain.

expunction; expungement. The latter, which is recorded in neither the OED nor W3, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that surfaces from time to time—e.g.: "He sought declaratory and injunctive relief, damages, and the expungement [read expunction] of his prison disciplinary record." Hewitt v. Helms, 482 U.S. 755, 764 (1987) (Marshall, J., dissenting).

exquisite is best pronounced with the first syllable accented /eks-kwiz-it/; it is acceptable in AmE, however, to stress the second /ek-skwiz-it/.

Although there is historical justification for using exquisite (= acute) in reference to pain, modern readers are likely to find this use macabre at best, for they generally understand the word as meaning "keenly discriminating" <exquisite taste> or "especially beautiful" <an exquisite vase>. For many readers, the obsolescent sense is merely a MISCUE: "From this we cannot say that it was unreasonable for the jury to infer that the decedent was conscious after impact and[,] before her death, suffering [read suffered] during that period from both impact injuries and the exquisite [read excruciating] pain of massive burns."

And when the word is used figuratively in the sense "acute, intense," the MISCUE is aggravated—e.g.: "Claimant's counsel might be faced with the exquisite [omit exquisite] dilemma of whether to forgo any fee application and thereby preserve his client's meager judgment, or jeopardize the client's judgment by applying for fees and thereby giving the government an incentive to appeal."

ex rel., the abbreviation for L. ex relatione (= upon the relation or information of), is now used almost exclusively in styles of cases brought by the government on the application of a relator, q.v., who is a private party that is somehow interested in the matter (as in an action to abate a public nuisance). A typical case style is as follows: U.S. ex rel. Carter v. Jennings, 333 F. Supp. 1392 (E.D. Pa. 1971). See qui tam.

In pre-20th-century lawbooks, ex rel. ordinarily denotes that the reporter did not personally witness the proceedings but got an account secondhand.

extemporaneous; extempore, adj.; extemporary; extemporal. In AmE, the first is the usual form. The others might be considered NEEDLESS VARIANTS, but extempore is most common in BrE.

extemporaneously; ex tempore, adv. In AmE, the latter is the Latin-lover's (or Anglophile's) NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former. Ex tempore, like the adjective extempore, is the usual form in BrE.

extend. See enlarge.

extendable; extendible; extensible. The preferred form is extendable. See -ABLE (A).

extended opinion = a separate opinion. E.g., "Mr. Justice Brennan, concurring in part and dissenting in part, filed an extended opinion." See write specially.

extension; renewal. Both of these words are used in referring to the continuation of a legal contract, such as a lease. But the two have undergone a subtle DIFFERENTIATION with sometimes important ramifications: an extension continues the same contract for a specified period, whereas a renewal institutes a new contract that replaces the old one. Unfortunately, some courts muddle the two words, using them interchangeably or using both but not defining the difference.

extenuate (= to lessen the seriousness of [a fault or a crime] by partial excuse) should be used only of the fault that is minimized, not of the person. The OED cites improper uses (so labeled) such as, "The pursuer's steward . . . extenuated himself calmly enough," in which the word is used as if it meant "to extenuate the guilt of; to plead partial excuses for" (OED).

extern. See clerk.

extinguishment; extinction. Both words are nouns corresponding to the verb to extinguish. If there is a DIFFERENTIATION, it is that extinguishment refers to the process, and extinction to the resultant state. Extinguishment means in law "the cessation or cancellation of some right or interest" (CDL). E.g., "Both the Senate Bill and the House amendments provided for recordation of mining claims and for extinguishment of abandoned claims."

extortion; bribery. For public officials, the line of demarcation is unclear. Extortion = the corrupt obtaining of property by an officer under color of office. Bribery = something of value given or promised to an officer in return for corrupt behavior. If the briber takes the initiative, it is bribery; if the bribee takes the initiative, it is extortion. See briber & bribery.

extortionate; extortionary; extortive; extorsive. Extortionate (= [1] given to or characterized by extortion; [2] [of prices] exorbitant) is the standard term, the others being NEEDLESS VARIANTS. E.g., "The vice arises only when he employs extortive [read extortionate] measures, or when, lacking good faith, he makes improper demands." State Nat'l Bank v. Farah Mfg. Co., 678 S.W.2d 661, 684 (Tex. App.—El Paso 1984)./ "Wright and Armstrong urge, among other things, that the court erred in finding a nexus between the extortionate conduct and interstate commerce." U.S. v. Wright, 804 F.2d 843, 844 (5th Cir. 1986).

extortioner; extortionist; extorter. The first is most usual, the others being NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

extortive. See extortionate.

EXTRA- (= lying outside the province or scope of) is a prefix that in modern English has formed hundreds of new adjectives, mostly for learned or literary purposes. The prefix has been adopted by many legal writers to form NEOLOGISMS not yet found in unabridged dictionaries. These writers usually do no harm, and in fact occasionally coin useful words. Extralegal and extrajudicial both date from the early 17th century; extraconstitutional dates from the early 19th century. Following are four representative examples of 20th-century legal neologisms using this prefix:

- "[T]he business judgment rule would shield the directors' decision to terminate a derivative suit against an extracorporate party." Mark P. Krysinski, Note, Derivative Suits and the Special Litigation Committee, 29 Wayne L. Rev. 149, 167 (1982).
- Laurie R. Wallach, Note, Intercircuit Conflicts and the Enforcement of Extracircuit Judgments, 95 Yale L.J. 1500 (1986).
- "The decision to withhold enforcement of the immigration laws is extrastatutory; it constitutes one of the Executive's inherent prerogatives." Hotel & Restaurant Employees Union v. Attorney General, 804 F.2d 1256, 1279 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (Silberman, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
- "Even if the goods themselves were destroyed by a defect giving rise to a tort action based on strict liability, the interest protected is basically an extra-contractual [read extracontractual] one." Peter Schlechtriem, The Borderland of Tort and Contract—Opening a New Frontier? 21 Cornell Int'l L.J. 467, 474 (1988).

extracurial; extracuriam. The first is the better form because it is a properly formed adjective—e.g.: "The decision in Baker v. Carr represents a gamble that extracurial processes of political adjustment and compromise will produce an issue digestible, as it were, by the Court." Lon Fuller, The Morality of Law 178 (1964)./ "Much of the extra-curiam [read extracurial] activity in which the Supreme Court justices have engaged has not been sufficiently consequential to matter . . . ." Robert Scigliano, The Supreme Court and the Presidency 81 (1971).

extrajudicial. A. And out-of-court. These terms are generally equivalent (see (B)). The latter is more readily comprehensible to readers and listeners, but it can be awkward. Euphony should govern the word choice—e.g.: "The constitutional privilege has no application to an extrajudicial confession, whether or not it is under oath."/ "The mere fact that sworn testimony may differ from extrajudicial statements does not constitute perjury, particularly where the discrepancy is extremely slight."/ "The due process clause should not be treated as a uniform command that courts throughout the nation abandon their age-old practice of seeking information from out-of-court sources to guide their judgment toward a more enlightened and just sentence."

B. Special Sense. Occasionally, this term means "outside the judicial process" as opposed to "out of court"—e.g.: "Saying there had been 'a cascade of extrajudicial executions, arbitrary arrests, disappearances and torture,' the [Americas Watch] organization commented that the attitude of the Government of President Alan Garcia 'might best be described as one of resignation.'" Alan Riding, Human Rights Group Criticizes Peru, N.Y. Times, 3 Nov. 1988, at 4.

extralegal (= beyond the province of law), dating from the mid-17th century and now in fairly frequent use, is omitted from most legal and nonlegal (extralegal?) dictionaries. E.g., "To a great extent they are extra-legal, existing under the sanctions of religion and morality, but not of human law." James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 248 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co. 1881)./ "[T]hey often develop a tendency to pursue their purposes extra-legally, or even illegally . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 49 (5th ed. 1955)./ "[W]here law is largely a reflection of extralegal morality, what appears in form as retrospective legislation may in substance represent merely the confirmation of views already held . . . ." Lon Fuller, The Morality of Law 92 (1964). Today the word is written as a solid, without the hyphen. Cf. alegal & nonlegal.

extraordinary writs. See prerogative writs.

extrastatutory. See EXTRA-.

ex turpi causa non oritur actio. See MAXIMS exult. See exalt.

ex vi termini = by the force of the term; by the very meaning of the expression used. This LATINISM has no place in modern legal writing. "It is said that words not actionable ex vi termini [read in themselves] cannot be made so by innuendo."/ "In the second will there are no words that ex vi termini [omit ex vi termini] import a disposition of real property."

eyeing. So spelled; eying is a blunder.

eye of the law. See ANTHROPOMORPHISM.

eyewitness is spelled as one word, not two. Avoid eyeball witness. Cf. earwitness.

face of, in the = in front of; directly opposite; when confronted with. This idiomatic expression has become a part of legal JARGON. E.g., "Commenting upon the recent disarmament of the Highlanders, which had been so drastic that they were defenseless in the face of a gang of robbers or pirates, he remarked that 'Laws that place the subjects in such a state of insecurity contravene the first principles of the compact of authority: they exact obedience, and yield not protection.'" (Eng.)/ "Nor will equity engraft the doctrine of subrogation on a transaction in the face of an agreement that negates the idea of subrogation." See fly in the face of.

face, on its. In this age-old legal expression, face refers to the inscribed side of a document. The full phrase means "in the words of, in the plain sense of" <the document on its face indicates testamentary intent>. The phrase is sometimes used with a possessive noun in place of its—e.g.: "The difference between this law and the law in the McCray case is that the purpose to control child labor is evident on the law's face . . . ." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 143 (1960). And it is sometimes used figuratively of things other than documents—e.g.: "A libel is harmful on its face."

One must be careful of context with this shopworn phrase. When the subject is plural, and the phrase becomes on their face, there is a technical failure of CONCORD that can sometimes be risible: "Most laws, however, discriminate or mete out different treatment on their face." (No one wants to see treatment meted out on anyone's face; though the sentence refers to the face of the statute, nonetheless the imagery suggests something different.)/ "On their face, the municipal historic preservation ordinances satisfy requisite due process criteria."/ "Some of these statutes were held to be unconstitutional on their face or as applied." (Note that in these last two sentences the plural form on their faces would be even worse.) See METAPHORS, ex facie & facial.

facial = complete; on its face; as a whole. E.g., "The cases before us are governed by the normal rule that partial, rather than facial, invalidation is the required course for such statutes."/ "The doctrine asserts that the constitutionality of an overbroad law should be judged on its face. The result is that the statute is upheld or invalidated in toto and not as it applies in a particular case. This approach is called 'facial' review." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 77 (1982).

The adverb facially is almost as common as the adjective facial. Though it might appear to mean "in a facial manner," facially means "on its face": "The court of appeals erred by facially invalidating the statute in its entirety [i.e., invalidating the statute on its face]."/ "We hold that the plaintiff has standing to challenge the constitutionality of the ordinance, and that the section in its present form is facially overbroad and unconstitutional [i.e., overbroad and unconstitutional on its face]."

facilitate (= to aid, help) is a FORMAL WORD to be used sparingly, for it often is jargonistic, as is the agent noun facilitator (= helper). E.g., "The commission's improved decision undoubtedly facilitates this court's review by clarifying the issues involved." As Fowler and others have noted, it is better to write that an action (e.g., the court's review, in the sentence just quoted) is facilitated rather than that the actor (e.g., the court) is facilitated.

facility. This word is surplusage in phrases such as jail facility and museum facility.

facsimile transmission. See fax.

fact, adj.; factual. In phrases such as fact(ual) question, the longer form is preferable. Notwithstanding that fact question is jarring, it is potentially misleading to the reader. In the following sentence, for instance, the use of factual would have circumvented the reader's thinking that existence of fact is an unhyphenated phrasal adjective: "If the proceedings are characterized as a trial on a stipulated record, the existence of fact questions [read factual questions] will not undermine the result." The sentences that follow illustrate the better usage: "We are directed by statute and Supreme Court precedent to accord a presumption of correctness to such state court factual findings."/ "Petitioners contend that the ICC impermissibly substituted its judgment for the factual findings of the state commission."

Notably, factual has two meanings: (1) "of or involving facts" <factual issue>; (2) "true" . Here sense (2) is illustrated in a sentence in which fact would be not just inferior, but wrong: "If this were a factual account of what happened, the plaintiff would not have a cause of action." See fact-finding & fact situation.

Sense (1) of factual, the more usual meaning, appears in the following sentences: "The ICC's section 11501(c) jurisdiction is not of a limited nature, but in a proper case is plenary, and may allow the ICC to delve into the factual record before the state agency."/ "The rule contemplates that only factual questions will be submitted to the jury to which the judge will apply the law, supplementing, if necessary, any factual determinations not submitted to the jury."

fact, n.; factum. Fact (lit., "a thing done") means "an action performed, an event, an occurrence, or a circumstance." In legal writing, fact has the additional particularized sense "an evil deed; a crime." Thus we have the expressions before the fact, after the fact, and confess the fact.

Factum, the Latinate form of the word, has several meanings: (1) [regarding change in domicile] "a person's physical presence in a new domicile"; (2) "due execution of a will"; (3) "a fact or statement of facts"; and (4) "an act or deed." In senses (3) and (4), the only ones contained in the OED, the word has no merit in modern contexts (except in the phrase fraud in the factum [senses 2 & 4], for which see fraud (B)); few lawyers would understand factum when so used. In sense (1), factum is perhaps a TERM OF ART; nevertheless, the term calls for elucidation.

Sense (2) occurs frequently in the context of wills, where it is generally no more useful or specific than execution: "It might be argued that logically the only question upon the probate was the factum [read execution] of the instrument." In the SET PHRASE fraud or mistake in the factum, however, the use of factum is well ensconced: "There is a close analogy, however, to the situation in which a provision in a will by mistake in the factum is denied effect."/ "When there has been a fraudulent representation concerning the nature of the instrument or its contents, usually described as a fraud in the factum, it is well settled that the will or a fraudulently induced part of a will should be denied probate."

Although RH2 lists facta as the plural of factum, the form most common in published sources is factums. See PLURALS (A). fact, actual. See actual fact & facts.

fact(-)bound. Sometimes written as a single word, it is usually hyphenated as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—e.g.: "The three [Justices O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter] tend to be cautious, fact-bound judges who decide cases based on their practical effects rather than some lofty, dispassionate doctrine." David A. Kaplan & Bob Cohn, "Nine Scorpions in a Bottle," Newsweek, 13 July 1992, at 20.

fact(-)finder should be hyphenated, not spelled as two words. Likewise, fact-finding is best hyphenated. The trend is to make both terms solid, but that trend is at best incipient.

fact-finding = the finding of facts; factual finding = a finding of fact. E.g., "The agency's decision that an impact statement was not required pretermitted the fact-finding process designed by Congress."/ "The court's factual finding on that issue precluded recovery by the plaintiff."

Fact-finding is often mistakenly used not in reference to the process, but to mean "a finding of fact"—e.g.: "The earlier ruling was a fact-finding [read factual finding]."/ "On the basis of the above fact-findings [read factual findings], plaintiff has failed to make out a prima facie case."/ "The magistrate declined to enter any meaningful fact-findings [read factual findings] on the incidents surrounding the workover crew's hotel room arrangement, which appellant contended had precipitated the discharge." See finding.

factional; factious; fractious. These words are confusingly similar. Factional = of or relating to a faction. Factious = given to faction; acting for partisan purposes. Fractious = refractory, unruly, fretful, peevish.

factitious; fictitious. Both have the basic sense "artificial." Factitious = (1) man-made and not natural; (2) sham; produced by contrivance. Fictitious = imaginary, not real. This latter term is often used of testimony, accounts of facts, or stories. See fictional.

fact of the matter, the. This phrase is trite FUSTIAN that may serve as a filler in speech, but that generally has no justification in writing. Infrequently it gives the needed rhythm.

factor properly means "an agent or cause that contributes to a particular result." It should not be used, by SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, in the sense "a thing to be considered; event; occurrence." In law factor is used also—chiefly in BrE—in the sense "consignee" or "commission agent." E.g., "Among the more important classes recognised by English law are 'factors,' who are employed to sell goods for their principal." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 303 (13th ed. 1924).

In Scotland, factor usually refers to "a manager acting on behalf of an owner of heritable property." Andrew D. Gibb, Glossary of Scottish Law Terms 37 (A.G.M. Duncan ed., 2d ed. 1982).

In some American states, meanwhile, factor may refer to a garnishee: "In Vermont and Connecticut, he [the garnishee] is also sometimes called factor, and the process [of garnishing], factorizing process." Charles D. Drake, A Treatise on the Law of Suits by Attachment in the United States § 451, at 386 (7th ed. 1891). This use of factor and factorize is now infrequent, but it does occur—e.g.: "[D]ebtor became insolvent and plaintiff, a creditor of the debtor, 'factorized' the $169.88 garnishee owed debtor . . . ." Dick Warner Cargo Handling Corp. v. Aetna Business Credit, Inc., 538 F. Supp. 1049, 1054 (D. Conn. 1982).

factorize. See factor (3d par.).

factotum = a general servant with myriad duties. The correct plural is -tums, not -ta. E.g., "The agents suspected that the appellees were driving stolen vehicles, not that they served as factota [read factotums] of illegal aliens." U.S. v. Miranda-Perez, 764 F.2d 285, 289 (5th Cir. 1985). See PLURALS (A).

fact pleading. See code pleading.

fact question. See fact, adj.

facts cannot literally be false; if something is a fact, then it is by its very nature true. Yet in law one often reads and hears of the "truth" or "falsity" of certain facts. E.g., "Presumably there were good reasons in the interest of justice nearly 100 years ago which impelled the court to fetter its own power to get at the true facts." (Eng.)/ "No order shall recite untrue facts." In such a context, facts is really an elliptical form of alleged facts. Hence: "Subject to later case development, the Texas measure of probative value, 'tending to establish the presence or absence, truth or falsity of a fact,' does not seem functionally distinct from the federal definition, 'to make the existence of the fact more probable or less probable.'" But the best practice is to speak of false or untrue allegations, not false or untrue facts. See true facts.

fact-sensitive; fact-specific. Both are hyphenated thus.

fact situation; factual situation. Fact situation = a situation with a given set of facts (hypothetical or actual). Factual situation = a situation that exists or existed in fact. When coupled with the noun situation, factual tends to take on sense (2) listed in the entry under fact, adj.

facts, judicial. See judicial notice.

facts, under the, is an acceptable legal idiom. E.g., "Under the facts of the case at bar, we cannot say that the district court erred in allowing the inclusion of this testimony." Cf. circumstances.

fact that, the. It is imprudent to say, as some have, that this phrase ought never to be used. At times it cannot reasonably be avoided. One writer has suggested that because will usually suffice for the fact that. See "Vigilans" [Eric Partridge]. Chamber of Horrors 63 (1952). Yet rarely, if ever, is because a good substitute.

Where the fact that can be easily avoided, however, it should be. E.g., "The fact that [read That] the police officer was engaged in the performance of his duties did not relieve him of the duty of care at intersections." See that (D).

The common phrase notwithstanding the fact that can almost always be replaced by although or even if—e.g.: "The creditor's release of the principal debtor discharges the surety, notwithstanding the fact that [read even if] the creditor was induced to execute the release by the principal's fraud." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 307 (1950). See notwithstanding the fact that.

The pluralized form, as in "The facts that . . . ," is usually unnecessary and awkward for the singular, where the discrete facts discussed are easily considered part of an overall structure or pattern. "The facts that [read The fact that or That] the records in this case were made by the proprietor and were in his possession were [read was] irrelevant to the determination whether their creation was compelled, the majority said." See FLOTSAM PHRASES.

factum. See fact, n. & non est factum.

fail; failure. These are charged words. The late Judge Thomas Gibbs Gee, of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, used to admonish his clerks: "Be gentle with district judges. Never, for example, use failure in referring to an action of a district judge." A Few of Wisdom's Idiosyncrasies and a Few of Ignorance's, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 55, 58 (1990). Likewise, a modern commentator should not say that Cardozo, in Palsgraf, "failed" to mention the plaintiff's occupation and precise injury; not mentioning these things was no doubt a conscious stylistic choice—not a "failure" at all.

fair, properly an adjective, is sometimes misused for the verb fare (= [1] to experience good or bad fortune or treatment; or [2] to happen or turn out)—e.g.: "While the proofs on retrial, as at the prior trial, obviously indicate guilt, defendant faired [read fared] better with this jury and was found guilty of manslaughter." People v. Ansley, 192 N.W.2d 41, 41 (Mich. Ct. App. 1971)./ "From all outward appearances the business was fairing [read faring] well until Abbott purchased a jet airplane for approximately one million dollars in December of 1974 . . . ." Abbott v. Southern Subaru Star, Inc., 574 S.W.2d 684, 685 (Ky. Ct. App. 1978)./ "McAfee reiterated his view that the diagnosis of gout was incorrect in this case, and he stated that plaintiff would have faired [read fared] better had he been operated on sooner." Nastasi v. United Mine Workers of Am. Union Hosp., 567 N.E.2d 1358, 1362-63 (Ill. App. Ct. 1991).

fair comment denotes a defense in libel actions. The substance of it is that the words complained of were honestly made on a matter of public interest. Fair does not here mean "balanced; restrained; moderate"; rather, it means "honest; not malicious." The defense is rebutted by proof that the words were uttered maliciously.

fair dealing. See fair use.

fair play. In legal usage, this phrase, dating from the 18th century at the latest, is the quintessential expression for equitable and impartial treatment. It is often seen in procedural or due-process contexts.

fair use; fair dealing. The defense of fair use, in actions for copyright infringement, is known also as fair dealing in BrE. The term fair use (not fair usage) is the one applied in 17 U.S.C. § 107 to describe the kinds of limitations the law places on the exclusive rights of copyright.

fair wear and tear. See wear and tear.

falderol. See folderol.

fall = to be struck down, often on grounds of unconstitutionality. E.g., "But since the evil aimed at here, child labor, occurs before interstate commerce begins, and since the product transported (for example, a can of shrimp) is in itself harmless, the law must fall." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 145–46 (1960)./ "On the other hand, although initially it was merely the 'hot oil' provisions of the National Recovery Act of 1933 . . . that fell as an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power in January 1935, four months later the codes, too, and with them the entire structure of the act, fell on similar grounds." Henry J. Abraham, The Judicial Process 374 (2d ed. 1968).

fall due is the legal idiom meaning "to become due." It is used in reference to negotiable instruments—e.g.: "He paid the notes as they fell due."

false, in a phrase such as false statement, is potentially ambiguous, since the word may mean either "erroneous, incorrect" or "purposely deceptive."

false arrest. See false imprisonment.

false check. See check, worthless.

false imprisonment; false arrest. Both are ARCHAISMS, the former being more common and a little less quaint. Both denote the act of detaining a person unlawfully—a common-law misdemeanor and tort.

false misrepresentation. See misrepresentation.

false oath. See perjury.

false plea; sham plea. Both terms mean "an obviously frivolous or absurd pleading that is made only for purposes of vexation or delay." Sham plea (or pleading) has been the more common of the two in the U.S.; the CDL (British) contains the main entry under false plea.

false pretenses, an elliptical form of obtaining property by false pretenses, means "knowingly obtaining another's property by means of a misrepresentation of fact with intent to defraud." Though still in use in most American jurisdictions, false pretences (as spelled in BrE) has been largely replaced in England by a clearer name: obtaining by deception. See cheat & common law (B).

Some have complained that the phrase false pretenses is a REDUNDANCY because pretense suggests falsity. That is certainly the connotation today, but formerly pretense was a more neutral word denoting "the putting forth of a claim." That it now seems redundant is not a good cause for tampering with the name, unless lawmakers wished to make a wholesale clarification such as obtaining by deception.

false representation. See misrepresentation.

family of nations. Writers formerly took a more restrictive view about what this phrase means than most would today: "'The family of nations' is an aggregate of States which, as the result of their historical antecedents, have inherited a common civilisation, and are at a similar level of moral and political opinion." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 396 (13th ed. 1924). Today, by contrast, virtually any member-state of the United Nations is considered a part of the family of nations. Perhaps the only nations to be excluded are those that regularly engage in state-sponsored terrorism.

fantasy; phantasy. The former is now the preferred spelling in both AmE and BrE.

fare, n. Because this word, in one of its senses, means "food," the phrase food fare is a REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "Purchased sandwiches constituted the solid food fare [read food or fare] given the prisoners." Davis v. North Carolina, 310 F.2d 904, 910 (4th Cir. 1962)./ "Out-of-town colleagues in town for the American Bar Association annual meeting this month may want to sample Chicago's food fare [read food, or, perhaps, cuisine]." Jerold Jacover, Lawyers Wax Caloric Over Favorite Chicago Restaurants, Chicago Law., Aug. 1990, at 53.

fare, vb. See fair.

farmoutee; farmoutor; farm(in)ee; farm-(in)or. Readers first encountering these terms may suspect a joke. Who, after all, would use farmoutor for someone who farms out work, or farmoutee for the person to whom the work is farmed out?

The answer is American oil-and-gas lawyers and business people. The odd thing, though, is that farmor = farminor = farmoutor. Usage varies, obviously—but that is so even within a given jurisdiction. Many published sources contain farmor and farmee as correlatives—e.g.: "Generally speaking, a farm-out involves an assignment of, or agreement to assign, leasehold acreage (by the farmor) in exchange for an obligation to drill (by the farmee). Burke v. Blumenthal, 504 F. Supp. 35, 36 (N.D. Tex. 1980)./ "He claimed that their relationship with Cambridge was transformed from a relationship of lessor-lessee, farmor-farmee, to a particular fiduciary relationship because Cambridge had promised in writing to handle future royalty payments with more propriety than it had in the past." Cambridge Oil Co. v. Huggins, 765 S.W.2d 540, 542 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 1989).

In other sources, the correlative terms are farmoutor and farmoutee—e.g.: "Pan American paid royalties on the same rate to the oil and gas lease royalty owners and transmitted payments at the same rate to its farmoutees mentioned in finding No. 13 below, for the period from January 1, 1954, through December 22, 1957." Waechter v. Amoco Prod. Co., 537 P.2d 228, 232 (Kan. 1975)./ "It is first necessary to determine the meaning of the parties in the farmout agreement with respect to 'all costs and expenses incurred in drilling, testing, completing, equipping . . . any test well drilled hereunder . . .' which were the sole responsibility of the farmoutee, for which farmouters would never be liable, according to the contract." Continental Oil Co. v. American Quasar Petroleum Co., 438 F. Supp. 909, 912 (D. Wyo. 1977)./ "In July 1982, Manges, on behalf of himself, DCRC (Manges) and as agent for the State under the Relinquishment Act, brought suit against Mobil, Exxon, the royalty owners under the lease, and some of the farmoutees under the lease." Scott v. Exxon Corp., 763 S.W.2d 764, 765 (Tex. 1988).

Despite the second example above, the spelling farmoutor is more common than -er—e.g.: "Farmoutor should pay rentals and be reimbursed by the farmoutee without liability for improper payment." R.L. Harkinson & R.L. Harkinson, Jr., Landman's Encyclopedia 188 (2d ed. 1981).

far-reaching is one of our most overburdened adjectival phrases. This otiose metaphor should be used cautiously; the phrase should always be hyphenated. E.g., "This argument, which is of far-reaching significance, was designed to show that the union was not in breach of the court's orders." (Eng.)/ "They had no notification that any complaint was being made under section 6(k), which is a different and, in this case, more far-reaching matter." (Eng.)

farther; further. Both are comparative degrees of far, but they have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. In the best usage, the former refers to physical distances, the latter to figurative distances. E.g.,

"The Supreme Court looks no farther [read further] than whether the distinctions have some 'rational basis.'"/ "But the immunity goes farther [read further]."

In BrE, further is used both physically and figuratively, whereas farther is physical only. But there are exceptions, which some would call peccadilloes: "It cannot now be seriously contended that the so-called restrictive force of International Law goes farther [read further] than this . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 461 (7th ed. 1964) (an English work).

The superlatives—farthest and furthest—follow the same patterns. E.g., "With intense questioning, the Justices pushed the lawyers into the farthest [read furthest] rhetorical corners of their arguments . . . ." Linda Greenhouse, Right-to-Die Case Gets First Hearing in Supreme Court, N.Y. Times, 7 Dec. 1989, at 1. Furthermost is rare for farthest (not furthest).

F.A.S. See F.O.B.

fastly is an obsolete form that now exists only as a barbarism, inasmuch as fast is an adverb as well as an adjective. Even so, American courts have recently published opinions using the following phrases: the standard is fastly placed, the fastly held rule, and fastly becoming so. In the first two phrases, firmly, and in the last, fast, would serve better.

fatal. A. In Legal Jargon. In law, this word commonly means "providing grounds for legal invalidity"—e.g.: "The court pointed out that uncertainty as to the fact of damage is fatal."/ "While the parties have extensively argued and briefed a number of questions, one basic proposition is dispositive of, and fatal to, the position taken by the plaintiffs."/ "The fundamental, and in the end fatal, deficiency in Montana's reading of the statute is its failure to acknowledge, much less account for, language that equally plainly compels the conclusion that Congress did not intend that funds derived from Indian lands be distributed to the states."

B. And fateful. Though both are tied etymologically to the noun fate, they have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. Fatal means "of or relating to death," while fateful means "producing grave consequences." The most common mistake is to use fatal when fateful would be more appropriate, but sometimes one would be presumptuous to suggest any change, so close is the call: "Like Henry Kissinger and other modern scholars, Mr. Gelb considers the fatal turning point not Munich in 1938, but the failure by France and Britain to oppose German reoccupation of the Rhineland in 1936." John Lehman, The "Heroic" Retreat Was Really a Rout, Wall St. J., 9 Oct. 1989, at A6.

father-in-law. Pl. fathers-in-law.

fault, at or in. See at fault & in fault.

favorite of the law. This phrase, referring to any person or status entitled to extremely generous treatment in legal doctrine, exemplifies the PERSONIFICATION of law in which lawyers habitually engage—e.g.: "It has long been said that the surety is a favorite of the law and his contract strictissimi-juris." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 94 (1950).

fax. This term is now all but universal, in the face of which facsimile transmission became an instant ARCHAISM—and a trifle pompous at that. Fax is perfectly appropriate in formal contexts—e.g.: "Fax messages seem to occupy an intermediate position." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 25 (8th ed. 1991). Pl. faxes.

faze. See phase.

fealty, a feudal term, formerly meant "the fidelity owed by a feudal tenant or vassal to a lord"—a fidelity implying duties not to do the lord harm or to blacken the lord's reputation, but to facilitate his prosperity. Today it is used figuratively as an ARCHAISM for fidelity: "If I begin to quote from the opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes, I hardly know where I shall end, yet fealty to a master makes me reluctant to hold back." Benjamin N. Cardozo, Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 472, 480 (1939).

feasance (= the doing or execution of a condition or obligation), though branded "obsolete" in the OED, is current in legal usage. Even so, the term is not nearly as common as the negatives malfeasance and misfeasance. See malfeasance.

feasant. Though not listed in the OED or in W3, this term has been used consistently in American law since the 19th century. The word means merely "doing" and is used primarily in the phrase damage feasant, which could almost always be improved by changing the phrase to refer to something "doing" or "causing" damage—e.g.: "In Sackrider v. McDonald, . . . it was held to be such an abuse of the power of distraining animals damage feasant [read that cause damage], to impound them before the damages were assessed, as to render the original seizure a trespass." Webber v. Hartman, 1 P. 230, 234 (Colo. 1883)./ "It belongs to that small category of personal rights, the assertion of which has always been independent of legal procedure, of which the right to abate a nuisance, under certain circumstances, and the right to distrain cattle damage feasant [read doing damage or causing damage], are examples." Jones v. Ford, 254 F. 645, 649 (8th Cir. 1918)./ "When the shipowner's liability presupposes no preceding consensual relation with the injured party, but arises from a base invasion of his interests, it can be safely asserted that the surrender of only the damage feasant [read damage-causing] vessel is necessary in order to secure limitation." In re U.S. Dredging Corp., 264 F.2d 339, 340 (2d Cir. 1959).

feasible = practicable—i.e., capable of being done or carried out. It does not mean "possible" or "probable," though "[u]nfortunately, most courts . . . have used 'feasible' and 'probable' interchangeably." In re Rape, 104 B.R. 741, 748 n.9 (W.D.N.C. 1989).

feasor. Most commonly appearing in the compound tortfeasor (q.v.), the word feasor often appears on its own or in some other combination. Ordinarily it can be simplified—e.g.: "The referee in the court below decided the case upon the theory that one joint feasor [read tortfeasor or actor] could not recover from another." Johnson v. Matson, 45 F.2d 550, 551 (9th Cir. 1930)./ "On February 17, 1960, counsel for Mahlum having further mulled over the quizzical prospect of paying Carlson, the alleged non-feasor [read non-actor], the proceeds of the sale of his boat, filed a motion to withhold paying Carlson because the money ought to go to Mahlum when he got his decree." Mahlum v. Carlson, 304 F.2d 285, 287 (9th Cir. 1962)./ "Evidence which shows that, following the crime charged, defendant and his joint crime-feasor [read accomplice or partner in crime] possessed weapons with which the crime was committed is relevant . . . ." Ross v. State, 601 S.W.2d 672, 675 (Mo. Ct. App. 1980).

federal. This word should be lowercased unless it is part of a title or of an organization's name. See national.

federal common law; federal general common law. In Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 78 (1938), Justice Brandeis declared: "There is no federal general common law." Apart from a so-called general common law, however, there is a very substantial federal common law, "involving matters in which the federal interest is so strong that the federal courts are free to develop substantive rules to protect that interest." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 273 (4th ed. 1983). The federal common law applies, for example, in disputes between two states.

federal jurisdiction, exclusive. See preemption, federal.

federalism, in AmE, has traditionally referred to the "coordinate relationship and distribution of power between the individual states and the national government." Cathleen C. Herasimchuk, The New Federalism, 68 Tex. L. Rev. 1481, 1485 (1990). Cf. our federalism.

federally, for in federal court or by federal court(s), is unidiomatic among those working with federal courts. E.g., "The appellant argues that the waiver provision as spelled out federally [read in federal court] by Johnson v. Zerbst and locally by Maryland Rule 719c had not been complied with." Howell v. State, 425 A.2d 1361, 1371 (Md. Ct. App. 1981).

federation. See confederation.

fee = an inheritable interest in land, constituting the maximum of legal ownership <fee simple> <fee tail>. Plurals formed from phrases containing this word can be problematic. One textbook, for example, has fee tails but fees simple. The better practice is to make fees plural, whether the phrase is fees simple absolute, fees simple determinable, or fees tail. See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

Fee often acts as an elliptical form of fee simple absolute: "Although it is probably good practice to use the word 'absolute' whenever one is referring to an estate in fee simple that is free of special limitation, condition subsequent, or executory limitation, lawyers frequently refer to such an estate as a 'fee simple' or even as a 'fee.' We may find ourselves slipping into that usage as we go along." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 24 (2d ed. 1984). See fee simple.

feebleness literally denotes a debilitated physical state; feeblemindedness denotes the mental state. In the following sentence, the two are confused: "Traditionally, in cases of incapacity, incompetency, or simply feebleness [read feeblemindedness], a court-supervised guardianship was the only remedy."

feel. A. For think. Feel is a weak and informal substitute for think or believe or maintain or submit. E.g., "In order for this opinion to have any real meaning, we feel [read believe] the stipulation of facts should be summarized in considerable detail." When an idea is phrased on an emotional rather than a cognitive level, the resulting sentence seems to minimize the thoughts being reported—e.g.: "She feels [read thinks or believes] that crime prevention must start with helping small children find their way out of poverty and neglect, and that society's resources should go toward better education and housing, not more jails." Bob Cohn & Eleanor Clift, The Contrary Voice of Janet Reno, Newsweek, 11 Oct. 1993, at 30.

B. Feel bad(ly). When someone is sick or unhappy, that person feels bad—not badly. See ADVERBS (C)

C. Feel like. To avoid using like as a conjunction, writers usually need to change this phrase to feel as if. E.g., "But on a combined income of $60,000, McDonald and his wife Cindy, who have five children, feel like [read feel as if] they're just scraping by." Marc Levinson, Living on the Edge, Newsweek, 4 Nov. 1991, at 23. See like (A).

fee simple. A. Generally. Fee simple, the name of the most comprehensive estate in land, "is a term not likely to be found in modern conversation between laymen, who would in all probability find it quite unintelligible. Yet to a layman of the 14th century the term would have been perfectly intelligible, for it refers to the elementary social relationship of feudalism with which he was fully familiar: the words 'fee' and 'feudal' are closely related." Peter Butt, Land Law 35 (2d ed. 1988). A fee simple was originally an estate that existed only as long as its original owner or any of that owner's heirs were living; since the Middle Ages, the estate has continued indefinitely even when the original owner and all heirs have died.

The phrase in fee simple is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the LAW LATIN in feodo simpliciter, which appears in the statute Quia Emptores (1289).

The common-law fee-simple estates are: (1) fee simple absolute; (2) fee simple conditional; (3) fee simple determinable; and (4) fee simple subject to a condition subsequent. The different estates, which have confusingly similar names—as well as the different names for the same estates—are discussed in the sections that follow. See fee.

B. Fee simple* with No Other Words. When fee simple is used alone, fee simple absolute is almost invariably the intended meaning: "Their contention is that the will vested a life estate only in Fred Sybert, while respondent contends that the Rule in Shelley's Case operated to vest a fee simple estate in him." Sybert v. Sybert, 254 S.W.2d 999, 1000 (Tex. 1953). The plural is fees simple. See fee.

C. Fee simple absolute; fee simple absolute in possession. Since the Law of Property Act was enacted in 1925, England has had only two legal estates: the fee simple absolute in possession and the term of years absolute. Thus, "[i]f one retains the old concepts in all strictness the fee simple has been abolished [in England]." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 64 n.1 (1961). In AmE, by contrast, fee simple absolute is the usual form—not fee simple absolute in possession.

In the phrase fee simple absolute, the word absolute takes on a special meaning: "perpetual."

D. Fee simple conditional. A mostly obsolete estate—lingering only in Iowa, Oregon, and South Carolina—the fee simple conditional is an estate restricted to some specified heirs, exclusive of others. This term should not be confused with the similarly named fee simple subject to a condition subsequent (see G).

E. Fee simple defeasible; qualified fee. These synonyms refer to an estate that ends either because there are no more heirs of the body of the person to whom it is granted, or because a special limitation, condition subsequent, or executory limitation takes effect before the line of heirs runs out. See (F)–(I). See defeasible.

F. Fee simple determinable; fee simple subject to special limitation; fee simple subject to common-law limitation. These synonyms refer to an estate that will automatically end if some specified event ever occurs. If the event is sure to occur (e.g., someone's death), then these terms are inappropriate. The usual phrase is fee simple determinable. (See determinable.) The future interest retained by the grantor is called a possibility of reverter. For more on that phrase, see reversion.

G. Fee simple subject to a condition subsequent; fee simple on a condition subsequent; fee simple upon condition; fee simple subject to a power of termination. These terms denote an estate subject to the grantor's power to end the estate if some specified event happens. American lawyers tend to use the phrase fee simple subject to a condition subsequent, whereas English lawyers tend to use fee simple upon condition. The future interest retained by the grantor is called a power of termination or a right of entry for condition broken, q.v.

H. Fee simple subject to an executory limitation. This phrase denotes a type of fee simple defeasible (see (E)) subject to divestment in favor of someone other than the grantor if a specified event happens.

I. Fee simple subject to special limitation. See (F).

fee-splitting is, in the view of some lawyers, a EUPHEMISM for a certain type of kickback that lawyers on a contingent fee use to reward other lawyers who send them cases: "One rotten aspect worth mentioning is fee splitting, a kind name for kickbacks from personal injury specialists to other lawyers who refer them cases." Letter of John M. Beal, N.Y. Times, 1 Dec. 1989, at 30. In some American states, the practice is considered unethical, but in others it is tolerated.

Even as a noun, the phrase is best hyphenated; but when it functions as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, the hyphen is obligatory <fee-splitting arrangements>.

fee tail. A. Generally. A LOAN TRANSLATION of the LAW LATIN feodum talliatum (lit., "a cut-down fee"), the phrase fee tail means "an estate that is inheritable only by specified descendants of the original grantee." The TERM OF ART formerly used to create a fee tail was the phrase and the heirs of his (or her) body. By special wording, the fee tail might be restricted to male or female descendants: a tail male was formerly common, a tail female rare. The estate is defunct in most American jurisdictions—the exceptions being Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island—and was generally abolished in England in 1925 (though it survives there as an equitable interest). See entail, fee & tail.

The expressions estate tail, estate in fee tail, entailed estate, tenancy in tail, and entail (n.) are sometimes used as synonyms.

B. Fee tail general and fee tail special. A fee tail special arose if the grant was to a donee and the heirs of his body by a particular spouse. A fee tail general arose if no spouse was named.

feign; feint. These words, though they derive from the same French verb (feindre "to touch or shape"), have undergone DIFFERENTIATION in English. To feign is either to make up or fabricate <she feigned an excuse> or to make a false show of <he feigned illness>. To feint is to deliver a pretended blow or attack designed to confuse an opponent momentarily. The word is also, in its older (but still current) sense, used as a noun meaning either a sham or a pretended blow or attack (i.e., the act of feinting).

fellow-servant rule (= the common-law doctrine, now generally defunct, holding that an employer could avoid liability to an employee by showing that an injury to the latter was caused by another employee's negligence) should be hyphenated thus. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

felo-de-se (lit., "felon with respect to oneself") is a synonym and perhaps a EUPHEMISM for suicide (in both senses—i.e., both for the act and for the actor). In modern writing, this GALLICISM seems to appear primarily when the writer wishes to avoid repeating the word suicide—e.g.: "English law stigmatised suicide as a felony; the felo-de-se's property was forfeited, leaving his family impoverished . . . ." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 530 (1978). See suicide.

felonious = (1) of, relating to, or involving a felony <felonious intent>; or (2) constituting or having the character of a felony <felonious assault>. In whichever sense, the word is used rarely of persons, almost always of acts. E.g., "Over the last twenty-five years five judges have been disciplined for associating with criminals; in most of the cases, the judges performed specific favors for their felonious friends [better: felon-friends]." The OED cites but one (19th-century) sentence in which felonious is used of a person in the sense of someone who "has committed felony."

felony (originally a LAW FRENCH word meaning "wicked" or "treacherous") was recognized, as early as the 18th century, to be "a term of loose signification even in the common law of England; and of various import in the statute law of that kingdom." The Federalist No. 42, at 266 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961). Generally, felony denotes one of the two classes of crimes at common law, felonies being serious crimes and misdemeanors being minor crimes. A felony was any offense that involved either the death penalty or a forfeiture of the felon's land and goods.

As that suggests, the difference between a felony and a misdemeanor is determined solely by the possible punishments: in most American states today, a felony is any crime punishable by death or by imprisonment for a year or more, while a misdemeanor is any crime with a lesser punishment.

Before the felony-misdemeanor distinction was abolished in England in 1967, it was widely condemned—e.g.: "[I]n form [the criminal law] remains a sprawling and unwieldy mass, and it still contains a number of anachronisms and anomalies—such as the now valueless and inconvenient distinction between felonies and misdemeanours—which hardly a lawyer in the land would be prepared to defend." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 353–54 (7th ed. 1964). Odd though it seems, most American lawyers would likely resist any move to abolish the distinction. See misdemeano(u)r (B).

felony murder = a death occurring as a result of the commission of a dangerous felony. E.g., "One day in 1931 while waiting to argue a motion in Part One [a New York court], I was for a time an involuntary spectator at the trial of Eric Martin, a youth, hardly more than a boy, charged with a murder committed during a burglary, that is to say 'felony murder.' " Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 324 (1943).

The so-called felony-murder rule (hyphenated thus) refers to the oft-cited doctrine that any homicide resulting from a felony or attempted felony is murder. The frequent formulation, "Homicide committed while perpetrating or attempting a felony is murder," is too broad because it suggests that mere coincidence is sufficient, as opposed to causation. See Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 35 (1957). The best formulation today, then, explicitly excepts all felonies that carry no appreciable risk to human safety. Hence, any homicide is considered murder if the death results from a person's committing (or trying to commit) an inherently dangerous felony. Abolished in England in 1957, the felony-murder rule remains current in most American jurisdictions.

feme covert. See fem(m)e co(u)vert(e).

feme sole = (1) an unmarried woman; (2) a married woman handling the affairs of her separate estate. This LAW FRENCH term is now obsolescent since the distinctions that it denotes are falling into disuse. Following are typical traditional uses: "During their natural lives, they were to use and enjoy the house, subject to their own control, and to be managed by them as femes sole."/ "The court relied upon the analogy of a feme sole who makes a bequest to her surviving husband, saying that the subsequent exercise of volition could not be deemed testamentary in a legal sense."

Historically, feme referred primarily to a married woman: hence a feme sole was ordinarily a woman who had been divorced or widowed, as opposed to just any unmarried woman. For a discussion of other sex-specific forms, see SEXISM (C).

FEMININE ENDINGS. See SEXISM (C).

FEMININE PRONOUNS USED GENERICALLY. See SEXISM (A).

fem(m)e co(u)vert(e) /fem-kəv-ərt/, literally "protected woman" or "sheltered woman," is the traditional term for a married woman. Though it would be spelled differently in modern French, this LAW FRENCH term, in Anglo-American law, is generally spelled feme covert (omitting all the optional letters)—a spelling preferred since Blackstone's time. The plural is femes covert. Today, of course, this term (meaning "a married woman") is entirely unnecessary. See coverture & LAW FRENCH. For a discussion of other sex-specific forms, see SEXISM (C).

femme sole. See feme sole.

fence = (1) a receiver of stolen goods; or (2) a place where stolen goods are sold. Though this use of the word began as underworld slang, it has become standard in criminal law—e.g.: "The receivers of stolen goods almost never 'know' that they have been stolen, in the sense that they could testify to it in a courtroom. The business could not be so conducted, for those who sell the goods—the 'fences'—must keep up a more respectable front than is generally possible for the thieves." U.S. v. Werner, 160 F.2d 438, 441 (2d Cir. 1947)./ "[T]here are professional 'fences' who act as outlets for stolen goods, and goods are sometimes stolen 'to order' . . . ." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 347 (1991).

feodum talliatum. See fee tail.

feoff, v.t.; enfeoff; infeoff. The usual form of the verb meaning "to put in legal possession (of a freehold interest)" is enfeoff. Feoff and infeoff are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

feoff. A. And *enfeoff. Although most of the derivatives are based on feoff—e.g., feoffment, feoffor, feoffee—the usual verb is enfeoff (= to put in legal possession). E.g., "O enfeoffed T and his (or her) heirs to the use of A and his (of her) heirs." A. James Casner & W. Barton Leach, Cases and Text on Property 320 (1984). The verb feoff is properly classifiable as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

B. And fief. Both fief and feoff are pronounced /feef/. Whereas feoff is the variant verb, fief is a noun denoting a fee, or an estate in land held on condition of homage and service to a superior lord, by whom it is granted and in whom the ownership remains. See fee.

C. For feoffee. Occasionally, feoff is misused for feoffee—e.g.: "The Rule [in Shelley's Case] was devised in feudal times to insure feudal landlords the receipt of their rents from their feoffs [read feoffees], or tenants." Sybert v. Sybert, 254 S.W.2d 999, 1001 (Tex. 1953) (Griffin, J., concurring).

feoffee = the transferee of an estate in fee simple; the person to whom a freehold estate in land is conveyed by feoffment, or a trustee invested with a freehold estate in land. E.g., "A collateral relation who inherited had to be of the blood of the first purchaser (or feoffee) of the land."/ "Each feoffee (recipient of a fief), having received the seisin from his feoffor, would be said to be seised, or possessed of an interest in the land." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 11 (2d ed. 1984). See -EE & feoff (C).

feoffer. See feoffor.

feoffment /fef-mənt/ (fr. L. feoffare "to give one a fief") is an ancient form of conveyance usually involving livery of seisin. (See livery of seisin.) At common law, it is the transaction by which a fee is granted. Blackstone defines it as "the gift of any corporeal hereditament to another." 2 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 310 (1766). E.g., "The English common law, influenced by the notion that a life tenant could make a tortious feoffment that barred subsequent exercise of the power, permitted release of all except a power simply collateral."/ "No collateral of the half-blood inherited in any event; when collaterals did inherit, the land remained within the family into which it had been brought by feoffment." feoffor; feoffer. This word, meaning "the transferor of a fee simple," is generally spelled -or. E.g., "On the creation of any estate of freehold, whether in possession or remainder, the seisin must pass out of the transferor (the feoffor), i.e., there must be a livery of seisin."/ "Since the value of the use depended upon the ability of the cestui que use to enforce his claim, the transfer of freeholds to the use of the feoffor or a third-party became common when the Chancellor enforced the feoffee's duties as a routine matter."

The OED notes that, in old lawbooks (from the 15th to the 17th centuries), feoffor was "often misused for feoffee." ferae naturae (L. "of a wild nature") is the law's rather pretentious way, in referring to animals, of saying "wild." The best modern practice, of course, is simply to use the phrase wild animals. See Robert Megarry & H.W.R. Wade, The Law of Real Property 65 (5th ed. 1984) (consistently using wild animals).

But traditionally, legal writers have not been so straightforward. They formerly used the phrase ferae naturae adjectivally, in phrases such as beasts ferae naturae or animals ferae naturae—e.g.: "Any one who stores up a great bulk of water in a reservoir, or keeps a caravan of beasts ferae naturae, is said, by English law, to do so 'at his peril' . . . ." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 173 (13th ed. 1924).

By extension, this Latin genitive has come to take on a noun sense in legal writing, so that it means "wild animals" . Though Latin purists would probably consider this use a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, it is now established in American legal writing. Perhaps the solution is to write wild animals instead.

The Latin purists are quite right, however, to lament another development: some writers mistakenly write fera rather than ferae—e.g.: "Ideas have been compared to fera naturae [read ferae naturae], property rights . . . which are dependent on possession and are lost by escape of a wild animal and likewise by disclosure of an idea." Schonwald v. F. Burkart Mfg. Co., 202 S.W.2d 7, 12 (Mo. 1947). The best solution is to dispense with the Latin altogether.

Festschrift (= a collection of writings forming a volume presented by the authors as a tribute to a [usu. senior] scholar), a German loanword, forms the plurals Festschriften and Festschrifts. For reasons given at PLURALS (A), the better plural in an English-language context is Festschrifts.

feticide. See abortion.

fetus is the clinical term denoting, most broadly, "the product of pregnancy up to the time of birth." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 250 (1978). More narrowly, it has been defined as "a viable unborn child." People v. Smith, 129 Cal. Rptr. 498, 504 (Cal. Ct. App. 1976).

The plural form is fetuses. The old BrE spelling—fœtus—is now disappearing in favor of fetus.

A more connotatively charged term, which partisans sometimes find more suitable to their purposes, is unborn child.

feu (= a feudal holding) is today obsolete everywhere but in Scotland, where it is used not only as a noun—the counterpart of fief—but also as a verb meaning "to give out land upon a feudal arrangement whereby the vassal (buyer) holds land of a superior (the landowner) usually upon the terms that he builds on the land and pays a perpetual rent, or feuduty." Andrew D. Gibb, Students' Glossary of Scottish Legal Terms 38 (A.G.M. Duncan ed., 2d ed. 1982). The verb is inflected feued, feuing.

feudal; feudatory; feudatary; feudatorial. The only important words are feudal and feudatory, the others being NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Feudal = of or relating to a feud or fief, q.v.

Feudatory, as an adjective, means "owing feudal allegiance to; under the overlordship of"; and, as a noun, "one who holds lands by feudal tenure; a feudal vassal." E.g., "In France, every feudatory legislated for his own demesne, but as a necessary result, it followed that an overlord, and even the King, could not legislate for the demesnes of his under-tenants for they were under the jurisdiction of their immediate lord." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 317 (5th ed. 1956).

In the following sentence, feudatory appears where feudal belongs: "The exclusive right of the first-born to the succession and the rules for entailment of estates were originally promulgated in the 'house laws' of the great feudatory [read feudal] chiefs, who compelled weak sovereigns to incorporate them in their land grants . . . ." Stephen Pfeil, "Law," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 86, 89 (1953).

feudalism. This word, a vague word of modern origin, "was completely unknown in the ages to which we apply it, [being] nothing more than a rough generalisation upon the character of mediaeval society." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 507 (5th ed. 1956). Still, the word feudalism is "a convenient way of referring to certain fundamental similarities [that], in spite of large local variations, can be discerned in the social development of all the peoples of western Europe from about the ninth to the thirteenth centuries." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 2 (5th ed. 1955).

What are those similarities? They involved dependent land holding in return for the rendition of services—typically military service. Society was organized largely through a tenurial system, in which everyone—from king to the lowest landowner—was bound by obligation of service and defense. In the later, more sophisticated forms of feudalism, the rights of defense and service are supplemented by the right of jurisdiction. See feu.

fewer; less. Fewer emphasizes number, and less emphasizes degree or quantity. Fewer number and fewest number are illogical tautologies, inasmuch as fewer means "of smaller number." E.g., "The fewest number [read smallest number] of people use the library between 4:30 and 7:00 p.m." [Or, better, read The fewest people use the library between 4:30 and 7:00 p.m.] See less (A) & COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

few in number is a common REDUNDANCY.

fiasco (= a complete failure) forms the plural fiascoes. See PLURALS (C) fiat (= a judge's decree) means "let it be done" in Latin. The word in its broad, popular sense has come to connote arbitrariness: "I cannot pretend to the power by judicial fiat to affect property located in the Bahamas."/ "We agree with the Seventh Circuit that a ruling that the marketing of handguns constitutes an ultrahazardous activity would in practice drive manufacturers out of the business and would produce a handgun ban by judicial fiat."

More technically, fiat also denotes in many Anglo-American jurisdictions any one of a number of decrees rendered by a court in pursuance of its jurisdiction. For example, in Texas practice, most motions must contain a fiat (to be filled in by the court) fixing the time for a hearing on the motion.

fiber is the AmE, fibre the BrE spelling. Frequently in asbestosis cases in the U.S., fibre appears instead of fiber. But the latter spelling is preferred in any context in the U.S. fictional; fictitious; fictive. These forms are distinguishable. Fictional = of, pertaining to, or having the characteristics of "an intentional fabrication" of the mind, i.e., of "a convenient assumption that overlooks known facts in order to achieve an immediate goal" (W3). This is the adjective to be used of legal FICTIONS. E.g., "There are many instances in which equity has protected purely personal rights, though in some instances the courts have reached that result by finding fictional property rights—declaring things property rights that were in truth not of that character."/ "The use of these words in connection with legal relations is, strictly speaking, figurative or fictional."

Fictitious = (1) sham; or (2) imaginary. Here sense (1) is illustrated: "Government officials should be free to make decisions without fear or threat of vexatious or fictitious suits and alleged personal liability."/ "The question is whether A, the acceptor of a bill of exchange, knew that the name of the payee was fictitious." (Eng.)/ "The aspect of the Abscam investigation leading to this bribe began in 1979 when an FBI agent took on the undercover role of one Tony DeVito, president of the fictitious Abdul Enterprises."

Sense (2) here obtains: "After describing a fictitious vehicle on each certificate, he then obtained titles and registrations from the state."/ "The ejectment action involved a fictitious party plaintiff."

In the following sentences, fictitious is used where fictional would be better: "That some rule of evidence or law could have been evolved by the court to require the court to hold by some fictitious [read fictional] or artificial reasoning that the testatrix did not know the contents of the will is repugnant, to say the least." (Eng.)/ "The decision of Sachs J. in the Crerar case will help the probate court to give effect to the wishes of other testators, and to avoid imputing to them a fictitious [read fictional] knowledge and approval of testamentary documents whose meaning they did not know and would not have approved." (Eng.)

Fictive = having the capacity of imaginative creation <fictive talent>. Apart from this narrow sense, rarely of use in legal writing, fictive is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of both fictional and fictitious. E.g., "There has been some fictive [read fictional] talk to the effect that the reason why a nonresident can be subjected to a state's jurisdiction is that the nonresident has impliedly consented to be sued there." (Beginning and ending a sentence with the word there is to be avoided.)

FICTIONS. To lawyers, fictions are assumptions that conceal, or presume to conceal, the fact that a rule of law has undergone alteration, its letter remaining unchanged, its operation being modified. See Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 21–22 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). To nonlawyers, of course, the phrase legal fiction means "a surreal untruth."

> In jurisprudence a legal fiction denotes an uncontrovertible averment in an action In the history of English law legal fictions have had three main functions The first was to extend the jurisdiction of a court: such was the averment, used to give the Court of Exchequer jurisdiction, that the plaintiff was indebted to the Crown but was the less capable of discharging his debt by reason of the defendant's default to him (which was the true cause of action), or the averment that a contract in fact made abroad was made at the Royal Exchange in Cheapside—a decisive step towards the embodiment into the common law of the whole body of the law merchant. Secondly, legal fictions were designed to avoid cumbersome and archaic forms of action: thus, the fictitious lease, entry and ouster made the action of ejectment applicable to freeholds to the exclusion of the old real actions. Thirdly, fictions were used to extend the scope of a remedy: for example, the allegation that the defendant had found the plaintiff's chattel but refused to deliver it up made the superior remedy in trover not only supersede the action of detinue [q.v.] but also available for most claims in relation to chattels.
> Jocelyn Simon, English Idioms from the Law, 76 Law Q. Rev. 283, 304 (1960).

To understand legal fictions we must understand the difference between what is said and what is actually meant: "The best way to talk clearly and precisely and to talk sense is to understand as fully as possible the relation between predication and suggestion, between 'saying' and 'meaning.'" Owen Barfield, "Poetic Diction and Legal Fictions," in The Importance of Language 51, 71 (Max Black ed. 1962). A legal fiction is intended not to deceive, but to mask a change in the law, hence it is appropriately termed a "growing pain" in the language of the law. See Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 21–22 (1967).

Lord Devlin's caution is an apt one: "Legal fictions are dangerous because they have a tendency to spread." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 162 (1979).

fictitious; fictive. See fictional.

fides. See bona fides & mala fide(s).

fiduciary; fiducial. Fiduciary, as both adjective and noun, is the unvarying legal form of the word <fiduciary relationship> <bound as a fiduciary>. Fiducial, used by historians and philosophers in certain contexts, has not found a home in the law.

fief. See feoff.

fiefdom is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of fief.

fieri facias (lit. "that you cause to be done") is a LATINISM that has given its name to a writ of execution for the collection of a money judgment; it directs the marshal or sheriff to seize and sell enough of the defendant's property to satisfy the judgment. It is commonly abbreviated fi. fa. or Fi Fa. and pronounced /fi-fay/, not /fee-fah/—e.g.: "Fi. Fa. and writs of possession are still in common use, and (retaining their common-law form) have turned out to be the principal survivors of the medieval writ system." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 79 (3d ed. 1990).

Fifth Amendment. The idiom is to take the Fifth Amendment (= to remain silent in order to avoid incriminating oneself), not to plead the Fifth Amendment—e.g.: "The possibility that the money possessed by Ms. Perez was generated by another illegal activity, prostitution, was presented when Ms. Perez pleaded [read took] the Fifth Amendment when the state asked her if she earned any of her money from prostitution." State v. Seventy-Seven Thousand Fourteen & No/100 ($77,014.00) Dollars, 607 So. 2d 576, 585 (La. Ct. App. 1992)./ "They denied beating the defendant, seeing him beaten or that the defendant ever asked for an attorney or pleaded the Fifth Amendment [read invoked the Fifth Amendment]." People v. Hendrix, 620 N.E.2d 1176, 1185 (Ill. App. Ct. 1993).

Fifteen, the. This phrase formerly referred to the old Court of Session, in Scotland. E.g., " 'The Fifteen' decided against the minister and awarded damages against him." Arnold D. McNair, Dr Johnson and the Law 54 (1948). Today the Court of Session has 25 (or more) judges.

filt(e)rable. The preferred spelling is filterable.

file is often used as an ellipsis for file suit <file against the company>.

final. In reference to judgments, Justice Hugo Black exaggerated only slightly in commenting that "there is no more ambiguous word [than final] in all the legal lexicon." F.T.C. v. Minneapolis-Honeywell Regulator Co., 344 U.S. 206, 215 (1952) (Black, J., dissenting). The reason is that the U.S. Supreme Court's holdings on what constitutes a final judgment are inconsistent. But the problem is one of vagueness, properly speaking, not AMBIGUITY, as Black termed it. And, though a verbal formula for finality has proved elusive, "in almost all situations it is entirely clear, either from the nature of the order or from a crystallized body of decisions, that a particular order is or is not final." Charles A. Wright, Law of Federal Courts 740 (5th ed. 1994).

final analysis, in the. See in the final analysis.

finalize = (1) (v.t.) to complete; bring to an end; put in final form; or (2) (v.i.) to conclude. Originally an Australianism, finalize is a favorite word of jargonmongers. For that reason alone, and also because it is a NEOLOGISM that does not fill a gap in the language, it is to be avoided. E.g., "No decision of this court has squarely held that we have a capricious residual power to finalize [read make final or bring to an end] otherwise nonfinal appeals."/ "Westinghouse responded to the solicitation with a series of bids that were finalized [read made final] in a full proposal to Reynolds offering to manufacture the desired equipment for about $250,000." See -IZE.

final outcome; final result. These are common REDUNDANCIES, inasmuch as an outcome or result, as generally understood, is final. E.g., "We do not intimate what the final result [better: omit final] should be, but as for an alleged violation of the Voting Rights Act, we should not write until the court below shows that it considered all the evidence." Cf. end result & ultimate destination.

FINAL PREPOSITION. See PREPOSITIONS (A).

financeable. So spelled.

financ(i)er. Financer = one who finances a particular undertaking or on a particular occasion. E.g., "Prior to 1972, commentators debated inconclusively over whether a 'true' consigner was required to notify a secured financer of the consignee's inventory whose agreement included an after-acquired property clause." Financier = one whose business it is to lend money.

finders, keepers. See MAXIMS.

finding; holding. A court properly makes findings of fact and holdings or conclusions of law. The writer of the following sentence observed the distinction meticulously: "Because we find that the jury's finding of concurrent fault is amply supported by the evidence, we hold that appellee is entitled to full indemnity."

In appellate courts, properly, only holdings are affirmed, whereas factual findings are disturbed only when clearly erroneous, against the great weight of the evidence, etc., depending on the standard of review. Generally, it is not correct for an appellate court to say that it affirms a finding of fact.

Nor should the verb find be used when the court rules on a point of law. E.g., "We find [read hold] that the trial court properly instructed the jury on the Louisiana law of strict liability of the custodian of a defective thing under La. Civil Code art. 2317." See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT & fact-finding.

finicky is the preferred spelling—not finnicky. Finical is a pedantic variant.

finis = end; conclusion. This term should be used just as if one of the defining words were in its place: "But sometimes it denotes the judgment that writes finis [read a finis] to the entire litigation, after all appellate remedies have been either exhausted or, as here, abandoned." Sometimes finis is used to signal the end of a book; using it in this way has the sanction of long tradition.

In BrE, the word sometimes denotes a compromise and settlement—e.g.: "The parties then applied to the court to compromise the action; by the terms of the compromise (finis) the intending vendor admitted that the land belonged to the intending purchaser because he had given it to him, and the terms of the compromise were recorded in the court records." Peter Butt, Land Law 102 (2d ed. 1988).

finnicky. See finicky.

firing the client. When deciding that they will no longer represent a given client, lawyers (like literary agents and accountants) sometimes say that they are "firing" the client—e.g.:

- "In sum, it seems fair to say that the courts look the least favorably on conflicts created by a lawyer filing suit against a current client, and then 'firing' the client who refuses to consent to conflict." Samuel R. Miller et al., Conflicts of Interest in Corporate Litigation, Bus. Lawyer, Nov. 1992, at 141, 195.
- "Has the client hired and fired other lawyers? Has another lawyer fired the client?" Carole C. Jordan, Hungry Lawyers Need to Choose Work Carefully, Nat'l L.J., 12 April 1993, at S16.
- "When one client insisted that he answer his telephone calls, Natsis took an unusual step. 'I fired the client,' he says. 'I'm not just a lawyer.' " Commercial Real Estate Who's Who Towers of Influence: Rising Stars, L.A. Bus. J., 20 March 1994, § 2, at 11.

This phrasing makes perfect sense when read in light of the relevant OED definition of fire, which is labeled American slang dating from the late 19th century: "to turn (any one) out of a place; to eject or expel forcibly; to dismiss or discharge peremptorily."

But it is an odd usage, since generally in AmE only the party who hires can be said to fire. W10 perhaps more accurately defines this sense—"to dismiss from a position"—for only the employer can be said to fire the employee, not vice versa. One can understand, however, how the usage emerged among lawyers: they retain the upper hand in their client relations if they can be said to fire clients, even though they could never go out and "hire" clients.

The age-old struggle to establish just who rejected whom is typified by the following exchange between two friends: "I quit because the boss used repulsive language." "What did he say?" "He said, 'You're fired!' " Anon., as quoted in The Penguin Dictionary of Modern Humorous Quotations 258 (Fred Metcalf ed., 1987).

firm. This term is the title under which one or more persons carry on business jointly, or the partnership itself by which they are united for business purposes. A firm is not a corporation but an association. Cf. organization.

firm offer = one that includes a promise not to revoke it for a specified period.

first and foremost is a CLICHÉ that should not be used merely for first. The OED describes it as a "strengthened" phrase and dates it from the 16th century first-come-first-served is correct; first-come-first-serve is the mistaken rendition that is commonly encountered.

first impression, case (or question) of. This phrase is an English equivalent of the LATINISMS res nova and res integra. E.g., "With that principle in mind, we shall proceed to consider the appropriate scope of Section 501, a question of first impression in this circuit." See res integra.

first instance. The phrase in the first instance, a chameleon-hued and often a FLOTSAM PHRASE, is "now used alternatively to first, at first, or in the first place. It comes from the sense of instance as a suit or process in a court of justice. . . . We still speak of a court of first instance [i.e., a trial court]." Jocelyn Simon, English Idioms from the Law, 76 Law Q. Rev. 429, 433 (1960). E.g., "It seemed to him undesirable that there should be conflicting decisions by judges of first instance [i.e., trial judges] on such a point."/ "At first instance Uthwatt, J. thought that the annuitants had a right to the capital sum, the rule being a rule of law." Anthony R. Mellows, The Law of Succession 569 (3d ed. 1977). See CHAMELEONHUED WORDS & court of first instance.

Here the phrase is used for in the first place: "The purpose of that legal maxim in the first instance is the protection of minor children." We might classify in the first instance as a SET PHRASE, ruling out the variation here in evidence: "The trial court should have considered this overlooked but timely factual opposition in the original instance [read first instance]." See instance.

firstly, secondly, thirdly, etc. are today considered inferior to first, second, third, etc. Many stylists prefer using first over firstly even where the remaining signposts are secondly and thirdly. See ENUMERATIONS (A).

FIRST PERSON. As a general matter, it has been said that "the first person (I, we, us) is not usually used in legal writing because in an analysis of fact and law it seems best to have the emphasis on the facts and the law, and not on the analyzer." Norman Brand & John O. White, Legal Writing: The Strategy of Persuasion 123 (1976). This statement is true of DRAFTING and of BRIEF WRITING, but not of other types of legal writing, such as business letters, judicial opinions, and scholarly commentary. It is difficult if not impossible to state a sweeping rule applicable to all legal writing, diverse as it is. Instead, a few specific topics are here addressed in turn.

A. Awkward Avoidance of First Person. Such artifices as this writer, the present writer, and other graceless circumlocutions serve no real stylistic purpose and are inferior to the straightforward pronouns I and me. Late in his career as a legal writer, Jerome Frank confessed that he had long shunned the first-person pronoun, preferring the writer to I on the assumption that the indirect phrasing signified modesty. With age he became wiser and concluded: "To say I removes a false impression of a Jovian aloofness." Courts on Trial vii–viii (1950).

Of one common set of self-obscuring devices—it is suggested that, it is proposed that, and it is submitted that—Fred Rodell observed, "whether the writers really suppose that such constructions clothe them in anonymity so that people cannot guess who is suggesting and who is proposing, I do not know." Goodbye to Law Reviews—Revisited, 48 Va. L. Rev. 279, 280 (1962). We do know, however, that these phrases often make sentences read as if they had been "translated from the German by someone with a rather meager knowledge of English." Id. See it is submitted that & undersigned.

None of this should suggest, however, that every personal opinion should include the word I. Most opinions are transparently opinions, and they therefore need no direct mention of the writer—e.g.: "Though Holmes is routinely lionized as a great writer, Justice Jackson was the finest writer ever to sit on the high court." No moderately sophisticated reader would assume that this statement is anything more than an opinion. Even so, it is much more forceful and convincing when stated without the first person.

B. The Collegial we of Judges. The collegial we in which judges write their opinions is a useful stylistic device; but it sometimes traverses time with mind-boggling ease: "The court of appeals holding conflicts with our holdings in Hendon v. Pugh, 46 Tex. 211, 212 (1876) and Faver v. Robinson, 46 Tex. 204 (1876). In Hendon, we remanded a default judgment." Uvalde Country Club v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 690 S.W.2d 884, 884 (Tex. 1985). It is questionable whether we really works when used by a modern court to overleap such a stretch of time; some less strained expression like this court might have been better in that sentence.

C. Approaching Autobiography. For a highly autobiographical and first-personish judicial opinion, see Paine & Williams v. Baldwin Rubber Co., 23 F. Supp. 485 (E.D. Mich. 1938) (per Tuttle, J.). This opinion on a patent question is larded with language such as, "I hold that . . . ," "I take the case as I would an ordinary patent case," and "It seems to me that . . . ." The capstone, however, is the following passage, which I quote at length to convey the full flavor of the autobiographical style at its most personal and anecdotal:

> My experience began in the country and on the farm. I never laid the carpet directly in contact with the floor. The floor was a pretty rough one. Our loosely compacted base was straw or the old weekly newspapers. The usual thing was to put straw or paper under that carpet to protect it. The purposes were just the same as the purposes that this patent had in mind. It was yielding and would come back with a certain degree of resilience, it made it warmer when the wind got under the house, it protected against the cold, made the temperature more uniform, was nicer to walk over, didn't wear out so quickly. I can't think of any of the things that would be in the Turner patent that were not right in that old carpet with the papers under it, unless it be the fabric, and I say that is no[t] a material part of the claim. That, however, was in a way present. It was not uncommon to cover the floor with straw, place papers over the straw, and then stretch the carpet over the paper. The paper served as a fabric to hold the loose straw in place
> The carpets of our boyhood were not only flexible but they extended out beyond the margin of the fibrous substance which was underneath the carpet. No one ever carried the straw out to the edge of the carpet. We always kept it back. We didn't want it sticking out with the whiskery effect described. No woman would want straw sticking out around her carpet
> Id. at 486–87.

fisc [fr. L. fiscus "the imperial treasury"] = the public treasury. The OED notes that the word is "now rare," but it is not uncommon in American legal writing. E.g., "[C]ases like this . . . cumulatively pose a negligible threat to the national fisc." Swietlik v. U.S., 779 F.2d 1306, 1313 (7th Cir. 1985) (Cudahy, J., dissenting)./ "But protection of the fisc does not motivate all 'impoundments'; the executive can also use that power to obstruct programs and policies with which he disagrees."/ "Any profits obtained by Ginnie Mae inure solely to the benefit of the federal fisc." (N.B.: Public fisc, unlike federal fisc, is a REDUNDANCY.)

In Scots law, the word was formerly spelled fisk, and it means specifically "the public treasury or 'Crown,' to which estates lapse by escheat" (OED).

fishing expedition is a CLICHE used to describe (contemptuously) an opponent's attempt, through discovery, to elicit information that might help that opponent. The phrase ought to be given a rest, as the Supreme Court urged long ago: "No longer can the time-honored cry of 'fishing expedition' serve to preclude a party from inquiring into the facts underlying his opponent's case." Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 507 (1947).

fit > fitted > fitted; fit > fit > fit. Historically, the verb fit became fitted in both the past tense and the past participle. Since the mid-20th century, however, AmE has witnessed a shift from fitted to fit.

Traditionally, fit would have been considered incorrect as a past-tense verb. But it began appearing in journalism and even scholarly writing as early as the 1950s. See David S. Berkeley, The Past Tense of "Fit," 30 Am. Speech 311 (1955). This casualism appears even in what is generally considered well-edited journalism: "Gordon Getty had never quite fit in at his father's oil company." Wall St. J., 20 Dec. 1985, at 1./ "Judge Ciparick was overruled by an appeals court, which said that even a lopsided race fit the precise wording of the America's Cup deed." L. Gordon Crovitz, Even Gentlemanly Yachtsmen Go to Court, But Why Let Them? Wall St. J., 16 May 1990, at A17. And it has surfaced in fine scholarly writing—e.g.: "English land tenure, and the English way of life among landed gentry, fit [read fitted] this social order more than was true in the North." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 66 (2d ed. 1985).

The traditionally correct past tense still surfaces—esp. in BrE—but in AmE it is becoming rarer (and stuffier) year by year: "We may leave to others the question whether the conception can be fitted to our old and modern systems of pleading." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 100 (1945)./ "[I]t is wise before deciding to use it to have regard to the tools with which it can be fitted and to the machinery [that] operates it." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 20 (1968)./ "Absolute liability also fitted into an aspect of the objective theory of contract . . . ." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 48 (1974). Cf. retrofit.

fit and proper is a tiresome legalistic doublet with no claim to being either a TERM OF ART or a melodious phrase. One should write either fit or proper, without yoking them together so predictably. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS fitted. See fit.

fixture – an article that has been attached to land in such a way that, in law, it forms part of the land. The term denotes a special type of property that is a hybrid between real property and personal property: a fixture, though considered real property, was once personal property and may be again someday (if removed).

flack. See flak.

flagrancy; flagrance. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

flagrant. See blatant.

flagrante delicto. See in flagrante delicto.

flagrant necessity. See blatant.

flair. See flare.

flak (= criticism) is sometimes misspelled flack, which is the proper spelling of the term meaning "a press agent."

flammable; inflammable. The former is now accepted as standard in BrE and AmE alike. Though examples of its use date back to 1813, in recent years it has become widespread as a substitute for inflammable, in which some persons mistook the prefix in- to be negative rather than intensive. Traditionally, the forms were inflammable and noninflammable; today they are flammable and nonflammable. Purists have lost the fight to retain the older forms. See NEGATIVES (B) & NON-flare; flair. Flare, n., = a sudden outburst of flame; an unsteady light. Flair, n., = (1) outstanding skill or ability in some field; or (2) originality, stylishness. The most common confusion occurs when flare displaces flair—e.g.: "District Attorney Jerome, who was an intimate friend of Hapgood, turned the actual trial of the case over to Keyran O'Conner, a capable assistant with a flare [read flair] for picturesque diction." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 168 (1943)./ "It is a chance to show we have the imagination and the flare [read flair] and the vision." Geordie Grieg, £1 Billion Plan to Restore Britain's Heritage by AD 2000, Sunday Times, 1 July 1990, at 1-1.

Although flair is exclusively a noun, flare can function as a verb in several senses: (1) to burst into flame; (2) to erupt suddenly; (3) to become suddenly angry; (4) to expand outward in shape; or (5) to signal with a flash of light. Occasionally, flair is misused for flare in its verb senses, here in sense (2): "The controversy surrounding frozen embryos flaired [read flared] recently with the death of a wealthy Los Angeles couple and the discovery of two 'orphaned' embryos which the couple had frozen and stored in Australia." Marcia J. Wurmbrand, Note, Frozen Embryos: Moral, Social, and Legal Implications, 59 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1079, 1100 n.18 (1986).

flaunt; flout. Confusion of these terms is distressingly common. Flout means "to contravene or disregard; to treat with contempt." Flaunt means "to show off or parade (something) in an ostentatious manner," but is often incorrectly used for flout, perhaps because it is misunderstood as a telescoped version of flout and taunt. E.g., "Despite the fact that both parties flaunt [read flout] local rules regarding the length of supporting memoranda, neither really addresses the 'successor in interest' notice question in any meaningful way." Hemstreet v. Banctec, Inc., 748 F. Supp. 667, 669 n.2 (N.D. Ill. 1990)./ "CSW flaunted [read flouted] the rules and failed to properly credit and calculate student refunds." Jackson v. Culinary Sch. of Washington, 788 F. Supp. 1233, 1243 (D.D.C. 1992).

Of course, flaunt is most often used correctly—e.g.: "In February 1978, Bryant urged the Oklahoma legislature to pass the anti-advocacy statute to stop 'the flaunting of homosexuality' and to protect schoolchildren."/ "Words like 'reasonable,' 'substantial,' and 'satisfactory' flaunt their lack of precision."

Flout, meanwhile, never seems to cause a problem—e.g.: "The offenses did not involve any question of the flouting of military authority, the security of a military post, or the integrity of military property."/ "A man may not flout with impunity his obligation to provide necessaries to his dependent children."

One federal appellate judge who misused flaunt for flout in a published opinion, only to be sic'd and corrected by judges who later quoted him, appealed to W3 and its editors, who, of course, accept as standard any usage that can be documented with any frequency at all. The judge then attempted to justify his error and pledged to persist in it. See William Safire, I Stand Corrected 158–59 (1984). Seeking refuge in a nonprescriptive dictionary, however, merely ignores the all-important distinction between formal contexts, on the one hand, in which the strictest standards of usage must apply, and informal contexts, on the other, in which venial faults of grammar or usage may, if we are lucky, go unnoticed (or unmentioned). Judges' written opinions fall into the former category.

floes (= sheets of ice [fr. Norweg. flo, meaning "flat layer"]) should not be confused with flows: "Hovering over the ice flows [read floes], they looked for survivors amid the wreckage and debris."

flood of, a. See SYNESIS.

flotsam; jetsam; lagan. Blackstone called these "the barbarous and uncouth appellations" for goods abandoned at sea. 2 William Blackstone, Commentaries 292–93 (Tucker ed. 1803). Flotsam is goods that are cast into the sea and float on the surface of the water. Jetsam is goods thrown overboard that sink in the sea and remain under water. Lagan is goods sunk in the sea but attached to a buoy so that they may be found again. Flotsan and ligan are obsolete spellings of flotsam and lagan.

These terms have largely outlived their usefulness, except in metaphorical senses. Flotsam and jetsam is the CLICHÉ used figuratively to mean "miscellaneous unimportant materials; dispensable articles."

FLOTSAM PHRASES just take up space without adding to the meaning of a sentence. Thus there is usually no reason, where it is clear whose opinion is being expressed, to write In my opinion or It seems to me that. Other examples are hereby, in terms of, on a . . . basis, my sense is that, in the first instance, and the fact that. (Admittedly, some of these phrases may be useful in speech.) A favorite flotsam phrase of lawyers in their pleadings is at all relevant times: "At all relevant times, Burndy and Teledyne were competitors in the manufacture and sale of split bolt connectors." We have enough written words without these mere space-fillers.

flounder; founder. Both verbs signal failure, but the literal senses, and therefore the images conveyed metaphorically, differ. To flounder is to struggle and plunge as if in mud. To founder is (of a ship) to fill with water and sink, (of a building) to fall down or give way, (of a horseback rider) to fall to the ground.

flout. See flaunt.

flowchart, v.t. The verbal use of this word is not recorded in the dictionaries, although it was perhaps inevitable, what with the verbal use of chart. W10 records the gerund flowcharting but not the verb to flowchart, here illustrated: "To the extent that actual, historical vacancies in the employer's workforce can be flowcharted with reasonable accuracy, the court should award back pay to the minority employees who . . . would have occupied those vacancies but for discrimination." U.S. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 520 F.2d 1043, 1055 (5th Cir. 1975).

flowed; flown. These words, surprisingly, are frequently confused. Flowed is the past tense and past participle of flow. Flown is the past participle of fly. See overfly.

flow from. In legal writing, few things derive from, result from, or are caused by other things; effects always seem to flow from causes. This is one of our most overworked legal CLICHÉS. E.g., "Our analysis necessarily flows from Strickland v. Washington."/ "To show antitrust injury, the plaintiff must establish that the injury to his business flowed from defendant's alleged monopolization of the retail truck market."/ "There is no injury in law resulting in damages except that which flows from an unlawful act "/ "We conclude that any fraud conferred on Borg-Warner no rights in addition to those flowing from its status as a holder of an unperfected security interest."

A related locution is follow from: "The complaint also states that Swift was substantially certain the Trupiano's injuries would follow from its intentional acts."/ "The trust doctrine purportedly follows from normative principles."

flown. See flowed.

fly in the face of is a legal CLICHÉ. E.g., "[I]f we said that . . . , we should be flying in the face of a rule that is based on a very wide induction." (Maitland)/ "In the present case it flies in the face of common sense to say that there was a true consent to the marriage when the parties knew each other by sight for no more than minutes and when they have not even spent one whole day together as man and wife." (Eng.)

Fly in the teeth of is an inexcusable rending of the cliché. "[N]either court is required to accept, as credible, unsupported self-serving testimony that flies in the teeth of unimpeachable contradictory evidence and universal experience." New England Merchants Nat'l Bank v. Rosenfield, 679 F.2d 467, 473 (5th Cir. 1982). Cf. face of, in the.

F.O.B.; F.A.S.; C.I.F. These mercantile abbreviations—short for free on board, free alongside, and cost, insurance, and freight—denote types of contracts for the international sale of goods, and now also sales involving domestic transportation. With an F.O.B. contract, the seller's duty is fulfilled by placing the goods aboard the carrier. (Though some writers make the letters lowercase (f.o.b.), the capitalized form predominates.) Domestically, the use of F.O.B. [destination] indicates that freight charges have been paid to transport the goods as far as the named destination, whatever it may be (e.g., seller's plant or buyer's dock).

The term F.A.S. is nearly synonymous with F.O.B. in the context of contracts of water carriage. The phrasing is commonly F.A.S. vessel at a named port. But F.A.S. vessel differs from F.O.B. vessel in a significant way: "In the former case seller delivers at the wharf but is under no duty to see the loading: a 'received for shipment' bill of lading would be an appropriate document for him to tender. F.O.B. vessel, however, requires seller to bear the risk until the loading has been completed; only an 'on board' bill of lading would evidence the completion of his duties." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 106 (2d ed. 1975).

With a C.I.F. contract, the seller agrees not only to supply the goods but also to make a contract of carriage with a sea carrier (under which the goods will be delivered at the contract port of destination), to pay the freight, and to insure the goods while they are in transit.

focus, n. Pl. foci /foh-sI/ or focuses. The plural foci may strike readers as pretentious in ordinary prose—e.g.: "One of the foci [read, perhaps, focuses] of recent discussions of tort reform has been the suggestion that a prevailing defendant be allowed to resolve its attorney's fees."

foia, v.t.; foiable. In the slang of administrative lawyers, foiable documents are subject to disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), and citizens may foia (= seek to obtain) them under that Act. Common in oral use, there is little written evidence of these terms.

foist (= to falsely present [something] as genuine or superior) takes the preposition on. E.g., "It does not in fact impute moral turpitude to plaintiff in foisting an article of the characteristics described by defendant upon [read on] the public." When the phrase is as unidiomatic as foist with, a different verb is in order: "An employer is foisted with [read bears the] responsibility to a third party if his employee commits a tort in the course of his employment." Stanley Berwin, Pocket Lawyer 231 (1986).

Foist off on is awkward and prolix: "Defendant has been shown to have foisted bogus companies off on [read on] the public." The OED quotes folderol; falderol. The former is the preferred spelling for this word, which means either "nonsense" or "a useless trifle."

follow; apply. In the best usage, these terms are distinguishable in describing a court's actions. A court is said to follow a precedent when it rules that the precedent bears on and affects the decision on an important point in a pending dispute. Typically, this verb suggests that the court has discretion to choose between two or more lines of authority, or holds the precedent to be persuasive rather than binding. Apply, by contrast, usually suggests that a precedent unambiguously binds the decision-maker, so that the decision is more mechanical and less discretionary. Loosely, however, the two verbs are used interchangeably.

follow from. See flow from.

following (= after), when used to begin a sentence or clause, often results in a MISPLACED MODIFIER and a MISCUE—e.g.: "Following [read After] a bench trial, the district court voided portions of the plaintiff's settlement agreement."/ "Following [read After] a bench trial on the issue of liability, the district court held that the lessees and operators of the Galveston Bridge were 80% at fault." The problem, of course, is that the reader might expect following to function as a participle, as here: "Following these precedents, we affirm."

foment is incorrect as a noun for fomentation. "There is a lot of foment [read fomentation] going on around the Israeli border." It seems likely, however, that the writer confused ferment (= agitation) with foment (= to incite or rouse).

food fare. See fare.

fool for a client. From the early 19th century, it has been commonly said: "A man who is his own lawyer has a fool for a client." The earliest recorded variant dates from 1809: "He who is always his own counsellor will often have a fool for his client." Port Folio (Philadelphia), Aug. 1809, at 132.

Many occurrences are allusive only. For example, in 1887, when the Alabama Bar Association considered a code of conduct for its members, one suggested provision would have prevented lawyers from conducting their own cases. But that was deleted on constitutional grounds, the proponent of the change saying, "It is one of the American privileges to make a fool of yourself, and it is guaranteed by the Constitution, and I do not see anything wrong with it." Quoted in Walter P. Armstrong, Jr., A Century of Legal Ethics, 64 A.B.A. J. 1063, 1064 (1978).

Today, the quip is common in AmE and BrE alike—common enough, perhaps, to be a CLICHE that fresh writers would prefer to frame anew: "[A] lawyer never appears to worse advantage than when pleading his own cause." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 188 (1969).

Like many other quotations and SET PHRASES, this one sometimes gets mangled, usually when the writer substitutes attorney for client as the final word: "[Y]ou know, the old expression, someone who represents himself has a fool for an attorney." U.S. v. Hoffer, 423 F. Supp. 811, 814 (S.D.N.Y. 1976)./ "The old saying that the person who fights his own case has a fool for an attorney may have been invented by lawyers, but there is a lot of truth in it." Be Careful How You Say "I Quit," Sunday Times, 26 Nov. 1989, at E20. Although, logically speaking, the two formulations add up to the same thing, the original formulation is far wittier because of the ironic turn at the end (shifting from lawyer to client as if they were two persons).

footnote; endnote. Technically, footnotes appear at the foot of the page, and endnotes at the end of an article or chapter or at the end of a book. But endnotes are often called footnotes.

FOOTNOTES. A. Textual Footnotes. In modern legal writing, textual footnotes are mostly a scourge. As a writer, you might advantageously learn to detest them.

The thoroughly sensible policy of The Scribes Journal of Legal Writing, as stated inside the front cover, merits wide adherence: "We discourage footnotes that contain substantive discussion; footnotes used to cite pertinent materials are fully acceptable."

B. For Citations. In most types of legal writing, footnotes are a splendid place for citations, especially if the citations are followed by brief explanatory parentheticals. See CITATION OF CASES (D)

FOR-, FORE-. These prefixes, it will be observed in many of the entries following, have caused a great deal of confusion. One can usually arrive at the correct prefix for any given word by remembering that for- means either "completely" or "against," and that fore- means "before." See forbear & forego.

The two are confused here: "The traditional English approach rests on three doctrines—unforseen [read unforeseen] mode, mistaken object, and transferred fault." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 174 (1991).

for. See as (A).

fora. See forum.

for all intents and purposes; to all intents and purposes. These synonymous phrases both mean "for practical purposes." They are about equally common—e.g.: "The legacy should pass to the heirs, devisees, distributees, etc. of such devisee or legatee, in like manner, to all intents and purposes, in law and in equity, as if such devisee or legatee had survived the testator and had then died intestate."/ "On these facts the Seventh Circuit held that the district court erred in referring the case to a magistrate without the consent of the parties because the hearing before the magistrate was, for all intents and purposes, a civil trial." Often this collocation qualifies as a FLOTSAM PHRASE.

Because some people mishear the phrase, the erroneous form all intensive purposes has arisen—e.g., "[T]heir fellow officer . . . was for all intensive purposes [read for all intents and purposes] an eye witness to the commission of this offense." State v. Bland, 255 So. 2d 723, 725 (La. 1971)./ "When the charge, for all intensive purposes [read for all intents and purposes], is that the jury will be sequestered, then there is actual prejudice to the defendant." Underwood v. Kelly, 692 F. Supp. 146, 152 (E.D.N.Y. 1988)./ "In American Computer Communication Corp., Inc. (American), a Delaware corporation, which, for all intensive purposes [read for all intents and purposes], had all of its operations in Ohio, proposed to make an offering to Ohio residents under the Rule." Kevin C. Dicken, Rule 147: Those Hard to Find No-Action Letters, 17 Cap. U.L. Rev. 17, 33 (1987).

forbade. See forbid.

forbear, v.t.; forebear, n. These words are not cognate, though they are confused in every conceivable way. Forbear is the verb meaning "to refrain from objecting to; to tolerate." The verb is inflected forbear > forbore > forborne. E.g., "The plaintiff alleged that she forbore to sing for him, though engaged, whereby she lost great profits." (Eng.)

Forebear, the noun, means "ancestor" (usually used in the plural). Forebearer is an incorrect form of this noun. Forbear is occasionally misused for forebear: "We approach the study of history not merely in a spirit of piety to our forbears [read forebears] but our purpose will be to scan the panorama with a certain discernment."/ "D refused to vacate rooms belonging to the Government which he and his forbears [read forebears] had occupied for seventy years . . . ." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 42 (2d ed. 1961).

The opposite error, though less common, also occurs (quite ironically, in the second sentence): "A promise to forebear [read forbear], even where a promise is implicit, may be sufficient consideration." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 295 (2d ed. 1979)./ "It is tempting, but I forebear [read forbear] to comment on Vickers' own English lest someone else go on to find the faults in mine . . . ." Letter from H. Young, City Voice [Wellington, N.Z.], 23 Sept. 1993, at 18.

Forebearance is not a word; the term is forbearance: "It appears to be settled law that the forebearance [read forbearance] of some of the salvors to press their claims, whatever the reason for their forebearance [read forbearance], does not result in a windfall recovery for those who do claim." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 570 (2d ed. 1975).

For the difference between forbearance and omission, see omission.

forbid > forbade > forbidden. Forbid generally takes the preposition to or, less formally, from. Fowler stated that forbid from doing is unidiomatic, but it is increasingly common in AmE—e.g.: "[Locke] sharply distinguished the respective spheres of Church and State and forbade each from meddling in the other." Clifford Orwin, Civility, 60 Am. Scholar 553, 557 (1991).

Even so, forbid to remains preferable in formal contexts—e.g.: "Quia Emptores . . . did not forbid a tenant in fee simple to grant estates smaller than the fee simple absolute." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 27 (2d ed. 1984).

The past tense is forbade (rhyming with glad)—e.g.: "The plaintiff neither forbade nor encouraged its employees to join the union." Forbid is sometimes wrongly used as a past-tense form: "Paul testified she did not think the order forbid [read forbade] her from trying to make such contacts with her children." Paul v. Johnson, 604 So. 2d 883, 884 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1992).

Some writers—no doubt those who pronounce forbade correctly—mistakenly spell the word forbad. E.g., "Prouty had been found guilty of contempt for violating a decree of divorce against him which forbad [read forbade] either party to marry again within the time prohibited by the Illinois statute." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 201 (1930).

forbidden parts is a EUPHEMISM that is generally too vague to be helpful. But some criminal-law writers have found justifiable uses for the phrase when referring to various jurisdictions in which different bodily parts might be forbidden—e.g.: "[T]he general holding is that the crime [i.e., sodomy] is completed by any penetration into forbidden parts." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 466–67 (3d ed. 1982).

FORBIDDEN WORDS AND PHRASES. Blanket prohibitions are rarely valid, but they are useful in establishing rules to be flouted only in the rarest instances. It would hardly be an exaggeration to say that no sentence, and no document, would suffer from the absence of the following terms. As one court said, in a different context: "They spell wasted time, trouble for everyone and the delay of justice. Do not use them." People v. Wright, 289 N.W.2d 1, 20 (Mich. 1980).

B. Ignorant Malformations. Some terms have misbegotten by-forms—e.g.: forbore. See forbear.

forborne. See forbear.

forceable. See forcible.

force and arms, with, is a LOAN TRANSLATION of vi et armis. See trespass & vi et armis.

force and effect is a doublet that has become part of the legal idiom in the phrases in full force and effect and of no force or effect, neither of which is a TERM OF ART. Either synonym would suffice just as well as the doublet; but the emphasis gained by force and effect may justify use of the phrase, more likely in DRAFTING (contracts and statutes) than in judicial opinions. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS & OPINIONS, JUDICIAL.

force majeure; force majesture. Literally "a superior force," force majeure is the usual form of this LEGALISM denoting an event or effect that can be neither anticipated nor controlled. It is the LAW FRENCH equivalent of the LAW LATIN vis major. Force majesture is a NEEDLESS VARIANT

Both force majeure and vis major are broader terms than act of God (q.v.) because they include acts not only of nature but also of people (e.g., riots, strikes, governmental interventions, acts of war). See vis major.

forcible; forceable; forceful. Oddly, we have forcible but enforceable, q.v. Forcible, the usual and preferred term, means "obtaining something by physical strength or a display of violence." E.g., "Piracy is defined as robbery or forcible depredation on the high seas."/ "In an action for forcible abduction of children, the father is entitled to damages for the injury done to his feelings."

Properly referring only to physical force, forcible has frequently been misused for forceful, which may be used figuratively as well as literally: "The intention of the parties is forcibly [read forcefully] expressed in the agreement."/ "Counsel may state the facts as forcibly [read forcefully] as possible, but he must not enlarge them."/ "This case forcibly [read forcefully] points out the anomaly brought about by the Rule in Shelley's Case."

The spelling forceable at one point seemed entrenched in the phrase forceable entry and detainer in Texas, although the Texas Rules have now changed to the spelling forcible. Forceable frequently appears where forcible should: "The jury found that Flynn forceably [read forcibly] dispossessed plaintiff of his dinner plate."/ "The condemned are not [unduly] rushed and are not forceably [read forcibly] thrust into the chair, except as a last means." Aubrey Holmes, The Wake of a Lawyer 54 (1960). See -ABLE (A).

FORE-. See FOR-.

forebear. See forbear.

forebearance. See forbear.

forecast forms the past tense forecast, not forecasted—e.g.: "It can be shaped to meet real problems that have arisen and not possible problems forecasted [read forecast]." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 182 (1979). See broadcast.

foreclose (a person) from (an action) is an archaic construction still used in the law: "The rule against double recovery forecloses the wife from recovering for the loss of her husband's financial support." Today foreclose most commonly takes as an object one or more possibilities or choices <his failure of the exam forecloses the possibility of a promotion>.

Forclose is an erroneous form of foreclose. "If there is only one beneficiary, against whom there is a defense, this [sic] obviously forcloses [read forecloses] the action."

In the context of a real-estate foreclosure, the verb foreclose is generally intransitive: one forecloses on property or a mortgage. Formerly, however, the verb was transitive even in this context—e.g.: "[H]e proposes to foreclose the second mortgage . . . ." Swain v. Seamens, 76 U.S. (9 Wall.) 254, 273 (1869). This usage still occurs from time to time—e.g.: "He alleged that . . appellees . . . failed to make installment payments on existing mortgages and allowed the mortgages to be foreclosed." Roberts v. Mullen, 446 S.W.2d 86, 88 (Tex. Civ. App.—Dallas 1969)./ "On the following April 10 the Bank instituted an action to foreclose its mortgage." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 953 (2d ed. 1975).

foregather. See forgather.

forego; forgo. The former, as suggested by the prefix, means "to go before." The latter is the term meaning "to do without; to pass up voluntarily; waive; renounce." One of the most persistent errors in legal and other writing is the use of forego where forgo is intended. One court has actually construed forego as meaning "voluntarily relinquishing," misspelling the very word it was interpreting. See O'Neill v. Keegan, 103 A.2d 909, 911 (Pa. 1954).

Examples of the misuse are legion—e.g.: "The public finds it hard to forego [read forgo] its belief that the law should be so certain that an unequivocal answer could be given in every case . . . ." Max Radin, The Law and You 13 (1948)./ "The promise of one creditor is regarded as sufficient consideration for the promise of another creditor to forego [read forgo] part of his claim." James A. MacLachlan, Handbook of the Law of Bankruptcy 4 (1956)./ "Must such a one forego [read forgo] the profit of this transaction at the risk of being held a party to the crime if the surmise proves correct?" Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 745–46 (3d ed. 1982).

The opposite mistake—misusing forgo for forego—is less common: "Based on the forgoing [read foregoing] authorities, we hold that the allegations . . state a cause of action." Garrido v. Burger King Corp., 558 So. 2d 79, 83 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1990).

Forwent and forewent are the past-tense forms, and forgone and foregone the past-participial forms. The past participle forgone is more frequent in practice than forwent; yet, because legal writing is usually formal in tone, forwent is not as uncommon as in general practice. E.g., "Defendants admitted at trial that vestiges of de jure segregation still exist; hence the trial court forwent development of liability at trial, and concentrated solely on remedies."/ "If . . a professor who relied on that promise forwent the first opportunity to raise his challenge, the university could not deprive him of the second opportunity without violating due process." See foregone.

foregoing is occasionally mistaken for following. "Although the foregoing quote [read following quotation] is a long one, it succinctly states the entire problem with this regulation: [a long quotation follows, and none precedes this statement]." (Note also the unconscious irony in a long quotation that succinctly states a proposition!)

foregone is correct in foregone conclusion, but not here: "He based that part of his holding on the thought that the Aldecoa had 'foregone [read forgone] an opportunity' to engage in the profitable work of property salvage." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 573 (2d ed. 1975). See forego.

forehead. The preferable pronunciation of this word rhymes with horrid.

foreign. In law, this word means "of another jurisdiction," not necessarily "of another country."

Thus it is not uncommon for a court in Florida, say, to refer to a judgment of a New Mexico court as a foreign judgment. Exceptions occur, however, so one must read carefully. Here foreign occurs in the nonlawyer's sense: "Courts of equity have, as between the parties, reviewed the judgments of foreign courts; a specific performance of a contract of sale of land situated in a foreign country will be decreed in equity."

forejudge is an archaic equivalent of prejudge for which the OED includes only one citation more recent than the 18th century, and that from 1860. Perhaps the most notable use of the term was in the Mutiny Act of 1689, 1 Wm. & Mary, ch. 5: "[N]o man may be forejudged of Life or Limb, or subjected to any kind of Punishment by Martial Law, or in any other manner than by the Judgment of his Peers, and according to the known and established Laws of this Realm." In modern contexts, however, the word is a fusty ARCHAISM—e.g.: "[W]e do not mean to forejudge [read prejudge] the substantial and novel question involving disputed evidence of motivation and causation . . . ." Automatic Radio Mfg. Co. v. Ford Motor Co., 390 F.2d 113, 117 (1st Cir. 1968).

foreman; foreperson; presiding juror. The best nonsexist choice is presiding juror. Unfortunately, foreperson has crept into official court rules. See Fed. R. Crim. P. 6(c). See SEXISM (B).

It is mildly surprising to see foreman and foreperson used for purposes of INELEGANT VARIATION: "And since the foreperson is the single most influential person on a jury, lawyers will do anything to keep good foreman material off." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 114–15 (1990).

forensic = used in or suitable to courts of law or public debate. E.g., "It is the duty of the king, as parens patriae, to protect property devoted to charitable uses: and that duty is executed by the officer who represents the crown for all forensic purposes." (Eng.)/ "Where Parliament has used in nontechnical legislation words that, in their ordinary meaning, cover the situation before the court, it is a reasonable presumption that Parliament or its draftsmen envisaged the actual forensic situation." (Eng.)

Other senses have grown out of the primary one. For example, the adj. forensic has come to mean "rhetorical" or "argumentative" in certain contexts, the language or manner to which it refers being analogized to courtroom talk. Traditionally forensics = the art of argumentative discourse.

Today forensics, as a shortening of forensic ballistics, is used by police officers to refer to the section of law enforcement dealing with legal evidence relating to firearms. Thus the phrase forensic evidence has cropped up—a phrase understandably deplored by traditionalists but likely to become permanently ensconced in the language. It is especially common in BrE—e.g.: "Forensic evidence also showed Scottish detectives the bomb was in a brown Samsonite suitcase, similar to one belonging to Khreesat." David Black & Harvey Morris, Investigators Followed False Trail to Palestinian Cell, The Independent, 14 Dec. 1990, at 3./ "Defence lawyers are seeking more details of forensic evidence that has lain hidden from them for 16 years." Stewart Tendler, Six Decide Against Bail Plea, The Times (London), 19 Dec. 1990, at 3. foreperson. See foreman & SEXISM (B).

foresaid. See aforesaid.

foresake. See forsake.

foresee. See FOR- & anticipate.

foreseeable is occasionally misspelled forseeable. See FOR-.

foreword; preface. The word foreword denotes a book preface written by someone other than the author. It is often mistaken with its homophone, forward—e.g.: "Nathan S. Hefferman, Chief Justice of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, embellishes this concept in his forward [read foreword] to the book by reducing the title Modern Appellate Practice to an acronym . . . ." Robert L. Black, Jr., Book Review, 53 U. Cin. L. Rev. 171, 173 (1984).

The word preface, by contrast, usually refers to an introductory essay written by the author.

forfeit > forfeited > forfeited. Using forfeit as a past participle is an ARCHAISM in AmE and, as the OED suggests, in BrE as well—e.g.: "The Cinque Ports alone at this time had a general rule that bailed goods are not forfeit [read forfeited] by the felony of the bailee." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 474 (5th ed. 1956).

The adjectival use—which in some sentences is hardly distinguishable from the past-participial use—is still current in literary BrE. E.g., "[I]f a man were killed by an animal or thing, it was forfeit to the king, who usually sold it and paid the proceeds to the next-of-kin." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 29 n.2 (1978).

forfeiture is naturally pronounced /for-fi-chər/; pompous speakers are fond of pronouncing the final syllable /tyoor/.

forfend, in all but the literary (and precious) exclamation Heaven forfend!, is an ARCHAISM better replaced by prevent—e.g.: "To that end it imposes on the homeowner a liability to respond in damages for any injury received because his sidewalks are left in an icy condition—a liability [that] he can, of course, forfend [read prevent] by scraping the ice off or sprinkling it with sand or ashes." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 64 (1968).

forgather; foregather. The former is preferable, inasmuch as either might be said to be "preferable." Gather usually suffices.

forgery = (1) a false document, or false part of a document, that someone has tried to make look genuine; or (2) the act of making a false document so that it may be used as if it were genuine. In sense (1), the thing forged must be a document: imitating a sculpture, even with fraudulent intent, is not forgery. And in both senses, the phrase false document does not mean a document that tells a lie; it means a document that is a lie. See counterfeiting.

forgo. See forego.

formal contract; informal contract. Virtually every legal system has two ways in which promises may become binding as contracts. One is by giving the transaction a certain form in writing (i.e., making a formal contract); the other is by complying with the requisites of the transaction in some way other than satisfying requisites of form (i.e., making an informal contract). Formal contracts were traditionally made under seal; the only test for an informal contract is whether it contains the element of "valuable consideration." See informal contract.

formalism; formality. These words are quite distinct. Formality denotes conformity to rules, propriety, or precision of manners. Formalism, by contrast, is invariably a pejorative term, meaning "excessive adherence to prescribed forms; use of forms without regard to substantive import." Examples of the rigid, inflexible formalism that once characterized English law are legion: "[T]he omission of a single downstroke or contraction sign, or an error of Latin accidence, were fatal mistakes in a writ." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 103 (3d ed. 1990).

The corresponding adjective—formalistic—is perhaps even more pejorative than formalism—e.g.: "The distinction between aggravating and mitigating facts has been criticized as formalistic." McMillan v. Pennsylvania, 477 U.S. 79, 100 (1986) (Stevens, J., dissenting)./ "The dissenting judge rejected the majority's 'formalistic, technical and unrealistic application of Miranda' . . . ." Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195, 200 (1989). Cf. legalistic. See formulaic.

FORMAL WORDS are those occupying an elevated level of diction. The English language has several levels of diction, and even synonyms that exist on the different levels. Thus his honor is formal, the judge is the ordinary phrase, and the beak (BrE slang) is vulgar.

The language of the law is perhaps top-heavy with formal words, as the courts are one of the institutions in Western societies that are most fully bedecked with pomp and regalia. Legal language reflects that formality, often quite appropriately. But many lawyers (and especially nonlawyers talking to lawyers, it seems) go overboard, resorting to unnatural pomposities (e.g., this honorable court used repeatedly) where ordinary words are called for (e.g., the court).

Early in the 19th century, the novelist James Fenimore Cooper worried that "[t]he love of turgid expressions is gaining ground, and ought to be corrected." "On Language," in The American Democrat 117 (Cooperstown, H.E. Phinney, 1838) (repr. in A Language for Writers 110, 113 (James R. Gaskin & Jack Suberman eds., 1966). For stylists, that worry is perpetual, as each generation becomes enamored of its own brands of linguistic inflation: doublespeak, gobbledegook, legaldegook, officialese, and the like. The phrase formal words is virtually a EUPHEMISM for those stylistic disturbances. In the left-hand column are some of the chief symptoms:

forma pauperis. See in forma pauperis.

format, v.t., makes formatted, formatting. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

formation. See formulation.

formbook. One word.

former and latter can apply only to a series of two. The former is the first of two, the latter the second of two. In contexts in which more than two elements occur, first should be used rather than former, last or last-mentioned rather than latter. E.g., "Cities Service sued Lee-Vac and American Hoist. The latter [read last two] cross-claimed against each other."

These latter is not an impossibility if the second of the two elements is plural—e.g.: "This case was brought at the instance of the F.D.A. in the name of the United States against the individuals named as defendants, praying that these latter be restrained from introducing into interstate commerce certain misbranded drugs."

Former and latter can bewilder the reader when the elements referred to are numbers. E.g., "The second rationale is distinguished from the first because with the latter, both parties are aware of the special circumstances under which the contract was made." The latter here syntactically is "the first," but the context in which this sentence appeared made it clear that the writer meant to say the second rationale; that is, he used latter in a temporal rather than in a syntactic sense.

May one have a latter without a former? Strictly speaking, no: even if the word former doesn't appear, there should be an idea to which it might attach if it did appear. It was once common to use latter without a correlative. E.g., "In view of what has already been said, very little may suffice concerning a liability as such. The latter [i.e., liability], as we have seen, is the correlative of power, and the opposite of immunity (or exemption)." (Hohfeld) Latterly, however, this use of the term is uncommon.

former jeopardy. See double jeopardy.

form of action. Although it has virtually no current significance in modern law practice, this phrase is basic to an understanding of Anglo-American legal history. True, the forms of action have been buried, but "they still rule us from their graves." F.W. Maitland, The Forms of Action at Common Law 1 (1936; repr. 1971).

A form of action was a compartment of law and practice associated with a particular writ, each of which had specific forms of process and specific modes of pleading, of trial, of judgment, and of executing the judgment. Some forms of action had exotic names, such as mort d'ancestor, writ of entry in the per and cui, writ of besaiel, and quare impedit. In 1830, some 72 forms existed; in 1874, the number had dwindled to 12; and in 1875, they were abolished in England. About the same time, or shortly afterwards, they were abolished in most American jurisdictions.

FORMS OF ADDRESS. To avoid professional blunders in correspondence and other writings, the legal writer must know how to refer to judges and other dignitaries. The American rules are much simpler than the British ones. Only a few of the most basic questions are treated here. For a fuller discussion, consult one of the several modern books on forms of address, or a good book of etiquette.

A. Addressing Federal Judges. In addressing judges, err on the side of formality, but not to the point of archaism or pedantry. Thus, in court papers, instead of To the Honorable Judge of Said Court, write either To the Honorable Court or To the Honorable Alicemarie H. Stotler, U.S. District Judge.

In corresponding with the federal judiciary in the U.S., follow these forms:

Chief Justice

Very formal:

The Chief Justice of the United States
(address)

Dear Mr. Chief Justice:

Less formal:

The Honorable William H. Rehnquist
The Chief Justice of the United States
(address)

Dear Chief Justice Rehnquist:

Associate Justice

The Honorable Ruth Bader Ginsburg
The Supreme Court of the United States
(address)

Dear Justice Ginsburg:

Other federal judge

The Honorable William R. Wilson, Jr.
United States District Court, W.D. Arkansas
(address)

Dear Judge Wilson:

B. Addressing State-Court Judges. In corresponding with state judges, follow these forms (applicable in most states):

Chief Justice of the highest appellate tribunal

The Honorable (full name)
Chief Justice, (name of court)
(address)

Dear Chief Justice (surname):

Other state judge

The Honorable (full name)
(name of court)
(address)

Dear Judge (surname):

C. Four Rules in Using The Honorable. First, Honorable should be capitalized whenever coupled with a person's name. Second, never write The Honorable O'Connor or Hon. O'Connor; Honorable always takes a full name:

The Honorable Sandra Day O'Connor

Third, abbreviate Honorable only in addresses, and omit The when abbreviating:

Hon. Sandra Day O'Connor

Fourth, when writing a British, Canadian, or Australian correspondent and spelling out the word, use the BrE spelling:

The Right Honourable the Lord Goff of Chieveley

D. Mr. Justice; Mrs. Justice; Madam Justice. Many readers, especially in the U.S., find these labels gratuitously sexist. Justice alone suffices.

In the U.S. Supreme Court, the Mr. disappeared before Justice shortly after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor ascended to the bench. See SEXISM.

E. Third-Person References. Whereas British legal writers tend to refer in discourse to Denning M.R. and Woolf J.—without even a comma after the name—Americans generally refer to Justice Scalia (not Scalia J.) or Judge Robert E. Keeton (on first mention, and later Judge Keeton. In third-person contexts, avoid honorifics such as The Honorable.

F. Lawyer-to-Lawyer References. The American practice of appending Esq. to other lawyers' names is entirely acceptable, but no other titles—not even Mr.—may be used in conjunction with it. See Esq.

If you prefer not to use Esq. (some consider it clubby), a mere Mr. or Ms. or Mrs. (or even Miss, if that is the addressee's known preference) will always suffice.

British lawyers often have titles or affiliations that a correspondent is obliged to include after the addressee's name, such as Q.C. (Queen's Counsel) and F.B.A. (Fellow of the British Academy).

G. Signing Off. When ending a letter, dispense with the archaic flourishes: instead of I am, my dear sir, Sincerely yours, write Sincerely yours.

In business and personal letters, you may show some individuality in the complimentary close by adopting any of the several standard forms:

Very formal and deferential

Respectfully (yours),
Very respectfully yours,

Less formal, without deference (as in demand letters)

Very truly yours,
Yours very truly,
Yours truly,

General

Sincerely yours,
Yours sincerely,
Sincerely, (see H)

Informal

With best wishes,
Best wishes,
With best regards,
Best regards,
Kindest personal regards, Best,

Intimate

As ever,

Fondly,
Yours,
Yours ever,
Yours always,

H. The Lone Sincerely. A foul canard is afoot in the American legal profession: some believe that it is an error to close with Sincerely, Respectfully, Fondly, or any other adverb without adding yours. Do not believe it: every modern complimentary close contains UNDERSTOOD WORDS. Respected writers from Supreme Court justices to eminent law professors, even great poets, use Sincerely without saying whose. See An Epistolary Essay: The Wright-Garner-Maugans Correspondence on Complimentary Closes, 2 Scribes J. Legal Writing 83 (1991); A Sequel to "An Epistolary Essay," 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 95 (1992).

formula. Pl. -as, -ae. The English plural, ending in -s, is preferred in all but scientific writing. Legal writers are somehow fond of the Latinate ending. See PLURALS (A) formulaic; formulistic; formalistic. Formulaic = of, relating to, or constituting a formula. Formulistic = fond of formulas. Formalistic = adhering unduly to a set way of saying and doing something without regard to its substance or inner meaning.

formulation (= a setting forth systematically) for formation (= the act of forming, or the thing formed) is an odd error. In 1993, a newly formed (formulated?) law firm sent out tens of thousands of announcements that read, "X and Y are pleased to announce the formulation [sic] of their professional corporation for the practice of personal injury law under the name X & Y, P.C."

fornicate; copulate. Copulate is a neutral verb referring to the sexual act without regard to legality or the legal status of the parties. Fornicate is not neutral: it describes a criminal offense in some American jurisdictions; for example, Virginia Code § 18.2–344 provides that "[a]ny person, not being married, who voluntarily shall have sexual intercourse with any other person, shall be guilty of fornication, punishable as a Class 4 misdemeanor."

fornication. See adultery.

forsake > forsook > forsaken. Forsake (= to desert or renounce) is sometimes corrupted into foresake.

forseeable. See foreseeable.

for sure is colloquial for certain or certainly.

forswear; foreswear. The latter does not properly exist. If it did, it might mean "to swear before," since the prefix fore- denotes a previous time. Forswear is the proper synonym of renounce or abrogate. Cf. forego.

forswearing. See perjury.

forte (= a person's strong point) is preferably pronounced with one syllable, like fort. But many English-speaking people persist in the two-syllable version, /for-tay/, which can hardly be strongly condemned.

for the duration of is verbose for during.

for the reason that is prolix for because—e.g.: "It is still thought that magistrates are too disinclined to reject police evidence, however implausible, perhaps for the reason that [read because] they feel the police should always be supported as a matter of principle." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 26 (1983).

for the sake of (the) argument is a perfectly good phrase that is universally understandable to those who speak English—and therefore much preferable to arguendo (q.v.). Legal stylists frequently use it—e.g.: "But even if, for the sake of the argument, we concede the identity of the two Romes, we may go on to observe that the style and trappings of Catholic Rome were quite different from the style and trappings of Imperial Rome." Grant Gilmore, The Ages of American Law 68 (1977). The phrase is most commonly rendered without a definite article before argument: hence for the sake of argument.

forthwith, adv., is a usefully vague term, although it may strike some readers as antiquarian. The writer who intends a precise meaning must be wary: the word has been attributed every shade of meaning from "instantly" to "within 24 hours" to "within a reasonable or convenient time." It is a fuzzy word with no pretense of precision.

Forthwith makes no sense as an adjective, as in the phrase a forthwith subpoena.

fortuitous (= occurring by chance) is commonly misused for fortunate. Here the correct use of the term is illustrated: "Contrary to defendants' argument, the occasional fortuitous inclusion of a tenant in the resolution of a claim between the housing authority and the landlord affords no protection to a tenant."/ "Whether that result would follow in any other case is entirely fortuitous, and it may be that such a result was not intended." See aleatory & gratuitous.

In phrase fortuitous accident, the word fortuitous is correctly used but it results in a REDUNDANCY: every accident is fortuitous. E.g., "[T]he owners of other non-stationary property such as farm animals or trains [that] may sustain damage in a motor vehicle accident on a public highway are usually not at fault and thus should not be required to maintain their own insurance to cover fortuitous accidents [read accidents] [that] might occur." Pioneer State Mut. Ins. Co. v. Allstate Ins. Co., 339 N.W.2d 470, 475 (Mich. 1985).

Fortuity is the seldom-seen noun corresponding to fortuitous. E.g., "[The rule] tolerates opposite results depending upon the pure fortuity of the outcome of the race to the courthouse." Chapman v. International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, 401 F.2d 626, 628 (4th Cir. 1968). Fortuitousness, which emphasizes the quality as opposed to the state of being fortuitous, is also used.

forum. The preferred plural is forums, not fora. E.g., "Public fora [read forums] generally are those places which by long tradition or by government fiat have been devoted to assembly and debate." ACORN v. City of Phoenix, 798 F.2d 1260, 1264 (9th Cir. 1986)./ "Her scepticism is grounded in her suspicion that the legal techniques of interpretation and the forums in which interpretation proceeds are biased by the conscious and even more the unconscious mind-sets of bench and bar." Neil MacCormick, With Due Respect, TLS, 22 Jan. 1993, at 3. See PLURALS (A).

forum non conveniens = the doctrine that an inappropriate forum, even though competent under the law, may be divested of jurisdiction if, for the convenience of the litigants and the witnesses, it appears that the action should be instituted in another forum in which the action might originally have been brought. This LATINISM has become a TERM OF ART. E.g., "The common-law forum non conveniens, with its stress on contacts and fairness, unhampered by a mythology of power and sovereignty, may yet create a new American law of jurisdiction based on the forum conveniens."

forum-shopping, n., an Americanism dating from the early 1950s, should be hyphenated thus. The phrase refers to the practice of choosing the most favorable jurisdiction or court in which a claim might be heard. Cf. panel-shopping.

forward(s). See -WARD(S).

forwent. See forego.

founder. See flounder.

fountain of justice is a SET PHRASE, of which fountainhead of justice is a mangling: "The king was the fountainhead [read fountain] of justice . . . ." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 41 (1963).

four corners of the instrument (= the face of a legal document) derives from the age-old view that every deed was supposed to have been written on one skin of parchment having only four corners. The phrase is common in legal JARGON, esp. when it is argued that the court should not consider evidence extraneous to the legal document in question. E.g., "If the four corners of the deed provide a coherent expression of the parties' intent, we need search no further, but if an ambiguity or a reasonable doubt appears from a perusal of the particular symbols of expression our horizons must be broadened to encompass the circumstances surrounding the transaction." Oldfield v. Stoeco Homes, Inc., 139 A.2d 291, 297 (N.J. 1958).

Sometimes the phrase is used figuratively of things other than single documents: "In the resulting amalgam it is not possible to distinguish which notes and coins belong to the trust fund and which do not; all that can be said is that the trust fund is somewhere within the four corners of the account." (Eng.) (An account does not have four corners, although perhaps account records was intended.)

There is also a doctrine called the eight-corners rule—e.g.: "Texas courts follow the 'eight corners' rule when determining an insurer's duty to defend the insured. Under this rule, a court looks only to the pleadings and the insurance policy to determine whether the duty to defend exists . . . ." Cluett v. Medical Protective Co., 829 S.W.2d 822, 829 (Tex. App.—Dallas 1992).

Four Horsemen. In allusion to the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse—allegorical figures in the Bible (Rev. 6:1–8)—this phrase formerly referred to four U.S. Supreme Court Justices who consistently opposed New Deal legislation: George Sutherland, Pierce Butler, Willis Van Devanter, and James McReynolds. For an example of a legal writer's use of the phrase, see bad.

fours, on all. See on all fours.

four, rule of. See rule of four.

four unities. In his "Poetics," Aristotle devised "three unities" for dramatic composition, namely that a play should consist of one main action, should occur at one time (or within 24 hours), and should occur in one place. In allusion to these dramatic principles, real-estate lawyers devised four unities for the creation of a joint tenancy: time, title, interest, and possession. The joint tenants must have the same interest beginning at the same time, deriving from the same title, and consisting of the same undivided possession.

fractious. See factional.

FRAGMENTS, SENTENCE. See INCOMPLETE SENTENCES

fram(e)able. The -e- is best omitted. See MUTE E.

framers in AmE is capitalized only in reference to the drafters of the U.S. Constitution. In all other contexts in which this word refers to legislative drafters, the word is lowercased.

franchise, n., has two quite distinct senses: (1) "the right to vote"; (2) "the sole right of engaging in a certain business or in a business with a particular trademark in a certain area." Sense (1) is the less common one today, but it remains in use—e.g.: "In earlier times this led to obvious legal changes such as the gradual emancipation of married women, and the spread of the franchise." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 117 (1983).

In English and Scottish legal history, franchise also denoted an area enjoying exemption from royal justice. In a franchise, justice was administered by a noble or other person who had a grant of the power to do justice—hence the term franchise courts.

franchise, v.t.; enfranchise; affranchise. Enfranchise — (1) to set free, release from bondage; (2) to give to a person or class of persons the right to vote; (3) to give to an area or class of persons the right to be represented in an elected body (CDL); or (4) to endow with a franchise. Affranchise is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. See disfranchise.

Franchise = to grant (to another) the sole right of engaging in a certain business or in a business with a particular trademark in a certain area. See franchise, n.

franchiser; franchisor. Franchiser is preferred. W3 contains only the -er form; the OED lists -or as a variant.

frankalmoi(g)n(e); almoi(g)n. This obsolete form of English land tenure—a holding in free alms, in return for prayers—is generally spelled frankalmoin in modern texts. Almoign and almoin are historical variants.

fraud. A. Defining Generally. "Courts refrain from defining fraud," it was once said, "lest they be confronted by their own definition and it be found too broad or too narrow to cover cases that may subsequently arise." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 43–44 (1916). Fraud, in other words, is a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD. It may mean: (1) a tort consisting in a knowing misrepresentation made with the intention that the person receiving that misrepresentation should act on it; (2) the misrepresentation resulting in that tort; (3) a tort consisting in a representation made recklessly without any belief in its truth, but made with the intention that the person receiving that misrepresentation should act on it; (4) a misrepresentation made recklessly without any belief in its truth; (5) unconscionable dealing short of actionable deceit at common law; (6) in the context of conspiracy to defraud, a surreptitious taking of property without deception; or (7) in the law of contract, an unconscientious use of the power arising out of the relative positions of the parties and resulting in an unconscionable bargain. Because fraud occupies shifting ground, it is best braced with a modifier (see below). See deceit.

B. Fraud in fact; fraud in the factum. These terms refer to two very different principles. Fraud in fact is what is also known as actual or positive fraud, that is, a concealment or false representation by means of a statement or conduct that causes injury to another. Scienter (q.v.) is usu. required. Fraud in the factum occurs when a legal instrument (a "factum" at common law) as actually executed differs from the one intended for execution by the person who executes it, or when the instrument may have had no legal existence (as, e.g., because the substance of the document was misrepresented to a blind signatory). See fact, n.

C. Fraud in law; legal fraud. These phrases are deceptively similar. Fraud in law is fraud that is presumed under the circumstances, as, for example, when a debtor transfers assets and thereby impairs the efforts of creditors to collect sums due. Legal fraud is another term for constructive fraud or unintentional deception that causes injury to another. (To complicate matters, it is occasionally also called fraud in contemplation of law.) Because legal fraud is potentially ambiguous, constructive fraud is the better phrase. See constructive fraud.

fraudfeasor (= one who has committed fraud) is a legal NEOLOGISM not listed in most English-language dictionaries or law dictionaries. The word should be solid, not hyphenated. E.g., "[H]e may elect to disaffirm the fraudulent transaction and to make claim, or sue in equity, for rescission—to follow his property into the hands of the fraudfeasors or those who took with knowledge of the fraud, and to get it back . . . ." Western Newspaper Union v. Woodward, 133 F. Supp. 17, 25 (W.D. Mo. 1955)./ "In seeking to choose between a fraudfeasor and a negligent party, the Georgia law unfortunately goes with the alleged crook." Lariscy v. Hill, 159 S.E.2d 443, 444 (Ga. Ct. App. 1968)./ "Failure to correct another's delusion is obviously fraudulent if the circumstances are such that the fraud-feasor's [read fraudfeasor's] very silence reasonably causes the misapprehension . . . ." Estate of Jones v. Kvamme, 430 N.W.2d 188, 193 (Minn. Ct. App. 1988). See feasor.

fraud in contemplation of law. See fraud (c).

fraudulent; fraudful. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT fraudulent representation; fraudulent misrepresentation. Although the latter phrase cannot be called a REDUNDANCY—since not every misrepresentation is fraudulent—it is nevertheless inferior to the former phrase. Oliver Wendell Holmes, among others, used fraudulent representation. See The Common Law 255 (1881; repr. 1963).

fray. See affray.

freedom of contract, a fuzzy phrase often used in 19th-century and early 20th-century judicial opinions, embraced two connected but distinct ideas: "In the first place it indicated that contracts were based on mutual agreement, while in the second place it emphasized that the creation of a contract was the result of a free choice unhampered by external control such as government or legislative interference." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 5 (3d ed. 1981).

free from; froe of. Both are correct, the former being preferred by most writers on style. Note the shift in nominal forms: freedom of speech but freedom from oppression, pestilence, coercion, etc.

free gift is a common REDUNDANCY.

freehold has been defined in two quite different ways. Most recently, the CDL has defined it as "the most complete form of ownership in land: a legal estate held in fee simple absolute in possession." The OED and other modern authorities more accurately define freehold as "a tenure by which an estate is held in fee simple, fee-tail, or for term of life." The CDL's definition is unduly restrictive, for a life estate is held in freehold. See fee, fee simple & fee tail.

freeholder technically means "one who holds an estate in fee simple, an estate in fee tail, or a life estate." In fact, though, most uses of freeholder refer to an owner in fee simple absolute. Still, it is incorrect to define freeholder, as one book does, as "[o]ne who owns land that he or she can transfer without anyone's permission." John W. Reilly, The Language of Real Estate 206 (2d ed. 1982). See freehold, fee simple & fee tail.

free reign is an incorrect rendering of free rein—e.g.: "Considering Mrs. Waldman had free reign [read free rein] in spending $52,500, we affirm that part of the order allowing the set off for the suit money and costs she claims she is still due." Waldman v. Waldman, 612 So. 2d 703, 705 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1993). Cf. rein in.

freight = (1) goods transported by water as well as by land (though until recently in BrE it referred only to goods shipped by water); or (2) in a contract for water carriage, the payment made by the sender of goods to the shipowner.

frequently. This adverb can be ambiguous when used with a plural subject and verb. Do individuals do something frequently, or is the characteristic true of a group that may do something only once? Note the MISCUE here: "A study last year by Jack Hadley of the Georgetown University School of Medicine showed that uninsured patients arrived at the hospital sicker than those with health insurance, and died in the hospital more frequently [read more frequently died in the hospital]." Jane Bryant Quinn, Woe to the Reformers, Newsweek, 19 Oct. 1992, at 55. If the phrase more frequently is moved after the conjunction and, the miscue disappears. See MISPLACED MODIFIERS fresh pursuit; hot pursuit. The former is the traditional legal phrase, dating from 1626 in the OED and denoting close and continuous chasing of a criminal suspect by police, often across jurisdictional boundaries. The phrase is often used, however, in extended senses: "There is no doubt that during continuance of war a rebel guilty of treason may be slain in actual conflict or fresh pursuit." (Ir.)

friend. Advocates with a sense of tradition and civility typically, during any argument before the bench, refer to an adversary as my learned friend or my friend -never my opponent or my adversary. Unfortunately, though, this custom is fading as fast as the Bar's other traditions of civility.

friendly suit; amicable action. These synonymous phrases refer to a lawsuit in which all the parties have agreed beforehand to allow a court to resolve the issues involved. Friendly suit is more common today. "It never was the thought that, by means of a friendly suit, a party beaten in the legislature could transfer to the courts an inquiry as to the constitutionality of the legislative act." Chicago & Grand Trunk Ry. v. Wellman, 143 U.S. 339, 345 (1892)./ "If full-fledged litigation were needed to get the right decision, the Justices would have to throw out of Court, as they do not, the many 'friendly suits,' dressed up to resemble the genuine article, that are staged to get important problems decided less slowly." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 57 (1955).

friend of the court. See amicus curiae.

from hence; from thence. The words hence and thence (as well as whence) are sufficient without the preposition from and are therefore preferred singly; yet grammarians have not considered from hence, etc., incorrect. Hence includes the idea of "from," inasmuch as it means "from this time, from this place." Boswell, not best known for his achievements in law, used from thence: "Mr. Scott of University College, Oxford . . . accompanied [Johnson] from thence to Edinburgh." 5 Life of Johnson 16 (1791). See thence & whence.

from henceforth is redundant for henceforth, as in: "The will of the giver, according to the form in the deed of gift manifestly expressed, shall be from henceforth observed [read observed henceforth]."

from whence. See from hence, thence & whence.

frontal attack. This late 19th-century expression has become common in legal JARGON to denote a direct attack on a judgment, statute, etc. "This appeal makes the frontal attack that the court erred in not instructing a verdict in the bailor's favor for the total loss of the airplane."/ "Our statute does not make a frontal attack on the pre-existing law."

fructus industriales; fructus naturales. Lawyers might use terms such as crops and perennials, but instead they have used these LATINISMS. Fructus industriales are annual crops produced by labor (e.g., wheat, corn, potatoes, beets); fructus naturales are perennial plants (e.g., trees, grasses, perennial bushes). The latter are considered part of the real property, whereas the former usually are not.

fruit(s). Idiomatically speaking, one refers to the fruits of one's labor and fruits of a crime, but to the fruit of the poisonous tree (= in a criminal investigation, any tip or lead that results from an illegal search or seizure of evidence). E.g., "Because the illegally seized evidence provided the sole basis for the homicide arrest warrant and led directly to incriminating statements on that day, the warrant and statements are also inadmissible as fruit of the poisonous tree." A leading criminal-law text credits Justice Felix Frankfurter with having coined the phrase in Nardone v. U.S., 308 U.S. 338, 341 (1939). See Wayne R. LaFave & Jerold H. Israel, Criminal Procedure § 9.3, at 471 (1992).

Often, however, the idiom is paraphrased or foreshortened, and fruit is made plural: "The district court committed no error when it refused to suppress the fruits of the recorded conversations."/ "Because the amendment now affords protection against the uninvited ear, oral statements, if illegally overheard, and their fruits are also subject to suppression."

frustration = the doctrine that, if the entire performance of a contract becomes fundamentally changed without any fault on either side, the contract is considered dissolved. Theoretically—though rarely, it might be said, in pragmatic terms—frustration is imposed automatically by law and does not require either party to do anything. See impossibility & mistake (B).

FUDGE WORDS are common in mediocre and poor legal writing; they occur seldom in clean, precise prose. The typical phrases are it would seem to appear that, it is suggested that, and it is submitted that. E.g., "It would appear to be clear that the Pioneer Society was [read either The Pioneer Society was or It is clear that the Pioneer Society was] organized by a group of people who were brought together by their common interest in the history and historical relics of Los Angeles County and the State." Cf. WEASEL WORDS.

fugitive. Only in formal writing does this word mean, in its adjectival sense, "evanescent, fleeting." E.g., "It is no answer to say that complainant spends its money for that which is too fugitive or evanescent to be the subject of property."/ "It is further argued that that for which the Associated Press spends its money is too fugitive to be recognized as property." An even more learned equivalent is fugacious.

full-blown is often unnecessary, as in the following example: "The collective knowledge of the investigating officers amounted to probable cause for a full-blown arrest of appellant." An officer can either arrest or not arrest someone: full-blown adds nothing.

The phrase is fast becoming a CLICHÉ in legal writing. E.g., "All final orders in full-blown commission licensing proceedings would be reviewed initially by the court of appeals."/ "The officers stopped short of a technical arrest or a full-blown search."

full-faith-and-credit clause. As a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, full-faith-and-credit should be hyphenated.

full-fledged is the phrase, not fully fledged.

full force and effect. See force and effect.

full power is a common REDUNDANCY. E.g., "The corporation shall have full power to . . . ." The corporation would have just as much power if full were deleted.

full-scale, a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, should be hyphenated—e.g.: "A full scale [read full-scale] criminal investigation was initiated in September 1970 and indictments against eight alleged coconspirators were returned in January 1971."

fully and finally. This DOUBLET is justified in some contexts, as in the phrase fully and finally discharged: fully refers to the extent of the discharge (as opposed to a partial discharge), and finally refers to the time of the discharge (the order is not an interlocutory one). On the other hand, to say that one is discharged probably implies that the discharge is both full and final.

fully fledged. See full-fledged.

fulsome (= abundant to excess; offensive to normal tastes or sensibilities) is often incorrectly taken to mean "very full." Here, for example, fulsomely is used for fully: "The expectation that one who enters the 'public, political arena' must be prepared to take a certain amount of 'political bumping' is already fulsomely [read fully] assured by the New York Times Co. v. Sullivan requirement of actual malice in the defamation of public figures." Ollman v. Evans, 750 F.2d 970, 1036 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (citations omitted). Surely the writer of that sentence did not mean to impugn the U.S. Supreme Court.

functus officio is a LATINISM that literally means "having performed his or her office." In practice, the phrase denotes the idea that the specific duties and functions that an officer was legally empowered and charged to perform have now been wholly accomplished, and thus that the officer has no further authority or legal competence based on the original commission.

This term serves the purposes of conciseness but not of lucidity. E.g., "[A trustee's removal may be effected by] his becoming functus officio, that is, completing his duties as Trustee, by reason of the estate having been wound up or of some scheme of arrangement having been accepted by his creditors." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 253 (P.W. French ed., 10th ed. 1951)./ "It is only when the tribunal is closed, when the jury that decided the case is functus officio, and there is no way of getting another one, that the judges are forced themselves to determine what a jury might think." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 142 (1979).

fundament = (1) basis; or (2) anus or buttocks. This word can hardly be used without creating a double-entendre. "That policy has remained the fundament [read foundation] of federal appellate jurisdiction."

fundamental law. See constitutional law.

fundamental term = a contractual provision that specifies an essential purpose of the contract, so that a breach of that provision through inadequate performance makes the performance not only defective but essentially different from what had been promised. For example, a caterer might have contracted to deliver crepes but instead delivered burritos. The doctrine supplying the innocent party with an excuse if the other party breaches a fundamental term has often been used—since the 1950s—to overcome an exemption clause protecting the culpable party from liability. See term.

funds, when used as a COUNT NOUN, can confuse readers who usually encounter the plural form funds as an aggregate <the funds were [= money was] promptly deposited>. The following usage is odd enough to be considered unidiomatic: "Hundreds of funds are held for the benefit of students enrolled at the university. Each of these funds, which includes funds for endowments, scholarships, and student loans, has a designated fund manager." Report Accompanies Indictments, Amarillo Globe-Times, 11 Dec. 1991, at 8C.

funeral; funereal; funerary; funebrial. Funeral, commonly a noun, serves as its own adjective <funeral expenses>. Funereal, which is frequently confused with funeral, adj., means "solemn, mournful, somber." Funerary = of, used for, or connected with burial. Funebrial is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of funereal. Of funerary and funebrial, Fowler wrote that "no one uses [them] if he can help it" (MEU1 205).

fungible (= regarded as exchangeable with other property of the same kind) is most commonly an adjective <fungible goods>—as just defined—but it may also serve as a noun .

funnily. See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (B).

furnish is a useful word in the drafting of contracts because its alternatives—deliver, give, assign, transmit, and the like—are often too specific about the means of supplying a thing. Furnish can be usefully vague.

further. See farther.

further affiant . . . . American lawyers frequently end affidavits with some variation of this sentence: "Further affiant [= the person giving the affidavit] sayeth not." This sentence gives rise to three stylistic dilemmas: first, is it sayeth or saith; second, is it not or naught; and third, is the sentence necessary at all?

A. Sayeth or saith. It is surprising how often American lawyers stop to puzzle over this choice in spelling. (English lawyers use neither spelling because they do not use the phrase.) Both forms are good Elizabethan usage. Among American lawyers who use the phrase, sayeth predominates; among American lawyers who rightly pride themselves on their style, the phrase does not appear at all. See -ETH.

B. Not or naught. The predominant form is Further affiant sayeth not. But this is nonsense, because it is literally translatable as, "The affiant says not further," or "The affiant does not say further." Does not say what? The form with naught, by contrast, makes literal sense: "The affiant says nothing further." E.g., "Further your affiant sayeth naught." State v. Malkin, 722 P.2d 943, 944 n.3 (Alaska 1986) (quoting an affidavit).

The best choice, stylistically speaking, is to use these phrases not. See naught.

FUSED PARTICIPLES. A. The General Rule. Fowler gave the name "fused participle" to a participle used as a noun (i.e., a gerund) that is preceded by a noun or pronoun not in the possessive case. Thus Me going home made her sad rather than the preferred My going home made her sad. The fused participle is said to lack a proper grammatical relationship to the preceding noun or pronoun. No one today doubts that Fowler overstated his case in calling fused participles "grammatically indefensible" and in never admitting an exception. The grammarians Jespersen and Curme have cited any number of historical examples and have illustrated the absolute necessity of the fused participle in some sentences, barring some recasting of the sentence. E.g., The chance of that ever happening is slight. (One would not want to write, The chance of that's ever happening is slight.)

But Fowler had a stylistic if not a grammatical point. Especially in formal prose, the possessive ought to be used whenever it is not unidiomatic or unnatural. In the following sentences, then, possessives would have been better used than the nouns in the objective case:

- "Abolition of the distinction would result in manufacturers being [read manufacturers' being] liable for damages of unknown and unlimited scope."
- "In the second place, the danger of the courts reaching [read courts' reaching] an inequitable conclusion by refusing to modify the results of applying the legal incidents of joint tenancy to the partnership relation is done away with."
- "This is a divorce case in which the only remaining question concerns the propriety of the trial court granting [read trial court's granting] the wife a fractional interest in future military retirement benefits if and when received by the husband."
- "He told the jury that the really important issue was whether the plaintiff had consented to the journalist publishing [read journalist's publishing] the information about her and her former husband."
- "The plaintiffs are the freeholders of the locus in quo, and as such they have the right to forbid anybody coming [read anybody's coming] on their land or in any way interfering with it."

- "Arrest in retaliation to civil proceedings is privileged only by one having [read one's having] a warrant."
- "The extensive civil-service structure Congress had constructed militated against the court extending [read court's extending] constitutional tort liability to federal employees."
- "A question arose as to appellant being [read appellant's being] entitled to a longer notice of discontinuance." (Eng.)
- "The district court accepted the prosecutor's representation that it did not believe the additional charge would result in Krezdorn receiving [read Krezdorn's receiving] a sentence greater than the one initially imposed."
- "When an uncopyrighted combination of words is published, there is no general right to forbid other people repeating [read people's repeating] them." (Eng.)
- "There is a difference in probability between one [read one's] intentionally depositing and unintentionally forgetting and the hole-in-the-pocket man."
- "The problem of lawyers saying [read lawyers' saying] too much is discussed in Chapter XIV."
- "In consideration of appellant having [read appellant's having] prevented him from sustaining death, McGowin agreed with him to care for and maintain him."
- "It is elementary that the propriety of a court instructing [read court's instructing] a verdict in favor of a party must depend on the evidence introduced before the jury."
- "The jury could find that through constant wear the terrazzo slab had over a period of time become smooth, resulting in it being [read its being] very slippery when wet."

There are many exceptions to this rule of style, however. The Oxford Guide states: "When using most non-personal nouns (e.g. luggage, meaning, permission), groups of nouns (e.g. father and mother, surface area), non-personal pronouns (e.g. anything, something), and groups of pronouns (e.g. some of them), there is no choice of construction: the possessive would not sound idiomatic at all." Oxford Guide 156 (1983). Examples follow:

- "An attempt to create a passive trust in this country usually results in the legal title passing to the trust beneficiary."
- "The judgment does not result in the property being attached to the locus."
- "Upon the proper facts being shown, the attachment may be sued out against lands, tenements, goods, and credits of the debtor."
- "There can therefore be no question about the claim here being ripe for presentation to the United States Courts."
- "The remainder is subject to being divested on the contingency of one of the children of Ross Kost dying before the life tenant and leaving lawful children."
- "In 1908 Roscoe Pound decried decision-making from first principles and warned against the law becoming too scientific."
- "The ability to watch a decision being made on the most elemental level is of some significance."
- "The undisputed evidence precludes the possibility of speed being a proximate cause of this collision."

B. Unnecessary Participles. Even when there is no choice in the idiom, there is the choice of reconstructing the sentence to avoid the questionable usage. Sometimes it is even possible merely to omit the participle, as here: "Often such an accident results from something being [delete being] in the road ahead of the preceding car."

C. No Fused Participle. Adjectival participles sometimes appear on first sight to be fused participles, but they are not. E.g., "A donee beneficiary's rights vest automatically upon the working of the contract, knowledge of the beneficiary being unnecessary."/ "This appeal arises from an order of the Santa Fe County District Court granting the motion of defendant State of New Mexico to dismiss on the ground that the action was barred by the doctrine of sovereign immunity."

FUSTIAN (lit. a kind of cotton cloth) has given its name to pompous, empty speech and writing, or highfalutin words for ordinary ideas. The following sentence, for example, might be placed in virtually any judicial opinion on any subject: "The case presents questions of far-reaching importance which demand and have received mature and deliberate consideration by the court." We should take all that for granted. See FLOTSAM PHRASES.

futilely, adv., is sometimes misspelled futiley—e.g.: "The school futiley [read futilely] offered him assistance to prepare for the Boards, but he rejected any such help." DeMarco v. University of Health Sciences, 352 N.E.2d 356, 368 (Ill. App. Ct. 1976) (Burman, J., dissenting).

future interest is a phrase that dates from the mid-19th century. See 1 Charles Fearne, Contingent Remainders 381 (10th ed. 1844). The phrase denotes an interest in property in which the privilege of possession or of enjoyment is future and not present. A noted treatise states that "the interest is an existing interest from the time of its creation, and is looked upon as a part of the total ownership of the land or other thing [that] is its subject matter. In that sense, future interest is somewhat misleading, and it is applied only to indicate that the possession or enjoyment of the subject matter is to take place in the future." Lewis M. Simes & Allan F. Smith, The Law of Future Interests § 1, at 2–3 (2d ed. 1956).

The future interests commonly recognized are the reversion, the possibility of reverter, the power of termination (known also as the right of entry for condition broken), and the remainder. Some have suggested that this list might be supplemented with the rights of escheat, inchoate dower, and curtesy initiate, but "these interests . . . are not commonly classified as future interests." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 103–04 (2d ed. 1988). See remainder, reversion & right of entry for condition broken.

gainsay; contradict. Originally gainsay was the popular word, and contradict the learned one; today just the opposite is true. Gainsay may now appropriately be labeled a FORMAL WORD. E.g., "Judge Cire was in the unique position of being able to judge the credibility of what he saw and heard firsthand, and he should not be gainsaid [i.e., contradicted]."/ "The eminent position of the familial right to privacy in our jurisprudence cannot now be gainsaid [i.e., denied]."

Gaius, as a classical name, makes the possessive form Gaius', not Gaius's: "It consists of excerpts from the Theodosian Code and from Paulus's [read Paulus'] Sentences, of post-Theodosian Novellae, of an abridgment of Gaius's [read Gaius'] Institutes . . . ." Hans J. Wolff, Roman Law 175 (1951; repr. 1982). See POSSESSIVES (A).

GALLICISMS appear frequently in English prose, and no less frequently in legal than in nonlegal writing. By Gallicisms is not generally meant the LAW FRENCH terminology that is so prevalent in law (e.g., voir dire, de son tort), but French terms and phrases of a nonlegal character, such as coup de grace, coup d'état, tour de force, succès d'estime, cul-de-sac, blasé, tête-à-tête, and joie de vivre. None of these is unduly recherché, to use yet another. But foreignisms of any kind become affectations when used in place of a perfectly good English term, e.g., peu à peu for little by little, or en passant for in passing, or sans for without.

One stylist of high repute cautions sternly against all but thoroughly anglicized Gallicisms: "Of Gallicisms . . . it is perhaps not necessary to say much: they are universally recognized as a sign of bad taste, especially if they presuppose the knowledge of a foreign language. A few foreign words, such as cliché, have no English equivalent and are in current use; and there may be others [that] are desirable. But except in technical works it will generally be found possible to avoid them." Herbert Read, English Prose Style 10 (1952). Cf. LATINISMS.

gaming; gambling. The former is the law's EUPHEMISM for the latter. "[S]tate officialdom, when hoping to sound professional and clinical, uses the term gaming as having an ameliorative sense. By contrast, . . . gambling has a pejorative connotation." Thomas L. Clark, Gaming and/or Gambling: You Pays Your Money, 10 Verbatim 20 (Spring 1984). In traditional legal idiom, a wager or a bet is known as a gaming contract. And in the U.K., the Gaming Act 1968 set up the Gaming Board, which regulates gaming.

ganancial (= of, relating to, or consisting of community property) originated as a Spanish-law term, from the Spanish ganancias (= earnings, winnings); the Spanish equivalent of community property is gananciales. The only form of the word to have entered English is the adjective ganancial, which unfortunately is omitted from the OED, RH2, W3, and most other general English-language dictionaries. E.g., "The husband has the active control and administration of the ganancial property during the matrimony." Stramler v. Coe, 15 Tex. 211, 215 (1855)./ "Because the legal concept of the community property or ganancial system is so foreign to that of the common law, it is frequently very difficult for the judge or lawyer, trained or versed in the common law, to grasp and understand its principles." 1 William Q. deFuniak, Principles of Community Property § 3, at 7–8 (1943)./ "The community or 'ganancial' system was introduced by the Visigothic invaders of the Roman Empire in the early part of the fifth century into what is now Spain and portions of gantlet; gauntlet. Although the latter is more common in most senses, the former is still preferred in one of them. One runs the gantlet (= a kind of ordeal or punishment) but throws down the gauntlet (= a glove). The trend, however, is to use gauntlet for gantlet. Like many trends, it is worth resisting—e.g.: "Even if he is initially successful in convincing his client and executing a thoroughly professional draft, it will still have to run the gauntlet [read gantlet] of many minds." Reed Dickerson, The Fundamentals of Legal Drafting § 4.15, at 77 (2d ed. 1986)./ "[T]he Code did not require the taxpayers to run the administrative gantlet in 1985 to obtain a judicial determination of the 1985 value." Estepp v. Miller, 731 S.W.2d 677, 682 (Tex. App.—Austin 1987) (Shannon, C.J., concurring).

Gauntlet is correctly used in the following sentences: "In substance, the plaintiffs argue, the Department should have ignored the federal administrator's warnings, thrown down the gauntlet, litigated the matter and taken its chances on losing federal funds." Hightower v. Duffy, 548 N.E.2d 495, 505 (Ill. App. Ct. 1989)./ "At some point, we must throw down the gauntlet against the evil of racism." Anthony E. Cook, The Death of God in American Pragmatism and Realism, 82 Geo. L.J. 1431, 1504 (1994).

gaol; gaoler. These are variant BrE spellings of jail and jailer. The terms are pronounced the same regardless of spelling. See jail delivery.

garden-variety, adj., (= of the ordinary or familiar kind) is becoming a garden-variety CLICHÉ in legal prose. E.g., "Because Eichelberger was nothing more, nor less, than a garden-variety divorce case, one would normally have thought that the litigation had ended when the court of civil appeals overruled Mr. Eichelberger's motion for rehearing."

garnish; garnishee, v.t. In AmE, the usual verb form is garnish (= to take property, usu. a portion of someone's salary, by legal authority). Garnishee is usually reserved for the nominal sense ("a person or institution, such as a bank, that is indebted to or is bailee for another whose property has been subjected to garnishment"). The noun corresponding to garnish is garnishment.

In BrE, however, and in a few American jurisdictions, garnishee as well as garnish is used as a verb: "As it was composed entirely of money that did not belong to Smith, it could not be garnisheed by his creditor and this was sufficient to dispose of the case." (Eng.)

The OED gives passing notice to garnishee as a verb and its corresponding noun garnisheement; the main entries are under garnish and garnishment.

garnishable (= subject to garnishment), a 20th-century NEOLOGISM omitted from most general English-language dictionaries, is a useful term—e.g.: "[T]he Court of Appeals added a qualification to whether a check is a garnishable asset . . . ." Water Processing Co. v. Southern Golf Builders, Inc., 285 S.E.2d 21, 22 (Ga. 1981).

garnisher; garnishor. Garnisher is preferred; it is the only spelling listed in W3 and the prevalent spelling in legal texts.

garnishment order (AmE) = garnishee order (BrE).

gases, not gasses, is the plural form of the noun gas; nevertheless, for the verb to gas, gassed is the accepted past tense and gasses is the third-person singular form. Cf. bus.

gauntlet. See gantlet.

gavel. Though everyone knows what a judge's gavel is, few seem to know the name of the piece of wood that is struck by a gavel. The term is sound block.

gazump (BrE) = (1) v.i., to act improperly in the sale of houses, as by raising the price after accepting an offer; (2) v.t., (of a seller) to treat a buyer of a house unfairly by raising the price after accepting the buyer's offer; or (3) v.t., (of a competing house buyer) to place a higher bid for a house than the one that the seller has already accepted, thereby encouraging the seller to back out of a contract. This early 20th-century BrE NEOLOGISM, labeled "slang" in the OED and in the COD, is a word of unknown origin.

The past tense is gazumped, not gazumpted—e.g.: (sense 3) "During the go-go Thatcher years, it was not uncommon for apartments under contracts 'duly signed by both party's [sic] solicitors' to be 'gazumpted' [read 'gazumped'] by a higher bidder the day before closing." Paul Schneider, A Flat in London, Esquire, Dec. 1991, at 72.

g.b.h.; G.B.H.; GBH. Some English criminal-law writers use this initialism for grievous bodily harm—e.g.: "[C]ausing grievous bodily harm with intent is an alternative. The abbreviation 'g.b.h.' is frequently used in conversation, though not in court." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 151–52 (1978)./ "[T]he House of Lords has now decided that there can be an 'infliction' of GBH without proof of an assault." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 279 (1991). Though such an initialism may speed communication among specialists, nonspecialists are likely to consider it obscure and off-putting. If it must be used, the best form, for the sake of readability, is g.b.h. See ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS gender has long been used as a grammatical distinction of a word according to the sex referred to. It has newly been established in the language of the law in phrases such as gender-based discrimination, a use disapproved as jargonistic by some authorities. What this adds to sex discrimination, aside from eight letters and one hyphen, one can only guess.

Here, the better usage is illustrated: "In the court's view, the ordinance creates a conflict between first-amendment free speech guaranties and the fourteenth-amendment right to be free from sex-based discrimination." See sex.

gendered is a NEOLOGISM meaning "biased in favor of one sex." Built on the trendy use of gender (q.v.), this adjective dates from the early 1970s. E.g., "Yet the gendered structure of wage labor is not being challenged." Joan C. Williams, Deconstructing Gender, 87 Mich. L. Rev. 797, 801 (1989)./ "This Article and its analysis is 'feminist' in the sense that it seeks to uncover and examine the gendered nature of discourse—in this case, an opera by Giacomo Puccini." J.M. Balkin, Turandot's Victory, 2 Yale J. Law & Humanities 299, 300 n.1 (1990). See NOUNS AS VERBS.

general court, in some New England states, refers to the legislature, which historically convened itself as the highest judicial tribunal: "In 1639, Massachusetts Bay had a full system of courts, organized in a way that would not strike a modern lawyer as unduly exotic. The general court, acting both as legislature and as the highest court, stood at the crown of the system. As a court, it confined itself mostly to appeals, though its exact jurisdiction was a bit vague." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 39–40 (2d ed. 1985). See judicial court.

general damages; special damages. General damages are "those elements of loss or damage [that] need not be claimed or mentioned in the complaint in order to be the subject of proof and recovery at the trial"; and special damages are "those which must be specifically claimed and described if recovery for them is to be allowed." Charles T. McCormick, Handbook of the Law of Damages § 8, at 32–33 (1935). Another way of expressing the distinction is this: general damages are those that the law presumes follow from the type of wrong complained of; special damages are those that are alleged to have been sustained in the particular circumstances of the particular wrong, and they must be specifically claimed and proved to have been sustained. The terms, when "used in relation to the problem of pleading, relate to the question, Could the adversary foresee, at the time he reads the complaint, a claim of harm asserted at the trial?" Id. n.3. See damages.

general denial. See demurrer.

general intent, in criminal law, is problematic: "Most courts use the term without explanation as though everyone understood it. When an explanation is offered, it is frequently in terms that one suspects the court does not really mean or at least is not willing to generalize across offenses." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 231–32 (1982). The phrase general intent has two senses: (1) negligence involving blameworthy inadvertence; and (2) recklessness involving actual awareness of a risk and the culpable taking of that risk. See intent(ion).

general intention. See intent(ion) (F).

general issue; special issue. At common law, a general issue arose in litigation—still arises in some jurisdictions—upon the defendant's filing a general denial, which questioned the truth of every material allegation in the plaintiff's pleading. In a suit based on a contract under seal, the general issue was non est factum (q.v.); in detinue it was non detinet ("he does not detain"); in trespass it was "not guilty."

A special issue, by contrast, arose from pleading by specific as opposed to general allegations. For the most part, special issues long the delight of acutely technical lawyers—have fallen into disuse.

A general issue results in general verdict—e.g.: "In most federal cases, the traditional general verdict is used, by which the jury merely finds for one or the other of the parties." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 630 (4th ed. 1983). See special verdict.

generalized (= made general) sometimes wrongly displaces general. E.g., "Some courts, refusing to find in the rather generalized [read general] language of the usual statute a legislative intent to abolish the concept of marital unity, have sought to adapt the incidents of ownership by the entirety to the principle that neither spouse has rights or powers superior to those of the other." The sentence does not intend to convey that the language was made general (by the legislature, presumably), but that it is general. Cf. particularized.

generally has three basic meanings: (1) "disregarding insignificant exceptions" <the level of advocacy in this court is generally very high>; (2) "in many ways" <he was the most generally qualified applicant>; (3) "usually; most of the time" <he generally left the office at five o'clock> Sense (3) is least good in formal writing, although at times it merges with sense (1).

generally accepted accounting principles; generally accepted accountancy principles. The former is the usual phrase in AmE, the latter in BrE. Accountancy is, however, used in the U.S. in other phrases and contexts.

The phrases are often abbreviated GAAP /gap/—e.g.: "The court gave great deference to generally accepted accounting principles—GAAP—that would have guided the parties at the time of the acquisition." Stewart M. Landefeld, A Guide for the Fraudulent Transfer Law Maze, Nat'l L.J., 6 Nov. 1989, at 57. Because GAAP is an acronym, it should not have periods after each letter. See ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS.

general property; special property. Some legal theorists refer to ownership as general property and rightful possession as special property. See possession (B) & property (A). general verdict; general interrogatory; general issue. See special verdict & general issue.

generative; generational. The distinction is clear: generative = procreative; generational = pertaining to generations. "The degree of kinship between a decedent and a claimant was reckoned by taking the number of generative [read generational] steps between them or by adding the numbers of such steps between both of them and their nearest common ancestor."

generic. See genus (A).

generic(al)ness; genericism. Although it is odd-looking, genericness is now the most widely used noun corresponding to generic, adj. It is recorded from 1939 in the OED and appears most commonly in reference to trademarks. E.g., "As I view the cases, a defendant alleging invalidity of a trademark for genericness must show that to the consuming public as a whole the word has lost all its trademark significance." Marks v. Polaroid Corp., 129 F. Supp. 243, 270 (D. Mass. 1955)./ "Rovira's affirmative defense of genericness was not barred by the federal rules." Keebler Co. v. Rovira Biscuit Corp., 624 F.2d 366, 374 n.7 (1st Cir. 1980)./ "Indeed, BVA's own witnesses and exhibits effectively demonstrated the genericness of 'blinded veterans,' for they employed the term repeatedly to denote formerly sighted former warriors." Blinded Veterans Ass'n v. Blinded Am. Veterans Found., 872 F.2d 1035, 1041 (D.C. Cir. 1989). Despite its specialized currency, genericness retains an un-English appearance. Cf. prolificness.

Genericalness is listed in the OED and W2; it does not, like genericness, flout principles of English word formation and might be preferred on that ground. It is omitted from W3, which labels the adj. generical archaic.

Genericism has also appeared—e.g.: "There remain two defenses that licensees might make: descriptiveness and genericism." James M. Treece, Licensee Estoppel in Trademark Cases, 58 Trademark Rep. 728, 738 (1968). Labeled rare in the OED, genericism is perhaps the most realistic alternative to oust genericness.

genericide, a late-20th-century NEOLOGISM in the law of trademarks, means "the loss of a trademark that no longer distinguishes one owner's goods from others' goods." It makes little literal sense, as -cide (lit. "killer, slayer" or "killing, slaying") is made to refer merely to the death of a trademark—not its killing. One court calls the term a MALAPROPISM, stating: "It refers to the death of the trademark, not to the death of the generic name for the product. A more accurate term might be trademarkicide, or perhaps even generization, either of which seems to better capture the idea that the trademark dies by becoming a generic name." Plasticolor Molded Prods. v. Ford Motor Co., 713 F. Supp. 1329, 1344 n.22 (C.D. Cal. 1989). Nevertheless, the word genericide is "firmly ensconced in the literature." Id.

E.g., Jacqueline Stern, Genericide: Cancellation of a Registered Trademark, 51 Fordham L. Rev. 666 (1983)./ "In the usual 'genericide' case a venerable mark has come under attack because, over the course of years, consumers have come to regard it as a name for the genus of a product rather than as a brand name of a particular product from a single source." G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 676 F. Supp. 1436, 1488 (E.D. Wis. 1987).

GENITIVES. See POSSESSIVES (G).

genius (= the prevailing character or spirit; characteristic method or procedure) is often used in reference to law. E.g., "A federal cause of action 'brought at any distance of time' would be 'utterly repugnant to the genius of our laws.'" Wilson v. Garcia, 471 U.S. 261, 271 (1985) (quoting Adams v. Woods, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 336, 342 (1805)).

The plural geniuses is preferred over genii except in the sense of demons or spirits. See PLURALS (A). gentleman should not be used indiscriminately as a genteelism for man, the generic term. Gentleman should be reserved for reference to a cultured, refined man. It is a sign of the times that "[n]o word could be, it seems, more thoroughly out of style than gentleman." John Mortimer, Wooster Sauce, Sunday Times, 29 Sept. 1991, at 7-6 (reviewing Hugh David, Heroes, Mavericks and Bounders (1991)).

In BrE, the word formerly referred to a man of independent means and not working gainfully.

gentlemen's agreement; gentleman's agreement. The former is better, since at least two must agree. One writer defines the phrase as an agreement that "is not an agreement, made between two persons, neither of whom is a gentleman, whereby each expects the other to be strictly bound without himself being bound at all." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 326 (1973). A gentlemen's agreement differs from a contract because it is unenforceable.

The phrase runs afoul of the drive to eliminate SEXISM but is nevertheless widely used. Several alternative phrases are offered in Rosalie Maggio's Bias-Free Word Finder (1992)—among them honorable agreement, informal agreement, and your word. But these phrases are patently inadequate. The upshot is that the phrase gentlemen's agreement will probably stump many writers who want to be nonsexist.

gentlepersons; gentlepeople. These are occasionally used as neutral terms in salutations, but they have never lost their look of jocularity. The Second Barnhart Dictionary of New English (1980) says of gentleperson, "often used humorously or ironically." The lawyers who write "Dear Gentlepeople" (they do exist) apparently do so with a straight face, but their readers probably cannot keep one. Better choices are available for salutations: Ladies and Gentlemen, for example, or Dear Counsel (if all the recipients are lawyers).

genus. A. And species. Analytical jurists borrowed these terms from logic and biology. A genus is a major class or kind of things, which includes several subclasses usually called species. The corresponding adjectives are generic and specific. Thus, trademark is a species within the genus of intellectual property; murder is a species of the genus of crime, i.e., it is a particular crime.

B. Plural. The only plural form included in W10 is genera, but both the OED and RH2 include the variant genuses, which has appeared repeatedly in legal writing—e.g.: "There are other contentions, or, at least, other species of the above genuses." In re Missouri Pac. R. Co., 13 F. Supp. 888, 891 (E.D. Mo. 1935)./ "Scholars sought to classify and categorize legal doctrines and cases much as biologists would genuses and species . . . ." Peter R. Teachout, Book Review, 67 Va. L. Rev. 815, 825 (1981)./ "Rather, 'tasty' is 'merely descriptive' and describes a quality found in many genuses [read, perhaps, types] of salad dressing." Henri's Food Prods. Co. v. Tasty Snacks, Inc., 817 F.2d 1303, 1306 (7th Cir. 1987). Though purists decry this form, it is undeniably more comprehensible to more people. See PLURALS (A). gerrymander, an early-19th-century satirical PORTMANTEAU WORD, combines the name of Elbridge Gerry (the governor of Massachusetts) with the ending of salamander. When Gerry's party redistricted Massachusetts in 1812 to favor the antifederalists, Essex County was divided in a way that made one voting district look something like a salamander. Hence gerrymandering came to refer to the practice of arranging electoral divisions in a way that gives one political party an unfair advantage.

Though the original sense is still the primary one, this word has had its meaning extended. Some legal writers, for example, refer to jurisdictional gerrymandering, in which jurisdiction may carry either a geographical sense (as in E.E.O.C. v. Int'l Union of Operating Eng'rs, 553 F.2d 251, 254 (2d Cir. 1977)) or a sense conveying the idea of legal power (as in Laurence H. Tribe, Jurisdictional Gerrymandering: Zoning Disfavored Rights

Out of the Federal Courts, 16 Harv. Civ. Rights & Civ. Liberties Rev. 129 (1981)).

Those extensions in meaning seem reasonable, but the word has also been subjected to what could only be described as SLIPSHOD EXTENSION: "In the last few years, the 30-second 'attack ad' and the 10-second television news 'sound bite' have become such prominent . . . features of political campaigns that members of Congress have introduced more than two dozen bills in an attempt to gerrymander them out of existence." Randall Rothenberg, Politics on TV: Too Fast, Too Loose? N.Y. Times, 15 July 1990, at E1. How the metaphor of gerrymandering fits that sentence is anyone's guess.

GERUNDS. The legal writer's prejudice against nouns ending in -ing is unfounded. When it comes to CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF, one effective way of reducing prolixity is to use gerunds directly; thus adjudicating that case was difficult rather than the adjudication of that case was difficult; presenting the arguments rather than the presentation of the arguments, etc. See BURIED VERBS, FUSED PARTICIPLES (A) & DANGLERS (C).

Gestalt (= a shape, configuration, or structure that, as an object of perception, forms a specific whole or unity incapable of expression simply in terms of its parts), a VOGUE WORD, is usually capitalized and italicized. Why? Because it is still treated as a German noun (hence italics), and in German all nouns are capitalized. E.g., "Virtually all fact-finding was subjectively based, depending ultimately on intuition and emotion, 'hunching' in Gestalt-like response to the situation."

get > got > gotten, got. The past participle gotten predominates in AmE, got in BrE.

get is good English. Yet many lawyers want to avoid it because they consider it too informal; they prefer obtain or procure, two FORMAL WORDS. The same tendency is at work here that leads lawyers to shun before in favor of prior to or antecedent to, later in favor of subsequent to, and the like. Yet confident, relaxed legal writers use the word get quite naturally—e.g.: "It was until recently a civil offense, called 'alienation of affections,' for which either spouse could get damages." Max Radin, The Law and You 54 (1948)./ "And if he goes there and gets divorced there is no reason why the divorce should not be valid." Id. at 65. (On other stylistic points in the second sentence quoted, see and (A) & reason why.) See COLLOQUIALITY.

gibe; jibe. Gibe is both noun and verb. As a noun, it means "a caustic remark or taunt." E.g., "The gibes hurled at Chancery . . . had led to a determination on the part of some Chancellors that their decisions would be impeccable and would be rooted firmly in precedent." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 129 (2d ed. 1979).

Jibe is generally considered a verb only, meaning "to make things fit, uniform, or consistent." E.g., "These laws jibe well enough with his notions of right and wrong; the trouble is they do not jibe with his capacity to act on his own professed convictions." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 41 (1968). But Fuller, who was fond of the word, used it also as a noun meaning "agreement; consistency"—e.g.: "What we have here is a lack of jibe between words and actions at a level below that of the courts." Id. at 24.

gift, it may be surprising to learn, has acted as a verb since the 16th century. E.g., "All the property was gifted property [i.e., it took the form of gifts]." Though this usage is old, it is not now standard. English has the uncanny ability, however, to transform nouns into verbs, and to revive moribund usages. Twenty years ago contact was objected to as a verb, though it had been used that way since the early 19th century; few writers now feel uncomfortable using the word as a verb. See NOUNS AS VERBS.

Gift may soon be in the same class—still, cautious writers may prefer to use it only as a noun if the verb causes discomfort, as it well may: "The stock may not be gifted, pledged, or hypothecated without the board's approval." One is accustomed to thinking of gifted children, but not of gifted stock.

gift over. See over (A).

gin up (= [1] to rev up (as an engine); or [2] to concoct) is a late-19th-century AmE NEOLOGISM that is barely mentioned in the OED and appears to have been missed by most American lexicographers (being omitted from W10, RH2, W3, AHD, and the like). The PHRASAL VERB is a common one in discussions of law—e.g.: "The Government has taken tax charges, ginned them up into mail-fraud charges, ginned that up into a RICO case, and obtained an indictment of an ongoing business of this size." Oral argument in U.S. v. Regan, 2d Cir., Docket #88-1344, 17 Aug. 1988./ "So they ginned up a 'law and order' message suggesting that Democrats were soft on crime . . . ." David S. Broder, Mudball Politics, Wash. Post, 4 Nov. 1990, at C7./ "This is a law enacted by Congress. This is not something we just ginned up out of whole cloth." Carl Ingram, Debt-Reduction Bill girl. This word is widely (and understandably) regarded as an affront when used in reference to an adult, just as boy would be. But for a female minor, girl is the appropriate word; for an odd avoidance of the word in its proper context, see minor woman.

Could Cost Community Colleges, L.A. Times, 21 Dec. 1990, at A3 (quoting Bill Moran of the U.S. Department of Education).

gist /jist/ began as a legal term meaning "the real ground or point (of an action, indictment, etc.)" (OED) and has since passed into nonlegal parlance. Yet it is still (perhaps unwittingly) used in the legal sense: "The gist of the libel is that certain articles called lubricators are not good articles." See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES. Cf. gravamen.

give, devise, and bequeath. The leading American scholars on the law of wills and trusts should resolve any douht: "In drafting wills, 'I give' is an excellent substitute for 'I devise,' 'I bequeath,' and 'I give, devise, and bequeath.' 'I give' will effectively transfer any kind of property, and no fly-specking lawyer can ever fault you for using the wrong verb." Jesse Dukeminier, Jr. & Stanley M. Johanson, Family Wealth Transactions 11 (1972). They are not alone: "'I give' is better than 'I give, devise, and bequeath.'" Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 170 (2d ed. 1979). See bequeath, devise & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS give evidence is more vague and more verbose than testify. E.g., "The defendant gave evidence [read testified] that he was elsewhere at the time of the alleged sale and did not make it." Dunn v. U.S., 284 U.S. 390, 392 (1932)./ "She looked strained and ill, but gave her evidence [read testified or, perhaps, gave her testimony] in a quiet, subdued fashion that was most impressive." Stanley Jackson, The Life and Cases of Mr. Justice Humphreys 200 (n.d. [1951]).

Even if people generally understood give evidence as an equivalent of testify, the phrase would still be plagued with an AMBIGUITY: give evidence sometimes has nothing to do with testimony. E.g., "The American Bar Association is of the opinion that every candidate for admission to the bar should give evidence of graduation from a law school . . . ." "Law, American Schools of," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 93, 96 (1953).

give judgment for = to rule in favor of. E.g., "The court finds that Paul's patent is valid and that it is being infringed, and gives judgment for Paul." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 682 (4th ed. 1983).

Glanvil(l)(e). The purported author of the treatise that was truly the first book on English law (Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae)—and the justiciar of England from 1180 to 1189—was named Sir Ranulf de Glanvill. Though a few writers spell the name Glanvil (and even Glanville or de Glanville), most modern legal historians make it Glanvill.

global (= embracing a number of items or categories) is used commonly in American and British legal writing. E.g., "The wife's net income has to be calculated so as to ascertain the sum that is deemed to be the husband's by section 18 and must be added to his income similarly quantified; from this global sum must be deducted all that is allowable as allowances personal to him." (Eng.)/ "Plaintiff made global objections to the jury charge."

gloss, originally "a word inserted between the lines or in the margin as an explanatory equivalent of a foreign or otherwise difficult word in the text" (OED), is used in extended senses in legal contexts. E.g., "The function of chancery was to supply the deficiencies of the common law; thus equity was, in the words of Maitland, 'a gloss on the common law.'" (Eng.)

In its most extended sense, gloss is used as a COLLECTIVE NOUN equivalent to "pronouncements (usu. by a court)." E.g., "The act and its judicial gloss also provide the manner for distributing the recovery, if any, obtained from a third party [several cases interpreting the act are mentioned]." This sense is analogous to the nonlegal sense "a collection of explanations, glossary," and is not really exceptionable.

glossator. The Glossators were scholars principally in Bologna who, in the Middle Ages, annotated Justinian's legislation with marginal or interliner glosses, passage by passage. By convention, the name of this school of annotators is capitalized.

That practice is convenient, for purposes of DIFFERENTIATION, because the word glossator (always lowercase) also commonly denotes any modern scholar or court who provides glosses—e.g.: "Sometimes a glossator has relied on supposed purposes of the legislators, or on their debates at the time of enactment, or on their recitals of evils sought to be remedied, or on their putative responses to circumstances strictly contemporary with the enactments." Richards v. Thurston, 304 F. Supp. 449, 455 (D. Mass. 1969)./ "Most jurors encounter the arcane language of instructions infrequently—maybe only once in a lifetime—and it is therefore important to give them instructions that do not require scholastic glossators to impart meaning." U.S. v. Ramsey, 785 F.2d 184, 190 (7th Cir. 1986).

glue, v.t., preferably makes gluing, not glueing: "The systems have come unstuck and we see, presently, no way of glueing [read gluing] them back together again." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 102 (1974).

go. See go to.

GOBBLEDYGOOK is the obscure language characteristic of jargon-mongering bureaucrats. Thus iterative naturalistic inquiry methodology supposedly refers to a series of interviews. Much legal writing is open to the criticism of being gobbledygook. One of the purposes of this book is to wage a battle against it. See JARGON, LATINISMS, LEGALESE & OBSCURITY.

"The besetting sin of jurists," writes a well-known Australian authority, "is to conceal threadbare thoughts in elaborate and difficult language. In spite of the difficulties inherent in the subject, the problems of jurisprudence can be expressed in fairly simple language." G.W. Paton, A Textbook of Jurisprudence 1–2 (4th ed. 1972).

goes to. See go to.

goes without saying, it, is not generally suitable for formal contexts, although it may be appropriate in speech or in informal prose. If it goes without saying, then it need not be said.

go hence without day. This phrase, an old standard in defensive pleadings, is routinely used by lawyers who have absolutely no idea what they mean by it. Perhaps they reason just as Chief Justice Fortescue did in the 15th century: "Sir, the law is as I say it is, and so it has been laid down ever since the law began; and we have several set forms which are held as law, and so held and used for good reason, though we cannot at present remember that reason." Y.B. 36 Hen. VI, ff. 25b–26 (1458) (as translated in 3 William S. Holdsworth, A History of English Law 626 (3d ed. 1923)).

In fact, the phrase originated in what Sir Matthew Hale, the 17th-century chief justice of the King's Bench, called "the golden age of pleading" before 1500. See Margaret Hastings, The Court of Common Pleas in Fifteenth Century England 186 (1947). It is but a LOAN TRANSLATION of the LAW FRENCH phrase aller sans jour (lit., "to go without day"), used in medieval times. The phrase meant merely that the defendant would like to leave court without any further settings on the court's docket.

At common law, some time after Law French fell into disuse, a longer Latin phrase appeared in orders of dismissal: eat inde sine die, that is, "that he may go hence without day." The defendant was free to go; he would not have what he did not want · his day in court. This form of order was still used in England until 1733, when use of the English language became compulsory. See W.A. Jowitt, The Dictionary of English Law 679 (1959). See sine die & day in court.

Yet the English translation of the phrase, without day, cropped up well before 1733, In the 1701 edition of John's Cowel's Interpreter, we learn that "[t]o be dismissed without Day, is to be finally discharged [by] the Court." Dismissed cases were said to be put without day.

American lawyers mindlessly parrot the phrase: in Texas, for example, where most defensive pleadings contain the phrase, not one lawyer in fifty can explain what the phrase means. Though go hence without day is not current everywhere, it ought to be current nowhere.

golden rule. In the realm of morality, everyone knows about the do-unto-others Golden Rule. In law, the phrase golden rule takes on other meanings: (1) the principle that, in construing all written instruments, a court should adhere to the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words unless that adherence would lead to some manifest absurdity; (2) the principle, in legal drafting, that one should be consistent in terminology by employing one invariable term for one idea. For a discussion of the latter principle, see INELEGANT VARIATION.

good behavior is a well-known standard by which judges are considered fit to continue their tenure: "The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behavior . . . ." U.S. Const. art. III, § 1. But the phrase was not original with the constitutional Framers: in 1700, the Act of Settlement provided that judges' commissions would be quamdiu se bene gesserint, i.e., "during good be-good cause shown is one of the few standard legal expressions that are neither prolix nor inaccessible to nonlawyers. E.g., "A writ of sequestration may be quashed or dissolved for good cause shown." In statutes and rules, the participle shown is advisable because it places a burden on the party to demonstrate whatever must be demonstrated. But in advocates' arguments about whether the standard has been met—esp. in the argument of the advocate who is doing the showing—the word shown is often inadvisable because it emphasizes the wrong idea: shown rather than good cause. See SENTENCE ENDINGS. Cf. show cause & probable cause.

goods has a variety of senses, two of which are here relevant. In the legal sense, goods refers to chattels or personalty. In the economic sense, however, it often refers to things that have value, whether tangible or not. For example: "The meaning and value of all goods (money, power, love, and so forth) are socially created and vary from one society to the next. Social goods do not include privately valued goods, such as sunsets or mountain air." (From a review of M. Walzer's Spheres of Justice (1983).)

In the sense "tangible or movable pieces of property," goods has traditionally appeared only in the plural form. In recent years, however, good has developed the sense "a tangible or movable piece of property other than money." Though still considered unidiomatic by those with sensitive ears, this usage has made such inroads that it is unlikely to be stopped: "The buyer-seller relationship between the shipowner and the supplier of a good [better usage requires a supplier of goods, even if there is only one kind of goods] simply does not give rise to a duty on the shipowner's part not to act in such a manner as te cause an injured third party to sue the supplier as a possible defendant liable for the injuries."

goodwill. Formerly two words, then hyphenated, the term has now become one word.

goose case is legal slang for what in legal JARGON is termed a case on all fours. E.g., "While there is no 'goose' case in this circuit, Instruction 31 of the Fifth Circuit Pattern Jury Instructions (Criminal Cases) (1979), informs our judgment." U.S. v. Gaber, 745 F.2d 952, 954 (5th Cir. 1984)./ "One need not find a 'goose case' to imbue a warden at a jail with a constitutional duty to protect a prisoner prone to suicide from self-destruction." *Lewis v. got, p.pl. See get.

go to, in the sense "to bear on the issue of," is a distinctive legal usage that is current in both AmE and BrE. Oddly, though, it seems to have escaped the attention of American and British lexicographers to date.

Law students frequently say that it puzzles them at first, but soon they begin using it unconsciously. It is a commonplace in good legal writing: "Mistake going to the interpretation of the rule of law is not generally a defence." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 183 (2d ed. 1961)./ "Questions of substantive validity go to the consistency of the substance of the statute with constitutional provisions . . . ." John H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 145 (1969)./ "The discretion of the court does not go merely to terms and conditions, but extends to whether to permit a nonsuit at all." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 654 (4th ed. 1983).

go to court. See court, go to.

go to law = to sue. E.g., "If, for instance, a milk company goes to law to protest against a state statute setting the price of milk, the past profits—or lack of profits—of the milk distributors, the medical need of milk for slum children, the present financial shape of dairy farmers, the personnel and ability of the government agency doing the price-setting, all may be treated as just as important as the 'due process clause' . . . ." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 142 (1939)./ "In such circumstances it may be unreal to suggest that the buyer should resist the demand and go to law to enforce his right to the ship without extra payment." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 230 (3d ed. 1981).

governance. Fowler pronounced governance an ARCHAISM for which either government or control suffices, allowing it only in "rhetorical or solemn contexts." Yet this noun is frequently used in law to refer to running or governing a corporation. E.g., "The court emphasized that a proceeding in bankruptcy court does not address the same issues of corporate governance that the Delaware statute was intended to cover."

Governance does not mean "the quality of a jurisdiction's law that governs in a particular case." E.g., "While California has a significant interest in the governance of [read in having its law govern] these relationships, Texas has few, if any."

governmental; government, adj. When we have an adjective (governmental) to do the job, we need not resort to a noun (government) to do the work of the adjective. Though the trend today is to write government agency, the stylist writes governmental agency. These are the niceties of writing that make the reader's task a little easier and that distinguish between formal and ordinary prose. Following are a few examples of the better usage: "If a governmental institution is to be fair, one group cannot always be expected to win."/ "The City of Akron has not attempted to allocate governmental power on the basis of any general principle."/ "The decision whether a public facility shall be operated in compliance with the Constitution is an essential governmental decision."

GOVERNMENTAL FORMS. The English language abounds in words to denote almost every conceivable form of government, usually ending in either of the suffixes -cracy and -archy. Following is a sampling of the hundreds of familiar and arcane terms in the English language, too numerous for inclusion here:

clerisocracy	=	government by priests or scholars democracy	=	government by the people dyarchy	=	government by two rulers gerontocracy	=	government by the elderly gynecocracy	=	government by women jurocracy (q.v.)	=	government by the courts monocracy	=	government by a single person polyarchy	=	government by many persons plutocracy	=	government by the wealthy technocracy	=	government by technicians gownsman (= one who wears a gown as an indication of his office or profession) was formerly used in G.B. of judges and barristers, but is now more likely to be used in reference to academics. See silk & SEXISM (B).

grab law refers not to law but to a kind of lawlessness: it means "aggressive collection practices." The phrase frequently appears in discussions of bankruptcy—e.g.: "Such an unfair result is contrary to the policy of the Bankruptcy Act. Its policy is not to subject creditors to the haphazard chance of 'grab law.' Its chief purpose is to afford all creditors an equal opportunity to realize on their indebtedness." England v. Sanderson, 236 F.2d 641, 643–44 (9th Cir. 1956)./ "[The automatic stay provisions of the Bankruptcy Act were designed for] protection of the estate of the bankrupt against the ravages that would be inflicted on the estate if grab law were allowed to govern." Frank R. Kennedy, The Automatic Stay in Bankruptcy, 11 U. Mich. J.L. Reform 175, 187 (1978).

Sometimes the phrase is used attributively as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—e.g., "By such grab-law tactics Armstrong claims possession of the entire building, which contained the property of six tenants . . . ." In re Process-Manz Press, Inc., 369 F.2d 513, 524 (7th Cir. 1966).

GRAMMAR. The very word is considered anathema by many persons, even those with an advanced education, not so much because it is boring (which it can be) as because it seems intimidating. Often this intimidation causes scoffers to dismiss grammar as an unimportant, trifling pursuit. To be sure, there are more important things in life, but the significance of good grammar should not be underestimated, especially by those engaged in a learned profession.

The courts have frequently addressed the subject with good sense. For example, the Supreme Court of Florida has stated: "The legislature is presumed to know the meaning of words and the rules of grammar, and the only way that a court is advised of what the legislature intends is by giving the generally accepted construction, not only to the phraseology of an act but to the manner in which it is punctuated." Florida State Rac- ing Comm'n v. Bourquardez, 42 So. 2d 87, 88 (Fla. 1949) (en banc).

Courts give more leeway to nonlawyers but still take a commonsense approach. In examining wills, e.g., courts will forgive every error this book is designed to prevent: "When it becomes necessary to do so in order to effectuate the testator's intention as ascertained from the context of the will, the court may disregard clerical mistakes in writing, improper use of capital letters, paragraphing, abbreviation of words, punctuation, misspelling and grammatical inaccuracies, especially where the will is written by a layman who is unlearned, illiterate, or unskilled. In order to ascertain and give effect to the testator's intent, the court may disregard rules of grammar and verbal niceties, but unless a different construction is required, the ordinary rules of punctuation, capitalization, and grammar should be adhered to in construing a will." 95 C.J.S. Wills § 612 (1957).

Likewise with contracts: "[T]he use of inapt words or bad English . . . will not affect the validity of the agreement, although it may affect its construction." 17 C.J.S. Contracts § 57 (1963). And affidavits: "Where the meaning substantially appears, ordinarily errors or mistakes on the part of the draftsman in the body of [an] affidavit will be overlooked, and mere grammatical errors . . . will not vitiate the effectiveness of the instrument." 2A C.J.S. Affidavits § 43 (1972).

The same is true even in pleading: "Bad grammar does not vitiate a declaration, nor do other faults of style have that effect, unless they produce such a degree of obscurity as to give rise to the belief that the tribunal before whom the cause is heard might be misled as to the true issue." 41 Am. Jur. Pleading § 28 (1942).

Nevertheless, this book seeks to guide legal writers around these pitfalls in the belief that, even if a document's enforceability will not be marred by such lapses, the court's confidence in its reliability may well be adversely affected. Grammar is not, however, to be followed slavishly without regard for what is effective and what is idiomatic. "Wherever by small grammatical negligences the energy of an idea can be condensed, or a word stands for a sentence, I hold grammatical rigor in contempt." Thomas Jefferson, Letter to Madison, 12 Nov. 1801, in 8 Writings of Thomas Jefferson 108–09 (1897).

GRAMMATICAL AMBIGUITY. See AMBIGUITY.

grammatical error. Because grammatical may mean either (1) "relating to grammar" <grammatical subject> or (2) "consistent with grammar" , there is nothing wrong with the age-old phrase grammatical error (sense 1). Cf. the phrases criminal lawyer and logical fallacy. See ILLOGIC.

grammaticality is to grammar as constitutionality is to constitution.

grandfather clause = a clause in the constitutions of some southern American states that exempted from suffrage restrictions the descendants of men who voted before the Civil War. The OED misleadingly labels this phrase colloquial; it is the only available name for these statutes, and it appears in formal writing. E.g., "A state law directly denying Negroes the right would be overthrown as a matter of course, and in 1915 the Court had invalidated a so-called 'grandfather clause' [that] required literacy tests of those who were not descendants of those who could vote in 1867." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 212 (1960). Moreover, it has extended senses, referring to any statutory or regulatory clause exempting a class of persons or transactions because of circumstances existing before the clause takes effect.

This phrase has given rise to the verb to grandfather, meaning "to cover (a person) with the benefits of a grandfather clause." E.g., "Beginning in 1972, several States passed statutes permitting such acquisitions in limited circumstances or for specialized purposes. For example, Iowa passed a grandfathering statute which had the effect of permitting the only out-of-state bank holding company owning an Iowa bank to maintain and expand its in-state banking activities. . . ." Northeast Bancorp, Inc. v. Federal Reserve Sys., 472 U.S. 159, 163 (1985). To be grandfathered is to have the advantage of a grandfather clause <get yourself grandfathered by establishing priority in an interest>.

A few writers and speakers—sometimes in jest—have resorted to grandparent clause to avoid what might be perceived as SEXISM. But that neutering skews the historical sense and is likely to strike most readers and listeners as jocular.

grand jury. A. Generally. In most American states, a prosecutor cannot proceed in a case involving a felony or serious misdemeanor without first coming before a body of (often 23) people who are chosen to sit permanently for at least a month—and sometimes a year—and who, in ex parte proceedings, decide whether an indictment should be issued. This body is known as a grand jury. If the grand jury decides that the evidence is strong enough to hold the suspect for trial, it returns a true bill (q.v.), i.e., a bill of indictment, charging the suspect with a specific crime.

The grand jury was abolished in England—with insignificant exceptions in London and Middlesex—in 1933. Even these exceptions were wiped away by the Criminal Justice Act 1948.

Historical variants of the phrase grand jury include presenting jury, accusing jury, and jury of indictment.

B. And petit jury. Whereas a grand jury determines whether sufficient evidence exists to accuse a person of a crime and to bring a criminal prosecution, a petit jury ultimately determines the guilt or innocence of the accused and may convict only when the government has proved guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. See petit jury.

grand larceny. See larceny (B).

grant = (1) the formal transfer of real property; (2) the document by which such a transfer is effected; or (3) the property transferred. Sense (1) contains a historical AMBIGUITY. Originally, the verb grant was used only when the grantor conveyed a nonfreehold interest—that is, carved out a smaller interest—such as an easement or a lease. But today the verb is commonly used when the grantor's full interest, such as a fee simple absolute, is being conveyed.

grant, bargain, sell, and convey. The word grant or convey alone suffices: the rest is deadwood. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

gratify has been used in legal writing synonymously with satisfy in reference to rules or requirements. Neither the OED nor W3 records this use. E.g., "This averment does not gratify the rule requiring certainty in pleading."/ "Not only the language of the statute but also the fundamental purposes can be gratified only by a definite decree of the court that adjudicates the illegality of the practice in the past and enjoins the defendant from repetition thereof in the future."

gratis dictum. See dictum (B).

gratuitous; fortuitous. These two words are occasionally confounded. Gratuitous = (1) done or performed without obligation to do so; given without consideration <gratuitous promises>; or (2) done unnecessarily <gratuitous criticisms>. Fortuitous = occurring by chance <fortuitous circumstances>. See fortuitous.

gravamen /gra-vay-mən/ = the point of a complaint or grievance. E.g., "Under the fourth and fifth complaints, the gravamen of the charge was that he had failed to preserve for a period of twelve months from the date of delivery the invoices relating to those and certain other goods." (Eng.)/ "The gravamen of plaintiffs' claim is that Apopka has intentionally maintained a racially and geographically segregated system of municipal services."/ "The gravamen of the complaint in this case, to quote exactly, is as follows."/ "Here, of course, there is no final order—indeed, the lack of a final order is the very gravamen of the petitioner's complaint."

Gravamen is used also of criminal accusations <gravamen of the charge>, but not, properly, of crimes: "The gravamen of the crime [read The gist of the crime] is that the accused has used a fictitious credit card." See gist.

Today, nine out of ten times when this word appears, it is in the phrase gravamen of the complaint; inasmuch as gravamen in itself means "the material part of a complaint," the phrase seems redundant. The OED quotes no sentences containing the gravamen of the complaint, although it quotes several containing the gravamen of the charge. Perhaps it is felt in modern prose that the phrase of the complaint elucidates the meaning of gravamen; if so, the word is recondite on its own and infelicitously redundant in the common phrase.

Gravamen is frequently misused for crux or gist, both of which are broader—e.g.: "The gravamen [read crux] of appellant's argument is that he is entitled to have this 'dead time' credited against his federal sentence."/ "The gravamen [read gist] of the relief sought is the reformation or cancellation of records."/ "The gravamen [read gist] of the medical opinion in support of petitioners' position is that Rumbaugh is not able to countenance the delay inherent in the continuation of legal proceedings and the possible conversion of his death sentence to life imprisonment."

Gravaman is a common misspelling—e.g.: "The gravaman [read gravamen] of the tort action of alienation of affections was a spouse's loss of the love, society, companionship, and comfort of the other spouse." Koestler v. Pollard, 471 N.W.2d 7, 12 (Wis. 1991) (Abrahamson, J., dissenting).

The plural forms are gravamens and gravamina, the former being preferred.

gray; grey. The former spelling is more common in AmE, the latter in BrE; both are old, and neither is incorrect.

graymail originated in the late 1970s as a C.I.A. EUPHEMISM for blackmail. It refers to the "practice whereby a criminal defendant threatens to reveal classified information during the course of his trial in the hope of forcing the government to drop the criminal charge against him." U.S. v.

Smith, 780 F.2d 1102, 1105 (4th Cir. 1985). The Classified Information Procedure Act (1980), often shortened to the acronym CIPA, is informally called the Graymail Act.

Great Britain consists of England, Scotland, and Wales. It differs from United Kingdom, which includes Northern Ireland.

Great Charter, the. This phrase is a slightly affected synonym of Magna Carta—e.g.: "The ground plan to which the common-law polity has built ever since was given by the Great Charter." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 18 (1957).

Great Dissenter; First Dissenter. The Great Dissenter—no other judge has even approached his greatness as an author of dissenting opinions—was Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. The nickname has become standard in American legal parlance—e.g.: "Even Justice Holmes, the Great Dissenter himself, remarked in his first dissent that dissents are generally 'useless' and 'undesirable.'" William J. Brennan, Jr., In Defense of Dissents, 37 Hastings L.J. 427, 429 (1986)./ "Antiformalism in modern habeas interpretation was first heralded by Justice Holmes in his frequently cited dissent in Frank v. Mangum . . . . There, the Great Dissenter observed . . . ." Chatman-Bey v. Thornburgh, 864 F.2d 804, 807 (D.C. Cir. 1988). In this phrase, the more important word is great, not dissenter, for Holmes "in fact dissented less often than most of his colleagues." Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Remarks on Writing Separately, 65 Wash. L. Rev. 133, 142 (1990).

Interestingly, though, Holmes was not the first to bear this nickname: the phrase was applied originally to the first Justice Harlan. See T.J. Knight, The Dissenting Opinions of Justice Harlan, 51 Am. L. Rev. 481, 484 (1917). A 1970 Harlan biography by Frank Latham bore the title The Great Dissenter.

The so-called First Dissenter was Justice William Johnson, who was urged by the president who appointed him, Thomas Jefferson, to write a separate opinion in each case so as to check Chief Justice John Marshall's dominance on the Court. Johnson did so only sporadically, but he disagreed with the majority enough to earn this moniker.

great seal, to take the. This phrase, in BrE, means "to attain the office of Lord Chancellor." E.g., "The law itself had been changed to permit a Catholic (Lord Rawlinson) to take the great seal, but after the fanfare came the silence." Maths Genius Does His Homework on the Law's Reform, Sunday Times, 11 Dec. 1988, at A13. The phrase originated in the Lord Chancellor's acting as Keeper of the Great Seal. The Lord Chancellor, who is appointed by being handed the Great Seal, carries it in a bag as the badge of office.

Great Writ has long been used as an exalted synonym for habeas corpus—e.g.: "There has been a halo about the 'Great Writ' that no one would wish to dim." Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 275 (1973) (Powell, J., concurring)./ "The 'Great Writ,' as it has been called by the Supreme Court from John Marshall's day to this, is available by statute in four different situations." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 331 (4th ed. 1983).

greenmail, a PORTMANTEAU WORD made from greenbacks plus blackmail, was coined in the early 1980s. It carries two senses: (1) the act of buying enough stock in a company to threaten a hostile takeover, and of then agreeing to sell the stock back to the corporation at an inflated price; or (2) the money paid for stock in the corporation's buy-back. E.g., "There is no dispute that in the instant case, the common law claims and the federal Securities Exchange Act claims arise from the same transaction, i.e., the alleged misrepresentation by the Basses of their motives for acquiring the Texaco stock and the ensuing alleged 'greenmail' between the Bass defendants and Texaco." Seagoing Uniform Corp. v. Texaco, Inc., 705 F. Supp. 918, 921 (S.D.N.Y. 1989)./ "They are particularly infuriated at a suggestion to offer Goldsmith 'greenmail,' a controversial American takeover practice whereby a company under siege buys off a predator by giving it a large profit on its shares." Ivan Fallon & Tony Lorenz, Revealed: Secret Plot to Thwart Goldsmith BAT Bid, Sunday Times, 26 Nov. 1989, at A1.

The word has also been used as a verb, to greenmail, on the analogy of to blackmail.

grievable, adj., = of, constituting, or giving rise to a valid grievance. This word is almost certainly an unconscious revival of an old word that the OED records as having died off about 1500 (when it meant merely "causing distress"). It suddenly emerged in the mid-20th century—e.g.: "While not all 'grievable' disputes are arbitrable under the contract, this one is . . . ." Engineers Ass'n v. Sperry Gyroscope Co., 148 F. Supp. 521, 526 (S.D.N.Y. 1957)./ "The collective-bargaining agreement involved here prohibited without qualification all manner of invidious discrimination and made any claimed violation a grievable issue." Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Org., 420 U.S. 50, 66 (1975)./ "The Village refused to consider the grievance, declaring it non-grievable and stating that Fletcher's only appeal was pursuant to the Fire and Police Commission Act." Village of Creve Coeur v. Fletcher, 543 N.E.2d 323, 323 (Ill. App. Ct. 1989).

grievance; aggrievance. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

grievant; grievancer; aggrievant. The first term is commonly used in AmE in the context of arbitration. W3 defines grievant as "one who submits a grievance for arbitration." E.g., "[An arbitrator's] job is to define the relief that will compensate the grievant if his claim is upheld." Hotel & Restaurant Employees & Bartenders Int'l Union v. Michelson's Food Servs., Inc., 545 F.2d 1248, 1254 (9th Cir. 1976).

In practice, grievant often refers more narrowly to an employee who registers a complaint with an employer. See Katharine Seide, A Dictionary of Arbitration 106 (1970). E.g., "Thomas Rogers and Robert Wilson, Jr. (grievants), were employed by General Services Administration . . . ." Cornelius v. Nutt, 472 U.S. 648, 653 (1985).

The OED lists grievancer (= one who occasions a grievance or gives ground for complaint) but not grievant, a NEOLOGISM dating back only to 1956: "[T]he grievant [was entitled] to have such question submitted to final and binding arbitration . . . ." Wisconsin Motor Corp. v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Bd., 79 N.W.2d 119, 122 (Wis. 1956). Thus far, grievant has not yet spread beyond American legal writing. It is indisputably a useful term even if one might originally have objected to its formation.

grieve is most often an intransitive verb meaning "to feel grief." It could also, traditionally, be a transitive verb meaning "to cause distress to"—e.g.: "The murders that Gary Tison and Randy Greenawalt committed revolt and grieve all who learn of them." Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137, 159 (1987) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

But recently the verb has taken on a new meaning: "to bring a grievance for the purpose of protesting." The emergence of this sense is not entirely surprising because it is implied by the words grievable and grievant. Stylists are not likely to use the verb, but neither are they likely to succeed in expunging it. E.g., "Again, the Union was grieving G.E.'s subcontracting . . . ." General Elec. Co. v. N.L.R.B., 916 F.2d 1163, 1165 (7th Cir. 1990)./ "[E]mployees could grieve any discharge, suspension, or general dispute." Johnson v. Beatrice Foods Co., 921 F.2d 1015, 1016 (10th Cir. 1990)./ "After the 1987 ratification, the Union grieved AP's right to add the new inspection without modifying the standard hours figure." AP Parts Co. v. Int'l Union, United Auto Aerospace & Agric. Implement Workers, 923 F.2d 488, 490 (6th Cir. 1991).

grievous is frequently misspelled grievious, just as mischievous is frequently misspelled mischievious. These are grievous and mischievous malformations.

grievous bodily harm, a term commonly used in criminal law and in tort law, is a purposely vague term meaning physical harm that is truly serious; it is purposely vague because, ordinarily, the finder of fact must decide in any given case whether the injury meets this general standard. The term "has no specifically legal meaning." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 127–28 (1978). See g.b.h.

Grotian is the adjective corresponding to the name Grotius (1587–1645), the famous 17th-century Dutch jurist. E.g., "[T]he doctrines of the Grotian school had prevailed." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 83 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910).

ground(s). Although one does not count as one ground or two grounds every argument one can muster, it is acceptable to speak of a party's relying on a certain ground (= reason). Yet even the writer who has only one reason for a position can take that position on grounds of whatever that reason is.

In the speech and writing of American lawyers, the singular ground is loosely equivalent to sense (1) of ratio decidendi (q.v.)—that is, meaning the court's basis for a decision.

guarantee. A. And warranty. Originally the same word, warranty and guarantee (or -ty) arrived in the language through different medieval French dialects. Both terms denote undertakings by one party to another to indemnify an assured party against some possible default or defect. But there are important differences.

Guarantee relates to the future, in meaning either (1) the act of giving a security; the undertaking with respect to (a contract, performance of a legal act, etc.) that it will be duly carried out, or (2) something given or existing as security, e.g., to fulfill a future engagement or a condition subsequent.

Warranty relates to the present or past and has somewhat more specific and elaborate senses: (1) a covenant (either express or implied) annexed to a conveyance of realty by which the seller warrants the security of the title conveyed; (2) an assurance, express or implied, given by the seller of goods, that he will be answerable for their possession of some quality attributed to them <the seller hereby disclaims all warranties>; or (3) in an insurance contract, an insured's engagement that certain statements are true or that certain conditions will be fulfilled. See warranty.

B. And guaranty. The distinction in BrE once was that the former is the verb, the latter the noun. Yet guarantee is now commonly used as both n. & v.t. in both AmE and BrE. Following are examples of the nominal use: "Negro citizens, North and South, who saw in the Thirteenth Amendment a promise of freedom would be left with a mere paper guarantee if Congress were powerless to ensure that a dollar in the hands of a Negro will purchase the same thing as a dollar in the hands of a white man."/ "Without the exclusionary rule the constitutional guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures would be a mere 'form of words.'"

In practice, guarantee, n., is the usual term, seen often, for example, in the context of consumer warranties or other assurances of quality or performance. Guaranty, in contrast, is now used primarily in financial and banking contexts in the sense "a promise to answer for the debt of another." Guaranty is now rarely seen in nonlegal writing, whether in G.B. or in the U.S. Some legal writers prefer guaranty in all nominal senses.

Guaranty was formerly used as a verb but is now obsolete as a variant of guarantee, v.t. In the following sentence, it appears in its more modern legal use as a noun: "Footnote 10 indicates that Congress is without power to undercut the equal-protection guaranty of racial equality in the guise of implementing the Fourteenth Amendment."

C. And guarantor. Both guarantee (fr. 1679) and guarantor (fr. 1853) have filled the role of agent noun for the verb to guarantee. These words have shared the sense "one who makes a guaranty or gives a security," but today guarantor has taken the field, rendering guarantee in this sense but a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Oddly, guarantee has been used not only as an equivalent of guarantor, but also as a passive correlative of it consistently with other forms in -EE. Thus the OED quotes the following specimen of guarantee (= a person to whom a guarantee is given): "Guarantors are relieved by the guarantee being compelled, if one is ready to pay the whole, to sell him the debt of the others." This use of guarantee may be useful in tandem with -or, but the actual occurrences of it in legal prose are rare.

guardian ad litem; special guardian. These synonymous phrases denote a court-appointed guardian who acts in litigation on behalf of someone under a disability, such as a minor or a mentally defective person. E.g., "Since then the Appellate Division has ruled that no special guardians, or guardians ad litem, as they've been renamed, are needed in VA estates of less than $2,500." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 309 (1970). See ad litem*, next friend & prochein ami.

guerrilla [Sp. "raiding party"] = a member of a small band of military fighters who, mostly through surprise raids, try to harass and undermine occupying forces. The word is preferably so spelled—not guerilla.

And misusing gorilla for this word is a laughable MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "Alien . . . did not show that her alleged persecutors had attributed political opinions to her as result of any deliberate action on her part, such as refusal to join gorilla [read guerrilla] forces . . . ." Estrada-Posada v. INS, 924 F.2d 916, 916 syl. 5 (9th Cir. 1991).

guilt; culpability. The latter is a matter of fact regardless of whether it ever becomes known; the former what is determined by a trier of fact. Judge Learned Hand is said to have remarked that anyone can be a killer, but only a jury can make a murderer. See guilty.

guilt-prone (opposed to acquittal-prone) is coming to be used of juries in the sense "likely to convict." E.g., "Appellant contends that the process of excluding from the guilt phase of the trial prospective jurors who are unwilling to consider imposing capital punishment resulted in a jury that was impermissibly guilt-prone and unrepresentative of the community."

A variant is conviction-prone: "The argument assumes that if the prosecution strikes minority-group members on the basis of their group affiliation, then majority-group members inevitably must be likely to be as conviction-prone as the minority-group members are acquittal-prone." Cf. death-qualified jurors.

guilty. Lawyers and nonlawyers alike generally associate this word with criminal contexts. But some lawyers, esp. in BrE, use it in civil contexts as well—e.g.: "The better opinion is that cotenants in fee are not guilty of waste in using and enjoying the property in any way [that] is in accord with the reasonable exercise of prudent ownership by the average man." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 146 (1930)./ "A person is guilty of misrepresentation, though all the facts stated by him are true, if his statement is misleading as a whole because it does not refer to other facts affecting the weight of those stated." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 353 (8th ed. 1991).

Sometimes the idea of guilt can be eliminated through deft editing—e.g.: "The plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence [better: contributorily negligent]." See blameworthy.

habeas is often used in AmE as an abbreviated form of habeas corpus, as in the common phrase habeas relief. E.g., "This pro se appeal concerns Timothy Rudolph's second federal habeas petition."/ "In 1982, we affirmed the dismissal of a prior petition for federal habeas relief." See habeas corpus.

habeas corpus (lit., "that you may have the body") is the quintessential justified LATINISM that has taken on a peculiar meaning that no homegrown English term could now supply. Though it has become one of the basic devices to protect civil liberties, it was originally used in capias writs not to release people from prison but to secure their presence in custody. In the 16th century, the King's Bench began issuing the writ called habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, primarily so that subjects could challenge the constitutionality of imprisonment. In 1679, the writ was legislatively enshrined in the Habeas Corpus Act. Nearly a century later, in the famous Somersett's Case (1772), Lord Mansfield held that slavery had no standing in England, so that the writ was sufficient to release a black slave from a ship on the Thames. Today it is considered "perhaps the most important writ known to the constitutional law of England . . . ." Secretary of State for Home Affairs v. O'Brien, [1923] A.C. 603, 609. See prerogative writs.

When used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, the term is best hyphenated: "The Senate is scheduled to consider crime legislation, including habeas-corpus proposals, possibly as soon as next week." Wall St. J., 16 May 1990, at B6.

The plural (rarely used) is habeas corpora. See corpus.

habendum (L. "to be possessed") denotes the part of a deed that defines the estate or interest being transferred. The clause beginning "to have and to hold" is the habendum and tenendum combined, though it is traditionally called the habendum—e.g.: "The habendum clause is as follows: 'To have and to hold, all and singular, the premises above mentioned, unto the said C.M. Dubois, bishop of Galveston.'" Gabert v. Olcott, 23 S.W. 985, 986 (Tex. 1893).

The best plural form is not habenda, but habendums—e.g.: "There were other words in both deeds between the granting clauses and the habendums signifying the intention of the grantor . . . ." U.S. v. 31,600 Acres of Land, 47 F. Supp. 21, 24 (E.D.S.C. 1942).

habitability; inhabitability. Because of confusion over the prefix in-, which is intensive and not negative in inhabitability (as in inflammable), today the positive form is habitability, the negative form uninhabitability. Inhabitable is little used today, and it is unfortunately ambiguous now when it is used.

habitation is an abstract word best replaced by house or dwelling.

had and received. This DOUBLET has historically been a TERM OF ART in the phrase money had and received; in pleading in assumpsit, the plaintiff declares that the defendant had and received certain money. In most Anglo-American jurisdictions the phrase is no longer required in pleadings. See money had and received, action for.

had ought is a substandard usage in place of ought—e.g.: "[I]f his services are as valuable as he contended at the trial, he had ought [read ought] to be able to find substantial employment here or elsewhere . . . ." Roberts v. I-T-E Circuit Breaker Co., 316 F. Supp. 133, 134 (D. Minn. 1970).

haeres, the medieval Latin spelling of the Latin word heres (= heir), still sometimes appears: "[H]is interest passes to the state as ultima haeres." Spiegel's Estate v. C.I.R., 335 U.S. 701, 723 n 9 (1949) (Burton, J., dissenting). Justice Burton erred slightly in his Latin, as the correct form is ultimus, not ultima, before haeres.

hale. A. Hale into court; haul into court. These phrases are equally common. In hale into court, the verb hale means "to compel to go; pull"—e.g.: "Taney ordered that the general himself be haled into court . . . ." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 98 (1960)./ "Hans was not expressing some narrow objection to the particular federal power by which Louisiana had been haled into court, but was rather enunciating a fundamental principle of federalism . . . ." Pennsylvania v Union Gas Co., 491 U.S. 1, 37 (1989) (Scalia, J., concurring in part & dissenting in part).

Haul into court has the advantage of being at once more picturesque, because the verb haul conjures up a distinct image, and immune from the error discussed in (B)—e.g.: "There is even authority that anyone who takes steps deliberately to thwart the enforcement of a judicial decree can be hauled into court and dealt with summarily . . . ." U.S. v. Board of Educ., 11 F.3d 668, 673 (7th Cir. 1993)./ "Airlines have begun changing their policies even before being hauled into court." Reena N. Glazer, Note, Women's Body Image and the Law, 43 Duke L.J. 113, 144 (1993).

B. The Solecism hail into court. Properly, the verb hail—apart from meteorological senses—means (1) "to greet or salute" <they hailed her warmly>; (2) "to praise enthusiastically" <hailed as a great innovator>; or (3) "to call out to" <hail a cab>. Sense (2) is most common in legal writing—e.g.: "[M]ost of the feminist scholars who have treated the battered woman syndrome defense have explicitly endorsed the defense, hailing the court's acceptance of the theory as an important first step . . . ." Anne M. Coughlin, Excusing Women, 82 Cal. L. Rev. 1, 27 (1994).

The blunder hail into court is surprisingly common—e.g.:

- "When corporations are hailed [read haled] into court, they are well aware that many corporate secrets may be revealed as a result of discovery." Jacqueline S. Guenego, Trends in Protective Orders Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(c), 60 Fordham L. Rev. 541, 543 (1991).
- "The defendant took no actions purposefully directed at Illinois residents such that he would have fair warning that he would be hailed [read haled] into court in Illinois." Excel Energy Co. v. Pittman, 606 N.E.2d 637, 640 (Ill. App. Ct. 1992).
- "It is the defendant who, involuntarily hailed [read haled] into court, needs the protection of Rule 19." Susan S. Grover, The Silenced Majority: Martin v. Wilks and the Legislative Response, 1992 U. Ill. L. Rev. 43, 103 n.174 (1992).
- "When the commission was hailed [read haled] into court for failing to act, it claimed its process had not yet been appropriately exhausted by the plaintiffs." Klein v. Sullivan, 978 F.2d 520, 523 (9th Cir. 1992).

half (of). The preposition of is usu. unnecessary—e.g.: "[T]he insured may claim for a constructive total where the cost of repair, reconditioning, refloating, or the like would exceed half the value." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 84 (2d ed. 1975)./ "Half the intentional killings of adult males are in a rage or a quarrel . . . ." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 477 (1978).

hallucination; delusion. A hallucination results from disturbed perceptions, as when a person "hears voices" or "sees ghosts." A delusion is a belief that results from disturbed thinking, as when a person incorrectly imagines that he or she is being persecuted. For the difference between delusion and illusion, see illusion. See also allusion.

halting (= limping) sometimes causes a MISCUE—e.g.: "Progress is slow and halting." The writer of that sentence probably meant "limping along," but the sentence gives the impression of "coming to a halt."

halve (= to separate into two equal portions) is pronounced like have.

hand down a decision; hand out a decision. The former is the American, the latter said to be the traditional British legal idiom, as H.L. Mencken observed in The American Language 246 (4th ed. 1960). Following is an example of the American phrase: "It is not extravagant to argue that Ex parte Young is one of the three most important decisions the Supreme Court of the United States has ever handed down." The BrE idiom hand out is seldom if ever used today.

The traditional idiom has been stretched by journalists, who occasionally use it to refer not to what a judge does, but to what a jury does: "The verdict is noteworthy, lawyers say, because it is believed to be one of the largest sums ever handed down in an invasion of privacy case." Paul M. Barrett, Wall St. J., 16 Feb. 1990, at B6. Cf. hand up.

handful. Pl. handfuls. On the question whether handful, as a subject, takes a singular or a plural verb, see SYNESIS.

hand up. This idiom traditionally referred to a grand jury's passing a matter on to a criminal court—e.g.: "At the time the grand jury reported, five indictments were handed up, three of which were sealed and two open." People v. Bailey, 149 N.Y.S. 823, 824 (App. Div. 1914)./ "Had these indictments been handed up on the 21st, when the district attorney offered to have them prepared, the case . . . would be free from any doubt." U.S. v. Garsson, 291 F. 646, 648 (S.D.N.Y. 1923) (per L. Hand, J.).

Sometimes writers choose the wrong idiom, namely hand down—e.g.: "The indictment, handed down [read handed up] after a 2½-year investigation, cites 11 instances of racketeering . . . ." Ann Bancroft, Coastal Official Indicted, San Francisco Chronicle, 8 May 1992, at A1. See hand down a decision.

hang, v.i., = (of a jury) to be unable to reach a verdict. This Americanism dates from the mid-19th century and is still common—e.g.: "Prosecutor Murphy's own rhetoric in the second Hiss trial (after the first jury hung) was even more powerful." Daniel Levitt, Rhetoric in Closing Argument, 17 Litigation 17, 18 (Winter 1991)

Less commonly, hang is used as a transitive verb in the sense "to cause (a jury) to be unable to reach a verdict," as here: "One way to hang a jury is to have at least one person on it who is likely to raise the hackles of at least one of the others." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 116 (1990).

hanged; hung. Coats and pictures are hung, and sometimes even juries. But criminals found guilty of capital offenses are hanged—at least in some jurisdictions. See hung jury.

hanging judge (= a judge who is esp. harsh with defendants accused of capital crimes, and sometimes corruptly so) dates at least from the mid-19th century. Some modern references, though, suggest that the phrase might be older—e.g.: "Too often their attitude appears to be that of the 'hanging judges' of the seventeenth century." Ex parte Mouratis, 21 F.2d 694, 695 (N.D. Cal. 1927). See maximum [+ name].

Hansard = the official reports of the proceedings of the British Parliament. They take their name from Luke Hansard, printer of the Journal of the House of Commons from 1774 to 1828, and his son, Thomas Curson Hansard, printer of the Parliamentary Debates during the early 19th century.

happily means "fortunately," not "in a happy manner," when used as in the following examples: "The seventeenth- and eighteenth-century jurists were chiefly teachers and philosophers. Happily they had been trained to accept the Roman law as something of paramount authority." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 16 (1922; repr. 1975)./ "Happily, the Criminal Law Act sweeps aside these anomalies . . ." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 349 (1978). See SENTENCE ADVERBS. Cf. hopefully.

harass may be pronounced in either of two ways: /har-iss/ or /hə-ras/. The former is often thought to be preferable, but the latter prevails in AmE. The verb is often misspelled harrass. See, e.g., Suss v. Schammel, 375 N.W.2d 252, 256 (Iowa 1985).

harassment. During the Senate's confirmation hearings on the appointment of Justice Clarence Thomas in October 1991, senators divided over whether to say /har-is-mənt/ or /hə-ras-mənt/ (and over other issues as well). Because the proceedings were closely watched throughout the U.S , the correct pronunciation became a popular subject of discussion. Although in BrE /har-is-mənt/ predominates—and many Americans (therefore?) consider it preferable—in AmE /hə-ras-mənt/ is standard.

hard and fast rule. This CLICHE is common, and sometimes useful, in legal prose. E.g., "There is no hard and fast rule by which it can be determined when the court will interfere by injunction to prevent what is practically a fraud upon a person engaged in business by the unfair methods of competition."/ "We have expressly rejected the suggestion that we adopt a hard and fast time limit for a permissible Terry stop." Cf. the cousin of this phrase, bright-line rule.

hard cases make bad law. This catchphrase refers to the danger that a decision operating harshly on the defendant may lead a court to make an unwarranted exception or otherwise alter the law. Glanville Williams wrote wishfully when pronouncing this byword passé: "It used to be said that hard cases make bad law—a proposition that our less pedantic age regards as doubtful What is certain is that cases in which the moral indignation of the judge is aroused frequently make bad law." The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 105 (1957). In fact, this CLICHÉ is probably used as frequently today as it ever was—and sometimes unmeaningfully.

hard law. See soft law.

hardly. The word may mean "vigorously, harshly" <he was beaten hardly>, but this sense is confusing because the word's primary meaning today is "only just, barely"—e.g.: "The judge said hardly anything." The difference in placement between he was beaten hardly and he was hardly beaten is not enough to eliminate doubts about what the writer intends. Still, hardly in its primary sense is hardly ever ambiguous.

hard sell; hard sale. Hard sell = pressure tactics used in selling. E.g., "While at the funeral home, she was given the hard sell: the director implied that the cost of the casket should be proportional to the degree of love she felt for her deceased husband."

Hard sale = a difficult selling job, usu. on an unlikely buyer. Sometimes hard sell is used where sale belongs—e.g.: "The movie is going to be a hard sell [read hard sale] for most of today's audiences." Vincent Canby, "Stanley and Iris": A World Not Seen, N.Y. Times, 9 Feb. 1990, at B4.

harebrained is the correct form; hairbrained is the common blunder. The misspelling falls just short of being what it attempts to denote. A prosecutor is quoted in People v. Jolly, 214 N.W.2d 849, 851 (Mich. App. 1974), as having stated to the jury: "This was no hair-brained young kid." The court reporter should have written harebrained.

harelip. So spelled. This congenital condition got its name from the resemblance it bears to the cleft lip of a hare. Yet hairlip is a common error—e.g.: "If a suspect is described to the police as having one eye, a hairlip [read harelip], and a four-inch scar on his cheek, a line-up or a confrontation serves no purpose beyond cumulation." McRae v. U.S., 420 F.2d 1283, 1292 (D.C. Cir. 1969)./ "[S]ome reasonable persons might conclude that a slight genetic hairlip [read harelip] should qualify before the diabetes defect because they prefer a shorter life with a pretty face to a longer life without one." Edward J. Larson, Human Gene Therapy and the Law, 39 Emory L.J. 855, 861 (1990).

hark back is now preferred over harken back or hearken back. E.g., "We are not harking back to Latin bywords without sanction of our highest Court . . . ." In re City of Houston, 745 F.2d 925, 928 (5th Cir. 1984).

harmless (= not capable of being harmed)—as in the phrase indemnify and hold harmless—differs significantly from the lay sense ("not capable of harming"). E.g., "Lone Star forever releases, quitclaims, discharges, and holds harmless Harris Hospital from any and all claims and causes of action."

The phrase is sometimes written save harmless—e.g.: "Amoco would not be fully indemnified and saved harmless from any loss." Patch v. Amoco Oil Co., 845 F.2d 571, 572 (5th Cir. 1988).

havoc, v.i., forms havocking and havocked.

havoc, to wreak. Although the phrases create havoc, make havoc, play havoc, and work havoc were once common, the usu. phrase today is wreak havoc. The past tense is wreaked havoc, not wrought havoc (as many writers mistakenly think)—e.g.: "[T]here are abundant examples of linguistic havoc wrought [read wreaked] by lawyers and legal scholars as well." Robert C. Cumbow, The Subverting of the Goeduck: Sex and Gender, Which and That, and Other Adventures in the Language of the Law, 14 Univ. Puget Sound L. Rev. 755, 777 (1991).

H.D.C.; H.I.D.C. Both abbreviations denote a "holder in due course," the former being more common. Because they are initialisms and not acronyms, they should take periods (as opposed to being written HDC and HDJC), though this battle for reason may already be lost. See ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS.

Whether one uses H.D.C. or H.I.D.C., the indefinite article preceding the initialism should be an, not a: "In order to be a HIDC [read an H.D.C.], one must first be a "holder" which means that the party must be in possession of the documents of title or an instrument." In re Singer Prods. Co., 102 B.R. 912, 931 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1989).

head has special meanings in legal documents: (1) "a heading in legislation" <the 282-paragraph code was regularly arranged under heads and subheads>; (2) "in an abstract of title, the description of the land covered by the abstract (sometimes also called the caption)" <the head misdefined the realty>. These uses of head may be slowly disappearing, however; for sense (1), heading is now becoming the more usu. word, and for sense (2), either caption or property description is more common.

headlease. In BrE legal writing, this term denotes a primary lease under which subleases are in effect—e.g.: "The former sublease has been destroyed by the forfeiture of the headlease, and the court order does not and cannot revive that sublease." Peter Butt, Land Law 293 (2d ed. 1988). Thus, headlessor is the BrE correlative of sublessor, and headlessee of sublessee. In AmE, the words lease, lessor, and lessee generally refer to the primary lease.

headnote, in AmE and BrE alike, refers to the reporter's summary of a judicial opinion; usu. placed at the beginning of the reported case, the headnote states each rule of law that the case supposedly involves. A synonym of headnote is syllabus, q.v.

healthful; healthy. Healthy is used of a person in good health, healthful of whatever promotes good health.

hearsay evidence; secondhand evidence. The former is the preferred, universally understood term for evidence of the oral statements of someone other than the witness testifying and statements in documents offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

Hearsay is sometimes made heresay, an appalling error committed infrequently by legal secretaries. Heaven forbid that lawyers should perpetrate it. To do so would be heresy. See direct evidence.

heart-rending is sometimes malapropistically rendered heart-rendering. E.g., "The true ground of action is the outrage and deprivation; the injury the father sustains in the loss of his child; the heart-rendering [read heart-rending] agony he must suffer in the destruction of his dearest hopes." The verb rend (= to split, tear) has nothing to do with the verb render. See MALAPROPISMS hear ye, hear ye, hear ye; oyez, oyez, oyez. Both forms of the cry are used today in American courts. The first is archaic English, the second vestigial LAW FRENCH with the same meaning. See oyez, oyez, oyez & countez.

hedonic damages measure the taking away of the pleasure of being alive; such damages are not allowed in most jurisdictions. The phrase was innovated in the 1980s: "An Illinois jury has awarded hedonic damages." Nat'l L.J., Nov. 26, 1984, at 3./ "The amount of so-called hedonic damages was decided following an economist's evaluation of what the youth's enjoyment of life would have been worth had he not been killed." Court and Government Decisions with Impact on Business, Employees, Consumers, U.S. News & World Rep., 17 Dec. 1984, at 80./ "Pushed by a handful of imaginative plaintiff lawyers and expert witnesses-for-hire, hedonic damages are sought in personal-injury cases as compensation for the loss of the pleasure of living." Paul M. Barrett, Accept Hedonic Damages, Study Urges, but Fight for Proper Use, Wall St. J., 21 Aug. 1989, at 3B. See damages.

hegemony /hi-jem-ə-nee/ is a fundamentally political term ("political dominance; the leadership or predominant authority of one state of a confederacy or union over the others") that has been imported into nonpolitical contexts. E.g., "The court's duty is to protect the public from the activities of those who, because of the lack of professional skills, may cause injury; this does not mean, however, that attorneys' hegemony over the practice of law must be absolute."/ "With the passing of the hegemony of historical jurisprudence at the close of the last century there came a revival of comparative law." (Roscoe Pound) height has a distinct -t- sound at the end; to pronounce this word as if it were heighth is semiliterate.

heinous /hay-nəs/—rhyming with "pain us"—is one of the most commonly mispronounced words in legal contexts. It is also frequently misspelled heinuous.

heir. A. Heir (at law); (in)heritor. These terms denote "the person entitled by statute to the land of an intestate." Heir, the most common term, is commonly misunderstood: "Laymen—and sometimes first-year law students taking exams—wrongly assume that one who receives real property by will is an heir. Technically, the word 'heir' is reserved for one who receives real property by action of the laws of intestacy, which operate today only in the absence of a valid will." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 14 n.32 (2d ed. 1984).

Strictly speaking, heirs cannot be determined until the ancestor dies, though we commonly speak of heirs apparent and heirs presumptive (see B). Heir ordinarily differs from the term children, for brothers and sisters can be heirs.

Legal heir (= the heir of an intestate by operation of law) is another way of rendering heir at law: "There is nothing in the will or in the record that sustains a conclusion that she made the bequest because she wanted to make certain her legal heirs would not share in the estate." Still another variant synonymous with heir at law is heir general. Usually, though, heir alone is sufficient.

Inheritor, often used in extended senses <inheritors of the Western tradition>, predominates over heritor.

B. Types of Heirs: expectant heir; prospective heir; heir apparent; heir presumptive. A living person has no heirs, but various terms have been devised to describe potential heirs. An expectant heir is one who has a reversionary or remainder interest in property, or a chance of succeeding to it. E.g., "Even the expectant heir, who has no interest at all, may make a valid and specifically enforceable contract to convey for an adequate consideration."

A prospective heir is one who may inherit but may be excluded; this term embraces the two other types of heirs, presumptive and apparent. An heir presumptive is a person who will inherit if the potential intestate dies immediately, but who may be excluded if another more closely related heir is born. An heir apparent is certain to inherit unless he or she dies first or is excluded by a valid will.

On the placement of the adjectives in these phrases, see POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES. Sometimes the adjectives are used prepositively: "With the exception of the trustee, all the parties as thus represented—including contingent remaindermen and the presumptive heirs—joined in a petition to the court to consider and approve the proposed compromise of the litigation."

C. Heir; distributee; next of kin. Technically, heir should refer only to the person entitled to the land of an intestate; either distributee or next of kin should be used of one entitled to an intestate's personal property. But the technically correct forms are rarely followed even in the ordinary speech of lawyers: "[T]oday the word 'heirs' usually means those persons designated by the applicable statute to take a decedent's intestate property, real and personal." Jesse Dukeminier & Stanley M. Johanson, Family Wealth Transactions 11–12 (1972). See devisee.

heirs of the body. See bodily heirs.

helix yields either of the plurals helixes or helices. The unpretentious plural ending in -xes is better. Cf. appendixes & indexes. See PLURALS (A). help but. See cannot help but.

helpmate; helpmeet. Helpmeet, now archaic, was the original form, yet folk etymology changed the spelling to -mate, which is now the prevalent form. Though helpmate means "a companion or helper," it is generally restricted in use to one's spouse.

help (to). Where the to can be idiomatically omitted, it ought to be—e.g.: "All this may help to [read help] explain, though perhaps not to justify, [read not justify], the bias in the legal profession and the courts towards traditional goals and values." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 87 (1983).

he or she. The traditional view was that the masculine pronouns are generic, comprehending both male and female. But this view is now widely assailed as embodying SEXISM. One way to avoid the generic masculine he, his and him is to use—not at every turn, but sparingly—he or she, and his or her, and him or her. E.g., "If a juror could be challenged for cause merely because he or she was against the death penalty in the circumstances at issue, a prosecutor could describe the particular facts of the case and demand to know how each veniremember would vote at the penalty phase."

Another way to avoid the problem—not possible in all contexts—is to make the antecedent of the pronoun plural if possible. E.g., "If jurors could be challenged for cause merely because they were against the death penalty in the circumstances at issue, a prosecutor could describe the particular facts of the case and demand to know how each venireman would vote at the penalty phase." The disadvantage of such a wording is that it often too strongly suggests a singleness of mind in the group, as opposed to the uniqueness of an individual mind.

Interestingly, the forms he or she and his or her have long found acceptance in our typically verbose legal writing. Weseen wrote, "Outside of legal writing, it is not considered good form to use double pronouns, as he or she, his or her." Maurice H. Weseen, Crowell's Dictionary of English Grammar 198 (1928). The phrase is by no means a newfangled concession to feminism. In 1837, the English Wills Act stated: "And be it further enacted, That every Will made by a Man or Woman shall be revoked by his or her Marriage (except a Will made in exercise of Appointment . . .)." 7 Wm. IV & 1 Vict., c. 26 (1837). See SEXISM (A).

HERE- AND THERE- WORDS. These abound in legal writing (unfortunately they do not occur just here and there), usually thrown in gratuitously to give legal documents that musty legal smell. Following are typical examples:

- "Each capitalized term used herein which is defined in the loan and security agreement as hereby amended is used herein as defined therein unless otherwise defined herein or unless the context requires otherwise." (From a loan and security agreement.)
- "The exclusive right to enter upon the land, to drill wells thereon, to remove therefrom the oil to exhaustion, and to pay therefor a portion of the oil extracted or the equivalent of such portion, is a property right that the law protects." (From an oil-and-gas treatise.) See therefore.
- " . . . all as fully appears from the affidavit of the publisher thereof heretofore herein filed." (From a court paper quoted in Penn v. Pensacola-Escambia Gov't'al Ctr. Auth., 311 So. 2d 97, 102 (Fla. 1975))
- "[I]t is not necessary for us to take up each assignment seriatim and reply thereto, because from what we have heretofore said and what we will hereinafter say we have concluded this is a complete answer . . . ." Saunders v. State, 345 S.W.2d 899, 904–05 (Tenn. 1961).

These words are generally to be used only as a last resort to avoid awkward phrasing. They are certainly not to be used one after another in a passage that is already stylistically abhorrent.

hereabout(s). This term, meaning "in this vicinity," is preferably spelled with the final -s.

hereafter; hereinafter. Perhaps because hereinafter sounds especially legalistic, some plain-language advocates have misguidedly recommended hereafter in its place. The two words have distinct meanings, however; and in any event, hereafter could hardly be cheered as a plain-language triumph over hereinafter.

Hereafter = (1) henceforth; (2) at some future time. The existence of these two meanings may make the word ambiguous, for example in legislation that is said to be effective hereafter. A more precise rendering of the intended meaning is effective with the passage of this Act or after the day this Act takes effect. Sense (1) is the more usual meaning of hereafter. A similar ambiguity plagues heretofore. See hitherto.

Hereinafter = in a part of this document that follows. E.g., "The parties have stipulated that an exchange of telegrams hereinafter referred to constitutes the contract." Often, as in that sentence, the hereinafter-phrase ought to be omitted because it does not enhance clarity. Sometimes this compound word may even cloud the thought, as when drafters misuse it for hereinbefore and thus prompt courts to declare that it really does mean "hereinbefore" in such contexts.

As with herein, the legal writer is best advised to make the reference exact, by stating, e.g., later in this will or later in this paragraph rather than hereinafter. Moreover, in introducing abbreviated names, hereinafter is redundant: rather than Mobil Oil Corporation (hereinafter "Mobil"), one should write Mobil Oil Corporation ("Mobil"). See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS & hereinabove.

hereby is often a FLOTSAM PHRASE that can be excised with no loss of meaning: I hereby declare has no advantages over I declare. Sometimes the word is (correctly) omitted where you might expect to find it—e.g.: "The writs of scire facias and mandamus are abolished." Fed. R. Civ. P 81(b). The less-polished drafter would have written are hereby abolished. See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS
