hereditable /hə-red-i-tə-bəl/ = subject to inheritance. "'Children' is not a word of limitation; it does not point to hereditable succession." Apart from its use in the standard phrase hereditable succession, hereditable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of inheritable. See inheritable.

hereditament(s). This term, which is best accented on the second rather than the third syllable /hə-red-i-tə-mənt/, suggests a relation in meaning to inheritance. This is misleading, even though the term originally did mean "things capable of being inherited." Today it means merely "land, real property" and should be avoided as an obscure LEGALISM. It is often redundant—e.g.: "No tenant and no person claiming through any tenant of any land or hereditament of which he has been let into possession is, till he has given up possession, permitted to deny that the landlord had, at the time when the tenant was let into possession, a title to such land or hereditament." (Eng.)

Traditionally, the law distinguished between corporeal hereditaments (= tangible items of property, such as land or buildings) and incorporeal hereditaments (= intangible rights in land, such as easements). See corporeal hereditaments & lands.

In England, hereditament has the additional sense "a unit of land that has been separately assessed for rating purposes" (CDL).

hereditary. See inheritable.

heredity for inheritance or inheritability, though once possible, is today confusingly legalistic. Heredity has now been confined largely to biological senses in nonlegal writing; hence legal writing need not perpetuate an archaic sense of the word. "The decedent's many prolonged affairs make the problems of heredity [read inheritability] quite complex." The nonlegal reader would interpret the quoted sentence as addressing bastardy rather than inheritance.

herein (= in this) is a vague word in legal documents, for the reader can rarely be certain whether it means in this subsection, in this section (or paragraph), in this document, or in this transaction. A more precise phrase, such as any of the three just listed, is preferable. See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS & herewith.

hereinabove is almost always unnecessary for above. E.g., "I am of the opinion that defendant is liable by virtue of the express provisions of Act 34 of 1926, as I have related elsewhere hereinabove [read above]."/ "For lack of the essential findings hereinabove discussed [read discussed above], the judgment is reversed." See above (B), hereafter & hereinbefore. See also HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

hereinafter. See hereafter & hereinbefore.

hereinafter referred to as; hereinafter called. These stilted LEGALISMS are easily avoided. Ordinarily, a parenthetical short form ought to appear without a lead-in—e.g.: "Acme Fire & Casualty Company (hereinafter called "Acme") [read ("Acme")] moves that the court dismiss the action."

hereinbefore; hereinafter. In legislative DRAFTING, these words should be avoided, because amendments and repeals may effect a reordering of the statute, and make either of these words inaccurate or misleading. The better practice is to be specific and write in this act or in this section. See hereafter & hereinabove. See also HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

herein fail not (= please adhere closely to your instructions) is legalistic deadwood often found in writs directed to process-servers. E.g., "Herein fail not, and have you the said money, together with this writ, before this court within 60 days from the date of this writ." See herein.

heres is the L. equivalent of the singular word heir—not of the plural heirs. The plural of heres is heredes.

hereto (= to this) is sometimes misused for heretofore (= up to this time). E.g., "Hedonic damages have not hereto [read heretofore] been recoverable in this state." In any event, the word is best eliminated—e.g.: "This agreement shall be binding upon the parties hereto and their respective heirs, successors, and assigns." [Read This Agreement binds the parties as well as their heirs, successors, and assigns.] See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS & hereafter.

heretofore. See hitherto & up to now.

hereunder. This word can almost always be deleted unmisgivingly—e.g.: "If the Employee fails to use full vacation privileges hereunder [delete hereunder], the Employee is not entitled to additional compensation for the additional time worked." See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

herewith. See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS & enclosed herewith.

he/she. See SEXISM (A) & he or she.

hesitancy; hesitance; hesitation. Hesitancy is a quality ("the state of being hesitant; reluctance"), whereas hesitation is an act ("the act of hesitating"). Thus: "The courts had no hesitancy in holding the defamatory matter libelous."/ "We have no hesitation [read hesitancy, i.e., reluctance] in declaring that public policy requires that the interest of the beneficiary of a trust should be subject to the claims for support of his children." Hesitance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

hew = (1) to chop, cut; or (2) to adhere or conform (to). Thus sense (1): "The appellants contend that the wife took title to the estate of her husband in fee simple absolute, which is not hewed down to a lesser estate by words of weaker import." And sense (2), which is more common in modern legal prose: "In any event, we hew to the Supreme Court's broad language; if that is to be trimmed, it is for the court to do, not for us."

The preferred past participle is hewn in BrE and hewed in AmE. E.g., "The substantive distinction between admonitions and instructions is not always clear or closely hewn to [read, in AmE, hewed to]." (Eng.)

hiatus. Pl. hiatuses. See HYPERCORRECTION (A).

H.I.D.C. See H.D.C.

high court; High Court. In AmE, high court or high bench usu. refers to the U.S. Supreme Court—e.g.: "Four protesters, objecting to the Supreme Court's ruling last spring allowing states to further restrict abortions, disrupted the high court's session yesterday." Disorder in the Court, Wall St. J., 8 Nov. 1989, at B8.

In England and Northern Ireland, by contrast, the High Court is a trial and (for some purposes) appellate court having mainly civil jurisdiction and divided into three divisions: the Queen's Bench Division, the Chancery Division, and the Family Division. One judge sits at a trial. Two or three judges usu. sit in these divisional courts to review certain proceedings of a lower tribunal or to hear appeals from magistrates' decisions in summary criminal trials. Appeal lies in the Court of Appeal, Civil Division.

In Scotland, the High Court (of Justiciary) is the superior criminal court with trial and appellate jurisdiction.

higher court; upper court. Both phrases are used to denote an appellate court that reviews the judgment of a lower court, q.v. Higher court is more common in AmE and BrE; upper court appears occasionally in BrE. Cf. inferior (B).

highfalutin. So spelled—not highfaluting, highfalutin', or hifalutin.

high seas; open seas. Of these synonyms—meaning "the seas or oceans apart from territorial waters"—the former is now more common.

hijack. Vehicles and planes are hijacked, but not people. E.g., "Lipsig spent two years trying to get political asylum for Tshombe, who was mysteriously hijacked [read abducted?] to Algiers in the mid-sixties and detained in prison." See skyjack.

hindering impediment. See impedient impediment.

hired gun. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

hire purchase, n., is a late-19th-century BrE neologism equivalent to the AmE phrases lease-purchase contract (or agreement), rent-to-own contract (or agreement), or lease-to-own contract (or agreement). Hire purchase, which began as the longer phrase hire and purchase, is now usu. two words as a noun phrase and hyphenated as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE <the hire-purchase system>.

It is also sometimes used as a verb phrase (hyphenated): "[W]here a person examines goods and subsequently makes an offer to buy or hire-purchase them, it may be an implied term of the offer that the goods should remain in substantially the same state in which they were when the offer was made." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 43–44 (8th ed. 1991).

his or her. See he or she & SEXISM (A).

historical; historic. The former, meaning "of or relating to or occurring in history," is called upon for use far more frequently. The latter means "historically significant" <the Alamo is a historic building>. An event that makes history is historic; an event of no great importance that occurred in history is historical. Momentous happenings or developments are historic; merely documented happenings or developments are historical.

In the following sentences, historic is correctly used: "Chief Justice Cardozo's historic and oft-quoted dissent in Graf v. Hope Bldg. Corp. has become equity's modern fount in cases in which the tyrant demands his dollars and cents on legal time whatever the impact of sickening hardship his victim suffers."/ "In Brown II the Court referred to its historic opinion in Brown I as declaring the fundamental principle that racial discrimination in public education is unconstitutional."

Examples of historic used incorrectly for historical could easily run for several pages, so common is this error—e.g.: "The historic [read historical] option of a maritime suitor pursuing a common-law remedy to select his forum, state or federal, would be taken away by an expanded view of section 1331." Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 371 (1959) (per Frankfurter, J.)./ "Conceivably historic [read historical] skepticism about the propriety of nonpossessory security in personal property also stems from this mentality." R.E. Speidel et al., Commercial Law Teaching Materials 28 (4th ed. 1987).

On the question whether to write a or an historic(al), see a (A).

HISTORICAL PRESENT TENSE IN JUDICIAL OPINIONS. See OPINIONS, JUDICIAL (A).

hitherto; thitherto. Hitherto = up to now, i.e., heretofore. Thitherto = up to some specified or implied time in the past, i.e., theretofore. Obviously these ARCHAISMS are hardly worth using since the terms just used in defining them—heretofore (or up to now) and theretofore—are perfectly equivalent and much more common. In the following example, a legal writer mistook the import of hitherto, which does not properly appear with the past-perfect tense: "The Superior Court, conceding that it hitherto [read thitherto or, better, theretofore] had refused to enjoin such conduct, recognized the growing tendency in courts to grant equitable relief under such circumstances." See up to now.

Hobbesian choice. See Hobson's choice (C).

Hobson's choice. A. Generally. This ever-growing CLICHÉ has loosened its etymological tether. Tradition has it that Thomas Hobson (1549–1631), a hostler in Cambridge, England, always gave his customers only one choice among his horses: whichever one was closest to the door. Hence, in literary usage, a Hobson's choice came to denote no choice at all—either taking what is offered or taking nothing at all.

BrE writers tend to stick to that sense, as here: "The tribunal . . . concluded that the employees were faced with Hobson's choice[,] that they had no real option but to accept the move . . . ." Sheet Metal Components Ltd. v. Plumridge, [1974] I.C.R. 373, 377 (Nat'l Indus. Relations Ct.).

Though purists resist the change, the prevailing sense in AmE—in legal and nonlegal writing alike—is not that of having no choice at all, but of having two bad choices. E.g., "Ithaca faced a Hobson's choice when confronted with Dean's uncompromising and adamant refusal to work on Sunday. Ithaca could either totally capitulate to Dean's demands and require other employees to perform his work or replace Dean with an employee willing to make reciprocal accommodations." E.E.O.C. v. Ithaca Indus., Inc., 829 F.2d 519, 521 (4th Cir. 1987)./ "This important public policy will not be advanced by presenting a party with the Hobson's choice of either dropping its claim or revealing all confidential communications related to a criminal defense." Greater Newburyport Clamshell Alliance v. Public Serv. Co., 838 F.2d 13, 22 (1st Cir. 1988). Cf. dilemma.

B. Article with. Traditionally—and still in BrE—the phrase takes no article; that is, you are faced not with a Hobson's choice but with Hobson's choice. In modern AmE, the phrase usu. takes either a or the.

C. "Hobbesian choice." Amazingly, some writers have confused the obscure Thomas Hobson with his famous contemporary, the philosopher Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679). The resulting MALAPROPISM is beautifully grotesque:

- "A mere request for administrative relief, however, does not bind the property owner to the Hobbesian choice [read Hobson's choice] of countenancing all the delays a vast federal bureaucracy can produce." White v. Acree, 594 F.2d 1385, 1390 (10th Cir. 1979).
- "The court need not slap an innocent client with a judgment regardless of the merits, leaving the client with a Hobbesian choice [read Hobson's choice] of suffering in silence or of making a distasteful claim against his own lawyer." Fisher v. Crest Corp., 735 P.2d 1052, 1058 (Idaho Ct. App. 1987) (Burnett, J., dissenting).
- "Were the law otherwise, the officers' invitation to depart would present the subject of interrogation with a Hobbesian choice [read Hobson's choice]. To stay could lead to inculpation; to depart surely would." U.S. v. Sterling, 909 F.2d 1078, 1082 (7th Cir. 1990).

hodgepodge. See hotchpot.

hoi polloi (= the common people, the masses). Inasmuch as hoi in Greek means "the (plural)," the hoi polloi is a technical REDUNDANCY. Nevertheless, the hoi polloi overwhelmingly predominates in modern usage.

hold, vb. A. As Transitive Verb. When used properly in the legal sense (signifying "to decide," probably from "hold the opinion that"), this verb describes what judges do and is thus transitive. It should not be used intransitively to describe how judges do. In the following two sentences, the intransitive use is wrong: "Without the scarcity rationale, it seems unlikely that the Red Lion Court would have held as it did, even more unlikely that the present Court would do so."/ "This court's task, then, is to decide how [read what] the Oregon courts would hold when faced with the issue." (Courts hold something; they do not hold in a certain manner. Thus, in the second example, the noun what, not the adverb how, is the proper word.) In general English usage, of course, the intransitive use of hold is quite acceptable in such clauses as The argument does not hold.

B. Hold (to be). Hold need not be followed by to be or as, although to be may sometimes add clarity. E.g., "We hold permissible [better: hold to be permissible] an award of extraordinary damages for frivolous appeal."/ "In Bryan v. Bigelow, the unincorporated letter was held testamentary [better: held to be testamentary] and not admissible in evidence to rebut a resulting trust in favor of the residuary estate." But here the shorter form works better. "The defendant was held to be liable [read held liable] for breach of contract and conversion." Held as <the award was held as permissible> is idiomatically inferior.

C. It was held that. This phrase has traditionally been used in the sense "the law as repeatedly stated by the courts was that"—e.g.: "Previous to the case of Ackroyd v. Smithson, it was held that an unqualified direction by a testator in his will to sell land, or to buy land with his money, created a complete conversion in equity of the land into money." C.C. Langdell, Equitable Conversion, 19 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 1 (1905).

hold a brief for is a lawyers' idiom that has passed into general usage in a broadened sense. Originally, it meant "to be retained as counsel for," but now it generally means merely "to defend or support." E.g., "In setting forth the claims of the revived natural law of today, I am not holding a brief for the old natural law." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 29 (1938).

holden is an archaic past participle of hold, used as recently as 1850 in Brown v. Kendall, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 292, 295 (1850): "There certainly are cases in the books, where, the injury being direct and immediate, trespass has been holden to lie, though the injury was not intentional." This ARCHAISM has even found its way into 20th-century texts: "The rule has been adopted out of regard to the interests of justice, which cannot be upholden . . . ." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 25 (1916).

holder in due course = a person who in good faith has given value for a negotiable instrument that is complete and regular on its face, is not overdue, and, to the possessor's knowledge, has not been dishonored.

holding. As a noun, holding involves a determination of a matter of law that is pivotal to a judicial decision. Here it is loosely used in a lay sense: "Justice Jacobs quoted an 1859 New Jersey holding that '[f]ew statutes would stand if tried by standards of logic, grammar, or rhetoric.'" The opinion may have made this statement; but, inasmuch as it is not a statement of law, it cannot be a holding. See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT & finding.

holding over is legal JARGON denoting a tenant's action in continuing to occupy the leased premises after the lease term has expired. E.g., "The tenant, holding over despite efforts to evict him, planted a crop that eventually the landlord harvested."

The tenant is often referred to as a holdover tenant—e.g.: "In Montana a holdover tenant is charged treble rent." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 297 (1946)./ "In addition to delineating prohibited conduct, the legislature provided a remedy for landlords with holdover tenants and others guilty of forcible entry and detainer and unlawful detainer." Gorman v. Ratliff, 712 S.W.2d 888, 890 (Ark. 1986).

holiday (fr. holy day) = (AmE) a day on which one is exempt from one's usual work; or (BrE) a vacation. This term has long plagued American courts interpreting time computations in statutes and rules. In 1992, for example, the Supreme Court of Texas decided that holiday includes both a day that the commissioners' court in the county where the case is pending has determined to be a holiday, and a day on which the clerk's office for the court in which the case is pending is officially closed. See In re V.C., 829 S.W.2d 772 (Tex. 1992).

Holmesian; Holmesean. The former is the better and more common spelling.

holocaust (lit., "burnt whole," fr. Gk.) is one of our most hyperbolic words, beloved of jargonmongers and second-rate journalists. The historical meaning that the term acquired after World War II, of course, is beyond question. Figurative applications of the word, however, are often questionable. Here it is used to no avail in reference to a scandal: "C.R. would soon be engulfed in a holocaust of controversy and pain [read painful controversy] that would maim several lives, including his own, wound hundreds of other people, and jostle the foundations of the world's most glamorous industry." Inherent in the sense of the word, whether literal or figurative, is the idea of a complete burning; thus, it may be used appropriately of fires, but not, for example, of floods. See ETYMOLOGICAL AWARENESS & OVERSTATEMENT.

holograph, n.; olograph. In the law of wills, a holograph is a will that is entirely written, dated, and signed in the hand of the testator; in many American states, such a will is valid even if it is not witnessed. E.g., "Unfortunately, much litigation is stimulated by other requirements for the execution of holographs, and the difficulty in integrating holographs at probate is particularly acute." The spelling olograph is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that has appeared in a few hundred cases—but many hundreds fewer than the etymologically preferable holograph. Even so, the spelling olograph is prevalent in Louisiana.

holographic; holograph, adj. The word holographic is the better adjective, not holograph: "[T]he district court found that it was a holograph [read holographic] will." In re Estate of Buckley, 536 F.2d 580, 581 (3d Cir. 1976).

The form olographic is common in Louisiana but not elsewhere.

homage (orig., the ceremony by which the tenant became the lord's "man") is best pronounced /hom-ij/. It is a pretension to omit the -h- sound. See humble.

home in, not hone in, is the correct phrase. In the 19th century, the metaphor referred to what homing pigeons do; by the middle of the 20th century, it referred also to what aircraft and missiles do.

And by the late 20th century, some writers had begun mistaking the phrase by using the wrong verb, hone instead of home—e.g.: "True, the challenge was launched in general terms and did not hone in [read home in] on the determinative element . . . ." In re Allison H., 281 Cal. Rptr. 178, 180 (App. Ct. 1991)./ Prosecutors Hone [read Home] in on Gilley, Amarillo Sunday News-Globe, 10 Nov. 1991, at 1.

homered, to be; hometowned, to be. In AmE legal slang, to be homered or to be hometowned is to be bested in a rural courthouse by a local lawyer, usu. because of a judge's provincial biases. E.g., "Though city judges are accused of bias as often or more so than country judges, the distressing fact is that outsiders who lose their cases in rural courthouses may charge they've been 'homered.' " Allen G. Minker, Justice Out Here, 17 Litigation 3, 3 (Spring 1991).

Though in both phrases the primary reference is to hometown favoritism, the idiom to be homered was no doubt influenced by the baseball term homer (= a home run), which is used also as a verb, as in he homered (i.e., hit a home run).

homestead, n. In most American states, the land owned and occupied by a husband and wife as their home is known as their homestead, as long as the land does not exceed in area or value the limits fixed by law. Homestead laws or homestead rights exempt a homestead from execution or judicial sale for debt, unless both the husband and the wife have jointly mortgaged the property or otherwise subjected it to creditors' claims.

homestead, v.t. The past tense of this verb is homesteaded. E.g., "The Chancellor adjudged the subject property to be homestead [read to be homesteaded or to be a homestead] under Article X of the Florida Constitution." One who homesteads is a homesteader. Congress enacted the Homestead Act in 1862.

hometowned, to be. See homered, to be.

homicide refers not to a crime (as is commonly thought), but to the lawful or unlawful killing of a person. The word is frequently misspelled homocide. See murder (A) & -CIDE.

homogen(e)ous. Homogeneous (five syllables) is the usual and the etymologically preferable form.

Homogeneal, homogenetic, homogenetical are rare forms to be avoided; they have failed to become standard and should be laid to rest.

hone in. See home in.

Honorable, in AmE, is a title of respect given to judges, members of the U.S. Congress, ambassadors, and the like. It should be used not with surnames only, but with complete names (e.g., The Honorable Antonin Scalia) or with a title of courtesy (e.g., The Honorable Mr. Scalia). The abbreviation Hon. should be used only in mailing addresses.

In the U.K., the title Honourable (so spelled) is given to judges of the High Court and equivalents, and to children of viscounts and barons. Members of the Privy Council (which includes ministers of the Crown, Lords Justices of Appeal, and certain others) are styled Right Honourable. Judges at circuit courts in England are styled His Honour Judge So-and-So and addressed "Your Honour." Cf. my lord & your Honor.

honorable court, this. Commonly sprinkled throughout briefs, this phrase should be sparingly used, for it tends to nauseate even those judges most susceptible to flattery. E.g., "Review by this Honorable Court of the granting by the district court of the motion for preliminary injunction is a routine matter in which this Honorable Court need determine only whether the district court abused its broad discretion in granting the preliminary injunction." The references should be to the Court or this Court, apart from the first reference in, e.g., the commencement of a pleading. The capitalization of court is compliment enough.

honorarium. Pl. -ia, -iums. Though honorariums has much to commend itself as a homegrown plural—and is the form used by The New York Times—honoraria generally prevails in AmE and BrE alike. See PLURALS (A).

Honor, your. See your Honor.

honoree; honorand. In the early 1950s, these two forms sprang up, both denoting a person who receives an honor. Both words are acceptably formed. The OED records only honorand, which has probably predominated in BrE. In AmE, however, honoree has taken the field—e.g.: "We know of no reason . . . why the name of the donor [cannot appear] under the name of the honoree thereon." State v. Morrison, 57 So. 2d 238, 247 (La. Ct. App. 1952)./ "Neither the hostess nor the honoree testified." State v. Brown, 160 S.E.2d 508, 511 (N.C. Ct. App. 1968./ "Of the approximately ninety inquiries from judges to the committee in the past ten years, most have concerned three areas: thirty-five (about 40 percent) have sought guidance on the appropriateness of the inquiring judge's attending events as a guest or an honoree . . . ." In re Access to Certain Records of Rhode Island Advisory Committee on the Code of Judicial Conduct, 637 A.2d 1063, 1069 (R.I. 1994) (Lederberg, J., concurring). See -EE.

hopefully. So much has been written of this word that little can be added here except to suggest striking this word from your vocabulary. (See FORBIDDEN WORDS.) Briefly, the objections are that (1) hopefully properly means "in a hopeful manner" and should not be used merely to mean I hope or it is to be hoped; (2) in constructions such as, "Hopefully, it will rain today," the writer illogically attributes an emotion (hopefulness) to an inanimate object (it).

The first objection is to SLIPSHOD EXTENSION and is defensible. The second objection is unsound because it ignores similar SENTENCE ADVERBS such as sadly and happily, qq.v.

In 1932—the year in which the extended sense was first recorded—hopefully still generally meant "in a hopeful manner." E.g., "[D]efendant would be placed in a state of servitude, for which she might hopefully expect to realize only her room and board in return for carrying a full share of her load." Botkin v. Pyle, 14 P.2d 187, 192 (Colo. 1932). By 1949, the SLIPSHOD EXTENSION of hopefully was well on its way: "This is the third, hopefully the last, stage in the adjudication of the rights of the parties in this controversy." In re King's Estate, 66 A.2d 68, 69 (Pa. 1949).

Today, the word is all but ubiquitous—even in legal print. E.g., "[T]he protection of the American investing public against depredations by foreign nationals must be implemented by whatever tools are available, hopefully with more rather than less effectiveness." S.E.C. v. Myers, 285 F. Supp. 743, 750 (D. Md. 1968)./ "Hopefully, everyone ought to share the view that we are our 'brother's keeper' . . . ." Ross v. Ross, 200 N.W.2d 149, 154 (Minn. 1972) (Rogosheske, J., concurring)./ "[T]he trial court, hopefully imbued with a fair amount of common sense as well as an understanding of the applicable law, views the questioning as a whole." Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 435 (1985)./ "[T]his is a decision which will need to be taken by the parents (hopefully without the intervention of the court) in the future." Evans v. Evans, [1990] 2 All E.R. 147, 153.

Even so, the word received so much negative attention in the 1970s and 1980s that many writers have blacklisted it, so using it at all today is a precarious venture. Indeed, careful writers and speakers avoid the word even in its traditional sense, for they are likely to be misunderstood if they use it in the old sense.

horizontal restraints; vertical restraints. In the terminology of antitrust law, restraints imposed by agreement between competitors are called horizontal restraints; those imposed by agreement between firms at different levels of distribution are called vertical restraints. See Business Elecs. Corp. v. Sharp Elecs. Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 730 (1988).

hornbook law = black-letter law, q.v. Hornbooks were originally leaves of paper with the alphabet depicted on them; these were covered by a thin plate of translucent horn and mounted on a tablet of wood for use by schoolchildren. By extension, hornbook came to be applied to lawbooks containing the rudiments of law. E.g., "It is hornbook tort law that one who undertakes to warn the public of danger and thereby induces reliance must perform his 'good samaritan' task in a careful manner."/ "It is hornbook law everywhere that silence of itself does not constitute assent."

horse case. See whitehorse case.

horseshed, v.t., = to prepare (a witness favorable to one's cause, often a client) to testify, esp. with instructions about the proper method of responding to questions while testifying. E.g., "[E]very trial lawyer knows that the 'preparing' of witnesses may embrace a multitude of other measures, including some ethical lapses believed to be more common than we would wish. The process is labeled archly in lawyer's slang as 'horseshedding' the witness . . . . [T]he process often extends beyond organizing what the witness knows, and moves in the direction of helping the witness to know new things." Marvin Frankel, Partisan Justice 15 (1980)./ "Equally revealing is the slang used to describe the preparation of ordinary witnesses: 'sandpapering' and 'horseshedding.' " John H. Langbein, The German Advantage in Civil Procedure, 52 U. Chi. L. Rev. 823, 835 n.36 (1985).

This old Americanism has evolved since the novelist James Fenimore Cooper used it in a related sense ("to wheedle, cajole"): "Your regular 'horse shedder' is employed to frequent taverns where jurors stay, and drop hints before them touching the merits of causes known to be on the calendars." James F. Cooper, The Redskins 240 (1846).

host of, a. See SYNESIS hotchpot; hotchpotch; hodgepodge. The original form (a LAW FRENCH term referring to a dish mixed by shaking it up), still the preferred legal term, is hotchpot. Hotchpot was originally the blending of properties to secure equality of division, esp. as practiced in cases in which an intestate's property is to be distributed. E.g., "Ademption by satisfaction is related to the doctrine of advancements in intestacy, except that there is no opportunity on the part of the testamentary donee to come into hotchpot." Blackstone called it a "housewifely metaphor" and explained it in Littleton's words: "it seemeth that this word, hotchpot, is in English a pudding; for in a pudding is not commonly put one thing alone, but one thing with other things together." 2 William Blackstone, Commentaries 190 (1766) (quoting Co. Litt. 164).

This word was corrupted into hotchpotch (used by some courts), then into hodgepodge, which is now the usual nonlegal term meaning "an unorganized mixture." E.g., "The Bankruptcy Act of 1898 proved deficient because of its erratic and uncertain application resulting from a hodgepodge of state and federal statutory provisions."

In community-property states in the U.S., the term is also used in reference to the property that falls within the community estate.

housebreaking is a little-used variant of burglary in its modern statutory sense (as opposed to the common-law sense). Though the word suggests that it relates only to dwellings, its meaning is broader: "unlawfully breaking into any building, public or private, at any hour, and committing a felony [inside], or, having committed a felony [inside], breaking out." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 175 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). E.g., "Petitioner was charged with attempted housebreaking, and assault with attempt to rape in violation of articles 80, 130, and 134 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice." Breaking and entering is a frequently used DOUBLET in that sense. See burglary (B).

In Scotland, there is no crime of burglary—only housebreaking—and in that context house refers to any secured building.

houseburning. See arson.

house counsel; in-house counsel. These variant terms refer to one or more lawyers employed full-time by a company. The shorter phrase, house counsel, is stylistically preferable, though both phrases are common.

house of ill fame. See bawdy house.

House of Lords. Ever since 1876, this phrase has contained an ambiguity. In most people's minds, the House of Lords is most commonly known as the upper chamber of the British Parliament. But in 1876, the judicial House of Lords—a subset of the upper chamber—was created. It is a court composed of 11 professionally qualified judges who, together with peers who have had high judicial experience, sit independently of the parliamentary sittings of the House. It usually sits in panels of five, or occasionally seven. In civil matters, it is the court of final appeal for England, Wales, Scotland, and Northern Ireland; in criminal matters, it is the court of final appeal for England, Wales, and Northern Ireland. See Law Lord & Lord of Appeal in Ordinary.

how come is very informal, almost slang, for why. It should be avoided in writing.

however. Most writers have heard that sentences should not begin with this word. But doing so is not a grammatical error; it is merely a stylistic lapse, the word but ordinarily being much preferable. (See but (A).) E.g., "However, [read But] we regard the statutory history of section 702c as being less than univocal on this point, so we cannot assent to appellants' view." See Bryan A. Garner, On Beginning Sentences with "But," 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 87 (1992).

Yet, used in the sense "in whatever way" or "to whatever extent," however is unimpeachable at the beginning of a sentence. E.g., "However extraordinary this new doctrine may appear, it nevertheless has its advocates . . . ." The Federalist No. 2, at 37–38 (John Jay) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961). See RUN-ON SENTENCES.

hue and cry is an archaic LEGALISM that has passed into the vernacular. At common law it referred either to the public uproar that a citizen was expected to initiate after discovering a crime, or the chase after a felon accompanying such an uproar. The words in this DOUBLET may originally have been distinct, some scholars believing that hue may have referred to inarticulate sounds, such as horns or indistinct yells, while cry may have referred to distinctly audible words. See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.

human, n., for human being was long held objectionable by a few purists, but it is so pervasive today even in formal writing that it should be accepted as standard.

humankind; mankind. The former, a 17th-century creation, is unexceptionable, while the latter is, to many people, a sexist word. The prudent writer will therefore resort to humankind. E.g., "Native Americans fulfill this duty through ceremonies and rituals designed to preserve and stabilize the earth and to protect humankind from disease and other catastrophes." Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n, 485 U.S. 439, 460 (1988) (Brennan, J., dissenting). See SEXISM (B).

humble is preferably pronounced with the -h- sounded /hum-bəl/. (Cf. homage.) Inexplicably, the precious pronunciation without sounding the initial -h- is common in AmE. One judge went so far as to use an before the Humble Oil trademark: "To the contrary, purchasers were informed that the selected shipments would bear the HUMBLE name or be accompanied by an HUMBLE invoice [read by a HUMBLE invoice] but were the desired Exxon products." Exxon Corp. v. Humble Exploration Co., 695 F.2d 96, 100 (5th Cir. 1983).

hung jury (= a jury whose members cannot arrive at a verdict) does not require apologetic quotation marks, as if signaling that it is slang. It is not; it is a useful legal term (finding a synonymous phrase in deadlocked jury). See the quotation in par. 2 under contumacious.

hurt (= a legal injury) surprises the nonlegal reader, for whom hurt connotes physical or emotional pain only. E.g., "The hurts to relations fall in numerous patterns, some simple and some complex."

husband and wife. See man and wife.

HYBRIDS, or words made up of morphemes from different languages, have become even more common in the last 50 years than they were in Fowler's day. Perhaps it is our increasing ignorance of Classical tongues, or our disregard for the morphological integrity of the words we coin, that causes the problem. As an American lexicographer once observed, "Not many people care whether a word has Greek and Latin elements mixed in it." M.M. Mathews, American Words 93 (1959).

Virtually all the hybrids condemned by Fowler (e.g., amoral, bureaucracy, cablegram, climactic, coastal, coloration, gullible, pacifist, racial, speedometer) are now passed over without mention even by those who consider themselves purists. Others that Fowler did not mention also fall into this class, such as antedate, likable, lumpectomy, merriment, postwar, retrofit, riddance, telegenic, and transship. We also have our own fringe hybrids, however: botheration, raticide, and scatteration, and monokini (the last being a MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY as well).

In law, one rarely hears complaints about hybrids, though Mario Pei once called venireman a product of "the worst kind of hybridization (. . . half Latin, half Anglo-Saxon)." Mario Pei, Words in Sheep's Clothing 83 (1969). The nonsexist veniremember, of course, solves that problem. See venireman.

Other law-related hybrids are widely accepted. Breathalyzer (formerly drunkometer) has become standard, although in 1965 Gowers wrote that this term was "stillborn, it may be hoped" (MEU2 253). Creedal, q.v., is a near-commonplace. Quo warranto, q.v., is an example dating back to the 13th century. Automendacity, a word expressing the idea that a forgery tells not just a lie but a lie about itself—about what the very document is—has proved convenient for writers on criminal law. And Fowler may not be resting in peace.

hygiene used to have something to do with cleanliness and healthfulness, esp. with regard to the body. Then the bureaucrats and psychologists sullied this word with figurative senses, giving us, for example, the phrase mental hygiene (see State of California Dept. of Mental Hygiene v. Bank of Southwest, 354 S.W.2d 576 (Tex. 1962)). And this: "What she offers in the place of a system of punishment is in fact a system of purely forward-looking social hygiene in which our only concern when we have an offender to deal with is with the future and the rational aim of prevention of future crime." Careful writers shun this, as they shun all bureaucratic JARGON.

HYPALLAGE, known also as the transferred epithet, is a figure of speech in which the proper subject is displaced by what rightfully would be the object. Usually hypallage is a mere idiomatic curiosity. It has a distinguished lineage—a famous example being Shakespeare's line from Julius Caesar: "This was the most unkindest cut of all." It was not the cut that was unkind, but rather the cutter. Hence the object has become the subject.

An example from legal language is the phrase "negligent tort." It is the tortfeasor, not the tort, that is negligent. Likewise in these phrases:

abutting owner
angry confirmation fight arrestable offense bigamous cohabitation convictable case culpable silence disgruntled complaints drunk-driving cases English-speaking countries extraditable violations humble opinion immunized testimony imprisonable crime
in-custody statements indictable offense
intestate share reversible error
well-educated home

But this figure of speech can sometimes be used inartfully, or cause problems if the writer is not himself aware of the true subject. E.g., "The final subclass of originalism, what Brest calls 'moderate originalism,' views the text of the Constitution as. . . ." [A subclass does not view.]/ "State courts generally mirrored this theistic viewpoint." [State courts did not mirror the point of view discussed; rather, their decisions or opinions did.]/ "The authorities sustain the validity of the direction of the testator, and equity will afford protection to the donor to a charitable corporation in that the attorney general may maintain a suit to compel the property to be held for the charitable purpose for which it was given to the corporation." [The property is not being compelled to be held; someone is being compelled to hold the property.]/ "The arguments of the parties have addressed themselves in considerable part to the propriety of the district court's exercising its equitable jurisdiction to enjoin the strike in question once the findings set forth above have been made." [The arguments themselves haven't done the addressing; rather, in their arguments, the parties have addressed themselves.]

Hypallage can also lead to faulty metaphors: "The defendants in this case have reduced the husband to a physical wreck. The wife is the victim of that wreck." [The writer does not mean to say that the wife is a victim of her husband, a paraplegic. Rather, she is a victim of the defendants' actions.]

HYPERCORRECTION. Sometimes people strive to abide by the strictest etiquette, but in the process they behave inappropriately. The same human motivations that result in this irony can play havoc with the langauge: a person will strive for a correct linguistic form but instead fall into error. Linguists call this phenomenon "hypercorrection"—a shortcoming to which legal writers are particularly susceptible.

This foible can have several causes. Often, it results from an attempt to avoid what is incorrectly thought to be a grammatical error. (See SUPERSTITIONS.) At other times, it results when the writer has an imcomplete grasp of a foreign language's grammar—but insists on trying to conform to that grammar. And, yet again, it sometimes results when the writor allows a misplaced sense of logic to override a well-established idiom. A few of the most common manifestations are enumerated below.

A. False Latin Plurals. One with a smattering of Latin learns that, in that language, most nouns ending in -us have a plural ending in -i: genius forms genii, nimbus forms nimbi, syllabus forms syllabi, terminus forms termini, and so on. The trouble is that not all of them do end in -i, so traps abound for those who wish to show off their sketchy knowledge of Latin:

Hypercorrect Form	Latin Form	English Form
apparati	apparatus	apparatuses cestuis que trustent	[none]	cestuis que trust cestuis que usent	[none]	cestuis que use fori	fora	forums
hiati	hiatus	hiatuses
ignorami	[vb. in L.]	ignoramuses mandami	[vb. in L.]	mandamuses mittimi	[vb. in L.]	mittimuses
nexi	nexus	nexuses
octopi	octopodes (Gk.)	octopuses prospecti	prospectus	prospectuses
stati	status	statuses

B. Between you and I. Some users of the English language learn a thing or two about pronoun cases, but little more. They learn, for example, that it is incorrect to say "It is me" or "Me and Jane are going to school now." (See it is I.) But this knowledge puts them on tenterhooks: through the logical fallacy known as "hasty generalization," they come to fear that there is something wrong with the word me—that perhaps it's safer to stick with I.

They therefore begin to use I even when the objective case is called for: "She had the biggest surprise for Blair and I [read me]." "Please won't you keep this between you and I [read me]." These are gross linguistic gaffes, but it is perennially surprising how many otherwise educated speakers commit them. See between (C) & NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES.

Many writers and speakers try to avoid the problem by resorting to myself, but that is hardly an improvement. See myself.

C. Number Problems. Sometimes, in the quest for correctness, writers let their sense of grammar override long-established idioms. They may write, for example, "A number of people was there," when the correct form is "A number of people were there." Or they will write, "A handful of problems arises from that approach," instead of "A handful of problems arise from that approach." For more on these correct but "antigrammatical" constructions, see SYNESIS & number of, a.

D. Redundantly Formed Adverbs. The forms doubtless, much, and thus are adverbs, yet some writers overcompensate by adding -ly and thereby forming barbarisms: doubtlessly, muchly, and thusly. See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (D), doubtless(ly), illy, muchly, & thus (B).

E. As for like. When writers fear using like as a conjunction, they sometimes fail to use it when it would function appropriately as a preposition or adverb. Thus, "She writes like a lawyer" becomes "She writes as a lawyer." But the latter sentence sounds as if it is explaining the capacity in which she writes. The hypercorrection, then, results in a MISCUE. See like (A).

F. Whom for who. Perhaps writers should get points for trying, but those who do not know how to use whom should abstain in questionable contexts. That is, against whom, for whom, and the like may generally be instances in which the writer knows to choose whom. But things can get moderately tricky—e.g.: "[W]hat someone who intends to mug an approaching stranger whom [read who] he realizes is grey-haired and sunburnt intends is to mug a grey-haired and sunburnt stranger, though it was no part of his aim that the intended victim should be grey-haired and sunburnt." Alan R. White, Misleading Cases 60 (1991). Although, in that sentence, whom may seem to be the object of realizes, in fact it is the subject of the verb is. See who (A) & NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES.

G. Unsplit Infinitives Causing Miscues. Writers who have given in to the most widespread of superstitions—or who believe that most of the readers have done so—avoid all split infinitives. They should at least avoid introducing squinting modifiers into their prose. But many writers do introduce them, and the result is often a MISCUE or AMBIGUITY—e.g.: "Each is trying subtly to exert his or her influence over the other." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 26 (1984). In that sentence, does subtly modify the participle trying or the infinitive to exert? Because we cannot tell, the sentence needs to be revised in any of the following ways: (1) Each is subtly trying to exert his or her influence over the other, (2) Each is trying to exert his or her influence subtly over the other, or (3) Each is trying to subtly exert his or her influence over the other. See SPLIT INFINITIVES (C), SUPERSTITIONS (B) & MISCUES.

H. Unsplit Verb Phrases. A surprising number of writers believe that it's a mistake to put an adverb in the midst of a verb phrase. The surprise is for them: every language authority who addresses the question holds just the opposite view—that the adverb generally belongs in the midst of a verb phrase. (See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (A).) The canard to the contrary frequently causes awkwardness and artificiality—e.g.: "I soon will be calling you." [Read I will soon be calling you.] See SUPERSTITIONS (C).

I. Prepositions Moved from the End of the Sentence. "That is the type of arrant pedantry up with which I shall not put," said Winston Churchill, mocking the pedantry that causes some writers and speakers to avoid ending with a preposition. See PREPOSITIONS (A) & SUPERSTITIONS (A).

J. Borrowed Articles for Borrowed Nouns. When a naturalized or quasi-naturalized foreignism appears in an English-language context, the surrounding words—with a few exceptions, such as hoi polloi (q.v.)—should be English. Thus, one refers to finding the mot juste, not finding le mot juste (a common error among the would-be literati).

K. Overrefined Pronunciation. Some foreignisms acquire English and American pronunciations. For example, lingerie is pronounced in a way that the French would consider utterly barbarous: /lon-zhə-ray/, as opposed to /lan-zhree/. But for a native speaker of AmE to use the latter pronunciation would be foolish-sounding.

Similarly, American and English printers refer to the more modern typefaces—the ones without small projections coming off the straight lines—as sans serif /sanz-ser-if/, not /sahnz-sə-reef/. The latter pronunciation may show a familiarity with the French language, but it belies an unfamiliarity both with publishing and with the English language.

Even native-English words can cause problems. The word often, for example, preferably has a silent -t-, yet some speakers (unnaturally) pronounce it because of the spelling. The next logical step would be to pronounce administration /ad-min-i-stray-tee-on/, and all other words with the -tion suffix similarly. See PRONUNCIATION (A).

HYPHENS. See PUNCTUATION (D) & PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

hypnotism and hypnosis are not interchangeable. One might use either term to name the art of mesmerism, but one would never say, "He is under hypnotism." Hypnotism names only the practice or art; hypnosis refers either to the practice or to the state of consciousness itself.

The two words are susceptible to INELEGANT VARIATION, as Chief Justice Rehnquist has demonstrated. See Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987) (in which Rehnquist referred to "increased confidence in both true and false memories following hypnosis" (p. 62) and then to "increased confidence inspired by hypnotism" (at 63)).

hypostatize; hypostasize. The standard form is hypostatize (= to make an idea into, or to regard it, as a self-existent substance or person).

hypothecate is not, as some writers believe, a synonym of hypothesize. Properly, hypothecate is an admiralty and civil-law term meaning "to pledge without delivery of title or possession." Hypothesize means "to make a hypothesis," which is a proposition put forward as a basis for argument. President George Bush, for example, fell into error on 8 August 1990, when, after sending armed forces to Saudi Arabia in the wake of Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait, he said he would not "hypothecate" about this or that scenario. But the confusion is nothing new: "Was the district court, then, bound, in opposition to these facts, to instruct the jury . . . hypothetically, that . . . . [A]ny instruction . . . hypothecated [read hypothesized] on the absence of such calls, could only tend to confuse or mislead the jury." Boardman v. Lessees of Reed, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 328, 344 (1832). Hypotheticate is a mistaken form of hypothecate.

Hypothecation is best preceded by a rather than by an. E.g., "In my opinion, the definition given by Pothier of an hypothecation [read a hypothecation] is an accurate description of a maritime lien under our law." See a (A).

hypo(thet). Hypothetical was originally used adjectivally, but has come to be an attributive noun as well. Hypothet is an old-fashioned American shortening of hypothetical in legal contexts. Hypo is now the more widespread legal colloquialism, and it undoubtedly sounds better. E.g., "[I]n fact, fictional stories ('hypos' in the jargon of the law schools) will serve just as well . . . ." A.W.B. Simpson, Trouble with the Case, TLS, 14–20 Dec. 1990, at 1344.

hypothetic(al), adj. The longer form is now usual. E.g., "In the supplemental charge, the court expressly indicated that its prior remarks had been made in hypothetic [read hypothetical] form for illustrative purposes." See hypo(thet).

I

I; me. See NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES. For the error between you and I, see between (C) & HYPERCORRECTION (B).

ibid. Short for ibidem (= in the same place), this abbreviation is rarely used in legal citations. Id., the abbreviation for idem (= the same person or thing), does the same job for a lawyer.

id. See idem.

idea or concept. Many writers seem unable to say idea without adding or concept. The habit is a bad one, the two words being virtually interchangeable—e.g.: "[T]hey are all appealing to the same fundamental idea or concept, though it is extraordinarily difficult to define exactly the nature of that idea or concept." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 2 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). In that sentence, idea alone would suffice in both places.

idealogical. See ideological.

idem (= the same), in its abbreviated form id., is used in citations to refer to the cited authority immediately preceding. For example, if footnote 2 reads, "Mauet, Fundamentals of Trial Techniques 380 (1980)," footnote 3 might read, "Id. at 381."

The full word appears in the LATINISM idem sonans (lit., "having the same sound"), a rule of law that a variant spelling of a name in a document will not render the document void if the misspelling is pronounced in the same way as the true spelling (as Growgan for Grogan on a traffic ticket). E.g., "[U]nder our random system it sometimes happens that your name is idem sonans with mine, and it may be the same even in spelling." Oliver W. Holmes, The Theory of Legal Interpretation, 12 Harv. L. Rev. 417, 418 (1899).

identical preferably takes with, not to. One has identity with something or someone, not to it. Identical to was not widely used until the mid-20th century. The OED, in fact, quotes illustrative examples only with the phrase identical with. Here the better phrasing is used: "Under a constitutional provision identical with our own, the Missouri courts have held consistently that the question of libel or no libel is for the jury."/ "The evidence is that the two prior wills contained residuary devises identical with those in the latest will."

Just as frequently, however, and esp. in AmE, to appears. It has come to be the predominant nonliterary idiom—e.g.: "The code may then provide a term substantially identical to [read with] one of those rejected."/ "Section 35031 is virtually identical to [read with] section 72411."/ "Petitioner then filed his first federal habeas petition, raising issues identical to [read with] those raised and ruled on in his state appeal."

identify with. This phrase—used without a direct object following identify—has recently become a cant phrase, associated especially with slang of the 1960s and 1970s. Here it is inappropriately used in reference to a 19th-century historical figure. "Randolph identified with the books he read, and took upon himself the roles suggested by his favorite authors."

ideological. So spelled, though many misapprehend its etymology, believing the word is somehow derived from our modern word idea, and thus misspell it idealogical. The blunder has become common enough that it appears in W3 (cf. miniscule), but inclusion in that dictionary is not a persuasive defense of its use. Like several other, more learned words beginning with ideo- (e.g., ideograph), ideology passed into English through French (F. idéologie) and has been spelled ideo- in English since the 18th century.

idiosyncrasy. So spelled, though often erroneously rendered -cracy (as if the word denoted a form of government)—e.g.: "Their idiosyncracies [read idiosyncrasies] are patrician." David Margolick, Similar Histories, and Views, for 2 Court Finalists, N.Y. Times, 30 May 1993, at 9.

idyllic (= of, belonging to, or of the nature of an idyll [a short picturesque poem usu. describing rustic life]; full of charm or picturesqueness) is often misused as if it meant ideal (= perfect). E.g., "If unprofessional conduct . . . , deliberately employed as a means of thwarting the prosecution, was [read were] to be deemed per se ineffective assistance, then the accused would be placed in an idyllic [read ideal] situation." Chappee v. Vose, 843 F.2d 25, 33 (1st Cir. 1988). (On the change of was to were in that sentence, see SUBJUNCTIVES.)

i.e., the abbreviation for id est (L. "that is"), introduces explanatory phrases or clauses. The abbreviation is perfectly appropriate in legal writing. Formerly it was said that, in speaking or reading, the abbreviation should be rendered id est. But this is never heard today, whereas the abbreviated letters i.e. are frequently heard in lawyers' speech. (See e.g.) Generally, a comma follows i.e. in AmE (though not in BrE).

if. A. And whether. It is best to distinguish between the ways in which these words are used. Whether is generally preferable where one intends to express not a conditional idea, but an alternative or possibility. If is often used where, in formal writing at least, whether is the better word. E.g., "One person inquired if [read whether] the money was lost."

In some contexts, however, use of the different words may actually shade the meaning. E.g., "Please let me know if you need any advice" means to get in touch only if you need advice. "Please let me know whether you need any advice" means to advise in any event, whether the answer is yes or no.

B. If, and only if. This is inferior and adds nothing but unnecessary emphasis to only if. E.g., "Money is an adequate remedy if, and only if, [read only if] it can be used to replace the specific thing that was lost." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 246 (1991). The variation if, but only if, which sometimes occurs in legal writing, is unnecessary and even nonsensical for only if.

C. And in the event that. See in the event that.

if and when is a legalistic phrase of questionable validity—e.g.: "If and when the Patent and Trademark Office decides the trademark is registrable, it will be published in a weekly bulletin called the Official Gazette." What is the antecedent of it? Will the trademark be published, or the decision of registrability?

Fowler enumerated a number of suspicions that keen readers are likely to have about users of this phrase: "There is the suspicion that he is a mere parrot, who cannot say part of what he has often heard without saying the rest also; there is the suspicion that he likes verbiage for its own sake; there is the suspicion that he is a timid swordsman who thinks he will be safer with a second sword in his left hand; there is the suspicion that he has merely been too lazy to make up his mind between if and when" (MEU1 254). In short, one is ill advised to use the phrase, which almost invariably is improved when simplified: "Appellant has not specifically requested backpay; if and when [read if] he does, that issue might be judged by a different standard."

An even worse manifestation of the phrase is if, as, and when: "Decisions in other community property states have disagreed on whether future contingent payments may be apportioned if, as, and when [read as or when] they mature and are received by the retired spouse."/ "We shall offer these bonds at this price, if, as, and when [read if or when] they are issued by the trust company." One of the three words is suitable virtually wherever this phrase appears. Cf. unless and until.

if any. Instead of putting if any after the noun, try putting any before it—e.g.: "[T]he complaint must further show . . . what voyages or trips, if any [read any voyages or trips], she [read the ship] has made since the voyage or trip on which the claims sought to be limited arose." Supp. R. Adm. & Mar. Claims F(2).

iffy for uncertain is a casualism unfit for formal legal prose. E.g., "We conclude that this court should not undertake the iffy [read uncertain] task of determining whether each appellant is entitled to immunity."

if it ain't broke, don't fix it. This is a favorite CLICHÉ of American lawyers seeking to preserve the status quo—and often merely to entrench mediocrity.

if it be. See SUBJUNCTIVES

if not is an ambiguous phrase best avoided. It may mean either (1) lit., "(even) if it is, (we are, etc.) not; though not," or (2) "maybe even." Sense (2) is exemplified in the following sentences: "Justices of the peace who handle petty criminal cases and small claims are close to the general public and are an important, if not [i.e., and even an] essential, element in any state's system of justice."/ "Many, if not [i.e., even] most, courts are now willing to allow a substantial award for loss of the 'companionship' of the child."

Sense (1) is confusing if, as is quite likely, the reader first thinks of the phrase in terms of the more common sense (2): "We are apt if not vigilant to overlook the true status of the defendant husband and the defendant wife when they undertook acquisition by the entirety of the home lot." The sentence means: We are apt, if we are not vigilant, to overlook . . . ." But the reader more familiar with sense (2) will misperceive the sentence as meaning: We are apt, and even vigilant, to overlook . . . ." See AMBIGUITY.

if you will. This phrase typifies the language of those who engage in WORD-PATRONAGE—e.g.: "[W]ith regard to a large area of the legal field the experiments of the law, if they can be so called—the engineering appliances, if you will—are brought to bear ex post facto." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 36 (7th ed. 1964). This phrase, meaning in full if you will allow me to use the phrase, is almost always (as in the example quoted) best deleted.

ignis fatuus (= will o' the wisp; a delusive hope or desire) forms the plural ignes fatui.

ignitable. So spelled. See -ABLE (A).

ignominy is accented on the first, not the second, syllable /ig-nə-min-ee/.

ignoramus. Until 1934 in England, if a grand jury considered the evidence of an alleged crime insufficient, it would endorse the bill ignoramus, meaning literally "we do not know" or "we know nothing of this." This use of the term was a survival of the medieval practice of having juries act on personal knowledge. Today, the phrases No bill, No true bill, and Not a true bill have replaced ignoramus.

By the early 17th century, though, the word ignoramus had come to mean, by extension, "an ignorant person." (See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.) In 1615, George Ruggle wrote a play called Ignoramus, about a lawyer who knew nothing about the law; and this fictional lawyer soon gave his name to all manner of know-nothings, whether lawyers or nonlawyers.

The modern nonlegal meaning appears more frequently in modern legal writing than the historical legal meaning: "Thus, to accuse a lawyer of being an ignoramus, when spoken of him in his calling, is actionable per se, without proof of special damages." Pl. ignoramuses; the form ignorami is a pseudo-learned blunder (ignoramus is a verb and not one of the Latin nouns in -us). See PLURALS (A).

ignorance. See mistake (A).

ignorance of the law is no excuse. See ignorantia juris.

ignorant; stupid. Fastidious users of language distinguish between these terms. Stupid refers to innate ability, whereas ignorant refers merely to the state of one's knowledge on a particular subject. Geniuses are ignorant of certain facts; stupid people are ignorant of most facts.

ignorantia juris is a moderately useful LATINISM denoting the legal doctrine that ignorance of the law is no excuse (rendered in Latin ignorantia juris neminem excusat [lit., "ignorance of law excuses no one"]). E.g., "The effect of this provision is to continue the ignorantia juris principle as part of the Model Code culpability structure." The full maxim itself, however, is best rendered in English. See MAXIMS.

Some writers use the phrase ignorantia legis rather than ignorantia juris. Strictly speaking, jus (and its genitive juris) means the science of law or the whole body of the law, whereas lex (genitive legis) means a legislative act or pronouncement, or sometimes the body of enacted law as distinct from principles of common law (or judge-made law). Hence, strictly, ignorantia juris means ignorance of the law and ignorantia legis ignorance of a specific statute or ordinance. But no such DIFFERENTIATION seems to exist in practice. Ironically, the issue in most cases is ignorance of a specific provision, not of the law in general; but ignorantia juris remains the more common form.

ignore, when used in reference to a grand jury, means "to sign a bill with ignoramus [q.v.]"—e.g.: "[T]he grand jury may ignore the bill, and decline to find any indictment . . . ." Post v. U.S., 161 U.S. 583, 587 (1896)./ "Russo's testimony before the grand jury as to Foster, Baker and Weller, contradicted his testimony before the committing magistrate and in effect made it necessary for the grand jury to ignore all three bills." Commonwealth v. Russo, 111 A.2d 359, 364 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1955)./ "The grand jury takes it [the case] up anew, and may present or ignore the bill, without any reference whatever to the fact that one indictment has been presented and set aside." State v. Silver, 398 P.2d 178, 180 (Or. 1965) (en banc).

ilk correctly means "the same"; hence of that ilk means "of that same kind." E.g., "The evidence in this case was of the ilk that would tax the patience and wisdom of Solomon." Mink v. Mink, 395 S.E.2d 237, 239 (Ga. Ct. App. 1990). Yet the word is commonly misapprehended as relating to race or family—it is not that specific.

ill. The comparative form of this adjective is worse, the superlative worst. The adverb is ill, illy being an illiterate form. Yet illiteracies have been known to creep into legal writing and even into judicial opinions: see illy.

illation (= the act of inferring or something inferred) is a learned term little used today, though a few modern judges are quite fond of it. Inference serves just as well, and more understandably.

illegal; illicit; unlawful. These three terms are fundamentally synonymous, although illicit <illicit love affairs> carries moral overtones in addition to the basic sense "not in accordance with or sanctioned by law."

Illegal is not synonymous with criminal, though some writers mistakenly assume that it is. (See undocumented alien.) Anything against the law—even the civil law—is, technically speaking, "illegal." See illegal contract, nonlegal & unlawful.

illegal alien. See undocumented alien.

illegal contract. This phrase is "exceptionally difficult to define." P.A. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 38 (3d ed. 1981). The phrase does not denote merely "a contract contrary to the criminal law, although such a contract would indubitably be illegal. But a contract can well be illegal without contravening the criminal law, because there are certain activities [that] the law does not actually prohibit, but at the same time regards as contrary to the public interest and definitely to be discouraged, for instance, prostitution." Id.

illegal entry. This phrase, in some jurisdictions, denotes a lesser-included offense of burglary (q.v.)—e.g.: "A murderer, who might get the chair, would be offered a plea to 'manslaughter,' or a burglar, liable for twenty years, one to 'illegal entry,' depending on how strong the evidence in either case might be." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 88 (1943).

illegible; unreadable. Illegible = not plain or clear enough to be read (used of handwriting or defaced printing). Unreadable = too dull or obfuscatory to be read (used of bad writing).

illegitimate child. Though the phrase is still often used, it is undeniably insensitive. As a farsighted judge once observed, "[T]here are no illegitimate children, only illegitimate parents." In re Estate of Woodward, 40 Cal. Rptr. 781, 784 (Dist. Ct. App. 1964). A New York judge contends that "[t]he preferable modern term is nonmarital child." Letter of Arthur E. Blyn, Nonmarital Children, N.Y. Times, 10 March 1991, at 14. See EUPHEMISMS, bastard & natural child.

illicit (= illegal), when used for elicit (= to bring out), is a mistake. One might have thought this error impossible, but it does occur—e.g.: "[T]he trial court's subsequent inquiries could not have illicited [read elicited] honest responses." U.S. v. Washita Constr. Co., 789 F.2d 809, 818 (10th Cir. 1986)./ "[P]laintiff's attorney illicited [read elicited] from Loftsgard the amount of expenses and also the amount covered by insurance." Loftsgard v. Dorrian, 476 N.W.2d 730, 733 (Iowa Ct. App. 1991)./ "The record reveals defendant did not attempt to develop this version of the accident by illiciting [read eliciting] trial testimony or submitting expert opinion." Bordelon v. South Cent. Bell Tel. Co., 617 So. 2d 1337, 1340 (La. Ct. App. 1993).

For the proper use of illicit, see illegal.

illiterate = (1) unable to read or write; or (2) unlettered. Justice Holmes was wont to use this word in sense (2), the heightened sense of the word: "In the case at bar we have an illiterate woman writing her own will. Obviously the first sentence, 'I am going on a journey and may not ever return,' expresses the fact that was on her mind as the occasion and inducement for writing it." Eaton v. Brown, 193 U.S. 411, 414 (1904) (per Holmes, J.).

ILLOGIC. The writer on language who would dare drag logic into the discussion must do so warily. For centuries, grammarians labored under the mistaken belief that grammar is but applied logic and therefore tried to rid language of everything illogical.

But, to paraphrase Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., the life of the language has not been logic: it has been experience. No serious student believes anymore that grammatical distinctions necessarily reflect logical ones. Our language is full of idioms that defy logic, many of them literary and many colloquial. We should not, for example, fret over the synonymy of fat chance and slim chance. Applying "linguistic logic" to established ways of saying things is a misconceived effort.

We see that misconceived effort today when armchair grammarians insist that grammatical error is an Irish bull; that I don't think so is wrong in place of I think not; that the reason why is wrong (no more so, certainly, than place where or time when); that a number of people must take a singular not a plural verb (see SYNESIS); or that, in Don't spend any more time than you can help, the final words should be can't help. When logic is used for such purposes, it is worse than idle: it is harmful.

That does not mean, of course, that logic is of no concern to the writer. For rhetorical purposes, logic is essential. A few readers will look for holes in the wording. In evaluating our own writing, therefore, we should strictly follow idiom and usage, but otherwise apply logic.

The exercise will tighten your prose. Since idiom does not yet prefer could care less, much less require it, write couldn't care less. (Logically speaking, if you say you could care less, then you are admitting that you care to some extent.) No longer might you say, I was scared literally to death, because you recognize the literal meaning of literally and you are still alive to report how scared you were. Likewise, logic would have you banish such thoughtless words as preplanned and use words such as reiterate (q.v.) more carefully, so as to distinguish it from iterate.

Logic also rids prose of the various errors in thinking that workaday writers commonly commit. To avoid the ills catalogued below, consider closely how your words and sentences relate to one another.

A. Illogical Comparison. This lapse occurs commonly in locutions like as large if not larger than, which, when telescoped, becomes as large . . . than; properly, one writes as large as if not larger than. Similar problems occur with classes. For example, when members of classes are being compared, a word such as other must be used to restrict the class: "Our system of justice is better than any [other] in the world."

Another problem of comparison occurs when the writer forgets the point of reference in the comparison:

- "Like the hard-hitting Dianne Feinstein, a candidate for California's governorship, Silber's views are striking a chord among many Democrats tired of losing." Graham, Democrats' New Breed Upsets the Party Old Guard, Sunday Times, 15 April 1990, at A23. (The sentence compares a person to someone's views.)
- "I cannot ignore our culpability in this situation and, like parricide in the Athenian law, pass it over in silence." Brown v. United States, 454 F.2d 999, 1016 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (Tamm, J., dissenting). (Parricide didn't pass over anything in silence; rather, the Athenian law passed over parricide in silence, the writer means to say.)
- "Like the young Bentham, an ardent crusader, he [Rodell] lacks Bentham's patience [read he lacks patience]." Jerome Frank, Introduction, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! xii (1980 ed). (As a comparison of young Jeremy Bentham with old Jeremy Bentham, the sentence does not work, because the source of the comparison is also the source of difference.)
- "This case involves facts virtually identical with the previous case [read those in the previous case]."
- "May a defendant who has settled with the plaintiff recover contribution from other potential defendants?" (The phrase other potential defendants is wrong because anyone who has settled is no longer a potential defendant.)

For related problems, see as much as or more, as well as or better than & OVERSTATEMENT.

B. Danglers and Misplaced Modifiers. Every dangler or misplaced modifier, in some degree, perverts logic, sometimes humorously—e.g.: "I saw the Statue of Liberty flying into Newark." To avoid these disruptions of thought, remember that participles should relate to nouns that are truly capable of performing the action of the participle. Here, for example, note that neither a definition nor a belief construes: "Any definition is likely to distinguish between religion and mere conscientious belief, construing the first amendment to govern the former but not the latter." For a fuller discussion of these matters, see DANGLERS & MISPLACED MODIFIERS.

C. Disjointed Appositives. Phrases intended to be in apposition should not be separated. (See APPOSITIVES.) E.g., "A respected English legal authority on the common law, the view of William Blackstone permeated much of the early thinking on freedom of expression." John Murray, The Media Law Dictionary 11 (1978). (Blackstone himself, not Blackstone's view, is the respected authority.)

D. Mistaken Subject of a Prepositional Phrase. This problem crops up usually when a word or phrase intervenes between the noun and the prepositional phrase referring to that noun. Often, as in the first example below, the noun (school bus) functions as an adjective: "Wallin was the school bus driver in which [read Wallin was driving the school bus in which] Hillman and Ellington and Kleven were passengers."/ "Of the three persons involved, the entire loss fell upon the only one who was himself free from all negligence." (What is the relationship between the three persons involved, the loss incurred, and the degree of negligence? Read Of the three persons involved, the only one to incur a loss was the one free from all negligence.)

E. Insensitivity to Metaphor. Illogical metaphors abound in American writing. The scholar's virgin field pregnant with possibilities is among the more risible examples. Others less humorous are only a little less difficult to spot:

- "In my opinion that foundation is not weakened by the fact that it is buttressed by other provisions that are also designed to avoid the insidious evils of government propaganda favoring particular points of view." (Buttresses serve only to strengthen, not to weaken.)
- "That doctrine was bastardized by its progeny." (Parents, not children, create bastards.)
- "The nineteenth century has provided new impetus to literary studies, putting them on untraveled roads." (Travel creates roads; they do not exist in a vacuum.)

See METAPHORS (A).

F. Poor Exposition of Sequence. Do not ask your readers to assume what is not logically possible by your very assumptions—e.g.: "Indeed, the condition of the plane after the crash eliminated an air collision [read was such as to eliminate further speculation about an air collision or ruled out an air collision as the cause of the crash]."/ "The obligation of the deceased to transfer certain property, as a minimum, during his life does not negate a desire to leave the other property after death . . . ." (A deceased person cannot have obligations of any kind, much less obligations to transfer property during his life. This is an example of the rhetorical figure called "prolepsis.")

G. Vexatious Little Words with Plain Meanings. Writers often confound their meaning by misusing simple words—e.g.: "Acceptances must be communicated to the offeror after [read in] a reasonable amount of time." (If after a reasonable amount of time, then the period has become unreasonable!)

H. Complete Obliviousness in the Task of Writing. We all take leave of our senses, from time to time, especially while composing. We save ourselves, however, by applying our critical faculties while revising. Most of us do, anyway. But some writers don't—e.g.: "The courts are more reluctant in considering extrinsic evidence to construe a will than to construe an inter vivos transfer." [Read Courts are more reluctant to consider extrinsic evidence in construing a will than in construing an inter vivos transfer.] (The original sentence suggests that courts have a choice of what to construe, as if a judge might say, "Well, here I am considering some extrinsic evidence. Why, I think I'll construe an inter vivos transfer—that would be more fun than a will!")

I. Progression of Tenses. See TENSES.

illude. See allude (B).

illusion; delusion. These words are used differently despite their similar meanings. An illusion exists in one's fancy or imagination. A delusion is an idea or thing that deceives or misleads a person about some aspect of the real world.

For the difference between illusion and allusion, see allusion. For the difference between delusion and hallucination, see hallucination.

illusory; illusive. The former is preferred. See elusive.

illustrate, in modern usage, means "to provide a good example of (something); to exemplify." In the following sentence it is used ambiguously: "Hohfeld's analysis illustrates [read In his analysis, Hohfeld examines] the fallacy of accepting too literally the 'artificial entity' theory." The writer here is not claiming—as the sentence seems to do—that Hohfeld's analysis is itself a good example of "the fallacy of accepting too literally the 'artificial entity' theory." Rather, the sentence is intended to point to Hohfeld's analysis as one that elucidates well the nature of this fallacy.

Illustrate is usually accented on the first syllable: /il-ə-strayt/.

illustrative. The second syllable is accented: /i-lus-trə-tiv/.

illy is not an acceptable adverb in formal writing, perhaps not even in nondialectal informal writing. Ill itself acts as an adverb. E.g., "It is freely conceded that there are many decisions contrary to this view; but, when carried to the extent contended for by the appellant, we think they are unsafe, unsound, and illy [read ill] adapted to modern conditions." See ill & HYPERCORRECTION (D).

imbibe is a FORMAL WORD meaning "to drink." It occurs more frequently in legal than in nonlegal contexts. E.g., "In Kelly v. Gwinnell, the New Jersey Supreme Court took a major step in holding social hosts liable for the torts of their guests whom they have allowed to over*imbibe.*" imbracery. See embracery.

immanent. See imminent.

immaterial; nonmaterial. The former term is called for in most legal contexts. "Should even a nonmaterial [read immaterial] error, if made with the intent to deceive the magistrate, invalidate a warrant?"/ "A testator is not induced by the misrepresentation if he knows the facts, or if the facts misrepresented are immaterial." Although both may mean "not consisting of a material substance," immaterial tends to mean "of no substantial importance; inconsequential"; nonmaterial, in contrast, generally means "cultural, aesthetic" <the nonmaterial rewards of a career in law are sometimes debated>. See material.

immemorial. See time immemorial & memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

immigrate; emigrate. Immigrate [im (into) + migrate (to move from one place to another)] = to enter a country with the intention of settling there permanently. Emigrate [e (from) + migrate (to move from one place to another)] = to depart or exit from one country in the hope of settling in another. Some countries are plagued by illegal immigration (e.g., the United States); others have been plagued by attempts at illegal emigration (e.g., the former Soviet Union).

Both verbs are intransitive and hence do not take objects. In the following sentence, immigrate is wrongly made transitive: "Because you cannot immigrate your grandmother [Read Because your grandmother cannot immigrate], she and her husband and her six children will remain undocumented."

The agent nouns are immigrant and emigrant (the GALLICISM émigré being a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the latter).

imminent; eminent; immanent. Imminent means "certain and very near, impending," as in the legal phrases imminent bodily harm, imminent danger, and imminent death. E.g., "Obviously there should be some bar to letting the owner transfer solely for the purpose of cutting down his estate tax at a time when that tax becomes imminent."

Imminent does not mean merely "probable," as here incorrectly used: "We cannot assume reasonably that the Legislature intended that a statute enacted for the preservation of life and limb of pedestrians must be observed when observance would subject them to more imminent [read probable] danger."

Eminent = distinguished, of excellent repute <Judge Friendly of the Second Circuit was long considered an eminent jurist>. The adverb eminently is frequently used to mean "very," as in "He is eminently deserving of this award," or, "The court's decision was eminently fair." See eminence.

Immanent, primarily a theological term, means "inherent; pervading the material world" <the immanent goodness of the divine will>.

immoral; unmoral; amoral. These three words have distinct meanings. Immoral, the opposite of moral, means "evil, depraved." The word is highly judgmental. Unmoral means merely "without moral sense, not moral," and is used, for example, of animals and inanimate objects. Amoral, perhaps the most commonly misused of these terms, means "not moral, outside the sphere of morality; being neither moral nor immoral." It is loosely applied to people in the sense "not having morals or scruples."

immovable, in its fullest sense, is land, but, by extension, the word applies also to buildings and other permanent structures. In law, immovable has become a noun as well as an adjective, and is used almost always in the plural form. E.g., "All the cases before Langlois that imposed absolute liability involved dangerous activities relating to land or other immovables that were within the terms of those articles." (See ADJECTIVES (C).) The term immovables encompasses all immovable property, such as land, trees, buildings, and servitudes.

immune best takes from, not to. E.g., "The fact that Hale viewed husbands as immune from rape prosecution is not surprising." Susan Estrich, Real Rape 73 (1987)./ "Executive officers and other fellow employees of the injured employee are similarly immune to [read from] third-party demands." Still, to is acceptable, and so is against.

immunity; impunity. In legal contexts, immunity is the broader term because it relates to any type of exemption from a liability, service, or duty. Impunity, by contrast, refers merely to an exemption from punishment. E.g., "[I]f the pendency of an administrative petition conferred immunity from both civil forfeiture and criminal liability, a handler could violate the Act with impunity . . . ." U.S. v. Riverbend Farms, Inc., 847 F.2d 553, 557 (9th Cir. 1988).

immunize = to render immune from or insusceptible to poison or infection (OED). By extension it means "to protect (from something bad)." The sense of some contagion or danger is an important element of the word in figurative as well as literal senses: "The Court concluded that the proprietary position of the state did not immunize it from the Fourteenth Amendment." (The Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is generally seen as a good thing, not a bad one.)

Through HYPALLAGE, it is often said not that the witness is immunized against the effects of his or her testimony, but that the testimony is immunized—e.g.: "Yesterday, the high court refused to hear arguments that Mrs. Helmsley is entitled to a pre-trial hearing to determine if her indictment is based on immunized testimony from an earlier grand jury." Wall St. J., 16 May 1989, at B7.

impact, n., is not generally understood to be a count noun. "It is apparent that the ICC found Steere's 'melodramatic' list of adverse impacts upon [better: adverse effects on] the motor carrier industry unpersuasive." This use of the noun impact is an extension of the verbal use disapproved at impact, v.i. & v.t. See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

impact, v.i. & v.t. Impact has traditionally been only a noun. In recent years, however, it has undergone a semantic shift that has allowed it to act as a verb. Thus uses such as, "Five states have adopted plain English laws, but only New Jersey's law severely impacts upon lawyers in their private practice," have become widespread (and also widely condemned by stylists). E.g., "The termination of a tenured public schoolteacher adversely impacts on the teacher's personal and professional standing in both the educational community and the greater societal community."/ "The recently filed pro se application of Rumbaugh dramatically impacts on the issue before us."/ "The city argues that any step in the process that impacts adversely on black applicants is job-related and essential to the operation of the police department."

These uses of the word would be applauded if impact were performing any function not as ably performed by affect or influence. If affect as a verb is not sufficiently straightforward in context, then the careful writer might have recourse to have an impact on, which, though longer, to many is unquestionably preferable to the jarring impact of impacts upon. Impact is best reserved as a noun form.

Impact has also been used as a transitive verb, but the direct object does not make the verb any more acceptable. E.g., "Petitioner maintains that the commission must adhere to the rulemaking requirements of the APA when it conclusively affects and substantially impacts [better: redefines] pre-existing rights with a retroactive rule that has the force of law." Nor should the verb appear as a transitive verb in the passive voice—e.g.: "There was no evidence that, had he joined the medical staff, patient care would have been negatively impacted [better: affected]." See NOUNS AS VERBS

imparl, v.i.; imparlance, n. In England, the practice of imparling (= obtaining leave of court to adjourn proceedings so that the parties can try to settle the case) was abolished in 1853. Historians occasionally discuss the practice—e.g.: "Instead of putting up a defence Brown asks for 'leave to imparl'—that is, he asks the court for an adjournment whilst he talks the matter over with Jones in the hope of reaching a settlement, and he and Jones leave court to have their imparlance." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 122 (1961).

The terms imparl and its corresponding noun, imparlance, now appear more frequently in AmE than in BrE. But even in AmE, the terms are rare enough to be properly classifiable as ARCHAISMS—e.g.: "Whereupon Judge Blount held his decision in abeyance for three hours and directed parties and counsel to imparl [read discuss settlement] during the interim and attempt 'to clear the matter up.'" Sutton v. Figgatt, 185 S.E.2d 97, 98 (N.C. 1971)./ "An imparlance [read A settlement conference] followed and has been held under my supervision, in accordance with the usual regular procedure applicable to pre-trials." Martinez v. 348 East 104 Street Corp., 300 N.Y.S.2d 992, 993 (Sup. Ct. 1969).

impartable; impartible. These are two different words. Impartable = capable of being made known or granted (i.e., of being "imparted"). Impartible = indivisible. The latter word is chiefly legal, used primarily in describing estates <the question is whether the estate is partible or impartible>. See -ABLE (A). impassible; impassable. Impassible = incapable of feeling or suffering. Impassable = not capable of being passed. See -ABLE (A). Cf. passable.

impeach = (1) to charge a public official with a crime in office and to constitute a legal tribunal to adjudge whether the official should be removed; esp., in the U.K., to try before the House of Lords at the instance of the House of Commons, and, in the U.S., to try before the Senate at the instance of the House of Representatives <Richard Nixon resigned to avoid being impeached>; (2) to discredit the veracity of (a witness) <counsel thoroughly impeached the witness on cross-examination>; (3) to challenge the authenticity or accuracy of (a document); or (4) in Scotland, to set up the defense, in a criminal case, that another named person committed the crime charged. In sense (1), impeach means, not "to remove from office," but "to bring a charge or accusation

impecunious (= poor; penniless) is sometimes misused as if it meant "hapless," as when someone refers to an impecunious associate who is forced by a partner to sign pleadings.

impedient impediment; hindering impediment. Impedient = that impedes; obstructive. Thus impedient impediment is the most elementary type of REDUNDANCY. Yet it has acquired a specific legal meaning: "some fact that bars a marriage if known but that does not void the marriage after the ceremony." It is also called hindering impediment, which is just as redundant, albeit in a less obtrusive way.

impediment. See impedient impediment.

impel. For the difference between this word and compel, see the entry under that word. Impel to [+ noun phrase] is a construction not available with compel. E.g., "In the interest of the public good this is a hardness to be endured courageously if not cheerfully by the man whose ideals impel him to such a course."

impeller; impellor. The former spelling is preferred.

imperative. See directory.

imperfect, adj. In Roman law and in some modern writings, this word is given a curious sense. An imperfect statute is one that prohibits, but does not render void, an objectionable transaction; it provides a penalty for disobedience without depriving a violative transaction of its legal effect.

imperial; imperious. Deriving from the same root (L. imper- "power over a family, region, or state"), these words have been differentiated by their suffixes. Imperial = of or belonging to an emperor or empire. Imperious = overbearing, supercilious, tyrannical.

Additionally, imperious = urgent, absolute, imperative. E.g., "Can we adopt that construction, unless the words imperiously require it, which would impute to the framers of that instrument . . . the intention of impeding their exercise by withholding a choice of means?" McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 408 (1819) (per Marshall, C. J.)./ "Because taxes are the life-blood of government, and their prompt and certain availability an imperious need, Congress has created a formidable arsenal of collection tools."

imperium (= supreme authority) forms the pl. imperia. The word appears frequently in discussions of Roman law, but also in modern contexts—e.g.: "The function was so well performed that not even the monumental indiscretion of the Dred Scott decision could quite destroy the judicial imperium." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 85 (1960).

impermissible. So spelled. See -ABLE.

IMPERSONAL "IT." See EXPLETIVES.

impersonation; personation. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

impersuadable; impersuasible. See persuadable.

impertinence in nonlegal contexts is taken to mean "presumptuous or forward rudeness of behavior or speech, esp. to a superior; insolence" (OED). This sense originated as a colloquialism. In legal contexts, the original sense of the term is retained: "the fact or character of not pertaining to the matter at hand; lack of pertinence; irrelevance." See impertinent & pertinence.

impertinent does not, in most legal contexts, have its ordinary meaning, "saucy, impudent." Rather, it means "not pertinent or relevant." E.g., "[T]he court may order stricken from any pleading any insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f). Lawyers should beware in their pleadings of making impertinent statements of either kind. See impertinence.

impervious; imperviable. Impervious = not allowing something to pass through; not open to <some people are impervious to reason>. The word should be avoided in the sense "not affected by" <he was impervious to her screams for help> <expert-witnesses impervious to harsh cross-examination>. Imperviable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

impetration, in the sense "the obtaining (of a writ)," is an obsolescent LEGALISM—e.g.: "The jury allowed interest only from date of demand, which they fixed as the impetration [read issuance] of the writ, August 21, 1957, at the figure of $350." Peyton v. Margiotti, 156 A.2d 865, 869 (Pa. 1959)./ "Thus, the rule developed that a plaintiff could re-issue the writ (i.e., file the alias) within the statutory period beginning from the impetration (issuance) of the unserved writ." Anderson v.

Bernhard Realty Sales Co., 329 A.2d 852, 858 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1974).

In its literary sense, impetration (= an urgent entreaty) is a FORMAL WORD—e.g.: "Though plaintiff's impetration regarding its support of the war effort reflects a commendable attitude, the plaintiff in Teutsch was no less well motivated." Kraemer Mills, Inc. v. U.S., 319 F.2d 535, 539 (Ct. Cl. 1963).

impignorate = to mortgage, pledge, or pawn. Any of these more specific, simpler terms should be used rather than this rare, pedantic LATINISM. Pignorate is another form of the same word.

impinge; infringe. Impinge is used intransitively only; it is followed by on or upon <they impinged on the voter's rights>. Infringe, by contrast, may be either transitive or intransitive <to infringe someone's rights> <to infringe on someone's rights>.

Though impinge and infringe are often used as if they were interchangeable, we might keep in mind the following connotations: impinge = (lit.) to strike or dash upon something else, whereas infringe = to break in (damage, violate, or weaken).

Impinge should not be used without an object to impinge upon, as here: "These policies also impinge [on what or whom?] when we consider the potential for their abuse." The writer of that sentence should have supplied the object. See infringe.

implead; emplead. The former spelling is standard. See plead & EN-.

impleader is recorded in the OED only as an agent noun (meaning "one who impleads"), but the word has not been used in that way since the early 18th century. Today it means "a procedure by which a third party is brought into a lawsuit, usu. through a defendant's third-party action." See -ER (B).

implement, v.t., is a VOGUE WORD beloved by jargonmongers, in whose language policies are implemented. Carry out is usually better, and certainly less vague.

implementer; implementor. The former spelling is preferred.

implicate — (1) to bring into play; to involve in its nature or meaning, or as a consequence <forcible searching implicates a constitutionally protected interest>; (2) to involve (a person) in a charge or crime <each party, striving to implicate the other in this heinous deed>.

implication is the noun corresponding to both implicate and imply. Thus it means (1) "the action of implicating, or involving, entangling, or entwining" <Smith's implication of Jones in the crime>; (2) "the action of implying; the fact of being implied or involved" <by necessary implication>; or (3) "that which is implied or involved" <implications of wrongdoing>.

Legal implication—an extension of sense (2)—occurs when one statement is treated under the law as including another (regardless of what the speaker or writer intended). Contracts, for example, often contain terms implied by law, though the parties never contemplated them.

implicit, meaning "implied," has come to be misused in the sense "complete, unmitigated" <I have implicit trust in her> <I trust her implicitly>. The OED labels this usage both erroneous and obsolete; with its resurgence in recent years, one can no longer call it obsolete but can confidently call it erroneous. E.g., "[D]efendant testified that he was plaintiff's employee and friend and had implicit [read complete or unqualified] trust in and loyalty to plaintiff." Scafidi v. Johnson, 409 So. 2d 316, 317 (La. Ct. App. 1981)./ "Solicitors take counsel's opinion on difficult questions, and usually rely upon the resulting opinion implicitly [read completely or without qualification or unquestioningly] . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 29 (1983). See impliedly.

implied; express. These adjectives are correlative. Expressed is sometimes incorrectly contrasted with implied. See express(ed).

implied contract; quasi-contract. "[I]f a lawyer writes: 'The proper meaning of implied contract is contract implied in fact, not quasi-contract,' he does not express what is now the invariable usage of lawyers . . . ." Glanville Williams, Language and the Law, 61 Law Q. Rev. 384, 385 (1945). The terms implied contract and quasi-contract are now generally considered synonymous in denoting a contract not created by express words but inferred by a court from the conduct of the parties, from some special relationship between them, or because one of them has been unjustly enriched.

Formerly, implied contract was limited in use to a contract inferred by the courts by reason of the conduct of the parties or of a special relationship between them (implied in fact), and quasi-contract was used of an equitable remedy (also termed indebitatis assumpsit) imposed by courts when one party was unjustly enriched to the detriment of the other (implied in law). Some writers—including Scottish lawyers—continue to observe this distinction.

Implied contract is a phrase that is best avoided, however, because it "has given rise to great confusion in the law." 1 Samuel Williston & W.H.E. Jaeger, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 3, at 9 (3d ed. 1957). The confusion arises precisely because implied contract carries the two senses noted above, namely, both quasi-contract and implied-in-fact contract (= a mutual agreement and intent to promise without any expression in words). See implied in fact & quasi-contract.

implied in fact; implied in law. The DIFFERENTIATION between these terms is sometimes muddled. Implied in fact = inferable from the facts of a case. Implied in law = imposed by operation of law, and not because of any inferences that can be drawn about the facts of a case. E.g., "Numerous decisions have held that this waiver of sovereign immunity is limited to express contracts and contracts implied in fact and does not extend to contracts implied in law or founded upon equitable principles." See implied contract.

impliedly; implicitly. Though neither form is strictly incorrect, impliedly is awkward and characteristic of LEGALESE. Fowler wrote merely that "impliedly is a bad form" (MEU1 260). Though almost unknown to nonlawyers, it is a favorite of lawyers. Impliedly is old, dating in the OED from ca. 1400. Nevertheless, implicitly is almost always an improvement: "Because the quantity of court work influences quality, judicial administrators have at least impliedly [read implicitly] focused on the quality of judicial output."/ "When a person adopts the profession of law, and assumes to exercise its duties in behalf of another, for hire and reward, he impliedly [read implicitly] represents that he possesses the requisite knowledge and skill to properly conduct the matter for which he is engaged."/ "An effective argument might be made that the federal government impliedly [read implicitly] licenses an enemy alien to succeed to land by intestate succession or by will."/ "These decisions impliedly [read implicitly] hold that searches for contraband at checkpoints that are the functional equivalent of a berder need not be preceded by any form of cause or suspicion."

Used on both sides of the Atlantic, impliedly is a graceless LEGALISM with virtually no advantages over implicitly, which is much to be preferred. Still, implied might be thought to be more concise and direct than implicit. Some authorities strain to differentiate the two, but such attempts are futile. See implicit.

implied warranty of merchantability; implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Legal systems commonly insert a provision into some contracts—particularly those for the sale or supply of consumer goods—warranting that goods supplied under the contract will measure up to a prescribed standard. An implied warranty of merchantability, in most jurisdictions, means that the goods (a) pass as described without objection in the trade; (b) are fit for the ordinary uses to which the goods are put; (c) are adequately packaged and labeled; and (d) conform to the factual statements made on the packaging.

An implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose is more specific: if the manufacturer, distributor, or retailer has reason to know a particular use to which the goods are to be put, and the buyer relies on the skill and judgment of the seller in selecting the goods, then the seller implicitly warrants that the goods are fit for that purpose.

imply. A. Uses and Misuses of Legal Senses. Anglo-American judges, who continually evaluate facts, often use the phrase by implication (= by what is implied, though not formally expressed, by natural inference), along with its various cognates. Judges (by implication) draw "natural inferences" and thereby decide that something or other was, in the circumstances, "implied." Through the process of HYPALLAGE—a semantic shift by which the attributes of the true subject are transferred to another subject—the word imply has come to be used in reference to what the judges do, as opposed to the circumstances. This specialized use of imply runs counter to popular lay use and is not adequately treated in English-language dictionaries.

Specifically, the word imply often means "(of a court) to impute or impose on equitable or legal grounds." An implied contract is not always one implied from the facts of the case, but may be one implied by the court, i.e., imposed by the judge or judges as a result of their inferences.

In using imply in this way, courts are said to find a doctrinally posited fact (a condition, restriction, remedy, right of action, or the like) that controls a judicial decision. Thus:

- "[I]t would be more literally accurate to acknowledge that . . . the court implies the conditions from reasons of equity." Sussiwein v. Penn- sylvania Steel Co., 184 F. 102, 106 (C.C.D.N.Y. 1910).

- "This court cannot, upon some supposed hardship, defeat an estate by implying a condition which the grantor has not expressed, nor in the least intimated by the language of his conveyance." Brown v. State, 5 Colo. 496, 504 (1881).
- "The difficulty with the arguments seeking to imply Mary Silva's survival of Joseph as a condition is that they would result in holding that because it is express that Joseph must survive until the period of distribution to take an inheritable interest, a similar contingency should be implied as to Mary." In re Estate of Ferry, 361 P.2d 900, 904 (Cal. 1961) (en banc).
- "Judicial willingness to imply new remedies in areas governed by federal law has been expressed in a number of ways." S.E.C. v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co., 312 F. Supp. 77, 91 (S.D.N.Y. 1970).
- "[I]n my view, the Members of Congress merely assumed that the federal courts would follow the ancient maxim 'ubi jus, ibi remedium' and imply a private right of action." California v. Sierra Club, 451 U.S. 287, 300 (1981) (Stevens, J., concurring). See MAXIMS.

When put in the passive voice, imply may be especially confusing, because the person who does the implying is left unclear. The user of any unabridged English-language dictionary would either find it hard to divine precisely what imply means, or deduce an incorrect meaning: "[T]he remaining provisions of the Insurance Law would lack substance if no private right of action were implied." Corcoran v. Frank B. Hall & Co., 545 N.Y.S.2d 278, 284 (App. Div. 1989). In that sentence, the passive voice masks the subject. The writer apparently means to say that a court would allow such a cause of action: thus the court would imply a right of action, i.e., impose it on equitable or legal grounds.

This special legal sense is most keenly demonstrated when imply is coupled with impute, as here: "When deciding the shares, we look to their [the husband's and the wife's] respective contributions and we see what trust is to be implied or imputed to them." Cracknell v. Cracknell, [1971] 3 All E.R. 552, 554.

Often one could actually read impute in place of imply and have the same sense (read impute to for imply on): "Under special circumstances the Court may imply knowledge on the speaker, such as the inventor of a machine, 'who must be fully informed as to [the machine's] good and bad qualities.'" Brickell v. Collins, 262 S.E.2d 387, 390 (N.C. Ct. App. 1980).

In some contexts, imply seems to take on a slightly different sense, "to read into (a document)," as here: "[O]ne has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment . . . . Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used." Cape Brandy Syndicate v. I.R.C., [1921] 1 K.B. 64, 71. But such uses comport with the general sense here outlined, since "reading in" provisions has the same effect as "imputing" them.

The lawyer's imply has directly encroached on the word infer. Whereas nonlawyers frequently use infer for imply, lawyers and judges conflate the two in the opposite direction, by using imply for infer. In analyzing the facts of a case, judges will imply one fact from certain others. (From is a telling preposition.) Nonlawyers believe they must be inferring an additional fact from those already known; if contractual terms are implied, they must surely be implied by the words or circumstances of the contract and not by the judges.

Perhaps using this reasoning, some legal writers have recoiled from imply and have resorted instead to infer. E.g., "Apart from the difficulty of inferring a contract where none has been made, no agreement between husband and wife for future separation can be recognized." Pettitt v. Pettitt, [1970] A.C. 777, 811 (H.L.)./ "When a party voluntarily accepts a valuable service or benefit, having option to accept or reject it, the Court may infer a promise to pay." Lewis v. Holy Spirit Ass'n, 589 F. Supp. 10, 13 (D. Mass. 1983). In the following sentence, in which the court writes imply or infer from, the word imply adds nothing, unless by the circumstances (i.e., implicit in the circumstances) is to be understood, and or is to be read as and: "Rather, the crucial question is when can a waiver of rights be implied or inferred from the actions and words of the person interrogated." McDonald v. Lucas, 677 F.2d 518, 520 (5th Cir. 1982).

In the following sentences, infer might have served better than imply. One would be tempted to call these misuses, were some specimens not so ancient: "[T]here is nothing averred from which the court can imply that those conditions were performed." Cutting v. Myers, 6 F. Cas. 1081, 1082 (C.C.D. Pa. 1818) (No. 3,520)./ "The requirements of the rule are met if such an intention may be clearly implied from the language, the purposes of the agreement, and all the surrounding facts and circumstances." Salamy v. New York Cent. Sys., 146 N.Y.S.2d 814, 817 (App. Div. 1955). Note that the facts here posited (performance of a condition, intention) are of a lower level of abstraction than those in the examples given at the outset of this paper. Using imply with low-level abstractions, as opposed to doctrinally posited facts, is comparatively uncommon in modern legal usage.

Adding still more color to this CHAMELEON-HUED WORD in legal contexts is the ordinary nonlegal sense: "We do not mean to imply that where joint ownership is set up in conformity with the statutory provisions, a court of equity is thereby foreclosed from looking behind the form of the transaction and determining questions of real and beneficial interest as between the parties." Frey v. Wubbena, 185 N.E.2d 850, 855 (Ill. 1962)./ "There is nothing in the former decision [that] would imply that the 'sole discretion' vested in and exercised by the trustees in this case is beyond court review." In re Ferrall's Estate, 258 P.2d 1009, 1013 (Cal. 1953) (en banc).

It is not wholly surprising that the legal uses of imply have not found a place in English-language dictionaries. Common in American and British law alike, the uses here outlined have not yet spread from legal to nonlegal contexts—and may never do so. Moreover, because lexicographic reading programs seldom glean citations from legal texts, lexicographers often overlook linguistic innovation in law. See Bryan A. Garner, "The Missing Common Law Words," in The State of the Language 234–45 (Christopher Ricks & Leonard Michaels eds. 1990).

B. The Nonlegal Blunder. Courts are not immune from the general misusage of infer for imply: "The mere fact that Avondale's activities and conduct may have occurred ashore does not infer [read imply, or suggest] that Louisiana law would automatically apply."/ "The circuit court's remanding the case inferred [read implied], in the district court's view, that plaintiff's motion for new trial should be favorably considered."/ "We find no order, ruling, or stipulation stating or inferring [read implying] that the magistrate was bound by any prior evidentiary rulings of the district judge." See infer.

importunacy. See importunity.

importune is a verb meaning "to beg or beseech; entreat." It is also a NEEDLESS VARIANT for the adjective importunate (= troublesomely urgent), and an obsolete variant of inopportune (= inconvenient, untimely). The intended meaning in the following sentence is not clear, but perhaps inopportune would have been the right word: "Although sanctions against judges may be leveled importunely [read inopportunely? inappropriately?], the interests of the administration of justice demand that the error be on that side rather than on the side of retaining without forfeiture a judge whose effectiveness is damaged in the public view."

impossibility; frustration. In AmE, writers on the law of contract began using frustration instead of impossibility shortly after the turn of the 20th century. But as a would-be TERM OF ART, "frustration never acquired much precision or clarity of meaning; most of the time it was used as a sort of loose synonym for . . . impossibility." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 80–81 (1974). Some writers take the view that this change in terminology heralded a change in meaning: that it was "intended to widen the scope of the doctrine of discharge by supervening events." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 779–80 (8th ed. 1991). English writers such as Treitel resist the terminological and the corresponding doctrinal change.

Some writers distinguish between legal impossibility (e.g., having two spouses simultaneously) and physical impossibility (e.g., a person's leaping unaided across the Grand Canyon). See mistake (B).

impostor; imposter. In most states this word, as it appears in the heading of § 3-405 of the Uniform Commercial Code, is spelled impostor. In other states, it is spelled imposter. The -or spelling is preferred. See -ER (A).

impotence; impotency. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT Impotence in the modern literal sense should be used only in reference to men, a fact not recognized by the writer of this sentence: "The statute authorizes suit to annul a marriage if, at the time of the marriage, either party was permanently impotent for physical or mental reasons." Black's notes that impotence is "properly used of the male; but it has also been used synonymously with sterility." Any such use in modern contexts is an abuse of the term. The corresponding affliction for women, sometimes alleged to be spurious, is frigidity. See potence.

Impotence for impetus is a MALAPROPISM worthy of Mrs. Malaprop, Mistress Quickly, or Archie Bunker. E.g., "The main impotence [read impetus] for recruiting someone who has published is to ensure that he is used to long hours." Impetus means "force, impulse."

impoverishment. Only theoretically—not idiomatically—is impoverishment an antonym of enrichment. Whereas enrich means "to make rich or richer," impoverish means "to make poor; to reduce to indigency." E.g., "Like many a testator, who with specific devise and bequest has unwittingly impoverished the members of his family after his death, the settlor impoverished himself when he conveyed all his property in trust, and divested himself of the only means of livelihood he had." Finding a ten-dollar bill enriches one to some extent; but, for most, losing a ten-dollar bill would not constitute impoverishment.

In the following sentence, impoverishment is incorrectly made the correlative of the legal phrase unjust enrichment: "Under Louisiana law, recovery may be had for unjust enrichment only if the plaintiff proves the amount of his impoverishment [read damages?] and that the defendant was enriched to that extent." See unjust enrichment.

impractical; unpractical. Fowler had a point in believing that "the constant confusion between practicable and practical is a special reason for making use of im- and un- to add to the difference in the negatives" (MEU1 260), but unpractical has not been idiomatically accepted in the U.S. It is not included in some American dictionaries, and even in the (British) COD the entry under impractical is longer than under unpractical. To a few British stalwarts, it may be worth keeping up the fight. For the distinction between practical and practicable, see practical.

imprescriptible; imprescribable. The former is the preferred form for this word, meaning "not subject to being extinguished by lapse of time under the rules of prescription; that cannot in any circumstances be legally taken away or abandoned" (OED). E.g., "[O]ne of the most sacred imprescriptible rights of man, is violated." The Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36, 110 (1872) (Field, J., dissenting). It is worth warning that "imprescriptible is one of the words that are often used without a clear conception of their meaning" (MEU1 261). It may be overstating the case, however, to say that the word is often used.

impress, n.; impressment; impression; impressure. In the legal idiom, constructive trusts are impressed by courts upon property obtained by fraud, or the obtaining of which results in unjust enrichment. (See impress, v.t.) The question remains what to call the act of impressing a constructive trust. The answer is impressment: "In this instance it is doubtful that any property would have become available for trust impressment."

Impress, n., = a characteristic mark or quality. E.g., "A fixed contract right acquired before marriage was property the character of which takes its impress from the date of the contract." Impression = (1) the impressing (of a mark); (2) the mark impressed; (3) an effect produced on the mind or feelings; (4) a notion (COD). Impressure is an archaic NEEDLESS VARIANT of impression.

impress, v.t. This verb is used of a court's imposition of a constructive trust on equitable grounds. For an explanation of characteristic phraseology, see impress, n. Following are examples of each of the two legal idioms with this verb: "In many cases equity impresses a trust upon money or property secured by fraud." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 494 (1930)./ "To determine whether its assets were impressed with a trust, Pioneer filed an action for declaratory relief against a member of the society." See OBJECT-SHUFFLING.

impressible; impressable. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

impression; impressment; impressure. See impress, n.

imprimatur(a). The preferred form for ordinary purposes is imprimatur (/im-prim-a-tər/ or /im-pri-mah-tər/), meaning literally "let it be printed, from the formula used in the Roman Catholic Church by an official licenser, approving a work to be printed." This term (now meaning "commendatory license or sanction") is construed with the preposition on. E.g., "The trial judge placed his imprimatur on a defendant's theory."/ "It is the cause element that confers the imprimatur of constitutionality on the right."/ "A ruling admitting evidence in a criminal trial has the necessary effect of legitimizing the conduct that produced the evidence, while an application of the exclusionary rule withholds the constitutional imprimatur." imprisonable crime is a typical example of HYPALLAGE, the perpetrator and not the crime being what is truly imprisonable. Glanville Williams calls imprisonable "[p]olice jargon, but a convenient word." Textbook of Criminal Law 20 n.17 (1978).

improve (= to develop, as land) is a LEGALISM that is generally understandable to most nonlawyers. E.g., "The appellant negotiated for the purchase of an improved parcel of land in Baltimore." If confusion occurs, it is likely to result from the odd fact that, in lawyers' parlance, an improvement to land—say, a ramshackle house—may actually lessen the land's value.

improvident is a FORMAL WORD meaning "heedless, unwary, not circumspect." Judges use the word far more than other writers. E.g., "The chancellor ruled that Gilden's contract was a mere offer until approved by him, and that the trustee acted hastily, with inexperience, and improvidently."/ "It is not unreasonable to expect a state's highest legal officer to know the state's law and to bring to this Court's attention the rules of state law that might demonstrate that we granted the writ of certiorari improvidently."

improviser; improvisor; improvisator(e). The usual term for "one who improvises" is improviser. The -or spelling is not preferred. Improvisator is a formal equivalent, and improvisatore is an Italianate literary word meaning "one who composes verse or drama extemporaneously."

imprudent; impudent. Imprudent = rash, indiscreet. Impudent = insolently disrespectful; shamelessly presumptuous.

impugn; oppugn; repugn. Impugn = to challenge, call into question. E.g., "A most unfortunate result is that, to support its holding, the court, despite its disclaimers, impugns the integrity of public school teachers."/ "The ethical standards of the wife's solicitors have never been impugned." (Eng.) The noun is impugnment, q.v.

Impugn does not mean merely "to affect adversely." E.g., "The agreement's economic realignment of the parties did not impugn [read impair] the fact-finding process." In a footnote to this sentence, the court stated that the agreement "did not affect the ability of the court to make accurate findings of fact."

Oppugn and repugn are less frequently encountered than impugn. Oppugn = to controvert or call into question; to fight against. Repugn is an ARCHAISM meaning "to offer opposition or strive against; to affect disagreeably or be repugnant to."

impugnment; impugnation. The latter is an obsolete variant. Here is an example of the standard term: "Appellant contends that the district judge made many errors in his rulings concerning the conduct of the trial and the admissibility of evidence; the impugnment is more than a challenge to specific rulings, however."

impunity. See immunity.

impute (= to ascribe; to regard [usu. something undesirable] as being done, caused, or possessed by [COD]) takes to. E.g., "We are reluctant to impute a different meaning to the term where it has been used without modification, absent a compelling and certain impetus."/ "Appellee also failed to establish at trial that Agnes assigned the claim against Aetna to it, and indeed no attempt to show an assignment was made at trial; accordingly, we will not impute [to Agnes] such an assignment."

We see over and over again the growing idiomatic bias in favor of imputing undesirable things or qualities: "If the malice essential to support an action for libel can be found under such circumstances, it must be imputed. Malice in law is such as the law infers to exist without just or lawful excuse. The law will impute malice where a defamatory publication is made without sufficient cause or excuse." (See imply.)/ "We ought not to impute to others instincts contrary to our own."/ "Lafourche would be negligent only by virtue of an imputation of the negligence of another, in this case of its employee Savoie."

IN-. See EN- & NEGATIVES (C).

in; into. In denotes position, into movement—e.g.: "But to conclude that the motorist has actually agreed to be sued and has thus waived his federal venue rights is surely to move in [read into] the world of Alice in Wonderland." (Frankfurter, J.)

inadmissible; inadmissable. The former spelling is correct. See -ABLE (A). See admissible.

inadvertence; inadvertency. The DIFFERENTIATION between these terms should be carefully observed. Inadvertence – a fault resulting from not paying attention; a mistake caused by an oversight. E.g., "We cannot conclude that the district court abused its discretion in taking into account the lulling of Judge Bagley even though there is no suggestion that it was other than the product of oversight or inadvertence." Carbalan v. Vaughn, 760 F.2d 662, 665 (5th Cir. 1985). Inadvertency = the quality or state of being inadvertent <the inadvertency of the act is not disputed>.

Inadvertancy and inadvertance are common misspellings.

inalienable; unalienable. The former, though not Jefferson's choice in the Declaration of Independence, is slightly better formed (with a Latinate prefix as well as suffix). E.g., "The New York statutes make the interest of the beneficiary of a trust to receive the income from realty or personalty inalienable; most trusts thus become indestructible." Some writers have recently revived unalienable. See NEGATIVES (B).

in all things. This phrase is LEGALESE commonly found in court papers addressing motions—e.g.: "Defendant's motion should be in all things denied." Generally it adds nothing.

in any event. See at all events.

inapt. Though many English-language dictionaries would suggest that inapt is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of unapt (and perhaps also of inept), it occurs far more frequently in legal writing than unapt, which itself ought to be branded as unnecessary.

inasmuch as, in as much as; insofar as, in so far as. In modern AmE usage, the standard spelling of each group is inasmuch as and insofar as, both single words except for the final element. In modern BrE, usage is split: inasmuch as is standard and the expression in so far as is preferred as four separate words.

However the phrase is spelled, though, inasmuch as is almost always inferior to because or since. See insofar as.

inaugural, n.; inauguration. The ceremony for a president entering office is an inauguration; the speech that the new president makes on this occasion is the inaugural address, sometimes shortened to inaugural.

inaugurate is a FORMAL WORD, some might say pompous, for begin or start, being more formal even than commence, q.v. Sometimes another term, such as open or establish, is the desired substitute. E.g., "Thirteen years after Brown II, the only step that the Tennessee defendants had taken toward dismantling the dual system of public higher education was inauguration of [read setting up or starting] an open admissions policy." Little has changed since Richard Grant White wrote that inaugurate "is a word [that] might better be eschewed by all those who do not wish to talk high-flying nonsense . . . ." Words and Their Uses, Past and Present 128 (2d ed. 1872).

in back of. See back of.

in being; in esse. John Chipman Gray's classic formulation of the Rule Against Perpetuities states: "No interest is good unless it must vest, if at all, not later than 21 years after some life in being at the creation of the trust." Through this formulation, in being has become a TERM OF ART used commonly in discussions of wills and trusts. "On the date of Tilley's death, Lathan and Barrett and one great-grandchild were in being."/ "At the time of executing the will, the testator had several grandchildren in being."

In esse is a LATINISM equivalent to in being. Except as a correlative of in posse (= in possibility, but not in actual existence), in esse has no justification in place of the Anglo-Saxon phrase: "These words were not used in reference to children who possibly may—but possibly may not—ever be in esse [read in being], and certainly not to those of whose existence, of course, the testator would have no knowledge." See esse & in esse.

in between. Omit in when the phrase is followed by one or more objects—e.g.: "Ms. Smithweck sat in between [read between] Ms. Esquenazi and Mr. Sostek."

in brief is understood by most readers as meaning "briefly." In American legal writing, however, it sometimes means "in a brief addressed to a court," as here: "[Justice Jackson] meant that an oral argument requires an intense rethinking of your whole case, not in your terms already used in brief, but in terms of the questions likely to occur to the judges." George D. Gibson, Elements of Legal Style, 22 Bus. Law. 547, 555 (1967).

Inc. Unless otherwise required by syntax, a comma need not follow this abbreviation—e.g.: "Pedernales, Inc. was founded in 1994."

in camera = in the chamber; privately. Though this phrase usually refers to a judge's chambers, it may also refer to a courtroom from which all spectators are excluded. Thus, one cannot be sure where the examination took place in a sentence such as the following: "The documents were examined by the judge in camera." The phrase should not be used in reference to lawyers' offices—e.g.: "Usually, neither side needs to depose its own witnesses because its witnesses' information is generally obtained cooperatively in camera [read in private]." Peter M. Panken, The Art of Deposing in Employment Litigation, 36 Pract. Law. 23, 24 (June 1990).

The phrase may be an adverb that follows the verb it modifies—e.g.: "This court has reviewed in camera the portions of the memorandum that the IRS seeks to withhold." The phrase may also serve as an adjective that precedes the noun it modifies—e.g.: "The government invoked a 'deliberative processes' privilege for documents that it had turned over to the district court for in camera review."/ "Defense counsel conceded that he would be bound by the judge's decision after an in camera examination of the prosecution's reasons for refusal of the charge." Some writers would hyphenate the PHRASAL ADJECTIVE in the two immediately preceding examples.

The phrase should be used of inspections, but not, through HYPALLAGE, of documents inspected. E.g., "Plaintiff then filed a motion seeking the right to inspection of the in camera documents [read of the documents that the court had examined in camera]."

In chambers is sometimes used rather than in camera in citing an opinion by a single judge. For example, Lenhard v. Wolff, 444 U.S. 1301 (1979) (in-chambers opinion of Rehnquist, J.). Cf. open court, in.

incapable is usu. applied to persons in modern nonlegal contexts, in the sense "unable, unfit." In law it retains its broader use in reference to things as well as to persons. E.g., "In certain cases, no doubt, perhaps many cases, a rule [that] a statute attempts to lay down may be incapable of practical application till it has been explained by a judge or judges . . . ." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 23 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). In such a context, incapable means "not allowing or admitting of." See capable of.

incapacitate = to deprive of legal capacity. E.g., "The Uniform Probate Code is applied to all subject matter relating to the estates of decedents, including protection of minors and incapacitated persons." Incapacify is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. See capacitate.

incapacitation; incapacity. These words should be distinguished as follows: incapacitation = the action of incapacitating or rendering incapable; incapacity = lack of ability in some legal respect. See capacity.

in case is generally much inferior to if. See case (A).

in cases in which is usually verbose for when or whenever. See case (A).

inception; incipiency. Both words mean "beginning, commencement, initiation." The difference is that inception refers to the action or process of beginning, whereas incipiency refers to the fact or state of having begun. Here the two words are used merely in an attempt at INELEGANT VARIATION: "That pattern fixes the character of title at the time of its inception or acquisition. It depends on the existence or nonexistence of the marriage at the time of the incipiency [read inception] of the right in virtue of which the title is finally extended." Inception is far more commonly the appropriate word.

incest, denoting a statutory as opposed to a common-law crime, has been criticized for having an unduly restricted sense. In most English-speaking jurisdictions, a man commits incest by having sexual intercourse with a female he knows to be his granddaughter, daughter, sister, or mother; a woman (over the age of 16) commits incest by having sexual intercourse with her grandfather, father, brother, or son. The definitions are limited to sexual intercourse; i.e., oral and anal sex are excluded. A prominent English writer suggests reforming the law: "Surely the offence of incest should cover all cases of vaginal or anal penetration or penetration involving the penis." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 316 (1991).

in chief (= principal, as opposed to collateral or incidental) is legal JARGON denoting the part of a trial, or of a witness's testimony, in which the main body of evidence is presented. "Witnesses examined in open court must be first examined in chief, then cross-examined, and then re-examined." Cf. case-in-chief & tenant-in-chief.

inchoate, pronounced /in-koh-ət/ in AmE and /in-koh-ət/ in BrE, means "just begun, not yet fully developed." The prefix is an intensive in-, not a negative or privative in-. (See choate.) The law has found many uses for this word. In criminal law, for example, there are three inchoate offenses: attempt, conspiracy, and incitement. The word also appears in other legal contexts—e.g.: "Nor would common-law dower, giving her an inchoate right during the husband's lifetime, help her, for dower applies only to real estate."/ "In determining whether the officer acted reasonably in such circumstances, we must give due weight not to his inchoate suspicion or 'hunch,' but to the specific reasonable inferences that he is entitled to draw from the facts in light of his experience."

The antonym to inchoate is ordinarily either consummate <her dower becomes consummate> or consummated <they were consummated crimes>.

The word is sometimes a pomposity that usurps the place of an ordinary word. E.g., "Given the summary disposition of these issues, we cannot say at this inchoate [read early] stage that a fact-finder would be precluded from reasonably inferring the existence of a relevant submarket of third-party firms."

inchoate dower. See curtesy.

incidence = occurrence or rate of occurrence <the incidence of syphilis continues to decline>. Using this word as a variant for instance (= case or example) is a mistake: "As subsequent cases will establish, the rationale herein has been rejected in most incidences [read has been rejected in most instances, or better yet, has usually (or almost always) been rejected]." See incidents & instance.

incident, n. A. And instance. An incident is an occurrence or happening; an instance is an example. See instance. Cf. incidence.

B. Meaning "a concomitant." This sense, which originated in the feudal law of England, denotes the idea that a thing may be naturally and inseparably connected with something else that is more important. The usage has remained common in legal contexts, esp. in the context of either property law or judicial power. E.g., "The decedent had the incidents of ownership to the life insurance."/ "Courts of justice as an incident of their jurisdiction have inherent power to appoint guardians ad litem."

For the adjectival use, see incident to.

C. And accident. See accident & EUPHEMISMS

incidentally; incidently. The former means "loosely, casually" or "by the way," and the latter means "so as to be incident; so as to depend on or appertain to something else." The most common mistake with these words is to misuse incidently for incidentally—e.g.: "Section 474, to the extent it prohibits expression at all, does so only inadvertently and incidently [read incidentally]." Regan v. Time, Inc., 468 U.S. 641, 695 (1984) (Stevens, J., concurring in part & dissenting in part). See incident to.

incidentals is elliptical for incidental damages. Cf. consequentials, exemplaries & punitives. See damages.

incidently. See incidentally.

incidents and incidence, q.v., are homophones that may give listeners trouble. See incident.

incident to; incidental to. Though to some extent interchangeable historically, these phrases have undergone a plain DIFFERENTIATION that has gained acceptance among stylists. The former means "closely related to; naturally appearing with"; the latter, "happening by chance and subordinate to some other thing; peripheral." In the following sentence, incident is properly used: "In an action for fraud, exemplary damages are incident to and dependent on the recovery of actual damages." Here incidental is correctly used: "It is clear that testator's plan of accumulation was merely incidental to his primary charitable intention to create a source that would provide continuing income over the 400-year term for the maintenance of Masonic homes."

In the following quotations, incidental is misused for incident, a common blunder: "A half century ago, in that case, we denied damages for wrongful libel of a vessel save when the seizure resulted from bad faith, malice, or gross negligence. Incidental thereto, on the same grounds we denied [read Incident to that denial, we denied on the same grounds] recovery for attorney's fees incurred in obtaining the release of the vessel seized, without differentiating between attorney's fees and other damages."/ "The court held that the search was not incidental to [read incident to] the arrest because it was conducted six hours after the arrest and at a place other than the arrest scene." Incidental to has even had to be construed as meaning incident to, primarily because of slipshod drafting of statutes. See, e.g., U.S. v. Shursen, 649 F.2d 1250, 1257 (8th Cir. 1981).

Sometimes courts are inconsistent in their use of these terms in a single opinion: "Closer in point . . . are cases holding that . . . [a club's] outside profits must be . . . strictly incidental to [read incident to] club activities. . . . Here the rental income was not incident to the operation of the club." U.S. v. Fort Worth Club, 345 F.2d 52, 57 (5th Cir. 1965). See INELEGANT VARIATION.

Incidental is sometimes wrongly used for incident, adj., when the word precedes the noun it modifies: "Their primary objective is not to require the defendant to perform a contract, to carry out a trust, or to undo the effects of a fraud,

incipient; insipient. The former means "beginning, in an initial stage"; the latter is an obsolete word meaning "unwise, foolish." Chapter C of J. Gillis Wetler's Style of Judicial Opinions (1960) is entitled "Arkansas: American Style, and Insipient Transformation." A reading of the first paragraph of that chapter shows that incipient, not insipient, was the intended word. The misuse, especially for its being in such a prominent place, might be characterized as insipient.

inciteful; incitive; incitative; incitatory. What is the adjective meaning "tending to incite"? Most American dictionaries do not list one, and the OED merely records sparse and ancient examples of incitive, incitative, and incitatory—all of which today might be considered NEEDLESS VARIANTS of inciteful. This word is the legal NEOLOGISM that first appeared in mid-20th-century AmE. Today it is fairly common—e.g.:

- "Wall relied upon Enlow's alleged inciteful speech to create probable cause for the arrest." Enlow v. Tishomingo County, 962 F.2d 501, 505 (5th Cir. 1992).
- "Many courts have adopted a rule that 'mere words cannot be sufficient provocation to reduce a murder charge to voluntary manslaughter, no matter how insulting or inciteful.'" State v. Shane, 590 N.E.2d 272, 277 (Ohio 1992).
- "The derogatory and inciteful language in the newsletter used by Union members in reference to the Employees' activities further supports this Court's finding that violence may occur at the 'mass trials.'" Kinney v. International Union of Operating Eng'rs, 786 F. Supp. 1431, 1441 (N.D. Ind. 1992).
- "As the State presumably recognizes, were it to cast the cross burning law as an attempt to regulate only the most inciteful of constitutionally proscribable fighting words, it would commit the same mistake as Minnesota in selecting only certain socially charged words for prosecution." State v. Sheldon, 629 A.2d 753, 761 (Md. Ct. App. 1993).
- "[T]he statute is the product of a legislative intent to cover intentional inciteful acts or conduct aimed at one's opponents as well as one's supporters." Land v. State, 426 S.E.2d 370, 372 (Ga. 1993).
- "Defendant contends . . . that a cross which is functionally and symbolically equivalent to a cross used by the Ku Klux Klan at a private rally is, as a matter of law, sufficiently injurious and inciteful when left unattended as public property as to constitutionally permit a government to prohibit its display." Knight Riders of the Ku Klux Klan v. City of Cincinnati, 863 F. Supp. 587, 589 (S.D. Ohio 1994).

Unfortunately, the word can be confused with its homophone, insightful. See insightful.

incitement; incitation. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

inciter (= one who incites) is so spelled. See perpetrator.

inclimate is a spreading MALAPROPISM for inclement (= unmerciful; stormy). Because inclement weather has become such a common phrase—either a SET PHRASE or a CLICHÉ, depending on whom one asks—many have come to hear the phrase as a redundant comment on the climate as well as the weather: hence the erroneous inclimate weather. E.g., "According to Glascock, the test is used to determine the maximum safe speed at which a vehicle can traverse a curve under the most inclimate [read inclement] highway conditions, that is, with the highway surface being wet." Vervik v. State, 278 So. 2d 530, 535 (La. Ct. App. 1973)./ "He also contends that the Secretary's decision to not postpone the February 28th election date due to inclimate [read inclement] weather was arbitrary and capricious." Donovan v. Westside Local 174, AFL-CIO, 783 F.2d 616, 623 (6th Cir. 1986).

included. See including.

includable; includible; inclusible. Includible is usual in estate-planning texts, and is a main entry in the OED; includable, however, is given primary sanction in W3 and W10 and is now the more prevalent of the two in more general legal contexts. Inclusible is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. See -ABLE (A).

including is sometimes misused for namely. But it should not be used to introduce an exhaustive list, for it implies that the list is only partial. In the words of one federal court, "It is hornbook law that the use of the word including indicates that the specified list . . . is illustrative, not exclusive." Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Auth. v. I.C.C., 645 F.2d 1102, 1112 n.26 (D.C. Cir. 1981). E.g., "Several business-law courses will be offered next year, including [read namely] one this summer and four next year."

Included for including must be a rare error: "The agreement provides that it is an Arizona agreement and that it shall be governed by the laws of the State of Arizona in all matters, included [read including] but not limited to validity, obligation, interpretation, construction, and termination." See including but not limited to.

including but not limited to; including without limitation. In DRAFTING, these cautious phrases are often essential to defeat three canons of construction: inclusio unius est exclusio alterius ("to express one thing is to exclude the other"), noscitur a sociis ("it is known by its associates"), and ejusdem generis ("of the same class or nature"). See inclusio unius est exclusio alterius* & ejusdem generis.

Even though the word including itself means that the list is merely exemplary and not exhaustive, the courts have not invariably so held. So the longer, more explicit variations may be considered necessary by some drafters. Of course, drafters do not help matters when they use these phrases to introduce what is actually intended to be a comprehensive list.

inclusio unius est exclusio alterius; expressio unius est exclusio alterius. These interchangeable maxims of interpretation hold that to include or express one thing implies the exclusion of the other, or of the alternative (L. alterius meaning "of the other two"). For example, a rule that "each citizen is entitled . . . " implies that noncitizens do not share in the entitlement.

inclusive. This word is often helpful in expressing lengths of time. For example, the phrase from November 1 to December 15 inclusive makes clear that both the starting date and the ending date are included; without the word inclusive, the meaning is debatable.

incommensurate; incommensurable. See commensurate.

incomparable. The primary accent falls on the second syllable—hence /in-kom-pə-rə-bəl/, not /in-kəm-par-ə-bəl/. See comparable.

incompetence; incompetency. Some lay authorities have stated that incompetence is the preferred form, but in legal writing a growing distinction exists between the forms. The best advice is to reserve the -cy form to contexts involving sanity or ability to stand trial or to testify, and to use -ce form when referring to less than acceptable levels of ability. E.g., "The various newspaper stories commenting on both appellant's alleged incompetence [read incompetency] to stand trial and a grand jury investigation of the district's operations also fall short of the requirements set forth in Bollow." These two word-forms are favorites of writers who engage in INELEGANT VARIATION; one must be consistent when the sense does not vary. See competence (A).

incompetent is the adjective serving both incompetence and incompetency, q.v. Here it is the adjective for incompetency: "Their testimony, if accepted, clearly shows that Mary was not totally incompetent and at times she was normal and in possession of her mental and physical faculties." And here for incompetence: "The evidence shows that her discharge stemmed from her being generally incompetent at her job: she was unable to type satisfactorily, to add and subtract, and to file in alphabetical order." See competent.

INCOMPLETE SENTENCES. A. Fragments. Grammarians typically define fragment as a part of a sentence punctuated as if it were complete. Usually denoting an error—as opposed to literary license—the term fragment (or frag.) appears frequently in the marginal jottings of high-school and college English teachers. That is to say, some high-school and college students don't know how to write complete sentences. Thus, elementary grammars warn against constructions such as the following one, in which a main clause and a subordinate clause are each written as complete sentences:

> "We usually go to the fair in the evening. Because everything is more glamorous under the lights."
> Ex. fr Philip Gucker, Essential English Grammar 133 (1966).

The fragment might be corrected in any of several ways:

> "We usually go to the fair in the evening because everything is more glamorous under the lights."

> "We usually go to the fair in the evening; everything is more glamorous under the lights."

This type of elementary problem rarely occurs in the writing of lawyers, who generally know enough about writing to be able to construct complete sentences. (The more frequent problem is RUN-ON SENTENCES, which occur when writers punctuate two sentences as if they were one.) Therefore, basic advice on avoiding fragments—"don't write a phrase or dependent clause as if it were a complete sentence"—is of limited utility to legal writers. Further, for reasons discussed in (B), that advice might be misleading.

B. Incomplete Sentences in Informal Writing. Grammarians' definitions of the word sentence range widely. Here is a sampling:

- "A sentence is a group of words containing a subject and a predicate and expressing a complete thought." C. Rexford Davis, Toward Correct English 1 (1936).
- "A complete sentence says something about something." Robert M. Gorrell & Charlton Laird, Modern English Handbook 195 (2d ed. 1956).
- "Sentence . . . [means] a group of words consisting of a finite verb and its subject as well as any complement that may be present and any modifiers that belong to the verb, to the subject, to the complement, or to the entire statement, the whole group of words constituting a grammatically complete statement, i.e., a statement that is clearly not part of a larger structure." Ralph M. Albaugh, English: A Dictionary of Grammar and Structure 170 (1964).
- "A sentence is a combination of words so connected as to express a complete thought: Man is mortal. Is man mortal? How mortal man is!" James G. Fernald, English Grammar Simplified 161 (Cedric Gale ed., 2d ed. 1979).

Given that the word complete appears in each of those definitions, one might surmise—as many writers believe—that it is impossible to write an incomplete sentence and still be within the bounds of good usage.

Yet the more sophisticated grammarians have long qualified the notion of "completeness." The great linguist Otto Jespersen defined sentence as "a (relatively) complete and independent unit of communication . . .—the completeness and independence being shown by its standing alone or its capability of standing alone, i.e. of being uttered by itself." Essentials of English Grammar 106 (1933; repr. 1964). Similarly but more specifically, C.T. Onions defined sentence as a group of words—or sometimes a single word—that makes a statement <I'm a lawyer>, a command <Open the window>, an expression of a wish <Let's go>, a question <How are you?>, or an exclamation <What a verdict!>. Modern English Syntax 1 (B.D.H. Miller, ed., 1971). More recently still, a grammatical dictionary states that a sentence "usually" has a subject and a predicate. Sylvia Chalker & Edmund Weiner, The Oxford Dictionary of English Grammar 358 (1994).

It appears possible, then, to have an "incomplete" sentence—i.e., one in which the subject or the verb is at best implicit. Jespersen called one type "amorphous sentences," noting both that they are "more suitable for the emotional side of human nature" and that it would be impossible to say precisely what is "left out." Essentials at 105, 106. Examples are Yes!/ Goodbye!/ Thanks!/ Nonsense!/ Of course!/ Why all this fuss?/ Hence his financial difficulties! Id. at 105–06.

Sir Ernest Gowers, in fact, classified six common types of "verbless sentences": transitional, afterthought, dramatic climax, comment, pictorial, and aggressive. MEU2 at 674–75. The types that appear in modern legal writing might be classified somewhat differently. As the examples below illustrate, the important quality in each type is that the sentence be short enough that the reader will recognize it as purposely incomplete:

- Transitional: "One other thing. If they're not needed for a month or two, they never complain." James W. McElhaney, How I Write, 4 Scribes J. Legal Writing 39, 41 (1993).
- Afterthought: "It is tempting to set Cardozo and Corbin over against them as the engineers of its destruction. Tempting and by no means untrue." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 57 (1974).
- Emphatic: "For Mansfield this was intolerable; for Willes it was in the last resort right. In the last resort." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 129 (1979).
- Negating: "Several past efforts at translating Kelsen have been sad, broken-backed affairs. Not Hartney's." Neil MacCormick, Doing and Discussing, TLS, 19 July 1991, at 22.
- Responding: "Do we say, then, that history is everything and comparison nothing, or that comparative enquiry is merely an application of the historical method? By no means." Frederick Pollock, "The History of Comparative Jurisprudence," in Essays in the Law 1, 7 (1922; repr. 1969).
- Explanatory: "For the compromise theory the question of justice is a question of balance, and the balance is both impersonal and intuitive. Impersonal because individuals become the instruments of achieving aggregate quantities—of equality as much as of utility. Intuitive because the correct balance must be a matter of inarticulate 'feel.'" Ronald Dworkin, A Matter of Principle 272 (1985).
- Qualifying or Recanting: "The Age of Aquarius has finally dawned in Presidential politics. Sort of." Maureen Dowd, 2 Baby Boomers on 1 Ticket: A First, But Will It Work? N.Y. Times, 13 July 1992, at 1A.

- Summing up: "How different is this Treaty! It lays down general principles. It expresses its aims and purposes. All in sentences of moderate length and commendable style." H.P. Bulmer Ltd. v. J. Bollinger S.A., [1974] 1 Ch. 401, 425 (C.A.) (per Lord Denning, M.R.).
- Lively, staccato effect: "Men rather than women, black men if possible. Older people rather than younger. Discerning rather than deferential. Shepherds rather than sheep, football buffs rather than football widows, fans of 'L.A. Law' rather than 'NYPD Blue.' And though there are no longer any blank slates when it comes to O.J. Simpson . . . , it's better that they get their news from 'MacNeil/Lehrer' or Newsweek than 'Geraldo!' or The Star. [¶] Among lawyers and jury consultants that is the consensus prescription for Mr. Simpson's ideal juror . . . ." David Margolick, Ideal Juror for O.J. Simpson: Football Fan Who Can Listen, N.Y. Times, 23 Sept. 1994, at A1.

Whatever the purpose, though, the incomplete or verbless sentence carries some degree of risk. You risk your not being expert enough to carry it off adroitly. You risk your readers' being suspicious about whether you have carried it off. You should therefore be wary: "Most writers . . . use the incomplete sentence sparingly, except in reports of conversation. It is a special device, to be used for special effects. In the hands of anyone but an expert, it is usually unsuccessful because the basic patterns have not been established, and missing ideas cannot be supplied." Robert M. Gorrell & Charlton Laird, Modern English Handbook 202 (2d ed. 1956).

Generally, incomplete or verbless sentences of the acceptable type are not classified as "fragments," but technically they are precisely that. Thus, it is possible, in good usage, to write fragments. Possible but difficult.

in concert. See concert.

incongruent; incongruous. Both are preferably accented on the second rather than the third syllable. For the distinction, see congruent.

in connection with is always a vague, loose connective. Occasionally—very occasionally—it is the only connective that will do: it should always be used as a last resort. E.g., "Plaintiff sued defendant in connection with [read on?] an irrigation-system lease." (For breach of the lease? Who was the lessee, who the lessor?)/ "One of the most difficult problems in connection with [read with] the duty to take care is the problem of the unforeseeable plaintiff." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 74 (1963).

in consideration of the mutual covenants herein contained. In contract DRAFTING, this hoary phrase supposedly makes clear that the contract cannot fail for lack of consideration. In fact, though, the phrase is deadwood: courts look to the mutual promises to ascertain whether consideration exists, and if one side has promised nothing, vague recitals of consideration will not suffice to save the contract.

in consideration of the premises. Use therefore instead.

inconsistency; inconsistence. Writers on usage formerly tried to distinguish between the forms, reserving inconsistency for the sense "the general quality of being inconsistent," and making inconsistence mean "an act of an inconsistent nature or an instance of being inconsistent." Today, however, inconsistency has ousted -ce in all senses. Inconsistence should be eschewed as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

inconsistent pleading. See Codd's Puzzle.

in contrast with; in contrast to. These are equally good. See contrast (A).

incontrovertible. So spelled.

incorporeal; incorporal. See corporal & corporeal.

incorporeal hereditament. See corporeal hereditaments & hereditament(s).

increasingly less. See increasingly more.

increasingly more is increasingly—or, rather, more and more—common as a REDUNDANCY. E.g., "As the business becomes increasingly more [read increasingly or more] competitive, do publishers care which books they publish or what shape the manuscripts are in when they hit the press?" Roger Cohen, When a Best Seller Is at Stake, Publishers Can Lose Control, N.Y. Times, 12 May 1991, at 4E.

The phrase increasingly less [read less and less or decreasing] is equally bad: an OXYMORON. E.g., "They have increasingly less time for thorough first-hand work upon the vast mass of available material." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 164 (1938).

incredible; incredulous. Incredible = not believable. E.g., "We find incredible the testimony that the lawn mower slid laterally five to six feet across the grass on flat ground."/ "Sources of information are sometimes given because naming the source gives authority to an otherwise incredible statement." Noncredible is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Incredulous (= skeptical) is sometimes misused for incredible—e.g.: "The statute of limitations runs against the predecessors of the plaintiffs and in favor of the defendants; to argue otherwise is to border on being incredulous [read incredible]."/ "No court is required to believe, or should be bound by improbable, incredulous [read incredible], or unreasonable evidence supporting a verdict . . . ." Baker Serv. Tools, Inc. v. Buckley, 500 So. 2d 970, 971 (Miss. 1986). See credible.

incriminate has two important senses: (1) "to charge with a crime"; (2) "to indicate involvement in the commission of a crime." The latter sense is more frequent; it applies in the phrase self-incrimination, and, e.g., here: "When he presents his witnesses, he must reveal their identity and submit them to cross-examination, which in itself may prove incriminating, or which may furnish the state with leads to incriminating rebuttal evidence."/ "The fingerprints were not the only evidence linking Walborn to the incriminating documents."

The equivalent verb criminate, q.v., was formerly common in AmE and BrE but seldom appears in modern prose. E.g., "It has also been held that the fact that a witness voluntarily testifies to matters concerning which he might refuse to answer on the ground that the answer might tend to criminate him does not constitute any defense to a charge of perjury." Criminate is now but a NEEDLESS VARIANT of incriminate.

incriminatory; criminatory. The former is more common, just as incriminate is now more common than criminate, q.v. "[H]e must prove the criminatory [read incriminatory] character of what it is his privilege to suppress just because it is criminatory [read incriminatory]." U.S. v. Weisman, 111 F.2d 260, 262 (2d Cir. 1940).

incrust. See EN-.

inculcatable. So spelled. See -ATABLE.

inculcate (into) for indoctrinate. Although these are both transitive verbs (i.e., they take direct objects), the nature of the objects is different. One inculcates values into people; and one indoctrinates people with certain values. One does not inculcate people, but rather values or beliefs or ideas. The title of a law review article contains this infelicity: Tyll van Geel, The Search for Constitutional Limits on Governmental Authority to Inculcate Youth, 62 Tex. L. Rev. 197 (1983). Fowler noted this aberration and called it "a curious mistake" (MEU1 266); no longer is it curious, but it is still a mistake. See OBJECT-SHUFFLING.

inculpatable, not inculpable, is the correct form of the word meaning "capable of being inculpated." (See -ATABLE.) Inculpable is, however, a negative form that generally means "not culpable; blameless; free from guilt." Use of the term may cause ambiguities. See culpable & nonculpable.

inculpate = to accuse or incriminate. Although its antonym (exculpate, q.v.) can be found in nonlegal writing, inculpate rarely appears in nonlegal prose. But it is common in contexts involving criminal law and torts—e.g.: "The prosecution asserts that a prior inconsistent statement of the witness may be admitted to attack his credibility even if the statement tends to directly inculpate the defendant."/ "The right to confront a witness arises only when that witness inculpates a defendant."

The adjective is inculpatory: "Defense counsel heard this testimony of Masorlian, which was exculpatory with respect to her and Brissa and inculpatory with respect to petitioner." U.S. ex rel. Tonaldi v. Elrod, 782 F.2d 665, 666 (7th Cir. 1986). See -ATABLE.

incumbent upon or on has become a CLICHÉ as a way of expressing a duty or obligation. E.g., "If, however, a valid reason exists for the retention of a fund by the executor, it is incumbent upon him not to permit such fund to remain idle, but to invest it."

incumber; encumber. The latter is the preferred spelling. See EN-.

incumbrance. See encumbrance.

incumbrancer. See encumbrancer.

incuria. British legal writers use incuria (lit., "carelessness") to denote the idea that a case was decided per incuriam, that is, in ignorance of the relevant law. E.g., "Viscount Simon L.C. had erroneously assumed, with the concurrence of the other (including Scottish) peers, that the law of the two countries was the same. Quaere, whether this was incuria; or is incuria unthinkable in the House of Lords?" Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 257 (7th ed. 1964). See per incuriam.

incurrence; incurment. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the noun corresponding to the verb to incur (= [1] to run into (some undesirable consequence), or [2] to bring upon oneself). E.g., "The fault in the incurrence of the danger does not free the defendant from liability."/ "When a 'loss contingency' exists, the likelihood that the future event will confirm the loss or impairment of an asset or the incurrence of a liability can range from probable to remote." Incurrence is sometimes misspelled incurrance.

indebitatus assumpsit. See assumpsit, implied contract & quasi-contract.

indebtedness = the state or fact of being indebted. E.g., "For purposes of 12 U.S.C. § 82, a national bank's indebtedness or liability does not include Federal Funds Purchased or obligations to repurchase securities sold."

Indebtedness is frequently used where the simpler word debt would be preferable: "The petitioner elected to declare the entire indebtedness [better: debt] to be immediately due and payable."/ "The indebtedness [better: debt] has not been paid." In this sense, indebtedness is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of debt, although in some contexts one can hardly discern what is being referred to: the state of being indebted or the actual debt. See debt & indebtment.

indebtment, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of indebtedness or debt, was much more common up to the mid-20th century than it is today. E.g., "The transfer from Godfrey was a simple collateral security, taken as additional security for the old indebtment [read debt] . . . ." People's Sav. Bank v. Bates, 120 U.S. 556, 565 (1887). A few latter-day examples persist: "[T]he . . . amount due under an absolute indebtment [read debt or indebtedness] may be unascertained . . . ." Loyal Erectors Inc. v. Hamilton & Son, Inc., 312 A.2d 748, 752 (Me. 1973). See indebtedness & debt.

indecency. See obscenity (B).

indecent assault is the BrE phrase denoting a statutory crime that includes all forms of sexual assault other than rape, buggery (q.v.), and attempts to commit either of those crimes. The nearest AmE equivalent is sexual assault. See rape (C).

INDEFINITE ANTECEDENT. See ANTECEDENTS, FALSE.

indemnifiable; indemnitable. The former is better.

indemnificate, a BACK-FORMATION from indemnification, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of indemnify, q.v.

indemnification. See indemnity.

indemnificatory; indemnitory. Both mean "of, relating to, or constituting an indemnity." The standard term is indemnificatory. The other term, indemnitory, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT not recorded in the major unabridged dictionaries, but it occurs occasionally in American legal writing. "Among these problems are those arising from the possibility of multiple subrogation claims [and from] determining what types or lines of insurance are indemnitory [read indemnificatory]." Shelby Mut. Ins. Co. v. Birch, 196 So. 2d 482, 485 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1967) (Andrews, J., dissenting)./ "[N]o decision is necessary at this time on whether the indemnitory [read indemnificatory] theory should be limited only to owners of premises." Waller v. J.E. Brenneman Co., 307 A.2d 550, 553 (Del. Super. Ct. 1973).

indemnify. A. And hold harmless. Indemnify = (1) to make good a loss that someone has suffered because of another's act or default; (2) to promise to make good such a loss; or (3) to give security against such a loss.

Etymologically, the word derives from indemnis (= harmless) combined with facere (= to make). Thus, indemnify has long been held to be perfectly synonymous with hold harmless and save harmless. See Brentnal v. Holmes, 1 Root (Conn.) 291, 1 Am. Dec. 44 (1791).

That being so, the common DOUBLET indemnify and hold harmless (sometimes written indemnify and save harmless) is stylistically and substantively indefensible. But it is so common today that lawyers routinely use it without asking themselves what distinction, if any, exists between the two parts of the doublet. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

B. Intransitive and Transitive Uses. Indemnify takes the preposition from, against, or for. E.g., "Based on this finding, the district court ordered Lee-Vac to pay Cities Service's damages and to indemnify American Hoist for the expenses of its successful defense."

Usually one indemnifies from or against losses; the OED records the transitive sense "to compensate, make up for" <indemnify this defect>, and calls this sense "Obs. rare," but it has been revived: "The agreement did not require Atlas to indemnify losses caused by its own negligence." This sense arose apparently through HYPALLAGE, by transference of object from the person compensated to the thing for which that person is compensated.

indemnitee and indemnitor (q.v.) are MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITIES, since personal suffixes such as -or and -ee should be applied to verbs, and not to nouns. Yet the words are established beyond question in AmE, where they originated in the 19th century. E.g., "An indemnitee owes no obligation whatever to the creditor apart from his promise . . . ." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 130 (1950)./ "In a contract of indemnity the indemnitor agrees to make the indemnitee whole for losses incurred when the indemnitee is sued." Sekeres v. Arbaugh, 508 N.E.2d 941, 946 (Ohio 1987). See -EE.

indemnitor; indemnifier; indemnor. The first two words are absolutely synonymous, the former being the usual form in American legal writing. E.g., "[T]hat court granted a summary judgment in favor of the indemnitor . . . ." Patch v. Amoco Oil Co., 845 F.2d 571, 573 (5th Cir. 1988). Indemnifier would probably be slightly more comprehensible to educated nonlawyers. Indemnor, which appears in some 19th-century lawbooks, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

indemnity; indemnification. There is a distinction. Indemnity = (1) security or protection against contingent hurt, damage, or loss; or (2) a legal exemption from the penalties or liabilities incurred by any course of action (OED). Indemnification = the action of compensating for actual loss or damage sustained; the payment made with this object (OED). In the following example, indemnity appears where indemnification was the intended word: "If an injury is caused by defendant's tort, a sum of money may be awarded as compensation or indemnity [read indemnification] for the loss."

For the distinction between indemnity and contribution, see contribution.

indenture (= [1] a deed made by more than one party; or [2] a contract) is so called because, formerly, each party's copy was cut or indented like the teeth of a saw, so that they all corresponded; the zig-zagging edges reduced the possibility of forgeries. Today, indenture almost always bears sense (2), as in the phrases trust indenture and corporate indenture. And indentures rarely, if ever, have serrated edges.

But, as late as the mid-19th century, it was said that "[c]areful conveyancers . . . even in the United States, continue to notch or scallop the edge of the paper at the top of deeds, which, however unimportant in its legal significance, is not without significance, as an expression of the real character of the instrument." 2 Alexander M. Burrill, A Law Dictionary and Glossary 69 (N.Y., John S. Voorhies 1860).

independent contractor; employee. Unlike an employee, an independent contractor is left free to do the assigned work and to choose the method for accomplishing it. And unlike an employee, an independent contractor does not, upon committing a wrong while carrying out the work, create liability for an employer who did not authorize the wrongful acts. For example, a taxi driver is an independent contractor, while a private chauffeur is an employee. See employee.

independent(ly). A. Preposition with. Independent should take the preposition of, not from.

B. Adverb or Adjective. The proper adverbial phrase is independently of. E.g., "The respondent may be liable, independently of his tort against the owner."/ "The former class of rights exists independently of contract; the latter frequently arises out of contract." The phrase independent of is sometimes wrongly made to act as an adverbial phrase. E.g., "When a new remedy is given by statute for a right of action existing independent of [read independently of] it, without excluding other remedies already known to the law, the statutory remedy is a cumulative remedy."/ "That it differs from what is called by the same name in the common law is clear; for it exists independent of [read independently of] possession."

indexes; indices. For ordinary purposes, indexes is the preferable plural. E.g., "With all our carefully compiled statute books and elaborate indexes, modern legislators often fail to foresee points of rub between their innovations and the body of law against which they are projected."

Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 84 (1968)./ "Case-name and subject indexes are maintained on a cumulative basis." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 211 (2d ed. 1985).

Indices, though less pretentious than fora or dogmata, is pretentious nevertheless. Some writers prefer it in technical contexts, as in mathematics and the sciences. Though not the best plural for index, indices is permissible in the sense "indicators"—e.g.: "The existence of one or more of these indices does not necessarily preclude a summary determination that certain products or services either are reasonably interchangeable or demonstrate a high cross-elasticity of demand." Cf. appendixes. See PLURALS (A).

Writers who use the highfalutin form, of course, should spell it correctly. Some misspell it with a mediate -e- on the influence of index. See, e.g., 10 Cardozo L. Rev., Table of Contents ([Aug.] 1989) ("indeces").

indicable. See -ATABLE

indicate should not appear where say, state, or show will suffice.

indicative; indicatory; indicant; indicial. Indicative is the usual adjective corresponding to the noun indication and meaning "that indicates." Indicant and indicatory are NEEDLESS VARIANTS except in archaic medical contexts. Indicial—the adjective corresponding to both indicia, q.v., and index—means (1) "of the nature of an indicia, indicative"; or (2) "of the nature or form of an index."

indicia, the plural of indicium (= an indication, sign, token), is treated as a singular noun forming the plurals indicia and indicias, the former being preferred: "In Evans v. Newton, we held that the park had acquired such unalterable indicia of a public facility that for the purposes of the equal protection clause it remained public even after the city officials were replaced as trustees by a board of private citizens."

The singular indicium is still sometimes used: "The most reliable indicium of common interests among employees is similarity of their work, skills, qualifications, duties and working conditions." N.L.R.B. v. DMR Corp., 795 F.2d 472, 475 (5th Cir. 1986)./ "The challenged information is 'false' or 'unreliable' if it lacks some minimal indicium of reliability beyond mere allegation."/ "The word 'trademark' B used here in its broadest sense to include any indicium that indicates origin." (Compare data and datum: see data.) In the civil law, indicium is a species of proof similar to common-law circumstantial evidence.

indicial. See indicative.

indicium. See indicia.

indict; indite. Both words are pronounced /in-dɪt/. The former means "to charge formally with a crime"; the latter, "to write, compose, dictate." A literary term, indite is rarely used today.

indictable offence. See summary offence.

indictable offense. See HYPALLAGE.

indictee (= a person charged with a crime) is not a newfangled passive noun in -ee; it has been used in English since the 16th century. See -EE.

indictment; information; presentment. In the federal courts of the U.S., a distinction exists between these charging instruments. Any offense punishable by death, or for imprisonment for more than one year or by hard labor, must be prosecuted by indictment; any other offense may be prosecuted by either an indictment or an information. Fed. R. Crim. P. 7(a). An information may be filed without leave of court by a prosecutor, who need not obtain the approval of a grand jury. An indictment, by contrast, is issuable only by a grand jury. E.g., "In some states, while the grand jury still functions, it has lost a great deal of its importance, since the district attorney can begin the case with a simple 'information,' which does as well as the indictment." Max Radin, The Law and You 110 (1948).

Presentments are not used in American federal procedure; formerly, a presentment was "the notice taken, or statement made, by a grand jury of any offense or unlawful state of affairs from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them" (W2).

Through a historical transference of meaning, indictment, which originally referred to the accusation of the grand jury, came to signify in the 16th century the document containing the accusation. (See HYPALLAGE.) In both AmE and BrE, indictment may refer to the proceeding or to the charging instrument known more particularly as a bill of indictment. See arraignment.

To a nonlawyer it may seem strange to see information (the charging instrument) used as a count noun: "Appellant was prosecuted under two informations, in two courts, which charged that he personally sold a sixteen-year-old boy two 'girlie' magazines on each of two dates in October 1965."

indictor; indicter. The -or spelling is preferred.

indifference; indifferency. The latter is archaic.

indigency; indigence. Indigency, once the less common form, is now four times as common as indigence in AmE. Indigence ought therefore to be regarded as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

indirect evidence. See circumstantial evidence & direct evidence.

indiscernible; indiscernable. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A). indiscrete; indiscreet. See discrete.

indispensable; necessary; proper. Justice Harlan wrote, in Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 118 (1968): "To use the familiar but confusing terminology, the decision to proceed is a decision that the absent person is merely necessary, while the decision to dismiss is a decision that he is indispensable." With regard to possible parties to a lawsuit, necessary refers to those who should be included but need not be, indispensable to those without whom the action must be dismissed. In other words, in American legal English indispensable means "more necessary than necessary." The label proper "is used if the party is one who can be joined or not at plaintiff's option." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 457 (4th ed. 1983).

The words indispensable and necessary are opposed in other legal contexts—e.g.: "This does not mean that the transcript must have been 'indispensable' to the litigation to satisfy this test; it simply must have been 'necessary' to counsel's effective performance or the court's handling of the case." 10 Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 2677, at 350–51 (1983).

The two words should not be redundantly coupled when no nuance is intended: "The rule has no doubt been considerably relaxed since Peirce [sic] v. Corf was decided in 1874, but I think it is still indispensably necessary [read either indispensable or necessary] that there should be a document signed by the party to be charged." (Eng.) Similarly, the REDUNDANCY indispensable necessity occurs at least twice in The Federalist.

indisputable should receive its primary accent on the second, not the third, syllable /in-dis-pyoot-ə-bəl/. A common and acceptable pronunciation on both sides of the Atlantic is /in-di-spyoo-tə-bəl/.

indisputedly, misused for indisputably or undisputedly, is an odd error—e.g.: "Civil commitment indisputedly [read indisputably] entails a substantial curtailment of liberty." Project Release v. Prevost, 551 F. Supp. 1298, 1308 (E.D.N.Y. 1982)./ "She is the mother of three sons, which indisputedly [read indisputably] makes her the only justice to have experienced pregnancy." All Eyes on Justice O'Connor, Newsweek, 1 May 1989, at 34.

individual was formerly thought to be a newfangled barbarism as a noun substituting for man, woman, or person. Certainly, those more specific terms are generally to be preferred over individual, but this word should no longer be stigmatized. Still, individual is best confined to contexts in which the writer intends to distinguish the single (noncorporate) person from the group or crowd.

individualize; individuate. Both are commonly used, and they have basically the same sense ("to make individual in character, to give individuality to"); both are also so common that it would be inappropriate to call either a NEEDLESS VARIANT, and subtle writers may in fact intend nuances. Individualize is much more common in legal writing. E.g., "This approach injects hypothetical extraneous considerations into the sentencing process and contradicts the judicially approved policy of individualizing sentences that are tailored to fit the offender." Indeed, in AmE, individualize has become a VOGUE WORD meaning "to humanize; to portray as an individual human being." Hence: "Even if the jury had been presented individualized evidence that he was a human being and that he had no extended record of violent crime, we cannot say that counsel was ineffective unless it is shown affirmatively that the death penalty would not have been imposed had the sentencing jury been afforded this testimony."

Individuate is often used in scientific contexts and in Jungian psychology in highly technical senses, and ought generally to be confined to these uses.

inducement; inductance; induction. Inducement ordinarily means "that which influences or persuades." E.g., "The interests of representative and represented must, however, be so identical that the motive and inducement to protect and preserve may be assumed in each." In pleading, it has an additional sense in BrE: "Matters of inducement are introductory averments stating who the parties are, how connected and other surrounding circumstances leading up to the matter in dispute, but not stating such matter" (quoted in OED). Thus: "The first count of the declaration, after the usual inducement of the plaintiff's good conduct, stated that, before the [defendant's] speaking and publishing [various] defamatory words . . . the plaintiff was . . . [a] clerk . . . ." Lumby v. Allday, (1831) 1 Cr. & J. 301, 148 Eng. Rep. 1434 (Ex.).

Induction, in the context of reasoning, means "the establishment of a general proposition from a number of particular instances." Inductance is a technical electrical term.

indue; endue. The preferred spelling is endue (= to put on or clothe) <endued with the mantle of apparent authority>.

INELEGANT VARIATION. "A draftsman should never be afraid of repeating a word as often as may be necessary in order to avoid ambiguity." Alison Russell, Legislative Drafting and Forms 103 (1938). Fowler referred to as "elegant variation" the ludicrous practice of never using the same word twice in the same sentence. When Fowler named this vice of language in the 1920s, elegant was almost a pejorative word, commonly associated with precious overrefinement. Today, however, the word has positive connotations. E.g., "The book is exceedingly well edited, and several essays are elegantly written."

Lest the reader misapprehend that the subject of this article is a virtue rather than a vice in writing, I have renamed it unambiguously: *in*elegant variation. The rule of thumb with regard to undue repetition is that one should not repeat a word in the same sentence if it can be felicitously avoided; this is hardly an absolute proscription, however.

The problem is that if one uses terms that vary slightly in form, the reader is likely to deduce that some differentiation is intended. Thus one does not write punitive damages, punitory damages, and punishment damages all in the same opinion or brief, lest the reader infer that one intends to convey a distinction. Yet one judge did just that in a single dissent. See Jones v. Fisher, 166 N.W.2d 175 (Wis. 1969) (Hansen, J., dissenting) (using punitive damages and punitory damages). Other judges have used both forms in a single sentence: "There is an argument for regarding the punitory theory of punitive damages as anachronistic." See punitive.

One frequently encounters writing on criminal law in which informer and informant (q.v.) are used alternatively, but with no purpose. "Can the informant's general reliability be established by an officer's interview with the informer?" The second use could have been easily avoided by using him or her. The following example of inelegant variation occurred within the space of two paragraphs: "A counter-letter such as we have now before us does not affect marketability. . . . The lots were not rendered unmerchantable." See marketable.

The basic type of variation found objectionable by Fowler is the simple change from the straightforward term to some slightly more fanciful synonym, as here:

- "Several Southwestern states have established elaborate procedures for allocation of water and adjudication of conflicting claims to that resource [read water]."
- "Such a judgment of probate cannot be collaterally attacked and can be assailed only in the manner provided by statute [read attacked; it can be attacked only in the statutory manner]."
- "The court held merely that a protestant who could have sought, but did not seek, review may not now do so by unilaterally petitioning for a repeal or an amendment; to permit any complainant [read here protestant; or read complainant in each slot] to restart the limitations period . . . ."
- "Lawyers generally have a bad reputation; today the American public holds a grudge against the half-million counselors [read lawyers] who handle its legal affairs."
- "State law makes no provisions for mandatory autopsies, which means that justices of the peace follow different policies for seeking postmortems [read autopsies or them]."
- "One who executes a will believes that the testament [read it] covers all contingencies."

Equally common in modern legal writing is the switch from one form of a word to another. For example, Justice White alternated contributory neglect with contributory negligence throughout his opinion in Mosheuvel v. District of Columbia, 191 U.S. 247, 252 (1903). Similar examples of the distemper are legion:

- "Some courts have held that the gift passes by intestacy on the theory that there can be no residue of a residuum [read residue]."
- "The in rem theory would permit enforcement of the injunction by the contempt power even against persons who had no notice of the decree, since the res theory [read in rem theory] is that the whole world is bound by the court's control of the property."
- "And unlike Blackstone's blurred account, Coke made clear that his fictional death would not create new property rights or destroy old ones. . . . Without resort to fictitious death [read fictional death] the law stripped the felon of his property as a part of his punishment."
- "[H]is counsel, with commendable candor, includes in his brief a statement to the effect he concedes that if this court is satisfied [that] the judgment of the trial court is supported by evidence[,] such judgment will not be disturbed on appeal . . . . [E]ven in the absence of this commendatory [read commendable] concession . . . ." Redman v. Mutual Benefit Health & Accident Ass'n, 327 P.2d 854, 860 (Kan. 1958).

Certain pairs may lend themselves to this snare: arbiter and arbitrator, adjudicative and adjudicatory, investigative and investigatory, exigency and exigence. In fact, it sometimes seems that amateurish writers believe that NEEDLESS VARIANTS were made for this specific stylistic purpose.

Particularly confusing are pointless switches from a phrase such as admiralty law to maritime law—e.g.: "Finally, the court held that traditional concepts of the role of admiralty law did not require the finding of a substantial maritime relationship because allowing the parties to pursue state law remedies would not disturb the federal interest of maintaining the uniformity of maritime law." Jeanmarie B. Tade, The Texas and Louisiana Anti-Indemnity Statutes as Applied to Oil and Gas Industry Offshore Contracts, 24 Hous. L. Rev. 665, 692 (1987).

"The point to be observed," wrote Fowler, "is that, even if the words meant exactly the same, it would be better to keep the first selected on duty than to change guard" (MEU2 150).

inept. See inapt.

inequity; iniquity. The first means "unfairness"; the second, "evil."

in error. See error (B).

in esse; in posse. In esse = in actual existence; in being. In posse = potential; not realized. E.g., "There is no legal objection to constituting such a trustee in favor of one who was not in esse when the fraud was perpetrated."/ "A court would not intervene to deprive the children—in esse or in posse—of their property rights under such a provision." There is no good reason why the phrases in being and potential should not be substituted in place of these LATINISMS. See in being, esse & *de bene esse.

inexpense is not, by the normal measures, a legitimate English word; it is listed in no major unabridged dictionary and does not fill a need in the language. E.g., "[E]ven an absentee landlord could with relative inexpense [read rather inexpensively] employ someone regularly present to remove these hazards." Liability for Failure to Remove or Render Safe Ice and Snow on Common Passageways and Approaches, 41 Colum. L. Rev. 349, 352 (1941)./ "We have yet to figure out how the relative inexpense [read inexpensiveness] of attending this university relates in any way to the fact that the administration is illegitimately spending interest generated from student money." See NEOLOGISMS & BACK-FORMATIONS.

inexpert, adj.; nonexpert, adj. An important distinction exists. Inexpert = unskilled <the novice's inexpert cross-examination>. Nonexpert = not of or by an expert, but not necessarily unskilled .

inexplicable (= unexplainable) is accented on the second syllable /in-ek-spli-kə-bəl/ or the third /in-ek-splik-ə-bəl/.

inexpressible; inexpressable. The former spelling is correct. See -ABLE (A).

in extenso (= unabridged) is a pompous LEGALISM for the simple English phrase in full. E.g., "Convinced beyond peradventure that Oliver has no impact on those parts of our opinion, we reinstate those paragraphs as if set forth here in extenso [read in full] and verbatim."/ "I asked for a full transcript of the judgment in that case and I shall read in extenso [read in full] the passage of general importance in case the instant case is reported." (Eng.) See LATINISMS.

in extremis (= at the point of death; at the last gasp) is better known than most LATINISMS and may be used purposefully as a EUPHEMISM. E.g., "The test for imminence of death, which is required for an effective gift causa mortis, is equally indefinite: the donor must anticipate more than the general mortality of man, yet he need not be in extremis."

infamous crime. Originally, an infamous crime was one for which part of the penalty was infamy, i.e., being declared ineligible to serve on a jury, hold public office, or testify. These consequences were abolished in the 19th century. In England, the Larceny Act 1861 (repealed) defined infamous crime as "the abominable crime of buggery, committed with mankind or with beast . . . ." That statutory meaning is long since defunct. More commonly, legal writers equate the phrase with felony.

But it is simplistic to say, as writers occasionally do, that "an 'infamous crime' is a felony . . . ." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 108 (1963). In fact, infamous crime is something of a chameleon-hued phrase that takes its meaning from the context. The California Supreme Court has held that, although for some purposes any felony is an infamous crime, in the context of disfranchisement the phrase is limited to crimes involving moral corruption and dishonesty. See Otsuka v. Hite, 414 P.2d 412 (Cal. 1966) (en banc).

For purposes of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which requires an indictment or presentment for "a capital or otherwise infamous crime," the canon of construction termed ejusdem generis (q.v.) suggests that we should look to the potential penalty to decide whether a crime is infamous. "The potential penalty is bound to control," says one authority, "because the determination must be made in the early stages of the prosecution." Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 19 (1957). If we translate capital or otherwise infamous to "involving capital punishment or similarly grave penalties," it remains problematical to determine what penalty is grave enough to be considered similar to capital punishment.

In sum, infamous crime is a vague term in modern usage. See CHAMELEON-HUED WORDS.

infancy = the state or condition of being a minor. E.g., "At birth a child enters the condition of infancy—a condition [that] ceases at the age of eighteen years, or, rather, at the first moment of the day preceding the eighteenth birthday." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 41 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). Cf. nonage. See minority (A).

infant (= a minor) is peculiar to legal language; in nonlegal contexts, infant means "a small child, a baby." But in law it is quite possible to write of, say, a 17-year-old infant. E.g., "An exception was made for the time of filing for infants, incompetents, and nonresidents." The more usual—and less confusing—term is minor. Cf. infanticide. See minority (A) & age of capacity.

infanticide = (1) the killing of a baby, usu. by a parent or with a parent's consent; or (2) a parent who kills a baby, or one who kills a baby with a parent's consent. Sense (2) invariably takes an article , whereas sense (1) only sometimes takes an article <the infanticide committed by a deranged father> <infanticide committed by a mother with postpartum depression>.

According to one eminent authority, not every killer of a baby has committed infanticide. The killing of another person's child is simple murder or manslaughter. Infanticide, by definition, must be by or on behalf of a parent. See Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 13 (1957).

Despite the legal meaning of infant (q.v.), the word infanticide is restricted to baby-killing. A parent who kills a 17-year-old child would not be called an "infanticide" (sense 2). (In England, the Infanticide Act applies to the killing of a child up to one year old.) The slightly broader term child-slaying, however, might cover situations in which children who are old enough to walk—and up to the age of 18—are killed. By contrast, the most restrictive term is neonaticide, which refers to the killing of a newborn. Among the three terms—infanticide, child-slaying, and neonaticide—the first two are the most emotive terms because they are widely known, and the third is a clinical, abstract description that many would read or hear without understanding.

in fault. See at fault.

infeasible; unfeasible. The former is better.

infect = (1) to taint with crime; or (2) to involve (a ship or cargo) in the seizure to which contraband is liable. This verb is among the more vivid METAPHORS in traditional legal terminology.

infectious is sometimes erroneously rendered infectuous. See contagious.

infeft is a Scottish variant of enfeoffed. See feoff.

in feodo simpliciter. See fee simple (A).

infer is generally correctly used in legal writing. Properly, it means "to deduce; to reason from premises to a conclusion." E.g., "The court inferred that Congress must have intended to extend the suspension power to embrace initial as well as changed rates, and it relied on this inference to buttress its reading of the statute's literal language."

A common mistake among nonlawyers is to use infer when imply (= to hint at; suggest) is the correct word. Yet this nonlawyer's blunder has occasionally insinuated itself into legal writing. E.g., "Exclusion from venires focuses on the inherent attributes of the excluded group and infers [read implies] its inferiority. . . ." U.S. v. Leslie, 759 F.2d 381, 392 (5th Cir. 1985). See imply (B).

In Scots law, infer is used in a special sense: "to involve as a consequence"—e.g.: "In lay usage only a person infers, but in legal usage such and such a course of conduct, for example, infers a penalty." Andrew D. Gibb, Students' Glossary of Scottish Legal Terms 45 (A.G.M. Duncan ed., 2d ed. 1982).

inference. One draws, not makes, inferences. If one says "to make an inference" (like "to make a deduction"), then many listeners will confuse inference with implication. The verb to draw is therefore clearer. See infer.

inferentially for we can infer that. The OED states that inferentially = in an inferential manner, but allows that it is used "sometimes qualifying the whole clause or statement: = as an inference, as may be inferred." This use defies explication but is common in legal writing—e.g.: "Judge Lumbard pointed out that even though defendant destroyed its records, the evidence inferentially established profits of over $1000."/ "Inferentially, at least, the accused is entitled to counsel and to compulsory process for bringing in his witnesses."/ "The second paragraph of the statute, by providing that an adopted child may not take by representation property coming from collateral kindred of the adopting parent, inferentially contemplates the child may so take from lineal kin." See SENTENCE ADVERBS. Cf. hopefully & thankfully.

inferior; superior. A. Generally. These comparative adjectives cannot act as adverbs. E.g., "The statute is unconstitutional not only because it treats former mental patients differently from and inferior to [read and as inferior to] convicts, but also because it presumptively denies former mental patients the opportunity to establish that they no longer present the danger against which the statute was intended to guard."

Only etymologically are these words comparatives; they take to, not than. They are qualified by much or far, not by more, which is a fairly common error.

B. In Classifying Courts. Traditionally, the hierarchical system of courts within a given jurisdiction is broken down into inferior courts and superior courts. Many American judges feel uncomfortable with these terms, preferring to speak of trial courts and appellate courts. Inferior suggests, to many readers and listeners, a lower level of competence.

British legal writers, however, use the classification regularly, not least because many courts have both trial and appellate jurisdiction. In England and Wales, the superior courts include the House of Lords, the Court of Appeal, and the High Court; inferior courts include circuit courts and magistrates' courts.

inferior court. See inferior (B) & higher court.

infer(r)able; infer(r)ible. The preferred form is inferable, accented on the second syllable /in-fər-ə-bəl/. Fifty years ago inferrible was considered the best spelling, because of the rule that a consonant should be doubled after a stressed syllable. Inferable, which has now ousted the other spelling, is anomalous. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS infeudation (= the granting of an estate in fee; enfeoffment) is rarer than both its equivalent, enfeoffment, and its derivative, subinfeudation. E.g., "The tenures created during this era of universal infeudation were as various as the conditions [that] the tenants made with their new chiefs or were forced to accept from them." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 192 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). See subinfeudation.

in fine, a turgid, legalistic phrase for in conclusion or finally. E.g., "In fine, [read In conclusion, or Finally,] we reject the appellant's claim that the district court's treatment of the summaries unduly prejudiced his trial."/ "In fine, [read In conclusion, or Finally,] the jury would be warranted in finding that the defendant's conduct was a high-handed and unlawful means of collecting a debt."

infinitely (= endlessly, limitlessly) for eminently (= to a high degree) is either gross OVERSTATEMENT or a MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "You want to persuade the appellate court that the jury was infinitely [read eminently] reasonable."

infirm is frequently used in reference to fatal weaknesses, whether constitutional or statutory. In fact, constitutionally infirm might accurately be labeled a legal CLICHÉ. E.g., "The state argues further that the statute is not constitutionally infirm simply because the legislature could have achieved the same result by other means."/ "Our review of the record indicates no infirmities in the jury's findings." See fatal (A).

in flagrante delicto (= red-handed; in the act of committing an offense) is a term now more commonly used for polysyllabic humor in nonlegal contexts than as a serious word in law. See LATINISMS.

Some writers mistake the spelling—e.g.: "We do not doubt that NASA blushes whenever one of its own is caught in flagrante delictu [read in flagrante delicto or red-handed] . . . ." Norton v. Macy, 417 F.2d 1161, 1167 (D.C. Cir. 1969)./ "Two wrongs, usually of very unequal weight, should never equal a right to escape when caught in flagrante delictu [read in flagrante delicto or red-handed]." Commonwealth v. Weisenthal, 535 A.2d 600, 601 (Pa. 1988). See ITALICS (C). inflammable. See flammable.

inflatus. See afflatus.

inflict; afflict. These terms are infrequently confused. Afflict takes with; inflict takes on. Living things, esp. humans, are afflicted with diseases; inanimate objects, esp. scourges or punishments, are inflicted on people. But misusing inflict for afflict is increasingly common—e.g.: "[A]s the evidence indicates, the severed muscles in the plaintiff's face have inflicted [read afflicted] him with a tic." Rogers v. Moody, 242 A.2d 276, 279 (Pa. 1968)./ "The problems inflicting [read afflicting] this case and ultimately causing a remand have their genesis in the indictment . . . ." Honc v. State, 698 S.W.2d 218, 220 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 1985).

inflicter; inflictor. The former spelling is better.

influence. The first syllable, not the second, receives the primary accent /in-floo-ənts/, whether the part of speech is noun or verb.

inforce is an obsolete spelling of enforce, except in the prefixed reinforce. See EN- & enforce.

inform, in the sense "to determine, give form to, permeate" is somewhat archaic, but it is common in scholarly legal writing. E.g., "Whether vocational education produces salutary outcomes is informed in part by the nature of the dependent variable under consideration."/ "To the extent that economic analysis informs our decision here, we think that it favors retention of the present rule."

informal contract; simple contract; parol contract. These phrases each denote the same idea: a contract that derives its efficacy not from the form of the transaction but from its substance. Williston preferred the term informal contract because simple contract is misleading. See 1 Samuel Williston & W.H.E. Jaeger, A Treatise on the Law of Contract § 12, at 22 (3d ed. 1957). The phrase parol contract is even more likely to mislead, because, though it suggests an oral contract, it (surprisingly) can be in writing. See formal contract.

informant; informer. Both terms are used in reference to those who confidentially supply police with information about crimes. Informant is twice as common in American legal contexts, informer slightly more common in British ones. The Evanses write that informant is neutral, whereas informer, which acquired strong connotations of detestation in the 17th and 18th centuries, remains a connotatively charged term. Bergen Evans & Cornelia Evans, A Dictionary of Contemporary American Usage 245 (1957). If that is true in lay contexts, it certainly is not true in legal writing. See INELEGANT VARIATION.

in forma pauperis (= in the form of a poor person; not liable for costs of court) is a TERM OF ART in AmE (but is no longer used in BrE). E.g., "Under well-settled principles, a timely motion to proceed in forma pauperis on appeal is the substantial equivalent of a notice of appeal and is effective to invoke appellate jurisdiction." Judges frequently use the abbreviation IFP <an IFP motion>.

Where the entire phrase is not used, pauper should appear rather than forma pauperis. E.g., "This packet includes four copies of a complaint form and two copies of a forma pauperis [read a pauper] petition."/ "In sum, assuming forma pauperis status [read pauper status], the prisoner complaints must be filed."/ "We grant the motion for pauper status but deny the application for stay of execution." See pauper.

Additionally, in the full phrase one should italicize the in, not just forma pauperis: "Late in the trial, Wellington, proceeding in forma pauperis, [read in forma pauperis], unsuccessfully submitted an ex parte application." U.S. v. Nivica, 887 F.2d 1110, 1117 (1st Cir. 1989). See ITALICS (C).

information. See indictment.

information and belief. In traditional pleading, an allegation made only on information—unaccompanied by the pleader's asserting that he or she believes the allegation to be true—is insufficient. It has therefore become standard practice for pleaders to make allegations on information and belief.

Among those not used to the practice, it can be confusing. Take a count that reads: "On information and belief, a vice-president of the Bank then recorded the incorrect account number on the deposit slip." Grammatically speaking, on information and belief refers to the vice-president's state of mind. Actually, though, the allegation is shorthand for this: On information and belief, the plaintiff alleges that the vice-president of the Bank then . . . . The judges and lawyers who read such sentences are never misled because they understand the JARGON, which saves several words. If such a pleading comes before a jury, however, it will likely cause confusion.

informative; informatory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, except in bridge, the card game.

informer. See informant.

in foro conscientiae (lit., "in the forum of conscience") is used in the sense "privately or morally rather than legally" (W3). E.g., "The moral obligation exerts just as much force the day after the limit expired as it did the day before, and, in foro conscientiae, the debtor should discharge the debt." See LATINISMS.

infra; supra. These ubiquitous signals could advantageously be banished from all legal writing. One writer calls them "disconsolate inadequacies," explaining: "They border on the discourteous unless the point referred to is but a few lines away, and in that even they are not needed." Raymond S. Wilkins, "The Argument of an Appeal," in Advocacy and the King's English 277, 281 (George Rossman ed. 1960). See ante.

infract (= to break in; violate; infringe) is chiefly an Americanism. Even so, it is little used outside legal writing. E.g., "We find that article 6 was infracted because no treaty provision justifies the second boarding or the ultimate seizure of the La Rosa." U.S. v. Postal, 589 F.2d 862, 872 (5th Cir. 1979)./ "The court's determination that chapter 93A was infracted appears sustainable . . . ." Peckham v. Continental Cas. Ins. Co., 895 F.2d 830, 842 (1st Cir. 1990). See infringe.

infraction (= violation, infringement) is used in legal and in sports JARGON. E.g., "Appellants urge several other evidentiary infractions."

infringe, v.t. & v.i. Fowler held (just as a highest court holds) that infringe is best used transitively, as here: "The association infringed no legal right of the appellant by its nondisclosure of this fact." The transitive is especially useful where the passive voice is called for: "An association of college faculty members and five individual educators seek vindication of their First Amendment rights, which they contend were infringed by the action of a state college in attempting to destroy the association, in discharging one faculty member, and in discriminating against others."

Rather than infringe upon or on, some other verb such as impinge, encroach, or trespass is better when an intransitive verb is desired: "The plaintiff was free to make any legal contract with defendant that did not wrongfully infringe upon [read impinge on] the legal rights of others or offend against public rights." (Eng.)/ "The production of evidence demanded here does not infringe on [read encroach or impinge on] British sovereignty, as it calls merely for documents and not for personal appearance." See infract & impinge.

infringer. So spelled.

in future. This phrase is BrE, perhaps a direct translation of the Latin phrase in futuro, q.v. AmE uses the definite article: in the future.

in futuro is a legalistic LATINISM conveying (or failing to convey) an elementary notion for which the English language has adequate words. E.g., "It is an elementary rule that such a gift cannot be made to take effect in possession in futuro [read in the future]."/ "The point of distinction between a vested gift to be paid in futuro [read in the future] and a contingent gift to be paid to a person only upon reaching a certain age is made by Chief Justice Booth in Carey v. Pettyjohn." See in future & *in praesenti.

ingenious; ingenuous. These words, virtual antonyms, are frequently confused. Ingenious

ingenuity was once the nominal form of ingenuous, and ingeniosity (last used in 1608) the noun for ingenious. Through a curious historical reversal of the role of ingenuity, it came to mean "ingeniousness." Ingenuousness was the only term left to do the work of the noun corresponding to the adjective ingenuous. Thus, although ingenuity appears to be the correlative of ingenuous, it no longer is.

ingenuous. See ingenious.

ingraft. See engraft.

ingress. See egress.

ingross. See engross.

in gross, when used of servitudes, means "personal as distinguished from appurtenant to land." The phrase may be placed either before or after the noun it modifies. E.g., "A servitude in gross threatens the servient owner's autonomy, and thus deserves scrutiny."/ "This reasoning does not adequately address whether the burden should run if, as in the case of in gross conservation servitudes, there is never a benefited parcel." Cf. run (B).

inhabitability. See habitability.

in haec verba (= in these words) is the worst sort of puffed-up LATINISM for an ordinary idea—verbatim invariably being a good substitute. Often the term is used as an unhyphenated PHRASAL ADJECTIVE. E.g., "Nevertheless, the use of in haec verba pleadings on defamation charges is favored." Asay v. Hallmark Cards, Inc., 594 F.2d 692, 699 (8th Cir. 1979). The sentence would be far more comprehensible without the LATINISM, and with a few more words: The use of pleadings that give the defamatory words verbatim is favored. See verbatim. Cf. ipsissima verba.

in hand. See at hand.

inhere. A. Preposition with. Inhere takes the preposition in; it will not tolerate within. "Since a number of violations inhered within [read in] the same transaction, the defendant was not prosecuted more than once for the same statutory offense."

B. For inure. This MALAPROPISM is a stunning one—e.g.: "[T]he benefit of the enhancement inhered [read inured] to all users and all listeners, no matter what apparatus was employed for playback purposes." U.S. v. Chaudhry, 850 F.2d 851, 855 (1st Cir. 1988). See inure.

inherent takes in, not to. "We are dealing with a complexity inherent to [read inherent in] dual organizations."

The use of inherent in the following sentence resulted from ignorance of the word's meaning (as if it were equivalent to prejudicial or inflammatory): "Nothing in the letters is of such an inherent [read prejudicial or inflammatory] nature as to inflame the passions of the jury or invoke its sympathies." Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 750 F.2d 1314, 1319 (5th Cir. 1985). See inhere.

inheritability; inheritableness. The former being standard, the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT: "The inheritableness [read inheritability] of a knight's fee was accompanied by the rule of primogeniture . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 34 (1966).

inheritable; heritable; hereditary. As between the first two, the first is the more common; it means "capable of being inherited": "[L]ands held in feudal knight service immediately after the Conquest were not freely inheritable." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 7 (2d ed. 1984)./ "In the twelfth century the term fee came to be used to designate an inheritable interest in land rather than a mere life interest." Roger A. Cunningham et al., The Law of Property 15 n.6 (2d ed. 1993).

Heritable is infrequent enough today to be classed a NEEDLESS VARIANT for most purposes, although it persists in Scotland and in civil-law jurisdictions.

The negative form of the adjective has been rendered both uninheritable (OED) and nonheritable (W3). The latter is more common in AmE—e.g.: "[I]t would create an estate in fee simple which . . . would be nonheritable." William F. Fratcher, Bequests of Orts, 48 Mo. L. Rev. 476, 478 (1983).

Hereditary has a more restricted sense: "descending by inheritance from generation to generation" (OED): "In the American States it is a fundamental principle that no man can be a magistrate, a legislator, or a judge by hereditary right." (Eng.) See hereditable & heredity.

inheritableness. See inheritability.

inheritance. See descent (B).

inheritor; heritor. See heir (A).

inheritrix; inheritress. See SEXISM (C).

inhibitory; inhibitive. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

in-house counsel. See house counsel.

inimical (= hostile, injurious, adverse), a common word in legal writing, is almost a CLICHÉ in place of adverse, esp. in collocation with the word interests. "A settlor cannot force the courts to sanction his scheme of disposition if it is inimical to the interests of the state."

Inimicable for inimical is a fairly common error. The OED records inimicable as a "rare" adjective: it is not rare enough in AmE. E.g., "For anything believed to be inimicable [read inimical] to his best interests can be thwarted or prevented by simply revoking the trust or amending it in such a way as to conform to his wishes." Farkas v. Williams, 125 N.E.2d 600, 607 (Ill. 1955)./ "They argue that Tullos was on board the rig for purposes inimicable [read inimical] to the legitimate interests of the rig owner."

in invitum is unnecessary JARGON meaning "against an unwilling person." E.g., "[A constructive trust is] entirely in invitum [read nonconsensual] and forced upon the conscience of the trustee for the purpose of working out right and justice or frustrating fraud." Motley's Admin'rs v. Tabor, 271 S.W. 1064, 1065 (Ky. 1925)./ "Finally, in West, a nonparty was allowed to appeal after having been compelled to participate in the district court proceedings 'in invitum' [read unwillingly]." In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 643 F.2d 641, 643 n.2 (9th Cir. 1981). INITIALESE. Justice Rehnquist (as he then was) once wrote, after stating the facts of a case in which seven different groups of initials were used for identification: "The terminology required to describe the present controversy suggests that the 'alphabet soup' of the New Deal era was, by comparison, a clear broth." Chrysler Corp. v. Brown, 441 U.S. 281, 287 n.4 (1979). He was alluding, of course, to one of the most irritating types of pedantry that have gained a foothold in legal writing: the overuse of acronyms and abbreviations. Originally, to be sure, abbreviations were intended to serve the convenience of the reader by shortening names; with their use, cumbersome phrases would not have to be repeated in their entirety. The purported simplifications actually simplified. E.g., "For the sake of brevity and to avoid confusion, since all persons involved in this litigation, except Mrs. Robinson, have the same surname, we will refer to Mrs. Annie S. Harlan as Annie; to Mrs. Sue Robinson as Sue; to Messrs. Jay W. Harlan and George L. Harlan as Jay and George." Harlan v. Citizens Nat'l Bank, 251 S.W.2d 284, 284 (Ky. 1952).

Now, however, many writers seem to have lost sight of this goal: they allow abbreviated names to proliferate in their writing, which quickly becomes a system of hieroglyphs requiring the reader constantly to refer to the original use of the term so that he will understand the significance of the hieroglyphs. It may be thought that this kind of writing is more scholarly than ordinary, straightforward prose. It is not. Rather, it is tiresome and inconsiderate writing; it betrays the writer's thoughtlessness toward the reader and a fascination with the insubstantial trappings of scholarship.

A typical, and by no means exaggerated, example of this vice recently appeared in Ryder Energy Distrib. Corp. v. Merrill Lynch Commodities, Inc., 748 F.2d 774 (2d Cir. 1984). In this opinion seven hieroglyphs appear, often clumped together. We learn throughout the first few pages of the opinion that REDCO = Ryder Energy Distribution Corporation (why not call it Ryder?); NYME = New York Mercantile Exchange; FCM = futures commission merchant; CFTC = Commodity Futures Trading Commission; EFP = exchange of futures for physical; and TOI = Two Oil, Inc. Braced with this knowledge, if we can hold it, we encounter the following:

> [U]nlike Hutton's, Merrill's duty sprang from two sources Like Hutton, Merrill had the duty of an FCM representing the buyer—REDCO. In addition, however, Merrill had the duty of an FCM representing the seller—TOI. It was in its capacity as TOI's FCM that Merrill was required, under Form EFP-1, to certify that TOI owned and hed possession of enough oil to cover its EFP obligations

And this:

> The following facts cannot be found in the complaint: REDCO's previous dealings with TOI, REDCO's reasons for conducting an EFP, Merrill's inability to find REDCO an EFP partner, REDCO's introduction of TOI to Merrill, Hutton and NYME's lack of knowledge of TOI's default until June 11, and NYME's instigation of a rules compliance investigation after June 11.

And so it goes throughout the opinion, which would have reached the summit of initialese if only Merrill Lynch Commodities, Inc. had been termed MLCI, and E.F. Hutton & Co. Inc. termed EFHCO.

Almost as bad is Kierstead v. City of San Antonio, 643 S.W.2d 118, 120 (Tex. 1982), in which EMT = emergency medical technician, FY = fiscal year, and FPERA = Fire and Police Employee Relations Act: "Both parties presented their interpretations of the application of Art. 1269p, § 6 vis-à-vis the override provision of FPERA, § 20 during the bench trial of the EMTs' claim in November 1979. The trial court awarded the EMTs overtime on the early contracts but denied awards for the FY 1978 and FY 1979 agreements that had specifically mentioned a 56-hour work week obligation for the EMTs." Why not technician, a statement that all references to years mean fiscal years, and the Act?

The simple solution, of course, is to adopt simplified names for parties and frequently repeated phrases, rather than initials in all capitals that depersonalize and obscure. Instead of referring to "TDMHMR" (Texas Department of Mental Health and Mental Retardation) again and again, one should refer to "the Department" when only one is involved.

In naming something new, one's task is sometimes hopeless: the choice is clear between ALI–ABA CLE Review and American Law Institute–American Bar Association Continuing Legal Education Review, but one cannot choose either enthusiastically. Both entities must have their due (in part so that they can have their dues), and the acronyms gradually become familiar. But they are not ideal because they are sure to turn off readers initially.

The legal writer should never forget that effective communication takes two—the writer and the reader. In the words of Quiller-Couch, > the obligation of courtesy rests first with the author, who invites the seance, and commonly charges for it. What follows, but that in speaking or writing we have an obligation to put ourselves into the hearer's or reader's place? It is his comfort, his convenience, we have to consult. To express ourselves is a very small part of the business: very small and unimportant as compares with impressing ourselves: the aim of the whole process being to persuade.

initiate is a FORMAL WORD for begin, open, or introduce.

initiate tenant by curtesy; tenant by the curtesy initiate. These phrases are both used, but are falling into disuse. See curtesy.

initio. See ab initio.

injoin is an obsolete spelling of enjoin, q.v. See EN-.

injudicious; injudicial. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. The antonym of judicial is nonjudicial. See judicial.

injunct is at best colloquial, and at worst downright wrong, for enjoin. E.g., "'There are no more copies left to be injuncted,' said the editor after the ruling." The word generally, and quite appropriately, does not appear in legal prose. See enjoin.

injunction. Temporary injunction (AmE) = interlocutory injunction (BrE). Permanent injunction (AmE) = perpetual injunction (BrE). See enjoinder. For the Scots-law equivalent of injunction, see interdict.

injunctional. See injunctive.

injunction enjoining is a common REDUNDANCY. E.g., "On the basis of these allegations, plaintiff moved for a temporary injunction enjoining [better: injunction prohibiting] the enforcement of the Michigan order." See enjoin.

injunctive; injunctional; injunctory. Injunctive is the standard word. E.g., "Monetary awards, like injunctive decrees, should be measured by the trade secrets' probable life." Injunctional, a NEEDLESS VARIANT not recorded in the major English-language dictionaries, has now been almost wholly displaced by injunctive—e.g.: "[T]here is a noticeable absence of judicial attempt so to enumerate the subjects of the remedy or delimit its field as to hamper the power of equity to grant injunctional [read injunctive] relief . . . ." Funk Jewelry Co. v. State ex rel. La Prade, 50 P.2d 945, 947 (Ariz. 1935)./ "[T]he injunctional [read injunctive] prohibition against picketing was supported by evidence of the unlawful purpose." International Bhd. of Carpenters & Joiners v. Todd L. Storms Constr. Co., 324 P.2d 1002, 1004 (Ariz. 1958).

The other NEEDLESS VARIANT, injunctory, is also uncommon—e.g.: "[S]he demands injunctory [read injunctive] relief." O'Hair v. Paine, 432 F.2d 66, 67 n.1 (5th Cir. 1970)./ "[T]he issue presented was whether plaintiff had standing . . . to bring this cause of action seeking injunctory [read injunctive] relief." Helbig v. Murray, 558 S.W.2d 772, 774 (Mo. Ct. App. 1977).

injuria. See injury.

injuria absque damno; injuria sine damno. The English equivalent of each phrase is injury without damage, which denotes a legal wrong that causes no actual damage. E.g., "It is a well-established principle that an injury without damage creates no right to compensation." (Cf. damnum absque injuria.) In this context, injuria and injury mean "a legal wrong," not "hurt." See LATINISMS.

injury; injuria. The latter, a LATINISM, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT in common-law contexts. See damage.

Inland Revenue Service. See Internal Revenue Service.

in-law, n., is generally hyphenated or spelled as one word.

in law. See under law.

in lieu of. A. Generally. The phrase in lieu of is now English, and instead of will not always suffice in its stead—e.g.: "The defendant was released in lieu of $10,000 bond."/ "It has been held that a testamentary gift in lieu of dower has priority over all other testamentary gifts."

B. In lieu without of. Omitting of from the phrase is a sure sign that instead would be an improvement over in lieu—e.g.: "[T]he Court is now empowered to refuse to permit rescission and to award damages in lieu [read instead]." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 309 (3d ed. 1981)./ "[A]n injunction is sometimes available against a refusal to contract; and it may be that damages can be awarded in lieu [read instead] even though the refusal gives rise to no cause of action at common law." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 925 (8th ed. 1991).

C. For in view of. The day after President Clinton announced his health-care plan in the fall of 1993, a radio host, broadcasting from the lawn of the White House, said to his listeners: "This morning we're going to discuss what state health care means in lieu of the President's new federal plan." This mistake—which is spreading—results from a confusion of in view of and in light of, either of which would have sufficed in that sentence. As it is, in lieu of is a MALAPROPISM when used for either of the other phrases.

in limine (= at the threshold or outset; preliminarily) is a LATINISM not likely to be displaced in lawyers' JARGON, esp. in the phrase motion in limine. But apart from that phrase, in limine is easily and advantageously Englished—e.g.: "[W]e are faced in limine [read initially] with a jurisdictional question." Haynes v. Felder, 239 F.2d 868, 869 (5th Cir. 1957)./ "If the courts continue to insist on a fiduciary relationship, a restitutionary proprietary claim against a tortfeasor may be defeated in limine [read at the outset]." Lord Goff of Chieveley & Gareth Jones, The Law of Restitution 622 (3d ed. 1986).

in loco parentis (= in the place of a parent) is perhaps a justified LATINISM. Generally, the term applies to guardians and not to trustees, but much depends upon context: "The trustee is requested to remember that, the child's guardians having gone away, he is expected to act in loco parentis." (Eng.)/ "In a majority of states, if the testator stands in loco parentis to the donee, the inter vivos gift is presumed to be intended in satisfaction of the testamentary provision." The in is a part of the Latin phrase and should be italicized if the rest of the phrase is in italics. See ITALICS (C).

A clever or not-so-clever law student—it is impossible to know which—once asked whether in loco parentis is synonymous with en ventre sa mère.

in memoriam is sometimes misspelled in memorium—e.g.: "A few days before May 13, 1970, in memorium [read memoriam] to the dead students at Kent State, white and black students at SFA conducted a large so-called 'candlelight march' . . . ." McGuire v. Roebuck, 347 F. Supp. 1111, 1115 (E.D. Tex. 1972).

innocence; innocency. The latter is an obsolete variant.

innocent until proven guilty. This, the usual rendering of the phrase, is perhaps tendentious because it suggests that guilt will ultimately be proved. Some criminal-law specialists therefore resort to the longer innocent unless and until proven guilty, which violates the SET PHRASE but is more legally accurate—e.g.: "The principle that a person should be presumed innocent unless and until proven guilty is a fundamental principle of fairness, although its relation to the law of evidence means that it is not always included in discussions of the criminal law." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 74 (1991).

innoculation. See inoculation.

innovative; innovatory; innovational. The second and third are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of the first: "Considerations of this sort did not . . . commend themselves to the judges of 1907 or their immediate successors. It was another unfortunate provision, they doubtless felt, in this innovatory [read innovative] Act." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 113 (1979)./ "Differences in the way firms explore these combinations lead to different innovational [read innovative] approaches and, ultimately, different degrees of success." Robert P. Merges, Commercial Success and Patent Standards, 76 Calif. L. Rev. 803, 853 (1988).

Inns of Court. This phrase, a proper noun, refers to four autonomous institutions in which English barristers receive their training: the Honourable Societies of Lincoln's Inn, the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, and Gray's Inn. These powerful bodies examine candidates for the Bar, "call" them to the Bar, and award the degree of barrister. Every bar student must join one of them, and every barrister remains a member for life unless he or she resigns or is disbarred. These bodies have been known as Inns of Court since the 1420s, though for centuries the phrase denoted primarily the buildings in which the four legal societies were housed.

innuendo. Early in its life as an English word, innuendo was a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY. In medieval Latin, innuendo (lit. "by nodding; meaning; to wit; that is to say") was used in legal documents to introduce a parenthetical explanation of precisely what a preceding noun or pronoun referred to. Thus Thomas Blount, in his early law dictionary entitled Glossographia (1656), wrote that innuendo "is a Law term, most used in Declarations and other pleadings . . . to declare and design the person or thing which was named incertain before; as to say, he (innuendo the Plaintiff) is a Theef."

By the 17th century, the word had taken on its current meaning, "an oblique remark or indirect suggestion, usu. of a derogatory nature." Because, by its nature, an innuendo must be in words, the phrase verbal innuendo is a REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "Yes of course sexual harassment by verbal innuendo [read innuendo] is vulgar . . . ." Russell Baker, Potomac Breakdown, N.Y. Times, 12 Oct. 1991, at 19. See verbal.

inoperative is a LEGALISM usu. meaning "invalid." E.g., "I do not find that part of the will would be inoperative unless applied to the power." In recent years it has become a VOGUE WORD among government bureaucrats.

In the law of contract, legal writers have given it a special and useful nuance. If a condition precedent fails, it is more precise to say that the contract is inoperative rather than void—i.e., the validity of the contract itself does not depend on the fulfillment of the condition precedent. See P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 146–47 (3d ed. 1981).

in order (to) (for) (that). The phrase in order to is often wordy for the simple infinitive: "We granted the writ of error in order to resolve [read to resolve] the conflicting decisions among courts of appeals."/ "In order to [read To] avoid probate and administration, it is often urged that a joint estate in the account has been created." Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 168 (2d ed. 1953).

In order for, which takes a noun, is often wordy for for: "The transformers had been energized in order for use by Jones [read energized for use by Jones] in the building operations."

Finally, in order that, which needs no reduction, begins a noun phrase expressing purpose: "We remand on the sentencing issue in order that the district court might conduct an evidentiary hearing on that issue." See LEGALISMS AND LAWYERISMS.

in pais (= outside court or legal proceedings) is legal JARGON deriving from LAW FRENCH, meaning literally "in the country (as opposed to in court)." Matter in pais, for example, means "a matter of fact that is not in writing." E.g., "[T]he facts from which equitable estoppels arise are all matters in pais as distinguished from records and deeds." 3 John N. Pomeroy & Spencer W. Symons, Equity Jurisprudence § 802, at 180 (5th ed. 1941).

Estoppel in pais = an estoppel not arising from a deed or contract, but, for example, from an express statement implied by conduct or negligence. E.g., "These articles embody the principal cases of estoppels in pais, as distinguished from estoppels by deed or by record." (Eng.) See estop & estoppel (B).

in pari delicto is legal JARGON meaning "in equal fault; equally culpable." E.g., "Plaintiffs who are truly in pari delicto are those who have themselves violated the law in cooperation with the defendant."/ "The district court dismissed the complaint, concluding that the investors were in pari delicto with the defendants and thus barred from recovery."

Some writers mistakenly write delictu—e.g.: "The court rejected the plaintiff's reliance on Buttrey to defeat the defense of in pari delictu [read in pari delicto] . . . ." Lank v. New York Stock Exch., 405 F. Supp. 1031, 1038 (S.D.N.Y. 1975). Cf. in flagrante delicto. See LATINISMS.

in pari materia (= upon the same matter or subject) is legal JARGON used in the context of interpreting statutes. The common maxim is that statutes in pari materia are to be construed together. Usually the phrase functions as an adjective—e.g.: "Sometimes there is, by statute, an appeal from them to the High Court, in which case it may be presumed that the High Court will consider itself bound by its previous decisions in pari materia." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 237 (7th Cir. 1964)./ "[I]t seems that the present position is that, when an earlier statute is in pari materia with a later one, it is simply part of its context to be considered by the judge in deciding whether the meaning of a provision in the later statute is plain." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 128 (1976).

At times the phrase denotes the doctrine and is therefore used as a noun—e.g.: "In pari materia finds its greatest force when the statutes are enacted by the same legislative body at the same time."

At other times the phrase is used adverbially—e.g.: "The federal estate tax and the federal gift tax . . . are construed in pari materia . . . ." Harris v. I.R.C., 340 U.S. 106, 107 (1950)./ "[T]he Maryland constitutional provision is construed in pari materia with the Fourth Amendment." Maryland v. Garrison, 55 U.S.L.W. 4190, 4192 (1987). See ITALICS (C) & LATINISMS.

in-patient should be hyphenated. Otherwise it is easily mistaken for impatient. E.g., "A limitation on in-patient hospital service to twenty-one days does not violate federal regulations." See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A).

in personam. A. And *personal. In personam is inferior to personal when used in the phrase in personam jurisdiction (= jurisdiction over a legal person). In many contexts, however, personal cannot substitute for in personam: "Plaintiff asserted an in personam admiralty claim against defendant for breach of the charter agreement." A claim in personam is one that is vested in a person and that imposes a liability against another person (such as a claim for repayment of a debt).

In personam occurs sometimes after, sometimes before the noun it qualifies. Traditionally it follows—e.g.: "The vast majority of federal cases are actions in personam." Likewise one refers to a judgment in personam (= a judgment rendered against a legal person) and to a right in personam (= a right availing against a specific legal person for liability). See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES

B. And in rem. An action is in personam when its purpose is to determine the rights and interests of the parties themselves in the subject matter of the action; an action is in rem when the court's judgment determines the title to property and the rights of the parties, not merely among themselves, but also against all persons at any time claiming an interest in the property at issue. In rem, then, means "availing against other persons generally and imposing on everyone a legal liability to respect the claimant's right."

Walter Wheeler Cook classified several very different ways in which these phrases are used:

> There seem to be at least four different uses which need to be distinguished: 1. These phrases are used in the classification of the so-called 'primary' rights which legal and equitable actions are supposed to protect and enforce. The classification here is, of course, the well-known one of rights in rem and rights in personam. 2. The next use has to do with the equally well-known classification of actions as actions in rem and actions in personam. 3. A third use is in the classification of judgments and decrees as in rem or in personam. 4. The fourth use refers to the procedure used by a court in the enforcement of its judgment or decree. Here the court is said to act in rem or act in personam, as the case may be, the usual statement being that the law does the former and equity the latter.
> Walter W. Cook, The Powers of Courts of Equity, 15 Colum. L. Rev. 37, 39 (1915).

C. Misspelled in personum. This fairly common mistake drew a "[sic]" from one court: "On March 31, 1976, attorneys for the other defendant in the case filed an amended motion to dismiss, alleging for the first time as grounds therein that '[t]his court lacks in personum [sic] jurisdiction over this defendant.'" Rauch v. Day & Night Mfg. Corp., 576 F.2d 697, 699 (6th Cir. 1978).

in pertinent part; in relevant part; in part. The last is best; the second, a variant of the first, is as verbose and jejune as the first. See QUOTATIONS (B)

in point; on point. Both terms, applied to prior judicial decisions, mean "apposite; discussing the precise issue now at hand." On point is now the more common phrase, but both are well established in the legal idiom. E.g., "Those cases fall into two classes, only one of which, in fact, is on point."/ "These cases are not in point as authority in our case."/ "More in point, the duties owed by a landowner depend on the role of the person injured on his premises."

Case in point is a popular idiom that originated in the law. See off point & POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.

in point of fact is verbose for in fact or actually. E.g., "It was early held that 'parents' and 'children' were words used to show an intention of indicating a family relation in point of fact [in fact a family relation] as the foundation of the right of action."

in praesenti, which means merely "in the present," is a LATINISM wholly without merit. E.g., "The question here determined is whether there was a valid declaration of trust operating in praesenti [omit in praesenti] between January 28 and May 3, 1929."/ "An irrevocable gift in praesenti [read present gift] of money or property, real or personal, to a child by a parent to enable the donee to anticipate his inheritance to the extent of the gift is known as an advancement." See in futuro.

in propria persona = pro se (q.v.). E.g., "Edward W. Bergquist appeared in propria persona." In re Victoria Co., 42 B.R. 533, 534 (Bankr. D. Minn. 1984)./ "He filed a claim of appeal and a brief in propria persona in the Court of Appeals." In re Sanchez, 375 N.W.2d 353, 355 (Mich. 1985). See pro persona.

input, n. & v.t. This jargonmonger's word is generally eschewed by careful writers. "Each decision-maker [q.v.] has a different optimal point of informational input [read advice or comment]."/ "Analysis is not restricted to studying the influence of precareer inputs [read the effect of precareer influences]." The English have the phrase input tax, statutorily defined in the Finance Act of 1977.

inquire; enquire. Inquire is a FORMAL WORD for ask. In AmE, in- is the preferred spelling. See EN- & enquiry.

inquirer; inquisitor. Inquirer is the more general of the two terms, meaning "one who asks questions or investigates." Inquisitor, not to be used where inquirer is called for, means "one who examines others to obtain information," and carries with it historical connotations of the Spanish Inquisition or trial by inquisition.

inquiry. See enquiry & EN-.

inquisitive; inquisitorial; inquisitional. Inquisitive = given to inquiry or questioning .

Inquisitorial has quite different connotations: "of the character of an inquisitor; offensively or impertinently inquiring, prying" (OED). E.g., "In an inquisitorial system of trial, the accused would himself be questioned by or before a judge, and the truth might then emerge." To contrast inquisitorial with accusatorial, see accusatorial.

Inquisitional is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of inquisitorial—e.g.: "A defendant may assert her own Fifth Amendment right to a fair trial as a valid objection to the introduction of statements extracted from a nondefendant by coercion or other inquisitional [read inquisitorial] tactics."

in re; en re; re. The correct spelling of the two-word version is in re (= regarding, in the matter of). Known to nonlawyers as a legalistic term, in re was once commonly used at the outset of legal documents, and now is often used before case names (particularly in uncontested proceedings)—e.g., In re Wolfson's Estate, which is frequently Englished In the Matter of Wolfson's Estate. The Bluebook (15th ed.) recommends (p. 57) changing citations that begin In the Matter of to In re.

Sometimes, in the driest of commercial correspondence, in re is shortened to re, the ablative inflection of the noun res; the ellipsis carries the same meaning as in re. Although some authorities object to this use of the term, its conciseness makes it well-nigh irreplaceable. The best practice is to restrict it to use as a signal or introductory title announcing the subject of correspon-

in rebus. See in rem.

in regards to is semiliterate. The idiomatic phrases are in regard to, in respect to (or of), and with respect to. E.g., "This phone call to Howard on behalf of Servotech was in regards to [read in regard to] purchasing weapons in the United States for delivery in the Republic of South Africa." See as regards.

in relevant part. See in pertinent part.

in rem; in rebus. The former is accusative singular ("in or against the thing"), the latter ablative plural ("in things"). Both are common parts of lengthier LATINISMS. See in personam.

in respect of can usually be replaced by a simpler substitute, as the New Zealand Court of Appeal has recognized: "In respect of is a phrase used more by lawyers and in official and business documents than in other writing or ordinary speech. Yet it cannot be said to have a precise legal meaning. Fowler's Modern English Usage does it justice by recommending that it be used as seldom as possible." Phonographic Performances (NZ) Ltd v. Lion Breweries Ltd, [1980] F.S.R. 383, (1979).

insanity. Although this word has a strong hold in criminal law, leading criminal-law writers have tried their best to uproot it. The primary objections are that the word insanity (1) is not as clear as mental disorder, which more obviously includes disease of the mind, congenital problems, and damage resulting from traumatic injury; (2) suggests misleadingly that it refers to a specific mental condition when in fact it refers to a broad array of conditions; (3) is mere legal JARGON, not a medical term at all. As to the third point, one writer states: "[Insanity] is a legal term only, and one that is not used by the psychiatrist; the latter prefers to speak of mental disorder, mental illness, or of psychosis or neurosis." Winfred Overholser, Psychiatry and the Law, 38 Mental Hygiene 243, 244 (1954).

insider is sometimes used as a shorthand for inside trader or trader in inside information. E.g., Kurt Eichenwald, Two Firms Are Charged as Insiders, N.Y. Times, 3 Nov. 1988, at 29.

insider trading; insider dealing. The former phrase predominates in AmE. E.g., "Only after being arraigned and fingerprinted did Mr. Wigton learn that he was being charged with insider trading . . . ." Steve Swartz & James B. Stewart, Kidder's Mr. Wigton, Charged as "Insider," Ends His Long Ordeal, Wall St. J., 21 Aug. 1989, at A10.

The phrase insider dealing is a primarily BrE term that denotes dealing on the stock exchange by a person who was, within the previous six months, knowingly connected with the company whose stock is dealt in. Such conduct is penalized by the U.K. Company Securities (Insider Dealing) Act 1985.

insidious; invidious. A distinction exists between these words. Insidious = (of persons and things) lying in wait or seeking to entrap or ensnare; operating subtly or secretly so as not to excite suspicion. E.g., "The officers of a trust company owe allegiance to the shareholders as well as to the beneficiaries, and the temptation to favor the shareholders may well be more insidious than the temptation of an individual trustee to favor himself."

Invidious = offensive; entailing odium or ill will upon the person performing, discharging, or discussing; giving offense to others (OED). This term is often used of discrimination, and has been for more than two centuries. E.g., "He failed to allege motivations of class-based invidious discrimination." The two words ought not to be used in the same sentence, as here: "Ugly in its practice and insidious in its effects, invidious racial discrimination deserves protection in no area of society, least of all in the administration of justice in federal courts." A workable revision might be to drop insidious altogether and write "invidious in its effects, racial discrimination . . . " insightful. This vague one-word CLICHÉ is sometimes misspelled inciteful—e.g.: "In assessing Morales' impact on the common law claims of plaintiffs, the court is fortunate to have available the inciteful [read insightful] opinion in Vail v. Pan Am Corp. . . ." El-Menshawy v. Egypt Air, 647 A.2d 491, 492 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1994). See inciteful.

insignia; insigne. Today insignia (technically plural) is regarded as the singular, insignias as its plural. E.g., "This insignia is two feet three inches in length and one foot four inches in height." Chicago Park Dist. v. Canfield, 19 N.E.2d 376, 377 (Ill. 1939). Cf. indicia.

The Latin singular insigne is rarely used, and when it does occasionally appear, it would be better as insignia—e.g.: "It was undisputed that he had never made use of the Indian insigne [read insignia] and had never attempted to imitate or copy the script of printing of the words, White Kitchen, as used by the plaintiff." Faciane v. Starner, 230 F.2d 732, 735 (5th Cir. 1956).

insipient. See incipient.

insist takes the preposition on, not in. E.g., "In a society that persists and insists in [read persists in and insists on, if the ALLITERATION is really necessary] permitting its citizens to own and possess weapons, it becomes necessary to determine who may and who may not acquire them."

insistence. So spelled—often misspelled -ance. See instance.

insistment, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of insistence, appears occasionally in legal writing, though it is not recorded in most English-language dictionaries. E.g., "The insistment [read insistence] of the plaintiff is twofold." Jelinek v. Sotak, 86 A.2d 684, 687 (N.J. 1952)./ "The wife objected, asserting that she would live in one room if need be rather than reside with her mother-in-law, but her spouse remained 'obdurate in his insistment [read insistence].'" Koch v. Koch, 232 A.2d 157, 160 (N.J. Super. Ct. 1967).

in situ (= in its original place; back in place) is a LATINISM used in property law. It is almost always unnecessary.

insofar as (= in such degree as), spelled thus in AmE and in so far as in BrE, is sometimes misused because its meaning is misunderstood. One does not know exactly what this writer, for instance, had in mind: "Insofar as important to this appeal, Greyhound defended this suit on the grounds that, when plaintiff's cause of action arose, O was not its employee, but was B's employee or an independent contractor." A better—and grammatical—way of beginning this sentence would be, What is important in this appeal is that Greyhound defended . . . . See inasmuch as.

insoluble; insolvable; unsolvable. Insoluble is used both of substances that will not dissolve in liquids and of problems that cannot be solved. E.g., "The powder, which is insoluble, sits at the bottom of the vial."/ "It relieves the legislature of a problem insoluble in bulk."

Insolvable is used only of problems that cannot be solved; some stylists prefer it to insoluble. Judge Henry Friendly, for example, referred to an essentially insolvable problem. Schine v. Schine, 367 F.2d 685, 688 (2d Cir. 1966) (Friendly, J., concurring).

Unsolvable should be avoided as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

insolvency = (1) generally, the inability to pay debts as they mature; (2) under the (U.S.) Bankruptcy Act of 1898, the insufficiency of assets at a fair valuation to pay debts; or (3) under other laws, the insufficiency of assets at a fair salable valuation to pay debts. See James A. MacLachlan, Handbook of the Law of Bankruptcy 10–13 (1956). Sense (2), sometimes called the balance-sheet insolvency test, is the predominant sense in civil-law jurisdictions. See bankruptcy.

insolvent. Nonlawyers are accustomed to using this word as an adjective <an insolvent debtor>, but lawyers sometimes used it attributively as a noun <an insolvent>—e.g.: "An insolvent can obey an order not to commit a threatened tort . . . ." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 76 (1991).

in specie. See specie.

in spite of. See despite.

inst. = short for instant. Wood writes that this was "once a quite respectable legal term, now a piece of commercial jargon for 'the present month' (e.g., 'We beg to recognise the receipt of your letter of the 25th inst.'). Use the name of the month instead." F.T. Wood, Current English Usage 123 (1962). The advice is well taken. Cf. ult.

instal(l)ment. Instalment is the BrE spelling, installment the spelling preferred in AmE.

instance; instancy. Instance "in the sense of urgent solicitation or insistence [always in the phrase at the instance of] is a useful word; in any other sense it is useless." Percy Marks, The Craft of Writing 53 (1932). Another legitimate meaning of the word is "an illustrative example." Here the word is useless: "It seems plain that in at least the vast majority of instances [delete the italicized words] such a purported conveyance of lifetime services would usually (or almost always) be unenforceable and essentially nugatory under applicable state law."

Following are examples of the use, largely legal, that has substantive value: "Thousands of government employees would object to being forced to take polygraph tests at the instance of their supervisors."/ "In 1804, the Court of Session of Scotland interdicted, at the instance of the children, the publication of the manuscript letters of the poet Burns."/ "Apart from a limited class of expectations, a minor's contracts are not void but only voidable at his instance."

Instancy, a rare term, means "urgency; pressing nature; imminence" <the instancy of the danger was apparent to all>.

For the misuse of incidence for instance, see incidence.

instance, v.t., = to cite as an instance, to adduce as an example in illustration or proof (OED). E.g., "Nowhere in the record is to be found any remark by the trial judge smacking of impropriety in the faintest degree, let alone any such as those instanced above."/ "'Uno' is better analogized to a term such as 'Del Monte,' instanced in Pick 'N' Fly, Inc. v. Park & Fly, Inc."

instantaneously; instantly. "Instantly is virtually a synonym of at once, directly, and immediately, though perhaps the strongest of the four. Instantaneously is applied to something that takes an inappreciable time to occur, like the taking of an instantaneous photograph, especially to two events that occur so nearly simultaneously that the difference is imperceptible" (MEU2 288). E.g., "He was killed instantaneously [read instantly] in the collision of that car with the truck driven by the defendant." Cf. instanter.

instant case; instant cause; present case; case at bar. These equivalent phrases, though sometimes useful, can often be avoided by here, if not used vaguely. Some variation of all these terms may be desirable to avoid verbal tedium, but one should not be so obvious as to lapse into INELEGANT VARIATION.

Instant case is sometimes used where this case would be preferable. E.g., "Appellant and her husband brought the instant [read this] products-liability case against the manufacturer of the chair."

Instant (= now under consideration), labeled an ARCHAISM by the OED, is alive in the law, and has been extended beyond the basic phrase instant case: "Since the instant will has been previously construed as permitting newborn grandnieces and grandnephews to enter the class, the composition of the class has not yet been determined."/ "According to the parties' stipulation in this case, it is expected with respect to the instant bonds that more than half of the debt service requirements will be satisfied not from real property taxes but from revenues from other local taxes."/ "The district court dismissed the instant petition for abuse of the writ." This bit of legal JARGON ought to be used sparingly if at all. See case at bar.

instanter, a silly LATINISM to find in an English-language context, easily makes our list of FORBIDDEN WORDS. Apart from facetiousness, there is no good reason for preferring instanter to instantly or at once. There are several reasons, however, for preferring instantly. First, it is universally comprehensible among speakers of English. Second, it conveys the nuances available to either term. Third, it is not, like its cousin the Latinism, pompous (e.g., "Study of, and, if study warrants, changes in land use control cannot be completed instanter [read instantly]."). And fourth, it is not susceptible to the ambiguity of instanter, which a few courts have held to mean "within 24 hours."

Adding to the utter dispensability of instanter, some legal writers have failed to understand that the term is an adverb and have misused it as if it were an adjective: "It was an excessive statement made in the heat of the closing argument of a hard-fought case, one which was objected to and subjected to [see ALLITERATION] an instanter cautionary instruction." The writer should have used immediate.

All that being said, the jocular contexts do exist in which instanter is just the word—e.g.: "The worst woman I ever knew . . . had a face [that] for purity and innocence I can only compare with Raphael's 'Madonna,' and some of the best men and women who have crossed my path would have been convicted instanter under any laws founded on Cesare Lombroso's theories." F.W. Ashley, My Sixty Years in the Law 163 (1936).

instantiate (= to represent by an instance), a vintage World War II NEOLOGISM of questionable value. E.g., "The reference to defendant's silence constitutes harmless error; Chapman's fate is to instantiate [read exemplify] this third rule."

instantly. See instantaneously.

in statu quo is a LATINISM properly equivalent to in statu quo ante (= in the same condition as previously). Some writers have quite understandably assumed that there was a distinction between in statu quo and in statu quo ante, and have used the former merely to mean "in the status quo; in the same condition as now exists." In the two examples that follow, the phrase is correctly used: "The fact that the parties cannot be put in statu quo precisely as to the subject-matter of the contract will not preclude a decree for rescission."/ "Depriving one of the benefit of a contract that he supposes he has made leaves everything in statu quo, rather than imposing a liability to which no limit can be placed." See ITALICS (C).

The foregoing discussion is largely beside the point, however, since the English renditions of the phrase are preferable to the Latinate. One should write in the status quo (present condition) or in the status quo ante (previous condition). See status quo.

instil(l). The preferred spelling in AmE is instill. Instil is preferred in BrE. This word takes the preposition (in)to, not with <he instilled character as well as knowledge into his students>. Use of the latter preposition occurs as a result of confusion of inspire with instill. See OBJECT-SHUFFLING.

In the following sentence, instill in is misused for confer on: "Presence within a state, even temporary or transitory presence, is still a common-law basis instilling competence in [read conferring competence on] the courts of that state to adjudicate claims against a person."

instinct (= imbued or charged with) is a recherché usage that has given the law a memorable idiom: "The whole contract is instinct with such an obligation."/ "There are times when reciprocal engagements do not fit each other like the parts of an indented deed, and yet the whole contract . . . may be 'instinct with an obligation,' imperfectly expressed." (Cardozo, J.)/ "The personal atmosphere of the Court of Appeal today is instinct with comity and friendliness." Asquith, L.J., [1950] J.S.P.T.L. 353.

instinctive; instinctual. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

institute is a FORMAL WORD for begin or start. Cf. commence. See begin (B).

institute proceedings is a highfalutin way of saying file suit.

instruct = to give information as a client to (as a solicitor) or as a solicitor to (a counsel); or (2) to authorize (a solicitor or barrister) to act for one. E.g., "This cause has been carefully instructed with evidence by the practisers, who have had the conduct of it." (Eng.) See advise (C).

instructed verdict. See directed verdict.

instrument = a formal legal document that entails rights, duties, and liabilities, such as a contract, will, note, bill of exchange, money order, share certificate, and the like. E.g., "A will and codicil are separate instruments for the purpose of execution; it would seem better to require separate physical acts of revocation." Often the word can be supplanted to advantage by writing or document, terms understandable to nonlawyers.

The word instrument strongly suggests a document that is the result of DRAFTING—i.e., a document that sets forth the rights, duties, and liabilities of parties or beneficiaries. To call a piece of written advocacy an instrument is to mangle the legal idiom: "No instrument [read document] of this character [i.e., a brief] is in use in England." William M. Lile et al. Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 366 (3d ed. 1914). [Or: No such document is in use in England.]

In any event, the phrase written instrument and instrument in writing are redundancies when a legal instrument is clearly contemplated, inasmuch as there is no such thing as an oral instrument. See document. Cf. statutory instrument.

insue is an archaic spelling of ensue, q.v.

in suit = in dispute, or (engaged) in a lawsuit. E.g., "No further incentive is needed to produce the information in suit." The notation in the OED that this phrase from legal JARGON is obsolete proved to be premature. Yet the phrase is hardly common.

insurable. So spelled.

insurance. A. Pronunciation. This word is pronounced with the primary accent on the second syllable /in-shoor-ənsl.

B. Two Species. Insurance is of two kinds. One is insurance against accidents: buildings burning, ships sinking, cars colliding, being injured, and the like. The other—in BrE frequently called assurance—is provision for designated persons on the occurrence of death (life insurance [AmE] or life assurance [BrE]). See assurance.

insurance adjuster (AmE) = insurance assessor (BrE).

insure. See assure.

insured, n., like deceased and accused, forms an awkward plural and possessive. E.g., "This type of policy is often used to provide for the education of children or for the insured's retirement." An equivalent term, insurant, solves this infelicity but is little known. See PLURALS (D) & POSSESSIVES (F). insurer; insuror. The -or form should be avoided. See underwriter.

insurgence; insurgency. These two words have undergone DIFFERENTIATION Insurgence = a revolt; the action of rising against authority. Insurgency = the quality or state of being in revolt; the tendency to rise in revolt (OED).

insurrection. See sedition.

insurrectionary; insurrectional. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

in tail. See tail.

integral; integrant. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT as an adjective; but it exists legitimately as a noun (meaning "component"): "A res is a necessary integrant of the concept of 'constructive trust.'"

integr(at)able. The correct form is integrable. See -ATABLE.

integrated bar. This is an odd name for a bar in which membership is compulsory for anyone wishing to practice law. To the nonlawyer, the phrase is likely to give rise to a MISCUE, as one writer recognized with his parenthetical: "Twenty-seven states have integrated bars. (Nothing to do with racial relations. All lawyers in these integrated-bar states have to be members of the bar association in order to practice.)" Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 161 (1970). See bar.

integration clause; merger clause. These synonymous terms refer to a contractual provision stating that the contract represents the parties' complete and final agreement and supersedes all informal understandings and oral agreements relating to the subject matter of the contract.

intellectual property comprises two subdivisions: industrial property and copyright. Industrial property includes patents, inventions, trademarks, and industrial designs. Copyrights are property rights in literary, musical, artistic, photographic, and film works, as well as in maps and technical drawings. See R.P. Benko, Protecting Intellectual Property Rights 2–3 (1987).

intelligent. In lay usage this word is usually confined to descriptions of persons; in legal writing it is used just as frequently of acts as it is of persons. An intelligent act is one that is carried out comprehendingly. E.g., "When a defendant admits his guilt in open court, he may attack only the voluntary and intelligent character of the act." See HYPALLAGE.

intelligent; intelligible. The former means (of persons) "having mental power or grasp," the latter (of statements) "understandable."

intend = (1) in ordinary language, to desire that a consequence will follow from one's conduct; or (2) in legal language, to contemplate that consequences of one's act will necessarily or probably follow from the act, whether or not those consequences are desired for their own sake.

intendment = (1) the sense in which the law understands something; or (2) a decision-maker's inference about the true meaning or intention of (a legal instrument). E.g. (Sense 1): "The evidence produced upon the trial, with all its legal intendments, failed to fairly tend to prove that plaintiff's discharge was accomplished by the illegal acts of defendant."/ (Sense 2): "We must take the language of the section as we find it; there is no reason for any intendment."

Lon Fuller explained the term somewhat differently: "Our institutions and our formalized interactions with one another are accompanied by certain interlocking expectations that may be called intendments, even though there is seldom occasion to bring these underlying expectations across the threshold of consciousness. In a very real sense when I cast my vote in an election my conduct is directed and conditioned on the anticipation that my ballot will be counted in favor of the candidate I actually vote for. . . . [T]he institution of elections may be said to contain an intendment that the votes cast will be faithfully tallied . . . ." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 217 (rev. ed. 1976).

This specialized legal term should never be used as a fancy variant of intention or intent (both of which mean "purpose, aim, design, meaning). (See intent.) Common intendment = the natural meaning in legal construction. Intendiment is an obsolete form of intendment.

intense; intensive. The best advice, which is conventional, is to shun intensive wherever intense will fit the context. Intensive is really a philosophical and scientific term best left to philosophers and scientists; we lawyers can make do rather nicely with intense: "A firsthand familiarity with the type of participation required of a defendant would not be meaningfully supplemented by intensive [read intense] scrutiny on appeal."/ "The striking divergence of opinion conspicuously exemplifies the need for dealing somewhat more intensively [read intensely] and systematically than is usual with the nature and analysis of all types of jural interests."

intent(ion). A. Defining intention. "The general legal opinion," writes Glanville Williams, "is that intention cannot be satisfactorily defined and does not need a definition, since everyone knows what it means. This is largely true. Trouble has been caused in the past because when judges have offered to give definitions or tests of intention for the benefit of the jury they have used wide language going beyond the ordinary meaning of the word." Textbook of Criminal Law 51 (1978). The same must be said of intent, though the two words have subtle connotative differences. See (B).

B. Intent and intention. If any distinction may be drawn between intent and intention, it must be connotative: one has evil intent, but good intentions; one has the intent to murder, and the intention to do something either morally neutral or laudable. This distinction has not been fossilized in the language, however; often intent is used of neutral and even good motives, and arguably one may have bad as well as good intentions. Euphony usually governs the choice of word.

The usual phrase is testamentary intent, although testamentary intention has appeared. Following are sentences in which intent appears in reference to gifts or transfers of property: "We discovered the intent of the grantor from other factors, as shown by the instrument, to give full effect to the words of limitation."/ "The charity has no large discretionary power in carrying out the general intent of the donor."/ "The analogy of the 'fraudulent conveyance' from the creditors'-rights field has appealed to some courts, but others consider the issue of intent too difficult to administer."

Intention is also sometimes used: "The next question is whether it is a valid defence to an action for passing off that the defendant had no intention to deceive." (Eng.)/ "As long as the purposes to which the property is to be applied are limited to charitable purposes, there is no reason why the trust should not be carried out in accordance with the intention of the testator." Intention takes the infinitive form of the verb, not the present participle. E.g., "He then announced his intention of running [read intention to run] for governor."

Intent and intention are liable to INELEGANT VARIATION. E.g., "Such a construction results in a rule that the grantor must expressly indicate his intention [read intent, for the sake of consistency] to create a remainder in his heirs, or a presumption in favor of reversions that may be rebutted by indication of the grantor's contrary intent."/ "Her intent in executing the paper, at least as far as such intent is now before us, must be determined by the court as a matter of law. The paper writing does not declare an intention [read intent] to revoke the will except through its destruction, either wholly or as far as Hart is concerned by O'Kennedy."

C. And motive. The motive is the inducement for doing an act; the intent is the resolve to commit an act. Stated differently, motive relates to the end; intent relates to the means. One court has said of these two words (and two others, deliberation and purpose): "One reason [that these words] are often confused is that they are used synonymously in ordinary speech." Snakenberg v. Hartford Casualty Ins. Co., 383 S.E.2d 2, 7 n.7 (S.C. Ct. App. 1989). See motive.

D. And purpose. For the erroneous use of purpose for intention, see purpose (B).

E. Specific intent in Criminal Law. Specific intent – any intention involved in the definition of a crime. Williams considers the phrase unhelpful. "The adjective 'specific' seems to be somewhat pointless, for the intent is no more specific than any other intent required in criminal law. The most it can mean is that the intent is specifically referred to in the indictment. There is no substantive difference between an intent specifically mentioned and one implied in the name of the crime." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 49 (2d ed. 1961).

Other writers point out, however, that because the test for specific intent is subjective rather than objective—and therefore more particularized to a defendant's actual state of mind—it conveys a useful sense: "There is no question . . . that [specific intent] refers to a subjective inquiry into the defendant's actual state of mind. For this reason, in a prosecution for a specific-intent crime many courts do not permit an instruction that a person is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts. Intent to kill, intent to steal, and intent to rape would all be 'specific intents' . . . . The phrase thus refers to some particular state of mind required by the definition of the offense." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 230–31 (1982). See general intent.

F. Particular intention; general intention; transferred intention. These are the three types of criminal intention (or malice, q.v.) from the victim's point of view. Particular intention involves a particular victim as its target. General intention (sometimes called general malice) involves no particular victim (as when someone explodes a bomb to destroy a building), but the intention to harm anyone who ends up being harmed is generally ascribed to the perpetrator. Transferred intention (or transferred malice) occurs when harm intended for one person befalls another by accident.

intentional. For the distinction between unintentional and involuntary, see unintentional.

intentional murder. See murder (A).

intents and purposes, for all. See for all intents and purposes.

INTER-, INTRA-. These prefixes have quite different meanings. Inter- means "between, among." Intra- means "within, in." Thus interstate means "between states" and intrastate means "within a state." Lawyers have recently created any number of NEOLOGISMS with these prefixes, primarily with inter-: interagency, interbranch, intercircuit, intercorporate, intermunicipal, and the like.

inter alia; inter alios. The best course, undoubtedly, is to use among others, a phrase that can refer to people or things. The Latin is not so simple. Whereas inter alia (= among other things) refers to anything that is not human, inter alios (= among other persons) refers to people. (The unanglicized form inter alias means "among other female persons.")

Both anglicized phrases are used more in legal writing than elsewhere. Inter alia is the much more common phrase—e.g.: "When the balance of the purchase price was not paid on the due date, the vendor resold the house and brought this action for damages for, inter alia, the deficiency on the resale." (Aus.) Though not common, inter alios occurs far more frequently in legal than in nonlegal writing: "The Senate report stated that the residual section was intended to reach, inter alios, 'a person who induces another to remain silent or to give misleading information to a federal law enforcement officer.'"

The misuse of inter alia for inter alios is on the rise—e.g.: "It makes no sense to create a system in which the inferior officers of the Environmental Protection Agency, for example—which may include, inter alia [read inter alios] bureau chiefs, the general counsel and administrative law judges—must be appointed by the President, the Courts of Law, or the Secretary of Something Else." Freytag v. I.R.C., 501 U.S. 868, 919–20 (1991) (Scalia, J., concurring).

In the following sentence, the phrase is not only wrong but also misplaced: "A contract between, inter alia, the manufacturer and one of its former employees, [read between the manufacturer and, inter alios, one of its former employees,] wherein the former employee expressly agreed not to disclose any of the processes and methods of the manufacturer, was an admission of a positive character that such processes and methods were secret."

intercourse. In modern usage, even lawful intercourse has sexual overtones that are not to be ignored. The term is best avoided in its traditional sense "mutual dealings and communication." E.g., "Notwithstanding that lawyers are often arrayed against each other as champions of opposing forces, their intercourse [read dealings with one another] should be friendly."/ "The means commonly used is the inducing of others to withdraw from such companies their patronage and business intercourse by threats."/ "The libel in this case deprived plaintiff of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse." To most modern readers this use of the term is an ARCHAISM.

Commerce was formerly used in virtually all senses of intercourse, including in the phrase sexual commerce (= sexual intercourse): "Sexual commerce or intercourse and carnal knowledge are synonymous terms." 44 Am. Jur. Rape § 2 (1942). See commerce.

interdict (= to forbid, restrain) is a FORMAL WORD often occurring in legal writing. E.g., "A supersedeas bond is a privilege extended to the judgment debtor as a price of interdicting the validity of an order to pay money."/ "Both cases followed and applied the due process test set out in Ferguson and construed its bias prohibition to interdict only actual bias, not the mere appearance of bias."/ "The defendants argue that all the interests in Bernard's estate will necessarily vest before the expiration of the period interdicted by the Rule against Perpetuities." The noun is interdiction. E.g., "In November 1981, the United States entered into an arrangement with Great Britain respecting the interdiction of vessels suspected of carrying illicit drugs."/ "On May 27, after a three-day hearing, the court granted a preliminary injunction that continued the interdictions of the restraining order."

Interdict is also a civil-law term used as a noun in a sense close to "injunction." E.g., "This is an application on notice of motion in which the applicant asks for a declaration of rights and for an interdict." (Rhod.) It also serves as a verb: in Scotland, for example, one petitions the court to interdict trespass.

interest. For its most general sense, see right, title, and interest. For the distinction between interest and dividend in corporate law, see dividend.

interest, legal rate of. The phrase refers to the rate of interest imposed as a matter of law where none is provided for contractually. But it suggests, perhaps misleadingly, a legal ceiling.

interests in community. See concurrent interests.

interface, v.i., is jargonmongers' talk. E.g., "This man possesses the ability to interface and relate with people from all social and economic levels." Interface should be left to COMPUTERESE.

interferee, for person interfered with, is legal JARGON without much to be said in its defense—e.g.: "The court is not aware of any decisions in which the relationship between the interferer and the interferee [read person interfered with] was that of coventures or prospective coventures." United Euram Corp. v. Occidental Petroleum Corp., 474 N.Y.S.2d 372, 375 (Sup. Ct. 1984)./ "[T]ortious interference with a business relationship . . . has four requirements: . . . (2) knowledge of the relationship or expectancy on the part of the interferee [read party interfered with] . . . ." Upjohn Co. v. Riahom Corp., 650 F. Supp. 485, 488 n.4 (D. Del. 1986). See -EE interference, in the JARGON of American patent lawyers, has a special legal meaning: "a proceeding to decide which of two patent applicants is the first inventor." The interference may involve an application and a patent, as long as the claim is made in the application before one year from the date on which the patent was issued. See Louis B. Applebaum et al., Glossary of United States Patent Practice 63 (1969).

interfering with contractual relations. See tortious interference with contractual relations.

interim relief. See interlocutory relief.

interlocutor = (1) a person who takes part in a dialogue (U.S. and G.B.); or (2) a judicial pronouncement or court order (Scots law).

interlocutory injunction. See injunction.

interlocutory relief; interim relief. Interlocutory relief is the phrase used in AmE and BrE to mean "a temporary judicial remedy, such as a preliminary injunction." Interim relief is an equivalent term sometimes used in BrE.

intermarriage. One word, but usu. a NEEDLESS VARIANT of marriage—e.g.: "Some statutes provide that intermarriage [read marriage] of the parties subsequent to the offense [of seduction] is a bar to prosecution therefor . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 464 (3d ed. 1982).

intermarry should not be used for marry, which itself necessarily implies mutuality. This old-fashioned LEGALISM suggests to the modern reader a hint that the writer is concerned about miscegenation—e.g.: "Before that time, his daughter, Martha Florence, had intermarried with [read had married] R.P. Watson, and five children were born unto them." Intermarry should be laid to rest, except when one conveys the nuance of marrying only within a specified group.

intermeddle is always spelled with two d's. One might not have thought intermedling to be anything but a typographical error, but it appears that way consistently in a popular primer on torts.

intermeddler, officious. See officious.

interment; internment. Interment = burial. Internment = detention, esp. of aliens in wartime.

In burial contexts, the word internment frequently ousts the proper word—e.g.: "[T]he internment [read interment] or other disposition of the deceased's body is an extremely important emotional catharsis for the family and friends of the deceased." Bock v. Los Angeles County, 197 Cal. Rptr. 470, 474 (Ct. App. 1983)./ "These cases make clear that the common law rule applies only to individual purchasers of burial spaces for direct internment [read interment] purposes." In re Memorial Estates, Inc., 90 B.R. 886, 901 (N.D. Ill. 1988).

in terms. See terms, in.

in terms of is often nothing more than a FLOTSAM PHRASE—e.g.: "The development in the application of a constitutional provision may be shown in terms of [read through] the power of the federal government to prohibit commerce." Edward H. Levi, An Introduction to Legal Reasoning 62 (1949; repr. 1972). See VERBOSITY.

Internal Revenue Service (U.S.) = Inland Revenue Service (U.K.). Each is referred to informally as the IRS.

international. To the international lawyer, the word international (= of or relating to the legal relations among states or nations) is an antonym of municipal (= of or relating to the internal government of a state or nation). See municipal.

international law; jus gentium; law of nations. These phrases are generally synonymous in meaning "the system of law regulating the interrelationship of sovereign states and their rights and duties vis-à-vis one another." International law—the newest of these phrases, a Bentham NEOLOGISM dating from 1789—is the predominant term nowadays. See jus gentium.

The phrase international law, however, also has a broader sense, in which it covers not just the law of nations (as defined above) but also private international law, or the conflict of laws. In this broader sense, international law is concerned with "the rights of persons within the territory and dominion of one nation, by reason of acts, private or public, done within the dominions of another nation . . . ." Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113, 163 (1895).

internecine = mutually deadly; destructive of both parties. The word is often misused in hyperbolic ways—e.g.: "[T]he judiciary, in fact and of necessity, has absolutely no interest in internecine [read rancorous] battles over social etiquette or the unprofessional personality clashes [that] frequently occur among opposing counsel these days." Amax Coal Co. v. Adams, 597 N.E.2d 350, 352 (Ind. Ct. App. 1992)./ "A private association of volunteer fire fighters chose to remove four individuals from its membership after an internecine [read a bitter?] struggle." Yeager v. City of McGregor, 980 F.2d 337, 344 (5th Cir. 1993)./ "During the Carter administration, the biggest internecine [delete internecine] schism within the Democratic Party involved disagreements over health care reform." James F. Blumstein, Health Care Reform: The Policy Context, 29 Wake Forest L. Rev. 15, 15 (1994).

internment. See interment.

inter partes, the antonym of ex parte (q.v.), means "between parties; involving all parties to a lawsuit." This LATINISM—hardly a TERM OF ART—seems to be of little use. It is rare in American but common in British legal writing. E.g., "On its face it is an instrument inter partes [read between parties]." (Eng.)/ "In an inter partes proceeding [read a proceeding between two or more parties or an adversary proceeding,] notice on the petition is given to all interested persons by publication."/ "In the inter-partes [read adversary] proceeding, based upon the English 'solemn' form, notice to interested parties is required and the contestant submits evidence against the will."

If the phrase were to be Englished, interparty, which already has limited currency, would serve well—but only preceding the noun it modifies.

interpellate. See interpolate.

interplead, v.t. A. Who Interpleads. In an interpleader, it is traditionally the adverse parties claiming a right to the property held by the stakeholder that are said to interplead their claims. Jowitt, for example, states: "When a person is in possession of property in which he claims no interest, but to which two or more other persons lay claim, and he, not knowing to whom he may safely give it up, is sued by one or both, he can compel them to interplead . . . ." W.A. Jowitt, The Dictionary of English Law 997 (Clifford Walsh ed., 1959).

From the late 19th century, however, it has become common to say that the stakeholder interpleads the two contending parties. E.g., "The insurance company, not knowing where the payment should go between the three, interpleaded the claimants [read go, initiated an interpleader among the three claimants]."/ "The insurance company interpleaded the parties . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 59 (1930). See interpleader (A).

B. Past Tense and Past Participle. The past-tense and past-participle forms are interpleaded, not interpled. E.g., "The adverse claims of the interpled parties [read interpleaded parties or, better, interpleading parties] must, of course, concern the same property or the same debt." See plead.

interpleader. A. General Sense and Uses. Interpleader = a suit pleaded between two parties to determine a matter of claim or right to property held by a usu. disinterested third party (called a stakeholder, q.v.) who is in doubt about which claimant should have the property, the purpose of the suit being to determine to which claimant delivery or payment ought to be made. Despite its appearance, then, interpleader generally denotes a type of lawsuit and not a person; that is, the word is not ordinarily an agent noun. See -ER (B).

The equivalent term in Scots law is multiplepoinding.

B. As an Agent Noun. The OED lists, as one sense of interpleader, "one who interpleads," but notes: "it is doubtful whether the word is more than a dictionary assumption due to a misunderstanding . . . ." The sole support for the definition and note is a quotation from Worcester's 1846 dictionary. Today the word is not a "dictionary assumption"; it is a bona fide blunder. E.g., "[A]n interpleader action cannot be maintained if the interpleader [read stakeholder] asserts any right or interest against interpleaded claimants." State Compensation Fund v. Superior Court, 466 P.2d 802, 806 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1970)./ "Affirmed order to allow interpleaders [read interpleading parties] access to discovery." Stan Soocher, Court Decisions—U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals, Nat'l L.J., 6 Aug. 1990, at 46. See -ER (B).

interpolate; interpellate. The former means "to insert into a text or writing"; the latter, used in legislative reports, means "to question formally; to seek information."

interpose for submit <to interpose a demurrer> is the term traditionally used for pleadings and motions made by the defense. E.g., "The counterclaimant has failed to advance a justifiable reason for its failure to timely interpose a claim."/ "The defense of forum non conveniens could be interposed, and, if meritorious, the Illinois court would dismiss the case."

interpretation; construction. There are two schools of thought with regard to how these terms apply to statutes and other types of DRAFTING. One has it that, although "interpretation and construction are generally regarded as synonymous and used interchangeably, it is not only possible, but desirable as well, to draw a distinction. The word interpretation is used with respect to language itself; it is the process of applying the legal standard to expressions found in the agreement in order to determine their meaning. Construction, on the other hand, is used to determine, not the sense of the words or symbols, but the legal meaning of the entire contract; the word is rightly used wherever the import of the writing is made to depend upon a special sense imposed by law." 4 Samuel Williston, Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 602, at 320 (3d ed. 1961). See Frederick Bowers, Linguistic Aspects of Legislative Expression 166 (1989) (calling the distinction "in keeping with general hermeneutic terminology"). See construction.

The other school of thought—perhaps more consistent with actual usage—utterly rejects Williston's view: "Some authors have attempted to introduce a distinction between interpretation and construction. Etymologically there is, perhaps, a distinction; but it has not been accepted by the profession. For practical purposes any such distinction may be ignored, in view of the real object of both interpretation and construction, which is merely to ascertain the meaning and will of the lawmaking body, in order that it may be enforced." William M. Lile et al., Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 337 (3d ed. 1914).

interpretative; interpretive; interpretational. Generally, one forms the adjective on the model of the nominal form of a word. Hence prevention yields preventive, not preventative. But with interpretation, the correct adjectival form is interpretative (= having the character or function of interpreting; explanatory), which should be used consistently. E.g., "[T]he common law, or even statute law, once encrusted with interpretative case-law, is not the work of a single mind, or even of a small number of minds." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 73 (1983).

Interpretive, although it has gained ground in the last 50 years, should be laid to rest. E.g., "Appellant filed for rehearing of the new interpretive [read interpretative] rule under the FPA."/ "The question here is whether due process authorizes the Court to resort to noninterpretive [read noninterpretative] modes of constitutional adjudication."

Given, though, the fact that interpretivism (q.v.) is a linguistic fait accompli, one would be hard put to argue very strenuously against interpretive. Though it may not be condemned, it should be avoided by those who know better.

Interpretational is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "The courts do not all follow a single basic interpretational [read interpretative] technique . . . ." James J. White & Robert S. Summers, Uniform Commercial Code § 4, at 18 (3d ed. 1988).

interpretivism; noninterpretivism. Among American constitutional lawyers, the terms interpretivism and noninterpretivism have become standard words for certain doctrines of constitutional interpretation. Although they have been called "misleading labels," they are unlikely to disappear. Though one might have preferred that the words be interpretationism and noninterpretationism, the ill-formed versions are probably too well entrenched to be easily uprooted. Cf. interpretative.

The so-called interpretivists "believe that the Court must confine itself to norms clearly stated or implied in the language of the Constitution," while the noninterpretivists "believe that the Court may protect norms not mentioned in the Constitution's text or in its preratification history." Erwin Chemerinsky, The Price of Asking the Wrong Question, 62 Tex. L. Rev. 1207, 1208–09 (1984). Cf. strict construction.

interregnum. Pl. -nums, -na. The English plural (-ums) is preferred. See PLURALS (A). interrogate is a FORMAL WORD for question; it suggests formal or rigorous questioning.

interrogatee; interrogee. W3 lists interrogee (= someone interrogated), not interrogatee, but the OED lists interrogatee, not interrogee. Since the agent noun is interrogator, it makes more sense to prefer the corresponding passive form, interrogatee.

interrogation. See custodial interrogation.

interrogative; interrogatory, adj.; interrogational. Interrogative (= of, pertaining to, or of the nature of, questioning: having the form or force of a question [OED]). The other forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

interrogatory, n.; interrogation. Interrogatory = a legal questionnaire submitted to an opposing party as part of pretrial discovery. Interrogation = (1) the act or process of questioning in depth; or (2) questioning as a form of discourse.

interrogee. See interrogatee.

in terrorem (= as a warning; intimidating) is used in legal JARGON primarily of clauses in wills that threaten to dispossess any beneficiaries who challenge the terms of the will. E.g., "The in terrorem clause provides the penalty of forfeiture against anyone who shall contest in any court any of the provisions of this instrument."/ "Whatever else may be said, it is clear that when equity contempt decrees rely upon in terrorem fines, or the prospect of compensatory damages for effectiveness, the contention that equity acts in personam is further modified." Justice Frankfurter made literary use of the LATINISM: "[T]here is nothing judicially more unseemly nor more self-defeating than for this Court to make in terrorem pronouncements. . . ." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 270 (1962) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). See ITALICS (C).

No-contest clause is often used as an anglicized equivalent of in terrorem clause in the context of wills. E.g., "While we find that the appellant cannot take under the provisions of the will by virtue of the no-contest clause, the testator cannot rewrite sections 41 and 43 of the Probate Code to prevent appellant from exercising her right to take as an heir."

inter se (= between or among themselves) is an unjustified LATINISM. "The parties are supposed to have agreed inter se [read among themselves] that the deed shall not be given in evidence without the attesting witness's being called to depose to the circumstances attending its execution."/ "'Consortium' has come to mean the reciprocal rights and duties of both husband and wife inter se [omit inter se: it is redundant after reciprocal and both] resulting from marriage."/ "The Uniform Commercial Code reaffirms from the first the general freedom of the parties to determine their obligations inter se [read between themselves]." See FORBIDDEN WORDS (A) & LATINISMS.

Inter sese is a variant form of the phrase without any difference in meaning—e.g.: "Many arrangements for economy of expense and for convenience of administration may be made between carriers without subjecting them to liability as partners or as coadventurers either inter sese or as to third parties." Berkey v. Third Ave. Ry. Co., 155 N.E. 58, 60 (N.Y. 1926) (per Cardozo, J.)./ "The rights of the co-owners inter sese are not determined by the . . . Arkansas statutes . . . ." U.S. v. National Bank of Commerce, 726 F.2d 1292, 1295 (8th Cir. 1984).

interspousal (= between spouses) is a relatively recent legal NEOLOGISM, included in neither the OED nor W3. It probably originated in and is largely confined to AmE—e.g.: "The interspousal communication sought to be disclosed appears from the record to have been confidential . . . ." C.M.D. v. J.R.D., 710 S.W.2d 474, 478 (Mo. Ct. App. 1986)./ "She argues that the 'something more' test should be applied only to complaints seeking to modify interspousal support provisions in independent separation agreements . . . ." Ames v. Perry, 547 N.E.2d 309, 311 (Mass. 1989). See spousal.

interstate; intrastate. These adjectives should not be used adverbially, as here: "Organized crime operates interstate [read in interstate commerce or across state lines or throughout the states]." See INTER-.

interstitial; intersticial. The former spelling is preferred.

intervener. See intervenor.

intervenience. See intervention.

intervening cause. See CAUSATION (D).

intervenor; intervener. Although most English-language dictionaries prefer intervener, the U.S. Supreme Court (predominantly) and the leading American treatise on federal courts (uniformly) prefer intervenor. See Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1902, at 231 n.3 (1986).

English writers—perhaps finding the SOED more persuasive authority than the U.S. Supreme Court—tend to use intervener. E.g., "We have suggested that an intervener should be required to show that there was an emergency and that he did not act officiously but in the defendant's best interests." Robert Goff & Gareth Jones, The Law of Restitution 350 (3d ed. 1986).

intervention; intervenience. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT

inter vivos, meaning "between living persons," should be spelled as two words. The phrase may either precede or follow the noun it medifies. Traditionally it functions as an adjective following the noun: "The rule of law is well settled that in transactions inter vivos, where a party stands in confidential relations to another, if the dominant party receives the benefit during the existence of such relation, the party reposing the confidence may obtain relief."/ "A gift inter vivos may be made of land or personal property." See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

In the following specimens, inter vivos appears as an adjective preceding the noun: "Employment contracts and employment retirement programs have proved popular for inter vivos dispositions."/ "It does not relate to the inter vivos gifts to the children, of which Ruth received the greater share; consequently the truth or falsity of the statement stands independently of the history of inter vivos donations." Some writers hyphenate this PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—e.g.: "In most states these statutes can be evaded by inter-vivos transfers, even deathbed transfers." Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 184 (2d ed. 1979).

Occasionally the phrase is used adverbially—e.g.: "Moreover it could be argued that the control of an owner, in order to be complete, must include not only the power to give inter vivos but also the power to provide for devolution after death as a sort of postponed gift." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 115 (1922; repr. 1975).

inter vivos* trust; living trust. These are the terms used to describe trusts created by the settlor during his or her lifetime. Inter vivos, though a LATINISM, has been so commonly used as a general adjective (see the preceding entry) as to be unobjectionable in legal writing. Even so, inter vivos trust, though once more common than living trust, seems to be fading.

intestate (= a person who dies without a will) is an attributive noun, the adjective intestate having appeared several centuries before the noun. Intestate, n., frequently follows a possessive proper noun, although literally the usage curiously suggests that the decedent somehow "belonged" to the heir: "David Kling, the present plaintiff's intestate, brought this action in his lifetime, claiming damages for an alleged malicious and willful assault."/ "Plaintiff's intestate made with the government two contracts in relation to the monitor." See testate.

Intestate, adj., is usually used of persons, but sometimes, through HYPALLAGE, of property: "The court's conclusion that under the Hubinger case the surplus income is intestate is correct."

in that is commonly used for because or since in legal prose, often with considerable awkwardness—e.g.: "In that [read Because] we have overruled appellant's fourth ground of error, we also overrule ground of error number five."/ "A pledge differs from a chattel mortgage in that [read because] in the pledge the general ownership of the goods remains in the pledgor . . . ." R.A. Brown, The Law of Personal Property 622 (1936; repr. 1955).

in the circumstances. See circumstances.

in the event of. This phrase, which usually precedes a BURIED VERB, can often be changed to if—e.g.: "In the event of the termination of the Employee's employment [read If the Employee's employment terminates] for any reason, ..." See event, in the & of (A).

in the event that is unnecessarily prolix for if. And it is poor form in DRAFTING—e.g.: "In the event that [read If] any patent or patent claim included within the Licensor's patent rights is held invalid in a final decision by a court of competent jurisdiction and last resort, all obligation to pay royalties based on the patent or claim ceases as of the date of the final decision." See event, in the.

in the final analysis; in the last analysis. Both are CLICHÉS: "In the last analysis, the testator had an absolute right to divert his property from this contestant; he was under no obligation to assign any reason for so doing." These trite expressions only detract from one's prose. One might better simply state the proposition without this tepid lead-in.

in the first instance. See first instance.

in the future. See in futuro.

in the midst of. See amid(st).

in the last analysis. See in the final analysis.

inthral(l). See enthral(l).

in the light of is inferior to in light of, itself a CLICHÉ.

in the offing. See offing.

into. See in.

in toto (= completely, entirely, wholly) is a LATINISM expressing such a fundamental notion, and having so many ready English synonyms, that it is seldom if ever justified. E.g., "That material omission negates the authorization in toto [read completely negates the authorization]."/ "Neither do all the plaintiff's policies, taken in toto [read as a whole], allow, in this court's opinion, the application of that doctrine to the use of the National YWCA."

intoxilyzer. See breathalyzer.

INTRA-. See INTER-.

in transitu is an unjustified LATINISM; the English phrase in transit suffices. E.g., "The right of stoppage in transitu [read in transit] was first recognized and enforced in England in the year 1690."/ "The creditors are entitled to share ratably in the assets of the defendant (except in the coke stopped in transitu [read in transit])." But many statutes, such as the U.K. Sale of Goods Act, 1979, still bear the phrase.

intrastate. See interstate.

intraversion. See introversion.

intra vires (= within the powers [of]) is the antonym of, but is not nearly as familiar as, ultra vires (q.v.). E.g., "Courts interfere seldom to control such discretion intra vires the corporation." United Copper Sec. Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., 244 U.S. 261, 263–64 (1917)./ "What we have said, however, only applies when the tort committed is a wrongful way of doing what the corporation has power to do ('intra vires tort,' as it is paradoxically called)." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 281–82 (3d ed. 1955)./ "[T]he sum it spent on intra vires functions would fully absorb the sum paid by the banks together with accrued interest." Aviva Golden, Digest of Trinity Term (reporting In re a Company No. 0013734 of 1991), Fin. Times, 5 Aug. 1992, at 8. See LATINISMS.

intrigue, v.i., = to carry on a plot or secret love affair. It should not be used in formal prose for interest or fascinate, although this sense has long been usual in informal speech. E.g., "The question presented in appellant's first point of error is an intriguing [read interesting or fascinating] one."

introduce in(to) evidence. Although both forms commonly appear, one is demonstrably superior: because the phrase suggests movement (physical or metaphorical), into is the better preposition. E.g., "As the use of the deposition becomes further removed from its introduction in [read into] evidence, it is more difficult to predict whether a court will tax the expenses associated with a particular deposition."

introductory should never be used in the phrase be introductory of (something); one should instead write introduce. E.g., "This first section is introductory of [read introduces] some of the constitutional provisions that constitute part of that framework." See BE-VERBS (B).

As a noun, introductory sometimes serves as a chapter title, but it is inferior to introduction.

introductory clause; commencement; exordium. In DRAFTING, these are the three names given to the paragraph, placed at the outset of a contract, that gives introductory material. The best of the three phrases is introductory clause, and the worst exordium. The phrase introductory clause applies aptly even if there is more than one sentence. See clause.

INTRODUCTORY "IT" AND "THERE." See EXPLETIVES, it & there is.

introversion; intraversion. The former is the preferred spelling.

intrust is an obsolete form of entrust, q.v.

inundate. So spelled, though it is often misspelled inn-, as here: "Lawyers and judges are among those who are innundated [read inundated] with these media images." Letter of David A. Sharp, 18 Barrister 6 (Winter 1991–1992).

inure; enure. The former is the standard spelling in both legal and nonlegal texts. Inure = (1) to take effect, come into use; or (2) to make accustomed to something unpleasant; habituate. Sense (1) is the sense that usually appears in legal contexts: "The rule is well established that whenever a contract between attorney and client inures to the benefit or advantage of the attorney the court will not only closely scrutinize but will actually change the ordinary rules of evidence to arrive at a determination."/ "The damages must inure to the exclusive benefit of the widow and children." The noun is inurement.

Although in sense (2) persons are inured to unpleasant things <many battered women, tragically, become inured to violence>, in sense (1) inure is used only of positive effects: inure to the detriment of is an idiomatic impossibility. The author of the following sentence lacked idiomatic sensibility: "No prejudice has inured [read resulted] to the defendant because of any procedural default leading to the suspensions." Sense (2) occasionally appears in legal writing: "The steady parade of human savagery that is presented to us has an inuring effect."

in utero. See en ventre sa mere.

invade is the metaphor used in the law of trusts to denote withdrawals from an initial or principal investment. E.g., "She had unlimited power to invade the corpus of the trust if she so desired."/ "The settlor can authorize the trustee to invade the principal or corpus of the trust for the benefit of the wife." See corpus.

invalidate; invalid, v.t. In the sense "to nullify," the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT seen only in legal writing. E.g., "[W]e turn to the question whether such a meritorious patent is to be invalided [read invalidated] as held by the court below . . . ." Seiberling v. John E. Thropp's Sons Co., 284 F. 746, 756 (3d Cir. 1922).

inventable; inventible. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A) inventory is commonly a verb as well as a noun in legal and business contexts. This use of the word, dating back to the 16th century, is perfectly acceptable—e.g.: "The officer inventories the contents of the car."/ "Local police departments generally follow a routine practice of securing and inventorying the automobile's contents."/ "While the husband was creating joint tenancies for the benefit of his daughters, he was building up the value of the farm chattels, which were inventoried at $22,850.29."

inverse. See converse.

INVERSIONS, GRAMMATICAL. Awkward are most, though not all, inversions. They commonly appear in legalistic phrasing—e.g.: "Personally appeared before the undersigned notary public, John Ivan Simon, who . . . ."/ "Came on for consideration the above-referenced civil action." Other standard inversions include Comes now the plaintiff and the variant Now comes the plaintiff, both of which have recently fallen into disrepute as unnecessary LEGALESE. See come(s) now.

The inversions especially to be avoided are those whose existence is attributable to amateurish literary striving. The problem with these is that, "like the atmospheric inversion that is blamed for smog, the inversion of sentences creates a kind of linguistic smog that puts the reader to work sorting out the disarranged elements, causes his eyes to smart, and perhaps makes him wish he were reading something else." Roy H. Copperud, American Usage and Style 210 (1980).

What prompts writers to use inversion? Most commonly, they are quite commendably striving to vary the structure of their sentences. But this method often results in sentences that sound insincere and contrived—e.g.: "Unaffected would be the current status of the defense, in which the risk is expressly assumed." [Better: "The current status of the defense, in which the risk is expressly assumed, would be unaffected."]/ "Therefore, concludes defendant, there being no privity of relationship between her and plaintiff, and no fraud or deceit alleged, she has the right to the property." [Better: "There being no privity of relationship between defendant and plaintiff, and no fraud or deceit alleged, the defendant therefore concludes that she has the right to the property."]

Some legislative drafters are addicted to minor inversions, such as notwithstanding anything in this Act contained. They may be minor inversions, but they cloy immediately, even on the first reading of the first one. In this example, because the word contained is superfluous, an acceptable phrasing is notwithstanding anything in this Act. See notwithstanding & notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained herein.

Often those who use inversion are no better at grammar than they are at style; thus they have problems with number, being unable to distinguish the inverted predicate from the subject: "To judicial bravery and congressional impetus belong the credit for large-scale rectification of racial injustices." (Here the verb should be singular—belongs—because, without the inversion, the clause reads: The credit for large-scale rectification of racial injustices belongs to judicial bravery and congressional impetus.")/ "By the term literature is [read are] meant those written or printed compositions that preserve the thought and experience of a race recorded in artistic form."

Occasionally inversion is called for idiomatically but is wrongly omitted: "It is much easier to answer this at the end rather than at the beginning, for only after prolonged study one may [read may one] look back and appreciate the significance of the hornbook definition of equitable jurisprudence."

invest; vest. These words are synonymous in meaning "to establish (a person) in the possession of any office, position, or property; to endow or furnish (a person or institution) with power, authority, or privilege." Vest is more usual in general English usage; the use of invest in this sense is chiefly confined to legal writing and evangelical preaching <By the power invested in me by the Holy Spirit, I declare that you shall be instantly healed!>.

Not surprisingly, the legal examples have a different tone from the evangelical ones: "By the Constitution of the United States, the President is invested with certain important political powers . . . ." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 165 (1803)./ "In a proper legal sense, the holder of the legal title is not seised until he is fully invested with the possession, actual or constructive."/ "His status as a cabinet officer is not itself sufficient to invest him with absolute immunity."/ "Article V, section 5 of the Texas Constitution has invested the court of criminal appeals with a mandamus power comparable to that granted the supreme court." See vest.

investigative; investigatory. W3 calls investigatory "chiefly British," but it occurs almost as commonly as investigative does in American legal contexts. E.g., "It is not unreasonably intrusive, courts have often held, for a police officer to aid his own investigatory senses with devices that serve only to enhance those senses, such as flashlights and binoculars."/ "These statements involved alleged incompetence and investigatory grand jury proceedings."/ "The frisk, it was held, was essential to the proper performance of the officer's investigatory duties."

The COD lists investigative before -tory, and it does appear more frequently—e.g.: "The particular interests involved here were the neutralization of danger to the policeman in the investigative circumstance and the sanctity of the individual."/ "It was this legitimate investigative function that Officer McFadden was discharging when he decided to approach petitioner and his companions."

There is certainly no need for the two variants to coexist. We might be well advised to throw over investigatory and stick with investigative, or to develop some heretofore unhinted-at DIFFERENTIATION. In any event, the two terms should not be used interchangeably in a single piece of writing, as they are in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968). See INELEGANT VARIATION

in view of. See in lieu of.

in view of the fact that is a weak equivalent of because.

inviolate; inviolable. The latter suggests that something is incapable of being violated, whereas the former suggests merely that the thing has not been violated. In practice, however, the words are often used interchangeably. Inviolate sometimes appears as a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE. E.g., "The Court weakens, if indeed it does not in fact submerge, this basic principle by finding, in effect, a grant of substantive legislative power in the constitutional provision for a federal court system, and through it, setting up the Federal Rules as a body of law inviolate."

invite is a verb; it should be avoided as a noun displacing invitation.

invitee. Although nonlawyers might assume that an invitee is someone expressly invited onto property, lawyers use the term to include those who have implied permission to enter the premises, such as postal and delivery workers.

inviter; invitor. The former is preferred. See -ER (A).

involuntary. An involuntary act, as Jeremy Bentham phrased it, is an act "in the performance of which the will has no sort of share: such as the contraction of the heart and arteries." An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation 83–84 n.1 (1823 ed.; repr. 1948). For the unusual meaning attributed to the word in the phrase involuntary manslaughter, see manslaughter (A). For the distinction between involuntary and unintentional, see unintentional.

in whole; in part. Follett wrote that in whole is unidiomatic for as a whole, the former phrase having been created as a needed parallel of in part. He was wrong, unless we want to trace what is idiomatic back before the sixteenth century and ignore steady uses up till the present time. Both in whole and as a whole are acceptable idioms; indeed, they are not even used in quite the same way. Both mean "as a complete thing," but, whereas as a whole is the general phrase, in whole is always used as a correlative of in part. E.g., "In one form a statute may create a new right, while neglecting in whole or in part the matter of the remedy."

in witness whereof (= signed), one of the quintessential LEGALISMS, is the phrase that introduces the testimonium clause in a legal document. E.g., "An appropriate testimonium or concluding clause is 'In witness whereof I have subscribed my name this —— day of 19—,' although 'Witness my signature this —— day of 19—' will do just as well." Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 820 (2d ed. 1953). See testimonium clause & attestation clause.

I personally is prolix for a simple I. Occasionally it is legitimately used to contrast one's personal opinions with an official stance that one takes for reasons of a position one holds. See FIRST PERSON.

ipse dixit (lit., "he himself said it") = something said but not proved; a dogmatic statement. E.g., "The realm of procedure is after all the judge's special domain; the construction of statutes is a peculiarly judicial art; and the Court's ipse dixit seems more authoritative in these areas than it might if substantive issues of policy were being decided." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 204 (1960). Cf. probatum. See dictum (B).

ipsissima verba = the very (same) words. E.g., "So far as possible, I have tried to preserve the ipsissima verba of the original author . . . ." P.B. Fairest, Foreword to Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law xiv (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).

Another form of the phrase, ipsissimis verbis, means "in the very (same) words." In the following example, though, the Supreme Court mangled its Latin with a meaningless phrase, ipsissima verbis: "The record does not purport to give ipsissima verbis [read ipsissimis verbis or verbatim] the form of the oath administered to the jurors." Baldwin v. Kansas, 129 U.S. 52, 55 (1889).

The phrases are easily simplified—e.g.: "Now Texas has hastened to fall into line, and has enacted this North Dakota resolve ipsissimis verbis [read in the very same words or verbatim]" (ex. fr. G. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 334 (1927)). Cf. in haec verba. See verbatim & LATINISMS.

ipso facto (= by the fact or act itself; by its very nature) is sometimes replaceable by the phrase in itself—e.g.: "Lunacy does not ipso facto [read in itself] dissolve a partnership unless the articles so provide . . . ." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 9 (1951). But the LATINISM sometimes seems useful—e.g.: "The court said that the statute was against common right and Magna Carta and ipso facto void." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 101 (1957). The phrase need not be italicized.

I respectfully submit. It is as easy for an advocate to hedge too much as it is to pound too hard. Some lawyers, arguing a position, use I respectfully submit as a verbal tic—even when the statement that follows is quite uncontroversial. The result is an undesirable, namby-pamby tone. See respectfully.

ironic(al). Ironic is standard, ironical being a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

IRONY is the use of words whose literal and figurative senses are opposites—that is, it is the difference between what seems to be said and what is meant. The chief weapon of satirists, irony subverts the reader's expectations.

A word of warning: "[M]ost attempts by legal writers to employ irony . . . range from ill-advised to pathetic." Jordan H. Leibman & James P. White, How the Student-Edited Law Journals Make Their Publication Decisions, 39 J. Legal Educ. 387, 423 (1989). But the warning should not deter unduly. As the following examples illustrate, irony can be an effective rhetorical tool:

- "[T]he only thing about the appeals [that] we can commend is the hardihood in supposing that they could possibly succeed." U.S. v. Minneci, 142 F.2d 428, 429 (2d Cir. 1944) (per L. Hand, J.).
- "Ownership meant no more to [the Shoshone Indians] than to roam the land as a great common, and to possess and enjoy it in the same way that they possessed and enjoyed sunlight and the west wind and the feel of spring in the air. Acquisitiveness, which develops a law of real property, is an accomplishment only of the 'civilized.'" Northwestern Bands of Shoshone Indians v. U.S., 324 U.S. 335, 357 (1945) (Jackson, J., concurring).
- "I cannot say that I know much about the law, having been far more interested in justice." William Temple, the former Archbishop of Canterbury, as quoted in Lord Denning, The Road to Justice 1 (1955).
- "[W]e hold that the first amendment does not clothe these plaintiffs with a constitutional right to sunbathe in the nude . . . . They remain able to advocate the benefits of nude sunbathing, albeit while fully dressed." South Florida Free Beaches, Inc. v. Miami, 734 F.2d 608, 610 (11th Cir. 1984) (per Henderson, J.).

One of the most common types of irony is the Swiftian modest proposal, here carried out with some success: "Of course, a simple mechanism for deterring violations such as [police brutality] would be to amend section 1983 to provide that violators will be drawn and quartered. This seems like a very powerful deterrent and might substantially reduce violations of federal rights under color of state law. Aside from problems relating to fairness, however, this solution also poses problems in the deterrence framework. A powerful deterrent such as drawing and quartering offenders might also deter worthwhile conduct [by the police]. . . . So, the deterrence rationale calls for neither too much nor too little deterrence; we need to find the right amount." Dobson v. Camden, 705 F.2d 759, 765 (5th Cir. 1983) (per Goldberg, J.).

irrefragable (= unanswerable; not to be controverted), a useful term in the law, is underused today—so much so that its pronunciation has caused problems even in the Old Country: "In 1955 leading counsel pronounced it [/ir-i-frag-ə-bəl/], but Harman J. asserted that it was [/ir-i-fray-gə-bəl/]; and thus it was for the rest of the case. However, on appeal (on another point) one of the juniors invoked the Oxford English Dictionary, and his leader persuaded a reluctant and suspicious Court of Appeal to shift the accent from the third syllable to the second, and pronounce the word [/i-ref-rə-gə-bəl/]." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 164 (1973). Only Harman J. got it entirely wrong, both of the other pronunciations being acceptable (and the last one given being preferred).

irregardless, a semiliterate PORTMANTEAU WORD from irrespective and regardless, should long ago have been stamped out. Irregardless is common enough in speech in the U.S. that it has found its way into judicial opinions. See, e.g., State ex rel. Fisher v. McKinney, 85 N.E.2d 562, 563 (Ohio Ct. App. 1949).

On the second day of the U.S. Supreme Court's 1986–1987 term, Chief Justice Rehnquist upbraided a lawyer who used irregardless, saying: "I feel bound to inform you there is no word irregardless in the English language. The word is regardless." Linguistic fastidiousness is no less important in oral than in written argument.

In American legal writing, most of the published examples of irregardless appear in quoted testimony, in which the word is followed by "[sic]" in three of every four instances. Of the handful of published examples that originated in a federal judge's writing—as opposed to originating as oral statements that are later quoted—a third appear in a single Illinois judge's opinions.

Although this widely scorned word seems unlikely to spread and flourish, careful users of language must continually stamp on it when they encounter it.

irrelevance; irrelevancy. The former is generally preferred. The only plural form, however, is irrelevancies. See relevance.

irreparable is pronounced /i-rep-ə-rə-bəl/.

irreparable injury is a phrase that "generally produces more dust than light." Studebaker Corp. v. Gittlin, 360 F.2d 692, 698 (2d Cir. 1966). Often misunderstood, irreparable injury means merely that the injury cannot be remedied through an award of damages. As Douglas Laycock has convincingly shown, "That an injury has little monetary value is often a cause of irreparability, not an antidote." The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 74 (1991).

irreplevi(s)able. See repleviable.

irrespective of = regardless of. E.g., "It is true that the author is the owner of the composition as property irrespective of its value." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 217 (1930)

Confusion of the words irrespective and regardless has given rise to the mistaken form irregardless, q.v.

irresponsive. See unresponsive.

irrevocable; unrevokable. The former is preferred. It is pronounced /i-rev-ə-kə-bəl/.

is comprised of. See compose (A).

-ISE. See -IZE.

is entitled to. See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (G).

isle (= island) for aisle (= a passage for foot traffic) results from mistaking homophones—e.g.: "[A]s she was walking down one of the isles [read aisles] in the store she slipped on a potato sprout near the potato bin and fell . . . ." Houtchens v. Kyle's Grocery Corp., 390 S.W.2d 325, 326 (Tex. Civ. App.—Eastland 1965).

isolable, not isolatable, is the correct form. E.g., "We do not believe the events are so easily isolable." U.S. v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48, 52 (1951)./ "The State . . . bas[es] its position on the fact that the petitioner has established no isolatable [read isolable] prejudice . . . ." Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, 542 (1965). See -ATABLE issuable. In nonlegal contexts this word means "capable of being issued"—and sometimes in legal writing as well. E.g., "It is fair to say that though the writ of habeas corpus was issuable at common law its present form in England has had its origin in the Act of 1679." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 60 (1963).

The word carries a special legal sense, however: "that admits of an issue being taken; in regard to which or during which issue may be joined" (OED). E.g., "No issuable fact or condition existed that would authorize the governing board to exercise the discretion confided to it in the passage of that part of the zoning ordinance under attack."

issue. A. *At issue; in issue. At issue is the common idiomatic phrase, whereas in issue is purely a specialized legal phrase. At issue = (1) (of people) in controversy; taking opposite sides of a case or contrary views of a matter; at variance <his views are at issue with mine>; (2) (of matters or questions) in dispute; under discussion; in question <the allegations at issue> (OED). The OED notes that in issue shares sense (2) of at issue, but calls it rare.

Having originated in mid-19th-century legal contexts, in issue is not at all rare today—e.g.: "In the law of evidence, facts in issue are either (1) facts that, in the pleadings, are affirmed on one side and denied on the other; or (2) in actions without pleadings, all facts from the establishment of which would follow the existence, nonexistence, nature, or extent of any right, liability, disability, or immunity asserted or denied in the case." (Eng.)/ "Roman law confined to the judge, when questions of law were in issue, the purely mechanical task of counting and of determining the numerical preponderance of authority."/ "The test to be applied in passing on the validity of a gift such as the one in issue is that of reasonableness."

B. Issue as to whether; issue of whether. These phrases are prolix for issue whether. Cf. question (as to) whether. See as to (A).

C. Issue and issuance. Issuance was not used until the mid-nineteenth century, up until which time issue was the noun corresponding to the verb to issue. E.g., "These lawyers reported that not only was there a strong current of precedent during the last century for the issue of such injunctions, but the common-law judges had themselves advised parties to apply to the Chancery." (Eng.) A nonlawyer in the U.S. today would think issuance to have been an apter term in the sentence quoted.

D. Join issue. This phrase may mean: (1) "to submit an issue jointly for decision"; (2) "to accept or adopt a disputed point as the basis of argument in a controversy"; or (3) "to take up the opposite side of a case, or a contrary view on a question" (OED). The idiom is more common in BrE than in AmE.

The nominal phrase is joinder of issue. E.g., "After joinder of issue, defendant moved for summary judgment." Bradley v. Burroughs Wellcome Co., 497 N.Y.S.2d 401, 402 (N.Y. App. Div. 1986).

E. In the Sense of "Offspring" or "Descendants." In the drafting of wills and trusts, the word issue invites litigation. English courts—as well as courts in New York and New Jersey—have held that it means all lineal descendants, however remote. Other courts have held that the word refers only to children and not to descendants more remote. And whether it covers adopted children is a question that courts will answer differently. See In re Upjohn's Will, 107 N.E.2d 492, 495 (N.Y. 1952). In sum, the word is best avoided altogether.

But if it is not to be avoided, it ought to be used grammatically. The question sometimes arises whether the word should be treated as a singular or as a plural noun. The answer is either—e.g.: "Any issue who is a minor [or issue who are minors] will be treated as if . . . ." See die without issue.

F. General issue; special issue. See general issue.

issue estoppel. See issue preclusion & collateral estoppel (A).

ISSUE-FRAMING. A. Generally. There is no more important point in persuasive and analytical writings—and certainly no point that is more commonly bungled—than framing the issue. If you have clearly in mind what question you're addressing, the writing will inevitably be much clearer than it otherwise would be.

That may sound obvious, but in fact very few legal writers frame their issues well. As a result, legal memos and briefs are often diffuse, repetitive, and poorly organized. Sometimes—even to the reader who works hard to find out—memos and briefs do not reveal precisely what question they purport to answer. When confronting such writing, the reader works impatiently to find the point—the gist—the upshot.

Any piece of persuasive or analytical writing must deliver three things: the question, the answer, and the reasons for that answer. The better the writing, the more clearly and quickly those things are delivered. The legal stylist should probably insist that the writing lead the reader to have those things well in mind within 60 seconds of picking up the document, whether it is a brief, an analytical memo, or a judicial opinion.

To do this consistently, open the discussion with a factually specific issue that captures the essence of the problem. The issue should be brief—no more than 75 words—and should be phrased in separate sentences. The format is generally as follows: statement, statement, question. Or, phrased differently: premise, premise, conclusion (followed by a question mark).

Although few legal writers have mastered this technique, it is old. Consider the following issue, framed in 1835:

> A Turk, having three wives, to whom he was lawfully married, according to the laws of his own country, and three sons, one by each wife, comes to Philadelphia with his family, and dies, leaving his three wives and three sons alive, and also real property in this State to a large amount. Will it go to the three children equally, under the intestate law of Pennsylvania? [67 words]
> Conflict of Laws, 14 Am. Jurist 275, 275 (1835).

Anyone of moderate legal sophistication can understand that question. And most readers, having seen the question, would probably like to know the answer.

But six American lawyers in ten would probably build up to the question with at least two pages of facts explaining how the Turk came to the U.S., when and where the marriages were solemnized, what the names and birthdates of each of the sons are, and so on. In other words, those six writers would engage in a badly overparticularized statement of facts—a statement that would leave many readers bewildered about the upshot of it all. See OVERPARTICULARIZATION.

Three more of the ten would probably assume that the intended reader knows the facts and therefore dispense with them altogether. The so-called "issue" in an analytical memo would read something like this: "Is our client entitled to take one-third under Pennsylvania law?" Then the writing would launch into a legal discussion of the intestacy laws. Never mind that the intended reader and the writer do not have an identical understanding of the facts—a point that will likely never emerge if the memo is written in this way. Further, any other reader will remain none the wiser even after reading the entire memo, which as a result can never be useful in future research.

Perhaps the one remaining lawyer of the ten would write an issue more nearly resembling the 1835 version than either the overparticularized or the overvague approach, but perhaps not one in a hundred would frame it with equal brevity and clarity.

B. Deep vs. Surface Issues. A "deep" issue is concrete: it sums up the case in a nutshell—and is therefore difficult to frame but easy to understand. A "surface" issue is abstract: it requires the reader to know everything about the case before it can be truly comprehended—and is therefore easy to frame but hard to understand.

Assume that a defendant is moving for summary judgment. Which of the following statements is more helpful?

1. Can Jones maintain an action for fraud?
2. To maintain a cause of action for fraud under California law, a plaintiff must show that the defendant made a false representation. In his deposition, Jones concedes that neither Continental nor its agents or employees made a false representation. Is Continental entitled to summary judgment on Jones's fraud claim? [49 words]

The longer version asks the reader to do considerably less work. The shorter version sends the reader elsewhere to learn what, precisely, the issue is. Whereas the surface issue says next to nothing about what the court is being asked to decide, the deep issue explains precisely what that something is. To put it differently, the surface issue does not disclose the decisional premises; the deep issue makes them explicit.

The goal is ease of understanding. One way to analyze the difference between a deep issue and a surface issue is to focus on the level of abstraction. Generally speaking, the more abstract an issue is, the more superficial it is: the reader must learn that much more to make any sense of it. The more concrete the issue is, the deeper it is: the reader need hardly exercise the brain to understand.

C. Persuasive vs. Analytical Issues. Unlike the deep-vs.-surface dichotomy, this split is not a matter of good and bad: writing that aims to persuade must have persuasive issues, whereas writing that seeks to analyze in an objective way must have analytical issues. Persuasive issues answer themselves; analytical issues are open-ended.

Karl Llewellyn, one of the great legal thinkers and writers of the 20th century, well understood the importance of a persuasive issue in effective advocacy: "The first art is framing the issue so that if your framing is accepted the case comes out your way. Got that? Second, you have to capture the issue, because your opponent will be framing an issue very differently . . . . And third, you have to build a technique of phrasing your issue which not only will help you capture the Court but which will stick your capture into the Court's head so that it can't forget it." A Lecture on Appellate Advocacy, 29 U. Chi. L. Rev. 627, 630 (1962).

Llewellyn's initial point is the most powerful: the first art is framing the issue so that, if your framing is accepted, you win. The persuasive issue, then, can have only one answer. Still, it is far more persuasive than a mere statement of the conclusion. The advocate comes forward simply asking the court to address a straightforward question—e.g.:

- "Texas law provides that a lease predating a lien is not affected in foreclosure. Nelson's lease predates Marshall's lien, on which Marshall judicially foreclosed last month. Was Nelson's lease affected by the foreclosure?" [33 words]
- "Liability-insurance coverage for directors and officers of financial institutions is universally required to recruit well-qualified directors and officers. When the Trew Group acquired First Eastern from the FDIC in 1987, the FDIC agree to pay the 'reasonable and necessary' operating costs of First Eastern. Is the FDIC obligated to pay the cost of directors' and officers' liability insurance for First Eastern?" [62 words]
- "On dozens of occasions over the course of a decade, United Peoria hired and paid a waste-hauler to haul its hazardous liquid waste to a landfill. In accordance with United Peoria's instructions, the hauler discharged thousands of gallons of United Peoria's waste into the landfill. Were these discharges an 'accident' from United Peoria's point of view?" [57 words]
- "Boskey Insurance issued an excess-insurance policy to BEC for liability exceeding $100,000. BEC represented to Boskey that it had purchased primary coverage for the first $100,000 of liability from Cooper Insurance. If Cooper becomes insolvent, should Boskey be required to step down and provide primary coverage when it never bargained for a role as—or contracted to be—a primary insurer, and when its premium reflected only the risk taken as an excess insurer?" [75 words]

As in the first two examples, an issue often proceeds from the law to the facts. Yet, as in the third and fourth examples, it may nearly as often proceed from the facts to the law. The only key to organizing the statements is to allow the whole to be readily absorbed—and this usually means putting the most easily comprehensible part in the middle of the issue.

These same characteristics hold true with analytical issues, but unlike persuasive ones, they are open-ended. The reader doesn't know the answer upon reading the question, but probably yearns to—e.g.:

- "Section 273 of the Immigration Act makes it a crime to bring an undocumented alien to the U.S. Meanwhile, section 2304 of the Maritime Act makes it a crime for the master of a vessel to fail to rescue persons aboard a vessel in distress. Does a master commit a crime under the Immigration Act when he rescues illegal aliens aboard a ship in distress and brings them to the U.S.? If so, what are his defenses?" [75 words]
- "Mr. and Mrs. Zephyr were killed in the crash of an airplane negligently piloted by Mr. Zephyr. Their daughter, Kate, has sued the estate of her deceased father for the wrongful death of her mother. Does the doctrine of interspousal immunity bar Kate's recovery when there is no marital harmony to preserve?" [52 words]
- "A six-year-old plaintiff rode his bicycle in front of our client's truck before being struck by the truck. Is the six-year-old capable of contributory negligence?" [29 words]

- "In Massachusetts, a dead body is the property of the decedent's family members. As a result, the authority to order an autopsy generally rests with the relatives. In what circumstances is that authority transferred from the family to the medical examiner?" [41 words]

In an analytical memo, such an issue should be followed immediately by a brief answer (with reasons embedded in the answer), so that the question and the answer amount to something resembling an executive summary: the reader understands the gist of the memo merely by reading the first few lines.

D. Readers' Reactions. The purpose of using separate sentences and of limiting the issue to 75 words is to help the reader. A one-sentence issue of 75 or so words is difficult to follow, especially when the interrogative word begins the sentence and the end is merely a succession of when-clauses—e.g.:

> Can Barndt Insurance deny insurance coverage on grounds of late notice when Fiver's insurance policy required Fiver to give Barndt notice of a claim "immediately," and when in May 1994, one of Fiver's offices was damaged by smoke from a fire in another tenant's space, and when 10 months later, Fiver gave notice, and when Barndt investigated the claim for 6 months before denying coverage and did not raise a late-notice defense until 18 months after the claim was filed? [81 words]

That is a muddle. Readers forget the question by the time they reach the question mark. Part of the reason is that the time is out of joint: we begin with a present question, then back up to what happened, and then, with the question mark, jump back to the present.

The better strategy is to follow a more or less chronological order, telling a story in miniature. Then, the pointed question—which emerges inevitably from the story—comes at the end:

> Fiver's insurance policy required it to give Barndt Insurance notice of a claim "immediately." In May 1994, one of Fiver's offices was damaged by smoke from a fire in another tenant's space. Ten months later, Fiver gave notice. Barndt investigated the claim for 6 months before denying coverage and did not raise a late-notice claim until 18 months after the claim was filed. Can Barndt now deny coverage because of late notice? [73 words]

Instead of one 81-word-long sentence, we have five sentences with an average length of 15 words. (See SENTENCE LENGTH.) And the information is presented in a way that readers can easily understand.

Because seasoned legal readers are always impatient to reach the issue, the practice of opening a memo, brief, or judicial opinion with the deep issue always satisfies a need that readers feel.

But is the 75-word limit a fair one? Where does it come from? It is the rare case indeed—in fact, I have yet to encounter it—in which issues cannot be framed in 75 words. The 75-word limit is the result of experimentation and informal testing: once an issue goes beyond that length, it is likely to be rambling. You lose the rigor of a concentrated statement. And you probably lose some readers.

It is no accident that the most readable judicial opinions invariably begin with a brief statement of the overarching issue in the case. Among the ablest practitioners of this art was Judge Thomas Gibbs Gee, of the Fifth Circuit, who enshrined it as the first principle in his style sheet for opinions: "Try to state the principal question in the first sentence." A Few of Wisdom's Idiosyncrasies and a Few of Ignorance's: A Judicial Style Sheet, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 55, 56 (1990).

E. The Importance of It All. These principles of issue-framing may seem elementary at first glance. Yet, judging from most legal writing, they are not at all obvious. And, in any event, stylists who cultivate the ability to frame good issues know just how difficult it is: it requires a great deal of mental energy.

It is therefore easy to forgo the effort, and many writers do. Legal writers everywhere seem preoccupied with answers—with conclusions—and rarely with the questions they are answering, or the premises from which their conclusions might follow. As a result, much of the "analysis" and advocacy that goes on is sloppy, or worse.

Even the greatest legal intellects must remain vigilant about these points. One of the most important 20th-century legal philosophers warned about how easy it is to stumble over fundamentals: "One principal source of trouble is obvious: it is always necessary to bear in mind, and fatally easy to forget, the number of different questions about punishment which theories of punishment ambitiously seek to answer." H.L.A. Hart, "Postscript: Responsibility and Retribution," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 210, 231 (1968).

is when; is where. These locutions are improper means of introducing a definition. Instead of writing, "'Livery of seisin' is where the grantor delivers possession," one should write, "'Livery of seisin' is the grantor's delivery of possession." Examples of ill-phrased definitions abound in legal writing: "A bill of exchange is when a person takes money in one country or city upon exchange, and draws a bill whereby he directs another person in another country or city to pay so much to A on order for value received of B and subscribes it." (Eng.) The idea of defining is here misplaced. [Read "With a bill of exchange, one takes money . . . ."] See where (C) & DEFINITIONS (C).

it. A. Overuse. This expletive and pronoun often appears too many times in one sentence. Careful writers restrict it (it, that is) to one meaning in a given sentence—no more. And still one must be vigilant about whether the antecedent is the closest noun—e.g.:

- "Within such a unitary jurisdictional framework, the appellate court will, of course, require the trial court to conform to constitutional mandates, but it [read the appellate court] may likewise require it [read the trial court] to follow procedures deemed desirable from the viewpoint of sound judicial practice."
- "Applying the test of an apportionable or apportioned consideration to the contract in question, it will be seen [read one will see] at once that it [read such consideration] is severable."
- "It is here that [Read Here] the advantage of an absolute sovereign is most apparent, for it [read the sovereign] makes it possible for immediate effect to be given to the will of the people." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 20 (2d ed. 1953).
- "For it is often this sovereign power which gives to the jury its place in the constitution. Bereft of it [read the power], it [read the criminal jury] will become an expensive and unwieldy fact-finding tribunal which sooner or later will go the way of the civil jury." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 145 (1979).

Sometimes a single it may be problematic in having no identifiable antecedent: "Paraphrasing the opinion of Judge Vann in Tabor v. Hoffman, because an inspection of plaintiff's models may be by fair means, it [?] does not justify obtaining the same by unfair means." See ANTECEDENTS, FALSE (A), EXPLETIVES (A) & DANGLERS.

B. Referring to a Person. Although a young baby is often referred to as an it, other persons should not be, and especially not judges—e.g.: "In this case an experienced and careful district judge heard and reviewed the quantitative apportionment testimony and exhibits in this case, and it [read he—i.e., Lucius D. Bunton III] possessed opportunities to assess their convincingness far superior to those of this (appellate) court." In re Bell Petroleum Servs., Inc., 3 F.3d 889, 911 (5th Cir. 1993).

Even in reference to an older child, the word it seems inappropriately dehumanizing: "To begin with it was held that a child could not be guilty of crime unless it [read he or she] had reached the age of twelve." J.W. Cecil Turner, Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law 66 (1952). Perhaps a preferable edit—to avoid he or she—would be simply to write could not be guilty of crime before the age of twelve. See he or she.

ITALICS. A. Generally. Fowler's shot across the bow is worth heeding: "To those who, however competent on their special subject, have not had enough experience of writing to have learnt [the] rudiments, it comes as natural to italicize every tenth sentence or so as it comes to the letter-writing schoolgirl to underline whatever she enjoys recording" (MEU1 304).

How does one avoid overitalicizing? First, if the italicized words appear in quotations, try making the quoted passage shorter. Second, if the italicized words are one's own, try rearranging the sentence so that the italicized words appear at the end. Third, try the deliberate repetition characterizing any one of several rhetorical devices. (See The Elements of Legal Style 165–72 (1991).)

Ralph Waldo Emerson overstated the case: "'Tis a good rule of rhetoric [that] Schlegel gives—'In good prose, every word is underscored,' which, I suppose, means, Never italicize." "Lectures and Biographical Sketches," in 10 Complete Works of Emerson 169 (1904). By parity of reasoning, of course, one might say we should abolish question marks, exclamation points, and even commas. The point is to italicize only when one must.

B. Foreign Phrases. Anglicized terms of foreign origin appear in roman—i.e., nonitalic—type (e.g., bonus). Unnaturalized terms are italicized. Throughout this dictionary, the fuzzy line between naturalized and unnaturalized foreignisms is drawn through the headwords, which appear in either italic or nonitalic boldface type. See GALLICISMS & LATINISMS.

C. Latin Phrases Beginning with in. Some writers italicize only flagrante delicto, forma pauperis, loco parentis, pari materia, statu quo, and terrorem. But the word in, which is a part of each of these Latin phrases, ought to be italicized as well.

iterate. See reiterate.

it is I; it is me. In formal English, it is I is the preferred expression, it is me being passable in the speech of most persons (less commonly in writing).

E.B. White told an amusing story about the fear that so many writers have of making a mistake:

"One time a newspaper sent us to a morgue to get a story on a woman whose body was being held for identification. A man believed to be her husband was brought in. Somebody pulled the sheet back; the man took one agonizing look, and cried, 'My God, it's her!' When we reported this grim incident, the editor diligently changed it to 'My God, it's she!'" E.B. White, "English Usage," in The Second Tree from the Corner 150, 150–51 (1954). See NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES.

it is important to note that; it is interesting to note that. These sentence-nonstarters merely gather lint. They should be abolished.

it is me. See it is I.

it is plain that. See clearly & obviously.

it is submitted that. This phrase is an especially weak sentence-opener, usually a face-saving mannerism to avoid saying I think.

its; it's. The possessive form of it is its; the contraction for it is is it's.

it's me. See it is I.

it was held that. See hold (C).

-IZE, -ISE. A. Verbs Ending in -ize. Adding the suffix -ize to an adjective or noun is one of the most frequently used means of forming new verbs. Many verbs so formed are objectionable. In AmE, -ize is more usual than in BrE, in which -ise is more common. But even in BrE, -ize is preferred to -ise in words in which either form of the suffix may appear. The possibility of choice between -ise and -ize arises only with words ending with the pronounciation "eyes," not with that of "ice," "iss," or "eez." For example, in precise, the suffix is pronounced "ice," not "eyes"; in promise it is pronounced "iss," not "eyes"; and in expertise it is pronounced "eez."

Generally, -ize verbs are formed on familiar English words or stems—e.g.: authorize, familiarize, symbolize; or with a slight alteration to the stem—e.g.: agonize, dogmatize, sterilize. A few words have no such immediate stem: aggrandize (cf. aggrandizement), appetize (cf. appetite), baptize (cf. baptism), catechize (cf. catechism), recognize (cf. recognition), and capsize.

NEOLOGISMS in -ize are generally to be discouraged, for they are invariably ungainly and often superfluous. Thus we have no use for accessorize, artificialize, cubiclize, fenderize (= to fix a dented fender), funeralize, ghettoize, Mirandize (q.v.), nakedize, and so on. The law has many of its own curiosities in -ize (e.g., privatize, collateralize, communitize, Lochnerize), and probably needs no more. Careful writers are wary of new words formed with this suffix.

B. Verbs Ending in -ise. Verbs that correspond to nouns having -is- as a part of the stem (e.g., in the syllables -vis-, -cis-, -mis-), or that are identical with a noun in -ise, similarly take -ise rather than -ize (from which they are precluded). Some of the common verbs in -ise are:

advertise	despise	merchandise advise	disfranchise	premise apprise	disguise	prise (open) arise	enfranchise	revise chastise	enterprise	supervise circumcise	excise	surmise comprise	exercise	surprise compromise	improvise	televise demise	incise

J

J. is the abbreviation for Judge or Justice. In American legal writing, one commonly sees references such as Scalia, J., dissenting. In British legal writing, no comma is used, even in midtext: "The policy reason advanced by La Forest J. seems to me to be quite inadequate to support his rule of irrecoverability. As Wilson J. pointed out, the idea of fiscal disruption hardly seems sufficient to cast the burden of governmental error on the innocent taxpayer." Peter W. Hogg, Liability of the Crown 184 (2d ed. 1989). The plural is JJ.

jackleg lawyer. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

jactation; jactitation. Jactation, lit. "a tossing or swinging of the body to and fro" (OED), came figuratively to mean (in both Latin and English) "boasting, bragging, ostentatious display" (OED). It is a learned word.

Its sibling jactitation derives from the same Latin verb and also has the sense "a boastful declaration." In law the term has been applied specifically to boasts of marriage. Today jactitation of marriage = a false assertion that one is married to someone to whom one is not in fact married (CDL). E.g., "A decree in a suit of jactitation of marriage, forbidding C to claim to be the husband of A, on the ground that he was not her husband, is deemed to be irrelevant." (Eng.)/ "This is an action in jactitation instituted by the eleven named plaintiffs who prayed that defendant be ordered to disclaim title to the property described in plaintiffs' petition . . . ." Holmes v. Wyatt Lumber Co., 104 So. 2d 293, 293 (La. Ct. App. 1958).

jail delivery, in AmE, means "an escape by several prisoners from a jail"; in BrE, the phrase (spelled gaol delivery) means "the bringing of prisoners to trial."

jailhouse lawyer. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (B).

JANUS-FACED TERMS. Janus is an ancient Italian deity, the god of thresholds such as doorways, gates, and even (by figurative extension) the month of January. He is depicted with two faces—one on each side of the head. Hence "Janus-faced terms" are, because of syntactic construction, overburdened in being asked to look backward and forward simultaneously. (They sometimes look forward at two different objects, or backward.) As here defined, a word so called upon can properly look one way, but not both.

Commonly known as ZEUGMA, this fault of writing occurs when a verb is incorrectly associated with two subjects or objects, an adjective with two nouns, or a noun with an antecedent and a consequent that are different. Some specimens follow, with short explanations of the problems.

A. Simultaneously Referring to the Case Name and the Name of the Person. "It is now doubtful whether McCardle (the defendant) would now be sustained," in which the writer means the opinion with the short-title form McCardle, though the parenthesis refers to the person. Another such example would be: "Shakespeare's powers were perhaps greatest in Hamlet, the most famous of tragedic protagonists," in which the writer is unconsciously referring to the character and the play at the same time. Following is a sentence that avoids the problem just illustrated: "The Roskos court found that the plaintiff, Roskos, was coerced into resignation."

B. Pronoun Used Also as an Expletive. "When Mr. Crick writes about the nature and origin of life, it is always prudent and often a delight to pay attention." Is There Life Elsewhere, and Did It Come Here? N.Y. Times, 29 Nov. 1981, at 7-1. In this sentence, it first appears to refer to Crick's writing (though it has no clear antecedent) and then is used as an introductory filler or expletive. [Read It is always prudent and often delightful to pay attention to Mr. Crick's writing about the nature and origin of life.]

C. Two Different Senses of the Same Word. "Why ought Louisiana [the state government] to have power over one who has had an auto accident there [the place]?"

D. Word Referred to as a Word, While Purporting to Have Substantive Meaning as Well. "Derived from Slav, of which people many were enslaved by the conquering Romans, the word [slave] has acquired connotations of servility, timidity, and cowardice." (Bergen Evans) The reference to Slav is to the word, not the people; hence the phrase that follows is illogical.

E. Preposition Given Two Meanings. "The shareholders will transact such other business as may properly come before the meeting or any adjournment thereof." Here before is asked to mean both "in front of" (before the convocation or meeting) and "prior to" (before adjournment). See ZEUGMA AND SYLLEPSIS (A).

JARGON. A. Definition. Jargon refers to the language, spoken and written, that members of any social, occupational, or professional group use to communicate with one another. As used in this book, the term refers to the full range of specialized vocabulary, devised by lawyers to save themselves time and space in communicating with each other, and sometimes even to conceal meaning from those uninitiated into the law.

Jargon covers a broad range of legal vocabulary from the almost slangy (horse case) to the almost technically precise (res ipsa loquitur). And although an expression that is labeled "jargon" fails to rise to the level of a TERM OF ART, it remains a useful bit of shorthand for presenting ideas that would ordinarily need explaining in other, more circumlocutory terms if persons who lack experience in the law are to understand them.

Thus, a strong in-group property characterizes jargon, which may be acceptable—even desirable—when one lawyer talks with another or addresses a judge. But jargon is unacceptable when the purpose of using it is to demonstrate how much more the speaker or writer knows as a specialist than ordinary listeners or readers do. The intended audience, then, should be the primary concern of a lawyer in deciding which words to use to communicate intelligibly. In a bench trial a lawyer may be justified in referring to the corpus delicti (not truly a TERM OF ART), but in a jury trial, a lawyer who uses this term is likely to lead the jury into confusion, puzzlement, and even misjudgment.

As an archetypal example of jargon, the phrase case on all fours denotes "a reported case in which the facts and law are so closely similar to the one at hand as to be indistinguishable from it." This phrase, containing only four short words, is much more economical than the definition. But the shorthand phrase, useful as it is to lawyers, remains inscrutable, unless explained, to virtually all nonlawyers. Such jargonistic phrases collectively fall under the rubric of this entry. See on all fours.

The following are typical jargonistic words and phrases, all of which are treated in other entries: adhesion contract (see adherence (A)), alter ego, Blackacre, case at bar, case-in-chief, clean hands, clog on the equity, cloud on title, conclusory, four corners of the instrument, in personam, instant case, on all fours, pierce the corporate veil, reasonable person, res integra (or res nova), res ipsa loquitur, sidebar, Whiteacre. For a related phenomenon, see ABSTRACTITIS. For the opposite tendency, see PLAIN LANGUAGE

B. Jargonmongering. Some would say that to be a lawyer (or at least a good one) is necessarily to be a jargonmonger, that word-shuffling is the nature of the business. That pessimistic view is not borne out by the evidence of the many successful straight-talking and straight-writing practitioners. If such a jaded view has any validity, the best one can do is to prove its falsity by one's own example.

It is difficult to improve on Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's seminal analysis of jargon in his book On the Art of Writing (1916; repr. 1961). He sets out its two primary vices: "The first is that it uses circumlocution rather than short straight speech. It says: 'In the case of John Jenkins deceased, the coffin' when it means 'John Jenkins's coffin'; and its yea is not yea, neither is its nay nay; but its answer is in the affirmative or in the negative, as the foolish and superfluous case may be. The second vice is that it habitually chooses vague wooly abstract nouns rather than concrete ones" (id. at 105). "To write jargon is to be perpetually shuffling around in a fog and cotton-wool of abstract terms" (id. at 117). See ABSTRACTITIS.

Nothing nauseates like the real thing: "A supplement to the draft or final EIS on file will be prepared whenever significant impacts resulting from changes in the proposed plan or new significant impact information, criteria or circumstances relevant to environmental considerations impact on the recommended plan or proposed action." 33 C.F.R. § 2502.9(c)(1) (1988). See INITIALESE.

jaywalker (= a pedestrian who crosses a street without heeding traffic regulations) began as an early-20th-century Americanism but is now used also in BrE. In the 1910s, jay was a slang term meaning "a stupid, silly person; a simpleton," and at about that time jaywalker and its BACK-FORMATION jaywalk came to refer to someone stupid enough to cross streets unsafely.

J.D. is now the predominantly awarded law degree in the U.S.—LL.B. (q.v.) formerly having this distinction. The abbreviation J.D. generally stands for Juris Doctor (= doctor of law).

jealousy; envy. The careful writer distinguishes between these terms. Jealousy is properly restricted to contexts involving love and affairs of the heart, whereas envy is used more broadly of resentful contemplation of a more fortunate person.

Jeddart justice; Jedburgh justice; Jedwood justice. The first is now the usual form of this term, meaning "execution first, trial afterwards." The name derives from Jedburgh in Roxburghshire, Scotland, a town near the English border where bands of raiders frequently skirmished on both sides. (Jeddart is probably a corrupted form of "Jedworth," the old name of the place.) Apparently of 16th-century origin, Jeddart justice "differs from lynch law in that it was done by a kind of summary court, not by persons wholly unauthorized" (OCL).

jeofails (= mistakes or oversights in pleading), for the most part an obsolete term, is pronounced /jə-faylz/. Formerly thought to be the LAW FRENCH form of j'ai faillé, meaning "I have made an error," the term is now generally thought to derive from jocus, as in jeopardy (= jocus partitus). See John H. Baker & M.S. Arnold, Origin of "Jeofail," 87 Law Q. Rev. 166 (1971).

jeopardize; (en)jeopard. Horwill wrote that in AmE "jeopard is preferred to jeopardize, the common term in England." Modern American Usage 178 (2d ed. 1944). This was not true in 1944, and it is not true today. E.g., "Fanciful rights of accused persons cannot be allowed to prevent the functioning of the police and so to jeopardize the safety of the public." Enjeopard and jeopard are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

jeopardy. See double jeopardy.

jetsam. See flotsam.

jibe. See gibe.

Jim Crow laws (= laws enacted or purposely interpreted to discriminate against blacks) is an early-19th-century American coinage deriving from Jim Crow (1838), a derogatory name for a black man. The institution of American segregation came to be called Jim Crowism at about the same time.

jimmy; jemmy. A burglar's crowbar is spelled jimmy in AmE, jemmy in BrE.

JJ. (invariably capitalized) is the abbreviation for judges or justices.

j.n.o.v. (= judgment non obstante veredicto) is usually abbreviated thus in lower case. Some courts write JNOV, but the capital letters and dropping of periods are distracting. The abbreviation is sometimes shortened to n.o.v.: "Appellee may bring his grounds for new trial to the trial court's attention when defendant first makes an n.o.v. [better: a j.n.o.v.] motion." See judgment non obstante veredicto.

jobsite. One word. Cf. worksite.

John a Nokes; John a Stiles. These fictitious names of parties in a lawsuit, dating from the 15th and used well into the 19th century, derive from John atten Oke (= John who dwells at the oak) and John atte Stile (= John who dwells at the stile). They were frequently abbreviated J.N. and J.S. See Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 25 (1881) (referring to John at Stile).

Occasionally these names are not fictitious. For example, Stiles v. Blunt, 912 F.2d 260 (8th Cir. 1990), involves John A. Stiles's candidacy for the Missouri House of Representatives. Cf. Doe, John.

join = (1) to unite (several causes of action) in a lawsuit; or (2) to unite (several parties) in a lawsuit.

joinder. A. And jointure. These are different words. Joinder, the noun corresponding to the verb to join, q.v., is the usual term in law for the uniting of several causes of action or of parties in a single suit. E.g., "The proceeding was one that by statute binds such future interest without either joinder or representation of the person in favor of whom it was limited." See issue (D).

Jointure, a much less common term, means "a widow's freehold life estate in land, made in lieu of dower." E.g., "A jointure or any pecuniary provision that is made for the benefit of the intended wife, and in lieu of her dower, shall bar her right to dower provided she assents to the jointure." John W. Reilly, The Language of Real Estate 261 (2d ed. 1982). / "It became usual instead to provide in a marriage settlement for some land to be settled on the husband and wife jointly for the life of the survivor, so that a widow would have the land until her death in lieu of a dower. Such a provision was called a 'jointure.'" J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 309 (3d ed. 1990).

B. And consolidation. Whereas joinder has come to be used usually in the sense of uniting parties in a suit, consolidation has become in AmE the more usual word for uniting two or more lawsuits into a single suit. See disjoinder & misjoinder.

C. Compulsory joinder; permissive joinder. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which have served as the model for many other sets of court rules, distinguish between compulsory joinder and permissive joinder. Under Rule 19(a), a party whose presence will not deprive the court of subject-matter jurisdiction must be joined if either of the following is true: (1) in that party's absence, those already involved in the lawsuit cannot receive complete relief; or (2) the absence of such a party, claiming an interest in the subject of the action, might either impair the protection of that interest or leave some other party subject to multiple or inconsistent obligations. These provisions equate with compulsory joinder, although the word compulsory appears nowhere in the rule. Commentators arrived at the name compulsory joinder because the rule uses the mandatory shall. (If a party who falls under this rule cannot be joined for some reason, the court must then decide whether the party is indispensable or merely necessary. See indispensable.)

Permissive joinder, meanwhile, falls under Rule 20, which is given that very heading. Under this rule, persons may be joined as plaintiffs if they assert a right to relief jointly, severally, or in the alternative in respect of the same transaction or occurrence, and if any legal or factual question common to all plaintiffs will arise. Persons may be joined as defendants if any right to relief is asserted against them jointly, severally, or in respect of the same transaction or occurrence, and if any legal or factual question common to all defendants will arise.

D. Joinder of issue. See issue (D).

join issue. See issue (D).

joint and several = together and in separation. When two or more persons bind themselves to do something for another person, their liability on the contract is joint and several if both or all first bind themselves by one promise, and then each of them makes a separate promise to the same effect. E.g., "Appellants jointly and severally covenanted and agreed that they would pay the principal sum of $280,000 on February 1."/ "When a partner dies, his private estate is jointly and severally liable . . for debts and obligations of the firm incurred while he was a partner." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 14 (1951).

With joint and several liability, the liability of two or more obligors may be enforced against them all by a joint action or against any of them by an individual action. Solidary liability is used in this sense in Louisiana, Puerto Rico, and civil-law countries. In addition to joint and several obligations, Scottish lawyers refer to conjunct and several obligations. See several.

joint enterprise. Unlike joint venture, q.v., the phrase joint enterprise occurs primarily in criminal law. It is apt when two or more persons set out to commit an offense they have conspired to commit; it should not apply when two or more persons are involved in an unplanned and unforeseen incident that has arisen unexpectedly.

jointly and severally. See joint and several.

joint tenancy; tenancy in common. The distinction between these two terms is basic to the law of property. Joint tenancy = ownership of property by two or more persons who have identical interests in the whole of the property, with a right of survivorship. Tenancy in common = equitable ownership of property by two or more persons in equal or unequal undivided shares, with no right of survivorship. The property for each of these tenancies may be either real (land) or personal (e.g., a bank account), although the CDL, which reflects British legal practices, confines its definitions to real property.

join together is a REDUNDANCY that should be allowed to survive only in the marriage service, and there only because it is a bona fide remnant of Elizabethan English.

jointure. See joinder (A). joint venture; joint adventure. The latter, an ARCHAISM, still occasionally appears, but joint venture—a clearer phrase—ought to displace it. E.g., "[I]n each case the parties were joint adventurers [read joint venturers] and were unquestionably in a confidential relationship . . . ." Dairy Queen of Duncanville, Inc. v. O'Quinn, 502 S.W.2d 889, 892 (Tex. Civ. App.—Dallas 1973). Cf. joint enterprise.

joint wills. See mutual wills.

joker = an ambiguous clause in a legislative bill inserted to render it inoperative or uncertain in some respect without arousing opposition at time of passage. See Bennet v. Commercial Advertiser Ass'n, 129 N.E. 343, 345 (N.Y. 1920). More broadly—and less malignantly—the term may also refer to a rider or amendment that is extraneous to the subject of the bill. E.g., "Such a holding seems to me to throw both general and special revenue acts wide open as convenient vehicles for the enactment, under the concealment of their titles, of 'joker' legislation . . . ." Macke v. Commonwealth, 159 S.E. 148, 151 (Va. 1931) (Espes, J., dissenting). journal, v.t.; journalize. Both terms are used in the sense "to record in a journal." Journalize is more usual in legal contexts—e.g.: "He filed an appeal after the district judge officially journalized the judgment." The verb to journal has additional, nonlegal senses.

JOURNALESE. See TITULAR TOMFOOLERY

joyrider; joyriding. These early-20th-century American coinages remain colloquialisms—yet criminal-law texts use them because they are the only available terms. Joyrider = one who drives someone else's car without permission. The verb, a BACK-FORMATION, is hyphenated: to joy-ride.

J.P. = Justice of the Peace. Conventionally, if the abbreviation is used, the plural would be J.P.'s, because the abbreviation contains periods—e.g.: "From the J.P.s [read J.P.'s] odium and contempt spread to the higher justices, usually J.P.s [read J.P.'s] in their own localities . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 71 (1966). In the sentence quoted, however, one can understand the author's desire to avoid a MISCUE caused by the apostrophe's seeming to make J.P. a possessive. Oddly, however, the same writer used the pl. Q.C.'s (see quot. at junior).

judex, except in historical contexts—e.g.: "English Chancery Courts, heavy borrowers from the civil law, may have derived the system of special masters from the civilian judex of the Roman Republic and Early Empire"—is an unnecessary equivalent of judge. Pl. judices.

judge; justice. A. An Array of Distinctions. In the U.S., as a general rule, judges sitting on the highest appellate level of a jurisdiction are known as justices. Trial judges and appellate judges on intermediate levels are generally called judges, not justices. (New York, Texas, and a few other jurisdictions depart from these general rules. In New York, justices sit on the trial court of general jurisdiction [the Supreme Court, oddly], whereas judges sit on the appellate courts. In Texas, justices sit on the courts of appeals [between the trial court and the Supreme Court—the latter being the highest court of civil appeal—which is also composed of justices]; judges sit on the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the highest criminal court, and on trial courts.)

In England and Northern Ireland, similarly, judges of the Supreme Court at trial level are justices and at the appellate level lords justices. Judges sit on circuit courts and justices in magistrates' courts.

Horwill wrote that "judge carries with it in America by no means such dignified associations as it possesses in Eng. It may mean [in AmE] no more than a magistrate of a police court." H.W. Horwill, Modern American Usage 180 (2d ed. 1944). Justice may also denote, in AmE and BrE alike, a low-ranking judge or inferior magistrate, as in the phrases justice of the peace and police justice. When, however, the word refers to the highest American judges—the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States—the word Justice is ordinarily capitalized, even if no particular Justice is named.

Judges often look unkindly on mistakes in their titles, as by inserting "[sic]" after mistakes—e.g.: "By two identical motions filed January 3, 1985 in these related actions, defendant moves for an order 'disqualifying the Honorable Mr. Justice [sic] Charles L. Brieant from hearing this matter on the ground that said Honorable Charles L. Brieant was the presiding justice [sic] in the trial of Lamy Optic Industries, Inc. v. Passport International Ltd . . . .'" Tenzer v. Lewitinn, 599 F. Supp. 973, 974 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) (per Brieant, J.). Similarly, Chief Justice Rehnquist, during oral argument, has corrected counsel who have addressed him as "Judge." See David Margolick, At the Bar, N.Y. Times, 26 April 1991, at B9.

B. In Informal Contexts. In AmE, lawyers conventionally call all but U.S. Supreme Court Justices "judge" in informal settings. Judge Phillips is permissible in talking with the Chief Justice of the Texas Supreme Court, though in referring to him in a conversation with someone else, one would say either the Chief Justice or Chief Justice Phillips, or perhaps Justice Phillips (less proper).

In BrE, the conventions are quite different: "Never say 'Justice Smith' or (except for a circuit or county court judge) 'Judge Smith'; these are Americanisms, to be shunned and avoided on this side of the Atlantic." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 64 (11th ed. 1982). Williams is emphatic about this point: do not just shun them—avoid them as well. What are the proper forms? Williams recommends "'Mr. Justice Smith' (or Mrs. Justice Smith, as the case may be) . . . when speaking of him in public." Id. He does not mention Ms. Justice Smith, the title Ms. not having caught on in BrE to the extent it has in AmE. See my lord & FORMS OF ADDRESS (D).

judgeable. So spelled.

judge advocate. Pl. judge advocates.

judge, v.t. See adjudge.

judgeless is a legal NEOLOGISM denoting an unhappy state of affairs—e.g.: "To so require would leave a number of rural Texas counties judgeless in some criminal cases." Joshua v. State, 696 S.W.2d 451, 456 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 1985)./ "Eventually, the jury might be on its own, without even a judge. [¶] The last move—from lawless to judgeless juries—suggests another process change." Leonard R. Jaffee, Empathetic Adjustment—An Alternative to Rules, Policies, and Politics, 58 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1161, 1225 (1990).

judge-made, adj., is used generally as an antonym of statutory. E.g., "No system of law—whether it be judge-made or legislatively enacted—can be so perfectly drafted as to leave no room for dispute." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 56 (rev. ed. 1969)./ "Such judge-made law would be disastrous for press freedom." Economist, 28 Jan.–3 Feb. 1989, at 18.

The exceptions are many, but a latent DIFFERENTIATION appears to be emerging between judge-made law and common law: though the common law is literally judge-made law, modern writers tend to use judge-made law in reference to recent developments and common law in reference to the remote past.

The phrase bench-made is a less frequent variant. See Henry J. Abraham, The Judicial Process 9 (2d ed. 1968) (bench-made law).

judge-shopping = using any of various means to bring a case before a judge who might be more favorably inclined to a litigant than some other judge might be. Though the following examples do not contain hyphens, the phrase is best hyphenated: "[W]e emphasize that the requirement of showing the unavailability of the trial judge must be strictly met in order to avoid the obvious possibilities of conflict or 'judge shopping' for a favorable ruling." Shafer v. Northside Inn, Inc., 184 N.E.2d 756, 758–59 (Ill. App. Ct. 1962)./ "'Judge shopping' in this overloaded court is rarely tolerated." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 112 (1988)./ "Payments previously varied from judge to judge, a situation that sometimes led to 'judge shopping.'" Michael deC. Hinds, Better Traps Being Built for Delinquent Parents, N.Y. Times, 9 Dec. 1989, at 10.

judgey (= characteristic of or like a judge) is a NEOLOGISM carrying negative connotations—e.g.: "Edwards is less 'judgey' than most judges. He is not modest, but neither is he pompous." Donald D. Jackson, Judges 324 (1974).

judgment. A. Spelling. Judgment is the preferred form in AmE and seems to be preferred in British legal texts, even as far back as the 19th century. Judgement is prevalent in British nonlegal texts, and was thought by Fowler to be the better form; Glanville Williams states that, in BrE, "judgement should really be the preferred spelling." Learning the Law 153 (11th ed. 1982).

B. AmE & BrE Senses. In AmE, a judgment is the final decisive act of a court in defining the rights of the parties. It "includes a decree and any order from which an appeal lies." Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(a).

In BrE, judgment is commonly used in the sense in which judicial opinion is used in AmE: "The facts of this case, which are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Hanworth M.R., were briefly as follows." (Eng.) Continental legal systems likewise use judgment in this way. See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT, decision & opinion.

C. And decree. Though decree is traditionally the term for a final disposition in equity, the term judgment applies, in most American states, to the final disposition made by a court in an equitable as well as in a legal proceeding. See Restatement of Judgments, Intro. at 3 (1942). See decree.

D. Court judgment. This phrase is a REDUNDANCY, though perhaps an understandable one when the likely readers are nonlawyers. For example, the title of the following book might have miscued general readers if the word court had been removed: Gini G. Scott et al., Collect Your Court Judgment (1991).

E. And verdict. See verdict (D).

judgment as a matter of law. See judgment non obstante veredicto (A).

judgment by default. See default judgment.

judgmental; judgmatic. Judgmental = (1) of or relating to judgment; or (2) judging when uncalled for. Sense (2) is now more common , but sense (1) still appears. E.g., "The qualification is generally undertaken only in an effort to make meaningful a whole host of judgmental factors applicable at a particular time." Judgmatic, called by Fowler a "facetious formation" because of its irregular formation on the analogy of dogmatic, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of judicious. See judicial.

judgment-book; judgment-roll. In most jurisdictions, these terms refer synonymously to the book kept by the clerk of court for the entry or recordation of judgments. (See rendition of judgment.) But some American jurisdictions call for entry of judgments in the judgment-roll and mere recordation of judgments in the judgment-book. The usual term in BrE is judgment-roll.

judgment non obstante veredicto. A. And judgment notwithstanding the verdict; j.n.o.v.; judgment n.o.v. In AmE, the tendency is to substitute all these phrases with judgment as a matter of law, q.v. But, of the headwords listed, perhaps the best unabbreviated one is judgment notwithstanding the verdict. We must not forget the Latin phrase, however, lest new generations of lawyers come to miss the import of j.n.o.v.—an abbreviation that litters many legal texts. See j.n.o.v.

B. Shortened form of non obstante veredicto. The phrase non obstante veredicto is sometimes used in the shortened form non obstante—e.g.: "This appeal requires us to determine whether the trial judge's action in granting judgment non obstante for the defendant was correct."

C. A Common Misspelling. A surprisingly high percentage of the time, American lawyers mangle the Latin and write verdicto—e.g.: "[I]f the jury's verdict is clearly arbitrary, the court may enter judgment non obstante verdicto [read veredicto]." Constance S. Huttner, Note, Unfit for Jury Determination, 20 B.C. L. Rev. 511, 534 (1979). All the more reason to stick to judgment as a matter judgment-proof; execution-proof. Both of these phrases, in reference to a judgment-debtor, mean "having insufficient assets to satisfy a money judgment." Although judgment-proof is much more common, execution-proof is more accurate: the judgment-creditor may have had little difficulty obtaining the judgment (i.e., winning the lawsuit), but collecting on the judgment through execution may be another matter entirely. Thus, the penniless loser is insulated not from judgment but from execution.

judgment-roll. See judgment-book.

JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT. Judgment in this article means the final decree of an appellate court that acts upon a lower-court judgment, whether affirming, reversing, vacating, or whatever. British lawyers ordinarily use judgment synonymously with opinion, whereas Americans distinguish between the opinion (which sets out the reasons for the disposition) and the judgment (the pronouncement of the disposition itself). This article, then, reflects primarily American practices.

A cardinal principle of judgment-drafting is that appellate opinions should make explicit how the court is disposing of the judgment or order below. Appellate courts have sometimes left the parties and the trial court uncertain about the status of a case by using vague terms such as so ordered and ordered accordingly, unaccompanied by a clear statement of the disposition preceding these phrases. This practice is, happily, obsolescent. Of course, if the judgment is particularly complex—as when an appellate court affirms certain parts of the trial court's judgment, vacates another part, and orders the trial court to dismiss what remains as moot—the so ordered might be just the phrase for concluding such an admirably precise judgment.

A second important point is that judges should almost make a fetish of the following distinctions: an appeals court affirms, reverses, or modifies judgments or orders; it agrees with, approves, or disapproves opinions or decisions; and it remands cases (or causes) and actions. When the lower court lacked jurisdiction, the proper disposition by the appellate court is to vacate the judgment of the trial court and dismiss the case from the docket of the trial court (or order the trial court to dismiss). If the trial court had jurisdiction over the case, but entered an order beyond its jurisdiction, the proper disposition is to vacate the order and remand the case. In each of these circumstances, the appellate court had jurisdiction over the appeal for the limited purpose of making the disposition described. If the appeal raised other issues about the judgment (or order) of the trial court, the proper disposition might add: in other respects the appeal is dismissed.

When the appellate court lacks jurisdiction to hear any aspect of the appeal, the proper disposition is usually appeal dismissed. Although an appellate court in its opinions may approve or disapprove the trial court's statement or use of legal propositions, the judgment proper operates only on the judgment or order appealed from—that is, appellate courts do not affirm or reverse opinions, only orders or judgments. (The appellate court may, for example, affirm the judgment below but substitute a rationale leading to that judgment.)

The terms vacate and reverse can be problematic. Practices vary: some courts reverse the judgment below when the trial court should have disposed of the case differently, and vacate when the trial court may not have been incorrect, but needs to be unconstrained by its former judgment as it carries out the further directions of the appellate court. E.g., "We vacate the judgment of the district court and remand the case for proceedings consistent with this opinion." Still other courts vacate only injunctions or administrative orders, or judgments or orders made without jurisdiction, reversing all other erroneous dispositions below. Courts ought to encourage consistency among their particular judges in these matters of usage.

With these guidelines in mind, we may usefully consider a number of appellate-court judgments, as well as statements about judgments, that are illustrative of the pitfalls awaiting the unwary. The first seven examples of poor drafting that follow have been adapted, with some additions, from the excellent discussion of the former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Texas, Robert W. Calvert, in his Appellate Court Judgments, 6 Tex. Tech L. Rev. 915, 923–24 (1975).

1. Mistaking the Lower Court for Its Judgment. "We deny the petitions and affirm [read affirm the order of] the Interstate Commerce Commission."/ "In an opinion by Justice Brennan, the Supreme Court affirmed [read affirmed the judgment of] the Fourth Circuit."/ "For these reasons, I am of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to warrant revocation in this case and would affirm [read affirm the judgment of] the lower court." The tribunal appealed from is not before the higher court for approval or disapproval, affirmance or reversal; rather, its judgment or order is.

2. Mistaking the Case for the Judgment Below.

"The case (or cause) [read The judgment] is affirmed." The case or cause remains the same; an appellate-court judgment acts directly upon a previous judgment in the case, but not upon the case itself.

3. Mistaking the Lower Court's Opinion for Its Judgment. "The opinion [read judgment] of the trial court is affirmed."/ "The decision [read judgment] of the district court is reversed."/ "For reasons stated below, we affirm the decision [read judgment] of the trial court." The appellate court may agree or disagree with the trial court's opinion or decision; again, however, it affirms or reverses the judgment.

4. Mistaking the Appellate Court's Judgment for the Trial Court's. "The judgment of the trial court is reversed and rendered." Appellate courts ordinarily have no power or jurisdiction to render a trial court's judgment; yet appellate courts are often authorized to render judgments that should have been rendered by the trial court. [Read The judgment of the trial court is reversed; [on appeal,] we render judgment for . . . .]

5. Purporting to Render a Judgment That the Court Simultaneously Reverses. "We reverse and render that judgment." Similar to #4. [Read We reverse, and instead render judgment as follows: . . . .]

6. Mistaking the Judgment for the Case. "The judgment of the trial court is reversed and remanded [read and the case is remanded]." (The judgment of the trial court may be reversed, but only the case may be remanded.)/ "We vacate and remand the case for consideration of whether these errors were harmless." (Understood, perhaps, are the words the judgment of the trial court after the word vacate; it is generally best not to rely on UNDERSTOOD WORDS in drafting judgments, however; yet see the next-to-last paragraph of this article.)/ "The trial court's judgment is affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part [read affirmed in part, reversed in part, and the case is remanded]." Though it is possible, cases are not ordinarily remanded in part. If the judgment is not stated in sentence form, it is quite proper to write Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

7. Superfluously Granting Judgment After Reversal of a Plaintiff's Judgment. "The judgment for the plaintiff is reversed and the judgment is here rendered for the defendant [omit the italicized words]." If the defendant has not filed a counterclaim, the judgment should end after the word reversed; the judgment is favorable to the defendant merely in denying the plaintiff recovery.

8. Wrongly Omitting a Remand. "The judgment that the plaintiff take nothing is reversed and is here rendered for the plaintiff." The judgment is incomplete, unless there is only one possible form and measure of relief; if the plaintiff sought damages, the case would have to be remanded to the trial court to determine damages. [Read We reverse the judgment and remand for a determination of damages.]

9. Mistaking the Judgment for the Court Below or Its Judgment. "The district court's judgment held [read opinion held, or, better, The district court held] that the oral contract was dissolved by virtue of appellee's breach for failure to provide or secure the promised financing."

Finally, it is worth noting that the terms affirm, reverse, remand, etc. may have "understood" objects, as here: "We affirm on all issues with regard to Jack Ballard, but reverse insofar as the court held Mary Ballard liable for the 1969 and 1970 deficiencies."/ "We hold that Ohio's law of trade secrets is not preempted by the patent laws of the United States, and, accordingly, we reverse."/ "We reverse and remand." These elliptical phrases are unexceptionable.

Lawyers as well as judges must be sensitive to these niceties if they are to draft meaningful prayers in their appellate briefs—and write more precise articles on appellate advocacy: "The appellee's brief should tell [read say] why the trial court [read the trial court's judgment] should be affirmed, not why appellant's brief is all wrong." James L. Robertson, Reality on Appeal, Litig., Fall 1990, at 3, 6.

judicative; judicatorial; judicatory. Judicative is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of adjudicative, q.v., while judicatorial is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of judicial, q.v. Judicatory, adj., = (1) of or relating to judgment; (2) by which a judgment may be made; giving a decisive indication; critical. For the noun senses of judicatory, see judicature.

judicator. See adjudicator.

judicature; judicatory. Judicature = (1) a judge's office, function, or authority; (2) a body of judges; or (3) the action of judging or of administering justice through duly constituted courts. It is sometimes used in BrE where judiciary, q.v., usu. appears in AmE; hence the U.S. statute is the Judiciary Act of 1789, whereas Britain had the Judicature Acts 1873–75 and the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, now consolidated in the Supreme Court Act 1981. (That Act omits judicature, which may be obsolescent in BrE.) Judicature is used in a few American names such as the American Judicature Society, which publishes the journal Judicature, by its own terms "a forum for fact and opinion relating to all aspects of the administration of justice and its improvement."

On the whole, however, judicature has generally been far more common in BrE than in AmE. E.g., "The chancery division placed stress upon certain provisions of the judicature act." (Eng.)// "It is a basic rule of English judicature that our courts do justice in public." (Eng.)// "What in later times were seen as two distinct branches of the constitution—the legislature and the judicature—had their origins in a less sophisticated notion of kingship in which legislation and adjudication were not distinguishable." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 234 (3d ed. 1990).

Judicatory = judiciary; judicature. E.g., "[C]onfusion . . . would unavoidably result from the contradictory decisions of a number of independent judicatories . . . ." The Federalist No. 22, at 150 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961). Today, except in specialized senses in Scotland and in the Presbyterian Church, this term should be avoided as a NEEDLESS VARIANT. For its adjectival sense, see judicative & adjudicative.

judicial; judicious. Judicial = (1) of, relating to, or by the court <judicial officers>; (2) in court <judicial admissions>; (3) legal <the Attorney General took no judicial action>; or (4) of or relating to a judgment <judicial interest at the rate of four percent per annum>. Following are illustrations of the four senses of this complex word.

Sense (1)—the usual sense: "The requirements of this section had been judicially interpreted [i.e., interpreted by the court] well before defendants' actions."/ "Far more imposing is the edifice of private remedies judicially extracted from the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934."

Sense (2)—closely related to sense (1) but distinct: "The record further revealed that the trial court erroneously apprised the defendant of the effect of his plea (i.e., by failing to inform him that his judicial stipulation had foreclosed a merit consideration of his appeal from the adverse ruling on the motion to suppress)."/ "Appellant then took the witness stand and judicially confessed that she had committed the offense alleged against her in the indictment."

Sense (3)—in which the court is quite remote: "Mr. Rogerson . . . was arrested that evening and charged with manslaughter, but in the first week of December last year a grand jury declined to indict him. In the months afterward, . . . Mrs. Wood's husband, Kevin, and other residents who were upset at the lack of judicial action have written letters to newspapers and government officials in an attempt to pressure the Attorney General's office to seek an indictment again." Lyn Riddle, Deer Hunter Is Indicted in Accidental Killing of Woman in Maine, N.Y. Times, 9 Dec. 1989, at 10.

Sense (4)—a sense not recorded in unabridged or legal dictionaries, but not uncommon in legal contexts, especially in AmE: "Todd's liability for Auto's attorney's fees, therefore, is fundamentally different from, for example, liability for interest on a judgment. . . . Whereas an award of judicial interest is collateral to and independent of the action itself, attorney's fees awarded as a result of breach of an implied warranty of workmanlike performance are an integral part of the merits of the case and the scope of relief." Todd Shipyards Corp. v. Auto Transp., S.A., 763 F.2d 745, 756 (5th Cir. 1985). Though hardly unusual, this use of the word is certainly suspect.

Judicious is a much simpler word, meaning "well considered, discreet, wisely circumspect." E.g., "The court judiciously exercised its inherent equitable power to fashion a remedy appropriate to the wrongs committed."/ "By judicious application of Rule 403, a trial judge can afford the defendant in an obscenity case a fair opportunity to prove that the community displays a reasonable degree of acceptance of comparable material."/ "My theory was expressed too widely in certain parts, and not widely enough in others; and Mr. Whitworth's pamphlet appeared to me to have corrected and completed it in a judicious manner." (Eng.) Judgmatic is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of judicious. See judgmental.

judicial cognizance. See judicial notice.

judicial court. In Massachusetts and Maine (and, formerly, New Hampshire), this phrase is not a redundancy: the legislature was originally called the general court, and therefore by distinction judicial court emerged in the 17th century and has persisted. See general court.

judicialize = to treat judicially, arrive at a judgment or decision upon (OED). More modernly it has evolved to mean "to take into the province of the courts" and appears usu. in a lament—e.g.: "A legal process designed to make the law judge-proof has become steadily more judicialized, and today the rate of judicialization is accelerating throughout the civil law world." J.H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 155 (1969)./ "As lawyers we have a natural inclination to 'judicialize' every function of government." Lon L. Fuller, The Mo- rality of Law 176 (rev. ed. 1969; repr. 1976). See -IZE.

The noun judicialization (used above in the Merryman quotation) is fairly common—e.g.: "He [Richard A. Epstein] talks, for example, of putting an end to government intervention in the area of labor relations, which he says has led to 'judicialization' of labor contracts." Deborah Graham, Conservative Academics: Rising Stars, Legal Times, 18 March 1985, at 1. Cf. juridification.

judicial notice; judicial cognizance. The former phrase (referring to the means by which a court may take as proved certain facts without hearing evidence) is now the more common of the two in both AmE and BrE. A court takes judicial notice of a fact for one of two reasons: either it relates to a general legal question (such as statutory construction or constitutionality) that can better be explored by the judge free of evidentiary limitations, or it is so indisputably settled that, although normally within the fact-finder's purview, it can be resolved by the judge without hearing evidence.

The verb phrase is either notice judicially or judicially notice: "While there are few absolutes in this area, we can notice judicially, if we need, that contemporary wills more often than not use the residuary clause to carry out the most important provisions."/ "According to professional etiquette, which is judicially noticed, a barrister may take instructions only from solicitors and not directly from lay clients . . . ." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 22 (3d ed. 1955).

judicial review. A. In AmE. Judicial review has specialized senses that are not at all apparent in the phrase itself. It means either (1) "the court's power to refuse to enforce an unconstitutional act of either the state or the national government"; or (2) "the court's exercise of that power." E.g., "This right of judicial review is indeed the most potent and pregnant fact of Supreme Court power; and its most dramatic and controversial manifestation is in the vetoing by the justices of things done by the other two supposedly equal branches of the national government, the Congress and the President." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 36 (1955)./ "Does the Constitution make it clear that the Court has this final authority of 'judicial review' over national legislative enactments?" Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 7–8 (1960).

Occasionally—and esp. in journalistic writing—judicial review is used as a synonym of appellate review. This usage, however, is not strictly proper.

B. In BrE. The BrE uses are quite different because G.B. does not have judicial review in the American sense: courts cannot invalidate primary legislation (though they review the decisions of lower courts). British writers use judicial review to refer to a relatively new procedure in England and Scotland, a procedure that enables a litigant to challenge an administrative action by a public body—and, in England, to secure a declaration; an order for mandamus, certiorari, or prohibition; or an award of damages. E.g., "The Labour-controlled authority is also among 21 councils contesting a judicial review in the High Court next week, in the hope of overturning proposals to cap their poll tax charges." Peter Davenport, Council Introduces "Austerity Cuts" Because of Poll Tax, Times (London), 2 June 1990, at 2.

judicial separation. See separation.

JUDICIAL WRITING. See OPINIONS, JUDICIAL (B).

judiciary, adj. Ordinarily a noun, judiciary is used in W3 adjectivally in the phrase with full judiciary authority (in definition of en banc). W3 records judiciary as an adjective equivalent to judicial. Today, though, it is rarely so used in legal contexts and should be avoided in that sense as a NEEDLESS VARIANT. "This procedure agrees with the judiciary [read judicial] practice in the United States." J.D. Hannan, The Canon Law of Wills, Catholic Univ. Am. Canon Law Studies, No. 86, at 135 (1934)./ "This system of checks and balances was not the result, as in the American Constitution, of a division of power between the legislative, executive, and judiciary [read judicial] branches of the government." Hans J. Wolff, Roman Law 27 (1951). See judicative.

But in the sense "of or relating to the judiciary," which means something different from judicial (= of or relating to a court or courts), the adjective judiciary is useful. E.g., "If the history of the interpretation of judiciary legislation teaches anything, it teaches the duty to reject treating such statutes as a wooden set of self-sufficient words . . . ." Romero v. International Terminal Operating Co., 358 U.S. 354, 379 (1959). In that sentence, judicial legislation would have created a miscue, suggesting judicial activism rather than statutes affecting the judiciary. See judicial.

judiciary, n., (= the judicial branch of government) is used in both AmE and BrE. (See judicature.) E.g., "In Crouch v. Crouch, we gave reasons for the federal judiciary's traditional refusal to exercise diversity jurisdiction in domestic relations cases."/ "I believe we should have rights of audience but this is only on condition that we satisfy the judiciary and the public that those rights will be exercised completely and fully." Valerie Elliott, Prosecutors Seek Senior Lawyers, Sunday Telegraph, 11 Feb. 1990, at 5 (quoting Allan Green, Q.C.).

jump bail (= to leave [a place] illegally while free on bail) began as slang, but has now become a respectable expression used even by judges in written opinions. E.g., "If the principal jumps bail and is not re-arrested, complete and permanent forfeiture of bail seems to be universal." U.S. v. Ciena, 195 F. Supp. 511, 511 (S.D.N.Y. 1961)./ "The defendant jumped bail before trial." Supreme Court Ponders Sanction for Violation of Speedy Trial Act, 56 U.S.L.W. 1176, 1176 (17 May 1988). See bail jump.

juncture. The phrase at this juncture should be used in reference to a crisis or a critically important time; it is not equivalent merely to "at this time" or "now." When used with these latter meanings, it is a pomposity. Here it is appropriate: "There can be no question that respondent was 'in custody' at least as of the moment he was placed under arrest; because he was not informed of his constitutional rights at this juncture, respondent's subsequent admissions should not have been used against him." And here it is inappropriate: "The controversy at this juncture merely points up [read at this point merely illustrates] the indefiniteness and uncertainty of the controversial portion of the decree."/ "Texas argues that delay of review is not all that it seeks to avoid by petitioning at this juncture [read at this point or now]."

junior (BrE) = a barrister who has not taken silk, regardless of age. E.g., "To the juniors—those who are not Q.C.'s—is reserved the work of drafting pleadings, so that the man who 'takes silk' must start all over again, with as much chance of failing as he ever had." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 390 (1966). See silk & devil.

junior party; senior party. In American patent-law practice, junior party refers to the applicant involved in an interference (q.v.) who filed later; senior party refers to the applicant who filed earlier.

junk bond = a security issued by a company that is too young or has too much debt to earn an investment-grade rating from an agency such as Moody's Investor's Service Inc. or Standard & Poor's Corporation. Such a bond pays a higher return and is considered riskier than an investment-grade bond.

junta; junto. Of Spanish origin, junta (= a political or military group in power, esp. after a coup d'état) is pronounced either /hoon-tə/ or /jən-tə/. It is much more common in AmE than its altered form, junto (/jən-toh/, which has undergone slight DIFFERENTIATION to mean "a self-appointed committee having political aims." Gowers wrote that junto "is an erroneous form" (MEU2 at 319), but it appears frequently in BrE where an American would write junta—e.g.: "Even so, a compliant civilian government may not be easy for the deeply unpopular junto to achieve." Myanmar: Deja Vu, Economist, 16 Jan. 1993, at 34 (Am. ed.).

jural; juristic; juridic; juridical; juratory; juratorial. Jural = (1) of or relating to law or its administration; legal; or (2) of or pertaining to rights and obligations <jural relations>. Today, jural is more common in sense (2)—e.g.: "The rule was cast in terms of jural relations, with a particular suit falling into one class or another according to the character of the right sought to be enforced . . . ." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 476 (4th ed. 1983)./ "The same points and the same examples seem valid in relation to all possible kinds of jural interests, legal as well as equitable."

In sense (1), jural appears to be only a NEEDLESS VARIANT of simpler terms, such as legal. But some legal theorists make a case for it, arguing that, whereas legal can be ambiguous as between "pertaining to law" and "conforming to the law," jural (in sense 1) unambiguously carries the former meaning. Also, jural is ordinarily confined to contexts involving legal theory. "Witnesses are often required to describe in meticulous detail a happening that occurred months and years before the jural {delete jural, or read juridical] finding of facts."/ "One legacy of the Enlightenment is the belief that law is something separate from the state, a set of longstanding jural [read legal] rules or immutable principles resting on God or 'nature' that the state supposedly enforces."

Juristic = (1) of or relating to a jurist, or jurists generally; or (2) of or relating to law or the study of law. Sense (1), though not common, is surely the more useful meaning of this term—e.g.: "A few words now as to the authority attached to this juristic literature [the Digest]." James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 65 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co., 1881)./ "The goal of modern Romanistics is to obtain as complete a picture as possible of the evolution of Roman legal institutions and of the forms of juristic thinking revealed by them from the earliest stages discernible down to Justinian and beyond . . . ." Hans J. Wolff, Roman Law 224 (1951). In sense (2), the word is merely a fuzzy equivalent of legal: "The transition from unwritten to written code marks a stage in the history of almost every juristic [read legal] system." Stephen Pfeil, "Law," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 86, 87 (1953). See juristic person.

Juridical = (1) relating to judicial proceedings or to the law; or (2) of or relating to law. The form in -idical is standard. Sense (1) is perhaps justifiable—e.g.: "I cannot believe that the court ever meant, in listing the criteria that usually attend the creation of a remainder, to express an inflexible rule or an inexorable juridical formula by the use of which we would be able to derive an automatic answer in all cases." But in sense (2), the word is merely a puffed-up equivalent of legal—e.g.: "The line of departure will be set by that unfinished classic of juridical [read legal] righteousness, the statement that for every wrong there is a remedy."/ "The intent that must be manifested by the settlor is an intent to create the juridical [read legal] relationship known to the law as a trust." Juridical is sometimes mispronounced as if it were spelled juridicial, with a soft -c-.

Juratory, a rare term today, means "of or pertaining to an oath or oaths; expressed or contained in an oath" (OED). Juratorial, also rare, means "of or belonging to a jury" (OED).

jurat; jurant. Both mean "one who has taken an oath"; jurant is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that is little used. Jurat usually refers to a public official as, in Jersey, to a bailiff's assistant. But historically jurat could refer to a juror: "On his left was a group of twelve sworn jurats, selected not for their ignorance of or impartiality for the matters at hand, but precisely because they were more likely to know the truth in advance." (Eng.)

Jurat has an additional, and perhaps more common, sense: "a clause placed at the end of an affidavit stating the time, place, and officer before whom the affidavit was made." E.g., "It further appears that the jurat to the loyalty affidavit has been properly executed."

jurator = (1) one who swears; or (2) a juror. In sense (2), of course, the word is a NEEDLESS VARIANT See juror.

juratory; juratorial. See jural.

jure gentium. See jus gentium.

juridic; juridical. See jural.

JURIDICO-, a combining form common in Spanish and French legal writing, has come to be used with some frequency in English as well—e.g.: "They were the first to work out methods for the discovery of interpolations in the Digest and to realize that much juridico-historical information is found in sources outside of Justinian's Corpus Iuris." Hans J. Wolff, Roman Law 211 (1951)./ "[T]hese relations of production are defined as entailing juridico-political (even ideological) conditions as well as economic ones." Catherine Colliot-Thelene, "Afterword" to I. Rubin, A History of Economic Thought: Part 5 426–29 (D. Filtzer, trans., 1979) (as quoted in Duncan Kennedy, The Role of Law in Economic Thought, 34 Am. U.L. Rev. 939, 1000 n.64 (1985)).

The prefix owes its existence to the perceived ineptitude of any derivative from legal as the first part of a compound. Writers who use sociological and historico-legal often feel uncomfortable with the newfangled and ill-formed lego- (q.v.), so they resort instead to juridico-.

juridification, a NEOLOGISM dating from the mid-1980s, is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the German word Verrechtlichung, which denotes the process of transforming social relations into legal relations—and social conflicts into legal conflicts—primarily through legislation and judicial decisions. Though probably destined never to move beyond the realm of theoretical JARGON, the word usefully describes modern society's increasing reliance on courts to adjudicate questions that were formerly dealt with by other, less formal means (for example, within the family or neighborhood). E.g., "[A] case exists for lesser juridification of labour relations, and for greater reliance on other political and social factors that have generated the transformations the country is now undergoing . . . ." Waclaw Szubert, New Trends in Polish Labour Relations, 12 Comp. Lab. L.J. 62, 72 (1990)./ "Some observers note the increasing encroachment of law on daily life—the 'juridification' of the social sphere—with trepidation." Robert Anderson et al., The Impact of Information Technology on Judicial Administration, 66 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1761, 1799 (1993).

The verb juridify, seemingly a BACK-FORMATION, is somewhat less common—e.g.: "[J]ust as dismissal procedures in Great Britain were increasingly juridified, despite the apparent predominance of an entirely different tradition, so attempts to limit the debate on dismissals in the United States to reflections exclusively addressing collective agreements and their implications failed." Spiros Simitis, Denationalizing Labour Law: The Case Against Age Discrimination, 15 Comp. Lab. L.J. 321, 324 (1994). Cf. judicialize.

jurimetrics, n., = the social science that attempts to "measure" those aspects of justice that are of an empirical nature. The term originated in the early 1960s in Lee Loevinger's article entitled Jurimetrics: The Methodology of Legal Inquiry, 28 Law & Contemp. Probs. 5 (1963). E.g., "Those who search for a technological and practical aspect of the law include writers espousing jurimetrics." Forte, Natural Law and Natural Laws, 26 Univ. Bookman 75, 75 (1986)./ "Glendon Schubert, the leader of a school known as Behavioral Jurisprudence and called by some 'Jurimetrics,' built on the work of Underhill Moore. He sought to develop a systematic, behavioral method for predicting judgments." W.M. Reisman & A.M. Schreiber, Jurisprudence 458–59 (1987). Today a journal called Jurimetrics Journal publishes papers within the field.

Jurimetrician refers to a lawyer, esp. an academic lawyer, who tries to solve legal problems scientifically.

jurisconsult (= one learned in law, esp. in civil or international law; jurist; a master of jurisprudence [OED]) is a well-known word from Roman law but is little used today. Perhaps it merits wider service—e.g.: "The judges [of the International Court of Justice] . . . must be qualified in their own country for the highest judicial office or be juris-consults of recognized capacity in international law . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 279 (5th ed. 1955). Despite Brierly's spelling, the term should be solid, not hyphenated.

jurisdiction. A. Senses. As Alexander Hamilton observed, the word is "composed of jus and dicto, juris, dictio, or a speaking or pronouncing of the law." The Federalist No. 81, at 489 n.* (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961). It may mean (1) "the power of a nation to speak with binding effect concerning legal relations" <Iraq's jurisdiction>; (2) within a nation, the power of a smaller governmental unit (such as an American state) to create interests that, under the principles of the common law, will be recognized as valid in other states" <Arizona's jurisdiction>; (3) "the power of a court to decide a case or enter a decree" <the constitutional grant of jurisdiction>; (4) "the territory within which an authority may exercise its power" <the accused fled the jurisdiction>; or (5) "a political or judicial entity within such a territory" <other jurisdictions make a similar distinction>. Senses (1) and (2) are most commonly used within the field of conflict of laws; sense (3) is the ordinary legal sense; sense (4) is the most prevalent outside law, but lawyers use the word in this sense as well; sense (5) is common but rarely mentioned by those who catalogue the meanings of the word. See concurrent jurisdiction.

B. And venue. Venue refers to the possible or proper places for the trial of a lawsuit, as distinguished from the proper forums in which jurisdiction (the power to hear the case) might be established. Jurisdiction over a suit may exist in a particular district, though its venue there would be improper; conversely, the venue of a suit may be appropriate in a particular district, though it must be dismissed there for lack of jurisdiction. The most important difference between the two is that a party may consent to be sued in an improper venue, waiving any objection to venue. But a party cannot consent to subject-matter jurisdiction, which the parties cannot confer on a court.

C. Prepositions With. Jurisdiction takes of or over. "This court does not have jurisdiction over the appeal."/ "How such a magistrate can be said to have had no jurisdiction over the charge at all, it is hard to see." (Eng.)/ "This court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of the claims asserted in plaintiff's first amended complaint."

jurisdictional; jurisdictive. Jurisdictional, the ordinary word, means "of or relating to jurisdiction." E.g., "The time limit fixed by Rule 59(e) is jurisdictional: it may not be extended by waiver of the parties or by rule of the district court."

Jurisdictive, a much rarer term, means "having jurisdiction." E.g., "Turning to the central issue presented in this case, we must decide what court is jurisdictive of this suit." Owner-Operators Indep. Drivers Ass'n v. State, 541 A.2d 69, 71 (R.I. 1988). The DIFFERENTIATION between the two headwords has only recently emerged, jurisdictive being, in its other senses, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of jurisdictional.

jurisdictionless (= not having jurisdiction) is a late-20th-century NEOLOGISM. E.g., "This after the-event resuscitation will encourage plaintiffs te try, and District Judges to tolerate, impleaders in the certain knowledge that all will be purified by the Court of Appeals whose wand of dismissal disinfects the infected jurisdictionless Court." Burleson v. Coastal Recreation, Inc., 595 F.2d 332, 339 (5th Cir. 1978) (Brown, C.J., dissenting)./ "In addition, the court held that the Goldlawr case only provided for jurisdictionless transfer in cases under § 1406(a)." Reed v. Brown, 623 F. Supp. 342, 346 (D. Nev. 1985).

juris gentium. See jus gentium.

jurisprude, not recorded in the OED, is listed in W3 as a BACK-FORMATION from jurisprudence with the meaning "a person who makes ostentatious show of learning in jurisprudence and the philosophy of law or who regards legal doctrine with undue solemnity or veneration."

The word deserves wider currency, but not without recognition of its pejorative connotations. (For the neutral personal noun corresponding to jurisprudence, see jurisprudent.) Occasionally, jurisprude is misapplied as if it were a neutral noun: "Our point of view has been expressed aptly by one of your most influential jurisprudes [i.e., Karl Llewellyn—hence, read jurisprudents] . . . ." Glenn W. Ferguson, Vocabulary, Veil, and Vested Interest, 10 J. Legal Educ. 87, 88 (1957)./ "Yet all these scientific theories of law still leave contemporary jurisprudes [read jurisprudents] unsatisfied, and for good reason." Forte, Natural Law and Natural Laws, 26 Univ. Bookman 75, 75–76 (1986).

jurisprudence. A. Practical and Theoretical Senses. This uncertain term has evolved curiously. The OED assigns to it three senses: (1) "knowledge of or skill in law"; (2) "the science that treats of human laws (written or unwritten) in general"; and (3) "a system or body of law." Sense (1), denoting practical skill in the law—the original sense—shifted to create the meanings (2 & 3) that emphasize the body of knowledge with which skilled practitioners work.

Though derivatives of jurisprudence exist in a number of Western languages, this shift in meaning from the practical to the theoretical has apparently occurred only in English. Although both senses remain alive, the theoretical one, equivalent now roughly to "philosophy of the law," or "general theory of law," now predominates. The result, one writer has argued, is that "a word of distinguished pedigree and a well-established English meaning not essentially different from that which it bears in other languages has been made to colour like a chameleon and finally emerge as a self-contradictory chimera." A.H. Campbell, A Note on the Word Jurisprudence, 58 Law Q. Rev. 334, 339 (1942).

Well, not exactly. We might wish for less confusion, but it looks today as if the theoretical jurisprudence (senses 2 & 3) will oust its practical competitor (sense 1), which is labeled archaic by W3, and at this point there is little we can do but take note.

But Holland's lament—that many writers use jurisprudence as a highfalutin equivalent of law—remains a valid caution in many contexts: "The imposing quadrisyllable is constantly introduced into a phrase on grounds of euphony alone. Thus we have books upon 'Equity Jurisprudence' [as by Story and Pomeroy], which are nothing more nor less than treatises upon the law administered by Courts of Equity . . . . This sacrifice of sense to sound might more readily be pardoned, had it not misled serious and accurate thinkers." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 4–5 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937). In defense of Story and Pomeroy, though, Equity Law would certainly have been a confusing title.

B. For caselaw. In AmE jurisprudence has been extended further than elsewhere in the English-speaking world, from "body of law" to "caselaw; court decisions." E.g., "The seaman's cause of action against a shipowner for unseaworthiness of the vessel is largely a child of twentieth-century federal jurisprudence." Note, The Doctrine of Unseaworthiness in the Lower Federal Courts, 76 Harv. L. Rev. 819, 819 (1963)./ "This holding recognized and applied as part of the general maritime law a principle previously applied by either statute or jurisprudence in other contexts." The French term la jurisprudence has precisely this sense, as does the German die Jurisprudenz. Case-law and decisional law are less grandiose terms in English. See case(-)law & decision(al) law.

C. As a Count Noun. Jurisprudence is not properly a COUNT NOUN. E.g., "The courts for many years refused to acknowledge the existence of 'administrative law' as a jurisprudence [read a branch of jurisprudence]."

D. General, Particular, and Comparative Jurisprudence. The phrase general jurisprudence refers to legal theory applied to law and legal systems generally. Particular jurisprudence is the scholarly study of the legal system within a particular jurisdiction. Comparative jurisprudence, a term in growing use, is preferred by some scholars to comparative law.

jurisprudent; jurisprudential. Jurisprudent, though appearing to be an adjective, is a noun meaning "a jurist, or learned lawyer." E.g., "We have no difficulty with the theoretical concept, expressed in various ways by modern jurisprudents, that intentional, willful, or malicious harms of any kind are actionable unless justified." Trautwein v. Harbourt, 123 A.2d 30, 40 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1956)./ "When there is no rule to follow the court must make one, or, as some jurisprudents prefer, 'discover' one." Britt v. Sears, 277 N.E.2d 20, 21 (Ind. App. 1971). Cf. jurisprude.

Jurisprudential = of or relating to jurisprudence. E.g., "In a real and practical sense, when such an opportunity arises, the remedial considerations (not theoretical or jurisprudential concepts) totally dictate the course of action the plaintiff should pursue."

jurist. In BrE, this word is reserved for those having made outstanding contributions to legal thought and legal literature. In AmE, it is rather loosely applied to every judge of whatever level, and sometimes even to nonscholarly practitioners who are well respected.

Here the term is used correctly: "These topics would lead us into a very enlarged inquiry, incompatible with the object of this summary sketch; but they deserve the attention of all students of the law of prize, and it is to be hoped that some eminent jurist will, hereafter, examine them . . . ." Appendix on Prize Causes, 15 U.S. (2 Wheat.) 37 (1817)./ "I cannot doubt that Livingston will be held the great jurist of nineteenth-century America and one to rank with Bentham among English-speaking jurists." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 167 (1938)./ "The great German jurist Savigny described law as the product of the common consciousness of the people." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 15 (2d ed. 1953).

The most common error in AmE is to suppose that jurist is merely an equivalent of judge: "We find no constitutional question concerning the validity of Charles Milton's conviction and sentence of death about which reasonable jurists [read judges] could differ."

The word has also been appropriated by those who work in legal philosophy—but jurisprudent is the more accurate term in this sense. Sometimes, of course, the senses overlap: "The legal scholar (whom we may, perhaps, here term a 'jurist' or 'jurisprudent') is finally limited only by the communication value of his creations and the usefulness of the resulting concepts . . . ." Julius Stone, Legal System and Lawyers' Reasoning 205 (1968).

juristic person; artificial person. These phrases, which are esp. common in BrE, are ordinarily defined as "a corporate entity." Holland's definitions are more precise: (1) "a mass of property or a group of human beings that, in the eye of the law, is capable of rights and liabilities"; or (2) "such a mass of property or group of humans to which the law gives a status." See Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 97–98 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937).

Juristic person is the usual phrase. E.g., "Countries ordinarily accept the existence of juristic persons brought into being in their country of origin." (Eng.)/ "The phrase includes damages arising from those acts for which a private ship is held legally responsible as a juristic person under the customary legal terminology of the admiralty law." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 984 (2d ed. 1975).

Other names for juristic person are conventional person, fictitious person, and juridical person, all of which should be avoided as NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

jurocracy = government by the courts. See, e.g., D.L. Horowitz, The Jurocracy: Government Lawyers, Agency Programs, and Judicial Decisions (1977). The term is recorded in none of the major dictionaries, although certainly it is a useful addition to the language. See GOVERNMENTAL FORMS.

A less-well-formed equivalent is judiocracy, coined by a noted conservative writer: "As our judges have become the makers of law, our Congress has become a colony of actors. In an era of judicial restraint, they are going to have to take responsibility for their acts and answer to the electorate. Times change. We move from judiocracy [read jurocracy] back to old-fashioned democracy." R. Emmett Tyrrell, Bork, Now More Than Ever, Am. Spectator, Nov. 1987, at 10.

juror; juryman; jurywoman; jurator. Juror is the modern word. Juryman and jurywoman should be avoided on grounds of SEXISM, although they still occasionally appear. E.g., "A petty juror may not, and it is doubtful whether a grand juror may, give evidence as to what passed between the jurymen [read jurors] in the discharge of their duties." (Eng.) Jurator is an obsolete equivalent.

Juror ought to be distinguished from potential juror or veniremember—e.g.: "When the court was cleared of unchosen jurors [read veniremembers], the spectators waiting in the corridor were allowed inside." John Bryson, Evil Angels 346 (1985). See venireman.

jury is a COLLECTIVE NOUN in AmE; hence, in most contexts, it takes a singular verb. To emphasize the individual members of the jury, we have the word jurors. In AmE, jury is almost always treated as a singular noun—e.g.: "A jury of twelve was chosen." Thiel v. Southern Pac. Co., 328 U.S. 217, 219 (1946)./ "Judges do not decide questions of fact; the jury do [read does] not decide questions of law."/ "The jury have [read has] little use for a smart-aleck cross-examiner."

In BrE, however, where using plural verbs with collective nouns is common, jury usually takes a plural verb—e.g.: "As a result of Shaw's case, virtually any cooperative conduct is criminal if a jury consider it ex post facto to have been immoral." H.L.A. Hart, Law Liberty, and Morality 12 (1963; repr. 1969). But exceptions do occur in BrE—e.g.: "[I]t is only when this jury has determined the facts that the judge is empowered to impose sentence . . . ." 1 Winston Churchill, A History of the English Speaking Peoples 222 (1956; repr. 1983).

Jury is both adjective and noun. Here it acts as an adjective: "Dunn still has a sound rationale, Justice Rehnquist declares: the possibility that the inconsistency was a product of jury lenity." The legal writer should be aware that, as a general English adjective, jury has, in addition to the ordinary legal meaning "of or relating to a jury," the maritime meaning "makeshift" .

jurybox; jury-stand. Jurybox is the standard term in AmE and BrE alike, though it is often spelled as two words (jury box) on both sides of the Atlantic. Jury-stand is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

jury-fixing. See jury-packing.

jury, go to the. When a case goes to the jury, the jury begins its deliberations. E.g., Wade Lambert & Paul M. Barrett, Haas Stock-Fraud Trial to Go to Jury, Wall St. J., 4 Dec. 1989, at B4./ "Cynthia Dowaliby was acquitted by the judge before the case went to the jury." Janita Poe & Terry Wilson, Dowaliby Case Status Unaltered by Reports, Chicago Tribune, 6 Jan. 1993, at 3.

juryless (= without a jury) is one of Jeremy Bentham's modest successes as a word-coiner. In the early 19th century, he wrote of "a wicked and jury-less Court of Conscience act." Jeremy Bentham, Scottish Reform Considered 29 (1808). The word has occurred in many modern contexts—e.g.: "[T]he Board differs from a trial judge (in a juryless case) who hears and sees the witnesses . . . ." NLRB v. Universal Camera Corp., 190 F.2d 429, 432 (2d Cir. 1951) (Frank, J., concurring)./ "The strategy of the English government was to remove litigation to the juryless forum of the vice-admiralty courts . . . ." Grant Gilmore, The Ages of American Law 9 (1977).

jury lottery. Those who are not fond of the jury system use this phrase to describe the unpredictability of juries, esp. those that award high amounts of punitive damages. E.g., "But awards far larger than necessary to achieve deterrence are naked and economically counterproductive transfers of wealth through a capricious jury lottery." Stuart Taylor, Jr., High Court Should Set Limits in Punitive Damages Sweepstakes, Manhattan Law., 25 April 1989, at 10./ "Last week's was a typically absurd case of law by jury lottery . . . ." L. Gordon Crovitz, A Legal Rule for the Justices: Never Forget the Consumer, Wall St. J., 13 March 1991, at A13.

jury of indictment. See grand jury (A).

jury-packing; jury-tampering; jury-fixing. Jury-packing = contriving to have the jury peopled with those who are predisposed toward one side or the other. Jury-tampering = engaging in any activity that might improperly influence one or more jurors. (Another term for jury-tampering is embracery, q.v.) Jury-fixing = corruptly procuring the cooperation of jurors who actually influence the outcome of a trial.

jury-stand. See jurybox.

jury-tampering. See jury-packing.

jury trial. Two words, no hyphen.

jury venire. See venire.

jury wheel = (traditionally) a contraption, usu. a circular box revolving on a crank, that aids officials in randomly choosing those who will be called in for jury duty. In several jurisdictions today, jury wheel has come to apply to the computer methods that have displaced the old-fashioned crank-up devices. E.g., "Richard J. Masotta, associate director of the Yale University Computer Center, which has a contract with the federal government to compile the master list and the so-called jury wheel, also had no answer to the mystery." William Cockerham, Federal Jury Picks Questioned, Hartford Courant, 29 July 1992, at A1.

jus (= law in the most abstract and general sense; a legal right, rule, or principle of law) forms the plural jura. E.g., "Such a lien secures the creditor neither jus in rem nor jus ad rem."/ "Rights to things, jura in rem, have for their subject some material thing, as land or goods, which the owner may use or dispose of in any manner he pleases within the limits prescribed by the terms of his right." The term is spelled also ius. See jus in re(m).

Inexplicably, one learned writer fell into error by pluralizing the word as if it were a masculine Latin noun rather than a neuter: "The question can be approached from another angle, that of the clarity of the rules about particular aspects of the law, the content of the iures [read iura], so to speak . . . ." E.Z. Tabuteau, Transfers of Property in Eleventh-Century Norman Law 225 (1988). For Latinists—and there are still a few in the law—so to speak is an abomination.

jus ad bellum. See jus in bello.

jus ad rem. See jus in re(m).

jus civile; jus gentium. Jus civile denoted the legal rules and principles applicable to citizens only—the common law of ancient Rome. Jus gentium denoted the legal rules and principles derived from customs of various peoples and nations or from fundamental ideas of right and wrong applicable to foreigners litigating in Rome and later supposed by some to be universal in the human mind. See jus gentium, civil law (A) & international law.

jus cogens = the peremptory norms of international law. E.g., "Such [peremptory] norms, often referred to as jus cogens (or 'compelling law'), enjoy the highest status in international law . . . ." Committee of U.S. Citizens Living in Nicaragua v. Reagan, 859 F.2d 929, 935 (D.C. Cir. 1988).

jus disponendi (= the right to dispose of property) is an unnecessary LATINISM that masks as a TERM OF ART. E.g., "He has the entire jus disponendi [read right to dispose of the property], which imports that he may give it absolutely, or may impose any restriction or fetters not repugnant to the nature of the estate that he gives."/ "Here, undoubtedly, the devisee is given an estate in fee simple by clear, unambiguous, and explicit words; this carries the jus disponendi [read right of disposition]."

jus gentium; juris gentium; jure gentium. The jus gentium, literally, is the law of nations. More specifically, it means either (1) "the body of law governing the status of foreigners in ancient Rome and their relations with foreign citizens (jus civile [q.v.], by contrast, applying to Roman citizens only); or (2) ever since the time of Grotius (1583–1645), the customary law of nations. See international law.

Juris gentium is the genitive form meaning "of the law of nations"—e.g.: "Tradition . . . was set down as an institution Juris Gentium, or rule of the Law common to all Nations." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 41 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). Jure gentium is the ablative form meaning "by the law of nations" among other things—e.g.: "[S]imilar instances may be found . . . in common law offences regarded as crimes jure gentium, such as piracy on the high seas." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 181 (7th ed. 1974).

jus in bello; jus ad bellum. The first means "the corpus of the laws and customs of war." The second means "the right of making war."

jus in re(m); jus ad rem. The distinction is a simple one, although of decreasing importance: "A jus in re is a right, or property in a thing, valid as against all mankind. A jus ad rem is a valid claim on one or more persons to do something, by force of which a jus in re will be acquired." The Young Mechanic, 30 F. Cas. 873, 876 (C.C.D. Me. 1855) (No. 18,180). The usual phrase in Anglo-American law is jus in rem (lit., "right against a thing"), not jus in re (lit., "right in or over a thing"). For the distinction between in rem and in personam, see in personam (B).

jus naturale. See natural law (A).

jus sanguinis – a legal rule whereby a child's citizenship is that of his parents. We have no other name for it.

just deserts (= a reward or punishment that is deserved) is occasionally misrendered just desserts, as here: "Nor can Horizon avoid its just desserts [read deserts] by its pleonastic harping on the fact that its conduct . . . has been impeccable since at least mid-June of 1983." NLRB v. Horizon Air Servs., Inc., 761 F.2d 22, 32 (1st Cir. 1985).

jus tertii (= the right of a third party) generally is not a useful enough LATINISM to justify its presence in legal prose. E.g., "Recovery in trover by a mere possessor against the defense of title in a third party (jus tertii) [omit parenthetical phrase] is apparently allowed in most states in which the question has been raised."/ "Respondents may be correct that petitioner does not possess standing jus tertii [read as a third party], but that is not the issue."/ "But in the third case, i.e., where the plaintiff was not in possession, the defendant may set up a jus tertii, i.e., [delete the italicized language immediately preceding] prove that some other person has a better title . . . ." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 230 (3d ed. 1955).

justice. See judge.

justice of the peace. See J.P. justiceship; justicedom; justicehood. The first is the usual term; the others are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

justiciability, in the federal law of the U.S., is a TERM OF ART employed to give expression to the limitation placed upon federal courts by the case-or-controversy doctrine. A matter that is a case or controversy is susceptible of a judicial determination—is justiciable. See case or controversy & justiciable.

justiciable; judicable. The former is preferred in the sense "susceptible of judicial decision; triable" <justiciable cases and controversies>. In the following quotation, however, the word is used nonsensically; Justice Thurgood Marshall, in quoting this sentence, appropriately sic'd it: "[T]here has not been enough time in which justiciably [sic] to decide the case." As quoted in Dobbert v. Wainwright, 468 U.S. 1231, 1242 (1984) (Marshall, J., dissenting). Judicable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, and justiceable is a fairly common misspelling.

justicial. The OED defines this term as "of or pertaining to justice or its administration"—a use last recorded in 1826. Some writers, such as Fred Rodell, use it as the adjective corresponding to the title justice, as in Supreme Court Justice: "A month after Grant took office, and while the first of the Legal Tender cases was still on its way up to the Court, Congress, perhaps foreseeing trouble, had increased the number of Justices to nine (at which figure, despite Franklin Roosevelt's bid to raise the Justicial ante, it has remained ever since)." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 158 (1955).

justiciar, n.; justiciary. The former is obsolete in all but historical senses relating to medieval England and Scotland. The latter survives in the names Clerk of Justiciary and High Court of Justiciary, both relating to the supreme criminal courts of Scotland, and as an adjective in related contexts, e.g., justiciary gowns, justiciary cases, and Lords Commissions of Justiciary.

justification. See excuse.

justificatory; justificative. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former. But justificatory itself is often part of a longer phrase that can be tightened: "The plaintiff should have marshaled justificatory reasons for [better: justified] allowance of the amount sought."

justify, like warrant, q.v., generally takes as its object an action or belief, not a person. E.g., "The instant cases furnish sufficient additional indications of the settlor's intent to justify our giving effect to the language of the instrument limiting an estate to the grantor's heirs."

In legal prose, however, this verb frequently takes personal objects. E.g., "M. told the officer nothing that would justify the officer in concluding that T. was about to escape."/ "The decision relied upon as justifying the sheriff in the levy of execution and sale of the property is James v. Western North Carolina Ry. Co."

This usage is old, and perhaps only today could be considered a LEGALISM: "If, therefore, the process could be commenced in rem, the authority of Bynkershoek would justify us . . . ." Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419, 425–26 (1793). Nevertheless, it strikes the modern ear as unidiomatic and illogical.

Justinian is a proper noun, the name of the Roman emperor (483–565 A.D.) who was perhaps the greatest legal codifier ever, responsible for promulgating the Corpus Juris Civilis.

For the adjective corresponding to his name, some books use Justinianean /jəs-tin-ee-an-ee-ən/, a clumsy word whose only advantage is that it is distinct from the name itself. Other books use Justinian as the adjective as well as the noun (see, e.g., the Hadley quotation under reception). The former spelling seems stilted; the latter is quite acceptable.

juvenile offender. This phrase, like juvenile delinquent, is a technical term deriving from 20th-century legislation. It generally refers to a minor who commits a criminal offense. Just why it offends some—in a juvenile way, one might say—is hard to fathom: "Among all legal expressions that lend themselves to weasely interpretations, there is one that deserves nomination for the Weasel Award. 'Juvenile (or Child) Offender' is a jewel of understatement created by welfare workers and a judiciary subject to political pressures." Mario Pei, Words in Sheep's Clothing 87 (1969). What would Mr. Pei have us call such offenders? Hooligans?

juxtaposition cannot be a verb; although one may position a thing, one may not juxtaposition two things. Juxtapose is the correct verb form.

kangaroo court (= a court, often illegitimately held, in which the principles of law and justice are disregarded and perverted) originated in the mid-19th century as American slang but is now an acceptable phrase, if responsibly applied, even in formal writing. W2 records three particular types of kangaroo courts: (1) "a mock court held by vagabonds or by prisoners in a jail"; (2) "an irregularly conducted minor court in a frontier or unsettled district"; and (3) "formerly, one of a number of courts in Ohio with county-wide jurisdiction, whose judge was paid by fines imposed by him upon conviction of accused persons."

K.B. = King's Bench.

K.C. = King's Counsel.

Keeper of the King's Conscience = (historically) the Lord Chancellor, who had the royal power of deciding equitable petitions to the King—a power that gave rise to the system of equity, q.v. E.g., "In his character of 'Keeper of the King's Conscience,' [the Chancellor] was held justified in thus exerting the undefined residuary authority which in early times was attributed to an English king." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 73 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937). See chancellor.

keeper of the peace is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the Latin phrase custos pacis, a phrase sometimes Englished as guardian of the peace. Our phrase to keep the peace derives from the agent-noun phrase.

key number. This phrase refers to the elaborate indexing system developed by West Publishing Co. for cataloguing the whole of American caselaw with brief (or not-so-brief) headnotes. The phrase is older than many lawyers suspect—e.g.: "The section number . . . affixed to the first catchword of the headnote paragraph is a 'key-number,' unlocking the door to all future and past decisions involving a similar principle." William M. Lile et al., Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 41 (3d ed. 1914)./ "The West Key Number system gives a crude sense of the numerical dominance of opinions on preliminary relief." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 110 (1991).

kidnapping. A. Spelling. The spellings in -pp- are, by convention, preferred. The inferior spelling kidnaping occasionally appears, however, as in People v. Norris, 706 P.2d 1141 (Cal. 1985) (en banc).

That spelling has its defenders, among them Rollin Perkins: "The form with a single 'p' is to be preferred because it is a general rule of spelling that the accent determines whether or not to double the letter when the suffix is to be added to a word ending in a single consonant preceded by a single vowel . . . . [T]he final consonant is not doubled if the word has more than one syllable and the accent is not on the last." Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 134 n.1 (1957) (citing the examples of develop, offer, and suffer).

Perkins's final statement, explaining the general rule, is sound. But it overlooks the exceptional nature of kidnapping. First, the word is formed on the model of the shorter verb: nap, napping. Second, up to the 19th century, kidnap was generally accented on the second syllable. Third, kidnapping is between five and ten times as common as kidnaping in printed sources. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

B. Sense. Kidnapping = the act or an instance of taking or carrying away a person without his or her consent, by force or fraud, and without lawful excuse. Glanville Williams addresses the question whether kidnapping refers, as its etymology suggests, to the napping of kids:

> Well, apparently not: not in the modern sense. It seems that when the term originated the "kids" who were napped were not the young of the human species but labourers (called "kids") who were recruited by force or guile for agricultural service in the American colonies. And the crime has always been as much concerned with the taking of adults as with the taking of children. Indeed, the > original kidnap is the taking of adults: infants were not of much use in the plantations.

> Glanville Williams, Can Babies Be Kidnapped? 1989 Crim. L. Rev. 473, 473.

Williams notes that the generally accepted definition of kidnap—given just above—is actually a definition of the term adult-kidnap. Id. With child-kidnap (popularly termed child-stealing or baby-snatching), the element of force or fraud is often missing, as when someone makes off with a baby-stroller. Id. See abduction.

kill . . . dead is a REDUNDANCY popularly promoted (alas) in television commercials touting insecticides that, it is said, will "kill bugs dead."

kind of is a poor substitute for somewhat, rather, somehow, and other adverbs. It properly functions as a noun, however, signifying category or class in phrases such as this kind of writ. See these kind of.

kindred, n., = relationship by consanguinity. E.g., "The policy of our laws is that heirs or next of kin who are in equal degree of kindred to the intestate, inherit per capita in equal shares, while those in a more remote degree, take per stirpes, or such portion as their immediate ancestor would inherit if living." See consanguinity & affinity.

King; Queen. In English legal decisions, if the monarch is a party, he or she is, in civil cases, sometimes called "The King" or "The Queen" in the style of the case. The abbreviated form R. (for Rex or Regina) is also commonly used, esp. in criminal cases. Even so, the case name R. v. Baker is pronounced "The Queen against Baker." See CASE REFERENCES & R.

king's conscience. See Keeper of the King's Conscience.

King's Court is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the phrase Curia Regis, q.v. Most historians refer to the Curia Regis, but others, such as Plucknett, use King's Court as well. See Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 142 (5th ed. 1956).

knock-for-knock agreement (= an arrangement between insurers that each will pay the claim of its insured without claiming against the other party's insurer) should be hyphenated thus. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

know all men by these presents (= take notice) is a FLOTSAM PHRASE—as sexist as it is inscrutable to most readers—that needlessly begins many legal documents. Following is a typical beginning of a bond: "Know all men by these presents, that we, X Corp., as principal, and Y Insurance Co., as surety, are held and firmly bound unto the Clerk of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Texas, in the sum of $100." The phrase originated as a LOAN TRANSLATION of the LATINISM noverint universi (= know all persons).

know-how = the information, practical knowledge, techniques, and skill required to achieve some practical end, particularly in industry or technology. Know-how is considered incorporeal property, in which rights may be bought and sold. E.g., "Gates seeks to recover the damages that it allegedly incurred as a result of defendant Yuasa's alleged breach of an agreement with Gates regarding the nondisclosure of trade-secret technical know-how." The phrase is best hyphenated.

knowledge; notice. As a general matter, knowledge requires awareness of a fact or condition, while notice requires merely a reason to know of a fact or condition. Knowledge is subsumed within notice because actual awareness is well above the threshold requirement of a reason to be aware. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 9 (1958). E.g., " 'Notice' and 'knowledge' are not synonyms; when one says of a person that he was 'on notice' of a fact, one may mean just that he should have known, not that he did know." Shacket v. Philko Aviation, Inc., 841 F.2d 166, 170 (7th Cir. 1988).

kudos (fr. Gk. kydos "glory") is a singular noun meaning "praise, glory." It is sometimes erroneously thought to be a plural. So kudo, a false singular—and therefore kudoes, a mistaken plural—have come to plague many texts. E.g., "I appreciate profoundly the kudo [read kudos—and read on] for loquacity bestowed upon me by my learned colleague of the majority . . . . I return it to him for placement wherever he is wont to place kudoes [read kudos]." Nelson v. Miller, 480 P.2d 467, 480 (Utah 1971) (Henriod, J., dissenting). Other writers mistakenly use a plural verb with kudos, as here: "Kudos are [read is] not awarded for these skills . . . ." Gertrude Block, Effective Legal Writing 1 (2d ed. 1983). Cf. HYPERCORRECTION (A) labor, v.t. See belabor.

Labo(u)r Party. In Great Britain, the spelling is Labour Party; in Australia, the spelling is Labor Party. How should Americans spell the name of the British party? Most newspapers Americanize the spelling, making it Labor, but the better practice is to spell this proper name, like any other, just as it is spelled in BrE.

laches. A. Sense. Laches (LAW FRENCH meaning "remissness, slackness") = unreasonable delay or negligence in pursuing a right or claim, esp. an equitable one, that may disentitle a claimant to relief. The doctrine exemplifies the reserved power of equity to withhold relief otherwise regularly granted when the relief would be unfair or unjust.

The OED records a transferred sense—"culpable negligence in general"—which modern lawyers would find difficult to accept. E.g., "[I]n his heart he felt rather ashamed that his conduct had shown laches which others who did not get benefices were free from." George Eliot, Middlemarch 375 (1873; repr. 1956).

B. Pronunciation. The word is pronounced /lach-əz/ (AmE) or /lay-chəz/ (BrE).

C. Singular Noun. Though plural in appearance, laches is a singular noun that is sometimes incorrectly coupled with a plural verb. E.g., "Laches are [read is] pleaded as a defense, but the claim here is essentially at law, not in equity."

D. And limitation. The guiding principle in distinguishing these two is that "laches is not, like limitation, a mere matter of time; but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced . . . ." Galliher v. Cadwell, 145 U.S. 368, 373 (1892). An old legal saw states that laches is a penalty for sleeping on one's rights. See limitation.

E. Run Idiom Inappropriate. Although we say, idiomatically, that the statute of limitations has run, it is not proper to use that verb with laches. Run, in this context, means "(of a period of time) to come to an end, be complete, expire." Because laches does not refer to any specific period of time but is determined after the fact by courts, it cannot be said to have run, but merely to apply in a given case. E.g., "Because the indemnity action had not yet vested, laches on the action had not begun to run [read the period to which laches might later apply had not begun]."

lacuna is a FORMAL WORD for gap: "If there is such a lacuna in the legislative scheme, the proper remedy is not for the courts to distort the plain language of section 1512, but for Congress to enact legislation to close the gap." (Note the INELEGANT VARIATION, which is remedied by changing lacuna to gap.) The plural lacunae is preferable to lacunas. See PLURALS (A)

laden. A. As a Past Participle Equivalent to *loaded. To the extent that laden lives, it lives primarily as a participial adjective  and not as a past participle. To use laden as a part of the verb phrase is to be guilty of ARCHAISM, although it is still used in shipping contexts. E.g., "The holder of the bill of lading had actual notice at the time of receiving the bill of lading that the goods had not in fact been laden on board." (Eng.) See lade.

B. For ridden. Ridden is the more general term, meaning "infested with" or "full of." Laden has not shed its strong connotation of "loaded down." Hence a place might be laden with things if they had been stacked there; or, more plausibly, a truck or barge might be laden with goods. But figuratively, laden fails as an effective adjective if the original suggestion of loading is ignored. E.g., "A seaman who removed his life jacket before diving into the eddy-laden [read eddy-ridden] lading, bill of. Lading is the Old English equivalent of loading. Dating from the 16th century, bill of lading = a document acknowledging the shipment of a consignor's goods for carriage by sea (CDL). See laden (A).

lady lawyer is an objectionable phrase to a great many lawyers (many but not all of them women). (See SEXISM.) The phrase sometimes merely supplements the already evident bias that some of its users harbor—e.g.: "At the trial, the relator was assigned two attorneys, Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Gellman. A lady lawyer, Katherine Bitses, . . . later became imbued with the cause of Kling after the trial." U.S. ex rel. Kling v. La Vallee, 188 F. Supp. 470, 472 (N.D.N.Y. 1960).

laesae majestatis; laesae majestas. See lese majesty.

lagan. See flotsam.

laic; lay. Whereas laic = nonclerical, nonecclesiastical, lay, which shares this sense, is broader, and encompasses the sense "nonprofessional, not expert, esp. with reference to law and medicine" (OED). Lawyers referred to jurors as lay ("unlearned, illiterate") in the LAW FRENCH of the Middle Ages. See laity & layman.

lain. See lie & lay.

laissez-faire; laisser-faire. The former spelling has long been standard. Some British publications, however, continue to use the outmoded spelling—e.g.: "Should Hongkong's laisser-faire [read laissez-faire] government do an about-face to build Hongkong Inc?" Farewell to Adam Smith, Economist, 30 Sept.–6 Oct. 1989, at 71.

laity is the noun corresponding to the adjective lay. But while lay is used about as commonly in legal as in church matters, laity appears far more commonly in religious than in legal contexts. Still, the OED includes the sense "unprofessional people, as opposed to those who follow some learned profession." E.g., "Fortunately for the bar and for the public, there are no rules of morality for the lawyers which do not apply with equal force to the laity, and it is well that there should not be." See laic & layman.

lament, v.t., should not be made intransitive by the addition of a preposition. E.g., "In this space we have often lamented over [omit over] the recent rise of ultraconservatism."

land. When thinking of land, most speakers of English visualize the earth's surface. But in law, the word includes everything above and below the surface—even gases, liquids, and buildings. As a legal concept, then, land is an area of three-dimensional space, an inverted pyramid with its tip at the center of the earth and extending outward through the surface of the earth—where natural or imaginary points locate it by reference—and continuing upward to the sky. Land is both immovable and indestructible.

land charge; land law; land tax. Two words in each phrase.

landlocked (= shut in or enclosed by land; almost entirely surrounded by land) is usually used in literal senses in the law. But it has its figurative uses as well: "The Chancellor is no longer fixed to the woolsack: he may stride the quarter-deck of maritime jurisprudence and, in the role of admiralty judge, dispense as would his landlocked brother, that which equity and good conscience impel."

landlord = (1) at common law, the lord who, under the feudal system, retained the fee of the land; or (2) one who owns or holds real property and lets it out to others.

Some writers have begun to use landlord as a verb—e.g.: "Learning landlording from a book can be difficult . . . ." Edwards, Renting Tips for Landlords, Chicago Tribune, 15 Feb. 1991, at C17./ Leigh Robinson, Landlording (5th ed. 1988). The usage seems unlikely to spread, but see NOUNS AS VERBS.

landman. A. Generally. In the law of oil and gas, landman refers to a person who, usu. on behalf of an oil company, contracts with landowners for the mineral rights to their land. In this field (as in the oil fields), women as well as men refer to themselves as landmen. (A less common variant is leaseman.) Many female landmen say they are reluctant to adopt a nonsexist alternative that would apply only to them, because their male counterparts are unlikely to abandon the term. Still, various nonsexist equivalents—such as exploration manager, land manager, and land agent—have achieved limited currency.

A less likely candidate for eventual success is landwoman: "Betsy Spomer, a landwoman [read land manager or land agent] for Gulf in Casper, said the company plans to assign a full-time person to resolve differences . . . ." Gulf Temporarily Shelves Little Knife Unit Plan, Oil & Gas J., 9 Jan. 1984, at 47, 47. See SEXISM (B).

B. Meaning "terre-tenant." Landman was formerly used as a LOAN TRANSLATION equivalent to terre-tenant, q.v. Because this usage is likely to confuse readers, it is best avoided. If an English phrase is needed, land-tenant is a better substitute.

C. And landsman. Unlike landman, the word landsman usu. refers to someone who lives and works on land. But it may also refer to an inexperienced sailor—e.g.: "The seaman, while on his vessel, is subject to the rigorous discipline of the sea and has little opportunity to appeal to the protection from abuse of power which the law makes readily available to the landsman." Socony–Vacuum Oil Co. v. Smith, 305 U.S. 424, 430 (1939)./ "This limitation serves much the same purpose for maritime ventures that the corporate fiction serves for the landsman's enterprises." Black Diamond S.S. v. Robert Stewart & Sons, 336 U.S. 386, 399 (1949) (Jackson, J., dissenting). See SEXISM (B).

landmark of the law is, as the following quotation suggests, a CLICHÉ to be sparingly bestowed on cases. E.g., "The critical decision is that of Lord Mansfield in Moses v. MacFerlan that truly merits the cliché, a landmark of the law." See WORD-PATRONAGE.

lands, tenements, and hereditaments. This triplet is the traditional means of referring to real property. Though now frequently used as mere legalistic deadwood, the phrase may be parsed without REDUNDANCY.

Land, of course, denotes the terrestrial earth and what is above and below it, including water. See land.

Tenement = anything that might be the subject of common-law tenure. "The word . . . is of a more extensive signification than land, which it includes, in addition to most . . . incorporeal things real." 1 Herbert T. Tiffany, The Law of Real Property § 10, at 13 (3d ed. rev. Basil Jones 1939).

Hereditament traditionally includes whatever, upon the owner's death, passes by intestacy. "The term is more extensive in its signification than the word tenement, which it generally, though not always, includes, and it may, in England at least, include things of a personal character." Id. at 13–14. See hereditament(s) & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

land scrip is an Americanism meaning "a negotiable instrument entitling the holder, usu. an individual or company engaged in public service, to possess specified areas of public land." E.g., "[T]he United States issued land scrip to Mann for location on 'unoccupied and unappropriated public lands' and the holder made location on tidelands and received the register's certificate therefor." Hynes v. Grimes Packing Co., 337 U.S. 86, 115 (1949)./ " 'Color of title' [includes] a consecutive chain of transfers to the person in possession that . . . is based on a certificate of headright, land warrant, or land scrip." Tex. Civ. Pract. & Rem. Code § 16.021 (West 1990).

language in the sense "wording (of a document)" is peculiar to the law. E.g., "Defendant points out that both sections 2223 and 2224 employ the language 'one who gains a thing,' and argues that the sense of the word 'gain' as thus used is to acquire a tangible benefit or an unconscionable thing." For an example illustrating the improper pluralizing of this MASS NOUN, see PLURALS (B).

lappage = (1) an overlapping of two claims to land; or (2) the portion of land over which rival claimants have overlapping claims. In AmE, almost every reported example originates in North Carolina—e.g.: "The rules of lappage [sense (1)] direct that when the title deeds of two rival claimants to land lap upon each other, and neither claimant is in actual possession of any of the land covered by the deeds, the claimant with the better title is deemed in possession of the lappage [sense (2)]." Willis v. Mann, 386 S.E.2d 68, 72 (N.C. Ct. App. 1989).

lapse, v.i., = (1) (of an estate or right) to pass away, revert (to someone) because conditions have not been fulfilled or because a person entitled to possession has failed in some duty; or (2) (of a devise or grant) to become void. Sense (2) is now much more usual—e.g.: "Suppose a man makes a will leaving all his property to his friend, A. A dies before the testator does. The gift to A is said to lapse. It becomes void, and the property goes to the testator's heirs." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 247 (1946; repr. 1950). Cf. ademption.

lapse statute; antilapse statute; nonlapse statute. All three phrases denote (in AmE) the same type of statute, the meaning of which is illuminated in the quotations: "Nearly all states have enacted lapse statutes designed to provide a substitute beneficiary for the deceased legatee in certain situations."/ "A majority of the states have held that a nonlapse statute does not apply to a member of a class who was dead at the time of the execution of the will."/ "If an antilapse statute applies to save gifts of persons living when the will is executed but not the gifts of persons who die before the will is executed, republication of the will by codicil after the death of a legatee should not prevent an application of the statute to save the gift."

Today lapse statute is the most common phrase, even though it is the least logical (since the effect of the statute is to prevent the lapse of testamentary gifts). The most lucid phrase is antilapse statute. There are judicial opinions in which both nonlapse and antilapse appear in reference to the selfsame statute; yet the terms should not be varied in a single writing. See INELEGANT VARIATION.

lapsus linguae; lapsus calami. These LATINISMS are fancy ways of referring to slips of the tongue (linguae) or of the pen (calami). The phrase lapsus linguae is the more common one. For example, in a case in which the trial court incorrectly referred to a witness as "Mrs. Argentine," the appellate court wrote: "This obvious lapsus linguae was plainly meant to refer to Mrs. Larsen . . . ." U.S. v. Argentine, 814 F.2d 783, 787 n.5 (1st Cir. 1987).

As for lapsus calami (= a slip of the pen), a good example—though it may merely be a misprint—occurs in a judicial opinion that looks as if it represents a backslide in First Amendment rights. A judge writes: "The First Amendment is not a fetish. Reversed it must be, but this reverence must be tempered with a realistic approach to such problems as that now at bar." Without reverence to prompt the reader to understand that the judge means Revered and not Reversed, we might be quite confused about his purpose.

larcenable (= subject to larceny) is listed in neither the OED nor most other dictionaries, but legal writers occasionally find it useful—e.g.: "The common law judges strained the law so as to discover reasons which would place the stealing of certain types of article outside the scope of larceny, e.g. some domestic animals, growing crops, were held not larcenable at common law." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 243–44 (1968; 2d ed. 1979)./ "For example, the realty and things which 'savour of the realty' were not larcenable at common law." Eli Lederman, Criminal Liability for Breach of Confidential Commercial Information, 38 Emory L.J. 921, 941 n.81 (1989).

larcenist; larcener. Larcenist (= one who commits larceny) is the ordinary term; larcener is a primarily BrE variant.

larcenous = of, relating to, or tainted with larceny; thievish. E.g., "The Court . . . concluded that 'stolen' does not refer exclusively to larcenously taken automobiles . . . ." U.S. v. McClain, 545 F.2d 988, 994–95 (5th Cir. 1977)./ "[I]n C. Doris H. Pepper . . . , a lawyer was allowed to deduct business expense amounts to recompense clients to whom he had recommended a promoter who turned out to be larcenous." Erwin Griswold, Cases and Materials on Federal Taxation 347 (6th ed. 1966).

larceny. A. Sense. Larceny = the unlawful taking and carrying away of someone else's goods with the intent to appropriate them. With the Theft Act 1968, English law replaced larceny with the statutory crime of theft. Many American states retain the old scheme of grand larceny and petty larceny, which was first set forth in the Statute of Westminster I, c. 15 (1275). The LAW FRENCH term was larcyn, from the LAW LATIN latrocinium (fr. latro "robber"). See asportation.

Classically, larceny has differed from embezzlement, in that the latter involves an employee or bailee already in lawful possession. But modern statutes in many jurisdictions have widened the sense of larceny to include common-law embezzlement. See embezzle.

B. Grand and petty larceny; simple and aggravated larceny. Two dichotomies exist in the legal analysis of larceny—at least, in the English-speaking jurisdictions that retain larceny as a crime. Petty larceny (or petit larceny) was at common law, and is today in many U.S. states, contrasted with grand larceny, the difference lying in the value of the goods stolen. Simple larceny is distinguished from aggravated larceny, the difference lying in the presence or absence of aggravating circumstances.

C. Spelling of petty (petit) larceny. Petit larceny is the older spelling of the term (which is still properly pronounced petty). The anglicized petty larceny is slightly more common, having been adopted for use in the Model Penal Code § 223.1(2)(b). The advantage of petty larceny is that the correct pronunciation is immediately apparent; the disadvantage is that it suggests a triviality. Merely for the sake of consistency, it would be convenient for writers to follow the Model Penal Code by writing petty instead of petit. See petit larceny.

D. Larceny by trick (and device). The elongation of this phrase—denoting a larceny in which the taker intended to keep the goods even as the rightful possessor, being misled, consensually handed them over—is optional. That being so, the shorter phrase, larceny by trick, is recommended.

E. Larceny from the person. This statutory offense is slightly different from robbery because it need not involve violence or intimidation—the victim usu. being taken unawares. For example, if a thief cuts a necklace and removes it from the owner's neck without her being aware, the thief commits larceny from the person. A thief who uses threats or force, on the other hand, commits robbery. For more on these distinctions, see burglary (A).

largess(e). The Englished spelling largess is preferred, but the Frenchified pronunciation /lahr-zhes/ is standard.

Las (Siete) Partidas (lit., "the seven parts") refers to the Spanish code compiled in 1250 by Alphonso X and based on the civil law, Spanish customary law, and canon law. First enacted in 1348, it still influences the law of Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. It is referred to either as Las Partidas or Las Siete Partidas, the latter being slightly more common.

last analysis, in the. See in the final analysis.

last but not least is a CLICHÉ to be avoided.

last rites is occasionally misrendered last rights—e.g.: "[I]ncident to the administration of the last rights [read last rites] to deceased by a priest who asked deceased if he was married the reply was 'Yes' . . . ." Flores v. Nicholson Terminal & Dock Co., 299 N.W. 786, 786–87 (Mich. 1941). Actually, that entire sentence is maladroit and mystifying. The awkwardness might be improved as follows, but the mystery is heightened: "While administering last rites, the priest asked the deceased whether he was married. The reply was 'yes.'" last will and testament is a phrase with ancient resonances. Lord Coke, for example, referred to an ultima voluntas in scriptis (= last will in writing). Much ink has been spilled by at least one well-known writer in opposition to this phrase. See David Mellinkoff, The Language of the Law 77–79, 331–33 (1963). The argument against it is that coupling testament with will is redundant, and that last is usually inaccurate. "When a testator has been made will-conscious, and likes the habit, last will adds spice to a will contest. For example [an actual case]: will No. 1 revoked by will No. 2; a later 'codicil to my last will' held to refer to No. 1, reviving it and revoking No. 2. The testator was talking about his first, not his second, when he said his last will" (id. at 333).

A curious case, to be sure, and one that might lead some to conclude that last will and testament "is redundant, confusing, and usually inaccurate" (id.). Yet nonlawyers know the phrase well and understand it as a ceremonious equivalent of will. The DOUBLET will and testament is no more disturbing than many others that exist undisturbed in our language, and that even enrich it. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS, testament & will.

The only recommendation to be made here is that the phrase be confined to use as a title to the document it refers to, and that general references to the document be couched in the single word will. If our goal is to clean up legal writing, there are worthier objects of our reforms than last will and testament.

latecoming. Although latecomer, the agent noun, dates from the late 19th century and is recorded in most English dictionaries, the adjective latecoming is unrecorded in most modern dictionaries. The word—a useful one, surely—appears in several reported American opinions. E.g., "But the rules vest the trial court, not this court, with the discretionary authority to pass upon latecoming motions to amend the pleadings." Janikowski v. Bendix Corp., 823 F.2d 945, 954 (6th Cir. 1987) (Ryan, J., dissenting in part)./ "Plaintiffs fear price was the problem here and believe they were simply outbid by a latecoming buyer." Trenta v. Gay, 468 A.2d 737, 739 (N.J. Super. Ch. Div. 1983).

later. A. Without Temporal Context. Later should not be used unless a proper temporal context has first been established. E.g., "As Charles Evans Hughes, later a chief justice of the Supreme Court, [read who was to become a chief justice,] stated in 1907, ..." Cf. then (A).

B. Later on. This collocation is venially verbose for later. E.g., "That deed and the description therein contained will be considered more particularly later on [read later] in this opinion."

later of [date] or [date]; later of [date] and [date]. Drafters frequently debate whether the proper conjunction in this phrase is or or and. The better idiomatic choice is or—nine of every ten lawyers believing it is the proper choice.

True, and has logic on its side. If we paraphrase by saying the later of two dates, it becomes clear that the sense must be plural (conjunctive and), not singular (disjunctive or). But the wording with and sounds as pedantic—and as wrong—as a number of people was there. See SYNESIS.

For a brief treatment of this issue, see Richard H. Miller, A Drafting Dilemma, 4 Scribes J. Legal Writing 127 (1993).

LATINATE PLURALS. See PLURALS (A).

LATINISMS. Can there be any doubt that modern judges and scholars have grown impatient with Anglo-American lawyers' fondness for Latin terminology?

- "On the whole the lesson of this part of our legal history should be that it is dangerous to play with foreign terms unless we know very well what we are about." F.W. Maitland, The Forms of Action at Common Law 63 (1909; A.H. Chaytor & W.J. Whittaker eds. 1971).
- "The marvelous capacity of a Latin phrase to serve as a substitute for reasoning, and the confusion of thought inevitably accompanying the use of inaccurate terminology, are nowhere better illustrated than in the decisions dealing with the admissibility of evidence as res gestae." Edmund M. Morgan, A Suggested Classification of Utterances Admissible as Res Gestae, 31 Yale L.J. 229, 229 (1922).
- "I cannot help deprecating the use of Latin . . . phrases in this way. They only distract the mind from the true problem which is to apply the principles of English law to the realities of the case." Smith, Hogg & Co. v. Black Sea and Baltic Gen. Ins. Co., [1940] A.C. 997, 1003 (per Lord Wright).
- "I think the cases are comparatively few in which much light is obtained by a liberal use of Latin phrases. . . . Nobody can derive any assistance from the phrase novus actus interveniens until it is translated into English . . . ." Ingram v. United Auto. Servs., Ltd., [1943] 2 All E.R. 71, 73 (per du Parcq, L.J.).
- "Pruitt's letter to the Clerk of the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals, his correspondence with his attorney, and his petition in the district court spoke of his 'being met with a plea of res judicata' in the state court. It is difficult to follow his line of reasoning or indeed to make any sense out of his prolix and confused arguments. One thing, however, is clear—he, not unlike some lawyers, thought he had discovered magic in a Latin phrase." Pruitt v. Peyton, 338 F.2d 859, 861 (4th Cir. 1964).

A century ago, scholars recognized that Latin MAXIMS had rapidly, for the most part, become obsolete: "The Latin maxims have largely disappeared from arguments and opinions. In their original phraseology they convey no idea that cannot be well expressed in modern English." William C. Anderson, Law Dictionaries, 28 Am. L. Rev. 531, 532 (1894). Still, several Latinisms have proved themselves useful—often in shortened forms, that is, as phrases and not so much as maxims—such as de minimis, contra proferentem, ejusdem generis, and noscitur a sociis.

Despite the overwhelming obsolescence of Latin—more overwhelming in AmE than in BrE—nonlawyers still generally misunderstand the nature of legal language. The linguist Mario Pei, for example, estimated that "[h]alf of our specifically legal terminology is Latin." Mario Pei, Words in Sheep's Clothing 83 (1969). That statement, of course, is nonsense. Probably more than 90 percent of our legal terminology is of Latin origin—English words and phrases such as contract, declaratory judgment, issue preclusion, realty, subordinated debt—but these phrases are English, not Latin.

Nevertheless, legal readers often encounter Latin in modern texts—some of it necessary and some of it not. In legal writing we must distinguish between TERMS OF ART, for which there are no ordinary English equivalents, and those terms that are merely vestigial Latinisms with simple English substitutes. The former category comprises useful Latinisms such as prima facie, ex parte, de minimis, habeas corpus, alibi, and quorum. Some words that do have ordinary English equivalents have nevertheless become such standard terms that they are unobjectionable, e.g., bona fide (= good faith), amicus curiae (= friend of the court), and versus (= against). These words have become a part of the English language, or at least necessary parts of the language of the law, and one would be misdirected to rail against them.

The rightful objects of our condemnation are the bombastic, vestigial Latinisms that serve no purpose but to give the writer a false sense of erudition. These terms convey no special legal meanings, no delicate nuances apprehended only by lawyers. They are pompous, turgid deadwood. Just as a mathematician would seem ludicrous to write 386/1544 rather than 1/4 merely in an attempt to sound more scholarly, so the lawyer who writes sub suo periculo instead of at his own risk, strikes the reader as a laughable, if vexatious, figure.

Other phrases in this category are illustrated in the following sentences, in which the simple English equivalents are bracketed:

- "But a legacy to one, to be paid when he attains the age of twenty one years, is a vested legacy; an interest which commences in praesenti [read in the present], although it be solvendum in futuro [read paid in the future]: and, if the legatee dies before that age, his representatives shall receive it out of the testator's personal estate . . . ." 2 William Blackstone, Commentaries 513 (1766).
- "There is a contradictio in adjecto [read contradiction in terms] when we speak of the general damages appropriate to an indeterminate transaction." Kerr S.S. v. Radio Corp. of Am., 157 N.E. 140, 142 (N.Y. 1927) (per Cardozo, C.J.).
- "Ancillary administration in this state, without assets presently here for administration, would be mere brutum fulmen [read mere empty noise (lit.), or ineffective]." In re Rogers' Will, 232 N.Y.S. 609, 613 (App. Div. 1929).
- "A father is directly responsible for the existence of his offspring and it would accordingly be contra bonos mores [read immoral] to allow a father to bring children into the world and avoid responsibility for them by himself departing the world." Lloyd v. Menzies, 1956 (2) S.A.L.R. 97, 102 (quoting curator ad litem's report).
- "The author did not look upon section 44 as a section inserted ex abundanti cautela [read out of abundant caution] but as a very important protection." (Eng.)

Reasonableness dictates that legal writers simplify where possible, allowing the more complicated locutions to stand only if they are legally or linguistically irreducible. Otherwise, our language is easily beclouded (the Latinist would say obnubilated) and becomes, before we know it, a fog of words in which our readers or listeners become hopelessly lost. This is no less true in STATUTE DRAFTING than in expository writing: "In the selection of words, Latin words and, where possible without a sacrifice of accuracy, technical phraseology should be avoided; the word best adapted to express a thought in ordinary composition will generally be found to be the best that can be used." Henry Thring, Practical Legislation 81 (1902).

Words are the primary tools of lawyers. Can we afford, then, to be undiscriminating in our use of those tools? Can we engage in unchecked ABSTRACTITIS with impunity? As Justice Holmes, who was doubtless aware of his oversimplification, wrote toward the end of the 19th century, "We must think things not words, or at least we must constantly translate our words into the facts for which they stand, if we are to keep to the real and the true." Oliver W. Holmes, Law in Science and Science in Law, 12 Harv. L. Rev. 443, 460 (1899). Such internal translation is most easily achieved if we use ordinary language when possible. Lawyers must learn the language of the law but wield it carefully, never losing the idiomatic flavor of the vernacular.

Particular Latinisms, their utility or their turgidity, are discussed throughout this work under particular entries. For examples of needless Latinity, see capacitas rationalis* & res gestae. See also LAW LATIN, MINGLE-MANGLE & PLAIN LANGUAGE. Cf. GALLICISMS. On questions of pronouncing Latin terms, see PRONUNCIATION (C).

latrine lawyer. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A). latter. See former.

latterly is an ARCHAISM for later or lately. E.g., "But there is a notion that latterly [read lately] has been insisted on a good deal, that a combination of persons to do what any one of them might lawfully do by himself will make the otherwise lawful conduct unlawful."

laudatory; laudative; laudable. The adjectives laudatory and laudative both mean "expressing praise." But laudative is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, laudatory being the common word. Laudable, in contrast, means "deserving praise." The distinction is the same as that between praiseworthy (= laudable) and the active praiseful (= laudatory).

The misuse of laudatory for laudable is lamentably common: "That the decision may achieve a laudatory [read laudable] result is not a valid consideration."/ "The more stringent provisions of the new act, while laudatory [read laudable] in purpose, cannot be used to enhance the punishment of individuals who committed crimes in possible reliance on the previous standards."/ "A subsequently adopted program, no matter how laudatory [read laudable], is wholly irrelevant to the issue of racial discrimination at an earlier date."

laughing heir, a LOAN TRANSLATION of the German phrase der lachende Erbe, refers to an heir who, being so remotely linked to a deceased relative as to suffer no sense of bereavement, receives a windfall from the estate. E.g., "A court-appointed guardian, Jonathan G. Blattmacher, a partner with Milbank, Tweed, Hadley & McCloy, said recently that rummaging through an old shoe box containing dog-eared letters led to a distant relative living in a trailer park in Terre Haute, Ind. The relative eventually became a 'laughing heir,' inheriting several hundred thousand dollars." Jay G. Baris, Personal Finance, N.Y. Times, 15 Feb. 1987, at C11./ "To decree . . . defeasance results in unnecessary loss to the beneficiaries of the inter vivos transfer and a possible gain for the 'laughing heirs.'" Macdonald, Fraud on the Widow's Share 130–31 (as quoted in In re Estate of Curtis, 663 S.W.2d 420, 425 (Mo. Ct. App. 1983)).

laundry list, in use only since 1958, is the slang phrase American lawyers commonly use to denote a statutory enumeration of items.

law, n. A. General Senses. This word, by Jerome Frank's sobering assessment, "drips with ambiguity. But it has a traditionally emotive quality which makes it highly serviceable to the legal magicians. There are dozens of discrepant definitions of that word." Jerome Frank, Courts on Trial 66 (1950). Those who have tried to define law agree only that no definition is fully satisfactory. Still, it is worthwhile to try to sort out the senses.

Roscoe Pound catalogued four meanings for the word law. They are:

1. the legal order, that is, the regime that orders human activities and relations through systematic application of the force of politically organized society, or through social pressure, backed by force, in such a society <respect for law>;
2. the aggregate of legislation and accepted legal precepts; the body of authoritative grounds of judicial and administrative action established in an organized society <justice according to law> <systems of law>;
3. the judicial and administrative process, i.e., the process of determining controversies, whether as it actually takes place, or as the public, the jurists, and the practitioners in the courts hold it ought to take place <law is whatever is officially done>;
4. some combination of the previous three definitions <law and morals>.

See Roscoe Pound, What Constitutes a Good Legal Education, 7 Am. L. Sch. Rev. 887, 891 (1933).

The word has at least three more senses for lawyers, though:

5. a statute <There should be a law!>;
6. the common law (q.v.) <law but not equity>;
7. the legal profession <one may live greatly in the law as elsewhere>.

The word also has senses in other realms of human activity—senses that lawyers sometimes decry:

8. in science and philosophy, a general formula expressing a de facto uniformity in nature as we find it <law of gravitation>;
9. in science and philosophy, a general formula expressing a necessary property of all conceivable worlds <the law of contradiction, which says that no proposition can at once be both true and false>.

Of the legal senses, (4) and (5) present the most interesting idiomatic distinction. Lawyers distinguish between a law (sense 5) and the law (sense 4). The former refers to a particular and concrete instance of a legal precept. Thus statutes such as the Sherman Antitrust Act (U.S.) and the Theft Act (Eng.)—or parts of them—can each be called a law.

The law, by contrast, is used for something much broader and more general, sometimes together with words describing a recognized branch of legal science, e.g., the law of torts, or with words descriptive of a particular system of law, e.g., the law of the United States.

Most Indo-European languages have different words for the concrete and abstract senses of law. For example, in Latin, there is lex for the concrete sense, jus for the abstract; in Italian, legge and diritto; in French, loi and droit; in Spanish, ley and derecho; in German, Gesetz and Recht. The English word right has long sense lost its sense corresponding to the German Recht—so English speakers have had to press law into double service. See lex (A).

As a result of our doing so, we have had to confront practical problems that might otherwise have been avoided. In Swift v. Tyson, a famous American constitutional-law case, the Supreme Court based its decision in part on the distinction between law and a law (or laws, in the plural): "In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of Courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are; and are not of themselves laws." 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 1, 18 (1842). Accord, 2 Alexander M. Burrill, A Law Dictionary and Glossary 132 (2d ed. 1860) ("A law . . . undoubtedly imports an act of the legislature; and the term is quite inapplicable to a decision of a court of justice . . . .").

The decision in Swift v. Tyson might have been decided differently, of course, if the statute at issue—the Rules of Decision Act—had declared that state law, as opposed to state laws, controlled questions of common law as applied by federal courts. Thus a drafter's lapse—using laws where law was probably intended—may have resulted in 96 years of bad law (not laws), until Swift v. Tyson was overturned in Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938).

law, adj. Law, like legal, acts as an adjective for law, n. No strict DIFFERENTIATION is possible, for we have law studies beside legal studies and lawbooks beside legal books; but legal firm is an un-English phrase for law firm, just as law doctrine is not used for legal doctrine. The OED contains hundreds of examples of the attributive adjective law, such as lawcourt and Law Lords.

Law shares with legal the sense "pertaining to the law as a body of rules, or as a field of study." E.g., "The principal law question on the cross-appeals is whether the Supreme Court committed reversible error in awarding exemplary damages as incidental to injunctive relief." Legal has the additional sense "permitted under law; not forbidden" <legal acts>, as the antonym of illegal.

law abhors a forfeiture, the. See equity abhors a forfeiture.

law-abiding (= abiding by, maintaining, or submitting to the law) is a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE dating from the early 19th century. E.g., "Courts do not depart from the rule that equity may not interfere, except to protect property rights of a pecuniary nature, in enjoining criminal acts exercised by one dealer to enhance his sales to the calculated pecuniary injury of a law-abiding competitor." See abide.

The corresponding noun—an awkward-looking form that does not exactly abide by the laws of English word-formation—is law-abidingness. E.g., "State v. Baird . . . expressly decides proof of reputation for 'law-abidingness' has no place in the case." State v. Shepard, 67 S.W.2d 91, 94 (Mo. 1933)./ "[T]he defendant's character witnesses . . . testified as to his reputation for honesty and law-abidingness . . . ." U.S. v. Londono-Villa, 898 F.2d 328, 329 (2d Cir. 1990).

law and order. The phrase—originating not in AmE but in 19th-century BrE—is hyphenated only when it functions as an adjective—e.g.: "Had Ervin been extra careful about appearing tough on law-and-order issues, he probably never would have done these things." Paul R. Clancy, Just a Country Lawyer 202 (1974). As a noun phrase, it should remain unhyphenated: "[T]hen all respect for law-and-order [read law and order] would vanish . . . ." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 179 (1939; repr. 1980).

lawcourt, one word, is another form of court of law, q.v. In most modern contexts—wherever the distinction between courts of equity and courts of law is not an issue—lawcourt is a one-word redundancy—e.g.: "To do so was its province as fact-finder as well as the lawcourt [read court]." City of Saginaw v. Garvey Elevators, Inc., 431 S.W.2d 575, 579 (Tex. Civ. App. -Fort Worth 1968).

In other contexts, however—esp. historical contexts—it provides a concise contrast to courts of equity, as here: "In England the law courts [read lawcourts] at first refused to recognize a decree for money in equity as creating a debt on which an action at law could be maintained." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 67 (1930). See law, adj.

law day. This phrase has undergone quite a metamorphosis in recent years. Originally, law day was the yearly or twice-yearly meeting of one of the early common-law courts. By the 15th century and for a long time after, it came to denote the day appointed for the debtor to discharge a mortgage or else forfeit the property to the mortgagee.

Since 1958, the American Bar Association has sponsored Law Day on May 1 of each year—a day in which American schools, public assemblies, and courts draw attention to the importance of law in modern society.

law factory, a derogatory term for a major law firm, dates from the mid-20th century—e.g.: "That is why the center of the nation's law business is in New York City and why the bulk of the nation's influential and profitable law practice is carried on in the Wall Street law factories." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 155 (1939; repr. 1980)./ "Hotchkiss, Levy & Hogan was a typical Wall Street law factory, occupying two entire stories in a white-stone office building within spitting distance of J.P. Morgan & Co." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 142 (1943).

law firm. See firm.

LAW FRENCH refers to the Anglo-Norman patois used in legal documents and all judicial proceedings from the 1260s to the reign of Edward III (1327–1377), and used with frequency in legal literature up to the early 18th century. When first introduced into England, this brand of French was the standard language used in Normandy; by the 1300s, through linguistic isolation, it became a corrupted language—by French standards, at any rate. In the 17th century, Sir Edward Coke wrote that Law French could not be either "pure or well pronounced," and that one could find within it "a whole army of words, which cannot defend themselves in bello grammaticali, in the grammatical war, and yet are most significant, compendious, and effectual to express the true sense of the matter." Edward Coke, Commentary on Littleton xxxix–xl (Butler ed. 1832).

English law cases were reported in Law French until the end of the 17th century. Even as late as the early 18th century, surprisingly, Law French had its apologists: "Really the Law is scarcely expressible properly in English." Roger North, A Discourse on the Study of the Laws 13 (c. 1710; repr. London: C. Baldwyn ed., 1824). Perhaps the best book written in Law French was Sir John Comyn's Digest of the Laws of England (1762-1767).

Though Law French may be obscure to the English-speaking lawyer, its remnants abound in the language of the law, in common words such as appeal, assault, arrest, attainder, counsel, defer, defy, demand, demise, disclaimer, escheat, escrow, heir, indictment, interpleader, joinder, laches, larceny, lay, lien, merger, mortgage, negligence, nuisance, ouster, party, process, proof, remainder, reverter, suit, tender, tort, trespass, verdict, and voir dire. There are also remnants somewhat more arcane, such as cestui que trust, and en ventre sa mere.

Law French was always a highly technical language that preserved many old Anglo-Normanisms, but English forms, inflections, word order, and construction finally took it over. A notorious example: in the Salisbury assizes of 1631, a prisoner condemned by the Chief Justice of Common Pleas was said to have "ject un brickbat a le dit Justice que narrowly mist"; for that outburst, "son dexter manus [was] ampute" and the man himself "immediatment hange in presence de Court." One noted writer has referred to Law French as "something very like a Sid Caesar version of a foreign language." Charles Rembar, The Law of the Land 178 n.* (1980). Though we have retained much of the vocabulary, Anglo-American lawyers no longer try to communicate with each other in this cabalistic dialect.

For what remains, though, of Law French, a word about pronunciation is in order. English and, to a lesser extent, American lawyers have generally preserved the medieval pronunciations given to Law French terms—pronunciations that resemble modern English much more than they do modern French. Thus the "correct" pronunciation of oyez is /oh-yez/ or /oh-yes/, not /oh-yay/, and of autrefois acquit /oh-tər-foyz/ not /oh-tər-fwah/. See J.H. Baker, Manual of Law French (2d ed. 1990); J.H. Baker, "Law French," in 7 Guide to American Law 80–81 (1984). Cf. LAW LATIN. See MINGLE-MANGLE

lawful cause (= good cause; legal justification) is not to be confused with legal cause (= proximate cause). See CAUSATION (A) lawgiver; lawmaker. Both are equivalent to legislator, but lawgiver suggests one who promulgates an entire code of laws, and is therefore more magisterial in tone: "To the Middle Ages the academic ideal of all Europe as the empire for which Justinian had been the law-giver made Roman law a universal law." (R. Pound)/ "Alfred [was] two hundred years later than the first English lawgivers quoted." (Holmes) Both lawgiver and lawmaker are now preferably written as single, unhyphenated words.

law is no respecter of persons, the. See no respecter of persons, the law is.

LAW LATIN, sometimes formerly called "dog Latin," is the bastardized or debased Latin formerly used in law and legal documents. For the most part, we have escaped from its clutches. In 1730, Parliament abolished Law Latin in legal proceedings, but two years later found it necessary to allow Latin phrases that had previously been in common use, such as fieri facias, habeas corpus, ne exeat, and nisi prius. As Blackstone would later say, some Latinisms were "not . . . capable of an English dress with any degree of seriousness." 3 William Blackstone, Commentaries 323 (1768).

Brewer's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable quotes the following jocular example: "As the law classically expresses it, a kitchen is 'camera necessaria pro usus cookare; cum sauce-pannis, stewpannis, scullero, dressero, coalholo, stovis, smoak-jacko; pro roastandum, boilandum, fryandum, et plum-pudding-mixandum.'" Stevens, A Law Report (Daniel v. Dishclout) (quoted in Brewer, Dictionary of Phrase and Fable (1894), s.v. "Dog-Latin"). See E.H. Jackson, Law Latin (1897); E. Hilton Jackson, Latin for Lawyers (1915); John Trayner, Latin Phrases and Maxims (4th ed. 1894); Herbert Broom, Legal Maxims (10th ed. 1939). Cf. LAW FRENCH. See MINGLE-MANGLE & LATINISMS.

lawlike (one word meaning "resembling or characteristic of law") is labeled "rare" in the OED.

The word is rare in the law reports, but not in legal commentary—e.g.: "[N]orms are more or less lawlike depending upon how formal they are . . . ." Larry A. Alexander, Painting Without the Numbers, 8 U. Dayton L. Rev. 447, 460 (1983)./ "The essence of a causal generalization is the belief that we attach to the generalization: the belief in its causal or lawlike character." Richard W. Wright, Causation in Tort Law, 73 Cal. L. Rev. 1735, 1823 (1985)./ "Gordon's basic strategy is to deconstruct the 'lawlike' qualities of the law by descending into ever finer levels of microstructural analysis." Steve Fuller, Playing Without a Full Deck, 97 Yale L.J. 549, 570–71 (1988).

Law Lord. This title refers to any member of the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords—the Lord Chancellor, the salaried Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, and any peer who holds or has held high judicial office. The Law Lords (usu. capitalized thus) form the highest court of appeal in the United Kingdom—roughly equivalent to the Supreme Court of the United States. E.g., "And this was the view of a majority of the law lords on that occasion, Lords Brougham and Campbell agreeing with Lord Lyndhurst." In re Broderick's Will, 88 U.S. 503, 512 (1874)./ "The Law Lords reached this view by analysing the meaning of the words without regard to their context or legislative intent." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 95 (2d ed. 1985). See House of Lords, Lords & Lord of Appeal in Ordinary.

lawmaker. One word. Although historically this term was thought to be equivalent to legislator, the advent of legal realism made it apply just as fully to a judge as to a legislator. Thus, Pound's use of the phrase legislative lawmaker is not a careless redundancy: "But they make the path of the legislative lawmaker a rough one." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 48 (1938). See lawgiver.

lawman = (1) historically, an official whose duty it was to declare the law; (2) a man of law, or lawyer; or (3) a law-enforcement officer. Sense (3) is the only sense recently in general use.

Sense (2) is labeled "obsolete except as a nonce-word" in the OED, and it probably ought to be obsolete. Yet: "Mispronunciations aside, do the modern lawmen [read lawyers] who use [legal terms] know something about their origin?" Mario Pei, Words in Sheep's Clothing 83 (1969). And, in the same year, Glendon Schubert wrote of Justice Robert H. Jackson, "For over forty years, from late adolescence until the very day of his death, his was the life of a law-man," adding—"The idiom is that of Karl Llewellyn rather than of Matt Dillon." Dispassionate Justice 285 & n.3 (1969). Schubert's use of the term—referring as it does to a particular man—seems more justifiable than Pei's, but either is likely to strike some readers as sexist. See SEXISM (B).

law merchant = a system of customary law that grew up in Europe during the Middle Ages and regulated the dealings of mariners and merchants in all the commercial countries of the world. Many of its principles came to be incorporated into the common law. The plural form is laws merchant, the second word (as in the singular) being a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE. This phrase is a LOAN TRANSLATION of lex mercatoria. See commercial law & lex mercatoria.

law of nations = (1) jus gentium (q.v.); or (2) international law. The phrase law of nations began as a LOAN TRANSLATION of jus gentium (the common law of peoples) but eventually took on a more restrictive sense, as a synonym of international law (= the body of rules and principles that bind civilized states in their relations with one another). As between these synonyms, "[m]ost writers and practitioners have for the past century preferred the term international law." Clive Parry & John P. Grant, Encyclopedic Dictionary of International Law 210 (1986). A notable exception is J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations (5th ed. 1955). See international law.

law of nature. See natural law.

law of the case = (1) the decision rendered in a former appeal of a case, which by legal doctrine is held to be binding; or (2) the doctrine so holding. Thus, if a case is appealed a second time to a panel of a U.S. Court of Appeals, and a panel with a different makeup from the first panel hears the case the second time, the second panel will generally hold itself bound by the writings of the first panel whether or not its members agree with those earlier writings. This phrase, in Holmes's words, "merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, not a limit to their power." Messenger v. Anderson, 225 U.S. 436, 444 (1912). Law of the case is to be distinguished from res judicata and stare decisis, qq.v.

law of the land is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the phrase lex terrae (LAW LATIN) or ley de terre (LAW FRENCH). First used in Magna Carta (in the phrase per legem terrae), the phrase generally means "the law in effect in a country and applicable to all members of the community, whether resulting from the highest court's pronouncements or from legislative enactment." E.g., "Gertz is now the law of the land, and until it is overruled, it must, under the principle of stare decisis, be applied by this court." In AmE, this phrase also sometimes signifies "due process of law."

law of the sea. See admiralty.

LAW REVIEWESE is the stilted, often jargonistic writing style characteristically found in law reviews. Judge Posner, an accomplished stylist who has written in many law reviews, bemoans "the drab, Latinate, plethoric, euphemistic style of law reviews." Richard A. Posner, Goodbye to the Bluebook, 53 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1343, 1349 (1986). Unless the author is a famous one whose prose the editors dare not tamper with, the edited and published writing usually takes on an "official" law-review style that is lacking in personality or individual idiom, overburdened with abstract phraseology, bottom-heavy with footnotes, humorless, and generally unobservant of good grammar and diction. This last fault is perhaps ineradicable, at least in the U.S., inasmuch as legally trained young men and women are called upon to be professional editors when not one in fifty has a background suitable to the task. Nevertheless, the industry and thought that go into publishing a law review are good training, however inconsequential the product often is.

"The ideal law review," writes James C. Raymond in an iconoclastic essay, > is one that is designed not only to be referred to, but actually (and here comes the revolutionary proposal) to be read. Its articles are selected not on the basis of the number of footnotes they contain, but on the basis of the timeliness of the topic and the soundness of the scholarship. They may have no footnotes or dozens of them—all that are necessary to satisfy the curiosity of intelligent readers who are particularly interested in the topic, but no more.

> In the ideal review, articles are also selected, or even solicited, at least partly on the basis of how well their authors can write. Ideal editors are prepared to instruct their assistants and even their contributors on the elements of good writing. They refuse to publish anything that they consider dull, and they have the courage to demand a revision of anything they cannot understand. They know from their own reading that the best legal writers are always more than crabbed logicians of the law. They are capable of clarity without any compromise in precision, and, when the occasion warrants, of eloquence no less memorable than Cicero's.
> James C. Raymond, Editing Law Reviews, 12 Pepp. L. Rev. 371, 378–79 (1985).

No such law review yet exists, or is likely to. Still, there is a move afoot to establish faculty-edited law reviews; let us hope that these bring much-needed reform. If they do, then Karl Llewellyn's words would lose their sting: "There is not, as far as I know, in the world an academic faculty which pins its reputation before the public on the work of undergraduate students—there is none, that is, except in the American law reviews." The Bramble Bush 107 (1930).

law's delay. The possessive is necessary in this phrase, which derives from Shakespeare: "For who would bear . . . the law's delay . . . when he might his quietus make with a bare bodkin [i.e., dagger]." Hamlet 3.1.69–75. The allusion is sometimes mistakenly rendered in the more emphatic plural, as the law's delays.

Law Society = a professional association originally formed in 1825 to prevent abuses among and (later) to regulate solicitors in England and Wales. Separate societies now exist in Australia, Northern Ireland, and Scotland—as well as other jurisdictions in which the dual system of solicitors and barristers exists.

lawsuit is best written as one word in AmE and BrE.

laws. See law, n.

lawyer, n. See attorney (A). lawyer, v.i. & v.t.; lawyering. The OED lists lawyering ("colloquial") but not the verb lawyer. W2 contains the verb lawyer, defining it as (1) "to conduct a lawsuit against" and (2) "to practice as a lawyer," noting that the term is "rare" in both senses. W3 omits lawyer as a verb and appends the note "often used disparagingly" to lawyering.

None of these treatments adequately describes these Americanisms. Lawyer is no longer rare as a verb—e.g.: "Of course, ever since lawyers began to lawyer, there have been losing counsel aplenty who have so believed in their causes that they have bitterly blamed the court." Karl Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition 3 (1960).

And it has taken on another sense: "to supply with lawyers"—e.g.: "China has never been a lawyered country and it is only beginning to understand and accept that for a foreign investor to come with an attorney for negotiation is not an unduly aggressive or untrusting act."

Finally, although lawyering may be used disparagingly in some quarters, many lawyers use it as a neutral term to describe what they do, and even as a laudatory term. E.g., "The real skill in judging, as it is in lawyering, is in being able properly to find and articulate the issues." Varol v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield, 708 F. Supp. 826, 827 (E.D. Mich. 1989)./ "This was a prodigious feat of lawyering on the part of defense counsel." People v. Gragg, 264 Cal. Rptr. 765, 773 (Ct. App. 1989) (referring to defense counsel's obtaining an acquittal for a defendant portrayed as a "brutish" person)./ "If lawyering is truly a public profession, it is no more seemly for the members of the bar to live lives of luxury than it was for the clergy of old." Jethro K. Lieberman, Crisis at the Bar 227 (1978). See attorney (c).

lawyer-basher, lawyer-bashing. Hyphenated thus.

lawyerdom (= the world of lawyers) is more than just a nonce-word, though most dictionaries do not record it. E.g., "[Cardozo's] style received wide acclaim in lawyerdom." Jerome N. Frank, Some Reflections on Judge Learned Hand, 24 U. Chi. L. Rev. 666, 672 (1957)./ "Seliger cannot fairly be placed in a limbo unoccupied by the rest of lawyerdom." Strama v. Peterson, 561 F. Supp. 997, 999 (N.D. Ill. 1983)./ "Is there any road through the labyrinth of lawyerdom?" Glenna Whitley, Why We Love to Hate Lawyers, D Mag., May 1991, at 47, 51.

Attorneydom is an occasional variant. E.g., "They also seem less prone to the sort of loophole chicanery and fine-print-chasing endemic to Washington attorneydom." Ken Ringle, The Soviets' Cram Course in Freedom, Washington Post, 11 Oct. 1989, at B1./ "They were, it seems, not the green cloth bags which afterwards became a synonym for attorneydom, but of black buckram." E.B.V. Christian, A Short History of Solicitors 56 (1896; repr. 1983).

lawyeress [according to the OED] = (1) the wife of a lawyer; or (2) a female lawyer. Neither sense (1), a surprising one, nor sense (2) has much of a place in modern legal writing. See SEXISM (C). lawyering. See lawyer, v.i. & v.t.

lawyerish is the disparaging counterpart to lawyerlike. E.g., "The constitutional amendment . . . is advocated by the people who have lost patience with lawyerish logic and want to settle the question once and for all." The Flag Burners, Washington Post, 20 July 1989, at A22./ "He has nicked his own name down to Dick Thornburgh, from more lawyerish Richard L. Thornburgh." J. Randolph Murray, Chicago Tribune, 26 March 1989, at 4C./ "It is a lengthy, involved, and complicated document 13 typewritten pages in length . . . . Its language is 'lawyerish,' full of technical terms . . . ." Mercantile-Commerce Bank & Trust Co. v. Binowitz, 238 S.W.2d 893, 897 (Mo. Ct. App. 1951). See lawyerly.

lawyerism – (1) a mannerism, esp. of speech or writing, characteristic of lawyers; or (2) the influence, principles, or practices of lawyers. Examples of sense (1) are legion—e.g.: "The use of 'lawyerisms' that becloud clarity of expression is to be avoided." Edward Re, Brief Writing and Oral Argument 7 (6th ed. 1987).

Sense (2), however, is less common—e.g.: "Trial-lawyerism 'is the only salient issue of the campaign since there's no judicial record for either candidate,' Ross added." Walter Borges, In Judge Race, GOP Hits Kidd with TTLA Label, Texas Law., 20 Aug. 1990, at 6./ "OAG . . . concluded that control over environmental problems from oil and gas operations on state land lay in not leasing in the first place, the kind of lawyerism which drives most clients to ignore the answer they didn't want in the second place." Michigan Oil Co. v. Natural Resources Comm'n, 249 N.W.2d 135, 149 n.7 (Mich. Ct. App. 1976).

LAWYERISMS. See LEGALISMS AND LAWYERISMS.

lawyerize, lawyerization. Many question the need for such terms, esp. since so many NEOLOGISMS formed with the -ize suffix are needless and ephemeral. But these words have appeared again and again in legal and nonlegal publications. Sometimes the meaning can be gleaned from the passage—e.g.: "The lawyerization of America has not reached that point." Sally Beauty Co. v. Nexxus Prods. Co., 801 F.2d 1001, 1010 (7th Cir. 1986) (Posner, J., dissenting)./ "[W]e ought to consider the potential impact on the dockets of our busy district courts, and ultimately on our crowded docket, of 'lawyerizing' prisoner civil litigation." Merritt v. Faulkner, 697 F.2d 761, 771 (7th Cir. 1983) (Posner, J., dissenting in part). By lawyerize, Posner probably means "to put (a thing) under the control of lawyers, the implication being that the adversary system is the only appropriate or effective way to proceed."

In other contexts, the sense is not so easily ascertained—e.g.: "Gilmore minimizes the importance of lawyerizing and laws through skepticism—how can one make rules in an existence that is fundamentally unknowable and perpetually in flux?" James G. Wilson, The Morality of Formalism, 33 UCLA L. Rev. 431, 437 (1985)./

"Lawyerization outside urban enclaves has been most dramatic in the state's north-central valley . . . ." Gail D. Cox, 100,000 Practitioners, Nat'l L.J., 21 Nov. 1988, at 1. In the latter sentence, lawyerization seems to mean "populating (an area) with lawyers."

lawyerly; lawyerlike. Most American and English dictionaries record lawyerlike but not lawyerly—this despite the greater currency of the latter word. Lawyerly first appeared in Milton's Eikonoklastes (1650), but then it fell into a long period of disuse. See 3 Complete Works of John Milton 403 (1962) ("the more Lawyerlie mooting on this point"). The first dictionary to record lawyerly was, appropriately, written by a lawyer: Noah Webster, Dictionary of the English Language (1828). Until recently, however, most other dictionary-makers, being unlawyerly, have ignored the word.

Whether lawyerly is a term of praise or of abuse depends on one's general disposition toward lawyers. Sometimes it is used admiringly: "What Marshall did was a stroke of political genius, salted with lawyerly adroitness." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 87 (1955). Sometimes not: "With every half line of testimony interrupted by half a page of lawyerly harangue, it was exceedingly difficult for the witness to develop his thesis and the search for the truth was well nigh lost in the process." Watson v. State, 306 A.2d 599, 608 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1973)./ "But the judges, with lawyerly indirection, have not avowed the interest of the judiciary in orderly resort to the courts as a basis for their decision . . . ." Miles v. Illinois Central R.R., 315 U.S. 698, 706 (1942) (Jackson, J., concurring).

Lawyerlike, on the other hand, is almost invariably a term of praise—e.g.: "This is not very lawyerlike, nor very respectful to the Court." Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 657, 699 (1838) (argument of counsel)./ "Counsel for both sides tried this case on a very high plane and in a very objective, lawyerlike fashion." Reed v. Gulf Oil Corp., 217 F. Supp. 370, 373 (D.D.C. 1963)./ "Without exception, despite the emotional overtones of the proceeding, the briefs and oral arguments were temperate, lawyerlike and constructive." South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 308 (1966).

LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR. The chief irony of lawyerdom is that poll after poll shows that (1) the public holds lawyers in low esteem, but (2) of all the possible careers that are available, parents would prefer to have their children become lawyers. Whole books could be written about that inconsistency. This is not the place, however, for a discussion of why people disparage lawyers; it is, however, the place to examine the vocabulary with which people do it.

The English language has a formidable stock of disparaging names for lawyers. Of course, every language has its proverbs that reflect poorly in one way or another on lawyers (maybe uncomprehendingly), but probably no other has the range in depreciative vocabulary—from the mild to the harsh. Of course, much depends on who is mouthing the word; some people use lawyer itself in derogatory ways—hence the unfortunate tendency for lawyers to call themselves attorneys (q.v.) instead of lawyers.

A. Names Actually Given to Lawyers. The following 33 terms have been used at various times and in various places to refer to lawyers in ways that are less than flattering:

- ack-ack = (20th-c. AmE criminal cant) a court-appointed lawyer. One writer says that the expression "is both a pun on the World War II antiaircraft gun and also a partial acronym for 'ambulance chaser.'" Joel Homer, Jargon 76 (1979)
- ambidexter = (16th–19th-c. BrE) an unscrupulous lawyer who takes fees (or sometimes bribes) "with both hands," that is, from both sides of a controversy.
- ambulance chaser = (19th–20th c.) a lawyer who solicits business from accident victims at the scene of an accident or shortly thereafter; by extension, an unscrupulous plaintiffs' lawyer. E.g., "[I]rresponsible reporters and editors . . . might, for example, describe the lawyer as a 'mob mouthpiece' for representing a client with a serious prior criminal record, or as an 'ambulance chaser' for representing a claimant in a personal injury action." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 355 (1974) (Burger, C.J., dissenting). See ambulance chaser.
- Blackstone lawyer = (19th–20th-c. AmE) a self-educated antebellum lawyer whose legal training consisted primarily in reading Blackstone's Commentaries. Thomas Jefferson complained that "a student finds there a smattering of everything, and his indolence easily persuades him that if he understands that book, he is a master of the whole body of law." The "unlettered common people" applied "the appellation of Blackstone lawyers to these ephemeral insects of the law." Letter from Thomas Jefferson to Judge John Tyler, 17 June 1812, in 13 The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 166–67 (Andrew Lipscomb ed. 1905).
- chaser = (20th-c. AmE) an ambulance chaser. E.g., "Practicing attorneys often tell us [i.e., the disciplinary authorities]: why don't you go get so-and-so, the big guys, the publicity seekers, the big chasers . . . ." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble With Lawyers 156 (1970) (quoting Vincent Cullinan, president of the San Francisco Bar, 1967–1968). The term also refers to a "runner" employed by the lawyer for purposes of soliciting business from accident victims.

- city lawyer. This term (19th–20th c.) is self-explanatory, except that the people who use the term are usually from rural areas. E.g., "They talked about the avaricious city lawyers who soon would be descending upon the company and demanding private documents." Joseph C. Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 283 (1978). See city lawyer.
- country lawyer = (19th–20th-c. AmE) a rural lawyer. This term can carry positive connotations, but it sometimes suggests modest intellectual abilities—e.g.: "The rule of reason . . . should now allow one to put an antitrust theory of liability or justification into terms that a country lawyer can understand." Lawrence A. Sullivan, The Viability of the Current Law on Horizontal Restraints, 75 Calif. L. Rev. 835, 847 (1987). See country lawyer.
- Court Street lawyer = (20th-c. AmE) a (sometimes disreputable) lawyer with a practice—usu. a trial practice—centered in the borough hall area of Brooklyn. E.g., "Before the Depression, real estate lawyers were typically wheeler-dealers, called 'Court Street lawyers' after the Brooklyn street where many of them set up practice." Rachelle DePalma, The Role of the Pro in Real Estate Deals, Crain's N.Y. Bus., 28 April 1986, at 30. Today the term is also used loosely to distinguish lawyers who practice in the outer boroughs (principally Brooklyn) from those, usu. white-shoe lawyers, who practice in the federal courts and the state courts of the borough of Manhattan, which is co-extensive with New York County.
- dump truck = (20th-c. AmE) a public defender. E.g., "Clients often refer to their public defenders as 'dump trucks,' a term that apparently derives from the defendant's belief that defenders are not interested in giving a vigorous defense, but rather seek only to 'dump' them as quickly as possible." Suzanne E. Mounts, Public Defender Programs, Professional Responsibility, and Competent Representation, 1982 Wis. L. Rev. 473, 474.
- green bag = (17th–19th c.) a lawyer—through the process of metonymy: for their papers, lawyers formerly carried bags made of green canvas or cloth.
- gunslinger = (20th-c. AmE) a hired gun. E.g., "Some lawyers were disturbed when I wrote that lawyers should be 'healers not gunslingers' but I have not hesitated to restate it." Warren E. Burger, Foreward [sic]: American Law Institute Study on Paths to a "Better Way," 1989 Duke L.J. 808, 809.
- hired gun = (20th-c. AmE) a lawyer who acts like an aggressive gunfighter in the Old West, and who will do anything for a fee. E.g., "Kevin Mulligan, president of the union, said an agreement was reached in only three months because the 'hired guns' were not present during negotiations. He said that when the lawyers for both sides were involved in the last contract,the process took 18 months." Carol Stream, Firefighters Sign 3-Year Contract, Chicago Tribune, 15 May 1992, at 3D.
- horse lawyer = (19th–20th-c. AmE) a lawyer of little ability. See 3 Richard H. Thornton, An American Glossary 196 (Louise Hanley ed. 1962).
- jackleg lawyer = (20th-c. AmE) an amateurish and dishonest lawyer. E.g., "She did have a chat with a couple of lawyers. The lawyers couldn't do a thing. 'Jackleg lawyers,' she says, and flicks ashes." Wil Haygood, A Time Revisited, Boston Globe, 16 March 1989, at 85.
- jungle fighter = (20th-c. AmE) a lawyer who practices in the lower criminal courts. E.g., "It may well be that the standard of decorum usually prevailing in the sedate precincts of chancery should also be observed by the jungle-fighters in the pit of police and criminal courts, but it would be somewhat less than realistic . . . ." Kentucky State Bar Ass'n v. Taylor, 482 S.W.2d 574, 583 (Ky. Ct. App. 1972).
- latrine lawyer = (20th-c. AmE) a lawyer who gets business from the rumors spread in the latrine.
- lawmonger = (17th-c. BrE) a low practitioner of law; a pettifogger. E.g., "[T]hough this catering Law-monger be bold to call it wicked." John Milton, "Colasterion" (1645), in The Works of John Milton 233, 259 (Frank A. Patterson et al. eds. 1931).
- legal beagle = (20th c.) a lawyer. Like legal eagle, this term is generally found in the speech and writing of nonlawyers, sometimes with positive and sometimes with negative connotations. Sometimes it occurs with dog metaphors—e.g.: "Even if council's legal beagles sniff out a loophole to invalidate the petition, the mayor's suggestion to put voter-rejected water metering back on the ballot morally compels the council to repeat the fluoridation vote." Don Martin, Fluoride Forces Better Brush Up for Battle, Calgary Herald, 11 Oct. 1991, at B1. See legal eagle.
- legal eagle = (20th-c. AmE) a lawyer. Like legal beagle, this term is almost invariably used by those outside the legal profession, usu. with positive connotations. But not always—e.g.: "The legal eagles snookered a federal judge into swallowing their sophistry . . . ." Samuel Francis, The Long Count on Executions, Washington Times, 1 May 1992, at F3. See legal eagle.

- leguleian = (17th–19th-c. BrE) a pettifogger—as the OED puts it, "a contemptuous term for a lawyer." E.g., "You do but that . . . which some silly Leguleians now and then do, to argue unawares against their own clients." John Milton, "A Defence of the People of England," in The Prose Works of John Milton 1, 179 (J.A. St. John ed. 1910 [Joseph Washington trans. 1692])
- lip = (20th-c. AmE) a criminal lawyer (viewed cynically).
- mob mouthpiece = (20th-c. AmE) a defense lawyer for mobsters. E.g., "Oscar Goodman has defended a federal judge and the mayor of San Diego, derailed a U.S. attorney general's effort and proudly wears the title 'mob mouthpiece,' having represented a who's who of alleged crime figures." Robert Macy, Money's Source "Irrelevant": "Mob Mouthpiece" Fights U.S. Attempt to Seize Fees, L.A. Times, 6 April 1986, at 2-8.
- mouthpiece = (19th–20th-c. AmE & BrE) defense counsel hired to speak at the client's bidding. E.g., "[A]n attorney is not merely the client's 'alter ego' functioning only as the client's 'mouthpiece.'" Morrison v. State, 373 S.E.2d 506, 509 (Ga. 1988).
- pettifogger = (16th–20th-c. BrE & AmE) a petty and disreputable lawyer who niggles over inconsequential details; a "rascally attorney" (OED). E.g., "Quite the contrary, counsel in that case were not pettifoggers . . . ." Nebeker v. Piper Aircraft Corp., 747 P.2d 18, 38 (Idaho 1987). See pettifogger.
- Philadelphia lawyer = (18th–20th-c. AmE) an ultracompetent lawyer who knows the ins and outs of legal technicalities; also, a shrewdly unscrupulous lawyer. (This term has long been known in AmE and BrE alike. Similar geographic terms are used as regionalisms. For example, Dallas lawyer is often snidely used in Fort Worth; Houston lawyer is often snidely used in Dallas; and New York lawyer is snidely used by lawyers almost everywhere else.) See Philadelphia lawyer.
- shady lawyer (self-explanatory): "A shady lawyer named Kantor, who had been assigned as counsel to the defendant, managed by terrifying the mother as to the possible outcome of the case, to extort from her her entire savings amounting to four hundred and thirty-five dollars." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 106 (1943).
- ship's lawyer = (19th–20th-c. AmE) an unskillful lawyer. See 3 Richard H. Thornton, An American Glossary 348 (Louise Hanley ed 1962).
- shyster = (19th–20th-c. AmE) a professionally unscrupulous lawyer. For the fascinating etymology of this word, see shyster. For the distinction between a pettifogger and a shyster, see pettifogger.
- shyster lawyer (redundant and self-explanatory): "[T]he shyster lawyer assigned by the court wanted to squeeze all the money he could out of the boy's family . . . ." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 106 (1943). For the etymology, see shyster.
- silk-stocking lawyer = (19th–20th-c. AmE) a patrician lawyer. E.g., "'Do you want ivory tower, silk stocking lawyers defending these people?' the house speaker shouted at him. Mr. [Gary] Parker replied, 'That's better than no lawyer at all.'" Marianne Lavelle, Piercing Racism's Heart, Nat'l L.J., 24 Dec. 1990, at 1.
- sore-back lawyer = (20th-c. AmE) a personal-injury lawyer. E.g., "[My father] really didn't like this bleep I was doing, you know, suing businesses, being a sore-back lawyer (legalslang for a personal injury lawyer), and he was oriented the other way." Joe Jamail (as quoted in Steve Coll, Down Home with Texas' $10.5 Billion Barrister Pennzoil Attorney Joe Jamail, Wash. Post, 31 July 1986, at B1).
- Tombs lawyer = (19th–20th-c. AmE) an unscrupulous New York practitioner. Thornton defines the term Tombs lawyers as "a class of men in New York, resembling the 'Old Bailey practitioners,' but, if possible, more unscrupulous," with this illustration: "A man as corrupt as sin, as venal as a Tombs lawyer . . . ." 3 Richard H. Thornton, An American Glossary 196 (Louise Hanley ed. 1962).
- white-shoe lawyer = (20th-c. AmE) an establishment lawyer. E.g., "Lifland rejected Gold's suggestion, appointing white-shoe lawyer Leon Silverman of New York's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson instead of someone from the ranks of organized labor." Caroline V. Clarke, Labor's Turn to Take on Manville, American Law., Jan.–Feb. 1991, at 44, 44. See white-shoe lawyer.

B. Prejudicial Names for Other Forms of Life. Sometimes, people and things are referred to as lawyers, usually for the purpose of making the reference derogatory—e.g.:

- barrack lawyer = (20th-c. BrE criminal cant) a prisoner who thinks he knows all there is to know regarding prison rules. One text defines the phrase as follows: "Generally a solicitor's ex-clerk posing as a lawyer and always ready to give 'expert' advice on 'how to get on special release.'" Paul Tempest, Lag's Lexicon 11 (1950).

- bush lawyer = (19th–20th-c. Australianism) one who parades a merely fancied knowledge of the law. E.g., "Well, in the old days in the bush, there were no registered lawyers, so some half-shrewd mug, usually a barber, would set himself up to adivse all and sundry. So now anyone who throws around a lot of free advice is called a bush lawyer." F. Hardy, Billy Borker Yarns Again 135 (1967).
- guardhouse lawyer = (20th-c. AmE) a jailhouse lawyer. E.g., "If we are going to administer criminal justice properly to those whose cases call for our attention, if we are going to devote our attention to matters meriting attention and not submerge ourselves in a great bog of rhetorical trivia, mostly dreamed up by guardhouse lawyers, we must exercise some degree of rational selection." Surratt v. U.S., 262 F.2d 691, 694 (D.C. Cir. 1958) (Prettyman, C.J., dissenting).
- high lawyer = (16th–18th-c. BrE) a mounted highway robber. E.g., "The legerdemaine [sic] of . . . high Lawyers." Robert Greene, Groats-Worth of Wit XXIX (Dyce ed. 1617). See Eric Partridge, A Dictionary of of the Underworld 331 (1950).
- jailhouse lawyer = (20rh-c. AmE) an inmate who acquires some legal learning and counsels fellow inmates on drafting complaints and briefs.
- lake lawyer = (19th-c. AmE) either of two different fishes, the bow-fin and the burbot—named because of their "ferocious looks and voracious habits." John R. Bartlett, The Dictionary of Americanisms 198 (1849).
- lawyer = (19th-c. AmE) the black-necked stilt—so named because of its "long bill" (OED).
- lynch lawyer = (19th-c. AmE) a practitioner of lynch law. E.g., "In the middle [of the plaza] is planted a tall liberty pole, near which is erected a rude rostrum for lynch-lawyers and noisy politicians." Hinton R. Helper, The Land of Gold 74 (1855). See lynch law.
- pelican = (20th-c. AmE) a jailhouse lawyer specializing in appeals. See Joel Homer, Jargon 78 (1979).
- sea lawyer = (19th–20th-c. BrE & AmE) a captious or carping sailor—or, by extension, other person. E.g., "So long as the teacher acts reasonably the Constitution does not require him to work in an atmosphere of litigious contest with any juvenile sea-lawyer who may appear in his class." Meyers v. Arcata High Sch. Dist., 75 Cal. Rptr. 68, 78 (Ct. App. 1969) (Christian, J., dissenting). Originally, in the early 19th c., sea lawyer was a name given to the tiger shark.

lawyer's lawyer. This CLICHÉ is among highest compliments that one lawyer can pay another. E.g., "Robert Houghwout Jackson was an eloquent spokesman for the pattern of beliefs and feelings characteristic of the political ideology of the American lawyer. More than any other Supreme Court justice of the twentieth century, Jackson was a lawyer's lawyer." Glendon Schubert, Dispassionate Justice 1 (1969). For the definitive treatment of all that this phrase embodies, see William H. Harbaugh, Lawyer's Lawyer: The Life of John W. Davis (1973). Unfortunately, however, the phrase is coming to be used with little discrimination.

lay; lie. These verbs are commonly misused—even by members of our learned profession. Witness these specimens: "He said he played with guns all the time, and that he picked up a pistol laying [read lying] on the bedside table and began waiving [read waving] it around . . . ." Still v. State, 709 S.W.2d 672, 674 (Tex. App.—Tyler 1983)./ "Mr. Armstrong [debating against Alan Dershowitz] was not to be outdone . . . . But Mr. Dershowitz did not lay [read lie] down." William Glaberson, Face to Face, 2 Lawyers Feud Away, Slap for Slap, N.Y. Times, 19 Jan. 1991, at 15./ "Susman started looking around for a lucrative niche in the Houston legal market, and he thought the big money might lay [read lie] in plaintiffs' antitrust class action work." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 259–60 (1989; repr. 1991).

Very simply, lie (= to recline, be situated) is intransitive <he lies on his bed>, whereas lay (= to put down, arrange) is transitive only <she laid her hand on his shoulder> <they laid the body in its grave>. The verbs are declined lie > lay > lain and lay > laid > laid. To use lay intransitively to mean "lie" <I want to lay down> is nonstandard, even though (alas) fairly common in speech. See lie.

layman; layperson; lay person; nonlawyer. Layman is the most common among these terms and has traditionally been regarded as unexceptionable—in reference to members of both sexes, of course. E.g., "[A] layman was needed to evaluate the success or failure of my effort to translate rules of law into understandable English prose. Therefore, with infinite patience, my wife read and reread every section of this text . . . ." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law iv (1946; repr. 1950). Still, modern writers increasingly avoid layman on grounds of SEXISM. For those seeking a nonsexist substitute, nonlawyer is the best choice.

W10 records layperson from 1972; the one-word form appears to be an Americanism. E.g., "The average layperson would no doubt disagree with A if he said, 'I didn't intend to injure C.'" Here it appears in plural form lay people, an alternative to laypersons: "If they continue in their druidic isolation, the only course lay people might have is what Dick the butcher, in Henry IV, Part Two, suggested: 'The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers.'" For the reason to avoid layperson, like all other words ending with the -person suffix, see SEXISM (B) See also laity, nonlawyer, people (A) & BIBLICAL AFFECTATION leach, vb.; leech, vb. To leach is to pass through by percolation, or to separate a solid from a solution by percolation. To leech is to apply bloodsuckers to the skin in order to cause bleeding (no longer a favored medical technique); metaphorically, leeching occurs when a person acts like a blood-sucker.

Surprisingly often, leech is misused for leach—e.g.:

- "The advent of agriculture in the Imperial Valley and the Coachella Valley, with its attendant irrigation, leeching [read leaching], and drainage significantly changed the inflow into the Sea." U.S. v. Imperial Irrigation Dist., 799 F. Supp. 1052, 1058 (S.D. Cal. 1992).
- "Testimony was elicited regarding a condition known as 'new building syndrome,' indicating that new buildings have a greater accumulation of allergens and leeching [read leaching] of noxious vapors [that] subside with the passage of time." Champion v. Beale, 833 S.W.2d 799, 800 (Ky. 1992).
- "Plaintiffs in California, Illinois, and New York are alleging that children whose mothers had implants prior to their conception may have been injured from silicone leeching [read leaching] through their mothers' bloodstream and breast milk." Todd P. Myers, Casenote, Ohio Rejects Preconception Cause of Action for DES Grandchildren, 62 U. Cin. L. Rev. 283, 320 n.267 (1993).

lead is sometimes wrongly used for led, perhaps on the mistaken analogy of read/read, and perhaps also because of confusion with the metal. E.g., "Claimant has failed to prove that her work injury has lead [read led] employers to refuse her employment . . . ." Perman v. North Dakota Workers Compensation Bureau, 458 N.W.2d 484, 486 (N.D. 1990).

leader (at the bar) is a Britishism meaning "the senior barrister for a party in a case." In the U.S., lead counsel is the usual phrase.

leading case = (1) most strictly, a judicial precedent that first definitely settled an important rule or principle of law and that has since been often and consistently followed; (2) less strictly, an important, often the most important, judicial precedent on a particular legal issue; or (3) loosely, a reported case that determines an issue being litigated; a ruling case, q.v. Sense (1) is the classic one, referring to cases such as these:

- McNaghten's Case, 8 Eng. Rep. 718, 10 Cl. & Fin. 200 (1843) (first setting forth the grounds of the insanity defense). See McNaghten.
- Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R., 162 N.E. 99 (N.Y. 1928) (establishing the doctrine that a defendant's duty in a negligence action is limited to plaintiffs within the zone of apparent danger—to whom damage could be reasonably foreseen).
- Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938) (holding that on questions of state law, a federal court sitting in diversity is bound by the law as declared by the highest state court).
- Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966) (creating the exclusionary rule for evidence obtained improperly from a suspect being interrogated while in police custody).

leading question; categorical question. Nonlawyers frequently misapprehend leading question as referring to a question showing hostility or posed just to embarrass or take unfair advantage. Actually, as litigators well know, a leading question is one that suggests the answer to the person being interrogated. In Anglo-American law such questions are generally permissible only on cross-examination. Categorical question, another name for the same practice, is today little used.

leaflet(t)ing. This word arises in First Amendment cases, such as Jews for Jesus, Inc. v. Board of Airport Comm'rs, 661 F. Supp. 1223, 1224, 1225 (C.D. Cal. 1985), in which the word is spelling leafletting on one page and leafleting on the next. The better spelling in AmE is leafleting; in BrE, leafletting. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

learned; learnt. As an adjective, learned has two syllables, and as a past tense one. Learnt is a BrE variant of the past tense learned.

learned counsel; learned friend; learned court. These are tiresome legal CLICHÉS; examples like the following one show just how debased such phrases have become: "Learned counsel . . . contend . . . . This contention is unsound, and . . . is bottomed wholly on a false premise . . . ." Ford v. Moody, 276 S.W. 595, 597 (Ark. 1925). Learned friend is a common variation, as in, "It may be helpful to your Lordship and my learned friend if I . . . ," meaning, as David Pannick points out, "it will certainly be helpful to me." Pannick adds that to say, "In all fairness to my learned friend," means that one is about to "put the legal boot in." David Pannick, Judges 153 (1987).

Even learned court is likely to sound patronizing, esp. when used by an appellate court in reference to a lower court—e.g.: "The learned court at special term has found that, although the instrument relied upon by the defendant was testamentary in character, it did not comply with the statutory requirements of a will and is therefore void."

leasable. So spelled.

lease, n., = (1) a conveyance of real property, usu. in return for rent, made for life, for a fixed period, or at will—but always for less time than the lessor has a right to; (2) both such a conveyance and all other covenants attached to the conveyance; (3) the written instrument in which such a conveyance, together with the covenants, is incorporated; (4) in North America and Australia, a piece of real property that is held on lease; or (5) a temporary conveyance of personal property in return for consideration.

When sense (5) arose in the 19th century, it was considered a loose usage. Today, however, leases of cars and office equipment, for example, are common.

lease, v.t.; let. Let (10th c.) is 300 years older than lease (13th c.) in the sense "to grant the temporary possession and use of (land, buildings, rooms, movable property) to another in return for rent or other consideration." But both are well established, and they are equally good. As used by (real) estate agents in BrE, the term "To Let" is more common than the phrase "For Rent," the usual term in AmE.

To say that one leases property nowadays does not tell the reader or listener whether one is lessor or lessee. From its first verbal use in the 13th century, lease meant "to grant the possession of," but in the mid-19th century it took on the additional sense "to take a lease of; to hold by a lease." This ambiguity has made the preposition used important to clarity: the lessor leases to and the lessee leases from.

leaseback (= the sale of property on the understanding, or with the express option, that the seller may lease the property immediately upon the sale) dates from the mid-20th century. Though technically a REDUNDANCY, the common phrase sale and leaseback helps clarify the meaning.

leasee. See lessor.

lease for years. See term of years.

lease from. See lease, v.t.

leaseholder (BrE) = lessee (AmE). Both terms are used in both speech communities—for example, leaseholder is fairly common in American oil-and-gas cases—but leaseholder is the more general term in BrE, lessee the more general term in AmE.

lease-lend. See lend-lease.

leaseman. See landman.

lease-purchase agreement; hire-purchase agreement. The first is standard AmE; the second is the BrE equivalent. The AmE phrase is sometimes written lease-to-purchase agreement. See hire purchase.

lease to. See lease, v.t.

leasor; leasee. These are blunders for lessor and lessee. E.g., "[T]he legal status of a third person coming upon a leasor's [read lessor's] property at the invitation of a leasee [read lessee] is immaterial." Flott v. Cates, 528 N.E.2d 847, 849 (Ind. Ct. App. 1988)./ "[T]he city would require the leasee [read lessee] to construct at least 55,000 square feet of maintenance hangar space . . . ." Government Actions, Wash. Post, 12 April 1990, at V5. See lessor.

leave of court = judicial permission to follow a nonroutine procedure. In the sense of permission, leave had become archaic by the 19th century in every field but law. Rather than just leaving it alone, sometimes lawyers use the word leave alone—e.g.: "Your honor, we seek leave to amend our complaint under these extraordinary circumstances."

lecture method. See casebook method.

leech, vb. See leach.

legacy = a gift by will, esp. of personal property and often of money. Several types of legacies are distinguishable. A specific legacy or bequest is a testamentary gift of property that can be distinguished with reasonable accuracy from the other property forming the testator's estate. A demonstrative legacy is paid from a particular source; but if the source is insufficient to satisfy the legacy, then the legacy is paid from the general assets of the estate to the extent that the specific source is lacking. A general legacy or bequest is a gift of personal property that the testator intends to come from the general assets of the estate.

A residuary legacy or bequest is a gift of the estate remaining after all claims against the estate have been satisfied, and all specific, demonstrative, and general legacies have been paid out. Cf. bequest. See devise.

legal, adj.; lawful; licit. Legal is the broadest term, meaning either (1) "of or pertaining to law, falling within the province of law," or (2) "established, permitted, or not forbidden by law." These two senses are used with about equal frequency.

Lawful and licit share with legal sense (2), "according or not contrary to law, permitted by law." Lawful is quite common—e.g.: "In March 1977, the company posted a notice on the bulletin board that contained a lawful statement on the solicitation and distribution of materials." The least frequently used of these terms is licit <licit acts> <the licit use of force>, which usu. occurs in direct contrast to illicit.

Lawful should not be used in sense (1) of legal, as it sometimes is—e.g.: "The judgment must be affirmed if there is sufficient evidence to support it on any lawful [read legal] theory, and every fact issue sufficiently raised by the evidence must be resolved in support of the judgment." See illegal.

legal, as an attributive noun, means "the legal description of real property" <I have enclosed the legal on the parcel you asked about>. This usage began as surveyors' cant but has gradually infected lawyers' language. See ADJECTIVES (B).

legal assistant. See paralegal (B).

legal beagle. See legal eagle.

legal cause. See CAUSATION (A).

legal centr(al)ism = a doctrine holding that the legal entities erected by the state occupy the center of legal life and stand in a relation of hierarchic control over other, lesser norms that define appropriate behavior and social relationships, such as the family, the corporation, or business networks. The form legal centralism is more usual—e.g.: "This is the defining belief of 'Legal Centralism,' the almost-universally accepted dogma of legal professionals." David Luban, Difference Made Legal: The Court and Dr. King, 87 Mich. L. Rev. 2152, 2184 n.100 (1989)./ "Recently, legal scholars have begun to challenge the fundamental assumption of 'legal centrism' [read 'legal centralism'], which emphasizes the importance of the promulgated law as a behavior-guiding force in society." Lynn A. Baker, Promulgating the Marriage Contract, 23 U. Mich. J.L. Ref. 217, 220 n.20 (1990). As for the variant form legocentrism, see lego-.

legaldegook = legal gobbledygook; the worst manifestations of LEGALESE. Each year beginning in the early 1990s, the Plain-Language Committee of the State Bar of Texas has bestowed its "Legaldegook Awards" to bring attention to what it calls "delightfully atrocious" examples of legal writing.

The adjective legaldegooky originated in the writings of Fred Rodell, who, in his famous essay, wrote: "Else why—once they have won their full professorships, at any rate—do they keep submitting that turgid, legaldegooky garbage to law reviews—for free?" Goodbye to Law Reviews—Revisited, 48 Va. L. Rev. 279, 288 (1962). See GOBBLEDYGOOK.

legal eagle; legal beagle. Linguists call phrases like these "reduplicative"—other more or less common ones being fuddy-duddy, hoity-toity, namby-pamby, nolens volens, and wishy-washy. Both legal beagle and legal eagle are journalists' favorites, and they both seem to be used sometimes with positive connotations, sometimes neutrally, and sometimes with negative connotations. If there is a difference, legal beagle seems more frequently to convey the idea (vaguely) of lawyer-as-lapdog—e.g.: "Fuller, meanwhile, has come off to many as the stereotypical high-paid legal beagle defending a rich celebrity." Jon Saraceno, Attorneys Present Dueling Images, USA Today, 4 Feb. 1992, at 2C.

Legal eagle, an Americanism that is more than twice as common as legal beagle in journalistic AmE, provides writers with a little trick for "enlivening" their prose by avoiding the word lawyer. E.g., "Hillary Clinton, feminist, children's rights activist, legal eagle and betrayed wife, has won

LEGALESE. Ironically, many dictionaries label legalese a "colloquialism." It denotes what is perhaps the least colloquial of all forms of English writing: the complicated language of legal documents. The OED traces legalese—the word, not the thing—back to the second decade of the 20th century, with this example: "He signed his name at the foot of a bald formal agreement, written in the most incomprehensible legalese." C.J.C. Hyne, Firemen Hot 189 (1914).

Though the name for it is fairly new, legalese itself has, throughout the history of Anglo-American law, been a scourge of the profession. Thomas Jefferson railed against statutes "which, from their verbosity, their endless tautologies, their involutions of case within case, and parenthesis within parenthesis, and their multiplied efforts at certainty, by *said*s and *aforesaid*s, by *or*s and *and*s, to make them more plain, are really rendered more perplexed and incomprehensible, not only to common readers, but to the lawyers themselves." 1 The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 65 (Lipscomb ed. 1903).

The same is true, of course, of all types of legal writing, not just statutes or even just DRAFTING. For a humorous epitome of legalese, the following 19th-century example, describing a collision, is without equal:

> The declaration stated, that the plaintiff theretofore, and at the time of the committing of the grievance thereinafter mentioned, to wit, on, etc., was lawfully possessed of a certain donkey, which said donkey of the plaintiff was then lawfully in a certain highway, and the defendant was then possessed of a certain waggon and certain horses drawing the same, which said waggon and horses of the defendant were then under the care, government, and direction of a certain then servant of the defendant, in and along the said highway; nevertheless the defendant, by his said servant, so carelessly, negligently, unskilfully, and improperly governed and directed his said waggon and horses, that by and through the carelessness, negligence, unskilfulness, and improper conduct of the defendant, by his said servant, the said waggon and horses of the defendant then ran and struck with great violence against the said donkey of the plaintiff, and thereby then wounded, crushed, and killed the same, etc.

Even in the 20th century, collisions have sounded much the same in legalese—e.g.: "On information and belief, Defendants Newton and Kautz, immediately prior to operating their vehicles on the aforesaid Route 315, had attended a party sponsored by defendant Roach Incorporated on Powell Road in Powell, Ohio; said Defendants left the party at approximately the same time; said Defendants Newton and Kautz were racing their automobiles pursuant to an agreement reached at said party shortly prior to the aforesaid collision . . . ." Pleading quoted in Baird v. Roach, Inc., 462 N.E.2d 1229, 1231 (Ohio Ct. App. 1983).

Legalese is often highly compressed—e.g.: "The question here is whether service of citation was proper in the face of a writ of error attack on a default judgment." And it flaunts legal ceremony, which arguably has a place in some documents: "In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my seal, this 24th day of June, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and eighty five."

We have enough examples, however, of what not to do. The nauseous (q.v.) effect of the passage from Davies v. Mann, and other passages throughout this work, should purge readers of any attraction to legalese. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS, LEGALISMS AND LAWYERISMS & PLAIN LANGUAGE.

LEGAL FICTIONS. See FICTIONS.

legal fraternity is a traditional phrase that, unfortunately, carries strong associations of maleness—and is therefore unlikely to survive the spreading intolerance toward sexist language. Nonsexist substitutes include legal community, the bar (in AmE), bench and bar, the legal world, and the like. On the unflattering side, Fred Rodell referred to the legal tribe: "Those amendments begin to look more important than the whole original Constitution; and to any of the legal tribe, they are." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 56 (1939; repr. 1980). See SEXISM.

legal fraud. See constructive fraud & fraud (C).

legalism; legality. Legality = strict adherence to law, prescription, or doctrine; the quality of being legal. E.g., "A genuine dispute exists as to the legality of any ownership claim made by the codepositors." Legalism = (1) formalism carried almost to the point of meaninglessness; a disposition to exalt the importance of law or formulated rule in any department of action, (2) a mode of expression characteristic of lawyers. See legalist & legalistic.

LEGALISMS AND LAWYERISMS are the circumlocutions, FORMAL WORDS, and ARCHAISMS that characterize lawyers' speech and writing, esp. in DRAFT-ING. Little can be said by way of advice except that generally lawyers and legislators should try hard to avoid them.

legalist = one who adheres to legalistic thinking. E.g., "Some legalists suggest the literal translation of this statute to mean marital assets may be sold only upon entry of a judgment of divorce." Glatthorn v. Wisniewski, 566 A.2d 242, 244 (N.J. Super. Ct. Ch. Div. 1989).

legalistic is a rather contemptuous term meaning "formalistic; exalting the importance of formulated rules in any department of action." E.g., "In the course of time the inevitable happened, and legalistic elaboration of this form of action pursued its stultifying course, so that a mass of complex law grew up around the writ." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 29 (1961).

The word has taken on such negative connotations that it has been perverted by at least one writer to mean "without any imaginable legal support": "The Trout of the title is a psychopathic storekeeper who guns down a twelve-year-old girl on the strictly legalistic grounds that her foster-brother owes him instalments on a car loan." John Sutherland, Tangling with the Mob, TLS, 21 Feb. 1992, at 32. See legalism.

legalitarian, adj.; legalitarianism, n. The SOED records legalitarianism as having two senses: (1) "advocacy of conformity with the law"; and (2) "legal egalitarianism." Only sense (2)—in which the term is a PORTMANTEAU WORD combining legal and egalitarianism—is really sensible. E.g., "Such a result may be acceptable to a legalitarian . . . ." Travelers Indem. Co. v. Peacock Constr. Co., 423 F.2d 1153, 1160 (5th Cir. 1970) (per Brown, C.J.).

legalize – (1) to make legal; to justify by legal sanction; to authorize; (2) to imbue with the spirit of the law, often making (a thing) legalistic; or (3) to practice as a lawyer. Sense (1) is the common one—e.g.: "[Lithuania's] parliament voted overwhelmingly today to legalize rival political parties." Esther B. Fein, Lithuania Legalizes Rival Parties, Removing Communists' Monopoly, N.Y. Times, 8 Dec. 1989, at 1.

Sense (2) is not so common but still appears—e.g.: "But it is difficult or perhaps impossible for him to avoid a certain distortion of the way in which legalized conceptions and legal institutions operate to distribute power in society . . . ." A.W.B. Simpson, Trouble with the Case, TLS, 14–20 Dec. 1990, at 1344.

Sense (3) is a nonce-use illustrated by a single quotation in the OED: "Jobson still legalizes in Gray's Inn." John R. Leifchild, Cornwall: Its Mines and Miners 244 (1855).

legally sometimes functions as a SENTENCE ADVERB in the sense "from a legal point of view." E.g., "Legally, however, it seems impossible to differentiate between the sexes, except possibly by confining the theory of maim to the fighting sex." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 107 (1957; repr. 1972)./ "Legally he knows that of which he has notice." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 509 (1930).

legal science. "The terms legal science and jurisprudence," writes David M. Walker, "are themselves . . . of very indefinite connotation. The main meanings are probably: all knowledge of and about law; the knowledge of the more theoretical problems of law, as contrasted with knowledge of principles in force; and the systematic analysis and exposition of knowledge of and about law." David M. Walker, The Scottish Jurists 6 n.1 (1985).

The term legal science is rarely encountered in contemporary writing, perhaps because lawyers know that they are not scientists—perhaps not even to the extent that social scientists might be called "scientists." There are "hard sciences"—such as chemistry, physics, biology—and there are "soft sciences"—such as sociology, psychology, and political science. Law is a soft science at best; the better view, though, is that it has little enough in common with any science as to make it illegitimate to call it a "science."

legalspeak is another term for legalese, with connotations perhaps even more negative. It is formed from the fairly new suffix -speak, which came into vogue after George Orwell coined Newspeak and Oldspeak in his apocalyptic book 1984 (1949). Like its forerunners, legalspeak vaguely suggests a conspiracy. E.g., "[T]o use the appropriate legalspeak, there was no 'privity'—no direct contact between Becker and Klein." Geoffrey Smith, Revenge of the Nerds, Forbes, 22 Oct. 1984, at 102./ "In China, legalspeak makes an unflattering distinction between barristers and lawyers by terming barristers 'big lawyers' and solicitors simply 'lawyers.'" Point of Order, Daily Telegraph, 8 Sept. 1990, at 15. See LEGALESE.

legal tender = (1) the money—bills or coins—approved by a state; or (2) a tender (of something) that is legally sufficient.

LEGAL WRITING STYLE. A sound legal style is not so very different from a sound style in any other realm of writing—except perhaps that it is rarer. As legal writers, we begin with several disadvantages:

- We continually resort to lawbooks that overflow with writing contaminated by stylistic infections—but few readers effectively inoculate themselves.
- Built as it is on precedent, Anglo-American law discourages lawyers from writing differently from their predecessors.
- Our law schools generally shunt legal writing off to the periphery of the curriculum, thereby signaling in effect that attainments in writing are of minimal importance.
- The modern practice of law does not tolerate the type of revisory process necessary to produce a polished product—the "well-managed" law firm has more work to do than it can complete in a given span of time.
- As a whole, the profession disdains literary accomplishment within law—it believes in a sharp (and illusory) split between style and substance.
- Even those lawyers who care about writing style are often inured to—and therefore help perpetuate—the worst conventions of legal writing.

How often do legal writers overcome these obstacles? Not often.

Why? Perhaps because mistaken notions of "style" mislead so many talented lawyers. They imitate law reviews. (See LAW REVIEWESE.) For continuing-legal-education programs, they try to write "scholarly" papers jam-packed with discursive footnotes. In client letters, they try to sound "professional" but instead come across as pompous. They learn LEGALESE and forget idiomatic English. They become habituated to their prior tos, their pursuant tos, their hereinafters, their incident theretos, and all their other ballyhoos—and they forget what it is to speak or write directly and simply. They try to be showy instead of being lucid and brief.

Few have written as lucidly and briefly about stylistic excellence in law as Walker Gibson, who delineated the literary contours of legal prose:

> There is no reason why almost any piece of legal writing—and certainly judicial writing—may not move us with its sensitive and wise and gracious handling of language. It is true that the legal writer operates within limiting situations, and he must attend painstakingly to the minutiae of facts that confront him. Yet it is also true that he is engaged in expressing in words the chaos of > life, and no poet can say more. Judicial opinions and poetry are obviously not identical forms of expression; yet, in Frost's memorable phrase about poets, the legal writer too is attempting "a momentary stay against confusion." It is hard to think of a finer thing for a man to do

> A curious humility, or an equally curious arrogance, is apparent in the attitude that legal writers sometimes express toward their performances in language. One hears a lawyer or a judge remark, "Oh, I'm no stylist—I just write down the facts in plain words." This is both humble and arrogant—humble in surrendering elegance to the "creative artists," arrogant in suggesting that only "the facts" really matter. But the situation is surely quite otherwise. The poet or novelist, the historian, the physicist, the appellate judge are all deeply involved in one essential responsibility: the expression of life's complexities in mere man-made words. Wherever he starts, whatever trivial item of human experience he initially confronts, the legal writer can make his stab at eloquence. If Holmes was right, that "a man may live greatly in the law as well as elsewhere," then the consequence is that he must write greatly, for in law as well as in literature there is no other meaning of greatness.
> Walker Gibson, Literary Minds and Judicial Style, 36 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 915, 930 (1961).

Following are works that merit the legal writer's study. These represent the most helpful references available in the specific niches of legal writing.

A. General Legal Writing. Bryan A. Garner, The Elements of Legal Style (1991); Mark Adler, Clarity (1990); Tom Goldstein & Jethro K. Lieberman, The Lawyer's Guide to Writing Well (1989); C. Edward Good, Mightier Than the Sword (1989); Ronald Goldfarb & James C. Raymond, Clear Understandings (1982); Christopher T. Lutz, "Why Can't Lawyers Write?" in Appellate Practice Manual 167 (Priscilla A. Schwab ed. 1992).

B. Brief-Writing. "It should never be forgotten that in a law office you will find three English styles: (1) the style of a contract, a mortgage, a conveyance, etc. [see (C) below]; (2) the style of a pleading; and (3) the style which should characterize briefs. A brief written in the other two styles is a monstrosity." Paxton Blair, "Appellate Briefs and Advocacy," in Advocacy and the King's English 788, 791 (1960). For recommended works to forestall all such monstrosities, see BRIEF-WRITING.

C. Drafting. The style of contracts, rules, and statutes differs dramatically from the style of briefs, judicial opinions, legal memos, and other types of legal writing. The paramount aim of the drafter is to be unmistakable, not interesting.

Some say that "it is even more difficult to write intelligibly about drafting than to draft intelligibly . . . ." Noel Hutton, Mechanics of Law Reform, 24 Mod. L. Rev. 18, 21 (1961). A few writers, however, have succeeded. The following works are useful for the legislative or legal drafter: Barbara Child, Drafting Legal Documents (2d ed. 1992); Reed Dickerson, The Fundamentals of Legal Drafting (2d ed. 1985); Elmer Driedger, The Composition of Legislation (1957). See DRAFTING & STATUTE DRAFTING.

D. Judicial Opinions. Unfortunately, there is a dearth of good writing on this difficult subject. Ruggero Aldisert's Opinion Writing (1990) and B.E. Witkin's Manual on Appellate Court Opinions (1977) both contain much useful information, but they are not widely available. Four articles worth consulting are Walker Gibson, Literary Minds and Judicial Style, 36 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 915 (1961); Glen Leggett, Judicial Writing: An Observation by a Teacher of Writing, 58 Law Lib. J. 114 (1965); George R. Smith, A Primer of Opinion Writing, for Four New Judges, 21 Ark. L. Rev. 197 (1967); and Irving Younger, On Judicial Opinions Considered as One of the Fine Arts, 51 U. Colo. L. Rev. 341 (1980). See OPINIONS, JUDICIAL.

legate, v.t.; legacy, v.t. Both may mean "to give or leave as a legacy; to bequeath a legacy to." Legacy is an ARCHAISM in this verbal sense, and legate is rather rare. Bequeath, q.v., is the usual word.

legatee – one who is named in a will to take personal property; one who has received a legacy or bequest. In strict common-law terminology, a distinction was drawn between a legatee and a devisee, the former receiving personal property and the latter real property. E.g., "A devise or bequest to a child does not lapse by death, but the property so devised or bequeathed shall vest in the surviving child or other descendant of the legatee or devisee, as if such legatee or devisee had survived the testator and had died intestate." But legatee is often loosely used for one to whom a devise is given. See devisee.

Legatary, n., is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

legation. See embassy.

legator, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of testator, is infrequently used. It may occasionally be in meaning "one who bequeaths a legacy," as opposed to one devising real property—but some readers will likely be puzzled. See devise & bequeath.

legible. See illegible.

legislate = (1) (v.i.) to make laws; (2) (v.t.) to bring (something) into or out of existence by making laws; to (attempt to) bring about or control by legislation. Sense (1) is the more common one—e.g.: "Montana is free to legislate with respect to the liability incurred." Miller v. Fallon County, 721 P.2d 342, 347 (Mont. 1986). Sense (2), though, is common enough to be a part of the general language—e.g.: "The critics contend the court far exceeded its authority to interpret the law and instead used Roe to legislate social policy from the bench." The Battle Over Abortion, Newsweek, 1 May 1989, at 29.

A BACK-FORMATION from legislation, the verb to legislate was rarely used before the 19th century. Before that time, laws were said to be not legislated, but enacted or ordained.

legislation = (1) the action of making or giving a positive law in written form, according to some type of formal procedure, by a branch of government constituted to perform this action <legislation is an arduous process>; or (2) what a legislature has enacted; the whole body of enacted laws <the legislation threatens the university's independence>. For a REDUNDANCY involving this term, see statutory legislation.

legislational is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of legislative. E.g., Arthur Lenhoff, Extra-Legislational [read Extra-Legislative] Process of Law, 28 Neb. L. Rev. 542 (1949). See legislative.

legislative; legislatorial. The first corresponds to legislation, the second (in good usage) to legislator, q.v. See legislatorial.

legislative facts; adjudicative facts. The difference between these phrases is "the cardinal distinction [that], more than any other, governs the use of extra-record facts by courts and agencies." Kenneth C. Davis, Administrative Law Text § 15.03, at 296 (3d ed. 1972). Legislative facts, which are ordinarily general and do not concern the immediate parties, are facts that "help the tribunal to exercise its judgment or discretion in determining what course of action to take"; they are implicated "whenever a tribunal engages in the creation of law or of policy." Id. They are, for example, the kinds of facts that are used in a Brandeis brief, q.v.

Adjudicative facts are those found by a court or agency "concerning the immediate parties—who did what, where, when, how, and with what motive or intent." Id. In finding adjudicative facts, then, the court or agency performs an adjudicative function.

legislative veto (AmE) = a practice that, originating in the 1930s and valid until held unconstitutional in 1983, allowed Congress to block a federal executive or agency action within a specified time (usu. 60 or 90 working days) without presidential approval. E.g., "Short, dark-haired, and tending toward stockiness, this pipe-puffing, feisty constitutional expert [Antonin Scalia] had no doubts in his mind about the legislative veto's unconstitutionality, and no hesitancy in speaking his mind to anyone who would listen." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 53 (1988) (which tells the story behind INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), the case holding the legislative veto unconstitutional).

legislatorial = (1) of or pertaining to a legislator; or (2) of or pertaining to legislation. In sense (2), the word is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of legislative. In sense (1), however, the term is useful—e.g.: "An examination of the act impresses that there was legislatorial doubt in its enactment." Hume-Sinclair Coal Mining Co. v. Nee, 12 F. Supp. 801, 805 (W.D. Mo. 1935). See legislative.

legist = one learned or skilled in the law; a lawyer; a jurist. This word is underused—it appears in only a few modern cases. E.g., "[N]o legist meriting deference has noticeably recorded the opinion that a witness could be adjudged in contempt of court for the failure to comply with the terms of a mere summons in such circumstances." In re Roberts, 30 A.2d 900, 902 (N.J. Ch. 1943)./ "[C]ertain 'proceedings' were had out of the hearing of the jury panel, in the course of which the Cooperative's legists reverted in this wise to the above-quoted statement by opposing counsel . . . ." M & A Elec. Power Coop. v. True, 480 S.W.2d 310, 313 (Mo. Ct. App. 1972).

legitimacy; legitimation; legitimization; legitimatization. Legitimacy = the fact of being legitimate. Legitimation is the best word for the sense (1) "the action or process of rendering or authoritatively declaring (a person) legitimate" (OED); or (2) "the action of making lawful; authorization" (id.). E.g., "An illegitimate child may be legitimated by the marriage of his parents, although several states require, in addition, an acknowledgment by the father. A few states have judicial procedures for legitimation." Legitimization and legitimatization are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

legitimate, v.t.; legitimize; legitimatize. The first is preferred in all senses and is by far the most common of the three forms. E.g., "[T]his end is undoubtedly better answered by legitimating all issue born after wedlock, than by legitimating issue of the same parties, even born before wedlock, so as wedlock afterwards ensues . . . ." 1

William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 443 (1765)./ "This fact suggests implicit recognition of the value of the larger body as a means of legitimating society's decision to impose the death penalty."

Legitimize and legitimatize are both NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Though formed incorrectly, the former is much more common than the latter. See -IZE.

legitimation; legitimization. See legitimacy.

legitim(e). This civil-law term, meaning "the part of a decedent's estate to which his or her issue are entitled as a legal right," is usu. spelled legitim in Scotland and legitime in Louisiana. E.g., "There is no case for imputation of advances where only one of several children claims legitim." 4 David M. Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law 127 (3d ed. 1983)./ "[A] testator may not by testamentary dispositions infringe on the legitime of his forced heirs." A.N. Yiannopoulos, Of Legal Usufruct, the Surviving Spouse, and Article 890 of the Louisiana Civil Code, 49 La. L. Rev. 803, 803 (1989). Other terms for legitime are legal portion and forced portion.

LEGO-, as a prefix meaning "legal," has no etymological warrant. It occurs most frequently (and perhaps occurred originally) in legocentrism—a word coined on the analogy of ethnocentrism. The following quotation makes its sense apparent: "Lawyers and judges tend to develop a form of tunnel vision which causes them to view the litigation process as if it were the most vital part of our society. We must avoid such 'legocentrism.'" Gregory Gelfand, "Taking" Informational Property Through Discovery, 66 Wash. U.L.Q. 703, 727 (1988). The corresponding adjective, also a NEOLOGISM, is legocentric—e.g.: "Gold has a 'legocentric' view of people." J. Alexander Tanford & Sarah Tanford, Better Trials Through Science, 66 N.C. L. Rev. 741, 746 (1988). See legal centr(al)ism.

lemon law. The word lemon, in the sense "something bad or undesirable," originated as an Americanism in the early 20th century. In AmE, the word has increasingly been specialized to refer to cars with persistent problems. Hence, a lemon law is a statute designed to protect consumers who buy substandard cars. In 1992, 45 of the 50 U.S. states had lemon laws in effect.

BrE was quick to adopt lemon but has not narrowed the term, as AmE has. So lemon law has a broader sense, referring to faulty consumer goods of any kind—e.g.: "The attempt by Mr Martyn Jones, Labour MP for Clwyd South-West, to introduce a 'lemon law' to protect consumers buying faulty items has all-party support at Westminster . . . ." Julia Langdon, Consumers' Minister May Try to Squash Lemon Bill, Sunday Telegraph, 21 Jan. 1990, at 4.

lend-lease; lease-lend. Both phrases refer to either (1) "an arrangement made in 1941, under the Lend-Lease Act, whereby sites in British overseas possessions were leased to the United States as bases in exchange for the loan of U.S. destroyers"; or, by extension, (2) "a cooperative arrangement made between friendly entities." The phrase lend-lease, which comes directly from the statute, is more common—so it would not be amiss to label lease-lend a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

leniency; lenience. The first form is preferred.

leonine contract is another term for adhesion contract. In Roman law, a leonina societas was a partnership in which one party took all the profits and the other all the losses. Cf. the Spanish term contrato leonino.

lept for leapt or leaped is a mistaken past-tense form. E.g., "John J. Sirica lept [read leapt] to his feet, shouting, 'It ain't fair. It ain't fair!'" Sirica, 88, Dies; Persistent Judge in Fall of Nixon, N.Y. Times, 15 Aug. 1992, at 1, 11./ "McGensey who by then had reached the top of the wall lept [read leapt] down on Rivera." Gates v. Rivera, 993 F.2d 697, 698 (9th Cir. 1993).

lese majesty; lèse majesty; leze majesty; lèse-majesté; laesae majestas; laesae majestatis. The preferred form of this originally civil-law term—meaning "a crime against the state, esp. against the ruler" or "an attack on a custom or traditional belief"—is the anglicized lese majesty. The variant spellings should be avoided. In BrE, the phrase tends to be hyphenated; in AmE it usually is not.

In spelling the full LATINISM naming the crime, however, the phrase is spelled crimen laesae majestatis—e.g.: "Counterfeiting has usually been classified as an offense affecting the administration of governmental functions, which unquestionably it is, having been considered crimen laesae majestatis and punished as treason at one time in England." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 432 (3d ed. 1982). Laesae majestas is a hybrid: half LAW LATIN and half LAW FRENCH.

less. A. And fewer. Less applies to mass nouns <less tonic water, please> or units of measure <less than six ounces of epoxy>. Fewer applies to COUNT NOUNS <fewer than ten guests arrived> or numbers of things <fewer than six limes are left>.

The only exception in using fewer occurs when count nouns are so great as to render the idea of individual increments meaningless. E.g., "A District Court has concurrent jurisdiction under the Tucker Act over suits for fewer [read less] than $10,000." Here, because the dollars are taken not individually but collectively as an amount, less is appropriate. Hence we say less discovery but fewer depositions; less testimony but fewer witnesses; less documentation but fewer documents; less argumentation but fewer arguments; less whispering but fewer sidebars (q.v.); less ambiguity but fewer ambiguities; less of a burden but fewer burdens; less material but fewer items; less fattening but fewer calories.

Less is used correctly with time—e.g.: "More than three but less than six years after the completion of the cleanup operations, the United States instituted civil actions to recover its cleanup costs."/ "The Supreme Court denied certiorari, and Milton's execution was scheduled again, for June 25, 1985, fewer [read less] than two hours from this writing." In the sentence just quoted, not only is fewer used incorrectly with a period of time but also with the number two, which is illogical. (One hesitates to fault the style of a judge who works under such exigencies.) But if the units of time are countable as whole and rather fractional units, then fewer is called for—e.g.: "The time must be not less [read fewer] than fourteen nor more than twenty-one days after the receipt of the warrant . . . ." H.C. Richards & J.P.H. Soper, The Law and Practice of Compensation 143 (n.d. [1898]).

Less for fewer is an all-too-frequent error: "From 1970 to 1975, the number of pending criminal cases increased from 20,910 to 22,411, a caseload difference of less [read fewer] than four cases per authorized judgeship."/ "Further, this rule also provides that if three or less [read fewer] jurors become disabled or otherwise unable to serve, the remaining jurors may render a verdict."/ "The principal felt that this particular pupil might create less [read fewer] problems if he remained in the main school building."/ "What the juvenile court system needs is not more but less [read fewer] of the trappings of legal procedure and formalism."/ "Over the years, membership in the organization decreased until in 1941 there were less [read fewer] than 100 members; at the time of this action there were approximately 58 members still living."

Less power but fewer powers: hence the adjective should be fewer here: "The move from the Articles of Confederation to the Constitution was a shift from a central government with less [read fewer] powers to one with more powers." See fewer.

B. And lesser. Lesser is an exact synonym of less, but is confined to use as an adjective before a noun and following an article <the lesser crime>, thus performing a function no longer idiomatically possible with less. Dating from the 13th century, this formal usage allows lesser to act as an antonym of greater, as here: "The lesser punishments are just as fit for the lesser crimes as the greater for the greater." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 46 (1881; repr. 1916)./ "His thought and his memories pervade the whole with greater or lesser distinction."

Perhaps because of its decreasing use, lesser was, esp. in the early and mid-20th century, mistakenly supplanted by less, which is awkward when used attributively: "Riot, rout, and unlawful assembly are kindred offenses and greater includes the less [read lesser]." Commonwealth v. Duitch, 67 A.2d 821, 822 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1949) (quoting 54 C.J., Riot, at 829)./ "The effect of the creation of a less [read lesser] estate is to deprive the owner of the fee simple estate of the right of immediate possession . . . ." 1 Herbert T. Tiffany, The Law of Real Property § 23, at 31 (3d ed., B. Jones ed., 1939).

The opposite offense against idiom also occurs: "The constitutional rights of minors do not receive lesser [read less] protection than the rights of adults." The OED states that the construction lesser than is obsolete.

Should lesser (when properly used) seem stilted, one might use smaller or, depending on the context, lower. Often smaller seems more natural. E.g., "The defendant in such a case would have to pay a much lesser [read smaller] amount."/ "A lease is a conveyance, usually in consideration of rent or other recompense, for life, years, or at will, but always for a less [read lesser, or—because lessor appears later in the sentence—shorter] time than lessor has in the premises."

Less is sometimes used in the sense "of lesser seriousness." E.g., "He was convicted of three felonies less than capital." Lesser is commonly used in the phrase from American criminal law, lesser included offense: "We also have serious doubts about whether the offense to which Garrett pleaded guilty in Washington was a lesser included offense within the continuing criminal enterprise charge."

lesseeship = the condition or position of a lessee (tenant). E.g., "The defendants argue in the alternative to their theory of co-lesseeship that they may assert a violation of their Fourth Amendment rights . . . ." U.S. v. Potter, 419 F. Supp. 1151, 1154 (N.D. Ill. 1976)./ "[T]here must be an ownership or a lesseeship in mail stages . . . ." Great Lakes Stages, Inc. v. Laing, 174 N.E. 784, 786 (Ohio Ct. App. 1930).

lesser included offense = a less serious crime than the one charged, but one that an accused necessarily committed in carrying out the more serious crime. E.g., "Joyriding is a lesser-included offense of theft of a motor vehicle." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 334 n.97 (3d ed. 1982). As in the preceding quotation, the phrase is often rendered lesser-included offense, but it is best not hyphenated because it is not, strictly speaking, a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE.

lessor; lessee. Landlord and tenant are simpler equivalents that are more comprehensible to most nonlawyers. And they do not run the risk of typographical errors reversing the suffixes.

lest is best followed by a SUBJUNCTIVE. E.g., "[S]trict scrutiny of the classification which a State makes in a sterilization law is essential, lest unwittingly, or otherwise, invidious discriminations are [read be] made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guaranty of just and equal laws." Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942) (per Douglas, J.)./ "The court should not instruct the jury to weigh carefully the evidence of insanity, lest an ingenious counterfeit of the disease furnish protection to guilt."

let (= hindrance or obstacle) is used in the legal doublet without let or hindrance. This meaning of let is archaic except in law, poetry, and tennis (let ball = net ball). The word differs in origin from the verb let (= to permit, allow, rent), though both terms appeared in Old English. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

Nonlawyers have sometimes misunderstood the meaning of let in the phrase without let or hindrance, as if let were an antonym rather than a synonym of hindrance. Thus Theodore Dreiser wrote of something descending on somebody "without his let or hindrance," confusing the lay with the legal meaning of let.

let, v.t. See lease.

lethal (= deadly, mortal) is generally used of poisons and medicines in nonlegal usage, but in legal usage still appears in the older sense relating to weapons and wounds as well: "We cannot condone lethal use of force as a first measure taken by police." Unlike fatal, q.v., which can be both literal and figurative, lethal is ordinarily confined to literal senses.

letter de cachet. See lettre de cachet.

letter of attorney. See power of attorney.

letter of the law, the. This metaphor, referring to the strict literal meaning of the law, is opposed to the spirit of the law. E.g., "Equity was based upon the idea of natural justice, as opposed to the strict letter of the law." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 2 (13th ed. rev. P.W. French 1950). See spirit.

letters of credence = the papers appointing a foreign diplomatic agent, who presents them to the head of government to which he or she is accredited. E.g., "[T]he United States Government is prepared to proceed with the issuance of appropriate letters of credence accrediting the United States Ambassador in Belgrade to the new Yugoslav regime." Artukovic v. Boyle, 107 F. Supp. 11, 34 n.5 (S.D. Cal. 1952) (quoting an official letter).

letters of marque = licenses to engage in reprisal against citizens or vessels of another nation. E.g., "[F]ormerly it was not uncommon for a state to issue 'letters of marque' to one of its own subjects, who had met with a denial of justice in another state, authorizing him to redress the wrong for himself by forcible action, such as the seizure of the property of subjects of the delinquent state." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 321 (5th ed. 1955)./ "Private maritime wars were legalized by letters of marque, allowing a merchant whose ship had been plundered to become a privateer and take revenge and compensation from other ships of the offender's nation." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 306 (1966). The wordy phrase letters of marque and reprisal, is traditional and appears, for example, in the U.S. Constitution; nevertheless, it should be avoided.

letters patent. Historically, this phrase, plural in form but singular in sense, denoted an open letter, under governmental seal, granting some right or privilege. E.g., "In the middle ages all local government was carried on by authority of the king's writs of commission (letters-patent)." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 72 (1966). The phrase was used in opposition to letters secret (= governmental documents closed and sealed, and hence not available for general perusal).

In modern law, the phrase letters patent has taken on a specialized sense, referring to a governmental grant of the exclusive right to use an invention or design. See patent.

letters rogatory; letter(s) of request. Both terms are used in the sense "a request issued to a foreign court requesting a judge to take evidence from a specific person within that court's jurisdiction." Letters rogatory has traditionally been the usual term, but it is slowly disappearing: in 1993, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were amended to replace the phrase with letter of request. Either letter of request or rogatory letter is used in G.B. Americans use the plural letters for the single request, whereas the British use the singular letter.

Historically, letters of request had a completely different meaning: "a documentary request sent by the judge of one ecclesiastical court to another, esp. to desire that a case may be withdrawn from his own jurisdiction to that of a superior court" (OED).

letters testamentary = the instrument by which a probate court approves the appointment of an executor under a will and authorizes that executor to administer the estate. In this phrase, testamentary acts as a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE.

lettre de cachet;* letter de cachet. The partial anglicization (-er) serves no purpose; for this French borrowing, lettre de cachet is the preferred spelling. The phrase denotes a warrant issued for the imprisonment of a person without trial. E.g., "The main thrust [of the Fourth Amendment] was directed at the invasion of privacy through general warrants of assistance and lettres de cachet." Ford v. U.S., 352 F.2d 927, 932 (D.C. Cir. 1965)./ "The tendency of fourth amendment orthodoxy to focus on citizen autonomy can undoubtedly be attributed to the Framers' fear of arbitrary and unrestrained state incursions on individuals' liberty and property interests. This fear was rooted in early experiences with England's infamous general warrants and writs of assistance and France's lettres de cachet, all of which permitted assertions of police power that were unaccountable to magistrate or judge." Developments in the Law—Race and the Criminal Process, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1472, 1500 n.26 (1988).

leverage, v.t. = (1) to provide (a borower or investor) with credit or funds to improve the ability to speculate and to achieve a high rate of return; or (2) to supplement (available capital) with credit or outside funds. This verb is a mid-20th-century Americanism  The term has definite meaning, but nevertheless may be characterized as a term used primarily by financial jargonmongers. See JARGON (B).

leviable = (1) that may be levied <leviable tax>; or (2) that may be levied upon; capable of being seized in execution. <The sheriff found no leviable assets>. Sense (2) is an AmE legalism.

levy; levee. Levy is usually a verb meaning (1) "to impose (as a fine or a tax) by legal sanction" <the court levied a fine of $500>; (2) "to conscript for service in the military" <the troops were soon levied>; (3) "to wage (a war)" <the rebels then levied war against the government>; or (4) to take or seize (property) in execution of a judgment—usually with the preposition on <the judgment creditor may levy on the debtor's assets>.

Levy may act also as a noun, however, in two senses: (1) "the imposition of a fine or tax, or the fine or tax so imposed"; and (2) "the conscription of men for military service, or the troops so conscripted."

Levee, meanwhile, is the noun meaning "a river embankment; dike; pier." In G.B. primarily, it also has the sense "a formal reception." Occasionally levee is used as a verb, meaning "to provide with a levee (dike)."

lex. A. Senses. Lex = (1) in Roman law, a legislative bill; (2) a collection of uncodified laws within a jurisdiction; (3) a system or body of laws, written or unwritten, that are peculiar to a jurisdiction or to a field of human activity; or (4) positive law, as opposed to natural law. Some scholars argue that senses (1) and (4) are the correct ones—e.g.: "The positive law formulated and fixed by a legislative body is called lex, loi, Gesetz; the general unwritten law is called ius, droit, Recht." 1 Joseph H. Beale, A Treatise on the Conflict of Laws 23 (1935).

The plural form of lex is leges.

B. Anglicizing Phrases Beginning with lex. The field known as conflict of laws (q.v.) was once rife with phrases—and a few maxims—beginning with the word lex. Several of them are discussed in the entries that follow; many are unnecessary LATINISMS that some scholars manage to avoid. For example, Ehrenzweig prefers to anglicize the phrases—e.g.: "Once both the place-of-contracting [i.e., lex loci contractus] and the place-of-performance [i.e., lex loci solutionis] rules had been found unsatisfactory, some courts returned to the law expressly or impliedly intended by the parties, as an alternative or even as an exclusive solution." Albert A. Ehrenzweig, A Treatise on the Conflict of Laws 462 (1962). More American scholars than British scholars now make the phrases English; more on both sides of the Atlantic ought to try.

C. A Redundancy: law of the lex. To write the law of the lex . . . is redundant and nonsensical—e.g.: "[T]he Court of Appeals has differed in determining whether the right to bring an action is of a substantive nature requiring the application of the law of the lex loci [read lex loci] or a remedy requiring the application of the law of the forum." Reale v. Herco, Inc., as reported in the New York L.J., 13 Sept. 1990, at 21.

lex actus; lex loci actus. The phrase, which means "the law of the place where a document is executed," seems to be a NEEDLESS VARIANT of lex loci contractus or lex loci celebrationis. The phrase is most often written lex actus /leks-ak-təs/—which is merely a shortened LAW LATIN form of the full phrase lex loci actus /leks-loh-sɪ-ak-təs/. Graveson has it both ways: "The strength of this presumption in favour of the lex actus was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 414 (7th ed. 1974)./ "[C]apacity is governed hy the lex loci actus." Id. at 402.

lex domicilii /leks-dah-mə-sil-ee-ɪ/ = (1) the law of the country in which a person is domiciled; or (2) the determination of a person's rights by establishing where, in law, he or she is domiciled. E.g., "It is . . . in all cases the lex domicilii which should determine the right of succession." John Anderson Foote, Private International Jurisprudence 253 (Coleman Phillipson ed., 4th ed. 1914).

lex fori /leks-fohr-ɪ/ = the law of the forum. E.g., "[T]he lex fori (the law of the court) governs the procedure and remedies to be applied . . . ." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 493 (1962)./ "The requirement of writing is classified as a rule of evidence and must therefore traditionally be governed by the lex fori of any proceedings." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 533 (7th ed. 1974).

Lex fori is sometimes Englished forum law: "In conflicts cases concerning the validity of contracts, Professor Ehrenzweig would displace the basic rule pointing to forum law [i.e., the law of a particular forum] with the lex validitatis."

lex loci /leks-loh-sɪ/ = (1) the law of the place; local law; or (2) the law of the place where a contract was executed (as a shorthand form of lex loci contractus). Sense (2) is increasingly conventional but potentially confusing to nonspecialists because any number of phrases—many more than the six listed here—begin with the words lex loci. See lex loci contractus.

lex loci celebrationis /leks-loh-sɪ-sel-ə-bray-shee-oh-nəs/ = the law of the place where a legal ceremony, such as a marriage or execution of a contract, was performed. E.g., "Thus parental consent is classified as a formality, not because it is a formality or bears any resemblance to part of the ceremony of marriage, but because the courts have decided that it should be governed by the lex loci celebrationis." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 251 (7th ed. 1974). See lex loci contractus.

lex loci contractus /leks-loh-sɪ-kən-trak-təs/ = the law of the place where the contract was executed—often the proper law by which to decide contractual disputes. E.g., "[T]he lex loci contractus (the law of the place where the contract was made) governs the interpretation of a contract." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 493 (1962)./ "The stipulations were valid by the lex loci contractus, but invalid by the law of the forum." Herbert F. Goodrich, Handbook of the Conflict of Laws § 110, at 215 (Eugene F. Scoles ed., 4th ed. 1964). Though it is confusing, given the number of phrases that begin with lex loci, this phrase is often shortened just to those two words. See lex loci.

Literally, the phrase means "the law of the place of the contract"—as opposed to "where the contract was made"—and this literal meaning can give rise to an ambiguity: "The lex loci contractus has always been an ambiguous term, which jurists have interpreted either as the lex loci celebrationis or solutionis, the law of the place where the contract was entered into, or of that where it was to be performed, according to the tendency of their peculiar views." John A. Foote, Private International Jurisprudence 337 (Coleman Phillipson ed., 4th ed. 1914). In practice, however, modern courts and scholars invariably use the term to refer to the law of the place where the contract is executed, not performed.

lex (loci) delicti; lex loci delictus. A. Latin vs. English Form. The best Latin form, lex loci delicti (= the law of the place where the tort was committed) is shortened from lex loci delicti commissi. The form delicti is ten times more common than delictus in modern American caselaw. E.g., "The traditional rule of lex loci delicti requires the application of the tort law of the jurisdiction where the injury occurred." International Paper Co. v. Ouellette, 479 U.S. 481, 502 n.1 (1987)./ "A number of American states still follow lex loci delicti in their most recent decisions, though the number of such states decreases every year." Robert A. Leflar, American Conflicts Law § 132, at 267 (1977).

But the best Latin form is the second-best form: Ehrenzweig's anglicized phrase, place-of-wrong rule or place-of-wrong law, seems the most sensible of the available options.

B. Pronunciation. The phrase lex loci delicti is pronounced /leks-loh-sI-dee-lik-tI/. See PRONUNCIATION (C)

C. Mistaken Forms. Perhaps the best argument against the Latin is that English-speaking lawyers—and Americans especially—cannot seem to get the Latin right. The form lex loci delictus, for example, mangles the Latin on the mistaken analogy of lex loci contractus—but the noun delictus forms its genitive differently from contractus: Being a masculine noun of the fourth declension, contractus stays the same in the genitive (contractus); delictus, meanwhile, is a neuter noun of the second declension, forming delicti in the genitive. But legal writers occasionally fall into error. E.g., "We note that Utah also followed the rule of lex loci delictus [read lex loci delicti] regarding torts." Mountain Fuel Supply v. Reliance Ins. Co., 933 F.2d 882, 888 (10th Cir. 1991).

The phrase is also sometimes mistakenly rendered lex loci delecti—e.g.: "At one time Arkansas courts followed the traditional approach of the First Restatement, termed lex loci delecti [read delicti] (law of the place of injury)." Carmen L. Arick, Note, Conflict of Laws—Multistate Torts, 10 U. Ark. Little Rock L.J. 511, 516 (1987–1988) (repeatedly using the wrong spelling). Cf. corpus delicti. See delecti.

Another occasional mistake is to write lex loci delictu—e.g.: "[T]he cases have read in the forum or lex loci delictu [read lex loci delicti] limitation provisions." Amdur v. Lizars, 39 F.R.D. 29, 36 n.12 (D. Md. 1965).

lex loci rei sitae /leks-loh-sI-ree-I-sI-dI/ = the law of the place where a thing is situated. This phrase is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of lex situs. E.g., "[H]e is before the Court as a party to the suit not warranting any interference as to the foreign real estate, with the lex loci rei sitæ [read lex situs]." John A. Foote, Private International Jurisprudence 208 (Coleman Phillipson ed., 4th ed. 1914). See lex situs.

lex loci solutionis /leks-loh-sI-sə-loo-shee-oh-nəs/ = the law of the place where a contract is performed. E.g., "[I]f a contract made in one country is to be wholly or partly performed in another, it is presumed that the parties intended the mode of performance to be governed by the law of the country of performance (lex loci solutionis)." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 87 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950)./ "The courts will give effect to the exchange control regulations of the proper law of the contract and of the lex loci solutionis." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 179 (7th ed. 1974).

lex mercatoria; lex mercatorum. The first phrase means "the law merchant"—and the phrase law merchant (q.v.), a TERM OF ART, ought to replace it in modern writing. The second phrase means "the law of merchants," which means something slightly different from law merchant. Both phrases ought to be anglicized.

lex monetae = the law of the country whose money is at issue. E.g., "In such cases the meaning of units of that currency, e.g. pounds or francs, is determined by reference to the law of the country whose money is in question, sometimes called the lex monetae." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 433 (7th ed. 1974).

lex naturae. See natural law.

lex patriae. See personal law.

lex situs /leks-sI-dəs/ = the law of the place where property is located. The phrase is modern LAW LATIN, not classical Latin. E.g., "[W]ith regard to contracts concerning land it is governed by the proper law of the contract, usually the law of the country in which the land is situated (lex situs)." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 87 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950)./ "The essential validity is governed by the proper law of the transaction, subject in the case of immovables to any overriding provision of the lex situs." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 356 (7th ed. 1974).

lex talionis /leks-tal-ee-oh-nəs/ = the law of retaliation—the retributive theory of punishment—based on the Mosaic principle of "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." E.g., "We are content to stand upon ground higher than the common urge of outraged reprisal which revives the lex talionis, demanding a life for a life." Musselwhite v. State, 60 So. 2d 807, 811 (Miss. 1952)./ "The 'lex talionis of Moses' was literally an 'eye for eye, a leg for a leg.'" Armstrong v. State, 444 A.2d 1049, 1052 n.8 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1982) (citation omitted).

lex terrae. See law of the land.

leze majesty. See lese majesty.

liability. See disability (A). liability without fault. See strict liability.

liable (= subject to or exposed to) should not be used merely for likely (= expected; probably) or apt (= inclined toward; fit). Liable best refers to something the occurrence of which risks being permanent or recurrent. E.g., "If the act is one that the party ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have anticipated [read foreseen] was liable [read likely] to result in injury to others, then he is liable for any injury proximately resulting from it."/ "The parties are competitors in this field; and when the rights or privileges of the one are liable to conflict with those of the other, each party is under a duty so to conduct its own business as not unnecessarily or unfairly to injure that of the other." The idea of recurrence is far more salient in the second than in the first sentence just quoted. Cf. apt.

Liable may also mean "responsible; subject to liability." In this sense, the word is usually confined to civil contexts in AmE, but in BrE it is used in criminal as well as civil contexts—e.g.: "She does not become liable merely by assisting her husband to escape punishment for a crime which she knows him to have committed . . . ." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 49 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984)./ "The trial court concluded that the appellant's conduct made him a socius criminis in the crime and, as such, that he was liable as a principal." (Eng.)

liable, continue. See continue liable.

liaise, v.i., is a BACK-FORMATION from liaison, meaning "to establish liaison" or "to act as a liaison officer" <diplomats who liaise with Japanese officials>. First used in the 1920s, this word is still stigmatized as being cant or JARGON. It is pronounced /lee-ayz/.

liaison is pronounced either /lee-ə-zən/ or /lee-ay-zən/, the latter being more common in both AmE and BrE. The nontechnical senses of the word are (1) (n.) "an illicit love affair"; (2) (n.) "communication established for the promotion of mutual understanding; one who establishes such communication"; and (3) (adj.) "acting as an intermediary" <liaison officer>.

libel; slander. The former is written defamation, the latter oral defamation. In English, the distinction emerged in the 1600s, before which time both words applied to what was either written or spoken. Perhaps the 17th-century legists were following the distinction observed in Roman law between famosus libellus (libel) and injuria verbalis (slander). As Gowers points out, the modern distinction is not well fixed in lay minds.

> In popular usage [the terms] are synonymous, meaning a deliberate, untrue, derogatory statement, usually about a person, whether made in writing or orally. In legal usage there are important differences. Each is an untrue and defamatory imputation made by one person about another which, if 'published' (i.e. communicated to a third person), can be a ground for a civil action in damages. Such an imputation is a libel if made in permanent form (writing, pictures, etc.) or by broadcasting. It is a slander if made in fugitive form (e.g. by speaking or gestures). A further distinction is that an action for slander cannot ordinarily succeed without proof that actual damage has been caused; in an action for libel this is unnecessary. In both cases proof that the allegation was true is a good defence.
> MEU2 at 333.

Here libel is misused for slander: "According to the complaint, the libel [read slander] was uttered in the presence of only one person." (See defamation.) Verbal slander is a common REDUNDANCY. See verbal.

Libel has the additional sense in admiralty "the complaint or initial pleading in an admiralty or ecclesiastical case." The word is used also as a verb in this context—e.g.: "And so, in our own admiralty law, if a ship does you any injury, you 'libel' or attach, and actually sue, the ship." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 16 (1962). Hence libelant, for which see libel(l)ant.

libel(l)ant = an injured sailor. E.g., "The libelants recovered in both Courts below." Robins Dry Rock & Repair Co. v. Flint, 275 U.S. 303, 307 (1927). One -l- is preferred in AmE, two in BrE. (See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.) The accent of libelant is on the first syllable.

Historically libelant has been an admiralty term as just defined, but the word has come to mean additionally "one who publishes a defamatory statement; a libeler." Libeler (in BrE libeller) is the older and better term for this sense, for it forestalls confusion about what the cause of action is.

libel(l)ee (= one against whom a libel has been filed) is correlative not with libeler, but with libellant. The word is spelled libelee in AmE, libellee in BrE. See -EE.

libel(l)er. See libel(l)ant.

libel(l)ous (= defamatory, constituting libel) is spelled -l- in AmE, -ll- in BrE. E.g., "The question is whether a writing published by A of B is libellous or not." (Eng.) See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

liberty; freedom. These synonyms have connotative distinctions. Freedom is the broader, all-encompassing term that carries strong positive connotations. Liberty, slightly less emotive, generally suggests the past removal of restraints on specific freedoms.

Pound explained the distinction between Kantian liberty and constitutional liberty as guaranteed in the Bill of Rights:

> Kant's idea of the liberty of each—the free self-assertion of each—limited only by the like liberty of all, was generally accepted. Liberty was a condition in which free exercise of the will was restrained only so far as necessary to secure a harmonious coexistence of the free will of each and the free will of all others. But I am not speaking of the Kantian idea of liberty, in which my generation was brought up. Whatever "liberty" may mean today, the liberty guaranteed by our bills of rights is a reservation to the individual of certain fundamental reasonable expectations involved in life in civilized society and a freedom from arbitrary and unreasonable exercise of the power and authority of those who are designated or chosen in a politically organized society to adjust relations and order conduct, and so are able to apply the force of that society to individuals.

license. A. And licence. The AmE spelling of the noun and the verb is license; that is the BrE spelling of the verb, but licence is the BrE spelling of the noun.

B. And easement. An easement (q.v.) is a right of property; a license is a revocable permission to commit some act that would otherwise be unlawful. An easement is usu. created by a written document; a license is often created orally. An easement is more or less permanent; a license is temporary. An easement cannot be revoked; a license is revocable.

licensee = (1) one to whom a license is granted; or (2) one who enters an occupier's property not for business purposes but with the occupier's permission.

licenser; licensor. The former spelling is preferred.

licentiate (= one who has obtained a license or authoritative permission to exercise some function) is sometimes used of lawyers. E.g., "In the U.S. a licentiate in law is admitted to practice as an 'attorney and counselor,' a combination of names and functions unknown to the English law." (Eng.)/ "When the conduct of the licentiate clearly shows, either that the court was deceived at the time of his admission, or that there has been a moral degeneracy since that time, a proper case for discipline may be presented."

licit. See legal, adj.

lie (= to have foundation in the law; to be legally supportable, sustainable, or proper) is a peculiar legal idiom. E.g., "A writ of certiorari does not lie to review the proceedings of a board the function of which is to ascertain the competency of militia officers."/ "An action will lie for interference with enforceable contractual rights if there is no sufficient justification for the interference."/ "If review is available by appeal, mandamus will not lie."/ "As a general rule, replevin will not lie for an undivided share in a larger mass."

Lie is used additionally in law in the figurative sense "to reside, exist." E.g., "Final appeal lay to the House of Lords." (Eng.) Cf. sound.

For the difference between lie and lay, see lay.

lie low; lay low. The latter phrase is incorrect. E.g., "Another reason I laid low [read lay low] was to be in a position to help a friend back out of what he now must know to be a dead end." William Safire, Buchanan's Campaign, N.Y. Times, 16 Dec. 1991, at A15. See lay.

lien, n., (= a legal right or interest that a creditor has in another's property, lasting usu. until a debt that it secures is satisfied) is pronounced, most properly, /lee-ən/ or /lin/; and commonly, but less properly, /leen/. In G.B., it is customary for the lienholder to retain possession of the property on which the lien has been obtained, whereas in the U.S. it is more usual that a lien does not involve retention by the lienholder. In the U.S., when the creditor possesses the collateral, pledge is the more usual term. See liens and encumbrances.

lien, v.t., a 19th-century innovation, is increasingly common, though it is not yet listed in most dictionaries. E.g., "In addition, the Northcutts allege that the Hancocks wrongfully lienedd the property." Hancock v. Northcutt, 808 P.2d 251, 253 (Alaska 1991).

Liened = burdened with a lien. E.g., "The proceeds of the water power are liened for the discharge of the canal debt by the act of 1825." McArthur v. Kelly, 5 Ohio 140, 152 (1831)./ "[S]ome courts have held liened penalty claims allowable . . . ." Simonson v. Granquist, 369 U.S. 38, 42 (1962).

lienable = capable of being subjected to a lien. E.g., "Certain kinds of labor and materials are not lienable." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 203 (1946; repr. 1950). This 20th-century Americanism is not listed in the OED; it appears in W3, but not in its predecessor, W2.

liened, adj. See lien, v.t. lienee means, in AmE, "one whose property is subject to a lien," but in Australia it is synonymous with lienholder. The Australian usage mangles any sense left in the suffix -EE, q.v.

lienor; lienholder. The former, an Americanism, is best left unused; it is hardly known in BrE. Lienholder is also more likely to be understood by nonlawyers—and is more common in published materials. E.g., "The debtor listed the purported lienholder's claim as unsecured and the lienholder did not object to confirmation of the plan."/ "It is also clear that the lienor [read lienholder] has, by virtue of his possession per se, rights in rem against all others that they shall not disturb that possession or harm the object possessed." See encumbrancer.

liens and encumbrances. Though common, this phrase is redundant and illogical because a lien is one type of encumbrance. The better phrasing, then, would be liens and other encumbrances, or perhaps just encumbrances alone. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS. See also encumbrance.

lieu of, in. See in lieu of.

life-and-death; life-or-death. Though the sense is "relating to a matter of life or death," idiom has sanctioned and in this PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, not or—e.g.: "An individual justice has no power to dispose of cases on the merits, but may make a variety of interim orders, sometimes of literally life-and-death significance." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 763 (4th ed. 1983)./ "'It's good enough for a life-and-death decision,' says one of the judges." James W. McElhaney, The Law of Experts, Litigation, Summer 1991, at 47, 50.

life assurance. See life insurance.

life estate = an estate that the grantee holds for life—resulting, for example, from a grant "to X during his life," by will, deed, or trust. Today, most life estates are beneficial interests under trusts, the corpus being personal property, not real property.

like; as. A. Like as a Conjunction. In standard usage, like is a preposition that governs nouns and noun phrases, not a conjunction that governs verbs or clauses. Its function is adjectival, not adverbial. Hence one does not write, properly, "He argued this case like he argued the previous one," but, "He argued this case as he argued the previous one." If we change argue to argument, like is possible: "His argument in this case was like his argument in the previous one."/ "In fact, the term 'legal writing' has become synonymous with poor writing: specifically, verbose and inflated prose that reads like [as if]—well, like [as if] it was written by a lawyer." Steven Stark, Why Lawyers Can't Write, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 1389, 1389 (1984) (though the change does change the tone).

This relatively simple precept is generally observed in writing but has been increasingly flouted in American speech. Examples of like used conjunctively can be found throughout the Middle English period; but the usage has been considered nonstandard at least since the 17th century. For the opposite error (as for like), see as (B).

B. Faulty Comparison: like for as in. "Like Bush [read As in Bush], administrative procedures are available to plaintiff to redress her grievance."/ "The State may, like in [read as in] cases where the offense charged includes lesser offenses, reduce the offense charged to the lesser included offense." See ILLOGIC (A).

In the following sentence, like appears erroneously in place of as with. "Like other [read As with other] judicial rules, however, exceptions to the warrantless search-and-seizure rule have been recognized by the courts."

likely has different shades of meaning. Most often it indicates a degree of probability greater than five on a scale of one to ten. The probability is, of course, greater when the word is preceded by a qualifier such as quite, very, or extremely. But it may also refer to a degree of possibility that is less than five on that same scale. See probable.

limitation; repose. A limitation period bars a lawsuit if the plaintiff does not sue within a set time from the date when the cause of action accrued. A period of repose, meanwhile, bars a lawsuit for a fixed number of years after an action by the defendant (such as manufacturing a product), even if this period ends before the plaintiff suffers any injury. Beard v. J.I. Case Co., 823 F.2d 1095, 1097 n.1 (7th Cir. 1987). Cf. laches (D).

liquefy. So spelled. Liquify is a common misspelling.

liquidated damages, originally a EUPHEMISM for forfeiture or penalty, has, in many jurisdictions, become a TERM OF ART distinguishable from those other terms. Liquidated damages applies when the parties to a contract have agreed in advance on the measure of damages to be assessed in the event of default. It should be distinguished from forfeiture or penalty, which involves a provision imposed as a threat of punishment rather than as a genuine estimate of damages upon default.

Of course, the line between a penalty and liquidated damages is not always easy to draw. Regardless of what the sum might be called, the courts decide the true nature of the agreed-upon sum. Three conditions commonly lead a court to decide that a sum called "liquidated damages" is really a penalty: (1) if the sum grossly exceeds the probable damages on breach; (2) if the same sum is made payable for any variety of different breaches (some major, some minor); and (3) if a mere delay in payment has been listed among the events of default. See damages (A).

lis (= a piece of litigation; a controversy) is brief but, probably to many readers, obscure. E.g., "The courts are concerned with the practical business of deciding a lis . . . ." Attorney-General v. Prince Ernest Augustus of Hanover, [1957] A.C. 436, 467 (per Lord Normand).

lis pendens; lis alibi pendens; lite pendente; pendente lite. Lis pendens (L. "a pending lawsuit"), pronounced /lis-pen-dənz/, is a useful LATINISM that has given its name to a notice required in some jurisdictions to warn all persons that certain property is the subject matter of litigation, and that any interests acquired during the pendency of the suit must be subject to the outcome of the litigation. Traditionally this notice was called the notice of lis pendens, but 20th-century American lawyers have shortened the phrase to merely lis pendens. E.g., "The defendant says that the plaintiff's harsh conduct in holding up a whole subdivision by the lis pendens in this action disentitles him to such relief."

Lis alibi pendens = a lawsuit pending elsewhere. E.g., "Where actions in personam are started in two courts of concurrent authority of the same country, the plea lis alibi pendens is a good defence to the second action." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 144 (7th ed. 1974).

Pendente lite /pen-den-tee-lI-tee/, less usually written lite pendente, is the same phrase in the present participial form, meaning "pending the lawsuit; during litigation." In G.B., administrators pendente lite are appointed to handle estates in dispute; in the U.S., matters are said to be pendente lite when they are contingent on the outcome of litigation.

Sometimes the phrase unnecessarily displaces an English phrase—e.g.: "The funds were deposited with the clerk of court, pendente lite [read pending the outcome of the suit]." The extra words provide extra comprehensibility.

list. There cannot be a list of one. E.g., "The name of the winner is listed below." [Read The winner is named below.] literal canon; literal rule. These are both alternate names for strict constructionism, i.e., the doctrinal view of judicial construction holding that judges should apply the literal words of a statute or document without looking to the purpose behind them. E.g., "Then, should the literal canon be dislodged from, or relegated to the position of a presumption in a modern theory of interpretation? . . . [I]t is submitted that the formal approach is within its province most consonant with the judicial function." E. Russell Hopkins, The Literal Canon and the Golden Rule, 15 Can. B. Rev. 689, 695–96 (1937)./ "The literal rule is a rule against using intelligence in understanding language. Anyone who in ordinary life interpreted words literally, being indifferent to what the speaker or writer meant, would be regarded as a pedant, a mischief-maker or an idiot." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 105 (11th ed. 1982).

literally = (1) with truth to the letter; or (2) exactly; according to the strict sense of the word or words. The use of this word in the sense "truly, completely," is an example of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION. E.g., "Behavioralists and postbehavioralists alike, literally or figuratively, learn what they know of science from the natural sciences, from the outside." [Read Behavioralists and postbehavioralists alike learn what they know of science from the natural sciences, from the outside.]

When used for figuratively, where figuratively would not ordinarily be used, literally is distorted beyond recognition: "Mr. Gladstone had sat literally glued to the Treasury Bench." Because we know it is a metaphor, simply say: "Mr. Gladstone had sat glued to the Treasury Bench."

LITERARY ALLUSION, if not too arcane, can add substantially to the subtlety and effectiveness of writing. Allusiveness assumes a common body of literature with which all cultured persons are familiar. The effective writer is wary on the one hand of allusions that are hackneyed, and on the other hand of allusions so learned that they are inaccessible to the average educated reader. It is perhaps easier for judges than for practicing lawyers to use literary allusions, for judges have a guaranteed readership and do not suffer directly if anyone (or everyone) fails to appreciate their allusions. A lawyer submitting a brief to a judge, on the contrary, is likely to be less adventurous in literary flights of fancy. A few specimens follow, with short explanations.

A. Effective Use of Allusion. The following quotations illustrate some of the most common types of allusion used to good effect.

1. Proverbial. A good example of effective allusiveness appears in the dissent of Justice Robert W. Hansen of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, in Jones v. Fisher, 166 N.W.2d 175 (Wis. 1969). He plays with an old proverb: "The road that has brought us to the present state of affairs in regard to punitive damages in Wisconsin courts is a long one, paved with good intentions." Id. at 182. Justice Hansen here subtly suggests that this is the road to hell, conjuring up the saying that "the road to hell is paved with good intentions." He might have ruined the effect by quoting the aphorism directly.

2. Biblical. "One of the prime concerns addressed in the [Magnuson-Moss Warranty] Act was the warranty wherein the large print giveth but the small print taketh away." Gorman v. Saf-T-Mate, Inc., 513 F. Supp. 1028, 1035 (N.D. Ind. 1981). This alludes to Job 1:21: "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." See BIBLICAL AFFECTATION.

3. Shakespearean. "La. Rev. Stat. 14:27(A) . . . requires specific intent to commit a crime, and in Stewart's eyes there is the rub." Stewart v. Blackburn, 746 F.2d 262, 264 (5th Cir. 1984). This allusion may confuse the reader because of the proximity of rub and eyes; the phrase there's the rub (orig. fr. Hamlet 3.1.64) has passed into common parlance.

4. Mythological and Classical. "This appeal requires this Court to make another trek through that Serbonian bog of damages in maritime cases." Delta S.S. Lines v. Avondale Shipyards, Inc., 747 F.2d 995, 997 (5th Cir. 1984). Serbonian bog (= a quagmire or predicament from which there is no way of extricating oneself) has become a judges' CLICHÉ, though it may have been fresh when Cardozo wrote: "The attempted distinction between accidental results and accidental means will plunge this branch of law into a Serbonian Bog." Landress v. Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co., 291 U.S. 491, 499 (1934) (Cardozo, J., dissenting). The Serbonian bog is said to have been between Egypt and Palestine. Milton wrote: "A gulf profound as that Serbonian Bog,/ Betwixt Damiata and Mount Casius old,/ Where armies whole have sunk." Paradise Lost 2.592.

Here is another typical allusion to ancient history: "Most of the arguments and points made by the en banc opinion have been addressed by our panel opinion, and I will let the matter rest upon what has been said; for me to write more on the subject, which now appears settled by virtue of the majority here and the Second Circuit in In re Taddeo, would be largely repetitious and amount to no more than a Parthian shot." Grubbs v. Houston First Am. Savs. Ass'n, 730 F.2d 236, 247–48 (5th Cir. 1984) (en banc) (Jolly, J., dissenting). A Parthian shot is a parting shot, an allusion to the people of ancient Parthia, noted for their method of fighting on horseback with the bow as their only weapon; after each discharge of an arrow the horse turned as if in flight—hence the modern meaning.

5. Other Literary. "We will not oblige the state to joust windmills by requiring that it prove what is not wrong with that which is not there to be seen." (In Cervantes' Don Quixote, the protagonist Don Quixote tilts at windmills under the delusion that they are giants.)/ "This old but little used section is a kind of legal Lohengrin; although it has been with us since the first Judiciary Act, . . . no one seems to know whence it came." IIT v. Vencap, Ltd., 519 F.2d 1001, 1015 (2d Cir. 1975). (Lohengrin, hero of R. Wagner's opera of the same name and a knight of the Holy Grail, refuses to reveal, even to his wife, the mystery of his origins.)/ "There are village tyrants as well as village Hampdens, but none who acts under color of law is beyond reach of the Constitution." West Virginia State Bd. of Educ. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 638 (1943) (referring to Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard"). See Charles A. Wright, Literary Allusion in Legal Writing, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 1, 3–4 (1990).

B. Poor Use of Allusion. Not always does allusion work, however. Following are some examples with brief explanations of pitfalls.

1. Hackneyed Allusions. "What is and what is not a sham is the Hamlet-like question that has perplexed the lower courts in the two decades since the Supreme Court, in a 'new and unusual application of the Sherman Act,' enunciated the Noerr doctrine." To be or not to be (to live or not to live) is rather a different kind of question from what is and is not a sham. Moreover, To be or not to be (Hamlet 3.1.55) is a greatly overworked phrase.

Hyperbolic allusion, especially if it smacks of BIBLICAL AFFECTATION, is also ineffective. E.g., "The words, both singly and conjunctively, have been in common use and generally understood since Moses delivered the commandments and the law to his people, and up to the present time." The judge who wrote that, in the process of construing a legal document written in English, merely detracted from his persuasiveness. See OVERSTATEMENT.

2. Contrived Literariness. Some judges and advocates, in their quest for originality, go off the deep end. Perhaps the worst manifestation of this phenomenon is what we might term "literary foppery," consisting in the legal writer's going to absurd lengths to display the breadth of his literary knowledge. For example, Sterne's Tristram Shandy is quite irrelevantly dragged into Farr v. Nordman, 78 N.W.2d 186, 193 (Mich. 1956) (Black, J., dissenting). Contrived allusions and references invariably detract from the message to be conveyed.

In a striking example of artificially engrafted literariness, an American judge recently peppered one of his opinions with wholly impertinent allusions and references to William Faulkner. The opinion itself discusses the constitutionality under the Fourth Amendment of a lessor's inspection of his land to determine whether the lessee has wrongfully diverted oil production. The first sentence of the statement of facts reads: "The events underlying Auster's claims could have arisen in Yoknapatawpha County, Mississippi, but most of them happened in Calcasieu Parish, Louisiana, where Stream owned the surface and mineral rights in oil-producing property." A footnote, of course, explains that Yoknapatawpha County is the fictional setting of many of Faulkner's novels (and cites works on Faulkner by the renowned critics Cleanth Brooks and Irving Howe). The contrivance has neither purpose nor subtlety.

Worse yet, however, are the headings and subheadings throughout the opinion. We begin with "The Sound and the Fury," which is followed by "Lease in August" (Light in August), "The Reivers," "Intruders in the Dust" (Intruder in the Dust), "Auster's Gambit" (Knight's Gambit), "Go Down, Auster" (Go Down, Moses), "Requiem for a Plaintiff" (Requiem for a Nun), "Sanctuary," "Microchip! Microchip!" (Absalom! Absalom!?), "Trooper's Pay" (Soldiers' Pay), "As the Wells Lay Pumping" (As I Lay Dying), and "The Unvanquished." In short, the references and allusions to Faulkner are entirely factitious. See Auster Oil & Gas, Inc. v. Stream, 764 F.2d 381 (5th Cir. 1985).

To those with an undiscerning literary sensibility, such contrivances may be appealing.

literatim. See verbatim.

litigant has denoted "a party to a lawsuit" since the mid-17th century. Originally, in the early 17th century, litigant was always an adjective, as in the phrase party litigant. Soon, however, the word came to act as a noun, without the necessity of pairing it always with party. Rarely nowadays does one encounter the adjectival use of litigant; instead, examples like the following abound: "It is quite possible that a litigant will find that his case will fit some two or three of these pigeonholes." F.W. Maitland, The Forms of Action at Common Law 3 (1909; A.H. Chaytor & W.J. Whittaker eds., 1971)./ "A bait was needed with which to draw litigants to the royal courts; the King must offer them better justice than they could have at the hands of their lords." 1 Winston litig(at)able. The correct form is litigable: "[N]one of the summoned witnesses . . . raised any litigatable [read litigable] objections . . . ." U.S. v. Newman, 441 F.2d 165, 173 (5th Cir. 1971). See -ATABLE.

litigate = (1) to be a party to, or carry on, a lawsuit; (2) to make the subject of a lawsuit, to contest at law; (3) to dispute, contest (e.g., a point). Thus in sense (1), one litigates cases and causes, but in sense (2) one may litigate property or consequences, etc. E.g., "Qualified immunity is in part an entitlement not to be forced to litigate the consequences of official conduct." Cf. adjudicate (A).

The phrase litigate against (a certain type of opponent) has become common in late 20th-century legal writing—e.g.: "New York's highest court ruled that lawyers litigating against a corporation can informally interview certain employees without the consent of the corporation's lawyers." Wall St. J., 6 July 1990, at B5.

litigated judgment is often a REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "The decision will result in the dismissal of key claims in literally thousands of pending lawsuits—and some litigated judgments [read judgments or final judgments]—and is bound to further depress the number of such suits filed in the future." Schmitt, California Court Further Restricts Right of Fired Workers to Sue Ex-Employers, Wall St. J., 26 May 1989, at A3. When used in contrast to consent judgment, however, litigated judgment makes perfect sense: "The distinction between a consent judgment and a litigated judgment has not been widely addressed by Michigan courts." Trendell v. Solomon, 443 N.W.2d 509, 510 (Mich. Ct. App. 1989).

litigation, n. Ordinarily, litigation refers to the process of carrying on lawsuits or a specific lawsuit. Hence the plural litigations might seem to make little sense. But litigation occasionally serves as a synonym for lawsuit. Though it may seem unidiomatic to make litigation a COUNT NOUN in this way, the usage is old and is today common. E.g., "In numberless litigations the description of the landscape must be studied to see whether vision has been obstructed . . . ." Benjamin N. Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process 165 (1921)./ "[The] first and second parties now have certain litigations pending in the Mercer Circuit Court . . . ." Reed v. Carter, 103 S.W.2d 663, 664 (Ky. Ct. App. 1937)./ "And unexpected things did happen in litigations in which they were retained." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 176 (1943). See PLURALS (B).

litigation, adj.; litigational; litigative. See litigatory.

litigator. When it originated—in the late 19th century—litigator was a NEEDLESS VARIANT of litigant, as here: "When a succession is in progress of litigation, the interest of the litigators is deducto aeri aliendo . . . ." Irwin v. Flynn, 34 So. 794, 794 syl. 2 (La. 1903). This sense persisted into the mid-20th century—e.g.: "Government agencies are the heaviest litigators in the United States courts . . . ." Lane v. Fitzsimmons Stores, Ltd., 62 F. Supp. 89, 91 n.7 (S.D. Cal. 1945). (Cf. litigant.) At the same time, the word was coming to refer to a lawyer who specializes in litigation, as an alternate term for trial lawyer, q.v.

But now those two terms have been vaguely differentiated. With the advent, in the U.S., of seemingly endless discovery before trial—which never seems to come—litigator has come to connote a lawyer who works in litigation but never sets foot in a courtroom. Trial lawyers try cases; litigators, it is sometimes said, merely prepare discovery requests.

litigatory; litigative; litigational. There is no single widely accepted neutral adjective corresponding to litigation and meaning "of, pertaining to, or involving litigation." Litigious, q.v., is close structurally, but its strong associations with disputatiousness and contentiousness impair its candidacy—in AmE, at any rate. (BrE continues to use litigious in neutral contexts.) Litigable <litigable claims> and litigant <parties litigant> have other specific senses. Litigation sometimes functions as an adjective, as in the title of Leon Green's collection of essays The Litigation Process in Tort Law (1965). It works in some phrases, such as litigation battles or litigation crisis, but not in others.

Litigatory, litigational, and litigative have been pressed into service in the desired neutral sense. Litigatory is listed in W2, but is omitted from W3 and has appeared in neither the OED nor its Supplement. Yet it is no stranger to American legal prose—e.g.:

- "The controlling declaration . . . is that equity can and should intervene whenever it is made to appear that one party, public or private, seeks unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another on account of his own mistake and the other's want of immediate vigilance—litigatory or otherwise." Spoon-Shacket Co. v. County of Oakland, 97 N.W.2d 25, 28 (Mich. 1959).

- "Certain Florida cases, though having litigatory objectives different from the one at bar, employ the principle . . . ." Brown v. Hutch, 156 So. 2d 683, 686 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1963).
- "Considering the overall strength of the factual and legal bases of the surety's rejection of the claim and the litigatory posture of the surety . . . , we believe that its rejection . . . was not preponderately [q.v.] reasonable . . . ." U.S. Fidelity & Guar. Co. v. Clover Creek Cattle Co., 452 P.2d 993, 1005 (Idaho 1969).
- "Not only do the decided cases lead us to this decision but such ruling accords with modern jurisprudence which seeks to eliminate the hidden litigatory pitfall." Federal Ins. Co. v. Oakwood Steel Co., 191 S.E.2d 298, 300 (Ga. Ct. App. 1972).
- "[O]ur affirmance in the present case is predicated upon the purposes and objectives underlying declaratory judgment actions and the litigatory posture of the dispute involving the parties herein." Volkswagenwerk, A.G. v. Watson, 390 N.E.2d 1082, 1084 (Ind. Ct. App. 1979).

Litigational, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of litigatory, has been similarly neglected in general English-language dictionaries, though it is not uncommon. E.g., "Litigational background of both appeals was [read In the litigatory background of both appeals was] a suit instituted by plaintiff . . . ." Morton v. Indemnity Ins. Co., 137 So. 2d 618, 619 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1962)./ "[W]e now consider briefly a second form of specific jurisdiction . . . relating not only to the plaintiff but also to the taking of evidence and other litigational [read litigatory] considerations." Arthur T. von Mehren & Donald T. Trautman, Jurisdiction to Adjudicate, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 1121, 1173 (1966)./ "[T]he Finney court recognize[d] that the binding nature of a stipulation of dispositiveness supported the parties in their exercise of litigational [read litigatory] strategy . . . ." Zeigler v. State, 471 So. 2d 172, 176 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985).

Litigative is likewise a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "The transfer of the stock was not actually made until April 1944 because of an unsuccessful litigative [read litigatory] attempt to prevent the same." Western Pac. R. R. Corp. v. Western Pac. R. R. Co., 85 F. Supp. 868, 870 (N.D. Cal. 1949)./ "For these reasons, I simply cannot accept the shift in the litigative [read litigatory] burden of proof adopted by the Court." Columbus Bd. of Educ. v. Penick, 443 U.S. 449, 473 (1979) (Stewart, J., dissenting).

litigiosity; litigiousness. If there is a nuance between these words, it is that litigiosity denotes the fact or state of being litigious, whereas litigiousness denotes the quality of being litigious. The fussiness of this distinction suggests that euphony is a better ground for choice between the two.

In Scots law, however, litigiosity has a special sense: "a legal prohibition on a debtor's alienating heritable property to the effect of defeating an action . . . commenced or inchoate" (OCL).

litigious = (1) fond of legal disputes, contentious <our litigious society>; (2) that is the subject of a lawsuit <the litigious property>; or (3) of or pertaining to lawsuits or litigation <dragged into a litigious dispute>. In AmE, the word has been narrowed to sense (1) exclusively. In BrE, however, the word is capable of taking on the neutral senses of (2) and (3)—e.g.: "The Statute codified procedure for a new jurisdiction, and may therefore have been more precise than current litigious practice." C.H.S. Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law 27 n.18 (1949)./ "[A] good deal of litigious work is disposed of not in open court but before a judge or master in chambers." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 190 (11th ed. 1982). See litigatory.

litiscontestation, a Scots law term, means "joinder of issue, arising after the defense in a lawsuit has been lodged." The word derives from the Roman term litis contestatio, the process by which a legal issue emerges from the oppposing statements of the parties, which still occasionally appears in English and American lawbooks: "A discussion of the influence on modern German procedure of the notion involved in the Roman litis contestatio (as a pretended contract of submission) will be found in Bülow . . . ." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 89 n.74 (1967; repr. 1977). See contest, n.

livery of seisin (= the ceremonial procedure at common law by which a grantor conveyed land to a grantee) is LAW FRENCH (orig. bail de la seisine) for delivery of seisin. It is sanctioned by centuries of legal usage, and today ordinarily appears only in historical contexts. The ceremony involved going on the land and having the grantor symbolically deliver possession of the land to the grantee by handing over a twig, a clod, or a piece of turf. Alternatively, livery of seisin could be accomplished by the grantor's telling the grantee, in view of the land, that possession was given to the grantee, followed by the grantee's entering the land. E.g., "A transferor, A, having an estate in fee simple, could provide, upon making livery of seisin to B, that he should have occupancy of the land for his lifetime."

The OED notes that livery and seisin is a common error for livery of seisin. See delivery (B) & seisin.

living trust. See inter vivos* trust.

living will; advance directive. Living will, a phrase that dates from the early 1970s, is not a statutory term—in fact, it is really misnamed, because the document to which it refers is not a will at all. It refers to a legal document instructing doctors, relatives, and others when to refrain from using life-support measures to prolong one's life during a catastrophic illness. E.g., "Living wills are useful for people who would rather bow out quickly and gracefully than fight for their lives as long as possible." Letter of F. Ackerman, N.Y. Times, 13 Oct. 1989, at 22./ "Under common law these situations can also be addressed in a living will, but the patient would never know it from the materials distributed . . . . There is no reason these advance directives should not be physician managed, just as surgical consent forms, anatomical gift forms and do-not-resuscitate orders are." Letter of Alan D. Lieberson, Law on "Living Wills" Doesn't Go Far Enough, N.Y. Times, 21 Dec. 1991, at 14.

A less commonly known term, advance directive, refers to a document much like a living will, but broader in scope and more detailed. An advance directive is a durable power of attorney designating a surrogate decision-maker for health-care matters. An advance directive takes effect upon incompetency—and is "durable" because, unlike most powers of attorney, it remains in effect during the maker's incompetency. E.g., "The federal Patient Self-Determination Act now requires hospitals to inform patients of their rights under state law to create 'advance directives' relating to their medical care and to find out whether patients have such advance directives." Tom Mayo, Patients' Rights, Dallas Morning News, 15 Dec. 1991, at 4J.

loadstone; lodestone. This term, meaning "something that strongly attracts," is spelled loadstone in BrE and lodestone in AmE. E.g., "The intention of the testator is the guide, or in the phrase of Lord Coke, the lodestone of the court." Cf. lodestar.

loan; lend. In formal usage, it is best to use lend as the verb and loan as the noun. Loan is considered permissible, however, when used as a verb denoting the lending of money (as distinguished from the lending of articles).

LOAN TRANSLATIONS are English terms arrived at by translating foreign terms into English equivalents. Thus we arrive at the un-English-sounding next friend as a loan translation (or calque) of prochein ami. The language of the law has many such terms, usually translated from Latin or French. (See LAW FRENCH & LAW LATIN.) Among the most common loan translations in legal writing are these:

English Term	Foreign Term
action on the case	action sur le case (L.F.)
against the form of the statute	contra formam statuti (L.)
against the peace	contra pacem (L.) a year and a day	ann et jour (L.F.)
as of right	de jure (L.)
burden of proof	onus probandi (L.)
civil death	mors civilis (L.)
damage without injury	damnum absque injuria (L.)
dead-hand	mortmain (L.F.)
defender of the faith	fidei defensor (L.)
friend of the court	amicus curiae (L.)
go hence without day	aller sans jour (L.F.)
goods and chattels	bona et catalla (L.F.)
half-blood	demy-sangue (L.F.)
have and hold	habendum et tenendum (L.)
	aver et tener (L.F.)
injury without damage	injuria absque damno (L.)
in the breast	in pectore (L.)
juridification	Verrechtlichung (Ger.)
keeper of the peace	custos pacis (L.)
King's Court	Curia Regis (L.)
know all persons	noverint universi (L.)
last will	ultima voluntas (L.)
law merchant	lex mercatoria (L.)
malice aforethought	malitia praecogitata (L.)
	meer dreit (L.F.)
naked contract	nudum pactum (L.)
next friend	prochein ami (L.F.)
notwithstanding the verdict	non obstante veredicto (L.)
on pain of	sur peine de (L.F.)
on the high sea	super altum mare (L.)

plead not guilty	plaider de rien culpable (L.F.)
these presents	hac praesentes litterae (L.)
true bill	billa vera (L.)
under pain of	sous pein de (L.F.) sub poena (L.)
unwritten law	lex non scripta (L.)
with force and arms	vi et armis (L.)

Sometimes the Englished versions require skillful inference to arrive at the meaning. E.g., "An acceptance that remains in the breast of the accepter without being actually and by legal implication communicated to the offeror is not a binding acceptance." (Eng.) Others have no literal significance, but have been adopted as legal names (as TERMS OF ART or legal JARGON) for doctrines and causes of action, such as trespass with force and arms: "This is an action in trespass that the defendant, with force and arms, wilfully and maliciously assaulted, debauched, and carnally knew the daughter and servant of the plaintiff." (Eng.)

The tendency toward translating unassimilated foreign terms that are used in law into English is salutary on the whole. Dead-hand may never displace mortmain, and friend of the court may never displace amicus curiae, but most of the foreign language law terms have fallen into disuse. And most of the loan translations listed above have become familiar. Now there is little call for more loan translations, because legal English increasingly approximates general-purpose English.

loathe; lo(a)th. Loathe is the verb meaning "to abhor, detest." Loath, with its NEEDLESS VARIANT loth, is an adjective meaning "reluctant." Here the verb spelling is used wrongly for the adjective, a frequent error: "[J]udges and crown prosecutors were not loathe [read loath] to intimidate a jury and even to punish the jurymen if they returned a verdict deemed improper by the judge." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 53 (1963)./ "Courts have generally been loathe [read loath] to refuse the offer of an aid to difficult problems of interpretation."/ "Yellow Cab has proved loathe [read loath] to loosen its grip on the airport market."

lobby. The legislative senses derive ultimately from the architectural sense of the word. In 19th-century AmE, lobby came to denote, through METONYMY, the persons who habitually occupy the lobby in a legislative chamber for the purpose of carrying on business with legislators, esp. influencing their votes.

As a verb, lobby has come to mean: (1) to frequent legislative chambers for the purpose of influencing the members' official actions <the group lobbied against the proposed reforms>; or (2) to promote or oppose (a measure) by soliciting legislative votes <the organization lobbied a measure through the House>.

The agent-noun lobbyist, meaning "one who lobbies," originated during the American Civil War.

locale; locality. Both terms are frequently used; for the most part they are equivalent, but only locale has the sense "the setting or scene of action or of a story."

locate for set up shop or establish residence is an Americanism that, despite its having been criticized by several grammarians, has become standard <after several years in the Plaza, the firm located in the Crescent>. Locate is transitive in BrE and means "to place" or "to ascertain the whereabouts of." In AmE, the word is used in these senses, but also in the colloquial intransitive sense of "to settle, begin residing." The sense "to fix or establish in a place" is also distinctively AmE: "Subsection (b) of the statute would seem generally to locate review of licensing proceedings in the courts of appeals." This usage is by no means new: "[The 1869 law] is aptly framed to remove from the more densely populated part of the city, the noxious slaughter-houses, and large and offensive collections of animals necessarily incident to [them], and to locate them where the convenience, health, and comfort of the people require they shall be located." The Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36, 64 (1872) (per Miller, J.).

LOCATIVES. See CASE REFERENCES (B).

Lochnerize, vb.; Lochnerization, n. These terms derive from the case name Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905). Lochnerize = to scrutinize and invalidate economic regulations under the guise of enforcing the due-process clause. The term carries no small degree of opprobrium. "Lochnerizing has become so much an epithet that the very use of the label may obscure attempts at understanding." Laurence Tribe, American Constitutional Law 435 (1978). E.g., "Lochner v. New York . . . (invalidating New York's maximum hours law for bakers) has come to typify the period of 'substantive due process' review, during which the Supreme Court over a strong dissent invalidated state economic and social legislation for interfering with the liberty of contract." Town of Ball v. Rapides Parish Police Jury, 746 F.2d 1049, 1056 n.21 (5th Cir. 1984)./ "[E]qual protection was so disfavored that, during the heyday of 'Lochnerizing,' it was called 'the usual last resort of constitutional arguments.'" (Id.)/ "Of course we are Lochnerizing and intruding into the affairs of a state." Dunagin v. City of Oxford, 718 F.2d 738, 755 (5th Cir. 1983) (Higginbotham, J., dissenting).

lockout, n., = (1) an employer's closing of a business or across-the-board dismissal of employees due to disagreement over the terms of employment; or (2) employees' refusal to work because the employer unreasonably refuses to abide by an expired employment contract while a new one is being negotiated.

locus; situs. Both terms are used in law to mean "a place in which something is situated or is done." Locus is the more concrete, specific term: "We hold that at the death of John Girdler's widow, his three daughters and granddaughter held undivided equal estates tail in the locus." Situs, to the contrary, is more abstract, with a usu. broader, territorial sense of "place": "Such a decree ought to be entitled to full faith and credit at the situs of the land."/ "Holding that Mexico rather than Texas was the situs of the bank deposits furthers the general policies of the act of state doctrine." See situs.

locus in quo (= the place where something is alleged to have been done) is common in property law, but is often unnecessary in place of locus or location. Here it is perhaps justifiable, because its use implicitly incorporates the notion of allegations in a lawsuit: "It is proper to admit photographs of a locus in quo even though taken 15½ months after the accident . . . ." Hamilton v. Fean, 221 A.2d 309, 315 (Pa. 1966).

locus poenitentiae /loh-kəs-pen-i-ten-shee-ee/ = a point at which it is not too late for a person to change his or her legal position; the possibility of withdrawing from a contemplated course of action, esp. a wrong, before being committed to it. E.g., "He would have us hold that so long as the cause or proceeding in which false testimony is given is not closed there remains a locus poenitentiae of which he was entitled to and did avail himself. The implications and results of such a doctrine prove its unsoundness." U.S. v. Norris, 300 U.S. 564, 573–74 (1937)./ "Mrs. Rosenblum enjoyed a locus poenitentiae, of which she could take advantage until Jacks or Better somehow changed its position; and she acted promptly in recalling the words of rescission." Rosenblum v. Jacks or Better of Am. West, Inc., 745 S.W.2d 754, 759 (Mo. Ct. App. 1988).

locus standi (= the right to bring an action or to be heard in a given forum) seems to be an unnecessary LATINISM, in view of the more common American legal term standing. Locus standi is common in G.B., however. E.g., "First, it may be asked what, if any, locus standi the Law Society has in a matter of this kind." (Eng.)/ "In my view, it would be most unfortunate if the intervenor did not have a locus standi in appropriate cases." (Eng.)/ "The Italian standpoint is that at the present juncture the League has no locus standi in the dispute." (Eng.) Formerly it was used in the sense "credentials, established position of high standing." (See standing.) The phrase is medieval in origin—it does not appear in classical Roman sources.

lodestar; loadstar. The former spelling is preferred in both AmE and BrE for this term meaning "a guiding star." (The word derives fr. O.E. lād [= way, course] + star.) The term has jargonistic uses in setting fees and damages, and these lead to mixed metaphors: "In awarding attorneys' fees, the district court increased the lodestar—the product of the number of hours reasonably expended multiplied by a reasonable hourly rate—to compensate counsel for the delay in actual payment for the legal services rendered." (The figurative does not impinge on the literal sense if we write of raising a lodestar, but it does so impinge if we write of increasing a lodestar.) See METAPHORS (A).

lodestone. See loadstone.

logical fallacy. See grammatical error.

logomachy = a contention about words. E.g., "The student of jurisprudence is at times troubled by the thought that he is dealing not with things, but with words, that he is busy with the shape and size of counters in a game of logomachy . . . ." John C. Gray, Nature and Sources of the Law viii (1909)./ "I know for myself that for the past thirty years and more a great part of my daily business has been to give opinions, to argue or to decide as to the meaning of words. These disputes are by no means always barren logoma- chies." Lord Macmillan, Law and Other Things 154 (1937).

logorrhea (= diarrhea of the mouth) is an affliction of which lawyers must beware.

long, adv., can stand alone, without for preceding it. E.g., "[W]e have now for long [read now long] been accustomed, with some archaic survivals, to the doctrine that imposed liability depends in part upon the conscious attitude which a supposititious normal person would take towards the damage resulting from his acts." Sinram v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 61 F.2d 767, 770 (2d Cir. 1932) (per L. Hand, J.).

long-arm statute (= a statute providing for the maintenance of jurisdiction over nonresident defendants) derives from the catchphrase the (long) arm of the law.

longshoreman. See SEXISM (B).

long-standing, adj. So spelled.

loophole. This term, dating from 1591 (OED), originally referred to a narrow vertical opening, widening inward, cut in a wall or door to allow through the passage either cannon fire and other missiles, or light and air. The word loop in this compound does not bear its modern sense, but instead derives from the medieval Dutch verb lupen, meaning "to lie in wait, watch, or peer."

By the late 1600s, the word had taken on its figurative sense in reference to an ambiguity, omission, or exception in a statute or other legal document. Today this figurative sense prevails—e.g.: "The court was also out to close all loopholes, such as the possibility of the brokers and title companies getting legislation giving them the right to do what they had been doing all along . . . ." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble With Lawyers 103 (1970).

loose, v.t.; loosen. Both words mean "to unbind; release." The DIFFERENTIATION between the two is that loose generally refers to a complete release <loosing criminals on the community>, loosen generally to a partial release <loosening one's belt>. Additionally, loosen is figurative more often than loose. See lose.

Lord Chancellor. The plural is sometimes made Lords Chancellor, sometimes Lord Chancellors, and sometimes Lords Chancellors. The prevailing, and the best, form is Lord Chancellors. But cf. lord justice. See Chancellor & Keeper of the King's Conscience.

Lord High Chancellor. See chancellor.

lord justice, the title of a judge on the (English) Court of Appeal, is generally pluralized lords justices. But lord justices might be an improvement. See Lord Chancellor.

Lord of Appeal in Ordinary; Lord Ordinary. Terms such as these often baffle those unacquainted with the British legal system. The Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, known also as Law Lords, sit in the House of Lords as the highest appellate court in the U.K. The Lords Ordinary sit in Scotland as the trial judges in the Court of Session. See Law Lord.

Lords is sometimes used as an elliptical term for House of Lords—e.g.: "Decision-making in the Lords does not take place in a vacuum." Alan Paterson, The Law Lords 9 (1982)./ "Oliver Cromwell later explained that the Lords was 'very forward to give up the people's rights . . . .'" Peering Ahead, Economist, 9–15 June 1990, at 68. See House of Lords.

lose; loose. Lose, v.t., = to suffer the deprivation of; to part with. Loose is both adj. & v.t., meaning in the latter use "to release; unfasten." Writers sometimes misuse loose for lose—e.g.: "Plaintiff and the other man ran and the police pursued, loosing [read losing] sight of the two for approximately 30 to 60 seconds." Stratton v. City of Albany, 612 N.Y.S.2d 286, 288 (App. Div. 1994)./ "Martini chased defendant, never loosing [read losing] eye contact with him." People v. Pulliam, 626 N.E.2d 356, 357 (Ill. App. Ct. 1994). (In the latter example, notice also the misuse of eye contact for sight.) See loose.

loser; winner. Courts sometimes use loser and winner as substitutes for appellant and appellee, respectively. E.g., "We may affirm a summary judgment only if the record, read in the light most favorable to the loser [i.e., appellant] reveals no genuine issues of material fact and shows that the winners [i.e., appellees] were entitled to judgment as a matter of law."

loss-of-bargain damages; lost-expectation damages. These phrases, which should be hyphenated thus, both refer to breach-of-contract damages that would place the injured party in the position he or she would have been in had the contract been performed. E.g., "Another major shift in the law appears to lie in an increased reluctance to award pure 'lost expectation' damages, except perhaps in straightforward commercial cases." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 21–22 (3d ed. 1981; repr. 1986).

lost earnings; lost earning capacity. In personal-injury cases, the distinction is an important one. To determine lost earnings, the court looks to what a plaintiff actually earned before the injury. To determine lost earning capacity, the court looks (more expansively) to the plaintiff's diminished earning power resulting from the injury.

lost property; mislaid property; abandoned property. At common law, these descriptions governed the disposition of property found by someone other than its original owner. The distinctions are still valid in many English-speaking jurisdictions. Property is said to be lost when the owner has involuntarily relinquished possession of it, usually by accident or forgetfulness, and cannot or is highly unlikely to recover it by diligent search. Property is mislaid when the owner has intentionally put it in a place and then forgotten it, but may find it by diligent searching. It is abandoned if the owner has knowingly forsaken interest in the property.

L.S. (= locus sigilli, meaning "place of the seal") is occasionally used on contracts and deeds in place of an actual seal. As contracts under seal have fallen into disuse, so has the need for this abbreviation. See seal. Cf. ss.

lucri causa /loo-kree-kaw-zə/ (= for the sake of gain) was once considered a necessary element of larceny: the thief must have been motivated by some purpose of gain or advantage. Today, in jurisdictions that retain larceny as a crime, lucri causa is generally considered an inessential element, the intent to deprive the owner of his or her property being sufficient.

lunatic, once a clinical medical description, was formerly used frequently in legal writing. E.g., "A lunatic has the capacity to take and hold title to property and therefore may become a trustee." Today, however, the term is one of opprobrium because of its figurative abuses; it should be used cautiously if at all.

luxuriant; luxurious. Luxuriant, a favorite word of metaphrasts, means "growing abundantly, lush." E.g., "The states have decided that it is better to leave a few of its noxious branches to their luxuriant growth, than by pruning them away to injure the vigor of those yielding the proper fruits."

Luxurious = characteristic of luxury. Sometimes the word is confused with luxuriant—e.g.: "With his luxuriously [read luxuriantly] curly white hair, dark bushy eyebrows, olive skin and direct gaze, Judge Botein reminds one lawyer I know of 'an implacable Old Testament Judge.'" Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble With Lawyers 168 (1970).

lynch law = the administration of summary punishment, esp. death, for an alleged crime, without legal authority. The phrase connotes mob lawlessness brought about by a perception that justice will be either denied or grossly delayed.

The phrase has an interesting etymology. Originally Lynch's law, it took its name from William Lynch (1742–1820) of Virginia, who in 1780 organized his neighbors to maintain order and punish lawlessness in their community. At first the phrase referred to punishments milder than death—whipping, tarring and feathering, burning houses, and the like—but since the late 19th century, the term has been increasingly confined to sentences of death by hanging. The verb to lynch, for example, carries that meaning exclusively: "to hang (a person) by lynch law."

lynchpin. See linchpin.

M

MACARONISM. See MINGLE-MANGLE.

McCulloch v. Maryland. This is the conventional spelling of the ground-breaking case in which the U.S. Supreme Court first used federal constitutional analysis to invalidate a state law. See 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). But the bank cashier involved in that case actually spelled his name McCulloh. See Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 370 n.5 (5th ed. 1994).

McKenzie; McKenzie man. In McKenzie v. McKenzie, [1970] 3 W.L.R. 472 (C.A.), the Court of Appeal ruled that any litigant is entitled to nonprofessional assistance in court. Hence in BrE, McKenzie or McKenzie man has come to denote a nonprofessional who attends trial as a party's helper or adviser.

McNaghten; M'Naghten; McNaughton; Macnaghten; MacNaughton; M'Naughten. In 1843, the House of Lords answered a series of questions about what a criminal defendant must show to succeed on the defense of insanity. (For the citation, see leading case.) These answers are generally known as the McNaghten rules (so spelled). Glanville Williams remarks: "The spelling of the defendant's name in this famous case varies; for simplicity, I have adopted one of the two versions [McNaghten] used in the Law Reports, though it is probably [historically] wrong." Textbook of Criminal Law 98 n.6 (1978). Historically wrong, perhaps, but so prevalent today that writers everywhere ought to settle on it as the standard spelling.

Justice Felix Frankfurter felt certain that M'Naghten was the correct spelling and, in 1952, wrote the editor of The Times (London) to reform the spelling used by that newspaper: "It is M'Naghten, not M'Naughten or any of the variants of its misspelling." Felix Frankfurter, "Postscript to M'Naghten's Case," in Of Law and Life and Other Things That Matter 1, 1 (Philip B. Kurland ed., 1967). The learned editor of The Times—Sir William Haley—produced historical evidence of ten variations, including the prisoner's own version during trial: M'Naughten. See id.

madding crowd; maddening crowd. By historical convention, madding crowd is the idiom, dating from the late 16th century. Unlike maddening, which describes the observer, madding (= frenzied) describes the crowd itself. Thomas Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" (1749) and Thomas Hardy's novel Far From the Madding Crowd (1874) helped establish this idiom, especially Gray's "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife." In modern published writings, madding crowd remains about seven times as common as its corrupted form.

maelstrom, originally a Dutch word referring to a grinding or turning stream, is frequently misspelled maelstorm—e.g.: "The application of any other Rule [than res judicata], in our judgment, would result in a maelstorm [read maelstrom] of uncertainty, lack of judicial finality and ultimate chaos." In re Van Deusen's Will, 196 N.Y.S.2d 737, 743 (Sur. Ct. 1960).

magisterial; magistral. Although magisterial carries connotations of nobility, command, and even dictatorialness, it is also the preferred adjective corresponding to the noun magistrate. E.g., "While we may review magistral [read magisterial] findings of fact subject only to the 'clearly erroneous' standard, we may overturn any conclusions of law that contradict or ignore applicable precepts of law as found in the Constitution, statutes, or case precedent." Magistratic and magistratical are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Magistral = (1) of a master or masters <an absolutely magistral work>; or (2) formulated by a physician .

magistracy; magistrature; magistrateship. The first of these is the standard term for the office, district, or power of a magistrate, or body of magistrates. Magistrature and magistrateship are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

magistral. See magisterial.

magistrate, in both AmE and BrE, is now generally understood as referring to a judicial officer with strictly limited jurisdiction and authority, often on the local level. In G.B., for example, magistrate is synonymous with justice of the peace and frequently appears in the phrases police magistrate, metropolitan magistrate, stipendiary magistrate, and magistrates' courts. (See stipe.) In Ireland the phrase is resident magistrate. The common characteristic is that magistrate "generally means a judge of inferior rank." Max Radin, The Law and You 110 (1948).

Formerly, however, the word retained a meaning closer to its etymological sense. Derived from L. magistratus or magister (= master), it once referred to the official first in rank in a branch of government. Hence an emperor, or a monarch, or a president might have been termed a magistrate. E.g., "Edicta, laws which the emperor himself put forth, in his character as highest magistrate . . . ." James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 6–7 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co. 1881). Thus it is that Cardozo referred to Chief Justice Marshall, with the greatest respect, as the magistrate who wrote Marbury v. Madison. See Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 471, 476 (1939).

But because the connotations of magistrate had fallen so, United States Magistrates—i.e., those at the federal level—lobbied in the late 1980s for a name change. In 1990 they got it, in the Judicial Improvements Act, and they are now called United States Magistrate Judges. See magisterial.

magistrates' courts. In England—as a result of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952—this term refers to what were formerly known as Courts of Summary Jurisdiction, i.e., the Justices in Petty Sessions and special sessions called Juvenile Courts and Matrimonial Courts.

magistrateship; magistrature. See magistracy.

Magna C(h)arta. The usual—and the better—form is Magna Carta. Time magazine used the secondary spelling and found itself on the defensive: "[W]e were unfairly reproved for our spelling of the document Magna Charta . . . . Although many publications use the more familiar Magna Carta, most dictionaries prefer the word we used, charta, from the Latin word for paper." Going by the Rules, Time, 16 Dec. 1991, at 9. Which dictionaries? Not W3, RH2, W10, or the OED—the last of which shows that the great document was known exclusively as Magna Carta from the 13th to the 17th centuries. And the leading British textbooks, by W.H. McKechnie and J.C. Holt, use Carta.

And what about the Time editors' argument that charta is the Latin word for paper? That argument is empty: charta and carta are variant forms bearing the same meaning in Latin.

Magna Carta does not take a definite article: one says Magna Carta, not the Magna Carta. E.g., "Habeas corpus is shown by ample evidence to have been in use before the memorable occasion when royal recognition was given it in the great document of Magna Carta."

magnanimous (= big-spirited, high-minded, and generous) has come to be misused as an ironic equivalent of magnificent, especially in reference to sums of money. But this usage is at best a MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "The sum in the general account is not a particularly handsome one in view of the trustees' unpaid obligations, but it is a magnanimous [read magnificent] amount compared to the balance in the general account on March 19, 1971, which was $11.70." In re Flying W Airways, Inc., 341 F. Supp. 26, 84 (E.D. Pa. 1972)./ "The judgment herein awarded the wife the magnanimous [read magnificent] sum of $250 per month for a period of three years as maintenance . . . ." Combs v. Combs, 622 S.W.2d 679, 680 (Ky. Ct. App. 1981)./ "Ex-husband was given 'for spending money' the magnanimous [read magnificent] amount of $45 per week for working in the grocery store. This does not approach the salary of carryout boys in grocery stores." Tuttle v. Tuttle, 399 N.W.2d 876, 880 n.* (S.D. 1986).

maihem. See mayhem (C).

maim. See mayhem (B).

main opinion (AmE) = majority opinion, q.v.

mainour. This word is a historical curiosity in modern opinions—e.g.: "[W]e are convinced that there was no proof that appellant was 'taken with the mainour' . . . ." King v. State, 645 S.W.2d 782, 785 (Tex. Crim. App. 1981) (explaining, in note 2: "A thief caught with the stolen goods in his possession was said to be taken 'with the mainour,' i.e., with the goods in manu, in his hands."). Thus with the mainour is synonymous with in flagrante delicto, q.v.

mainprise; mainprize. This word, referring to an old procedure for compelling a sheriff to take sureties for a prisoner's appearance, is generally spelled mainprise. The etymological meaning is taking by the hand (fr. Fr. main & pris.).

mainstream, v.t., is a jargonistic VOGUE WORD to be avoided—e.g.: "'It means Hispanics are mainstreaming themselves [read moving into the mainstream],' said Robin Rorapaugh, Texas director for the Clinton campaign." Sam Attlesey, Texas Politics, Dallas Morning News, 22 March 1992, at 46A. See NOUNS AS VERBS.

maintain <to maintain a lawsuit> is not synonymous with begin or institute; it embraces the idea of continuing or upholding. See George Moore Ice Cream Co. v. Rose, 289 U.S. 373, 377 (1933).

maintenance. A. Legal Senses. Maintenance = (1) the care and work put into a building to keep it operating and productive; general repair and upkeep; (2) help in a lawsuit given by a stranger to it who has no lawful cause; meddling in somebody else's litigation; or (3) court-ordered support for an estranged spouse or for children.

B. For maintain. Using maintenance as a verb in place of maintain, v.t. <to maintenance a certain line of inquiry>, is poor. See NOUNS AS VERBS.

C. And champerty. See champerty (A). maintenance and cure (= compensation afforded by maritime law to a sailor who gets sick or is injured while working on a vessel) is a TERM OF ART in admiralty contexts: "The seaman's right to maintenance and cure for illness or injury occurring while he is in the service of the ship is often analogized to workmen's compensation. While the origins of the right are customarily traced back to the mediæval sea codes, it appears to have been first recognized in this country by Justice Story in two cases [that] he decided on circuit." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 281 (2d ed. 1975).

maintainer; maintainor. The -er spelling is preferred in all senses.

majorat (= [1] the right of primogeniture in Spain, Italy, and other countries; or [2] an estate attached to the right of primogeniture) is pronounced /mə-zhor-ə/. In the plural form (majorats), the pronunciation remains the same. See primogeniture.

majority. A. And plurality. These terms are frequently used in reference to judicial opinions, as well as elections. Majority = a group of more than 50 percent (e.g., five of nine judges). Plurality = the group with the largest percentage where none of the percentages is 50 percent or more (e.g., four of nine judges, when three have adopted a different position, and two others still another position). See majority opinion & plurality opinion.

B. Number. Majority, like minority, is generally used in AmE as a COLLECTIVE NOUN, so that it takes a singular verb. E.g., "The majority deem [read deems] negotiations leading to execution of contracts admissible."/ "The majority reach [read reaches] their [read its] conclusion regarding the 50% stock dividend and the proceeds of sale by expressly overruling Crawford Estate."

But in the phrase a majority of (people or things), the word majority is generally treated as a plural in both AmE and BrE—e.g.: "[T]he great majority of prosecutions are in theory private." Patrick Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 16 (1960)./ "A minority of the chairmen and deputy chairmen . . . of the county Quarter Sessions are also practising barristers." Id. at 24. See SYNESIS.

C. References in Dissenting Opinions. In some courts, such as the U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, it has generally been considered bad form to refer in a dissent to what the "majority" says. The thought was that, because the majority speaks for the court as a whole, a temperate dissenter should use the term court instead of majority. See OPINIONS, JUDICIAL.

D. For full age. This LEGALISM <age of majority> is common in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "In the law of contract, persons below the age of majority were formerly called infants . . ." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 481 (8th ed. 1991). Cf. minority (A). majority opinion (AmE) = the chief opinion of an appellate court when more than one opinion is filed. See opinion of the court.

make (= to draw up [a legal document]) is an old legal idiom, dating from the 14th century <they made their wills>. In several phrases, such as make answer, it contributes to wordiness—e.g.: "Within twenty days, if the case is to come before the New York Supreme Court, the defendant must make his answer [read answer] unless he secures an extension of time from the court." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 134 (1963).

make due is a blunder for make do, the 20th-century idiom meaning "to manage with what happens to be available, however inadequate it may be." The error has become distressingly common—e.g.: "Respondent's own testimony showed just the slight difference of $80 per month, despite her claim that the children had to make due [read make do] with considerably less expensive clothes . . . ." Esposito v. Esposito, 371 N.W.2d 608, 610 (Minn. Ct. App. 1985)./ "When individuals or organizations satisfice, they make due [read make do] with means and ends they deem 'good enough' rather than try in vain to optimize." David M. Frankford, The Medicare DRGs: Efficiency and Organizational Rationality, 10 Yale J. Reg. 273, 346 n.87 (1993).

make efforts is verbose for try—e.g.: "Thus a contract by which a marriage bureau simply undertakes to make efforts [read try] to find a spouse for a client has been held invalid." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 390 (8th ed. 1991).

make good (= to compensate for, restore, or effect) is a legal as well as a lay idiom. Its primary use in law is in the field of contracts—e.g.: "The person who had brought about the mixing was entitled to claim his proper quantity, but subject to the other proprietor's being first made good out of the whole mass."/ "[U]nless the articles so require a company is not legally bound to make good losses of fixed capital before distributing current profits." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 207 (P.W. French ed., 10th ed. 1951).

Occasionally, when this PHRASAL VERB has a direct object, it creates a MISCUE—e.g.: "There is, however, nothing objectionable about a promise to make good defalcations for which the promisor is personally responsible . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 231 (3d ed. 1981). The reader may wonder for an instant whether there has been a problem with bad defalcations? What is a good defalcation, and how does one make it? Of course, the miscue vanishes after a moment's reflection, but the problem with miscues is precisely that they demand a moment's reflection.

make law. When applied to a legislature, this phrase means one thing. When applied to a court, it means another: "In applying the expression to the judge, we use it only in a derivative or secondary sense. Otherwise we are in danger of obscuring his essentially interpretative function. In this secondary sense, but only so, the judge does undoubtedly 'make' law. It is not an original act of creation. Every act of interpretation shapes something new, in a secondary sense." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 309 (7th ed. 1964).

make oath and say. This DOUBLET is an archaic equivalent of testify—e.g.: "I, Xavier Y. Clarke, Barrister and Solicitor, of 5678 Unknown Road, Vancouver, British Columbia, make oath and say [read testify] as follows . . . ." (Can.)

make-whole, adj. To be made whole is to be returned to the status quo ante (q.v.); the verb phrase to make whole has been transformed into the adjectival phrase make-whole—e.g.: "The market value of the property deviated significantly from the make-whole remedy intended by the just compensation clause."

mala fide(s). Mala fide (= in bad faith) is the adverb or adjective. Mala fides /mal-ə-fī-deez/ (= bad faith) is the noun. Unlike bona fide, neither mala fide nor mala fides is understandable to most nonlawyers, and only infrequently is either phrase encountered in modern legal texts. The best advice is to avoid it and use the well-known Anglo-Saxon equivalent. See bad(-)faith, bona fides & good(-)faith.

The two specimens following date from the late 19th century: "If advice given mala fide, and loss sustained, entitle me to damages, why, though the advice be given honestly [i.e., bona fide], but under wrong information, with a loss sustained, am I not entitled to them [i.e., damages]?"/ "Therefore, we are all of opinion that the defendant ought in justice to refund this money thus mala fide recovered."

mala in se; mala prohibita. See malum in se.

MALAPROPISMS are words used incorrectly that produce a humorous effect. The term derives from the character Mrs. Malaprop in Sheridan's play The Rivals; Mrs. Malaprop loves big words but uses them ignorantly to create hilarious solecisms and occasionally embarrassing double entendres. One of Mrs. Malaprop's famous similes is as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile.

Legal malapropisms are more common than one might expect. One lawyer apparently mistook meretricious (= marked by falsity; superficially attractive but fake nevertheless) for meritorious with embarrassing consequences: a plaintiff's lawyer, he asked a judge to rule favorably on his client's "meretricious claim." Similarly, Senator Sam Ervin recalled a lawyer who, in arguing that his client had been provoked by name-calling (epithets), said: "I hope that in passing sentence on my client upon his conviction for assault and battery, your honor will bear in mind that he was provoked to do so by the epitaphs hurled at him by the witness." Quoted in Paul R. Clancy, Just a Country Lawyer 121 (1974).

Other illustrations are nefarious (= evil) for multifarious ("Ties, shirts, shoes, belts, socks, and all the other nefarious parts of one's wardrobe") and voracity (= greediness with food) for veracity ("There would have been nothing to be gained by trying to impeach the truthfulness or voracity of those witnesses."). For other examples, see avert, contribute, degradation, disparaging, effrontery, evoke, Hobson's choice (C), illicit, impotence, panacea, prodigious, prospectus (B), solicit (A) & surcease.

malefactor /mal-ə-fak-tər/ = criminal; felon. Although the term is now primarily literary, the OED contains the following quotation of Herbert Spencer from 1862: "By a malefactor, we now understand a convicted criminal, which is far from being the acceptation of 'evil-doer'."

malefeasance. See malfeasance.

malevolent; maleficent. Whereas the former means "desirous of evil to others," the latter means positively "hurtful or criminal to others." Hence malevolent has to do with malicious desires, and maleficent with malicious actions. See malice (final par.).

malfeasance; malfeazance; malefeasance; misfeasance; malefaction. Because the words malfeasance and misfeasance are imprecise in AmE, we begin with the clear-cut BrE distinctions. In BrE, malfeasance refers to an unlawful act, whereas misfeasance refers to an otherwise lawful act performed in a wrongful manner. Malefeasance and malfeazance are obsolete spellings of malfeasance.

In AmE, malfeasance is often confined to the sense "misprision; misconduct or wrongdoing by a public official." Misfeasance is a more general word meaning "transgression, trespass."

In AmE, the notion in the word malfeasance of public office is sometimes important; but the word is often used of corporate as well as of public officials, and sometimes of other persons—e.g.: "Defendants have not cited any persuasive authorities to support their view that Washington, the successor, is tainted in equity by the malfeasance of Oaks, its predecessor."/ "The contract shall not cover any loss of production due to the neglect or malfeasance of the insured."

The legislative drafter of the following statutory provision was not unorthodox in using both malfeasance and misfeasance: "Respondents were classified civil service employees, entitled under Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 124.34 (1984) to retain their positions 'during good behavior and efficient service,' who could not be dismissed 'except for misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance in office.'" See feasance & nonfeasance.

Malefaction (= crime, offense) is a FORMAL WORD that has become an ARCHAISM.

malfeasant, adj., corresponds to the noun malfeasance, q.v. See feasant.

malfeazance. See malfeasance.

MALFORMATIONS. See MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITIES

malice is often ambiguous because it has been diluted in legal writing. Early in the 20th century the dilution was noted and objected to: "[W]hen all that is meant by malice is an intention to commit an unlawful act without reference to spite or ill-feeling, it is better to drop the word malice and so avoid all misunderstanding." South Wales Miners Fed'n v. Glamorgan Coal Co., [1905] A.C. 239, 255. Even in the 19th century, however, the attenuated legal meaning had taken hold: "Malice, in the definition of murder, has not the same meaning as in common speech ["strong ill will"], and . . . has been thought to mean criminal intention." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 53 (1881; repr. 1946).

The legal and nonlegal senses can be pointedly in contrast: "Although when used in its non-legal sense the word clearly denotes an evil or wicked state of mind, at law it does not necessarily have such a connotation; at law it simply means that the actor intentionally did something unlawful. Thus, the legal meaning of 'malice' is confusing to a non-lawyer because an individual may act with good reason or from humanitarian motives but, as a matter of legal terminology, he has acted with 'malice' if his act is against the law." Jonathan M. Purver, The Language of Murder, 14 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 1306, 1306 (1967). As a noncriminal example, the malice requirement in proving libel of a public figure does not involve spite or ill will, only knowing falsity or a reckless disregard for the truth.

Lord Wright suggested that lawyers should use malevolence instead of malice whenever the idea of ill will is involved. See Crofter Hand Woven Tweed Co. v. Veitch, [1942] A.C. 435, 463. Others have suggested avoiding malice in the legal sense because "the criminal law ought not to need translation." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 75 (2d ed. 1961). In its place, the phrase intention or recklessness could be substituted.

malice aforethought "is a TERM OF ART, if not a term of deception." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 208 (1978). In this phrase, in fact, malice, q.v., does not even bear its usual legal meaning. The phrase malice aforethought does not "mean a state of the defendant's mind, as is often thought, except in the sense that he knew circumstances which did in fact make his conduct dangerous. It is, in truth, an allegation like that of negligence, which asserts that the party did not come up to the legal standard of action under the circumstances in which he found himself, and also that there was no exceptional fact or excuse present which took the case out of the general rule." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 62–63 (1881; repr. 1946). This phrase, in other words, is neither self-explanatory nor descriptive of a single and invariable frame of mind: it expresses the idea merely that an accused killed the victim intentionally, or under such circumstances that the accused will be treated as severely as if the killing had been intentional. See aforethought & wil(l)fulness.

The word aforethought—a 16th-century LOAN TRANSLATION of prepense, q.v., or praecogitata—should not obscure the sense, as it is liable to. The word was long ago added to malice to indicate a design conceived well before the fatal act, but the cases that arose at common law involved such a variety of killings that the courts placed little emphasis on the idea of a well-laid plan. Today, the only requirement is that the intention not be an *after*thought.

Perkins contends that, because "the whole development of the mental requirement of the crime of murder has centered [on] the words malice aforethought, it will probably be wise to retain this phrase to express the concept." Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 30 (1957). Even so, Perkins suggests person-endangering state of mind as a clearer substitute. Id. at 38. But even that phrase fails to account for circumstances that justify, excuse, or mitigate.

malicious (= intentional or reckless) bears a legal sense corresponding to the noun malice, q.v. Glanville Williams recommends substituting the phrase intentional or reckless in place of malicious. See Criminal Law 76 (2d ed. 1961). Likewise, the phrase intentionally or recklessly might replace the adverb maliciously.

malicious damage is the former name in BrE for what is now called criminal damage. The name change resulted from the Criminal Damage Act 1971.

maliciously. See malicious.

malicious mischief; criminal mischief. The traditional phrase, malicious mischief, refers to the common-law misdemeanor of intentionally destroying or damaging another's property. Variant phrases include malicious mischief and trespass, malicious injury, malicious trespass, and maliciously damaging the property of another. To avoid the problematic word malice, the drafters of the Model Penal Code invented the term criminal mischief, a term now used in several American jurisdictions.

malicious prosecution; abuse of process. Charles McCormick suggested a demarcation between cases in which "process rightfully issued is wrongfully used, which should be termed abuse of process, and cases of malicious procurement of the issuance of process, which should be termed malicious prosecution." Charles T. McCormick, Handbook of the Law of Damages § 109, at 385 (1935). That distinction is as often blurred today as it was in McCormick's time, but it would still promote clear thinking if lawyers observed it.

malignancy; malignity. Malignancy should be confined to denoting any cancerous disease. Malignity = wicked or deep-rooted ill will or hatred; malignant feelings or actions.

malodorous. See odorous.

malpractice is confined in AmE to negligence or incompetence on the part of professionals (e.g., lawyers and doctors); in BrE, however, it has this meaning as well as a sense similar to misfeasance: "The mortgagees are not parties to the malpractices of the Waites, and the tenants, who were the victims of those malpractices." (Eng.) The OED records two senses not current in AmE: (1) "illegal action by which a person in a position of trust seeks a personal benefit at the cost of others"; and (2) "a criminal or overtly mischievous action; wrongdoing; misconduct." Cf. malfeasance.

malum in se; malum prohibitum. Pl. mala in se and mala prohibita. These LATINISMS are frequently used by common-law writers, and knowing the distinction between them helps one understand the relation between morality and law. Malum in se = evil in itself; something inherently and universally considered evil. Malum prohibitum = wrong merely because it is proscribed; made unlawful by statute. Thus murder is the usual example of a crime malum in se, but running a traffic light is said to be malum prohibitum. E.g., "A malum prohibitum is just as much a crime as a malum in se." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 46 (1881; repr. 1946).

The phrases are sometimes used not as nouns, but as POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES—e.g.: "Acts mala in se include, in addition to felonies, all breaches of public order, injuries to person and property, outrages upon public decency or good morals, and breaches of official duty, when done wilfully or corruptly. Acts mala prohibita include any matter forbidden or commanded by statute, but not otherwise wrong." Commonwealth v. Adams, 114 Mass. 323, 324 (1873).

malversation. This arcane term, meaning "official corruption," has on occasion been misrendered malversion—e.g.: "Although the defendants' expert interpreted the phrase in question to connote more of an 'abuse,' 'misuse' or 'malversion' [read 'malversation'] of Post 12's $7,000, we find . . . that the issue was not whether the term used meant 'embezzlement,' but whether or not it was libelous." Laniecki v. Polish Army Veterans Ass'n, 480 A.2d 1101, 1107 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1984). "[D]efalcations under the Act of 1898 were not limited to deliberate malversions [read malversations]." In re Johnson, 691 F.2d 249, 254 (6th Cir. 1982). Cf. misconduct in office.

The agent noun, which seems never before to have been recorded in a dictionary, is malversator: "That case has at times been thought to lay down a different rule, treating the infringer in all cases as a trustee ex maleficio, and therefore subject to the severe standard imposed upon malversators." Cincinnati Car Co. v. New York Rapid Transit Corp., 66 F.2d 592, 593 (2d Cir. 1933).

-MAN; -PERSON. See SEXISM (B).

man and wife. Since the 1960s, this phrase has been steadily decreasing in frequency of use in American judicial opinions. The reason is that it does not accord the female an equal status—i.e., she is referred to only by reference to her marital status. A more balanced phrasing—though less idiomatic—is husband and wife. See SEXISM (D).

mancipation. See emancipation.

M & A, in late 20th-century legal slang, is the abbreviated form of mergers and acquisitions.

mandamus, n., was originally a prerogative writ that, up to the 19th century, was used as a writ of restitution for those wrongfully deprived of public offices, as in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803). Thus, it was instrumental in securing democratic principles in the common law. Since the late 19th century, the writ has grown in use: a superior court issues it to compel a lower court or a government officer to perform mandatory or purely ministerial duties correctly. In England, mandamus has, since 1938, been an order, as opposed to a writ. See prerogative writs.

Pl. mandamuses. See HYPERCORRECTION (A).

mandamus, v.t., – to order (a lower court or a government official) to perform a specified act. This verb began as a colloquialism in the early 19th century. It is labeled colloquial in W2 (1934) but has no such notation in W3 (1961). It has come to appear even in published opinions—e.g.: "The prayer was that the county treasurer be mandamused to pay . . . the sum of $1,565 . . . ." Farson, Son & Co. v. Bird, 248 U.S. 268, 270 (1919)./ "Walker urges this Court to issue a Writ of Mandamus to the Court of Appeals ordering that court to mandamus Johnson to produce the statement of facts . . . ." Pat Walker & Co. v. Johnson, 623 S.W.2d 306, 308 (Tex. 1981).

Actually, the use of mandamus as a verb is closer to the etymological sense (L. "we charge or command") than the nominal use. The brevity of to mandamus recommends its more widespread adoption; no valid reasons exist to oppose it.

mandate = (1) an order from an appellate court directing a lower court to take a specified action; (2) a judicial command directed to an officer of the court to enforce a court order; (3) in civil law, a written command given by a principal to an agent; (4) in Roman law, a commission by which one person (the mandator) requests someone (the mandatary) to perform some service gratuitously, the commission becoming effective when the mandatary agrees—a synonym in this sense is mandatum; (5) in international law, an authority given by the League of Nations to certain governments to take over the administration and development of certain territories (replaced after 1945 by trusteeship); or (6) in politics, the electorate's overwhelming show of approval for a given political platform. See CHAMELEON-HUED WORDS.

mandate, v.t., for prescribe is merely verbal sloppiness. "The Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure mandate [read prescribe] the time for filing a notice of appeal."

mandatory; mandatary. Horwill wrote in the 1930s that mandatory—frequently used in AmE—is uncommon in England, and that obligatory and compulsory are more common. The latter two terms may still be predominant, but mandatory injunction is now a common phrase in English law reports. The three words—mandatory, obligatory, and compulsory—are close synonyms. See directory.

Mandatary, n. & adj., is a civil-law term. As a noun, it is a close equivalent to what in common-law jurisdictions is called an agent, though a mandatary usually (as in Scotland) acts gratuitously—e.g.: "[A]s respects liability for misconduct and limitation of action therefor they are more exactly agents or mandataries." Anderson v. Gailey, 33 F.2d 589, 592 (N.D. Ga. 1929)./ "[T]he fraud committed by a mandatary in exercise of the mandate is regarded as fraud committed by the principal by virtue of the rules governing representation." Saul Litvinoff, Vices of Consent, Error, Fraud, Duress and an Epilogue on Lesion, 50 La. L. Rev. 1, 71 (1989). As an adjective, the word means "of or relating to an agency relationship"—e.g.: "[T]his contract is also a contract of a certain kind; it is a mandatary contract, establishing an agency relationship . . . ." Commonwealth Capital Corp. v. Enterprise Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 630 F. Supp. 1199, 1201 (E.D. La. 1986).

For the Roman-law sense of mandatary, see mandate (sense 4).

mandatory injunction; prohibitory injunction. The former court order requires a positive action; the latter requires restraint from action. See injunction.

manifest, adj., often functions in suspect ways in legal writing: "Someone has observed that whenever a lawyer says that something or other was the manifest intention of a man, 'manifest' means that the man never really had such an intention." Jerome Frank, Law and the Modern Mind 30 (1930; repr. 1963). This word is one of those vague terms by which lawyers "create an appearance of continuity, uniformity and definiteness [that does] not in fact exist." Id.

manifesto. Pl. -os. See PLURALS (C).

man-killing is still occasionally used in law to refer to the action of one person against another, but rarely in nonlegal writing. "Homicidal mania is the morbid and uncontrollable appetite for man-killing." See murder (A) & SEXISM (B).

manner, in a ——. This phrase typifies the style of a writer whose prose reads slowly. In a professional manner should be professionally; in a rigid manner should be rigidly; in a childish manner should be childishly. Good editors do not leave such phrases untouched.

Still, some phrases cannot be made into -ly adverbs: in a Rambo-like manner; in a determined manner (few editors would choose determinedly—see -EDLY); in a catch-as-catch-can manner. In many such contexts, though, the word way would be an improvement over manner.

man-of-law (= a man skilled in law; a lawyer), a word with decidedly positive connotations, is little used today, probably because it is considered sexist. (See SEXISM (B).) Some writers omit the hyphens—e.g.: "Never before had any society taken a professional man of law—Holmes, about whom I shall have more to say presently—as the embodiment of its dream." Grant Gilmore, The Ages of American Law 42 (1977).

manservant. The plural form, oddly, makes both words in the compound plural: menservants.

manslaughter, n. A. Voluntary manslaughter and *involuntary manslaughter. Because the term manslaughter (= unlawful homicide committed without malice aforethought) extends from the verge of murder to the verge of excusable homicide, it became necessary to divide the term into categories. Voluntary manslaughter means "an act of murder reduced to manslaughter because of extenuating circumstances such as provocation or diminished responsibility." In some jurisdictions, this crime is known as intentional manslaughter.

The other category, by natural contrast, is called involuntary manslaughter, but in this phrase the word involuntary is used quite unnaturally as a catch-all: the phrase means "homicide in which there is no intention to kill or do grievous bodily harm."

In England, involuntary manslaughter is subdivided still further into what one writer calls straightforward manslaughter and constructive manslaughter. The "straightforward" type "requires the prosecution to prove that the defendant caused the death in question by an act or omission, amounting in either case to gross negligence or recklessness (which one is not finally settled) in breach of a duty of care." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 224 (1978). Constructive manslaughter, in contrast, consists in "a killing in the course of certain kinds of unlawful acts, and then only when the defendant is negligent as to causing bodily injury." Id. at 238. See murder (B).

B. And causing death by reckless or dangerous driving. In 1956, this EUPHEMISM became established in English statutory law "owing to the notorious reluctance of juries to convict of 'motor manslaughter.'" William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 158 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

manslaughter, v.t. (= to kill [a person] unlawfully but without malice aforethought) is rightly listed as a colloquialism in the SOED. Though not common, it has appeared in reported opinions—e.g.: "In Burney, . . . the defendant assaulted victim Williams with a deadly weapon and manslaughtered victim Grant during a crowded bar room quarrel culminating in a shooting." People v. Masters, 241 Cal. Rptr. 511, 517 (Ct. App. 1988).

manslaughterer (= one who commits manslaughter) is infrequent but arguably useful—e.g.: "It was thought that actors whose emotions were stirred by other forms of outrageous conduct . . . also should be punished as manslaughterers rather than murderers." Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 218 (1977)./ "Defendant's planning activity rendered him more culpable than other manslaughterers . . . ." People v. Levitt, 203 Cal. Rptr. 276, 287 (Ct. App. 1984).

mantle; mantel. Mantle means, among other things, "a loose robe," and is frequently used by legal writers in figurative senses—e.g.: "The mantle of immunity should be withdrawn."/ "The court has not felt constrained by stare decisis in its expansion of the protective mantle of sovereign immunity." See clothe.

Mantel is a different and more common word in everyday speech. It means "a structure of wood or marble above or around a fireplace; a shelf." In legal writing, the spelling mantel is frequently used where mantle belongs.

manufacturer. So spelled. Some legal writers mistakenly write -or. See -ER (A).

many. A. And much. Many is used with count nouns (i.e., those that comprise a number of discrete or separable entities). Much is used with mass nouns (i.e., those that refer to amounts as distinguished from numbers). Hence, many persons but much salt. Here much is used incorrectly: "We do not have much [read many] facts here." Cf. less for fewer, and note that less is the correlative of much, whereas fewer is the correlative of many. See less (A) & COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS (A).

Sometimes the writer must decide whether a word such as data, q.v., is a count noun (as it traditionally has been) or a mass noun (as it has recently come to be). E.g., "But much [read many?] of the data in present personnel files is highly subjective." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 21 (1970). Of course, the choice of the singular verb is shows that Justice Douglas considered data a mass noun—so much was the appropriate word.

B. Many . . . abound. This phrasing commonly creates a REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "Certainly it must be conceded that many valid reasons abound [read that valid reasons abound] for choosing private over public education . . . ." Cook v. Hudson, 511 F.2d 744, 752 (5th Cir. 1975) (Clark, J., dissenting)./ "Many other examples abound [read Other examples abound] in the general statutes of local application passed by the Alabama legislature prior to the adoption of Amendments 375 and 397." Phalen v. Birmingham Racing Comm'n, 481 So. 2d 1108, 1122 (Ala. 1985).

margin (= footnotes) occurs today primarily in legal writing, although scholars in all disciplines once commonly used it. "The order and decree dismissing the bill is set out in the margin." This usage harks back to a bygone era when notes were set out in the outer margins rather than at the foot of the page.

marginal notes, in British STATUTE DRAFTING, are brief notes indicating the scope or subject matter of an Act of Parliament. Generally, they enhance readability, but they are not authoritative as a guide to interpretation because they are not debated as part of the bill and may be misleading.

marijuana; maribuana. The former now predominates in judicial opinions and should be preferred. Justice Lewis F. Powell, speaking in 1986 at a luncheon, stated: "The big problem we had in the Court this past Term was how to spell marijuana. We were about equally divided between a 'j' and an 'h' and since I was supposed to be the swing vote on the court, and just to show my impartiality, I added a footnote in a case . . . in which I spelled marijuana with a 'j' once and an 'h' in the same sentence." Quoted in News, A.B.A. J., 1 Oct. 1986, at 17, 34.

mariner is a serviceable replacement for seaman, which not only is sexist but also has an awkward homophone. See able-bodied seaman, seaman & SEXISM (B).

mariner's will. See oral will.

marital. See matrimonial law & marriage, adj.

marital rape was a type of OXYMORON at common law, since a husband was held to be exempt from rape charges if he had nonconsensual sexual intercourse with his wife. The so-called marital-rape exemption, though, is gradually disappearing as Anglo-American jurisdictions have generally abolished it. As one writer puts it, abolition "is surely important as a statement of the married woman's autonomy and freedom of choice in sexual matters." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 303 (1991). See rape (A).

marital relation is often wordy for marriage—e.g.: "A valid divorce terminates the marital relation [read marriage] and with it the duty of the husband to support his wife and vice versa . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 676 (3d ed. 1982). In the plural form, marital relations is sometimes used as a EUPHEMISM for sexual relations between husband and wife.

maritime. See admiralty (A). marked is pronounced /markt/, as one syllable. The pronunciation /mar-kəd/, in two syllables, is a vestige of the correct adverbial pronunciation /mar-kəd-lee/.

marketable; merchantable. The latter might well be termed a legal ARCHAISM, for it has no nuance not conveyed by the former. E.g., "Delivery was made subject to the condition that appellant furnish merchantable [read marketable] title." (Marketable title = a seller's nondefective title to property.) But merchantable appears in many statutes—such as the U.K. Sale of Goods Act—and is therefore unlikely to disappear anytime soon.

market overt usu. means something more specific than open market. Market overt = an open, legally regulated public market where buyers, with some exceptions, acquire good title to products regardless of any defects in the seller's title. Open market, though it sometimes shares that sense, generally means "a market with no competitive restrictions on price or availability of products."

Market overt is the less common term: "Conceivably the common-law judges might have refused to allow the bailor to recover in detinue against a bona fide purchaser, as they did refuse it against a purchaser in market overt; but this would have involved a weighing of ethical considerations altogether foreign to the medieval mode of thought."

marque, letters of. See letters of marque.

marriable. See marriageable.

marriage, adj. The word marital is better than marriage in adjectival senses. E.g., "An aggrieved spouse is not compelled to seek the courts of another state for the protection of her marriage [read marital] status." See NOUNS AS ADJECTIVES.

marriage, n. See common-law marriage.

marriageable; marriable. The latter is an ARCHAISM to be avoided.

marriage dissolution is a EUPHEMISM for divorce or annulment. E.g., "The Family Law Act, a response to general dissatisfaction with the social and legal procedures affecting divorce actions in California, effected substantial changes in the substantive law and procedure in proceedings for dissolution of marriage." Note the INELEGANT VARIATION in that sentence (divorce . . . dissolution of marriage)./ "The State Bar of Texas sponsored the Marriage Dissolution Institute in Fort Worth in February 1985." That marriage dissolution may technically encompass annulments as well as divorces does not redeem it. See divorce (B).

marriage of convenience; mariage de convenance. The anglicized version is to be preferred over the GALLICISM. But it should be understood rightly: marriage of convenience is not "an ill-considered marriage that happens to be convenient to the parties involved," but "a marriage contracted for social or financial advantages rather than out of mutual love."

marshal, n., – (1) a law-enforcement officer with duties similar to those of a sheriff; (2) a judicial officer who provides court security, executes process, and performs other tasks for a court; or (3) in England, a recently called barrister who acts as personal officer of and secretary to a High Court judge on circuit. The word is preferably so spelled—not marshall.

marshal, v.t. (= to arrange in order), in its past-tense and participial forms, is frequently misspelled in AmE with a doubled -l-. E.g., "The strongest support marshalled [read, in AmE, marshaled] by the majority opinion is the statement by Dean Page Keeton." See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

In BrE, the inflected form is marshalled, but the uninflected form is still marshal, as in AmE: "If one side can marshall [read marshal] a precedent that is binding and in point, that will conclude the debate." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 234 (2d ed. 1985).

martial law; military law. The two are distinct, as Holland suggests: "'Martial' as opposed to 'military law' is not recoguised by the law of England [or of the U.S.]." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 377 n.2 (13th ed. 1924). Martial law is the body of rules applied on grounds of necessity by a country's rulers when the civil government has failed or looks as if it might fail to function, the armed forces assuming control purportedly until civil processes and courts can be restored to their lawful places. Martial law applies only within a given country—not within occupied enemy territory. Military law, on the other hand, refers to the special branch of law that governs military discipline and other rules regarding service in the armed forces. Thus martial law usu. applies to civilians as well as soldiers, whereas military law almost never applies to civilians.

Mary Carter agreement, which owes its name to Booth v. Mary Carter Paint Co., 202 So. 2d 8 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1967), refers to a contract by which a codefendant settles with the plaintiff and obtains a release, with the further agreement that the codefendant will receive a portion of any amount that the plaintiff may recover from one or more other defendants. In short, the codefendant settles and then joins forces with the plaintiff against the remaining codefendants. See CASE REFERENCES (C).

Some lawyers shorten the phrase to Mary Carter <Sinergy then entered into a Mary Carter with the plaintiff>. Much more slangily, lawyers sometimes use the phrase as a verb <Sinergy was Mary Cartered out of the case>.

MASCULINE AND FEMININE PRONOUNS. See SEXISM (A).

mass of, a. See SYNESIS.

mass tort = a large number of tort claims with a common cause—such as a single-accident disaster, a defective product that injures many people, or environmental contamination at a single site—that has injured many victims. This term has, by extension, given rise to some odd JARGON such as mass litigation and even mass defendant. To avoid giving mass these contorted senses, the better practice is to write mass-tort litigation and mass-tort defendant.

master. A. Meaning "employer." The word master was once regularly used to mean "employer" in legal language, and servant to mean "employee." But this terminology has long been obsolescent. "Even the legal vocabulary changes; younger lawyers in the spirit of modern labor relations scorn to speak of the law of master and servant, under which rubric we used to find the little law that was especially directed to employment." Robert H. Jackson, Foreword to Jurisprudence in Action iii (1953). See employer and employee & servant.

B. Referring to a Parajudicial Officer. During the Middle Ages, the Court of Chancery began appointing officers to assist in various equitable proceedings. These officers were known as masters. Though the British Parliament abolished the office in the late 19th century, many American jurisdictions have continued using officers bearing the title master, without regard to the equitable or legal nature of the proceedings. Among the functions they may perform are taking testimony, computing interest, valuing annuities, investigating encumbrances on land titles, and the like—virtually always with a written report to the court.

master and servant. See employer and employee & master (A).

masterful; masterly. Masterful describes a powerful, even bullying, superior as opposed to servant or slave. Masterly indicates the skill of a master of a profession or trade as opposed to an unskilled worker. A master craftsman is masterly; a boorish tyrant is masterful. Which is the correct term in the following sentence, from a nonlegal text? "Though Britain's Derek Jacobi looks about as much like Adolph Hitler as Archie Bunker, he evokes the Fuhrer with masterful verve." (The actor is masterly; Hitler was masterful.)

Perhaps one reason the two words are so frequently confounded is that when an adverb for masterly is needed, masterfully seems more natural than masterlily. (See ADVERBS (B).) Indeed, "He writes masterfully" strikes one as much less stilted than "He writes masterlily." This problem with the adverbial form threatens to destroy a useful distinction between the two adjectival forms. Perhaps masterlily would seem less pedantic if we were to use it more often. Barring that, in a masterly way is always available.

master of the bench. See bencher.

Master of the Rolls = president of the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) in England.

MATCHING PARTS. See PARALLELISM.

material, adj.; relevant. The distinction between these terms—traditionally fundamental to the law of evidence—is counterintuitive and therefore sometimes confusing. Relevant = tending to prove or disprove a matter in issue. Material = having some logical connection with the consequential facts.

Why counterintuitive? Because the definition of material is the one that most educated people would match with relevant. The result of this confusion, among lawyers and nonlawyers alike, is that the drafters of the Federal Rules of Evidence felt compelled to "avoid 'the loosely used and ambiguous word material,' using instead the phrase 'of consequence in determination of the action' in defining relevance." Huff v. White Motor Corp., 609 F.2d 286, 294 n.13 (7th Cir. 1979)

Material, the victim of lawyers' SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, is frequently used in the sense "significant." E.g., "An immediate appeal would materially [i.e., significantly] advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." This sense is now commonplace in American securities law, where it is too pervasive to be considered exceptionable. It is also common in other legal contexts.

matrimonial law. We might question why matrimonial rather than marital came to be used in this and related phrases. Matrimonial is a FORMAL WORD rarely used outside the law except in reference to wedding services. Yet the law on both sides of the Atlantic has embraced this word in phrases such as matrimonial home, matrimonial offense, and matrimonial cohabitation. E.g., "Strangely, however, the changes in the method of quantifying rights in the matrimonial home have gone unnoticed." (Eng.)/ "In matrimonial causes because the state has an interest, special duties are laid on solicitors and the bar." (Eng.) The American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers is unlikely to approve of a change in terminology.

Still, in some contexts matrimonial is inarguably turgid in place of marital: "This language frequently has been applied as a general rule and the federal courts consistently have refused to entertain actions involving matrimonial [read marital] status." See marriage, adj.

matter is sometimes viewed as the lawyer's puffed-up equivalent of case. It commonly occurs in contexts such as these: "I handled a fascinating matter [read case] the other day."/ "How many matters [read cases] are there on the docket?" And it appears in BrE as well as AmE—e.g.: "It should be noted that section 76(i) extends not only to matters arising under the Constitution but also to matters involving its interpretation." James Crawford, Australian Courts of Law 146 (1982).

Actually, the term derives from the language of equity: "for the Queen's Bench Division we usually talk about 'actions,' denoting the idea of litigants who have a dispute to be determined, whilst in the Chancery Division we are more apt to speak of 'actions and matters.' Some of the causes in the Chancery Division are normal litigation between contesting parties, but 'matters' do not necessarily mean that there is a dispute." R.M. Jackson, The Machinery of Justice in England 50–51 (5th ed. 1967).

That quotation suggests a workable distinction for AmE and BrE alike: case or action refers to a pending lawsuit in which there is a genuine dispute; matter refers to any other affair in which a lawyer becomes professionally involved. It therefore makes good sense for law firms to keep records, as they ordinarily do, of "client-matter" numbers. A matter might involve legal advice where litigation is never contemplated.

maugre /maw-gər/ = despite. Listed as obsolete or archaic in virtually every English-language dictionary, this word is just one more ARCHAISM in which legal inkhornists can indulge. E.g., "Maugre this: shall we repudiate such 'excellent method of decision,' as violative of the common law of England in 1791?" Sunray Oil Corp. v. Allbritton, 187 F.2d 475, 480–81 (5th Cir. 1951)./ "Complaint is next made that the court erred in permitting the prosecutor to state in his final argument[,] maugre timely objection by counsel for the defendant, the following: . . . ." Shadle v. State, 194 So. 2d 538, 542–43 (Ala. 1967).

maximal. See maximum.

MAXIMS. A maxim is a traditional legal principle that has been frozen into a concise expression. There are a few legal and quasi-legal maxims that everyone knows, such as these:

- A man's home is his castle. See castle doctrine.
- Caveat emptor. See caveat.
- Ignorance of the law is no excuse. This phrase is a close LOAN TRANSLATION of ignorantia juris neminem excusat (= ignorance of the law excuses nobody). See ignorantia juris.
- Possession is nine-tenths of the law. See possession is nine-tenths of the law.

Then there are the thousands of maxims dressed up in Latin, few of which most lawyers seem nowadays to know. Among the more common ones are these:

- Actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea (= an act does not make the doer guilty unless his or her mind is guilty). See actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea.
- Delegatus non potest delegare (= a person to whom work is delegated cannot himself [or herself] delegate it).
- De minimis non curat lex (= the law does not concern itself with trifles). "No one knows exactly what it means." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 356 (1943). See de minimis (A).
- Ex turpi causa non oritur actio (= from an illegal transaction no action arises).
- Ignorantia facti excusat (= ignorance of fact excuses, i.e., is a ground for relief).

- Nulla poena sine lege (= no punishment except in accordance with the law). See nulla poena sine lege.
- Qui facit per alium facit per se (= he who acts through another acts himself; she who acts through another acts herself).
- Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas (= one should use one's own property in a manner that does not injure that of another). See sic utere.
- Transit in rem iudicatam (= it passes into a matter adjudged, i.e., becomes res judicata).
- Ubi remedium, ibi ius (= where there is a remedy, there is a right).
- Volenti non fit injuria (= that to which a person consents cannot be considered an injury). See volenti non fit injuria.

Though these and other maxims dot the pages of lawbooks—especially older lawbooks—most legal thinkers consider them unnecessary to a mature legal system. Roscoe Pound, for example, suggested that they characterize a legal system still in its formative stages: "[A] body of primitive law . . . often contains a certain number of sententious legal proverbs, put in striking form so as to stick in the memory but vague in their content." An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 48–49 (1922; repr. 1975). Lon Fuller echoed this view: "Undeveloped systems of law have a decided penchant for such brocards." Legal Fictions 33–34 (1967; repr. 1977).

Several writers have suggested that we are better off depositing maxims in the dustbin of history:

- "It seems to me that legal maxims in general are little more than pert headings of chapters. They are rather minims than maxims, for they give not a particularly great but a particularly small amount of information. As often as not, the exceptions and qualifications to them are more important than the so-called rules." 2 James F. Stephen, History of the Criminal Law of England 94 n.1 (1883).
- "[T]he fact that the great majority of legal maxims are clothed in the words of a dead language has had, in some instances, the effect of preventing proper inquiry into their meaning. A phrase couched in Latin seems to some persons invested with 'a kind of halo.'" Jeremiah Smith, The Use of Maxims in Jurisprudence, 9 Harv. L. Rev. 13, 25–26 (1895).
- "General propositions do not decide concrete cases." Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 76 (1905) (Holmes, J., dissenting).
- "[N]o one who reflects on the subject can doubt that some useless Latin maxims, and some untrue Latin maxims, have continued current, and that other Latin maxims have been misapplied, when this would not have happened if those maxims had been expressed only in the vernacular." Sperbeck v. A.L. Burbank Co., 190 F.2d 449, 455 n.8 (2d Cir. 1951).
- "Happily such 'short, dark maxims' are not so common as they once were. When they are used today, it is for the sake of their flavor of antiquity, rather than because of any notion that they are actually explanatory." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 33–34 (1967; repr. 1977).

For the most nearly definitive work on maxims in Anglo-American law, see Herbert Broom, A Selection of Legal Maxims (10th ed. 1939). For a collection of more than a thousand maxims, see E. Hilton Jackson, Latin for Lawyers (1937; repr. 1992). See LATINISMS.

maximum, n. & adj.; maximal, adj. More and more frequently, maximum (like minimum) has come to act as its own adjective. E.g., "In bidding, the contractor shall expose to the bidders the maximum quantities required by the work."

Maximal usually means "the greatest possible," rather than merely "of, relating to, or constituting a maximum." E.g., "The state's interest in swift and efficient punishment need not eviscerate its interest in maximal certainty of application." See minimal.

The plural of the noun maximum is maxima—e.g.: "Moreover, a majority of the states pay less than their determined standard of need, and twenty of these states impose maximums [read maxima] on family grants of the kind here in issue."/ "To appreciate the truth of this assertion it is only necessary to think of the imposition of prison sentences within the maxima allowed by the various statutes . . . ." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 41 (1976). See PLURALS (A).

maximum [+ name] is another way of describing a "hanging judge" (q.v.). The phrase suggests that the judge routinely imposes the maximum sentence—e.g.: "But he had been at least as stern in earlier criminal cases, sentencing convicted defendants to long terms, thus earning the nickname 'maximum John.'" Sirica, 88, Dies; Persistent Judge in Fall of Nixon, N.Y. Times, 15 Aug. 1992, at 1, 11.

may = (1) has discretion to; is permitted to <suit may be brought in any district court>; (2) possibly will <the court may apply this doctrine>; or (3) shall. Sense (3), though a lexical perversion, has come about because "courts not infrequently construe may as shall or must to the end that justice may not be the slave of grammar" (Black's 6th ed.).

But no drafter who means must should consciously use may; the liberties taken by the courts in construing drafters' oversights should not be allowed to change the essential meanings of basic words like may. See can & WORDS OF AUTHORITY (E).

mayhem. A. Senses. Mayhem = (1) malicious injury to or maiming of a person, orig. so as to impair or destroy the victim's capacity for self-defense; (2) violent and damaging action; violent destruction; or (3) rowdy confusion, disruption, chaos. Sense (3) is inappropriately attenuated.

B. And maim, n. Though etymologically identical, mayhem and maim have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. In the best usage, mayhem refers to the crime (sense 1) and maim to the type of injury required for the crime.

C. And maihem. This spelling amounts to nothing more than a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

may it please the court is the standard introductory phrase that lawyers use when speaking to an appellate court. Some people call it LEGALESE, but it is not really in that category. The phrase helps establish a tone of civility and respect in an oral argument.

may not is sometimes the source of AMBIGUITY: it may mean either "is disallowed from" or "might or might not." For example, if an application contained a notice that read, "Applications received after September 30 may not be considered by this office," the question arises whether the office is prohibited from considering it or the decision about considering it depends on how the office exercises its discretion (or whim).

In stating a prohibition, some writers would solve the problem by resorting to cannot, but doing so blurs the widely recognized distinction between can and may. See can.

A better way to solve the problem in many contexts is to use the phrase must not. Thus, instead of saying that a brief may not contain addenda, one might say that a brief must not (preferably not shall not) contain addenda. (See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (A).) The phrasing with must is certainly unambiguous.

In drafted documents, however, the basic phrase at issue—may not—is conventionally viewed as unambiguous. Why? Because in DRAFTING, in which one sets forth rights, duties, and liabilities, one never has occasion to speculate in the sense of "might or might not." So, generally speaking, may not does not cause interpretative difficulties in statutes, rules, contracts, bylaws, and the like. But those who want to forestall even a minute possibility of a problem use must not. See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (F).

me; I. See NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES. For the error between you and I, see between (C).

mean, adj., = (1) small; (2) obstreperous; or (3) median, average. Readers today often misunderstand sense (1). A mean-spirited person is not malevolent or evil; rather, the person has a small spirit, a petty mind.

mean, n.; median. Writers should distinguish between these two words. The mean is the average. The median is the point in a series of numbers above which is half the series and below which is the other half.

meaningful (= full of meaning or expression) has, with some irony, rightly been criticized as a meaningless buzzword, esp. when used for reasonable. Here its meaning is stretched to the breaking point: "Options should be used carefully and sparingly; any options issued must expire a meaningful [read reasonable] time before the earliest possible conversion date."/ "Due process requires an opportunity for a hearing to be granted at a meaningful [read reasonable] time and in a meaningful [read reasonable] manner." Meaningful has also been used to mean "significant, important," as here: "We find no meaningful constitutional infraction." These uses have made meaningful a VOGUE WORD that careful writers avoid.

mechanic's lien; mechanic's and materialman's lien. A mechanic furnishes labor to the construction of improvements on land; a materialman furnishes materials. Because the mechanic and the materialman are usually one and the same, and because the legal distinction between the two is outmoded in most jurisdictions, it has become customary to refer to both in one breath, in the general phrase mechanic's lien or construction lien.

Such a lien secures payment for labor or materials supplied in improving, repairing, or maintaining real property. In many jurisdictions, the rules for perfecting such a lien are highly technical and rigid.

The word materialman is, from the viewpoint of eradicating sexist language, a particularly difficult one to replace. The word supplier is a possible candidate, but the word may not need a replacement at all if we merely refer to a mechanic's lien or construction lien. See SEXISM (B).

media; medium. Media, the plural of medium, cannot properly be used as a singular. And medias, which has recently raised its ugly head, can only be described as illiterate.

Mediums is the correct plural when the sense of medium is "a clairvoyant; spiritualist"—e.g.: "A similar state of dissociation seems to account for the manifestations of some 'psychic mediums.'" Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 37 (2d ed. 1961). Otherwise, the form should be avoided: "It is true that one of the mediums [read media] of the lawyer's art is rules, and the lawyer must know rules . . . ." James B. White, The Legal Imagination xxxv (1973)./ "Reporters for printed mediums [read media] also focus criticism on television for using all-purpose experts to express an opinion on a wide variety of subjects." Charles Rothfeld, On Legal Pundits and How They Got That Way, N.Y. Times, 4 May 1990, at B10.

Media is often used as a shortened form of communications media. E.g., "If one viewpoint monopolizes the media, however, the discussion that flows from it will not be full and unrestricted."

mediate, adj., = occupying a middle position; acting through an intermediate person or thing. It is frequently used in contrast with immediate. The Rule in Shelley's Case is often stated thus: "[W]here the ancestor takes an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance, an estate is limited either mediately or immediately to his heirs, either in fee or in tail, 'the heirs' are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase." Baker v. Scott, 62 Ill. 86, 90 (1871).

mediation. A. Generally. Mediation "has long been a relatively complex word in English." Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society 170 (1976). The most common, but conflicting, senses are the following, for which Williams suggests alternatives (in parentheses): (1) "intermediary action designed to bring about reconciliation or agreement" (conciliation); (2) "an activity that indirectly or deviously expresses a relationship between otherwise separated facts, actions, and experiences" (ideology or rationalization); and (3) "an activity that directly expresses otherwise unexpressed relations" (form).

B. And conciliation. The distinction between mediation and conciliation is widely debated among those interested in ADR (q.v.), arbitration, and international diplomacy. Some suggest that conciliation is "a nonbinding arbitration," whereas mediation is merely "assisted negotiation." Others put it nearly the opposite way: conciliation involves a third party's trying to bring together disputing parties to help them reconcile their differences, whereas mediation goes further by allowing the third party to suggest terms on which the dispute might be resolved. Still others reject these attempts at DIFFERENTIATION and contend that there is no consensus about what the two words mean—that they are generally interchangeable. Though a distinction would be convenient, those who argue that usage indicates a broad synonymy are most accurate.

mediatory; mediative; mediatorial. The second is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the first. Mediatorial, however, corresponds not to mediation but to mediator—e.g.: "It is the high province of this Court to interpose its benign and mediatorial influence." Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 184 (1824) (argument of counsel).

medical; medicinal. The former applies to all aspects of a physician's practice, the latter only to what is associated with medicines.

medication; medicament. See medicine.

medicinal. See medical.

medicine; medication; medicament. Medication has traditionally meant "the action of treating medically," but, through SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, has recently come to mean "a medicinal substance, medicament"—a sense that careful writers avoid. Medicament (= a substance taken internally or used externally in curative treatment) and medicine (= a substance taken internally in curative treatment) are synonymous with the loose meaning of medication.

medicolegal (= involving the application of medical science to law), though perhaps seeming to be a NEOLOGISM, was first used in the early 19th century. It has proved useful enough to be used frequently—e.g.: L. Thoinot & A.W. Weysse, Medico-Legal Moral Offenses (1911)./ "That these tests are very far from reality cannot, we think, be successfully disputed. Certainly, many competent medicolegal writers have so indicated and in our opinion they have proved their case." U.S. ex rel.

Smith v. Baldi, 192 F.2d 540, 566 (3d Cir. 1951)./ "M-LCS described itself as 'the only full-time consulting firm dedicated to assisting attorneys in all jurisdictions with screening and preparing medico-legal cases . . . .'" Joseph Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 122 (1978) (quoting advertisement). The best modern spelling is medicolegal—with no hyphen. Cf. psycholegal.

meeting of the minds. Grant Gilmore called this phrase "quaintly archaic." The Death of Contract 43 (1974). It is not quite a LOAN TRANSLATION, but perhaps a loan paraphrase, of the Roman-law phrase consensus ad idem. Holmes, Williston, and others treated meeting of the minds with contempt because it denotes a subjective rather than an objective theory of contracts. Thus, it is more than quaintly archaic; as a matter of substantive law, it is long since outmoded. Cf. mutuality of obligation.

member of the legal profession. This phrase is a needless circumlocution for lawyer.

memento. So spelled.

memoranda; memorandums. Memorandum is always the singular noun. Either -dums or -da is correct as a plural. No less a writer than Shakespeare used memorandums (Henry IV, Part 1, 3.3.157–63), but memoranda now predominates. See PLURALS (A).

Occasionally the Latinate plural is misused as a singular: "Once a valid agreement is evidenced by such a memoranda [read memorandum], the statute comes into play to prevent contradiction of the terms included in the memoranda [read memorandum] by evidence of any prior agreement."

memorandize (= to put into a memo), an -IZE neologism with little merit, appears to be a NEEDLESS VARIANT of memorialize, q.v. E.g., "[T]he two-year leaseback . . . was oral, and is not 'memorandized' [read memorialized] by any writing as required by the statute of frauds." Truslow v. Woodruff, 60 Cal. Rptr. 304, 308 n.1 (Ct. App. 1967).

memorandums. See memoranda.

memorialize (= to preserve the memory of; to supply the memorial of) is a word of great seriousness in lay contexts <to memorialize the plight of European Jews in World War II>. In legal writing, by contrast, it is used in far more mundane contexts: "A plea agreement letter memorialized the respective promises of the witness and the government."/ "According to the district court, the parties intended the paragraph memorializing their agreed right to cease option payments only to establish a right of succession to partnership interests."

memory of man runneth not to the contrary. This immemorial phrase expresses immemoriality—or the point before which legal memory began (fixed as the year 1189), also known as time immemorial, q.v. By the early 16th century, English courts were coming to use legal memory to restrict the growth of custom, which could be established only if it predated 1189.

The phrase is frequently used in extended senses in American judicial opinions as well as in legal commentary. E.g., "[W]e are not dealing with a traditional common law crime such as assault and battery, a crime in existence since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Prinz v. Great Bay Casino Corp. 705 F.2d 692, 701 (3d Cir. 1983) (A. Leon Higginbotham, J., dissenting).

Though the phrase dates from the 13th century at the latest, some have mistakenly thought it to have less antiquity. The phrase is often attributed to Blackstone, who himself hinted at its antiquity: "Whence it is that in our law the goodness of a custom depends upon it's [sic] having been used time out of mind; or, in the solemnity of our legal phrase, time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." 1 William Blackstone, Commentaries 67 (1769). The phrase (somewhat mangled) has also been attributed to the King James Version of the Bible (1611): "Myles Ambrose has been around this town . . . since as the Bible says, the mind of man runneth not to the contrary . . . ." Fourth Annual Judicial Conference of the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, 112 F.R.D. 439, 550 (1986) (Dave Busby introducing Myles Ambrose).

As in that last example, the phrase is sometimes misrendered mind of man (suggesting that no one could think otherwise) instead of memory of man (suggesting that no one could remember otherwise)—e.g.: "We have been operating on this premise for so long that the mind [read memory] of a man runneth not to the contrary." Okaw Drainage Dist. v. National Distillers & Chem. Corp., 882 F.2d 1241, 1245 (7th Cir. 1989) (quoting Mills, J., the trial judge). Note also that the phrase is memory of man (i.e., mankind or humankind), not memory of a man, as in the preceding example. See SEXISM (B).

mendacity; mendicity. The former is deceptiveness, the latter beggarliness.

mens rea; actus reus. Actus reus = a wrongful act; the element of conduct, as opposed to the mental state, that must be proved to convict a criminal defendant. Mens rea = the state of mind that the prosecution, to secure a conviction, must prove that a defendant had when committing a crime. Although these dovetailing TERMS OF ART—both deriving from LAW LATIN—have traditionally been basic to criminal law, one writer cautions against slavish adherence: "This way of dividing up the general elements in crimes is rather 'rough and ready,' and is certainly a better servant than master." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 78 (1991).

Mens rea does not bear a literal meaning (i.e., "bad mind" or "guilty mind"), because one who breaks the law even with the best of motives still commits a crime: "The language is no longer meant to convey the idea of general malevolence characteristic of early common-law usage." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 627 (1982). The true translation is criminal intention or recklessness. Words typically imposing a mens-rea requirement include willfully, maliciously, fraudulently, recklessly, negligently, scienter, corruptly, feloniously, and wantonly. See mental element.

Some writers wisely hyphenate the phrase when it appears as a phrasal adjective—e.g.: "Such an offense does not have the normal mens-rea requirement . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 716–17 (3d ed. 1982)./ "[I]t is important to treat common-law mens-rea terms, and indeed much of the language of the law, as words that must be translated into ordinary language before one can learn what they mean and how to use them." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 204–05 (1982). See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (B).

mental attitude is a common REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "What lifts ordinary negligence into gross negligence is the mental attitude [read mental state] of the defendant."

mental illness; mental disorder; disease of the mind. The McNaghten rules (q.v.) refer to a "defect of reason, from disease of the mind," a phrase that doctors no longer use. Instead, doctors tend to speak nowadays of mental illness or mental disorder, the latter being the broader of the two, encompassing any disorder of mind. But neither mental illness nor mental disorder is precisely synonymous with disease of the mind, which includes physically based pathologies such as cerebral arteriosclerosis (diminishing the flow of blood to the brain).

Thus, when it comes to applying the McNaghten rules, and getting expert witnesses to have a common understanding of what they are talking about, "the practical legal position is very confused." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 593 (1978). Cf. insanity.

meretricious (= alluring by false show) has not lost its strong etymological connection with the Latin word for "prostitute" (meretrix). A meretricious marriage is one that involves either two people of the same sex or lack of capacity on the part of one party. E.g., "If he is right in his contention that the respondent is a man, the ceremony of marriage in this case was in fact, if not in intention, a mere sham and the resulting 'marriage' not merely a void but a meretricious marriage, which could not in any circumstances give rise to anything remotely matrimonial in character." (Eng.) For a humorous misuse of the word, see MALAPROPISMS.

mergee is a mid-20th-century NEOLOGISM denoting a participant in a merger. E.g., "[I]n the event of a true statutory merger, the mergee corporation was entitled to the deductions of the other corporation." E. & J. Gallo Winery v. Commissioner, 227 F.2d 699, 703 (9th Cir. 1955)./ "Downs continued to solicit each of the mergees and made written reports more than five years after the first contact . . . ." Cherry, Bekaert & Holland v. Downs, 640 F. Supp. 1096, 1099 (W.D. N.C. 1986). See -EE.

merger. A. And consolidation; amalgamation. These terms are distinct in denoting types of corporate restructuring. In a merger, one company is absorbed by another, the latter retaining its own name, identity, articles of incorporation, and bylaws, and acquiring all the assets, liabilities, and powers of the absorbed company, which ceases its separate existence. In a consolidation, the corporations that are absorbed into a new entity lose their previous identities to form a new corporation.

In English law, the different forms of corporate union are referred to as amalgamation. As one writer states in recommending this word, "It is convenient to have some such inclusive term for corporate unions, as they have many elements in common." H.W. Ballantine, Ballantine on Corporations § 288, at 680–81 (rev. ed. 1946).

B. And bar. In the law of procedure, merger describes the effect of a judgment for the plaintiff. Such a judgment extinguishes any claim that was the subject of an earlier lawsuit and merges it into the judgment, so that the plaintiff's rights are confined to enforcing the judgment. Bar, on the other hand, describes the effect of a judgment on the merits for a defendant. Such a judgment extinguishes any claim that was the subject of a lawsuit in which judgment was rendered, including parts of that claim that were not raised in the earlier lawsuit.

C. Of Law and Equity. In traditional legal idiom, the joining of the procedural aspects of law and equity is termed "merger"—e.g.: "The history of the merger of law and equity, first in New York under the Old Code, and later in twenty-nine other states and territories in which codes similar to the New York Code were adopted, and in England by the Judicature Acts, which took effect in 1875, has been covered in Chapter II." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 96 (1930). Actually, despite Walsh's suggestion that merger did not occur in England until 1875, the fusion of law and equity began in that country with the Common Law Procedure Act 1854.

D. Doctrine of merger. This phrase means that something of greater importance subsumes something of lesser importance, but the context determines the precise signification. In the law of contract, for example, merger refers to the substitution of a superior form of contract for an inferior form, as when a written contract supersedes all oral agreements and prior understandings. Hence, a merger clause (also known as an integration clause) states expressly that the contract has this effect.

In criminal law, under the doctrine of merger—abolished in some jurisdictions, as in England—a charge of attempt would be defeated if the evidence showed that the defendant had actually committed a felony.

In the property lawyer's vocabulary, the word merger denotes the doctrine that, if a greater estate and a lesser estate in the same land become one person's property, the lesser estate is destroyed or "merged" into the greater.

merit takes the preposition in or to, not of. "There is no merit of [read merit to] this contention."

meritless. See unmeritorious.

meritorious usu. refers to parties' claims in AmE, and not to the parties themselves. This restriction does not hold in BrE: "There are no doubt a considerable number of cases in which an unmeritorious defendant escapes and a meritorious plaintiff suffers hardship because of his actions being statute-barred owing to bad advice on the law from his trade union or solicitor." (Eng.)

merits is often used as an ellipsis for merits of the case (= the substantive considerations to be taken into account in making a decision, in contrast to extraneous or technical points, esp. of procedure), as in the phrase trial on the merits.

mesalliance; misalliance. Mesalliance, a GALLICISM, means "a marriage with a social inferior; a morganatic marriage." Misalliance is best kept distinct in the senses (1) "an improper alliance"; or (2) "a marriage in which the partners are ill-suited for each other." A mesalliance /may-zahl-yahns/ may be a happy marriage, but a misalliance /mis-ə-lI-əns/ never is.

mesne /meen/ denotes the idea of occupying a middle position, and has two important senses in the law. Usually the word is used in historical contexts. In feudal contexts, a mesne lord is one who holds an estate of a superior lord while being a lord over tenants. The estate of a mesne lord was termed the mesnalty. The OED notes that mesne tenant is "inaccurately used to denote one who holds of a mesne lord."

Mesne may also signify "occurring or performed at a time intermediate between two dates" (OED). Thus mesne profits are the profits of an estate received by a tenant in wrongful possession between two dates. E.g., "The court has the power of allowing the verdict to be given for mesne profits." Mesne process = all process issued between the commencement of a lawsuit by the initial writ or pleading and the termination of the suit. E.g., "The writ upon which the plaintiff was arrested on mesne process was of no effect."

mesonomic. See zygnomic.

Messrs. is the abbreviation for Messieurs, the plural of the French Monsieur. In English it acts as the plural of Mr. The feminine equivalents are Mesdames (Mmes.) for married women and Mademoiselles (Mlles.) for unmarried women. Fortunately, the feminine French forms are not a regular part of the English language. See SEXISM (D) messuage /mes-wij/ "is usually understood to mean 'a house,' but it includes more than the actual buildings." Henry C. Richards & John P.H. Soper, The Law and Practice of Compensation 17 (n.d. [1898]). What else does it include? Generally any garden or orchard associated with the house and any outbuildings. If the term is used with the degree of particularity specified in its definition, then it may be justified in legal contexts. Often, however, one senses that it is a highfalutin LEGALISM for house. E.g., "The curtilage is a garden, yard, field, or piece of void ground lying near and belonging to the messuage." (Eng.) See curtilage & tenement.

metalaw is a 20th-century NEOLOGISM meaning "a hypothetical legal code based on the principles underlying existing legal codes and designed to provide a framework of agreement between diverse legal systems (orig. conceived as between terrestrial and possible extraterrestrial beings)" (OED). The word, then, has a specific sense; it should not be used in vague, half-sensical ways.

METAPHORS. A metaphor is a figure of speech in which one thing is called by the name of something else, or is said to be that other thing. Unlike similes, which use like or as, metaphorical comparisons are implicit rather than explicit. (See SIMILES.) Skillful use of metaphor is one of the highest attainments of writing; graceless and even aesthetically offensive use of metaphors is one of the most common scourges of writing, and especially of legal writing characterized by PURPLE PROSE. Those who use metaphors unrestrainedly and ineffectively almost always fancy themselves supreme stylists; hence the problem of educating readers on the uses and abuses of metaphor is a delicate one, for the worst offenders are likely to consider themselves masterly artists.

A. Mixed and Mangled Metaphors. Lord Keith of Avonholm has shrewdly addressed the use of metaphors in legal writing: "A graphic phrase, or expression, has its uses even in a law report and can give force to a legal principle, but it must be related to the circumstances in which it is used." White & Carter Councils, Ltd. v. McGregor, [1962] A.C. 413, 438 (H.L.). The Law Lord displayed a great deal of insight in that passage, for the vehicle of the metaphor (i.e., the literal sense of the metaphorical language) must be consonant with the tenor of the metaphor (i.e., the ultimate, metaphorical sense), which is to say the means must fit the end. In the statement, That lawyer's brief is a patchwork quilt without discernible design, the composition of the brief is the tenor, and the quilt is the vehicle. It is the comparison of the tenor with the vehicle that makes or breaks a metaphor.

A writer would be ill advised, for example, to use rustic metaphors in a discussion of the problems of air pollution, which is essentially a problem of the bigger cities and outlying areas. Following are two characteristic specimens in which the vehicle of the metaphor is mismatched with the tenor: "By their very nature, the assumptions on which we proceed today cannot be cast in stone." (Things can be cast in iron or clay, but not in stone, though one may cast [i.e., throw] stones and things may be etched in stone.) / "If money drives the program, paperwork provides the tinder." (Tinder must start something, inflame it—paperwork is an ongoing and usu. a dull process.)

Yet the greater problem in using metaphors is that one metaphor should not crowd another. The purpose of an image is to fix the idea in the reader's or listener's mind; if disparate images appear in abundance, the audience is left confused or sometimes, at the writer's expense, knee-slapping. E.g., "On the one hand, the contract between the two is a bipartite umbilical cord fed by Medicare and Medicaid funds such that Lifetron can be properly termed a recipient of federal financial assistance . . . . On the other hand, the parameters limned by the Supreme Court . . . constrain us to hold that the actions of this private defendant cannot be fairly attributed to the state . . . ." Frazier v. Board of Trustees, 765 F.2d 1278, 1295 (5th Cir. 1985). This cascade of metaphors bothers the intelligent reader far more than it helps. In fact, the metaphors make no sense: umbilical cords feed, they are not fed; and exactly what shape a bipartite umbilical cord would assume we have no idea, esp. if it is (rather grotesquely) resting on a hand.

Badly used metaphors are more forgivable in oratory than in writing, for with the latter the perpetrator can be charged with malice aforethought. Oratorical falls from grace are legion. Some time ago a newspaper article collected some of the oratorical gems of Michigan legislators. E.g., "This bill goes to the very heart of the moral fiber of the human anatomy."/ "From now on, I am watching everything you do with a fine-toothed comb." The following classic illustration comes from a speech by Boyle Roche in the Irish Parliament, delivered in about 1790: "Mr. Speaker, I smell a rat. I see him floating in the air. But mark me, sir, I will nip him in the bud." (Quoted by Jocelyn Simon, English Idioms from the Law, 76 Law Q. Rev. 283, 287 (1960).) Perhaps the supreme example of the comic misuse of metaphor occurred in the speech of a scientist who referred to "a virgin field pregnant with possibilities."

Legal writers must not play fast and loose with their images; they are not, like their speaking counterparts, to be forgiven so easily. To use metaphors badly in prose is amateurish and ultimately embarrassing. Writers should use metaphors sparingly, should wait for the aptest moments, elsewhere using a more straightforward style. The disadvantages in not doing so are easily enough demonstrated. Anyone who reads the following examples, and occasionally rereads them, is likely never to acquire the bad habit:

- "There are but two conduits or cables, the statutes of wills, and of descents and distributions, by which the Grim Reaper may at the moment of and by the stroke of his scythe flash the transfer and transmission of property and estate to the quick from the dead." (The Grim Reaper flashes a scythe by means of a conduit or cable?)
- "Although Sutter has clothed her complaint in the garb of a civil-rights action, we agree with the district court that her claim boils down to a demand for custody of the child." (A complaint clothed in a certain garb is boiled down?)
- "We need not explore the full depths of those issues, however. Our case may be resolved on two narrower grounds." (One might, presumably, avoid full depths by standing on narrow grounds, but not on narrower grounds. Narrower than what?)
- "The court has a voracious appetite for judicial activism in its Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, at least when it comes to restricting the constitutional rights of citizens." (Do judges who restrict constitutional rights of citizens feed on judicial activism? The metaphor makes no sense.)
- "Equal protection has become a stout shield to protect against the discriminatory bite of governmental classification." (What does a stout shield look like? Short and fat? And are shields ordinarily, or ever, used against biting attackers?)
- "To assume competency is to let the enigmas of psychology breathe our miasmic decree." (How do enigmas breathe miasmas?)
- "The rules of offer and acceptance have a grip on the vision and indeed on the affections held by no other rules of law, real or pseudo." (One cannot grip a vision.)
- "There is a long leap between a public right under the First Amendment to attend trials and a public right under the First Amendment to see a given trial televised. It is a leap that is not supported by history." (What leaps are supported by history?)
- "The legal foundation upon which Schneckloth rides is fiction." (A case does not "ride upon" a foundation, esp. a fictional one.)

Yet another pitfall for the unwary is the cliché-metaphor that the writer renders incorrectly. E.g., things may be stretched to the breaking point, but not: "Cases that take years to prepare, involve reams of documents and hundreds of hours of depositions, and require weeks or months to try have taxed the resources of our judicial system to the breaking point." See SET PHRASES & ILLOGIC (E)

B. Legal Metaphors. The legal idiom abounds in special metaphors not used elsewhere. For example, statutes of limitation are said to run, plaintiffs shoulder the burden of proof, plaintiffs have clean or unclean hands, defendants are sometimes insulated from liability, agents may be clothed with the mantle of apparent authority, we have suits to quiet title, government action may have a chilling effect on First Amendment rights, and we may sue to remove a cloud on title. (See CLICHÉS.) These are dormant rather than active metaphors; originally they were creatively expressive, whereas now they are merely expressive. When used with other metaphors, however, they may clash; hence writers must try to be sensitive to the compatibility of dormant with active metaphors.

C. The Overwrought Metaphor. Extended metaphors have been out of fashion for more than a century. The most we can tolerate nowadays is the two-part metaphor: "We are faced with the further problem of fitting the foot of modern-day usage and understanding of gifts of intangible personal property through survivorship arrangements into the rigid shoe of common-law principles." Even that type of sustained metaphor strikes most readers as facile. Here are more examples of metaphorical surfeit: "Notwithstanding Golemis's alarming diagnosis of the maladies . . . the ordinance has caused, he has come to the wrong place for an immediate antidote. The plaintiff's present effort to use a federal venue as an emetic against the municipal action which (in his view) has tainted the eupepsia of his property rights cannot be swallowed . . . . [H]e must look to the Rhode Island courts for a cure." Golemis v. Kirby, 632 F. Supp. 159, 164–65 (D.R.I. 1985)./ "Summary judgment is a potent weapon, and courts must be mindful of its aims and targets and beware of overkill in its use."/ "We find no such hybrid instrument, with its dual personality, self-executing and shifting gears, chameleon characteristics and Phoenix-like qualities as yet unknown to the law."/ "It is an error in one of these findings that tars the finding of likelihood of confusion with the brush of clear error."

mete out, v.t. (from an old word for "measure") is the correct phrase, not meet out or meat out. E.g., "Washington's penalty . . . marks the first time the maximum fine of $10,000 has been meeted out [read meted out] since O'Brien asked the NBA board of governors to expand his disciplinary powers." Nancy Scannell, Violence in the NBA: Getting Worse? Wash. Post, 16 Dec. 1977, at E1./ "For Europeans, the death sentences meeted out [read meted out] to 'rioters' . . . [have] an all too familiar ring." Robert Mauthner, Salvage from the Wreckage, Fin. Times, 20 June 1989, at I23.

metes and bounds; butts and bounds; lines and corners. All three phrases are used in deeds and surveys to describe the territorial limits of property; the surveyor measures distances and angles from designated landmarks and in relation to adjoining properties.

The most familiar phrase is metes and bounds, in which mete derives from the Latin term meta (= a mark or object around which chariots turned in a Roman race-course). At common law, mete denoted a visible object in line with a boundary, such as a stone or tree, showing where a line ended.

The term butts "is very obscurely defined in the old books." 1 Alexander M. Burrill, A Law Dictionary and Glossary 235 (2d ed. 1859). Today that could be held to include the OED, over which Burrill's treatment is an improvement: "In lands of ordinary rectangular shape, butts are the lines at the ends (Fr. bouts), and bounds are those on the sides, or sidings, as they were formerly termed. . . . But in lands of irregular shape, butts are the angular points, or corners, where the boundary lines stop and turn in a new direction." Id.

methinks is a creaky ARCHAISM used primarily by the lone judge in dissent—e.g.: "Methinks his silence indicates that Baskin had no non-gender-based reason for his action and his superiors well knew it." Smith v. Texas Dep't of Water Resources, 818 F.2d 363, 368 (5th Cir. 1987) (Politz, J., dissenting).

Only in allusions to Hamlet is the word perhaps appropriate—e.g.: "[M]ethinks my brothers and sisters protest too much about their general discussion of the writ." Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436, 463 n.2 (1986) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

methodology is frequently misused for method. Correctly used, methodology means "the science or study of method." Here are examples of the misuse: "Because this case involves the role of depreciation rates and methodologies [read methods] in determining the revenue requirements of a regulated utility, we begin by briefly reviewing certain basic principles of regulatory ratemaking."/ "The recent decision in Chevron elaborates on these principles and sets out the appropriate methodology [read method] for ascertaining whether to afford deference to an agency's construction of its governing statute."/ "The passage enumerating the factors was meant to be an expression of the methodology [read method] to be used in deciding whether an activity should be held to be within the reach of that statute's imposition of liability."

Methodology is correctly used in the following example; the sentence was hard to come by: "Writing in a time in which methodology in the social sciences [i.e., the study of method in the social sciences] has become the prevailing approach, Professor von Mehren speaks of comparative study of law rather than of comparative law." (R. Pound)

midwife, v.t.; midwive. The first is the preferred form. E.g., "This may happen when a writing judge believes with heart and soul that his position is right, but he knows that his majority is shaky; here persuasiveness must midwive [read midwife] the opinion if it is to come into existence at all."

mien (= demeanor, appearance, bearing) often carries connotations of formidableness <his imposing mien>. The word is pronounced /meen/.

migratory worker. See undocumented alien.

milieu is sometimes misspelled mileau. See, e.g., New Eng. Patriots Football Club, Inc. v. University of Colo., 592 F.2d 1196, 1198 (1st Cir. 1979).

The plural milieus is preferable to milieux—e.g.: "But marriages between first cousins are so usual that in many milieus they are almost normal." Max Radin, The Law and You 42 (1948). See PLURALS (A).

military law. See martial law.

military testament. See oral will.

militate. See mitigate.

millennium [L. mille "thousand" + annus "year"] forms two plurals: -ia and -iums. The preferred plural is -ia in the AmE, and -iums in BrE; but either is acceptable on both sides of the Atlantic. See PLURALS (A).

The word is often deprived of one -n- and misspelled millenium—e.g.: "The irreparable injury rule has been a fixture of Anglo-American law for half a millenium [read millennium]." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule vii (1991). In fact, this misspelling has even found its way into a proper name: the hotel across from the World Trade Center in New York City is called The Millenium. Perhaps that should be called not a proper name but an improper name.

millionaire is so spelled—not, like questionnaire, with -nn-. E.g., "[A] millionnaire [read millionaire] with a small pension could qualify for an adjustment under the ordinance." Halstead v. City of Flint, 338 N.W.2d 903, 905 (Mich. Ct. App. 1983). For another word susceptible to this problem—doctrinaire—see doctrinal.

mind and memory is a common DOUBLET <of sound mind and memory> in the context of establishing testamentary capacity. Mellinkoff calls it "a snatch of confusing nonsense . . . . As in England, American lawyers have long recognized that they were using memory here in a special way, in the sense of understanding or mind, and that mind and memory did no more for testamentary capacity than mind alone." David Mellinkoff, The Language of the Law 333, 335 (1963).

The snare lies in failing to recognize the phrase as an archaic doublet, and in misunderstanding it as setting forth independent criteria for judging testamentary capacity, since historically mind = memory. Especially in writing to be read by nonlawyers (as in jury instructions), the second half of this doublet should be avoided. As the law is currently understood, one may be very forgetful and still be "of sound mind and memory." Sound mind is sufficient and far less confusing.

In wills, the recitation that the testator is of sound mind and memory is falling into disuse for an additional reason: it not only does no good, it may even raise suspicions about mental capacity. See Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 819 (2d ed. 1953). See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

MINGLE-MANGLE, known in erudite circles as macaronism, soraismus, or cacozelia, was a common vice of language in early English opinions. It consists in English larded with Latin or French, as in the following example from Weaver v. Ward, decided by the King's Bench in 1616:

> The defendant pleaded . . . that he was . . . a trained soldier in London, of the band of one Andrews captain; and so was plaintiff, and that they were skirmishing with their musquets charged with powder for their exercise in re militari, against another captain and his band; and as they were so skirmishing, the defendant casualiter et per infortunium et contra voluntatem suam, in discharging his piece, did hurt and wound the plaintiff, which is the same, etc. absque hoc, that he was guilty aliter sive alio modo
> Hob. 134, 80 Eng. Rep. 284.

For modern legal readers, mingle-mangle makes for fascinating, if not entirely comprehensible, reading. Following is another Latin-English example, this also from a well-known torts case: "Trespass quare vi & armis clausum fregit, & herbam suam pedibus conculcando consumpsit in six acres. The defendant pleads, that he hath an acre lying next the said six acres, and upon it a hedge of thorns, and he cut the thorns, and they ipso invito fell upon the plaintiff's land." The Case of the Thorns, 6 Ed. 4, Mich. 7a, pl. 18 (1466) (summarized thus in Bessey v. Olliot & Lambert, T. Raym. 467 (1681)).

English-French was another mongrel dialect of the law: one early report referred to a prisoner being sentenced who "ject un Brickbat a le dit Justice que narrowly mist, & pur ceo immediately fuit Indictment drawn per Noy envers le prisoner, & son dexter manus ampute & fix al Gibbet sur que luy mesme immediatement hange in presence de Court." (Quoted fr. Dyer's Reports 188b minify. See minimize.

The 17th-century English reporters most inclined to engage in mingle-mangle were Rolle and Latch. See LAW LATIN & LAW FRENCH.

minim (= something minute) is sometimes used in the context of the maxim de minimis non curat lex. E.g., "The minim of the injury here obscures and tempts neglect of the importance of the issue." See de minimis.

minima. See minimum.

minimal; minimum, adj. Both words are used adjectivally, minimum as an attributive adjective in phrases such as minimum wage. If there is a valid nuance distinguishing these two adjectival forms, it is that minimal = few, little, smallest <with minimal disturbance> <minimal support> <minimal objections>, whereas minimum, adj., = consisting in the fewest necessary things, or the least acceptable or lawful amount <minimum contacts as a basis for jurisdiction> <minimum wage>. E.g., "Most statutes set up minimum requirements with respect to the corporate name."/ "Congress accommodated state fears by allowing the states to retain minimal residency requirements." See maximum.

minimize; minify. These words have distinct meanings, and the latter is too much neglected. Properly, minimize = to keep to a minimum, and minify = to belittle, degrade; to represent something as smaller than it really is. Minimalize is not a word.

minimum, n. Pl. minima. E.g., "In so ruling, however, the Court did not dispense with the Sixth Amendment's substantive minima of effectiveness . . . ." U.S. v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554, 568 n.1 (1988) (Brennan, J., dissenting)./ "The deprivation of his protected property interest was accomplished without adherence to due process minimums [read minima]." See maximum.

minions of the law is a CLICHÉ referring to police officers or other law-enforcement officers.

miniscule is one of the commonest misspellings in legal texts, the correct spelling being minuscule. E.g., "There has recently come into the possession of Lincoln's Inn, as the gift of the author's granddaughter, his working copy of the first edition covered and interleaved with miniscule [read minuscule] writing." P.V. Baker, Book Review, 103 Law Q. Rev. 650, 651 (1987). The word derives from the word minus, and has nothing to do with the prefix mini-. The counterpart—a rarity—is majuscule.

minister. See administer.

minor. See child.

minority. A. And infancy; nonage. These synonyms denote the period during which a person is underage—that is, when a person has not yet reached full age and therefore cannot vote, buy alcoholic beverages, and the like. Notably, a person may be underage for some purposes (such as buying liquor) but not for others (such as voting).

Minority, which is more generally used than either of the others, is the preferable term. It encompasses the full range of persons who fall into underage categories: children, infants, juveniles, young persons, and (in Scotland) pupils. (See child & infant.) Minority is much more common in general usage than its antonym, majority (= full age), which is largely confined to legal contexts. See age of capacity & majority (D).

Infancy is likely to mislead many readers, and nonage is obscure to many lawyers as well as nonlawyers. See infancy, infant & nonage.

B. Singular or Plural? See majority (B) & SYNESIS.

minor woman is an odd combination of EUPHEMISM, MISCUE, and near-OXYMORON that displaces a more natural wording such as girl, female minor, or, if the sex of the person is obvious, minor. E.g., "[H]is reference to a 'mature' woman means he does not favor the right of a minor woman [read minor] to choose to have an abortion without parental or judicial consent." Susan Yoachum, Wilson Campaign Sticks to Familiar Topics, S.F. Chronicle, 2 Nov. 1990, at A21.

minuscule. So spelled. See miniscule.

minutia (= a trivial detail; a trifling matter) is the singular of the plural minutiae. Though much less common than the plural form, minutia is hardly unknown. Unfortunately, almost every time it appears it is a misuse for the plural—e.g.: "Once one wades through the unhelpful minutia [read minutiae] three legal arguments remain . . . ." Lentomyynti Oy v. Medivac, Inc., 997 F.2d 364, 370 (7th Cir. 1993).

Then again, the plural form of the noun is sometimes mistakenly coupled with a singular verb—e.g.: "[W]e conclude . . . that such minutiae is [read are] without consequence in determining priority of jurisdiction." A.E. Staley Mfg. Co. v. Swift & Co., 399 N.E.2d 339, 341 (Ill. App. Ct. 1980)./ "We hardly believe such minutiae is [read are] cause for finding that a wrong principle of law was employed." Jackson County Bd. of Comm'rs v. State Tax Comm'n, 343 N.W.2d 255, 260 (Mich. Ct. App. 1983).

Mirandize (= to read an arrestee rights under Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)) has become common as police-officer slang in the U.S.; it is therefore coming to be adopted by some criminal lawyers and even judges—e.g.: "First, defendant claims that the trial court erred in ruling inadmissible his exculpatory statements made to the officer after defendant was arrested and Mirandized." People v. Barrick, 654 P.2d 1243, 1253 (Cal. 1982) (en banc)./ "So, too, inculpatory words from the suspect, though duly Mirandized, might be suppressed as 'fruit' of the unlawful arrest." H. Richard Uviller, Seizure by Gunshot, 14 N.Y.U. Rev. L. & Soc. Change 705, 708 (1986)./ "They are read their rights ('mirandized') and interrogated . . . ." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 87 (1990).

Surely, though, this -IZE neologism is a blemish in place of some acceptable periphrasis, such as to read (arrestees) their Miranda rights. Surprisingly, 23 percent of the usage panelists for the Harper Book of Contemporary Usage (2d ed. 1985) consider the word "a useful addition to the language." A more circumspect 77 percent disapprove.

misadventure = (1) a mishap or misfortune; or (2) homicide committed accidentally by a person doing a lawful act and having no intention to injure. The word now appears most frequently in the phrases death by misadventure and homicide by misadventure.

misalliance. See mesalliance.

misappropriate; appropriate, v.t. The former means "to apply (as another's money) dishonestly to one's own use." E.g., "It was held to be gross negligence for an administratrix to permit an attorney in fact to handle an estate for nine years without an accounting and settlement, during which time he misappropriated funds."/ "If he took title in his own name in bad faith, intending to misappropriate the property, he is liable for the full amount of the mortgage and interest thereon."

Appropriate has a more neutral, nonaccusatory connotation. Still, in meaning "to take from a particular person or organization for a particular purpose," it is tinged with some of the negative connotations made explicit in misappropriate. See appropriate & embezzle.

misbelief. See disbelief.

miscarriage. See abortion.

miscellaneous must be followed by a plural COUNT NOUN <miscellaneous charges>; it does not work with an abstract mass noun <miscellaneous legislation>. Though one might refer to miscellaneous languages (and thereby include Chinese, English, French, Thai, and Vietnamese), it makes no sense to write miscellaneous contract language, as in Mark M. Grossman, The Question of Arbitrability 57 (1984) (section title).

mischief is a slight ARCHAISM as lawyers commonly use it, that is, to denote "a condition in which a person suffers a wrong or is under some hardship, esp. one that a statute seeks to remove or for which equity provides a remedy." E.g., "It was permissible to consider what the law was before the statute, what 'mischief' the statute was meant to remedy, and what the statute actually said . . . ." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 335 (5th ed. 1956).

From this use of mischief—common esp. in the context of statutory construction—has arisen the phrase mischief rule, known also as the rule in Heydon's case ([1584] 3 Co. Rep. 7a). That rule encourages judges construing an ambiguous statute to consider to what "mischief" the statute was addressed and then to adopt an interpretation that will curtail the mischief and advance the remedy. The mischief rule is often contrasted with two other approaches to statutory construction: the golden rule (q.v.) and the plain-meaning rule (or, as it is termed in BrE, literal interpretation).

mischievious is a common misspelling and mispronunciation of mischievous. Cf. grievous.

misconcept should not displace misconception, the ordinary word that is (unlike the shorter form) recognized as a living word in English-language dictionaries—e.g.: "The 'impeach' misconcept [read misconception] was the judge's, not counsel's." In re Jose S., 144 Cal. Rptr. 309, 313 (Ct. App. 1978)./ "Another misconcept [read misconception] is that it is necessary for the airplane to have a relatively-high pitch altitude in order for it to stall." New Hampshire Ins. Co. v. U.S., 641 F. Supp. 642, 646 (D.P.R. 1986).

misconduct in office; official misconduct. These synonymous phrases refer to the common-law misdemeanor consisting in a public officer's corrupt violation of his or her duties by malfeasance (q.v.), misfeasance, or nonfeasance (q.v.). Other synonymous expressions include misbehavior in office, malconduct in office, malpractice in office, misdemeanor in office, corruption in office, and official corruption. Cf. malversation.

MISCUES. A miscue is an inadvertent misdirection that causes the reader to proceed momentarily with an incorrect assumption about how—in mechanics or in sense—a sentence or passage will end. The misdirection is not serious enough to cause a true AMBIGUITY because, on reflection, the reader can figure out the meaning. Thus:

> The court decided the question did not need to be addressed

The mere omission of that after the verb decided induces the reader to believe that the question is the direct object—that is, to believe (if only for an immeasurably short moment) that the court decided the question. In fact, of course, the court decided not to decide the question.

Miscues are of innumerable varieties; the only consistent cure is for the editor or self-editor to develop a keen empathy for the reader. Part of what the editor or self-editor must do, then, is to approach the text as a stranger might. Further, though, a good edit must involve the kind of skeptical reading in which one imagines how one reader in ten might misread the sentence.

Following are discussions of six of the most common causes of miscues.

A. Unintended Word Association. Sometimes a word appearing late in a passage seems to echo an earlier word to which it really has no relation. In the following example, barred, in the final clause, suggests some relation to disbarred in the opening sentence: "[I]n 1948 he was found guilty of unprofessional conduct and disbarred for three years by a federal judge. The decision was appealed and reversed three years later. In 1958 Fisher, a thin-faced, thinning-haired socialite, was censured by the Illinois Supreme Court for actions against clients—but the Chicago Bar Association had asked that he be barred from practice for five years." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 158 (1970) (quoting an Illinois bar official).

Then again, sometimes the word association is extratextual. In the following examples, the following things occur on first reading: litigators try cases, clothes are laid down, flattery induces a woman to engage in sex, and somebody engages in murder attacks:

- "All litigators have had the experience of trying to settle cases before trial, starting trial, and then settling during trial." (What litigators do is try cases. So when the writer says, All litigators have had the experience of trying . . . , the legal reader expects to read about some type of case that litigators try. In this particular sentence, attempting would probably be a better choice than trying.)
- "The Tudor justices enforced laws against Roman Catholic recusants, regulations laying down the clothes people might wear and the price they should pay for them . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 72 (1966). (Did 16th-century judges mandate nudity for Roman Catholics?)
- "Flattery induced a woman to submit to intercourse by pretending to perform a surgical operation. He was convicted of rape." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 514 (1978). (A man named Flattery committed a crime, but his name suggests the wile he might have used in committing it. The miscue might be removed by referring to Mr. Flattery instead of Flattery.)
- "Small-minded, episodic murder attacks the basis of our taken-for-granted values so fundamentally that it generates anxiety." David Canter, Anxious, Appalled . . . But Still Drawn to Horror, Sunday Times, 13 March 1994, at 4-6. (It looks on first reading as if the noun phrase murder attacks is the subject, but murder is the subject and attacks is the verb.)

B. Misplaced Modifiers. When modifying words are separated from the words they modify, readers have a hard time processing the information. Indeed, they are likely to attach the modifying language first to a nearby word or phrase—e.g.: "Ms. Connally knew Denotte before she had her surgical procedure on a casual basis." (The phrase on a casual basis, or perhaps casually, belongs after Denotte; otherwise, it sounds as if the surgical procedure was a casual one.)/ "The right to redeem collateral after default is available to the debtor unless otherwise agreed in writing after default." (In that sentence, the reader momentarily believes that the time when default becomes available is important; in fact, though, it is the right that is available. That is, we're not talking about the right to redeem after default is available. [Read: After default, the right to redeem collateral is available to the debtor unless . . . . Or: After default, the debtor may redeem collateral unless . . . .]) See MISPLACED MODIFIERS

C. Remote Antecedents. "There are various reasons that juries hang, some better than others . . . ." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 126 (1990). (The writer means some reasons, not some juries, but some readers will not see this immediately.]/ "Until recently, the inns showed themselves particularly ill-equipped to handle the overseas students, including many Africans and such future statesmen as Mr Nehru, who by 1960 made up two thirds of all those called to the English bar." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 389 (1966). (This sentence involves a REMOTE RELATIVE that makes Mr. Nehru sound like a very big man indeed.) See ANTECEDENTS, FALSE (B).

D. Failure to Hyphenate Phrasal Adjectives. The reason for hyphenating phrasal adjectives is precisely to avoid miscues: think of the difference between a small-claims court and a (very) small claims court. Other, less striking instances abound—e.g.: "The uncontroverted evidence establishes that Super Ships, Inc., never manufactured, sold, or distributed any asbestos containing products to Cereola." Unless the phrase asbestos-containing products is hyphenated thus, readers are likely to think at first that the company never manufactured or sold asbestos, as opposed to products containing asbestos. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

E. Misleading Phraseology. In the following example, the phrase make good—in the sense "to indemnify"—is paired with defalcations (= failures to meet expectations or honor promises) in an odd way. The reader may think at first that the promisor is making defalcations that are good: "There is, however, nothing objectionable about a promise to make good defalcations for which the promisor is personally responsible . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 231 (3d ed. 1981).

Sometimes, as in the following example, the confusing syntax results from a preposition (for) that appears to have a single-word object (which), as opposed to a phrasal object (which of several payment plans): "Here there is no problem in using blanks for which of several payment plans the borrower wants to use." Barbara Child, Drafting Legal Documents 138 (2d ed. 1992).

Yet again, the first word in a participial phrase (up the coast of New England) sometimes seems to be a particle, i.e., a part of a verb (blew up): "The storm also blew up the coast of New England." John J. Goldman, Northeast Slammed by Storm; 7 Killed, Austin American-Statesman, 12 Dec. 1992, at A1.

F. Ill-Advisedly Deleted that. The widespread but largely unfounded prejudice against that leads many writers to omit it when it is necessary—e.g.:

- "In Phillips, the Illinois Supreme Court held hotels and hospitals were not in the business of transmitting messages under either the State or City messages tax." (Add that after held.)
- "In Cox, the court held a contract indemnifying a casualty company for all liability under the Structural Work Act was void as against public policy." (Add that after held.)
- "The court also pointed out an executor cannot appeal for the protection of the interests of a particular devisee or legatee who is able to take an appeal." (Add that after pointed out.)

H. Unsplit Infinitives. See HYPERCORRECTION (G).

misdemeanant (= one who has committed a misdemeanor) is the analogue of a felon. E.g., "It is immaterial, for technical purposes, whether a misdemeanant was principal at the fact or before the fact." J.W. Cecil Turner, Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law 89 (16th ed. 1952)./ "Some statutes have provided a penalty for the criminal protector of a misdemeanant." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 726 n.34 (3d ed. 1982). Unlike felon, however, misdemeanant is little known outside the law.

Whether convicted misdemeanant is a REDUNDANCY is a close question; surely most legal readers would not think that it is: "A prosecutor clearly has a considerable stake in discouraging convicted misdemeanants from appealing and thus obtaining a trial de novo in the Superior Court."

Like felon, misdemeanant should not refer merely to one suspected or charged, as opposed to one who has been convicted: "The better rule seems to be that an officer is not justified in killing a mere misdemeanant [read suspected misdemeanant] to effectuate his arrests."

The OED includes also the lay sense "a person guilty of misconduct," but legal writers should avoid using this technical term in this overbroad sense.

misdemeano(u)r. A. Spelling. The -our is the British spelling, -or the American. (See -OR.) The word is archaically spelled misdemesnors, as in Blackstone: "[S]maller faults, and omissions of less consequence, are comprized under the gentler name of 'misdemesnors' only." 4 William Blackstone, Commentaries 5 (1769).

B. Modern Uses. Before the distinction between felonies and misdemeanors was abolished by the Criminal Law Act 1967, English lawyers used misdemeanour (as they spelled it) to refer to any criminal offense that was neither a felony nor treason. In BrE, the word is primarily of historical interest. But most American jurisdictions retain the felony-misdemeanor distinction. See felony.

misdoubt, equivalent to doubt, is an unnecessary and confusing ARCHAISM. See doubt.

misfeasance. See malfeasance.

misfeasor (= one who commits a misfeasance) is the correct agent noun, but it is little used.

misinformation. See disinformation.

misjoinder = (1) in civil actions, the improper joinder of parties in an action; or (2) in criminal actions, the improper joinder of distinct offenses in a criminal prosecution. See joinder. Cf. disjoinder.

mislaid property. See lost property.

mislead. See lead.

misnomer (= the use of a wrong name) in law may mean "a mistake in naming a person or place," whereas in nonlegal contexts it usually refers to a misdescription of a thing. E.g., "A misnomer of the plaintiff in the petition does not ordinarily affect the rule that the running of the statute of limitations is interrupted by the filing of a suit."

MISPLACED MODIFIERS. When using participial forms (and especially when beginning a sentence with an -ing phrase), one must be sure that the noun introducing the clause that follows is what the participle modifies. Hence the preceding sentence would be incorrect if it read: "When using participial forms . . . , the noun in the main clause must be modified by the participle"—because this construction suggests that a noun (as opposed to a writer) can "use" a participle. Here is another example: "After reading that case, the initial impulse of the reader might well be to nominate it for the most arbitrary equal protection decision in recent times." Note the problem that remains here if we change the main clause to "the reader's initial impulse," where impulse, not reader, is still improperly the subject of the clause. Some of the pitfalls in this area are treated under DANGLERS and MISCUES (B).

The problem often crops up where the writer inserts a passive verb phrase after an introductory participial phrase. E.g., "In applying the intermediate standard of review, the challenged statute must be analyzed [read the court must analyze the challenged statute] to determine whether it furthers a substantial state interest."/ "In determining whether a foreign corporation should be required to defend itself in a suit in Texas arising out of a contract between it and a Texas corporation, each case must be decided [read the courts must decide each case] on its own facts." The problem is easily remedied by making certain that an actor or agent appears in the main clause, and that this actor or agent is the one doing something in the participial phrase.

Following is a spate of examples of some misuses to which English sentences are susceptible. Brief comments (in parentheses) are appended before each sentence is recast in an improved form:

- "Without alleging fraud, accident, or mistake, the writing must be the entire contract and parol evidence must be excluded." (It is not the writing that alleges, but the person who seeks to have parol evidence admitted.) [Read Unless one alleges fraud, accident, or mistake, the writing must be the entire contract and parol evidence must be excluded.]
- "Awaiting the uncertainties as to quantum of damages, the delay in recovery may increase them." (The delay awaits uncertainties?) [Read By awaiting (the resolution of all?) uncertainties as to quantum of damages, one may increase, by the delay, the damages incurred.]
- "No discussion of the subject would be complete without an analysis of Dalcan v. Dalcan; read literally, the Texas Supreme Court addresses only two issues in that case." (What is read literally? Dalcan v. Dalcan, or the Texas Supreme Court?) [Read No discussion of the subject would be complete without an analysis of Dalcan v. Dalcan; read literally, that Texas Supreme Court case addresses only two issues.]
- "Having determined that none of the appellants' complaints presents any reversible error, the judgment of the district court is affirmed." (The judgment has determined that there is no reversible error?) [Read Having determined that none of the appellants' complaints presents any reversible error, we affirm the judgment of the district court.]
- "Kast argues that, having found CPL 2.25B to be a procedural rule, we should nevertheless not give effect to the APA's procedural-rules exception from the informal rulemaking requirements." (Having can here look either way: to Kast or to we. See JANUS-FACED TERMS (B).) [Read Kast argues that, even though we have found CPL 2.25B to be a procedural rule, we should not give effect to the APA's procedural-rules exception to the informal rulemaking requirements.]

- "Treating the papers whereon the appeal was taken as a petition for writ of certiorari, certiorari is denied." (Is it the certiorari that does the treating?) [Read Treating the papers whereon the appeal was taken as a petition for writ of certiorari, we deny certiorari.]
- "Having held that the commission had the power and authority to pass the order, and that such action was not arbitrary or an abuse of discretion, it must follow that this is a suit against the state that should be dismissed." (What it was it that held?) [Read Having held that the commission had the power and authority to pass the order, and that such action was not arbitrary or an abuse of discretion, the court must dismiss this suit against the state.]
- "Applying the rule to this case, plaintiff was arrested on a facially valid warrant and she has therefore alleged no deprivation of a right secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States." (The court, not the plaintiff, applies the rule to this case.) [Read In applying the rule to this case, we hold that the plaintiff was arrested on a facially valid warrant and therefore had no ground to allege deprivation of a right secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States.]
- "The record contains ample evidence to support the jury's verdict; synopsizing, plaintiffs offered evidence that attributed price increases to price-fixing." (The court does the synopsizing, not the plaintiffs.) Actually, this sentence needs no participle—see the rewrite. [Read The record contains ample evidence to support the jury's verdict. In short, the plaintiffs offered evidence that attributed price increases to price-fixing.]
- "Paraphrasing the opinion of Judge Vann in Tabor v. Hoffman, the fact that an inspection of plaintiff's models may be by fair means does not justify obtaining the same by unfair means." (The fact does not do the paraphrasing.) [Read To paraphrase the opinion of Judge Vann in Tabor v. Hoffman, the fact that an inspection of the plaintiff's models may be by fair means does not justify obtaining the same information by unfair means.]
- "Reasoning that 4,000 acres were, as both parties agreed, cleared by July 1970 as required, and that the lease also required a minimum of 700 acres to be cleared 'each year thereafter,' the contractual obligation mathematically had to be completely performed by July 1975." (The contractual obligation does not engage in reasoning.) [Read Reasoning that 4,000 acres were, as both parties agreed, cleared by July 1970 as required, and that the lease also required a minimum of 700 acres to be cleared 'each year thereafter,' we have calculated that the contractual obligation had to be completely performed by July 1975.] misprision. In legal usage, this word usually means "concealment of treason or of felony by one not participating in the treason or felony." The phrase most commonly occurs in the phrases misprision of felony and misprision of treason. The word may also refer, however, to seditious conduct itself or to an official's failure to perform duties of public office. More popularly, misprision means "misunderstanding, mistake."

Some writers misspell the word misprison, perhaps because they mistakenly associate felony with prison in the phrase misprision of felony. E.g., "A person commits misprison [read misprision] of felony when he witnesses or has knowledge of a felony being committed or about to be committed, and conceals or fails to give information as to such crime. Misprison [read Misprision] of felony cannot be committed if the crime is a misdemeanor . . . ." Garn H. Webb, Plain Language Law: Criminal Wrongs (Crimes) 122 (1981) (consistently misspelling the word thus).

misprisor, a NEOLOGISM not to be found in the OED or W3, is confined to senses derived from the phrase misprision of felony—e.g.: "A 'misprisor' is said to be one who knows of the commission of a felony and does not report it to the proper authorities." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 728–29 (3d ed. 1982).

misrepresent = (1) to make an untrue statement of fact, usu. with knowledge of its falsity, without belief in its truth, or recklessly; or (2) to conduct malpractice while representing; (of a lawyer) to represent (a client) inadequately. Sense (2) is an odd, unidiomatic use: "Mrs. Johnson has sued Shearman & Sterling, contending she was misrepresented by the firm and demanding that it return the nearly $3 million she has already paid." Ronald Sullivan, Firms Still Jarred by Fallout Over Johnson Will, N.Y. Times, 31 March 1989, at 22.

misrepresentation. This word is broad enough to describe a fraudulent as well as a negligent or innocent statement. Some readers may be surprised to learn that, in the law of contracts, the word can also describe a factually accurate statement: "A person is guilty of misrepresentation though all the facts stated by him are true, if his statement is misleading as a whole because it does not refer to other facts affecting the weight of those stated." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 353 (8th ed. 1991). See suggestio falsi* & representation.

The phrase false misrepresentation is a fairly common REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "MOT alleged (in its complaint) that the Coffeys made several false misrepresentations [read misrepresentations or false representations] . . . ." Moore, Owen, Thomas & Co. v. Coffey, 992 F.2d 1439, 1445 (6th Cir. 1993).

misrepresentee is an EE neologism that serves as a correlative to misrepresentor (as it is sometimes, alas, spelled)—e.g.: "The misrepresentee can, however, still rescind . . . ." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 321 (8th ed. 1991). Cf. representee.

misrepresenter; misrepresentor. The -er spelling is better.

mistake. A. And ignorance. These words, some authorities have said, "do not import the same significance and should not be confounded. Ignorance implies a total want of knowledge in reference to the subject matter. Mistake admits a knowledge, but implies a wrong conclusion." Hutton v. Edgerton, 6 S.C. 485, 489 (1875). But other authorities say that "[a] mistake, in its legal sense, is 'that result of ignorance of law or of fact which has misled a person to commit that which, if he had not been in error, he would not have done.'" 3 G.W. Field, Field's Lawyers' Briefs 109 (1885) (quoting an old equity treatise). The latter authorities, in other words, reject the distinction as being "a refinement too subtle to be applied to the every-day business of life." Schlesinger v. U.S., 1 Ct. Cl. 16, 25 (1863). And they are in the majority.

In fact, ignorance is the broader term—it includes mistake: "Every mistake involves ignorance but not vice versa. Ignorance is lack of true knowledge, either (1) because the mind is a complete blank or (2) because it is filled with untrue (mistaken) knowledge on a particular subject. The first variety, lack of knowledge without mistaken knowledge, may be called simple ignorance. The second variety, lack of true knowledge coupled with mistaken knowledge, is mistake. Ignorance is the genus of which simple ignorance and mistake are the species." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 151–52 (2d ed. 1961).

B. And frustration. In the law of contract, mistake and frustration are "merely different ways of talking about the same thing—that is, the real world has in some way failed to correspond with the imaginary world hypothesized by the parties to the contract." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 81 (1974). With either a mistake or frustration, consent may be nullified because of the extreme injustice of holding one of the parties to the contract. See frustration & impossibility.

C. Mutual mistake. See mutual mistake.

mistreat; maltreat. Most writers on usage have held that there is a difference between these terms. "To mistreat," write the Evanses, "is to treat badly or wrongly. The word suggests a deviation from some accepted norm of treatment and a deviation always towards the bad. To maltreat, to abuse, to handle roughly or cruelly, is to mistreat in a special way. The words are often used interchangeably (Horwill believes that Americans prefer mistreat and English maltreat), but maltreat is usu. restricted to the rougher forms of mistreating." Bergen Evans & Cornelia Evans, A Dictionary of Contemporary American Usage 302 (1957).

mistress. See common-law wife.

mistrial has two very distinct senses: (1) "a trial ending without a determination on the merits because of some procedural error or disruption during the proceedings"; or (2) "a trial that ends inconclusively because the jury cannot agree on a verdict." Sense (1) is common to AmE and BrE—e.g.: "When the judge discovered that Brumfield had hired a private detective to spy on the jurors and find out their opinions on smoking, he declared a mistrial and shoved Belli's case all the way to the bottom of his docket." Sense (2) occurs primarily in AmE—e.g.: "Bryant explained that the jury in a drug-possession case had been unable to agree, facing a mistrial." Donald D. Jackson, Judges 92–93 (1974).

mistry, v.t., corresponds only to sense (1) of mistrial, q.v., but with an even stronger suggestion of fault—e.g.: "In the court below, the case was totally misconceived and mistried." Kramer v. Winslow, 18 A. 923, 927 (Pa. 1890)./ "It is argued . . . that the case was mistried for this reason . . . ." Van Riper v. U.S., 13 F.2d 961, 963 (2d Cir. 1926) (per L. Hand, J.)./ "The defendant then moved to dismiss the mistried RICO count . . . ." U.S. v. Jenkins, 902 F.2d 459, 462 (6th Cir. 1990).

misusage (= [1] mistreatment; or [2] the incorrect use of language) is increasingly misused for misuse, n. (= unauthorized use; misapplication)—e.g.: "[T]here has been no evidence presented as to actual confusion arising from the misusage [read misuse] of the APOLLO mark . . . ." Apollo Distrib. Co. v. Jerry Kurtz Carpet Co., 696 F. Supp. 140, 142 (D.N.J. 1988).

mitigable is the correct form—not mitigatable. See -ATABLE.

mitigate; militate. Mitigate = to make less severe or intense; militate = to exert a strong influence. Here mitigate is correctly used: "In England, the power to mitigate the severity of the strict law was originally vested in the king."

Mitigate against is incorrect for militate against; Edmund Wilson called it "William Faulkner's favorite error." The Bit Between My Teeth 570 (1965). Faulkner's failings aside, the error is surprisingly common—e.g.: "[T]his factor mitigates [read militates] against immediate review." Midway Mfg. Co. v. Omni Video Games, Inc., 668 F.2d 70, 72 (1st Cir. 1981)./ "Plaintiffs suggest there are two theories [that], if applied to this case, would mitigate [read militate] against the harsh application of the statute of limitations . . . ." Cramsey v. Knoblock, 547 N.E.2d 1358, 1364 (Ill. App. Ct. 1989).

Militate against, of course, is perfectly acceptable: "If the obvious facts militate against such an intention as expressed in the document, the court can act upon the real intention as found by the court." (Eng.)

In law, militate often takes for or in favor of as well as against. The OED calls this use "rare," but today it is common in legal writing: "He argues that the same values that do not require exhaustion of state remedies militate in favor of his contention that the Board's denial of his fitness be regarded as an administrative determination."/ "Factors are listod which militate for and against construing such a provision as creating a determinable fee."/ "These considerations militate in favor of academic freedom at colleges and universities."

Militate toward is unidiomatic: "Every incentive deriving from this decision would militate toward [read in favor of] the physicians' giving these tests."

mitigational. See mitigatory.

mitigation-of-damages doctrine, as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, should be hyphenated thus. A variant name for this doctrine—which requires a plaintiff, after an injury or breach of contract, to use ordinary care to alleviate its effects—is avoidable-consequences doctrine.

mitigatory; mitigative; mitigational. The first is the preferred form. Mitigational, a NEEDLESS VARIANT, sometimes appears where mitigating would be the natural word—e.g.: "The issue of ineffective assistance of counsel due to the absence of mitigational [read mitigating] evidence was first raised by the testimony of several witnesses during the November 16, 1984, evidentiary hearing . . . ." Laws v. State, 708 S.W.2d 182, 184 (Mo. Ct. App. 1986).

mittimus [L. "we send"] (= a warrant ordering a jailer to detain a person until ordered otherwise) is a Latin verb used in English as a noun. The plural is mittimuses—e.g.: "[T]hese items are for mittimuses issued after the examination is concluded . . . ." U.S. v. Ewing, 140 U.S. 142, 144 (1891). Through HYPERCORRECTION, some writers have mistakenly written mittimi, which is on the order of ignorami: "In both of these mittimi [read mittimuses] the crime for which he was convicted was described as forgery . . . ." Green v. State, 113 F. Supp. 253, 256 (S.D. Me. 1953)./ "The jail mittimi [read mittimuses], the accuracy of which are [read is] not challenged, show that the defendant was represented by counsel and that he exercised his right of allocution." People v. Montoya, 640 P.2d 234, 237 (Colo. Ct. App. 1981). See HYPERCORRECTION (A). Cf. ignoramus.

mob mouthpiece. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

mobocracy; ochlocracy. The latter is the better word in formal prose for "mob rule," the former being a MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY. Ochlocracy has four centuries of use behind it, mobocracy but two. Mobocracy also retains a jocular overtone.

mockery. See make a mockery of.

modality (= a method or procedure) is a pretentious VOGUE WORD: "The mother's expert conceded a lack of awareness of any professional literature documenting the successful use of the modalities [read methods] he suggested in training the retarded to employ adequate parenting skills." In re Karen "Y," 550 N.Y.S.2d 67, 69 (App. Div. 1989).

mode; module. There must be something in the root: these words, like modality, are inflated VOGUE WORDS.

In proper usage, mode means "manner," and module means "a unit of size." President George Bush often entered the "mode mode," as when he told a crowd in Los Angeles: "I am not here in the mode of politics, I am not here in the mode of partisanship, I am not here in the mode of blame. I am here to learn from the community." Robert B. Gunnison & Susan Yoachum, Bush Visits Riot Zone, San Francisco Chronicle, 8 May 1992, at A1. Such talk proved fruitful for Russell Baker's lively column in The New York Times: "President Bush says he is about to enter 'campaign mode.' Does this mean America will then have president à la mode? Absolutely not. Do you think the President is a slice of pie? This is the same answer I had from Mr. Bush's mode handler . . . . The mode Mr. Bush will enter is not a dessert, but a new technological product of the space program. Space-news fans will have noticed that multitudes of modes pour out of NASA press releases." Russell Baker, In the Mode Mood, N.Y. Times, 15 Aug. 1992, at 15.

modern-day is invariably inferior to modern—e.g.: "Punitive damages . . . are a modern-day [read modern] analog of 13th century amercements." Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 268 (1989).

modernly (= in modern times) is accurately described by the OED as being "now rare"; more precisely, it might have stated "now rare, except in law." E.g., "Modernly, it is doubtful that McCardle would be sustained."/ "Modernly, the potential numerosity and severity of actions involving drinking drivers has become too serious to be ignored."/ "Chancery has ceased for long ages to issue new writs whereby supposed wrongs could be cured; such objectives are modernly to be accomplished by legislation."

Modifiers, Misplaced. See MISPLACED MODIFIERS.

module. See mode.

modus operandi (= a method of operating; a manner of procedure) is often a highfalutin substitute for method. Yet it is well established. Pl. modi operandi.

The phrase is sometimes misrendered mode of operandi. For humorous headnotes using motor operandi, see U.S. v. Aguirre-Valenzuela, 700 F.2d 161, 161 (Cir. 1983).

moiety. Moiety, a legal and literary ARCHAISM, does not, strictly speaking, mean "a small segment or portion," as some writers assume; rather, it means "half." This word should be part of the lawyer's recognition vocabulary, but not of one's working vocabulary, for half is the preferable and ordinary word, and the SLIPSHOD EXTENSION of moiety makes the word ambiguous. E.g., "We believe that in contributing the use of his moiety [read half] in the automobile, he was in fact furnishing the automobile to Clarice, a member of his family."/ "The testator devised lands to his wife for life, and at her death one to his heirs and the other moiety [read half] to his wife's heirs, as she might appoint."

But is half really the right word in the two examples just quoted? The OED notes that "loosely," the word moiety may denote "one of two (occasionally more) parts (not necessarily equal) into which something is divided." Max Radin's Law Dictionary defines the alternative meaning as "a fractional part less than half." Because legal writers use the word in this way almost as often as they do in the sense "half," the word really ought to be avoided altogether.

In American customs law, moiety has taken on still another meaning, illustrated in the following examples: "Under Customs Law, an informant is paid a 'moiety' up to, but not exceeding, $50,000. Moiety is payment made to an informant who assisted in the seizure and ultimate forfeiture of an object." U.S. v. Cresta, 825 F.2d 538, 545 n.3 (1st Cir. 1987)./ "The plaintiff, Mr. Robert Rickard, seeks an award of compensation to informants (otherwise known as moieties), pursuant to statutory authority contained in 19 U.S.C. § 1619 (1976)." Rickard v. U.S., 11 Ct. Cl. 874, 875 (1987). Although a better word might have been found for this type of reward, moiety appears to be established JARGON.

momentarily = for a moment. It does not, correctly, mean "in a moment." Cf. presently.

momento is a misspelling of memento, q.v.

monarchi(c)al. Monarchial is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of monarchical, the usual form.

monet(ar)ize. The longer form is incorrect for monetize (= [1] to put (coins or currency) into circulation as money; [2] to give fixed value as currency; or [3] to purchase debt and thereby free up moneys that would otherwise be used to service that debt). Sense (2): "[T]he benefits flowing from those services are, in theory, as difficult to monetarize [read monetize] as religious ones." Neher v. Commissioner, 852 F.2d 848, 855 (6th Cir. 1988).

monetary damages. See money damages.

money damages, like monetary damages, is a common REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "Where money damages [read damages] would not afford adequate compensation (as, for example, in the case of a breach of contract to convey land) equity would oblige a defendant to perform specifically his part of the agreement." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 126 (2d ed. 1979). See damage(s) (A).

moneyed; monied. The former is preferred—e.g.: "Commerce might have been used to 'refer to the entire moneyed economy . . . .'" Edward H. Levi, An Introduction to Legal Reasoning 63 (1949) (quoting the Government's brief in U.S. v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 103 (1941)). See monies.

moneyed judgment seems like an odd mistake for money judgment, a common phrase today. Actually, however, moneyed judgment appeared in any number of 19th-century cases. Today it is an ARCHAISM that will strike many readers as an error.

money had and received, action for; money paid, action for. At common law, the action for money had and received was one by which the plaintiff could recover money that he or she had paid to the defendant, the money usually being recoverable for either of the following reasons: (a) the money had been paid under mistake or compulsion, or (b) the consideration had wholly failed. The action for money paid, by contrast, was one by which the plaintiff could recover money paid not to the defendant, but to a third party in circumstances in which the defendant had benefited.

monies is an illogical and misconceived plural. Because it is so common, however, it cannot be labeled a gross error. Still, moneys remains the preferred form, used, e.g., in the heading of 18 U.S.C. § 2314 (1988). Monies is only as logical as the obsolete plural attornies. Cf. moneyed.

monish. See admonition.

monism; dualism. In international law, monism denotes the doctrine that international and domestic law are but two manifestations of the same conception of law. Dualism, by contrast, holds that international law and domestic law of the several states are essentially different from each other in three ways: (1) in source; (2) in the relations they regulate; and (3) in substance. See 1 Lassa Oppenheim, International Law 37 (Hersch Lauterpacht ed., 8th ed. 1955).

monition. See admonition.

monopoly. A. In Antitrust Law. Monopoly is generally understood to mean "control by one supplier or producer over the commercial market within a given region." Nonlawyers often believe that this control must be complete, but the law in various jurisdictions now sets the level of control at a fraction of the overall market. In England, for example, under the Monopolies and Mergers Acts 1948 and 1965, a monopoly existed when the level of control reached one-third of a local or national market. That proportion was lessened by the Fair Trading Act 1973, under which companies can be prevented from controlling more than one-fourth of the supply of a product or service.

In the U.S., under the Sherman Antitrust Act, monopoly is an offense that can lead to criminal penalties and divestiture. The offense has two elements: (1) the possession of a "monopoly power" within the relevant market, i.e., the power to fix prices and exclude competitors; and (2) willfully acquiring or maintaining that power "as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historical accident." U.S. v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 571 (1966).

B. In Patent Law. The word can be confusing in patent contexts, in which it bears no connotation of illegality. The solution may be to eliminate its patent-law uses: "Because of its antitrust connotations and association with illegality . . . , it often evokes negative reactions inappropriate to a dispassionate analysis of patent law problems." In re Kaplan, 789 F.2d 1574, 1578 n.3 (Fed. Cir. 1986). The modern tendency, therefore, is to speak of an exclusive right instead of a monopoly—that is, the exclusive right to make, use, and sell an invention.

C. And monopolization. Properly speaking, monopoly refers to the control or advantage itself, or the state of possessing that control or advantage; monopolization is the process or act of gaining that control or advantage.

D. And monopsony. Whereas monopoly (Gk. "sole seller") focuses on the source of goods and services, monopsony (Gk. "sole buyer") focuses on their immediate destination: monopsony "is the term used to describe a situation in which the relevant market for a factor of production is dominated by a single purchaser." Permian Basin Area Rate Cases, 390 U.S. 747, 794 n.64 (1968). E.g., "Once El Paso was certified, it held a virtual monopsony in the Basin since Southern Union Gas Company, the only other pipeline in the Basin, served only intrastate markets which were already fully utilized." El Paso Natural Gas Co. v. Sun Oil Co., 426 F. Supp. 963, 965–66 n.5 (W.D. Tex. 1977). The word monopsony is far less common than monopoly—so much so that a few texts refer erroneously to "monopoly buyers."

monthlong is properly one word in AmE. E.g., "Onshore, an estimated 8,000 well-wishers braved the bad weather—the first encountered by the entourage since beginning the monthlong tour." The same is true of yearlong, weeklong, and daylong.

monument has two legal meanings: (1) "a written document or record" (a sense derived historically from confusion with muniment, q.v.); and (2) in AmE, "any natural or artificial object that is fixed permanently in the soil and referred to in the legal description of land."

moot. A. As Adjective. The OED lists only the sense "that can be argued; debatable; not decided, doubtful." Hence a moot point was classically seen as one that is arguable. A moot case was a hypothetical case proposed for discussion in a 'moot' of law students (see (C) below). In the U.S., law students practice arguing hypethetical cases before appellate courts in moot court.

From that sense of moot derived the extended sense "of no practical importance; hypothetical; academic." Hence, "There is no other question worthy of notice. We are asked to express an opinion as to the right of the appellants to give bail pending their appeal, but that is now a moot point." Ah How v. U.S., 193 U.S. 65, 78 (1904) (per Holmes, J.)./ "There is thus presented the primary question as to whether there is anything for us to decide on this appeal or whether the question has become moot because defendant has surrendered possession to plaintiffs." Price v. Wilson, 32 A.2d 109, 109 (D.C. 1943).

Today, in AmE, the predominant sense of moot is "having no practical significance," in both legal and nonlegal writing. Bernstein and other writers have called this sense of the word incorrect, but it is now a fait accompli. To use moot in the sense "open to argument" in AmE today is to create an ambiguity, and to confuse most of one's readers. In BrE, the transformation in sense has been slower, and moot in its older sense retains vitality. Cf. mootness.

B. As Verb. Historically, moot, v.t., meant "to raise or bring forward (a point or question) for discussion." That sense is still current in BrE, and in older American usage. E.g., "United States v. Rauscher is noteworthy as involving the much-mooted question of the right to try a person for a crime other than that for which his extradition was secured . . . ." Correspondence, 1 Harv. L. Rev. 43, 43 (1887)./ "[A]lthough the Bar first mooted the idea, it was a joint enterprise." Coming Together, 130 Solic. J. 289, 289 (1986).

In American legal usage, however, a new sense has taken hold: "to render moot or of no practical significance." Thus, "The settlement did not moot the jurisdictional question."/ "These actions presented the mooted question of the coverage of the policy."

C. As Noun. In England, moot has the sense "a hypothetical legal problem discussed by students at the Inns of Court for practice" or "the discussion resulting from such a problem." E.g., "The maxim was never forgotten in the training of the English bar in the moots of the Inns of Court, nor in the long wrangling years of oral pleading." This use is unknown in the U.S., although its scent lingers in the phrase moot court.

mootness (= the fact or quality of having no practical importance) was an AmE NEOLOGISM when first used in the 1920s—e.g.: "The question of mootness is not discussed in the briefs of counsel for the government." U.S. v. Northern Pac. Ry., 18 F.2d 299, 304 (E.D. Wash. 1927). As a noun corresponding to the modern AmE sense of moot, the word mootness has steadily become more frequent in American legal writing—e.g.:

- "The ruling excepted to, whether on the evidence or on the pleadings, in no wise affects the question of mootness." Brockett v. Maxwell, 35 S.E.2d 906, 907 (Ga. 1945).
- "Mootness is a question of justiciability. If a case has become moot, . . . then there is no necessity for a judgment . . . ." Ferguson v. Commercial Bank, 578 So. 2d 1234, 1236 (Ala. 1991).
- "The issues in this mortgage foreclosure appeal concern the propriety of the dismissal of the appeal of the named defendant, Joseph Trantino, on the ground of mootness." Rothstein v. Trantino, 635 A.2d 813, 813 (Conn. 1994).

Today, the phrase mootness doctrine or mootness rule denotes the principle that American courts will not decide moot cases—e.g.: "[T]he trial court issued another order on December 1 that found the mootness doctrine was inapplicable because petitioner was still in custody of the department . . . ." Taylor v. Department of Corrections, 556 So. 2d 494, 494 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1990)./ "[T]here is a strong likelihood that application of the mootness doctrine may repeatedly frustrate review." Peloza v. Freas, 871 P.2d 687, 688 (Alaska 1994). See moot (A).

mooty, adj., is BrE legal slang meaning "debatable"—e.g.: "After discussing a 'mooty' problem, try to avoid the weak conclusion that 'A is perhaps liable.'" Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 124 (11th ed. 1982)./ " 'Mooty' as the case may be, it is unlikely that there are many good points to be made for your side." Id. at 164.

moral obligation, as used by legal theorists, usu. denotes a duty "semi-consciously followed and enforced rather by instinct and habit than by definite sanctions." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 121 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). Thus, a moral obligation is not legally enforceable. Further, "its scope has been restricted and the label has become unfashionable." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 76 (8th ed. 1991).

more important(ly). As an introductory phrase, more important has historically been considered an elliptical form of "What is more important . . . ," and hence the -ly form is thought to be the less desirable. E.g., "This provision, of course, directly conflicts with section 1235(k); more importantly [read more important], section 1273(a) defeats Montana's right to the funds collected on the ceded strip as much as it defeats that of the tribe."/ "Perhaps most importantly [read most important], the argument that Gertz should be limited to the media misapprehends our cases." Yet arguably, if we may begin a sentence, "Importantly, jurisdiction in the Supreme Court . . . ," we ought to be able to begin it, "More importantly, jurisdiction in the Supreme Court . . ." See SENTENCE ADVERBS.

The ellipsis does not work with less idiomatic phrases. E.g., one would not say: "More notable, Holmes wrote this opinion. . . ." More notably (as opposed to More notable) is called for in order that the sentence not sound alien, illogical, and even ungrammatical. The same is true of "More interestingly, . . . ." Furthermore, if the position of the phrase is changed from the beginning of the sentence in any significant way, the usual ellipsis becomes unidiomatic and -ly is quite acceptable: "But neither, and more importantly under the Bradley analysis, does the statute or the legislative history direct that the statute be applied prospectively only."/ "Second, and more importantly, this evidence improperly emphasized a 'reasonable man' standard of knowledge."

more or less (= somewhat) is often used imprecisely in the sense "some degree of," as here: "Keep in mind also that the phraseology used in an instrument quite commonly is not constructed by the grantor himself; the instrument is drafted by someone with more or less legal learning." Less legal learning than the grantor possessed?

more perfect. This phrase appears in the preamble to the U.S. Constitution: "We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union . . . ." Some critics object that perfect, as an absolute quality, should not take a comparative adjective. The answer to those critics is an old one: "It is pedantic to object to the colloquial use of such expressions as 'more universal' [and] 'more perfect' . . . . Of course, superficially viewed, these expressions are incorrect, as there cannot be degrees of universality or of perfection . . . ; yet what is really meant by 'more perfect' for example, is 'more nearly perfect' . . . ." Harry T. Peck, "What Is Good English?" in What Is Good English? and Other Essays 3, 16–17 (N.Y., Dodd, Mead & Co. 1899). See ADJECTIVES (B).

more . . . than. A. Parallel constructions. To create parallel phrasing in the use of this construction, it is often important to repeat the preposition. E.g., "Most civil audits are more favorably settled by an open, honest discussion about what the agent wants than having [read than by having] the attorney treat the agent as the taxpayer's mortal enemy." See PARALLELISM & above (A).

B. More than one (is) (are). In the phrase more than one court has held, the phrase more than acts as a compound adverb modifying the adjective one. The subject of the clause is the singular noun court—hence the singular verb has. The same holds true if the singular noun is merely implied, i.e., is an UNDERSTOOD WORD: more than one has, not more than one have.

For many writers, this principle is counterintuitive because the sense denoted is a plural one. But this is one of the rare instances in English grammar in which the number of the verb is determined not by the meaning of the subject but by its grammatical form. See SYNESIS.

Mistakes, however, are common—e.g.: "If one [blood relative] is named, or if more than one are [read is] named, the court, aided by the curator, must make the further finding of whether there are any inheritance rights [that] presently exist." Prentice v. Parker, 376 So. 2d 568, 570 (La. Ct. App. 1979)./ "The use of a single culpability score . . . permits the impact of aggravating and mitigating sentencing factors to be considered along the same scale and, where more than one are [read is] present, to offset or accumulate culpability considerations to produce a final sentencing recommendation." Richard S. Gruner, Towards an Organizational Jurisprudence: Transforming Corporate Criminal Law Through Federal Sentencing Reform, 36 Ariz. L. Rev. 407, 445 (1994). See SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT (K).

C. More . . . than all; more . . . than any. See OVERSTATEMENT.

moribund (= dying) does not mean "dead." Yet many lawyers misuse the word—e.g.: "[T]his matrimonial partnership is completely moribund [read, perhaps, dead or over], and cannot be revived . . . ." Wang v. Wang, 386 N.Y.S.2d 922, 925 (Sup. Ct. 1976)./ "That this rule saves the Clause from being completely moribund [read, perhaps, lifeless] does not . . . alter the reality that it is insufficient to ensure that federal law is paramount." Green v. Mansour, 474 U.S. 64, 77 (1985) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITIES are words derived from other languages, usu. Latin or Greek, whose morphemes are so put together as to travesty the lending or borrowing language's principles of word formation. In some philologists' view, one does not combine the inseparable particle dis- with nouns to form English verbs (e.g., dismember) because it is impermissible by Latin morphology. In Latin, dis- was joined only with verbs to form privative verbs (e.g., disentitle, disregard.)

Any number of examples of ill-formed words made up of classical morphemes exist in modern English: aborticide, abortuary [a PORTMANTEAU WORD from abortion mortuary], asylee, breathalyzer, deflation, drunkometer, homophobe, prosumerism [a PORTMANTEAU WORD from pro-consumerism], simulcast, slumpflation, stagflation, teletype, urinalysis, workaholic, and on and on. The importance of knowing something about morphology, or how word elements properly compose whole words, is that we can then create and use NEOLOGISMS that are inoffensive to those who know the English language and other languages. And we can likewise avoid opposition to morphological deformities, which refined writers avoid as much as possible. Cf. HYBRIDS.

mortgage, n., = a property owner's promise that, if some obligation is not met, the creditor may take the property to satisfy that obligation. At common law, the word referred only to real property. But in mid-19th century AmE, the word mortgage was extended to apply to personalty as well as realty. Hence, the phrase chattel mortgage arose. Still, in actual usage mortgage much more frequently applies to real rather than personal property.

The word mortgage has two possible etymological meanings. One theory—the better one—holds that the word derives from OF. mort gaige "dead pledge," so called because the debt becomes void or "dead" when the mortgagor redeems the pledge. Another theory is that dead pledge means the same thing as the current phrases dead capital and dead investment: while land is in the possession of the lender, it is dead—it gives no return to the owner.

mortgageable. So spelled.

mortgage-holder is less clear than mortgagee because many readers might take it to mean "mortgagor"—e.g.: "Purchase money mortgage holders [read mortgagees] may improve their collateral positions by allowing the owner to improve the property at the expense of the mechanics' lienholders." Shade v. Wheatcraft Indus., Inc., 809 P.2d 538, 542 (Kan. 1991).

mortgag(e)or; mortgager. Coke and Blackstone used the -or spelling; the lexicographers Johnson and Webster preferred -er, the latter terming -or "an orthography that should have no countenance." Noah Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828). The Law Quarterly Review and many other British publications use -er; the form -or predominates in AmE. The -eor spelling, which appeared in the Year Books, is nowhere used today.

mortis causa. See causa mortis.

mortmain (lit., "deadhand") the condition of lands or tenements held inalienably by an ecclesiastical or other corporation. The term suggests control from the grave, as here in a LOAN TRANSLATION: "The effect of the rule is to invalidate ab initio certain future interests that might otherwise remain in existence for a period of time considered inimical to society's interest in having reasonable limits to deadhand control and in facilitating the marketability of property."

The OED remarks: "It seems probable that

'dead hand' in English legal use is a metaphorical expression for impersonal ownership, and is unconnected with the older feudal use of manus mortua to denote the custom by which serfs (and other classes included under the term homines manus mortuae) had no power of testamentary disposition, their possessions, if they died without legitimate offspring, reverting to the lord."

most for very or almost is poor usage—e.g.: "The power of judicial review had a most inauspicious beginning." (The adjective inauspicious is actually stronger without a modifier; see WEASEL WORDS.)/ "Most [read Almost] everybody knows what a statute is, but what is a precedent?" C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 80 (1963). See very (A).

most-favored-nation clause. Commercial lawyers borrowed the diplomatic phrase most favored nation (a status that lowers import taxes) and used it to denote a contractual clause ensuring that a given buyer or royalty owner will be treated at least as favorably as any other buyer or royalty owner. The phrase favored-nation clause is a variant.

On the same principle, some commercial tenants negotiate a most-favored-tenant clause, which ensures that a tenant will be given any negotiating concessions given to other tenants.

Mother Hubbard clause; anaconda clause; dragnet clause. These synonymous phrases denote a clause stating that a mortgage (more specifically, an anaconda mortgage) secures all the debts that the mortgagor may at any time owe to the mortgagee. The metaphors underlying the terms are as follows: Mother Hubbard suggests that the mortgagor goes to great lengths to satisfy the mortgagee, just as Mother Hubbard (in the popular nursery rhyme) is absurdly solicitous toward her dog. E.g., "Amerada . . . invokes the 'coverall' (sometimes called the 'Mother Hubbard') clause in an oil and gas lease from Koch, dated January 19, 1945." Gardner v. Amerada Petroleum Corp., 91 F. Supp. 134, 135 (S.D. Tex. 1950). Anaconda suggests that the unsuspecting debtor may get wrapped up in the serpentine clutches of indebtedness. The dragnet metaphor suggests a broadly cast net that sweeps in all past and future debts. Today, Mother Hubbard clause is the most usual phrase.

motion = an application requesting a court to make a specified order. Though it is properly classifiable as a court paper, a motion is not a pleading. See court papers, application & pleading (B).

motion, v.t., in the sense "to move (as a court)" is labeled obsolete in the OED. It ought to be obsolete, but strangely it persists in American legal writing—e.g.: "Warrington motioned [read moved] the court for summary judgment on both the conversion and securities fraud causes of action." Levitz v. Warrington, 877 P.2d 1245, 1246 (Utah Ct. App. 1994)./ "On March 24, 1993, Parson motioned [read moved] the court to increase child support . . . ." Hernandez v. Hernandez, 640 So. 2d 818, 819 (La. Ct. App. 1994). See move (that) the court.

motion for (a) new trial. This motion, which dates back to medieval times, is now generally called a motion for new trial, without the indefinite article. See ARTICLES (C) motion in limine should not be hyphenated. See in limine.

motivate, -ation. See actuate.

motive is, as Wigmore has observed, unfortunately ambiguous: "That which has value to show the doing or not doing of the act is the inward emotion, passion, feeling, of the appropriate sort; but that which shows the probable existence of this emotion is termed—when it is . . . some outer fact—the 'motive.' For example, the prior prosecution of A by B in a suit at law is said to have been a 'motive' for A's subsequent burning of B's house. But in strictness the external fact of B's suit cannot be A's 'motive'; for the motive is a state of mind of A; the external fact does tend to show the excitement of the hostile and vindictive emotion, but it is not identical with that emotion." J.H. Wigmore, The Science of Judicial Proof 117 (3d ed. 1937). Cf. intent(ion) (C).

mouthpiece. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

movable, adj. & n., is the preferred spelling in both AmE and BrE. Moveable, chiefly a legal variant, should be avoided everywhere but in Scotland, where it is traditional. See immovable, -ABLE (A) & ADJECTIVES (C).

movant; mover. Movant (= one who makes a motion to the court) is a late-19th-century Americanism. Among the earliest recorded uses is this one: "The movants excepted to the rulings of the court . . . ." Lanning v. Lockett, 11 F. 814, 814 syl. (C.C.S.D. Ga. 1882).

In the U.S. today, movant is far more common than mover. It is the form used in most court rules and predominantly in reported cases. E.g., "While the movant need not always show a probability of success on the merits, he must present a substantial case on the merits." Movent is an incorrect variant spelling.

Mover, when used in the sense of movant, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "We must consider all the evidence—not just that evidence which supports the nonmover's [read nonmovant's] case—but in the light and with all reasonable inferences most favorable to the nonmoving party." Some people prefer mover over movant in parliamentary procedure.

move (that) the court. "We move the court to grant a new trial." This construction appears from a logical point of view to be incorrect. Idiom would seem to require: "I move that the court grant a new trial." By analogy, one might say: "I hereby move that we adjourn," but not "I hereby move us to adjourn."

Yet the phrase moving the court is of long standing in legal language, including this from the syllabus in Marbury v. Madison: "At the last term, . . . William Marbury [et al.] severally moved the court for a rule to James Madison . . . ." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 137 syl. (1803).

With either of those two constructions, move is transitive (move the court or move that the court), even when the object is understood: move [the court] for relief becomes move for relief.

much. See many (A).

muchly is nowadays considered a substandard form, though several centuries ago it was not so stigmatized. Much is the preferred form in all adverbial contexts. Surprisingly, muchly has appeared in reported American opinions. See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (D) & HYPERCORRECTION (D).

mulct /məlkt/ = to punish by a fine. The term is rarely encountered outside the law, and only infrequently within it—e.g.: "Let them then be mulcted to the uttermost in the penalty that Parliament has prescribed." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 60 (1968).

Mulct has the additional sense "to deprive or divest of," and carries pejorative connotations of mercilessness or deceit. E.g., "The panel opinion also permits a jury to mulct the defendant in a defamation action of more than compensatory damages."

multifarious = (1) improperly joining in one pleading distinct matters or causes of action, and thereby confounding them; (2) improperly joining parties in a lawsuit; or (3) diversified; many and various. Sense (3) is the common, nonlegal sense. In law, sense (1) predominates—e.g.: "The complaint as amended was dismissed . . . on the grounds of multifarious pleading and for failure to state a cause of action." Bates & Rogers Constr. Corp. v. North Shore Sanitary Dist., 414 N.E.2d 1274, 1276 (Ill. App. Ct. 1980).

multiparty; multipartite. Multiparty is defined by the OED as a political term meaning "comprising several parties or members of parties; of an electoral or political system which results in the formation of three or more influential parties." Yet in law, the party in this word has come in the U.S. to refer to a party to a lawsuit. E.g., "When the intervention was allowed, the suit became a multiparty action within the meaning of Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(b)."

Multipartite = divided into many parts. In the following example, multipartite seems to be misused for multiparty: "Multipartite [read multiparty?] agreements between the debtor and his creditors, or several of them, may bind participating creditors. Non-consenting creditors will not be so bound." James A. MacLachlan, Handbook of the Law of Bankruptcy 4 (1956).

multiplici(t)ous. A. Form of the Word. Although both forms (multiplicitous and multiplicious) have existed in the English language, W3 states (prematurely) that multiplicious is now obsolete. (It is the only form listed in the OED.) Certainly it is the rarer term, and it does not immediately reveal its relationship with the noun multiplicity. Nonetheless, multiplicious appears in the law reports. See, e.g., U.S. v. Wesley, 748 F.2d 962, 963 (5th Cir. 1984) ("Wesley argues that his convictions . . . are multiplicious and violative of the double jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment."); U.S. v. Stanfa, 685 F.2d 85, 88 (3d Cir. 1982) (multiplicious used four times in two paragraphs). But this word should not be resurrected: we should avoid multiplicitous forms of this word, and hold steady with multiplicitous. (When used—as in the previous sentence—for multiple, multiplicitous is a pomposity.)

The two forms of the word are susceptible to INELEGANT VARIATION. One judicial writer used both forms in consecutive paragraphs: "Even if a single fact pattern were present, the 'different evidence test' . . . would show that the counts in question were not multiplicitous. . . . The chief danger raised by a multiplicious [read multiplicitous] indictment is the possibility that the defendant will receive more than one sentence for a single offense." U.S. v. Swaim, 757 F.2d 1530, 1536–37 (5th Cir. 1985).

B. And duplicitous. The distinction is not what one might infer: "An indictment is multiplicitous when it charges one offense in several counts. An indictment is duplicitous when it charges numerous crimes in a single count." U.S. v. Jones, 648 F. Supp. 241, 242 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (citations omitted). E.g., "If Lartey has any complaint, it is not that the indictment is multiplicious [read multiplicitous], but rather that it is duplicitous, charging numerous crimes in a single count." U.S. v. Lartey, 716 F.2d 955, 968 (2d Cir. 1983). See duplicitous.

multiply is an adverb as well as a verb: "Theresa is a multiply handicapped child with severe behavioral problems."

multistate. So spelled, without a hyphen.

multital. See paucital.

multitude of, a. See SYNESIS.

mumbo-jumbo. Many critics use this phrase to denote LEGALESE and JARGON—e.g.: "And only the solemn and mystifying mumbo-jumbo of legal language keeps the non-lawyers from catching on." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 88 (1939; repr. 1980).

municipal = (1) of or relating to a town, city, or local governmental unit (as contrasted with county, state, or national); or (2) of or relating to the internal government of a state or nation (as contrasted with international). Sense (1) is ordinary. All but international lawyers are likely to find sense (2) odd—e.g.: "It is presumed that municipal law is to be interpreted to be in conformity with international law." Michael Zander, The Law Making Process 128 (2d ed. 1985). See international.

muniment = a document (as a deed or charter) preserved as evidence in defense of rights or privileges belonging to a person, family, or corporation. Today this word is most commonly used in the phrase muniment of title. E.g., "A trust may not under those circumstances be engrafted upon a deed absolute in its terms because if that were the rule, deeds would no longer be valuable as muniments of title." See monument.

murder. A. And homicide; manslaughter; man-killing. Homicide is the action of killing another human being; it is the general legal term. Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought. It is the most heinous kind of criminal homicide. At common law, murder was not subdivided; but in most American jurisdictions statutes have created first-degree murder, second-degree murder, and third-degree murder (in descending order of reprehensibility). Indeed, second-degree murder is the same as common-law murder, as defined above. First-degree murder, a statutory crime, is the common-law crime of murder with an added element that aggravates the crime (e.g., arson, rape, robbery, burglary, larceny, kidnapping). See degree.

Manslaughter, which is a less serious crime than murder, is homicide committed without malice aforethought. The Scots-law equivalent is culpable homicide.

Man-killing, q.v., is a nonlegal synonym for homicide, used sometimes of nonhuman killers . But it is a sexist term: see SEXISM (B).

B. Unintentional murder. This phrase may strike some readers as an OXYMORON, but it is in widespread use—e.g.: "On Tuesday, the [California Supreme Court], in a major break with a 4-year-old precedent, ruled that a killer can be executed for an unintentional murder." Calif. Death Sentence Upheld, L.A. Times, 15 Oct. 1987, at 1-1. And it is entirely proper to speak of an unintentional murder, as when a defendant, for no good reason, shoots a gun into an occupied room and kills somebody inside.

The distinction between unintentional murder and manslaughter, says one commentator, "has never been drawn with great clarity. What is clear is that murder requires a more culpable level of risk-taking than does manslaughter." Joshua Dressler, Understanding Criminal Law 462 (1987). The recklessness involved in unintentional murder is more extreme than that involved in manslaughter.

murder one; murder two; murder three. These are AmE colloquialisms for first-degree murder, second-degree murder, and third-degree murder.

must is used both factually and normatively. The factual use involves a judgment about something that has happened: "She must have known that he was there. Otherwise she never would have begun chanting the message." The normative must may be merely a strong ought ("You must always tell the truth.") or an absolute requirement ("To qualify, you must be at least 18 years of age.").

In DRAFTING, must is generally confined to the last of these senses. Many drafters, especially in Australia, Canada, and Great Britain, consider must a much better word than shall for stating requirements. And the trend seems to be for Americans to adopt this view. See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (A) & (C).

muster. The phrase to pass muster began as a military term meaning "to undergo review without censure." Lawyers have picked it up especially in the sense of constitutional review. E.g., "To pass muster, the classifications must serve important governmental objectives and be substantially related to the achievement of those objectives."/ "The admission of evidence in this case readily passes muster."

This SET PHRASE is occasionally mangled: "Such political undertakings cannot withstand constitutional muster [read pass constitutional muster]." Past muster is an ignorant blunder for pass muster: "We assume that this explanation would past muster [read pass muster]."

must needs. See needs must.

must not. See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (F).

mutatis mutandis (= the necessary changes having been made; taking into consideration or allowing for the changes that must be made) is a useful LATINISM in learned writing, for the only English equivalents are far wordier. E.g., "What we have said in connection with the counterclaim applies mutatis mutandis to his defense to the complaint."/ "What has thus far been said concerning contracts completed by mail would seem to apply, mutatis mutandis, to every type of contract."/ "How far can the account given above of legal liability-responsibility be applied mutatis mutandis to moral responsibility?" H.L.A. Hart, "Postscript: Responsibility and Retribution," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 210, 225 (1968). Cf. ceteris paribus.

mute. In nonlegal contexts this word has come to signify "dumb; destitute of the faculty of speech." In law, however, it retains its older use as a synonym of silent. E.g., "The petitioners' decision to remain mute during the deportability phase of the hearing was an appropriate exercise of their Fifth Amendment privilege."

MUTE E. In English, an unsounded final -e- is ordinarily dropped before the -ing and -ed inflections, e.g., create, creating, created; rate, rating, rated; share, sharing, shared. Exceptions to this rule are verbs with bases ending in -ee, -ye, and -oe: these do not drop the -e- before -ing, but they do drop it before -ed: agree, agreeing, agreed; dye, dyeing, dyed; shoe, shoeing, shoed.

The suffix -able often causes doubt when it is appended to a base ending in a mute -e-. Generally, the -e- is dropped when -able is added, but a number of exceptions exist in BrE (e.g., hireable, liveable, nameable, rateable, ropeable, saleable, sizeable, unshakeable). But in BrE, forms such as blamable, exercisable, and finable, which follow the American rule of dropping the -e-, are preferred.

The almost universal exception to the AmE rule of dropping the -e- before a vowel is that it should be kept if it is needed to indicate the soft sound of a preceding -g- or -c-, or to distinguish a word from another with a like spelling. E.g., change, changeable; hinge, hingeing; singe, singeing; trace, traceable. But even this exception to the rule is not uniform: lunge yields lunging. Because the given form of a word when inflected is easily forgotten and often the subject of disagreement even among lexicographers, the best course is to keep an up-to-date and reliable dictionary at one's side.

One other difference between AmE and BrE is of interest to legal writers: in AmE, the mute -e- is dropped after -dg- in words such as acknowledgment, fledgling, and judgment, whereas the -e- is retained in BrE (acknowledgement, fledgeling, and judgement). British legal writers, however, usu. prefer the spelling judgment. See judgment & pledg(e)or.

mutual; common. Mutual = reciprocal; directed by each toward the other(s). E.g., "This court has held that a contract made by mutual letters [read by the mutual exchange of letters] was not complete until the letter accepting the offer had been received by the person making the offer." Common = shared by two or more. Friend in common is preferable to mutual friend, although the latter has stuck because of Dickens's novel (the title to which, everyone forgets, comes from a sentence mouthed by an illiterate character). See mutual mistake.

Like together, q.v., mutual creates any number of redundant expressions. E.g., "We have repeatedly held that a party may not assume successive positions in the course of a suit, or series of suits, with reference to the same fact or state of facts, which are inconsistent with each other, or mutually contradictory [read merely contradictory]." Some of the more common prolixities with this word are mutual agreement and mutual coopera- tion. Redundancies are especially common when mutual is used in conjunction with both; for instance, mutually binding on both parties, or: "An invitee has been described as one who enters on another's land with the owner's knowledge and for the mutual benefit of both [read either for their mutual benefit or for the benefit of both]."

mutuality of obligation (= the fact of both parties to a contract having agreed to be bound in some way) once allowed courts to decide that one party's promise was "illusory" and that the contract therefore failed for lack of consideration. Today, however, "the once powerful slogan of 'mutuality of obligation' makes its rare appearance . . . as 'the now exploded theory of mutuality of obligation.'" Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 77 (1974). Cf. meeting of the minds.

mutually exclusive = each excluding the other. E.g., "It has always been hard to classify all government activity into three, and only three, neat and mutually exclusive categories." The phrase must be carefully used.

mutual mistake. Because this phrase, as it is ordinarily employed, involves a misuse of mutual for common, several writers on the law of contract—such as Cheshire, Fifoot, and Atiyah—have valiantly championed common mistake over mutual mistake. (See mutual.) Alas, the courts have not followed their grammatical lead and continue to refer overwhelmingly to mutual mistake.

It would be quite possible—and perhaps desirable—to distinguish between a common mistake and a mutual mistake. A common mistake occurs when both parties make the same mistake: when, for example, parties think that a painting is a genuine Van Gogh but in fact it is a fake. A mutual mistake occurs when each party is mistaken about the other's intent: when, for example, I think I am selling you my Honda Accord and you think you are buying my Acura. Mutual would be correct because I have mistaken your intent, and you have mistaken mine. But common-law judges typically lump both situations under the name mutual mistake.

mutual will; joint will. A joint will (sometimes wrongly called a mutual will) is one testamentary document executed by two persons. Mutual wills are separate documents in which two parties—usu. a husband and wife—establish identical testamentary provisions; such wills may contain or imply a contract not to revoke, so that the death of either party may bind the survivor to make no alteration.

my home is my castle. See castle doctrine.

my lady. See my lord.

my lord; your lordship. An English judge appointed to the High Court or some even higher court is invariably promoted within society: men are knighted and women are made Dames of the Order of the British Empire. Few become members of the House of Lords, but in court they are all nevertheless addressed my lord or your lordship, or my lady or your ladyship.

The my and your terms are not used interchangeably: my lord is used as a vocative in addressing a judge directly ("My lord, this case involves . . . "), whereas your lordship appears within a sentence as a polite alternative to you ("May it please your lordship, I am counsel for the plaintiff."). Cf. Honorable (2d par.).

In Scotland, judges of the Court of Session are, by courtesy, called Lord X and addressed in court as my lord or your lordship, even though they are rarely knighted or raised to the peerage. The origin of this practice was that superior-court judges were originally Lords of the King's Privy Council (i.e., "secret council"), from which the Court of Session evolved.

myriad is best used adjectivally, and not as a noun, for the adjectival use is more concise. E.g., "The Constitution does not empower this Court to second-guess state officials charged with the difficult responsibility of allocating limited public welfare funds among the myriad of [read among the myriad] potential recipients."

myself is best used either reflexively (e.g., "I have decided to recuse myself.") or intensively (e.g., "I myself will sue the corporation on behalf of the class of persons harmed.").

But myself should not appear as a substitute for I or me. Using it thus is thought somehow to be modest, as if the reference to oneself were less direct. But it is no less direct, and the writer may unconsciously cause the reader or listener to assume an intended jocularity, or that the writer is somewhat doltish. E.g., "After reconsideration, upon appellee's motion for rehearing, Mr. Justice B. and myself [read I] have reached the conclusion that this court has rendered an improper judgment, and that the motion for rehearing should be granted, and the judgment of the trial court affirmed." (Is it so difficult to say simply, "We have rendered an improper judgment"?)/ "Those ins and outs are largely a self-learning process, though knowing the experience of someone like myself [read me] might make the learning shorter, easier, and a lot less painful." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School xii (1984). See FIRST PERSON.

MYTH OF PRECISION, THE. "Delusive exactness is a source of fallacy throughout the law." Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U.S. 312, 342 (1921) (Holmes, J., dissenting). When attacked for their inscrutable use of language, lawyers have traditionally sought refuge in precision, and often silenced their critics by the invocation of precision. Not everyone has been satisfied, however, by the explanation or excuse that legal language, despite its WOOLLINESS and frequent ugliness, is more precise than the general language. In words that still ring true, Jeremy Bentham wrote, in the early 19th century:

> For this redundancy, for the accumulation of excrementitious matter [i.e., legalese] in all its various shapes . . [and] for all the pestilential effects that cannot be produced by this so enormous a load of literary garbage,—the plea commonly pleaded . . is, that it is necessary to precision—or, to use the word which on similar occasions they themselves are in the habit of using, certainty.
> But a more absolutely sham plea never was countenanced, or so much as pleaded, in either the King's Bench or Common Pleas
>
> 3 Jeremy Bentham, Works 260 (J. Bowring ed. 1843).

A late 19th-century legist wrote, in words less vitriolic but even more telling:

> There is an abundance of affected accuracy in the addition of descriptions to distinguish persons and things needing no distinction, and in the expression of immaterial matters; but real accuracy and precision are attained quite as much by the omission of superfluous phrases, by the avoidance of tautology, by correct references and by a strict adherence to the rules of grammar, as by the use of apt words
> 1 Charles Davidson, Precedents and Forms in Conveyancing 23 (4th ed. 1874).

The truth is that many people, lawyers included, buy into the fallacy that there must be a great deal of precision in LEGALESE. Why else—nonlawyers wonder—would lawyers talk so much about precision? Lon Fuller recognized the myth but not the extent of its currency: "For the time being it will be enough to put down one source of obfuscation. This is the notion current among laymen that lawyers, with all their forbidding jargon, have some uncanny ability to convey meaning to one another with great exactitude. Outside the area of a few TERMS OF ART, there is nothing to this belief." The Anatomy of Law 26 (1968). What Fuller did not realize is that the myth besots lawyers and nonlawyers alike. What everyone ought to recognize, though, is that, "[t]o fill in the spaces between their 'whereas's' and 'provided however's' lawyers have no resources except those available to any user of language." Id.

There is all too little precision in legal language, as many entries in this book should demonstrate. See PLAIN LANGUAGE.

naked is often used metaphorically in legal writing in the sense "having nothing that confirms or validates (a thing)." E.g., "The exceptions on this point present a naked proposition of law."/ "The plaintiff, having received only the naked ownership, never received any income from the property."

Naked trespasser describes not one who trespasses unclothed, but a trespasser with absolutely no claim to be present on the land: "Had A.S. entered upon this land as a naked trespasser, without any property right therein, he would have had no basis for a claim of title until the full period of limitation had run." In trademark law, a naked license is a license without provision for the licensor's exercise of quality control. And naked contract—a LOAN TRANSLATION of L. nudum pactum—denotes a contract not "clothed" with consideration. (See nudum pactum.) For the correlative METAPHOR, see clothe.

Napoleonic Code. American lawyers esp. often refer to the "Napoleonic Code" as if it were the official name of a single code. Those who do so are wrong on two counts. First, although Napoleon commissioned the codification of French law, his name is only unofficially connected with the product. Second, it is more proper to refer to Napoleonic codes, in the plural and with a lowercase -c-, as David M. Walker does in the OCL.

The Napoleonic codes include the Code civil (1804), the Code de procédure civil (1806), the Code de commerce (1807), the Code pénal (1810), and the Code d'instruction crimenelle (1811). When American lawyers use the singular phrase, they seem to have in mind the Code civil (or Civil Code, as rendered in English).

narrative. In Scots law, the narrative in a deed is equivalent to the recitals in English and American deeds. The narrative sets forth the names of the grantor and the grantee, along with the reason for the conveyance.

nation; state. These two words have different meanings. A nation is a group of people inhabiting a defined territory, that group being distinct from other groups of people by the fact of its having allegiance to a single government exercising jurisdiction directly over each individual in the group. The state, by contrast, is the system of rules—or the machinery—by which jurisdiction is exercised over individuals within the group. It is therefore "illogical and confusing to use the terms 'State' and 'Nation' as though they were interchangeable, although this is frequently done. Thus we refer to the 'United Nations' although this is in fact an organization of States." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 5 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). See state.

national; federal. In a nation whose government has a federal system, these two terms might seem interchangeable. But the founders of the United States carefully distinguished them—particularly James Madison, who wrote:

> '[T]he Constitution is to be founded on the assent and ratification of the people of America, given by deputies elected for the special purpose; but, on the other [hand], . . . this assent and ratification is to be given by the people, not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong. It is to be the assent and ratification of the several States, derived from the supreme authority in each State—the authority of the people themselves. The act, therefore, establishing the Constitution will not be a national but a federal act.
> The Federalist No. 39, at 243 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

Thus, as Madison explained, the foundation of the Constitution is federal; the operation of governmental powers under the Constitution is national; and the method of introducing amendments is mixed. Id. at 246.

National Reporter System. See report (A).

Native American. See native-born citizen.

native-born citizen. This phrase, though it has been fairly common since the 19th century, reeks of REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "The evidence in the record before us is not sufficiently compelling to require that we penalize a naturalized citizen for the expression of silly or even sinister-sounding views [that] native-born citizens [read native citizens] utter with impunity." Baumgartner v. U.S., 322 U.S. 665, 677 (1944)./ "For the native born citizen [read native citizen] it is a right that is truly inalienable." Kungys v. U.S., 485 U.S. 759, 784 (1988) (Stevens, J., concurring).

The modern temptation to brace the adjective native may come from two sources. First, in American law, the noun native has come to mean either (1) "a person born in the country"; or (2) "a person born outside the country of parents who are (at the time of the birth) citizens of that country and who are not permanently residing elsewhere." Sense (2) represents a slide in meaning, but the judicial writers quoted above could not possibly have wanted to protect against that extended meaning. Second, the phrase Native American, meaning American Indian, has recently popularized a secondary meaning of native, one having to do with heritage and not with birthplace: "one of the original or usual inhabitants of a country, as distinguished from strangers or foreigners; now esp. one belonging to a non-European race in a country in which Europeans hold political power" (OED).

natural child doubles as term equivalent to biological child and as a EUPHEMISM for bastard, illegitimate child, or nonmarital child. See bastard & illegitimate child.

natural justice is closely allied with natural law, q.v. A 19th-century court defined the phrase as "the natural sense of what is right and wrong." Voinet v. Barrett (1885) 55 L.J.Q.B. 39, 41. Although, on its face, the phrase is vague, its application tends to be specific: it usually turns up in discussions of whether a party has been afforded notice and a hearing. However desirable these procedural requirements may be, though, they are anything but "natural." So natural justice is really "a serious misnomer" by the use of which "lawyers may have underestimated their own contribution to one of the great principles of liberal societies." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 41 (1983).

natural law. A. General Sense. Historically a number of senses have been attributed to this term; today the prevailing sense, esp. in legal contexts, is "law that determines what is right and wrong and that has power or is valid by nature, inherently, hence everywhere and always." L. Strauss, "Natural Law," 11 Interna- tional Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences 80, 80 (1968). Because natural law and positive law (q.v.) are not mutually exclusive, a rule such as, "Thou shalt not kill," might be a rule equally in both systems.

Twentieth-century legal scholars have mostly rejected the notion of natural law on positivist grounds, because genuine scientific knowledge cannot validate value judgments, and natural law is composed fundamentally of value judgments. Stated differently, the problem with natural law is that, if it exists, there is no way to determine whose version of it is correct. The modern user of the term should be aware of the debate surrounding the concept and of the generally low regard in which the concept is now held.

Two synonymous phrases are law of nature and jus naturale.

B. Incorrect Sense. At least one writer has perversely used the phrase natural law as if it referred to the law (or lawlessness) of a state of nature: "Carr relished the good fight, and the opposition's propensity to settle contradicted his own natural law." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 350 (1989).

naturalist. To most people, Buffon and Darwin were naturalists, i.e., 19th-century biologists. Some lawyers use naturalist, however, to denote a natural-law adherent—e.g.: "Pufendorf, though differing in his concept of natural law, was also a 'naturalist.'" René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 513 (1962). The more usual (and comprehensible) phrase is natural lawyer.

natural lawyer. See naturalist.

natural life. The common conveyancing phrase during his natural life is better rendered for life or as long as he lives. See civil death.

natural person (= a human being) is unnecessary in place of either person or human being, except when contrast is made to juristic person, q.v.

natural right, like natural law and natural justice, is now generally considered a suspect phrase. Property lawyers have traditionally referred to the natural right of a landowner to have the land not be deprived of its support from adjacent tracts, to receive water from a stream, and the like. But "it is simpler and more intelligible to talk of the situations in which a landowner can sue in tort without proving the existence of a servitude, than to speak of natural rights and attempt to list these." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the Land Law 246 (1961).

naught; nought. These are different spellings of the same word, meaning "nothing." By convention nought—esp. in BrE—has come to signify the number zero (0). Naught is used in all nonmathematical contexts in which "nothing" is meant—e.g.: "The insurer may be put to the labor and expense of investigation that may, several years later, be found to have been for naught."/ "The appointees in the case at bar have not appealed from the decree under consideration, and thus have evidenced their acceptance of what we have just said, although it sets at naught the intent of the donees." See further affiant . . . .

nausea, when used for vomit, n., is a badly employed EUPHEMISM nauseous (= inducing nausea) for nauseated is becoming so common that to call it an "error" is to exaggerate. Even so, careful writers follow the traditional distinction in formal writing: what is nauseous makes one feel nauseated. As of the early 1990s, the U.S. Supreme Court, in its seven uses of either word, had maintained a perfect record—e.g.: "It is made up entirely of repetitive descriptions of physical, sexual conduct, 'clinically' explicit and offensive to the point of being nauseous; there is only the most tenuous plot." Kaplan v. California, 413 U.S. 115, 116–17 (1973).

Lower courts, however, had helped spread the peccadillo—e.g.: "Once outside, however, Yunis felt nauseous [read nauseated]." U.S. v. Yunis, 859 F.2d 953, 956 (D.C. Cir. 1988)./ "He then became nauseous [read nauseated] and crawled into the bathroom and vomited." State v. Thomas, 407 S.E.2d 141, 145 (N.C. 1991).

nay. Except in the parliamentary procedure of taking votes either yea or nay—or aye and nay—the word nay smacks of pretentious posturing. E.g., "Moreover, parties must be encouraged, nay required [read even required], to raise their complaints about the arbitration during the arbitration process itself, when that is possible." Marino v. Writers Guild of America, E., Inc., 992 F.2d 1480, 1483 (9th Cir. 1993)./ "The district court carefully juxtaposed selections from K-T's Licensed Materials with selections from the MPO program, thereby demonstrating a damning similarity—nay identity [read even identity]—of organization and language." Kepner-Tregoe, Inc. v. Leadership Software, Inc., 12 F.3d 527, 534 (5th Cir. 1994)./ "I, for one, find it instructive—nay, daunting [read no, daunting or even daunting]—that no Supreme Court case utters so much as a whisper about the doctrine of implied authority that is the centerpiece of the majority's analysis."

Thomas v. INS, 35 F.3d 1332, 1344 (9th Cir. 1994) (Kozinski, J., dissenting). See ARCHAISM.

N.B. is the abbreviation for nota bene (= note well; take notice).

necessaries; necessities. In legal senses, necessaries is the usual term for "things that are indispensable (to life)." E.g., "Claims for necessaries furnished to the beneficiary of a spendthrift or support trust may be enforced against his trust interest." Though one might suppose that necessaries would be the same for everyone, the law does not so hold: "It might be held that ten suits of clothes are necessaries for one infant, whereas three suits might not be deemed necessary for another. The whole question turns upon the infant's status in life." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 44–45 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950).

Necessities has the broader sense of "indispensable things," whatever the subject at hand may be.

necessary; necessitous. Necessary, the more common word, means "essential." (See indispensable.) Almost always used correctly, necessary is ill-used when it introduces an infinitive without a BE-VERB preceding it—e.g.: "The only Massachusetts case necessary to analyze [read that it is necessary to analyze or that must be analyzed here] is Balch v. Stone, supra, since all other cases from that state followed the Balch case without further discussion of the soundness of the rule." Maud v. Catherwood, 155 P.2d 111, 118 (Cal. Dist. Ct. App. 1945).

Necessitous = placed or living in a condition of necessity or poverty; hard-up. E.g., "It will be found that where a gift results in mere financial enrichment, a trust has been sustained only when the court found and concluded from the entire context of the will that the ultimate intended recipients were poor or in necessitous circumstances."

necessitate (= to make necessary) is often inferior to require. Yet require cannot always substitute for it: "The ALJ's failure to explain his reason for crediting certain testimony while ignoring more substantial evidence could normally necessitate a remand."/ "Appellant knew that his insistence on his right to represent himself would, perforce, necessitate his giving up his right to counsel."

necessities. See necessaries.

necessitous. See necessary.

necessity, in criminal law, denotes a utilitarian idea: that it is sometimes better to break the law than to follow it to the letter. It might lead an appellate court to overturn the murder convictions of four cave explorers who, having gone without food for 21 days and being on the verge of starvation, killed a companion and ate the flesh to survive. Then again, it might not. The doctrine of necessity might lead a court to approve a doctor's decision to perform an illegal, third-trimester abortion in order to save the mother's life. Some writers use duress of circumstances as an equivalent phrase.

neck verse. This phrase denotes the first verse of Psalm 51 (Miserere mei, Deus "Have mercy on me, O God"), which was traditionally used as a literacy test for an accused to claim benefit of clergy. Although judges might choose passages at random, they tended to stick to Psalm 51, with the result that, by the end of the 16th century, half of all convicted felons were able to save their necks by successfully claiming benefit of clergy. See J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 587 (3d ed. 1990). The reading of the neck verse was abolished in 1707. See benefit of clergy.

NEEDLESS VARIANTS, two or more forms of the same word without nuance or DIFFERENTIATION, and seemingly without even hope for either, teem in the language of the law. They teem in the English language for that matter, especially in the outer reaches of the language—that is, in technical vocabulary. Unfortunately, the unnecessary coexistence of variant forms, adjectives in -tive and -tory for example, lead not to precision in technical writing but to uncertainties about authorial intention. (Trusting readers think to themselves, "The writer used punitive on the last page but now has pressed into service punitory—is a distinction intended?")

"It is a source not of strength," wrote Fowler, "but of weakness, that there should be two names for the same thing [by-forms differing merely in suffix or in some such minor point], because the reasonable assumption is that two words mean two things, and confusion results when they do not" (MEU1 373). The confusion is perhaps greatest when writers who are fond of INELEGANT VARIATION discover the boundless mutations of form that exist in law: they will write res judicata in one paragraph, res adjudicata in the next; a quo in one sentence, a qua in the next; recusal, recusement, then recusation; and so on.

"On the other hand," we are advised to take note, "it may be much too hastily assumed that two words do mean the same thing; they may, for instance, denote the same object without meaning the same thing if they imply that the aspect from which it is regarded is different, or are appropriate in different mouths, or differ in rhythmic value or in some other matter that may escape a cursory examination" (MEU1 373). Hence the nonlawyer should not jump to assume that necessaries is uncalled for in place of necessities; that acquittance has no place alongside acquittal; that recusancy is yet another needless variant of the three similar words cited above; that burglarize is as good for a British audience as it is for an American one; and so forth. For just such an incorrect assumption, see wrong.

Any number of entries throughout this work attempt to ferret out and discriminate between cognate words that have established or emerging distinctions and those that seem, at present, to have neither. To the extent possible, words and phrases rightly classifiable as needless variants ought to be dropped from the language.

need not necessarily is a REDUNDANCY. E.g., "One's misconduct need not necessarily have [read need not have] been of such a nature as to be punishable as a crime or as to justify legal proceedings of any character."/ "Those injured in accidents would come to understand that matters need not necessarily [read need not] end with a simple bow and a flourish of the checkbook."

needs must is an idiomatic phrase deriving from Elizabethan English. Its inverted sibling is must needs, which is slightly older. In both phrases, needs = necessarily. E.g., "White is not satisfied, as bolder activists are, to assert that Justices are not bound by the Constitution; he needs must attribute his 'eccentric' view to the Framers."

ne exeat is a LATINISM that has given its name to the writ, no longer widely used, ordering the person to whom it is addressed not to leave the country or the jurisdiction of the court. E.g., "The wife then prayed that a writ of ne exeat be issued forthwith to prevent the defendant from leaving the state until he had paid the support arrearages and attorneys' fees."

The name of the writ derives from the Roman-law writ of ne exeat republica (= let him not go out from the republic). See Foote v. Foote, 140 A. 312, 313 (N.J. 1928). The medieval writ was ne exeat regno.

negative, v.t. This verb—meaning "to deny, nullify, or render ineffective"—was one of the earliest Americanisms, having first appeared in the American colonies in the early 18th century. Today the usage is an ARCHAISM, negate having taken over the work formerly handled by the verb to negative.

Yet the verb negative persists in law, particularly (and oddly) in BrE—e.g., "This contention is quite plainly negatived by the latter part of the provision." (Eng.)/ "Such an interference with a rival trader's right to a free course of trade leads to an almost irresistible inference of an indirect motive, and is therefore—unless the motive is negatived—a wrongful act as against his right." (Eng.) For more immediate comprehensibility to lawyers and nonlawyers alike, negate should be adopted as the preferred term.

negative pregnant; affirmative pregnant. Negative pregnant (= a negative implying or involving an affirmative) is an old POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY. The idea usually involves a denial that implies (is pregnant with) its opposite. For example, if a suspected thief is asked, "Did you break into the house at #8 Country Club Drive on Tuesday?" and responds by saying, "No, I didn't do it on Tuesday," the implication is that only the day is wrong. The full phrase is negative pregnant with an affirmative.

The affirmative pregnant (= a nonresponsive positive statement implying or involving a negative) is not so well known. For example, if a suspected thief is asked, "Did you take the Geochron from the house?" and responds by saying, "I tried to return it the next day!" the implication is that the true answer was "yes."

NEGATIVES. A. Colliding Negatives. Lawyers have become notorious for their proclivity to pile negative upon negative. The result is sentences that most fellow lawyers have a hard time decoding:

- "The order enjoined required the five railroad companies to abstain from refusing to deliver interstate shipments of livestock." (Quoted in F.E. Cooper, Effective Legal Writing 29 (1954).)
- "The trial court temporarily enjoined defendant from refusing to supply water service to petitioners' house on account of their not having paid a deposit, without notice and without bond."
- "Notwithstanding anything in subsection (3) of section two of the principal Act, a disablement allowance need not be considered at intervals of not less than three years in any case where the Treasury so directs." (Eng.)
- "Courts should not, by self-imposed impotence, not required by the precedents, be less efficacious."

• "A plan shall not be treated as not satisfying the requirements of this section solely because the spouse of the participant is not entitled to receive a survivor annuity (whether or not an election has been made . . .), unless the participant and his spouse have been married throughout the 1-year period ending on the date of such participant's death." Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, Pub. L. No. 93-406, § 205(d), 88 Stat. 829, 863 (1974).

See PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

B. Not un——; not in——. Double negatives such as not untimely are often used quite needlessly in place of a more straightforward wording such as timely. Could an action be not untimely but somehow not be timely?

Sometimes however, the double-negative form conveys an important nuance. The difference often has to do not with logic but with the burden of proof. For example, many jurisdictions admit customs as law if they are not unreasonable. Thus, the party who proves the existence of a custom does not have the further burden of showing that it is reasonable. Rather, to defeat the custom, the disputing party must show that it is unreasonable. The rule, then, is that customs will be admitted unless they are unreasonable, not that they will be admitted if they are reasonable.

Such constructions may also have a wider embrace within gray areas. Consider, for example, a set of national rules that allow local rules not inconsistent with these rules. Would the same meaning be conveyed by local rules consistent with these rules? No: if, for example, the national rules were silent on a question such as the size of paper for filed materials, a local rule specifying such sizes might not be consistent with the local rules—but it would certainly be not inconsistent with them. Not inconsistent prevents clashes; consistent with ensures conformity.

Finally, the double-negative form, shorn of any greater context, often connotes something quite different from a positive rendering. E.g., "The doctrine of equitable conversion is not unrestricted in its application." 1 H.T. Tiffany, The Law of Real Property § 299, at 510 (B. Jones ed., 3d ed. 1939). The sense is changed by writing, The doctrine . . . is restricted in its application.

But when the negatives serve no such identifiable purpose, they ought to be avoided. To say, for example, that a point of law is not uninteresting or not unintelligible is to engage in a time-wasting rhetorical flourish.

C. Negative Prefixes. The primary negative prefixes in English are un-, in- (assimilated in many words to il-, im-, ir-), non-, and anti-. For purposes of simple negation, in- is the most particularized of these prefixes, since it generally goes only with certain Latin nouns, and non- is the broadest of them, for it may precede virtually any word. As a general rule, it is best to find the most suitable particularized prefix, and if none is really suitable, then to have recourse to non-. (Anti-, of course, has the special sense "against.") Un- usually precedes those Latin verbs ending in the Anglo-Saxon -ed (unexhausted, undiluted, unsaturated).

Consistency is often difficult to find with particular roots. For example, unexhausted remedies yields nonexhaustion, not unexhaustion. Likewise, we have indubitable but undoubted, irresolute but unresolved, irrespective but unrespected. From a typographical standpoint, negative prefixes cause trouble with phrasal adjectives, as in uncross-examined civil deposition. Roundabout wordings are usually preferable to such telescoping; hence, a civil deposition in which the witness was not cross-examined. See NON-.

D. Periphrastic Negatives. Generally, "We disagree" is preferable to "We do not agree," unless some emphatic form such as the latter is called for in context to rebut an assertion. Directness is better than indirectness; hence violate rather than fail to comply with; violate rather than do not adhere to, and the like.

E. No and not. Lawyers often seem to prefer quaint reversals of modern usage: they say not when most native speakers of English would say no, and vice-versa. This tendency is esp. common in the phrase not more than (for no more than), but it can be seen at work in other phrases as well. The better legal writers stick to the more natural, more modern idiom. E.g., "Congress has chosen, wisely or no [read wisely or not], to speak to the precise issue at hand through a Committee Report that was expressly adopted by both Houses." ACLU v. FCC, 823 F.2d 1554, 1583 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (Starr, J., dissenting in part). See not & ARCHAISMS.

F. Special Problems with not. See not.

neglect (= the act or condition of disregarding) does not necessarily involve negligence. For example, "neglect of a child" may be either negligent or willful. Then again, in some contexts neglect may even include inadvertent omission that does not rise to the level of negligence. Therefore negligent neglect is not necessarily a REDUNDANCY. Cf. omission (B).

A leading English treatise on criminal law distinguishes neglect from negligence in the following way. Neglect indicates, as a purely objective fact, that a person has not performed a duty, but it does not indicate the reason for the failure. Negligence, by contrast, denotes a subjective state of mind and indicates a particular reason why the person has failed to perform a duty—namely, because the person has not kept the duty in mind. See J.W. Cecil Turner, Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law 108 n.1 (16th ed. 1952). See negligence (A).

neglectful; neglective. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that is rare or obsolete.

negligible; negligeable. The latter spelling should be avoided.

negligence. A. Senses. In general usage, negligence means "carelessness." But in legal usage, negligence = (1) the failure to exercise the standard of care that the doer as a reasonable person should have exercised in the circumstances; (2) undue indifference toward the consequences of one's act; or (3) a tort that includes the notions of duty, breach of that duty (unreasonable conduct), and resultant damage.

The term has various gradations: "Negligence in law ranges from inadvertence that is hardly more than accidental to sinful disregard of the safety of others." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 36 (1968). Ordinary or simple negligence is usu. sufficient to establish liability in a tort action. Criminal or gross negligence is usu. required before the court will impose a penalty. The phrase gross negligence has the disadvantage of applying both in civil actions (to increase damages) and in criminal actions (to establish criminal liability); many criminal lawyers therefore prefer criminal negligence in criminal-law contexts.

B. And neglect. See neglect.

C. And negligency. The word negligency is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of negligence.

negligent neglect. See neglect.

negotiability; assignability. These two terms are related but distinct. The two major ways in which negotiability differs from assignability are: (1) no notice need be given of the transfer of a negotiable instrument; and (2) the transfer of such an instrument is not subject to equitable remedies (i.e., from a claimant who might assert a right to or under the instrument). See assignment & negotiable instrument.

negotiable instrument; commercial paper. These terms are not interchangeable. Commercial paper is now the more widely used term in the U.S. because of its use in article three of the Uniform Commercial Code. As to the precise distinction, commercial paper is the broader term: it may include nonnegotiable as well as negotiable paper. whereas negotiable instruments are by definition negotiable ones only.

Generally, a writing is negotiable when it is signed by the maker or drawer; contains an unconditional promise or order to pay a sum certain in money, and no other promise, obligation, or power given by the maker or drawer; is payable on demand or at a definite time; and is payable to order or to bearer. The absence of any one of these elements makes commercial paper nonnegotiable.

negotiate = (1) to discuss or conduct a business transaction, such as a contract or sale; or (2) to transfer (a negotiable instrument [q.v.], such as a note or bond) in a way that makes the transferee the legal owner of the instrument. E.g., sense (2): "When a cheque is transferred, whether by delivery or endorsement, it is said to be negotiated, and negotiation is a kind of transfer [that] differs in important respects from the ordinary assignment of a contractual right." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 124 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

neither . . . nor. A. Singular or Plural Verb. When one of the two subjects is singular, and the other is plural, the verb takes its number from the closer subject. Thus, the verb is invariably singular if the second alternative is singular—e.g.: "Neither the speed at which the car was traveling [read Neither the car's speed] nor its operation through a red light are [read is] enough to make out a case against appellants provided there was no reckless disregard for the safety of others."/ "Neither of these views are [read is] acceptable." H.L.A. Hart, "Negligence, Mens Rea, and Criminal Responsibility," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 136, 150 (1968)./ "Neither hanging the governor in effigy nor hanging the governor are [read is] speech . . . ." Steven J. Burton, An Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning 70 (1985). See SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT (E).

Moreover, the verb should match the nearest subject in number and person. Sometimes the correct form is admittedly awkward—e.g.: "Neither you nor I is [read am] likely to change the world . . . ." Jefferson D. Bates, Writing with Precision 82 (rev. ed. 1988).

B. Number of Elements. These CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS should frame only two elements, not more; though it is possible to find modern and historical examples of neither . . . nor with more than two members, such constructions are, in Wilson Follett's words, "short of punctilious." E.g.,

"The October contract was neither surrendered, abrogated, nor annulled [read was not surrendered, abrogated, or annulled]."/ "We believe that the California Supreme Court's application of the minimum-contacts test in this case would, if sustained, sanction a result that is neither fair, just, nor reasonable [read not fair, just, or reasonable or unfair, unjust, and unreasonable]."/ "Finding the decision by the ICC to be supported by substantial evidence and neither arbitrary, capricious, nor an abuse of discretion [read not arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion], we deny the petitions./ "Because Rummel neither signed, read, nor heard [read Because Rummel did not sign, read, or hear] the entire document, these notes fail to qualify as a statement under this subsection."

It is permissible, however, to use a second nor emphatically in framing three elements: "Neither inadvertent failure to provide medical care, nor carelessness, nor even deliberate failure to conform to the standards suggested by the experts is cruel and unusual punishment." Cf. either (E).

C. Parallelism. Not only ought there to be no more than two elements, as explained in (B), but also the elements ought to match each other syntactically. (See PARALLELISM.) E.g., "P was held not liable for trespass to the person, the harm being accidental, and due neither to negligence nor lack of caution [read neither to negligence nor to lack of caution]." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 256 (2d ed. 1979)./ "Ex parte New York No. 1 makes it clear that the State can neither be proceeded against directly nor impleaded [read: can be neither proceeded against directly nor impleaded] in an action brought against the private owners." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 612 (2d ed. 1975).

D. Neither . . . or. This phraseology is a rank error—e.g.: "What if the intervention is neither foreseeable or [read nor] normal, but it leads to the same type of harm?"/"It appears that the admission was neither fraudulent or [read nor] willful and was due to oversight."/ "How is a 'male feminism' possible [that] assumes neither a false commonality of male and female experience or [read nor] a false essentialism?" J.M. Balkin, Turandot's Victory, 2 Yale J.L. & Human. 299, 302 (1990).

E. Beginning Sentences with. It is permissible, when introducing an additional point of contrast, to begin a sentence with neither or (more commonly) nor—e.g.: "[I]t is at least problematic whether the now official Catholic view, that a fetus has a full human soul at conception, is consistent with the Thomist tradition. Nor was that view thought necessary, in the past, to justify the strongest condemnation of even very early abortion." Ronald Dworkin, Life's Dominion 42–43 (1993). See nor.

nemine contradicente; nemine dissentiente. Both of these LATINISMS mean "without opposition or dissent." Either phrase may be more accurate than unanimously in a given context, for some of those entitled to vote may have abstained. In any event, the definition just given probably serves better than either of the recherché main entries.

NEOLOGISMS, or invented words, are to be used carefully and self-consciously. Usually they demand an explanation or justification, for the English language is quite well stocked as it is. The most obvious neologisms in -IZE, for example, are to be eschewed. New words must fill demonstrable voids, as conclusory, a 20th-century word, does. If a word is invented merely for the sake of novelty, then it is vexatious.

Some writers seem to relish neologisms, as if the new words alone could add freshness to writing. For most readers, they add merely irritation to writing—e.g.: "This would not be contraventive or thwartive of our mandate . . . ." Buder v. Fiske, 191 F.2d 321, 324 (8th Cir. 1951). (Why not would not contravene or thwart our mandate?)/ Lance S. Hamilton, Ethnomiseducationalization: A Legal Challenge, 100 Yale L.J. 1815 (1991). (Since the article is about ideas for which we already have words, why not ethnocentric education, educational ethnocentrism, ethnocentric miseducation, or some such phrase?)

Other writers self-consciously state that they have no adequate word. Their efforts are likely to fail (merely because the odds are stacked against neologists), but they have a utilitarian standard in mind—e.g.: "There is no accepted adjective from 'theft,' but the word 'theftous' will here be used." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 645 n.2 (1978).

Legal language has been the source of many neologisms over the past century. In fact, lawyers have probably tended toward the latter of the two opposing disasters that Lon Fuller wrote of: "linguistic stagnation and grotesque fecundity." Legal Fictions 22 (1967). Thus Pollock and Maitland had it, rather uncharacteristically, all wrong: "The licence that the man of science can allow himself of coining new words is one which by the nature of the case is denied to lawyers." 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic W. Maitland, History of English Law 31 (2d ed. 1905). Rather, "neologisms abound in modern legal writing, though both writer and reader are often unaware that certain commonplace law words have yet to find a home in English dictionaries." Bryan A. Garner, "The Missing Common-Law Words," in nephew; niece. Legally speaking, are the children of a spouse's siblings one's nephews and nieces? No: "It is only by courtesy that the children of a husband's or wife's brothers and sisters are called 'nephews' and 'nieces' . . . ." Fedi v. Ryan, 193 A. 801, 802 (N.J. 1937)./ "It is only 'loosely' that the son of a brother-in-law or sister-in law is called a nephew." In re Estate of Terney, 396 P.2d 557, 558 (Or. 1964).

nepotism is best reserved for the sense "bestowal of official favors upon members of one's family," and not attenuated to refer to any friends or political connections. The root sense of nepot- in Latin is "nephew, grandson."

next friend; guardian ad litem; prochein ami. Technically, an incompetent or minor plaintiff sues by a next friend, whereas an incompetent or minor defendant is defended by a guardian ad litem; but the duties and powers of the representative are identical regardless of the title. Ducanay v. Mendoza, 573 F.2d 1075, 1076 n.1 (9th Cir. 1978).

Nonlawyers occasionally misunderstand next friend as if it were literal—e.g.: "We say that a minor brings a suit 'by his next friend'; that is, by his nearest friend." Richard Grant White, Every-Day English 415 (1880). "Nearest friend" is not a good translation: a next friend is usually a parent or general guardian

The phrase next friend is to be preferred to the LAW FRENCH prochein ami, of which it is a LOAN TRANSLATION. E.g., "By this standard an individual is deemed competent or incompetent to assert his rights for purposes of conferring standing on next-friend petitioners."/ "The district court sought merely to clarify that the amount awarded to the minor children would be paid to their parents as their next friends." See prochein ami.

next of kin. See heir (C).

next preceding is an awkward phrase, arguably illogical, that commonly appears in DRAFTING. E.g., "All assurances mentioned herein must be satisfactorily tendered on the day next preceding [read before] the closing date."/ "Anything in the next preceding paragraph of this contract [read in the paragraph immediately preceding this one] notwithstanding . . . ."

nexus is the law's learned word for connection or multiple connections. Lawyers have long found it useful—e.g.: "The defendant's nexus with this country and with this district is not accidental."

The acceptable plural forms are either nexuses (English) or nexus (Latin)—e.g.: "When both nexuses are established, the litigant will have shown a taxpayer's stake in the outcome . . . ." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 103 (1968). Some writers have betrayed their ignorance of Latin by writing nexi, as if it were a second-declension noun, whereas the word nexus is a fourth-declension noun—e.g.: "[T]he state's theory would broaden the Skiriotes concept of 'citizen' to encompass all American nationals, and hence most if not all of the Bering Sea crabbers, because of their numerous nexi [read nexuses or nexus] with Alaska." State v. Bundrant, 546 P.2d 530, 555 (Alaska 1976)./ "The Lees denied that the application and initial premium . . . had been delivered in the District and emphasized the various nexi [read nexuses or nexus] mentioned above with the State of Maryland." Lee v. Wheeler, 810 F.2d 303, 304 (D.C. Cir. 1987). (In Latin, nexi = persons who have been reduced to quasi-slavery for debt!) Cf. apparatus & prospectus (A). See PLURALS (A) & HYPERCORRECTION (A) nice question = a subtle question. In this phrase, as in other similar ones, nice takes on the sense "not obvious or readily apprehended; difficult to decide or settle; demanding close consideration or thought" (OED). E.g., "Nice questions have arisen as to what constitutes a dedication to the public." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 218 (1930)./ "The cases are divided on this nice question." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 245 (4th ed. 1983).

niggardly (= grudging, stingy) derives from an Old Norse word (hnøggr "covetous, stingy"); it has nothing to do with the racial slur that is sounded similarly. E.g., "A tall, heavy-set, good-looking Irishman, he was never niggardly about attorney fees." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 272 (1970). Even so, some speakers and writers have come to shun it just to avoid MISCUES or even serious misunderstandings.

nihil ad rem (= irrelevant) serves no useful purpose in the language.

nil dicit; nihil dicit [L. "he (or she) says nothing."]. These Latin phrases are used adjectivally to mean "of or relating to a default judgment for the plaintiff entered after the defendant fails to file a timely answer." The form nil dicit slightly predominates. A contracted version of nihil, the form nil appeared even in classical Latin. E.g., "The court granted a nil dicit judgment for Nelson after First State failed to file an answer."

In Texas, a nil dicit default judgment is contrasted with a no-answer default judgment: with the latter, the defendant fails both to file an answer and to make an appearance, whereas with a nil dicit default judgment, the defendant appears, and may even file preliminary motions, but fails to file an answer.

nine (old) men. This phrase, denoting the U.S. Supreme Court, sprang up when, during the early 20th century, the Court blocked progressive legislation largely because of the majority's personal, political, and social views. In 1936, a book appeared in which the phrase was used as the title: Drew Pearson & Robert Allen, Nine Old Men (1936). Countless similar uses of the phrase soon began to appear—e.g.: "The nine men in black robes hold the entire structure of the nation in the hallowed hollows of their hands." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 41 (1939; repr. 1980). (This use by Fred Rodell anticipates the title of his 1955 book, Nine Men.)/ "The 'nine old men' of the United States Supreme Court are not so infirm that they cannot perform the most surprising handsprings." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 444 (1943)./ "[A]fter several setbacks Roosevelt vented his frustration with his 'court-packing' plan of 1937, railing at the 'nine old men' (the youngest was sixty-two, their average age seventy-two) who blocked the path of progress." Donald D. Jackson, Judges 338 (1974). See Court-packing plan.

nisi /nI-sI, nI-see, nee-see, or nis-ee/ [L. "unless"] = (of a court's ex parte ruling or grant of relief) having validity unless the adversely affected party appears and shows cause why it should be withdrawn. The word is commonly used in the phrase rule nisi—e.g.: "The motion to appoint counsel was filed and the rule nisi issued during pendency of James's notice of appeal . . ." State v. James, 438 S.E.2d 399, 400 (Ga. Ct. App. 1993)./ "On October 13, 1992, the mother filed a petition for rule nisi requesting that the trial court hold the father in contempt for his failure to pay child support." Leslie v. Beringer, 636 So. 2d 441, 442 (Ala. Civ. App. 1994). See decree absolute.

nisi prius (lit., "unless before then") refers generally to a civil trial court in which issues are tried before the jury—as opposed to an appellate court. The curious reader may well wonder what the semantic path is from "unless before then" to "trial." The answer lies deep in the recesses of English legal history: the phrase nisi prius was a prominent one at the outset of the medieval writ directing the sheriff to summon a jury at Westminster, "unless before" the appointed date the judges of assize arrived in the county where the cause of action arose. If those itinerant justices did arrive, they would try the case locally instead of at Westminster. Because the writ concerned only trial by jury, it became associated with jury trials. In the U.S., the phrase has even been extended to refer to nonjury trials.

A little American law dictionary mangles this etymology, stating: "Literally translated [nisi prius] means 'unless the first,' i.e., unless it is the original or first forum it is not a 'nisi prius' court." Stephen H. Gifis, Law Dictionary 320 (3d ed. 1991) The author's mistake lies in trying to find a modern meaning in the phrase nisi prius, which even 19th-century law reference works termed "unmeaning in its literal translation." 2 Alexander M. Burrill, A Law Dictionary and Glossary 233 (2d ed. 1867).

In England, the nisi prius system became defunct in 1971, when it was replaced by the system of Crown Courts. The phrase nisi prius is likewise obsolete in most parts of the U.S., but two American jurisdictions—New York and Oklahoma—continue to use the legal ARCHAISM. The phrase is almost always used attributively, that is, modifying a noun that follows—e.g.:

- "Recent jurisprudence, dispositive of all issues raised below, calls for reversal of the nisi prius postdecree order." Evans v. Evans, 852 P.2d 145, 147–48 (Okla. 1993).
- "The nisi prius court's position that any cause of action accrued in 1983 because plaintiff's assignor's right to future payments was rejected, is simply an assertion of an anticipatory breach by defendants." Vigilant Ins. Co. v. Housing Auth., 614 N.Y.S.2d 533, 535 (App. Div. 1994).
- "Here the nisi prius judge's signature authenti-> cates the judgment on the face of the memorial." Aven v. Reeh, 878 P.2d 1069, 1074 (Okla. 1994).

In most American jurisdictions, the JARGON phrase nisi prius would be replaced with trial court's in the first example, and with trial in the second and third examples.

nitpick is so spelled—not knitpick—though pointing this out may seem nitpicky. E.g., "The Hovanec decision upon the facts there presented is hypertechnical, is an indulgence in knitpicking [read nitpicking], and is an obvious disregard of R.C. 4123.95 . . . ." Wires v. Doehler-Jarvis Div. of NL Indus., Inc., 345 N.E.2d 629, 632 (Ohio Ct. App. 1974).

no case. In English criminal procedure, a submission of no case (or no case to answer) is the same as the American lawyer's motion for judgment of acquittal (in federal practice) or motion for directed verdict (abolished by the federal rules but still used in some states). In effect, the defense counsel, at the close of the prosecution's case-in-chief (q.v.), submits to the judge that there is no case that needs answering. British lawyers sometimes use the expression directed verdict as well.

no-compete covenant is an illogical form of covenant [or agreement] not to compete or noncompetition covenant [or agreement]. It should be avoided in favor of either of these longer phrases. E.g., "It seems reasonably clear that some allocation of the price to a covenant is necessary if a purchaser wants to deduct any amount for a no-compete covenant [read covenant not to compete]." See noncompetition covenant.

no contest; nolo contendere. The English phrase is no doubt preferable merely because it is more comprehensible to more people. Journalists rightly tend to use no contest even in jurisdictions in which the plea is called nolo contendere. E.g., "City Manager David Ivory pleaded no contest Thursday to two misdemeanor charges of improperly accepting cash from a company that was doing business with the city." Selwyn D. Crawford, FW Official Pleads No Contest to Getting Cash, Dallas Morning News, 8 Dec. 1989, at 33A. As a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it is hyphenated: no-contest plea.

With a plea of no contest or nolo contendere (lit., "I do not wish to contend"), the defendant does not admit guilt but nevertheless agrees not to offer a defense. The primary legal purpose of such a plea—whichever name is used—is that the defendant retains the right to deny the charge in any other judicial proceedings.

no doubt. See doubtless(ly).

no-fault divorce = divorce on either spouse's unilateral demand, without the necessity of proving elements that the law formerly required, such as adultery or cruelty. During the late 1960s and 1970s, the system of no-fault divorce was adopted throughout the U.S., as well as in England (1969) and Scotland (1977). The phrase is really a misnomer and an OXYMORON, for in divorce there is always enough fault to go around. What the courts and the parties (rightly) wanted to avoid was proving and apportioning fault in routine cases. See divorce.

noisome is sometimes misconstrued as meaning "noisy; loud; clamorous." In fact, it means "noxious; malodorous." (Cf. fulsome.) The word is related etymologically to annoy. Cardozo, naturally, used it correctly: "If the house is to be cleaned, it is for those who occupy and govern it, rather than for strangers, to do the noisome work." People ex rel. Karlin v. Culkin, 162 N.E. 487, 493 (N.Y. 1928).

no later than (= on or before) conveys an important nuance in the language of DRAFTING. It is not equivalent to before, which does not include the date specified.

Although within 10 days after might seem stylistically preferable to no later than 10 days after, the choice is not a stylistic one. The two phrases have different meanings, as the following examples illustrate: (a) a motion for relief filed within 10 days after entry of judgment; and (b) a motion for relief filed no later than 10 days after entry of judgment. In the first version, judgment must be entered for the provision to apply; in the second version, no entry of judgment need occur for the provision to apply. If an event triggers the clock, within requires one to wait for that triggering event, but no later than does not.

nolens volens (= willingly or unwillingly) would be considered a far-fetched LATINISM in most modern legal prose. E.g., "Correlative to all such legal powers are the legal liabilities in other persons—this meaning that the latter are subject nolens volens [read willingly or unwillingly] to the changes of jural relations involved in the exercise of A's powers." (Hohfeld) See willy-nilly.

no less. A. And no fewer. The phrase no less, just like less, q.v., best refers to amounts or to mass nouns, not countable numbers. No fewer is the better phrase when discussing numbers of things. But some excellent writers have nodded on this point:

- "America has already formed treaties with no less [read no fewer] than six foreign nations . . . ." The Federalist No. 3, at 42 (John Jay) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).
- "[I]n no less [read no fewer] than twenty-four states, an acknowledgment by the father, orally or in writing, is sufficient." Max Radin, The Law and You 32 (1948).
- "[H]e had appointed no less [read no fewer] than forty-two new justices of the peace . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 86 (1955).
- "The settlor could employ no less [read no fewer] than three different types of future interest . . . ." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 217 (1961).
- "Beven identified no less [read no fewer] than fifty-seven varieties of duty." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 476–77 (3d ed. 1990).
- "The point of law involved was one of extreme complexity and it was considered by no less [read no fewer] than fourteen judges sitting in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 86 (4th ed. 1991).

B. And not less. In DRAFTING, the two phrases are indistinguishable, no less being the more natural and therefore the better form. E.g., "Each participating company must have no less than $10,000 in cash posted by May 31, 1994."

In other types of expository writing, however, no less connotes surprise: "He weighs no less than 300 pounds." That sentence expresses astonishment that he weighs so much. Not less is more clinical and dispassionate: "He weighs not less than 300 pounds." That sentence states matter-of-factly that he weighs at least that much and maybe more. See NEGATIVES (E).

nolle prosequi(tur); non prosequitur. A. As Nouns. The phrase nolle prosequi (lit., "not to wish to prosecute") denotes either (1) the legal notice of abandonment of suit, or (2) a docket entry showing that the plaintiff or the prosecution has relinquished the action. Nolle is frequently used as a shortened form—e.g.: "We conclude that the nine-month period between the nolle and the defendant's rearrest is not properly chargeable as a pretrial delay for purposes of speedy trial analysis." State v. Gaston, 503 A.2d 594, 597 (Conn. 1986).

Non prosequitur (lit., "he does not prosecute") is the judgment rendered against a plaintiff who has not pursued the case. Non pros is the shortened nominal form, here functioning adjectivally: "[A]ppellants contest on appeal the trial court's opening of a non pros judgment entered in their favor." Geyer v. Steinbronn, 506 A.2d 901, 905 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1986).

Nolle prosequitur is a hybrid form that is simply meaningless.

B. As Verbs. Nolle prosequi is only a noun in England, but has two verb forms in the U.S., nol-pros and nolle pros. The term means "to abandon a suit or have it dismissed by a nolle prosequi." E.g., "That plaintiff was arrested but never tried, and the charges against him were nolle prossed." The earliest known use occurred in 1878.

Occasionally the phrase nolle prosequi is used as a verb in the U.S., although the shorter forms nolle pros, nol-pros, and nol-pro are more usual. E.g., "Gruskin's decision to permit defendant to admit responsibility for careless driving and to nolle prosequi the OUIL [operating a motor vehicle under the influence of intoxicating liquor] charge was an executive function . . . ." People v. Stackpoole, 375 N.W.2d 419, 424 (Mich. Ct. App. 1985).

Nonpros = to enter a non prosequitur against. The past tense form is nonprossed. Blackstone wrote nonpros'd. This word dates from about 1755.

nolo (L. "I do not wish") appears frequently as a shortened form of the full phrase, nolo contendere. E.g., "The reason the nolo plea makes a difference is that it protects defendants in subsequent criminal or civil litigation growing out of the act on which the criminal prosecution is based." Marcia Chambers, 'Nolo' Means You're Guilty Sort Of, Nat'l L.J., 9 Nov. 1987, at 13./ "There are provisions for convictions based on nolo pleas and for verdicts of conviction that are not yet solidified in a judgment." Paul F. Rothstein, Needed: A Rewrite, Crim. Just. Summer 1989, at 20, 21.

nolo contendere (L. "I do not wish to contend") is so spelled. See no contest.

nominal = in name only, but not in reality. A nominal party is one who, having some interest in or title to the subject matter of the lawsuit.

will not be affected by any judgment—an example being the disinterested stakeholder in a garnishment action. See nominal consideration & nominal damages.

nominal consideration; inadequate consideration. Nominal consideration is only of token value, whereas inadequate consideration has substantial value that is patently less than the value of the performance promised or rendered in return. Thus, to buy a $100,000 house, $10 might be termed nominal consideration while $30,000 might be termed inadequate consideration. The distinction matters in "exceptional cases in which the law treats promises or transfers supported only by nominal consideration differently from those supported by substantial or 'valuable' consideration (even though it may be inadequate)." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 72 (8th ed. 1991).

nominal damages; substantial damages. The former are "awarded in a trivial amount merely as a recognition of some breach of a duty owed by a defendant to plaintiff and not as a measure of recompense for loss or detriment sustained"; the latter are "the result of an effort at measured compensation . . . ." Charles T. McCormick, Handbook on the Law of Damages § 20, at 85 (1935). Nominal damages are symbolic; substantial damages are compensatory.

NOMINALIZATIONS. See BURIED VERBS.

nominate, in the lawyer's vocabulary, is often just a highfalutin substitute for name, v.t. E.g., "In case the testator nominates [read names] no executor, or if for any reason the person nominated [read named] does not act, the court will appoint someone to perform the same functions . . . ." Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 5 (2d ed. 1953).

NOMINATIVE ABSOLUTES. See ABSOLUTE CONSTRUCTIONS.

NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES. One might think that a work of this kind, catering as it does to members of a learned profession, could pass over the differences between subjects and objects in pronouns. The two sentences that follow, however, belie that thought: the first was written by a lawyer, the second by a law professor. "We will need to confer with whomever works on this project and then have he or she draft a motion for summary judgment."/ "Third, the fault is said to lie in part with we 'eccentric professors.'" In the first example whoever should be the subject of works and the pronouns should be him and her as objects of have; in the second, us should be the object of the preposition with. See who (A) & HYPERCORRECTION (F).

Debilitated grammar seems ubiquitous—e.g.:

- "I would hold that Dr Rowland, when he made his will, intended by these words 'coinciding with' to cover he [read him] and his wife dying together in just such a calamity as in fact happened . . . ." Re Rowland [1963] 1 Ch. 1 (C.A.) (Lord Denning, M.R., dissenting).
- "Are we really that much smarter than them [read they]?" John B. Mitchell, Current Theories on Expert and Novice Thinking, 39 J. Legal Educ. 275, 275 (1989).
- "Winston [Churchill] was crouched like a great bird over the unusually small table, giving tea to his son Randolph, several years younger than me [read I]." Lord Hailsham, Sad Memories of Dear Winston, Sunday Times, 8 July 1990, at 3-16.
- "My mother was busy raising my brother and I [read me]."/ "Give Al Gore and I [read me] a chance to bring America back." Bill Clinton, accepting the Democratic nomination for President of the United States, 16 July 1992.

For between you and I, see between (C) & HYPERCORRECTION (B).

no more than. See not more than.

NON- (= not) is the general-purpose negative prefix that has gained a great deal of ground since the 19th century. Non- often contrasts with in- or un- in expressing a nongradable contrast, rather than the opposite end of a scale, e.g., nonlegal as compared to illegal, or nonscientific as compared to unscientific. (See nonconstitutional.) Ordinarily, esp. in AmE, the prefix is not hyphenated A number of pitfalls lie in the way of its use, as categorized below. See generally NEGATIVES (B).

A. As a Separable Prefix. Except in a few historical phrases (e.g., the plea of non assumpsit), non- is properly used only as an inseparable or hyphenated prefix. Some legal writers, though, have tried to make it separable—e.g.: "But a trustee also has some non statutory [read nonstatutory] powers." R.T. Oerton, Trustees and the Enduring Powers of Attorney Act 1985, 130 Solic. J. 23, 23 (1986)./ "The Code seems to reflect a congressional perception that the taxation of the exercise of non qualified [read nonqualified, if not unqualified] stock options should be tightened up."/ "Rather, proof must be presented that the non parties [read nonparties] actively participated with the named party in violating the decree."

B. With Nouns and Adjectives. Before adding non- to a noun or adjective, determine whether the word being negated has an antonym that would suffice. For example, if nonpretextual means merely "valid" or "legitimate," it makes little sense to write: "The company showed that the reason for discharging the employee was nonpretextual [read, if appropriate, legitimate]." This infelicity may sometimes derive from tracking too closely statutory language, without searching for the most appropriate word. See SOUND OF PROSE, THE

Another disadvantage in the use of non- is that it is beginning to displace the simplest negative, not. For example, "The cases relied upon in the opinion are non-§ 1983 cases [read not § 1983 cases] . . . ." Grandstaff v. City of Borger, 779 F.2d 1129, 1133 (5th Cir. 1986) (Hill, J., dissenting). As this example suggests, the use of this prefix to construct phrasal nouns can be especially awkward. "The critical issue before us concerns the order and allocation of proof in a private, non-class action [read private suit, not a class action,] challenging employment discrimination."

When adding non- to a compound adjective, the meaning can become especially murky: "noncivil rights suit"; "nonper stirpes distribution." E.g., "In non-community property states [read common-law states] the most troublesome issue confronting the courts and legislatures arises out of the rapid expansion of a variety of devices for bypassing probate." Noncriminal can usually be rendered more straightforwardly civil; hence civil trial rather than noncriminal trial, private school (in AmE) rather than nonpublic school.

But the purpose of some negatives with non- is to cover a range of antonyms. For example, noncivil might mean more than just "criminal"; it might mean "criminal or administrative." Without an explanation of course, this type of subtlety will be lost on many readers.

On the whole, non- adjectives should be avoided wherever possible, even if the avoidance means using more words. "In nonautomobile cases [read cases not involving automobile accidents] there may be a homeowner's policy that triggers the lawsuit and protects the parent in a direct suit or in an apportionment."/ "Chapman transferred his only other non-cash asset, [read his only remaining asset other than cash], a used car lot, to his two minor sons."/ "A Tennessee statute that allows police officers to employ deadly force to prevent fleeing felons from escaping is unconstitutional insofar as it authorizes the use of such force to stop an apparently unarmed and nondangerous suspect [unarmed probably suffices; if not, then read unarmed suspect who does not appear dangerous]."/ "A nonnegligent plaintiff [read A plaintiff who is not contributorily negligent] may recover her total damages regardless of allocated damages."/ "We must therefore affirm the district court's declaratory judgment that the challenged provisions of the Arizona Constitution and statutes as applied to exclude nonproperty owners from elections [read applied to exclude those who do not own property from elections] for the approval of the issuance of general obligation bonds, violated the Equal Protection Clause of the U.S. Constitution."

Using the prefix non- with PHRASAL ADJECTIVES produces awkward results, e.g., nonfact-witness expert, nonincome-producing, noninterest-bearing, nonpar-value, nontaxpaid E.g., "It is undisputed that soybean production is a non-water dependent activity [read is an activity not dependent on water]."/ "A couple in a non-community property jurisdiction [read living in a common-law jurisdiction], one spouse being poorer than the other, will be subject to no gift taxation in interspousal transfers of property and will thus have the same tax advantages."

C. With Verbs. Although we have accepted verbal idioms such as to nonplus a person and to nonsuit a case, the prefix non- should not be used to create new verbs—e.g.: "'[The Board] erred by not finding that respondent violated the Texas Term Contract Nonrenewal Act when it nonrenewed [read did not renew] . . . the petitioner.'" Burke v. Central Educ. Agency, 725 S.W.2d 393, 398 (Tex. App.—Austin 1987) (quoting counsel).

nonage /non-ij/ = legal infancy; the condition of being under age. The term is rare today except in legal contexts. E.g., "The two major grounds for testamentary incapacity are nonage and mental disability." See age of capacity & minority (A). nonbailable. See bailable.

nonbelief. See disbelief.

NONCE WORDS are terms coined for a particular occasion only. The inventor usu. has no hope that the term will become established in the language. Judge Charles E. Clark probably had no hope that his word erieantompkinated would catch on. (See Erie*-bound.) The same must have been true of Frank Cooper's res administrata, q.v.

But that dictum is not absolute: the person who coined lawyerphile as an antonym of lawyer-basher, q.v., surely hoped that the word would suddenly spread throughout the land. It has not. As a failed NEOLOGISM, it became just another forgotten nonce word.

noncompetition covenant. The original phrase was covenant not to compete (= a provision in an employment agreement by which the employee agrees not to compete against the employer for some time after the employee leaves the job). In the late 20th century, this four-word phrase was reduced by half to form various phrases, including noncompetition covenant or agreement, which is preferable to noncompete covenant or no-compete covenant. The prefix non- may be joined to adjectives (as with nonexistent, nonfatal, nonresponsive), to nouns (as with nonoccurrence, nonissue, nonacceptance), or to present participles (as with nonpaying, nonsmoking, nonvoting). It is not at its best, however, when joined to a verb to make an adjective, as in noncompete. E.g., "The plaintiffs rely on four cases [that] they claim support their position that the amounts received pursuant to the non-compete [read noncompetition] agreements are 'personal service income.'" Furman v. U.S., 602 F. Supp. 444, 451 (D.S.C. 1984). Noncompete is not listed in most dictionaries, and we may justifiably hope that it never gains widespread approval. See NON-, no-compete covenant & anticompete.

non compos mentis; compos mentis. These LATINISMS (meaning lit. "not master of one's mind" and "master of one's mind") are now little used. But as long as words such as insane and similar words are used figuratively as terms of disparagement, these learned terms may be pressed into service as EUPHEMISMS Incompetent, however, usu. serves well in place of non compos mentis.

The OED contains no examples of non compos mentis used as an ATTRIBUTIVE NOUN, and it probably should not be so used: "When a minor, lunatic, idiot or a non-compos mentis [read incompetent person] may be a defendant to a suit and has no guardian . . . , the court shall appoint a guardian ad litem . . . ." Tex. R. Civ. P. 173 (West 1991). The strange hyphenation in that example suggests that the drafter somehow thought non-compos to be a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE and mentis a noun related to men or man. Of course, it really refers to the mind.

Although the plural form is non compotes mentis, that form is rarely if ever needed in English. When used as an English adjective, the phrase retains the singular form: "It may be said, therefore, that the equitable obligations resting upon . . . committees of persons non compotes mentis [read non compos mentis] . . . are analogous to those resting upon and given against actual trustees." 4 John N. Pomeroy & Spencer W. Symons, Treatise on Equity Jurisprudence § 1088, at 263–64 (5th ed. 1941). See PLURALS (A)

nonconsent. In the context of rape accusations, courts have consistently interpreted this important word as requiring some type of physical resistance. At one time, the burden was rather high: the victim must have exhibited "utmost resistance." Susan Estrich, Real Rape 29 (1987). Today, the law having advanced, the meaning is not so rigid.

nonconstitutional; unconstitutional. As used by American practitioners, these terms have distinct meanings. Nonconstitutional = of or relating to some legal principle other than a principle found in the U.S. Constitution. E.g., "Miranda established a nonconstitutional prophylactic rule, the violation of which creates an irrebuttable presumption of coercion that is applicable in only a limited number of circumstances."/ "Kent v. Dulles did invalidate a burden on the right to travel; however, the restriction was voided on the nonconstitutional basis that Congress did not intend to give the Secretary of State power to create the restriction at issue."

Unconstitutional (the more familiar word) = in violation of, or not in accordance with, principles found in a constitution, esp. the U.S. Constitution. E.g., "The three-judge district court held that the Act and regulations in question were unconstitutional both under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and under the Constitution of Alaska."

nonculpable; inculpable. Because the latter is possibly ambiguous—meaning either "not culpable" or "able to be inculpated"—most criminal-law writers prefer nonculpable.

nondelegable duty. In tort law, this phrase does not mean what it literally says: a principal may indeed delegate a nondelegable duty, but upon doing so, the principal retains primary (as opposed to vicarious) responsibility if the duty is not properly performed. See McDermid v. Nash Dredging & Reclamation Co., [1987] 3 W.L.R. 212, 215 (per Lord Hailsham). Cf. duty.

none. A. Number. None – (1) not one; or (2) not any. Hence it may correctly take either a singular or a plural verb. E.g., "None of these arguments is notably strong, let alone conclusive." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 229 (1991)./ "[N]one of the promises are within the statute of frauds." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 132 (1950). Generally speaking, none is is the more emphatic way of expressing an idea.

noneconomic. See uneconomic(al).

nonenforceable. See unenforceable.

non est factum (lit., "it is not my deed") is LAW LATIN denoting the plea denying the execution of an instrument sued on. E.g., "The plea of non est factum was not available, but the case fell within the statute." (Eng.)/ "The exception is that if the defendant thought that the document he signed belonged to an entirely different legal category from that to which it in fact belonged, he can plead non est factum and escape liability although he did not trouble to read the document and although he misled the plaintiff into supposing that he was agreeing." (Eng.) Pl. non est factums. See fact, n. & fraud (B).

non est inventus. See not found.

nonetheless. One word in AmE, three (frequently) in BrE.

nonexpert. See inexpert.

nonfeasance; nonact. The two are distinguishable. Whereas nonact means merely the failure to act, nonfeasance implies the failure to act where a duty to act existed. E.g., "There is a presumption of adequate representation, which may be overcome by the intervenor only upon a showing of adversity of interest, the representative's collusion with the opposing party, or nonfeasance by the representative." See feasance. Cf. malfeasance.

nonforeseeable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of unforeseeable.

nonheritable. See inheritable.

nonincentive. See disincentive.

noninterpretative. See interpretative.

nonjudicial. See injudicious & judicial.

nonjury, adj. Though the phrase nonjury trial is current in BrE as well as AmE,. the more geographically limited phrase bench trial (a condensed version of trial to the bench) seems stylistically preferable: the better practice is to name something for what it is rather than for what it is not. Even so, some lawyers and judges, from New York to the State of Washington, find bench trial an alien phrase.

Several legal writers, unfortunately, have pressed the adjective nonjury into service as an adverb—e.g.: "[T]his case will proceed nonjury [read without a jury]." Juckett v. Beecham Home Improvement Prods., Inc., 684 F. Supp. 448, 452 (N.D. Tex. 1988).

nonlapse statute. See lapse statute.

nonlawyer. It is a curious practice that lawyers (and others who write about law) divide the universe into lawyers and nonlawyers. But, of course, they do it of other professions and occupations as well—e.g.: "The Supreme Court later expressly limited the vessel owner's duty to nonseamen to situations where the workers were doing 'ship's work.'" Although the word layman is usually unambiguous, the masculine suffix is a major disadvantage. (See SEXISM (B).) And few would seriously argue that laypersons is a palatable alternative.

nonlegal = (1) not specifically related to law; or (2) not being a lawyer. Sense (1): "[D]espite what the lawyers say, it is possible to talk about legal principles and legal reasoning in everyday nonlegal language." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 12 (1939; repr. 1980). Sense (2): "[The] Employment Appeal Tribunal . . . is presided over by a senior judge and behaves very much like an ordinary appeal court, though it also has nonlegal members." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 27 (1983). Cf. alegal & extralegal.

nonlitigious is the antonym of litigious, but not in the latter word's prevalent sense today (i.e., "fond of litigation"). Rather, nonlitigious corresponds to an older and today infrequent sense of litigious (i.e., "involving litigation"). Hence, nonlitigious means not "court-shy" but "not involving litigation"—e.g.: "The legal services considered were 'typical nonlitigious matters for which the amount and work requirements would be reasonably foreseeable.'" Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 44 (1970).

nonmarital child. See bastard, illegitimate child & natural child.

nonmaterial. See immaterial.

nonmeritorious. See unmeritorious.

nonmovant (= a litigating party other than the one that has filed a motion currently under consideration) is omitted from most English-language dictionaries as well as most law dictionaries. But, in American courts, it occurs with great frequency—e.g.: "First National had to prove that a new trial would not prejudice the nonmovant . . . ." First Nat'l Bank v. Peterson, 709 S.W.2d 276, 279 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 1986).

nonnegotiable. See negotiable instruments.

nonobject. See object.

nonobjectionable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of unobjectionable.

non obstante veredicto. See judgment *non obstante veredicto.

nonparticipating royalty, used often in oil-and-gas law, is a venial REDUNDANCY: all mineral royalties are nonparticipating.

nonplus(s)ed. The form -ss- is preferred.

nonpretextual = not founded on a pretext. E.g., "Appellant's lawful dismissal was found by the jury to be nonpretextual." Actually, the jury found that the dismissal was not pretextual—thus the finding was a negative one. To say that it "found the dismissal to be nonpretextual" wrongly suggests that the jury answered a question asking whether the dismissal was nonpretextual; instead, the jury was asked whether the dismissal was pretextual, and it answered "no." See pretextual & NON (B).

nonprobate = other than by will; of or relating to some method of disposition apart from wills. E.g., "Today the proportion of property passing under probate is decreasing and the proportion of property passing by nonprobate methods is increasing."

nonprofit; not-for-profit. The former is more common, but the latter is increasingly used in AmE for greater accuracy: nonprofit corporation misleadingly suggests that the corporation makes no profits; but such a corporation actually does earn profits and then applies them to charitable purposes. Not-for-profit is thought to reveal,more accurately that the purpose is not for private gain, though indeed the organization may profit.

Whereas nonprofit corporation and not-for-profit corporation predominate in AmE, non-profit-making organization is the usual BrE phrase.

nonpros. See nolle prosequi.

nonrebuttable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of irrebuttable. E.g., "In actual operation, therefore, the three statutes enact what in effect are nonrebuttable [read irrebuttable] presumptions that every applicant for assistance in his first year of residency came to the jurisdiction solely to obtain higher benefits."

nonrefoulement. See refoulement.

nonresponsive, rather than unresponsive, is the usual adjective to describe a witness's answer that is somehow off the point—e.g.: "Witnesses are warned to answer questions directly and to the point, and to add nothing superfluous, . . . because extra information may be objected to as 'unresponsive' [read 'nonresponsive'] by the cross-examining attorney . . . ." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 90 (1990).

NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES. See RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES.

non sequitur should be spelled as two words, not hyphenated or spelled as one word. The phrase is frequently misspelled -tor or -tar.

nonstatutory. This word is sometimes replaceable by judicial, administrative, or some other descriptive word, as in judicial policy-making rather than nonstatutory policy-making. If it fits, the more specific word should oust nonstatutory.

nonsuit, v.t., - (1) of a plaintiff, to seek a voluntary dismissal of (a case or a defendant); or (2) of a court, to dismiss (a case or a defendant) because the plaintiff has failed to make out a legal case or to proffer sufficient evidence. This verb has been part of lawyers' language since the 16th century. Sense (1): "The plaintiff then nonsuited the case." Sense (2): "The court nonsuited him and rendered judgment dismissing the action."

nonsuitability. The preferred antonyms of suitable and suitability are unsuitable and unsuitableness. Nonsuitability, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of unsuitableness, unsuitably suggests a relationship with nonsuit, q.v. Yet it is perversely used in AmE legal contexts. E.g., "The Secretary of Agriculture shall, within ten years after September 3, 1964, review, as to its suitability or nonsuitability [read unsuitableness] . . . for preservation as wilderness, each area." Wilderness Act, 16 U.S.C. § 1132(b) (1988).

nontaxpaid is an opaque, ugly word to avoid. E.g., "Defendant has had a reputation with me for over four years as being a trafficker of nontaxpaid distilled spirits." A less concise wording should be used, e.g., trafficker of distilled spirits upon which no taxes had been paid.

nontortious. Just as tortuous is sometimes misused for tortious (see tortious (B)), so nontortuous has been misused for nontortious—e.g.: "Plaintiffs insist that this is not a case involving conflicting claims to the ownership or nontortuous [read nontortious] use of water . . . ." Friendswood Dev. Co. v. Smith-Southwest Indus., Inc., 576 S.W.2d 21, 24 (Tex. 1978).

nontriggerman – a murder defendant who did not actually kill the decedent, but who intended to do so. E.g., "The conduct of a nontriggerman during the planning and aftermath of a prison break, which eventually resulted in a quadruple murder, was sufficient for the imposition of a death penalty." The word is odd-looking but perhaps necessary; often accomplice suffices. See SEXISM (B).

no one; nobody. These have traditionally been regarded as singular nouns that act as singular antecedents. E.g., "This means that no one should be punished for speaking unless their [read his or her] speech will immediately lead to a definite dangerous act." See he or she.

But the language is changing—BrE more rapidly than AmE—so that no one . . . they may soon be regarded as standard. Some consider this change a defilement, others a tremendous advance. However you characterize it, it seems inevitable. See SEXISM (A) & CONCORD (B). Cf. none.

no question but that. The but in this phrase is unnecessary; the better phrase is no question that. E.g., "There can be no question but that [read no question that] jurisdiction to review and to affirm or set aside the Secretary's order became fully vested in the court upon the filing of the partnership's petition."

nor for or. Where the negative of a clause has already appeared and a disjunctive conjunction is needed, or is generally better than nor. The initial negative carries through to all the elements in an enumeration. E.g., "Religiosity insists that there is something called religion wholly apart from any specific religion, something that has no creed nor [read or] dogma, no theology or scriptures, something that may be felt and need not be understood."/ "Her symptoms were all subjective and not supported by any medical nor [read or] other corroborating evidence."/ "When on the witness stand at the trial of this case, however, he could not see the trial judge nor [read or] the examiner who was five feet away." See not (C) & neither . . . nor (D).

no respecter of persons, the law is. To many, this English-language legal MAXIM seems to say nearly the opposite of what it actually denotes. The point is not that the law disrespects persons, but that it pays no special regard to one's station in life: speaking ideally (if not idealistically), the law treats a homeless person with the same respect as it would a bishop. E.g.:

- "The law (as we are often told) is no respecter of persons. Without being universally true, this is a principle [that] has always applied with special force to the law of homicide. Thus, the villein could not be killed by his lord with impunity. Nor could the slave, even in Anglo-Saxon times, be killed by his master . . . ." J.W. Cecil Turner, Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law 104 (16th ed. 1952).
- "The Criminal Court of Appeals in Oklahoma in 1913 spoke in the tradition of this country's dedication to due process and equal protection when it declared that the law is no respecter of persons . . . ." Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 19 (1956).
- "The law is no respecter of persons. All persons including corporations stand equal before the law and are to be dealt with as equals in a Court of justice." In re Bendectin Litig., 857 F.2d 290, 322 (6th Cir. 1988).

norm is generally considered a broad term, broader even than "legal rule." A norm establishes acceptable and unacceptable standards of behavior; these are addressed to nonlawyers as well as to judges. Norms include public-policy imperatives (e.g., Thou shalt not kill) but also rules for private transactions (e.g., if you offer to make a bargain and the other party accepts, you are contractually bound).

Roscoe Pound explained the so-called norm theory of law as viewing law as "a body of norms (models or patterns) of conduct or of decisions established or recognized by the state in the administration of justice." Outlines of Lectures in Jurisprudence 75 (5th ed. 1943). He conceived of a hierarchy of norms, presumably starting with "Thou shalt obey the Constitution," and descending through statutes, judicial decisions, regulations, and so on down to commercial customs that a court might recognize.

normalcy has traditionally been considered inferior to normality. Born in the mid-19th century and later used by President Harding, normalcy has never been accepted as standard by the best writing authorities. E.g., "The normalcy [read normality] of these operations changed when Press was told by his delegate that Montana-Austria requested a stop-off in Johannesburg."/ Daniel K. Tarullo, Beyond Normalcy [read Normality] in the Regulation of International Trade, 100 Harv. L. Rev. 547, 547 (1987).

normative = establishing or conforming to a norm or standard.

nostrum (= panacea) forms the plural nostrums—e.g.: "But advertisements of nostrums for restoration of 'lost manhood' have appeared in the daily newspapers for at least fifty years." See PLURALS (A).

not. A. Placement of. When used in constructions with all and every, not is usually best placed just before those words. E.g., "Every disclosure of a trade secret does not result [read Not every disclosure of a trade secret results] in an abandonment of its element of secrecy."/ "Justice Holmes reminded us that every moral question could not [read Justice Holmes reminded us that not every moral question can] be submitted to the law . . ." Francis R. Kirkham, Problems of Complex Civil Litigation, 83 F.R.D. 497, 504 (1979). See all (B).

B. Not . . . nor. This construction should usu. (where short clauses are involved) be not . . . or. E.g., "Finding the lessee culpable is not inherently inconsistent nor contrary to [read not inherently inconsistent with or contrary to] the 'instructions.'" See nor & NEGATIVES.

C. In Typos. Not is a ready source of trouble. Sometimes it becomes now, and sometimes it drops completely from the sentence—e.g.: "The Legislature expressly refused to extend the concept of privilege when adopting the discovery procedures. Since privilege is created by statute it should [read should not] be extended by judicial fiat." John Kaplan & Jon R. Waltz, Cases and Materials on Evidence 506 (6th ed. 1988).

Problems of that kind have driven print journalists to "live in perpetual fear of the word not either being dropped by a printer or being changed from not to now. Therefore, wherever possible, they shy away from the word not, even at the expense of strict accuracy." Robert Sack, Hearing Myself Think: Some Thoughts on Legal Prose, 4 Scribes J. Legal Writing 93, 98 (1993). Notably, it is this very fear that leads newspaper writers to prefer plead innocent over the more accurate phrase, plead not guilty. See plead innocent.

D. And naught. See further affiant . . . .

E. Not only . . . but also . . . . See not only . . . but also.

notable; noteworthy; noticeable. Noticeable = easily seen or noticed (as, e.g., scars); it is generally confined to physical senses. Notable (having basically the same meaning) is applied to qualities as well as to material things. E.g., "The most notable thing about these observations is that quite obviously the word 'res', describing a thing, has a quite different connotation from 'subject matter'."/ "Some jurisdictions, notably New York, have attempted to solve this problem by applying more flexible and equitable standards."

Noteworthy, a near-synonym, means "worthy of notice or observation; remarkable." E.g., "It is noteworthy that the decree and codicil attached express conditions of survivorship to the interests of Joseph and to any wife or child of Joseph but do not add any words of that character to the limitation describing Mary Silva's interest."

not all. See not (A) & all (B).

notarize, originally an Americanism dating from the 1930s, is now commonplace in AmE—e.g.: "In order to administer oaths to these workers and to notarize their statements for use in civil litigation, petitioner applied in 1978 to become a notary public." Bernal v. Fainter, 467 U.S. 216, 218 (1984). In BrE, the word is still, in some quarters, considered something of an atrocity; British lawyers tend to say notarially validated instead of notarized.

notary; notary public. Notary is a common ellipsis of notary public in both AmE and BrE. Pl. notaries public. In this phrase, public is a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE.

not . . . because. See because (B).

note; draft. A note is a simple promise by one party to pay money to another party or to bearer.

A draft is an order by one person (the drawer) to pay another person (the drawee), demanding that the drawee pay money to a third person (the payee) or to bearer.

note = lawnote. See annotation.

note up is the approximate British equivalent of the American term shepardize, q.v. The British call their citators noter-ups, or, in some Commonwealth countries, noter-uppers.

noteworthy. See notable.

not-for-profit. See nonprofit.

not found is the English-language equivalent of the LAW LATIN non est inventus, sometimes abbreviated n.e.i. One phrase or the other is commonly used on a sheriff's return of process, saying that the defendant is not to be found in the sheriff's jurisdiction. For obvious reasons, not found is preferable.

not guilty. If a jury finds that a criminal defendant is not guilty, that finding does not mean (as some mistakenly believe) that the defendant did not commit the act complained of. The defendant may not have had the requisite mental state or may have had some justification or excuse.

nothing less than. With this phrase, "the risks of ambiguity are very great" (MEU2 at 398). The problem is that the word less may function either as an adjective or as an adverb, the resulting senses being contradictory.

When less functions as an adjective, the sense of the phrase nothing less than is "the same thing as; quite equal to." E.g., "In the context of insurance cases, so-called 'waiver' is nothing less than 'estoppel.'" That is, waiver and estoppel are the same in insurance cases.

But even in that sentence, less could be read as an adverb, so that the phrase nothing less than might mean "any thing other than; far from being." A reader who understands the phrase in that sense is in for a serious MISCUE. And the reader's misunderstanding is entirely understandable, as the following sentence illustrates: "It was a normal day to the thousands of workers who filed into the World Trade Center that morning; they expected nothing less than a terrorist bombing of their workplace."

notice, n., may refer to two quite different ideas: (1) legal notification required by law or imparted by operation of law as a result of some fact such as the recording of instruments; or (2) information that may be required under a contract. For the distinction between notice and knowledge, see knowledge. See also judicial notice.

notice, v.t. (= to give legal notice to or of) is a LEGALISM that is likely to strike nonlawyers as quite odd. E.g., "Under the present practice, however, the objecting party has no duty to notice a hearing, the initiative being shifted to the party seeking discovery."/ "We have not been noticed [i.e., received notice] to bring the records."/ "The magistrate heard the motions to set aside the default judgment apparently by virtue of the fact that they were noticed for a hearing before the magistrate rather than before the district court."/ "Unless you have already done so, notice the depositions of all expert witnesses being offered by your opponent."

Notice should be reserved for the giving of legal notice; legal writers should not use the word nonlegally, as here: "TACA International Airlines, in the midst of collective bargaining negotiations, noticed [read let be known] its intent to relocate its pilot base." (To the nonlawyer, this usage confusingly suggests notice in the sense "to observe."/ "It has been noticed [read noted, i.e., previously in a book] that some lawyers and judges were of the opinion that . . . " notice to quit (BrE) – notice to vacate (AmE). See quit.

notifiable, in BrE phrases such as notifiable disease and notifiable offence, is built from an old sense of notify (not current in AmE): rather than bearing its common meaning ("to give notice of; inform"), notify here means "to make known; proclaim; announce." In G.B., some serious diseases (e.g., cholera, diphtheria, scarlet fever, and typhoid) are classed as notifiable diseases—that is, they require anyone with knowledge that someone has the disease to contact the authorities. A notifiable offence is a serious crime that can be tried in the Crown Court.

notify. See notifiable.

not law is a phrase that common-law lawyers use when arguing that an old court decision is wrong or obsolete—e.g.: "A decision, to be binding, must not only emanate from high authority, but must be 'good law': if it once earns the reputation of being 'not law,' it perishes, sometimes by express disapproval, more often by cold disregard. If all else fails, the blame for its defects may be laid at the door of the reporter—sometimes not without cause." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 297 (7th ed. 1964).

not less. See no less.

not more than. The more natural idiom is no more than.

not only . . . but also. These CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS must frame syntactic parts that match. E.g.,

- "The offer had to not only be made in good faith but it had to also be [read had not only to be made in good faith but also to be] in such a form that it could, by an acceptance of the offeree, ripen into a valid and binding contract that could be enforced by any party to it."
- "These disclosures led not only to new calls for greater social responsibility of corporations but also focused on [read not only led to . . . but also focused on] the role of the board of directors and the need for better control mechanisms to ensure that corporate management conform with legal and moral principles of conduct."
- "[E]ach of these policies designated not only Smith and his wife Sybil as insureds, but also a corporate name, Rolling Hills Golf and Racquet Club, Inc." Smith v. Edward M Thompson Agency, Inc., 430 So. 2d 859, 859 (Ala. 1983) (matching parts: noun [Smith and his wife Sybil], noun [a corporate name]).
- "The document that appears in the record of this case contains not only Smith's signature but also the signature of someone identified as his attorney at the place indicated on the document for his attorney to sign 'if represented.'" Smith v. State, 785 S.W.2d 465, 467 (Ark. 1990) (matching parts: noun [Smith's signature], noun [signature of someone identified]).

See PARALLELISM.

One common failing in the not only constructions is to omit the also after but—e.g.: "[N]o one has questioned the proposition that the holding covers not only such cross-claims but [add also] impleaders of third parties." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 939 (2d ed. 1975)./ "A publication may be made not only intentionally but [also] negligently . . . ." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 137 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). See not (B).

Another possible construction is not only . . . but . . . as well. But a writer who uses this phrasing should not add also, which is redundant with as well—e.g.: "[F]eminist methods and insights [must] be adopted not only by female scholars, but also by males as well." J.M. Balkin, Turandot's Victory, 2 Yale J.L. & Human. 299, 302 (1990). In that sentence, either also or as well should have been omitted as a REDUNDANCY.

notorious may mean either "famous" or "infamous," though it usually carries connotations of the latter, i.e., unfavorably known. Notoriety is generally more neutral, although it is coming to be tinged with the connotations of its adjectival form.

not proven. See proved.

notwithstanding. A. Grammatical Use. This preposition is an interesting word. In DRAFTING, it commonly means "despite," "in spite of," or "although" and appears in sentences such as this one: "Notwithstanding the limitations contained in § 3.5, Mondraff will be offered the first option to quote competitive terms and conditions to Nuboil."

The question that literalist drafters ask is, What doesn't withstand what else? Are the limitations of § 3.5 "not withstanding" (i.e., subordinated to) the present section, or is the present section "not withstanding" (subordinated to) § 3.5? Because the former is the correct reading, some believe that notwithstanding should be sent to the end of the phrase in which it appears: The limitations contained in § 3.5 notwithstanding, as opposed to Notwithstanding the limitations contained in § 3.5.

But that literalist argument is very much in vain, as the OED attests with a 14th-century example of notwithstanding as a prepositional sentence-starter. This usage has been constant from the 1300s to the present day. In fact, the construction with notwithstanding after the noun first appeared more than a century later, and has never been as frequent. The Century Dictionary explains: "As the noun usually follows [the word notwithstanding], the [word] came to be regarded as a prep. (as also with during, ppr.), and is now usually so construed." 3 The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia 4029 (1914). The word is not a DANGLER because it does not function as a participle.

B. Followed by that. When introducing a verbless phrase, notwithstanding need not be followed by that. E.g., "Section 1322(b)(5) was amended to provide that its provisions were unchanged, notwithstanding section 1322 (b)(2)."

Otherwise, grammar demands that when the term introduces a clause, it should usually be followed by that. E.g., "The law is in accord in favoring free competition, since ordinarily it is essential to the general welfare of society, notwithstanding [insert that] competition is not altruistic but is fundamentally the play of interest against interest."/ "The instrument is likely to be upheld notwithstanding [insert that] it includes additionally the reservation of power to amend the trust in whole or in part." Even so, the phrase can be boiled down to a simpler wording: see notwithstanding the fact that.

notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained herein, an ungainly phrase often placed in complex contracts to introduce the most important provisions, can be fairly said to mean "the true agreement is as follows." It is best used when a lawyer wants one provision in a long, complex contract to override any arguably inconsistent provision.

The better phrasing avoids herein, q.v., by substituting in this agreement or in this contract. Better yet, the drafter should specify which provision might be read as contradictory.

The statutory equivalent is the phrase notwithstanding any other provision of law, as in Fed. R. Evid. 412(a) (1994).

The opposite effect—subordinating the current provision to all others—is achieved by the wording except as otherwise provided.

notwithstanding the fact that; notwithstanding that. These legalistic phrases are best replaced by either although or even if—e.g.: "The freedom that is worth having is freedom to do what you think to be good notwithstanding that [read even if] others think it to be bad." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 108 (1968). See notwithstanding & fact that, the.

nought. See naught.

NOUN PLAGUE is Wilson Follett's term for the piling up of nouns to modify other nouns. See Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 229 (1966). When a sentence has more than three nouns in a row, it generally becomes much less readable. The following sentence is badly constructed because of the noun-upon-noun syndrome, which unfortunately is more common now than in Follett's day: "Consumers complained to their congressman about the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's automobile seat belt 'interlock' rule." One can hardly get to the end of the sentence to find out that we are talking about a rule. (Actually, many writers today would leave off the possessive after Administration.) In the interest of plague control, the following rewrite seems advisable: the 'interlock' rule applied to automobile seat belts by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

Readability often drops when three words that are structurally nouns follow in succession, although exceptions such as fidelity life insurance certainly exist. Less readable examples such as the following are the rule rather than the exception, however: "Inasmuch as incentives are inevitably tied to immeasurable subjective evaluations, it is reassuring that the information generation stimuli of the adversary model rest in part on other foundations."/ "The interpretation process provides a reminder of the federalism aspects of individual right concerns."

The plague is virtually never endurable when four nouns appear consecutively. E.g., "The direct participation programs principal category of registration is the minimum qualification requirement for persons whose supervisory functions are limited to direct participation programs."/ "The recent decisions compel little change in the current state attorney solicitation rules." Similarly, what is a retiree benefit litigation procedure?

Frequently, noun plague is a cause of ambiguity. E.g., "My brother Harlan's objections to my Adamson dissent history, like that of most of the objectors, relies [sic] most heavily on a criticism written by Professor Charles Fairman . . . ." Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 165 (1968) (Black, J., concurring). Here Justice Black means "the history [of the incorporation doctrine] I recited in my dissent in Adamson," but the reader could just as easily arrive at "my history of the Adamson dissent," or "the history of opinions that dissent from Adamson." A couple of prepositions would have remedied the problem.

One aspect of noun plague in legal writing is the traditional—and misguided—preference for nouns over verbs. Jeremy Bentham's so-called substantive-preferring principle was developed as a result of his bias in favor of nouns, which could be modified and multiplied, whereas "[a] verb slips through your fingers like an eel . . . ." 10 Jeremy Bentham, Works 569 (J. Bowring ed. 1843). Thus Bentham, like his fellow lawyers, preferred to give motion to rather than to move and to give extension to rather than to extend. Even today, lawyers frequently use such circumlocutions.

Yet another root of the problem is the tendency in modern writing to make adjectives out of nouns and noun phrases, often postponing the true subject until long after the reader has left off hoping for one: "This is a breach of contract/Deceptive Trade Practices Act, Tex. Bus. & Comm. Code Ann. (Vernon Supp. 1982–83) (hereinafter referred to as 'the Act') case." Wolfe Masonry, Inc. v. Stewart, 664 S.W.2d 102, 102–03 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 1983)./ "The Public Utilities Commission made a question of law, not fact, determination when it allowed the LCRA to intervene."

Finally, avoid loading a single statement with too many abstract nouns ending in -tion. The effect is not a pleasing one: "This case involves protection against a second prosecution for the importation conviction."/ "The regulation of solicitation involves the consideration of whether there are 'ample alternative channels for communication of the information.'" See BE-VERBS (B), BURIED VERBS & SOUND OF PROSE (A).

NOUNS AS ADJECTIVES. English has long been noted for its ability to allow words to change parts of speech. The transmutation of nouns into adjectives is one of the most frequently seen shifts of this kind. Usually the change is unobjectionable, as in the first word in each of the following phrases: lawbook, state action, telephone wires, home repairs, litigation problems. A common example appears in this sentence: "In order to pose a jury question on the issue of seaman status, the plaintiff must present evidence of the following kind."

Occasionally, however, semantic shifts of this kind give rise to ambiguities or play tricks on the reader. For example, it would be unwise for one writing about a statute concerning invalids to call it an invalid statute. To make a somewhat different point, the reader's expectations are subverted when a noun is used adjectivally in place of the more usual adjectival form. E.g., "The subdivision was planned strictly for residence [read residential] purposes."

Often, of course, the sense conveyed is different when one uses the noun adjectivally as opposed to the adjectival form. For example, negligence defendant is something different from negligent defendant, the latter being judgmental; negligence action means something quite different from negligent action; pornography litigation seems to mean something different from pornographic litigation (which is somehow difficult to visualize).

Finally, relations often become vague when nouns that would normally follow prepositions are adjectives placed before nouns, and the relation-bearing prepositions are omitted. E.g., victim awareness is a vague phrase; does it mean on the part of, of, by? E.g., "Victim awareness gained momentum in the early 1980s, with the passage of the Victim and Witness Protection Act." We can deduce that the intended sense is awareness (on the part of the public) of victims and their rights, but perhaps we should not ask our readers to have to make such deductions. The same sort of uncertainty infects victim restitution (= full restitution to the victim of a crime).

NOUNS AS VERBS. A type of semantic shift less common than that of noun to adjective is for nouns to act as verbs. Often these usages are considered slangy—e.g.:

- "The movie would have box-officed $3 million."
- "She has been mayoring in Austin for six years."
- "Every youngster can summer in Europe."
- "If a man is not in the same city, his semen can be frozen and air-expressed to the doctor."
- "Though reported as a burglary, the incident was 'no-crimed' by the policy: the property was called 'lost property' rather than 'stolen property.'"

Yet nouns used as verbs often make their way into legal parlance and finally into legal print: "The grand jury had not focused on specific individuals and was playing a broader investigative role than the typical grand jury asked simply to true bill or no bill a specific suspect." Morrison v. City of Baton Rouge, 761 F.2d 242, 247 (5th Cir. 1985). Though writers refer to fast-tracking budgets, tasking committees, and mainstreaming children, English is generally inhospitable to this sort of jargonistic innovation. Legal writers should be wary of adopting usages of this kind.

novate (= to replace by something new), a 17th-century BACK-FORMATION from novation, is labeled "rare" and as peculiar to Roman law in the OED. But the word sometimes appears in modern American legal writing—e.g.: "[H]e did not novate his indebtedness to the Johnstown bank." Jones v. Costlow, 36 A.2d 460, 462 (Pa. 1944)./ "[T]he original contract of sale between Rains County and McCallon was novated by the commissioners' court . . . ." Simmons v. Ratliff, 182 S.W.2d 827, 829 (Tex. Civ. App.—Amarillo 1944).

novation, originally a Roman-law term, denotes the act of substituting for an old contract a new one that either (a) replaces an existing obligation for a new obligation or (b) adds a party who was not a party to the old contract. The word also sometimes refers to the contract that brings about such a substitution. The effect of a novation, unlike that of subrogation, is not to transfer liability, but to replace an old liability with a new one. See adoption & subrogation (A).

novatory; novative; novational. None of these can be said to be common, but novatory is used more frequently than the others, which might therefore be labeled NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

novel and concrete. These words appear in virtually all cases involving the misappropriation of commercial ideas. Though they have assumed an "almost talismanic significance," the terms "have nonetheless gained little specific content. Presumably, novel means the opposite of common or, perhaps, old. Concrete is probably the antithesis of abstract, and also implies that, to be protectable, the ideas must be reduced to tangible form. Beyond this, the decisions offer nothing definitive." Paul Goldstein, Copyright, Patent, Trademark and Related State Doctrines 59 (2d ed. 1981).

novelty does not mean "an extreme rarity." Rather, it denotes something both rare and new. "Mother-son incest is so rare as to be regarded as a novelty." The writer of this sentence could have better written, "Mother-son incest is an extreme rarity." Oedipus Rex belies any claim that incest might have to novelty.

novus actus interveniens is the primarily British legal phrase meaning literally "a new intervening act." (See CAUSATION (D) & LATINISMS.) Novus actus is sometimes used as an ellipsis for the full phrase. E.g., "On the assumed facts there would be in my view no novus actus when the trainees damaged the respondent's property." (Eng.)

now is sometimes mistakenly used for present or current as an opposite of then, as in then-owner. (See then (A).) "The defendants are purchasing two of the adjoining lots from the now owners [read present owners] thereof."

noway(s). See nowise.

now comes. See come(s) now.

nowhere near is colloquial for not nearly.

no-win–no-fee system is a phrase that some journalists use to describe contingent fees. E.g., "[E]ven the more modest no-win–no-fee system would in some cases create a dangerous pressure on lawyers to cheat in order to eat.",Sedley, Breaking the Law, London Rev. Books, 18 May 1989, at 3. See contingent fee.

nowise (= in no way; not at all) is an adverb that should not be introduced by in, although legal writers seem to commit this error more often than not when using the word. In no way might even generally be preferable to nowise. E.g., "The statute in no wise [read nowise or in no way] indicates that the 602(2) definition is only transitory." ACLU v. FCC, 823 F.2d 1554, 1568 (D.C. Cir. 1987). Mistaken uses of the word, esp. in AmE, are legion.

Formerly spelled as two words, nowise should now be consistently treated as a single word. The following examples illustrate the traditionally correct use of the word: "The exemption of the Crown is nowise dependent upon the local or imperial character of the rate." (Eng.)/ "Defendant is a banker who is nowise in the occupation of a barber."

Noways, in legal writing at least, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of nowise, although the Evanses state that it is more common in AmE than nowise. See Bergen Evans & Cornelia Evans, A Dictionary of Contemporary American Usage 326 (1957).

now pending is a commonplace REDUNDANCY, but no less sinful for that—e.g.: "[O]ur resolution of the dispute determines the course of proceedings if and when he is rearrested on the charges now pending [read pending charges]." U.S. v. Montalvo-Murillo, 495 U.S. 711, 713 (1990)./ "The Security Trust Company, N.A. attacks the validity of the deed of trust in a lawsuit now pending [read pending] in the United States District Court . . . ." Democratic Nat'l Comm. v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Comm'n, 21 F.3d 1145, 1147 n.2 (D.C. Cir. 1994).

noxal (= of or relating to a cause of action against an owner of an animal or slave for damage done by the animal or slave) is, though hardly on every lawyer's lips every day, common enough to merit inclusion in law dictionaries and in English-language dictionaries, from which it is regularly omitted. E.g., "The 1825 amendment created an exception to the ability of the owner to limit his liability by noxal surrender of the animal, a recognized Roman practice that foreshadowed limitation of liability in modern admiralty." William T. Tête, In Defense of Fault in the Guard Under Article 2317, 61 Tul. L. Rev. 759, 765 n.37 (1987). The phrase noxal action figures importantly in Oliver Wendell Holmes's book, The Common Law (1881).

NSF (= not sufficient funds) acts as an adjective where the full phrase is cumbersome and even ungrammatical <an NSF check>.

nuclear is pronounced /noo-klee-ər/, though often it is mispronounced /noo-kyə-lər/. Though presidents and other educated persons have had difficulty pronouncing the word correctly, you should if you can.

nudum pactum (= an unenforceable agreement) has taken on different particularized senses within different legal traditions. At common law, of course, a nudum pactum was an agreement that failed for lack of consideration. E.g., "An agreement made without consideration is a nudum pactum, i.e., it is an agreement [that] is destitute of legal effect." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 9 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950)./ "An agreement [that] did not fall into any of the recognised classes was nudum pactum; there was no causa and therefore no legal obligation." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 247 (3d ed. 1955).

In Roman law and civil law, in which consideration is not a necessary element of a contract, the term denoted unenforceability for some other reason, such as lack of a lawful "cause." The anglicized phrase nude pact has not been widely used, perhaps because each of those terms carries its own connotative baggage that may cause a MISCUE. See naked.

nugatory is not a legal word per se, but it is a learned word favored by lawyers. It means "of no force; useless; invalid." E.g., "These statutes were as effective when the Allen case was decided as now; they did not then serve to render the bequest involved nugatory under the circumstances."/ "But a person's liberty or right to deal with others is nugatory unless they are at liberty to deal with him if they choose to do so" (Eng.) Cf. otiose.

nuisance. Etymologically, nuisance derives from the Latin nocere "to hurt or harm," which has also given us the words annoy, noise, noisome, noxious, and obnoxious.

Some people, realizing that nuisance is a recognized legal wrong, therefore assume they might be able to sue people who annoy them. In fact, though, the legal requirement for nuisance is fairly specific: annoyance or disturbance in the enjoyment of property. Unlawful conduct of this kind is commonly put into two classes: (1) the acts of an owner or possessor of land who wrongfully uses that land in a way that unreasonably interferes with the rights of neighboring owners or possessors to enjoy their property; and (2) wrongful interference with easements and other incorporeal rights.

A public nuisance (also called a common nuisance) interferes with a communal right. Examples include obstructing a highway or allowing trash to accumulate in one's front yard to the annoyance of the neighborhood. A private nuisance, on the other hand, is an act that interferes with a person's enjoyment of his or her own land or premises. A common example occurs when someone living in an apartment plays music (or what passes for music) so loudly that the neighboring apartment dweller is unable to read or sleep. See attractive nuisance.

null (= void) is perfectly capable of standing alone. E.g., "The cancellation of the first will ought to be looked upon as null also, and therefore the first will is still subsisting and unrevoked."/ "Even in the compulsory areas, however, the effect of a transfer by unregistered deed is not entirely null." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 298 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). See null and void.

nulla bona (= no goods) is a LATINISM that has given its name to the sheriff's return on a writ of execution when he has found no property of the defendant on which to levy. E.g., "The goods seized were then sold by the sheriff and the proceeds paid to Bird, a return of nulla bona being made to the plaintiff's writ." Bankers Trust Co. v. Galadari, [1987] 1 Q.B. 222, 227 [1986] 3 All E.R. 794, 798.

null and void. "If the powers of the legislature have not been exercised in conformity with the Constitution, the laws enacted are null and void." This DOUBLET is old in the law, is readily understandable to nonlawyers, and is at worst a minor prolixity and a CLICHÉ. Though emphatic, null and void is susceptible to the frequent weakness of void alone, namely that of being interpreted to mean voidable. (See void.) Null and void is fundamentally innocuous, however; the fight for PLAIN LANGUAGE has far worse legalistic demons to eliminate. See null & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS nulla poena sine lege (= no punishment without a law authorizing it), one of the basic principles of civilized nations, is sometimes shortened to nulla poena—e.g.: "The doctrine of nulla poena would at first sight seem to require a very rigid criminal law and a severe pruning of the discretion allowed to the court in determining sentence." G.W. Paton, A Textbook of Jurisprudence 389 (4th ed. 1972).

A common variation on the phrase is nullum crimen sine lege (= no crime without a law authorizing it)—e.g.: "It is usual to begin a discussion of general principles of the criminal law by stating the maxim nullum crimen sine lege, sometimes known as the principle of legality." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 59 (1991). See MAXIMS

nullip, a clipped form of the gynecological term nullipara (= a woman who has never borne children), has become common in litigation of mass-tort claims relating to female infertility. The appearance and sound of the word are startling at first, when one considers the context, which seems much more likely to give rise to soft-sounding EUPHEMISMS—e.g.: "A prime candidate is the young nullip who will settle for nothing less than the most modern, trouble-free method of birth control." Hawkinson v. A.H. Robins Co., 595 F. Supp. 1290, 1305–06 (D. Colo. 1984) (quoting a corporate advertisement)./ "[T]he jury could consider defendant's statement that the Cu-7 was 'excellent for use' with nullips as a statement of fact, and not as an opinion." Kociemba v. G.D. Searle & Co., 707 F. Supp. 1517, 1525 (D. Minn. 1989).

nullity = (1) the fact of being legally void <petition for nullity of marriage>; or (2) something that is legally void <the contract that is now regarded as a nullity>. Sense (2) is now more common—e.g.: "A forged transfer is a nullity . . . ." J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 89 (4th ed. 1945). But sense (1) also appears from time to time—e.g.: "In questions of nullity of marriage, English courts will generally recognise the validity of a foreign decree . . . ." R.H. Graveson, Conflict of Laws 332 (7th ed. 1974).

nul tiel is LAW LATIN meaning "no such," and it typically occurs in denials that something exists, as in the names of pleas called nul tiel record, nul tiel corporation, and nul tiel debt. E.g., "Appellant filed an answer containing an allegation that the debt was the debt of another, a plea of 'nul tiel debt,' and a general denial." Gregson v. Webb, 239 S.E.2d 230, 231 (Ga. Ct. App. 1977)./ "The merits would be fully open to examination on a plea of the general issue, which would be nil nebet or non-assumpsit, and not nul tiel record." De la Mata v. American Life Ins. Co., 771 F. Supp. 1375, 1381 n.13 (D. Del. 1991).

The phrase is less likely to be replaced than many other JARGON phrases because it is the name of a plea, and lawyers are unlikely to adopt a new name such as "the no-such-corporation plea." Even so, many American jurisdictions, including the federal courts, do quite well without the phrase.

number of, a. This phrase is generally paired with a plural noun and a plural verb—i.e., there are a number of reasons instead of there is a number of reasons. The former is correct because of the linguistic principle known as SYNESIS—e.g.: "There have been a number of cases in which error or inadvertence has led to failure to comply with the provisions of section 33 or its forerunner."/ "[A] number of scholastic and, as it seems to me, unprofitable dogmas have grown up . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 268 (7th ed. 1964)./ "There is [read are] a number of reasons for this." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals vii (1968)./ "However, there is [read there are] a number of exceptions to this rule, whose importance appears to be increasing today." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 260 (3d ed. 1981) (Cf. p. 31. "There are a number of different ways of classifying contracts.").

But when number is modified with an adjective—that is, when the SET PHRASE that gives rise to the plural locution is changed—the focus shifts to the singular noun number, and the verb should become singular. E.g., "There are [read is] a considerable number of cases in the United States where courts have ordered the employer to pay the bonus notwithstanding language like that just quoted." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 128 (1968)./ "There is a surprising number of cases in the advance sheets [involving] joint and mutual wills . . . ." Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 184 (2d ed. 1979).

NUMERALS. A. General Guidance in Using. The best practice in legal writing is to spell out all numbers ten and below, and to use numerals for numbers 11 and above. This "rule" has five exceptions:

1. If numbers recur throughout the text or are being used for calculations—that is, if the context is quasi-mathematical—then use numerals.
2. Approximations are usually spelled out <about two hundred years ago>.
3. In units of measure, words substitute for rows of zeros where possible <$3 million, $3 billion>, and digits are used with words of measure <9 inches, 4 millimeters>.

4. Percentages may be spelled out <eight percent> or written as numbers <8 percent or 8%>.
5. Numbers that begin sentences must always be spelled out. (See C.)

B. Coupling Numerals with Words. In 1992, one lawyer wrote another, saying: "Dear Sally: I really enjoyed seeing you and your two (2) sons in the park last week." All that was missing was the clincher, "Please give my warm wishes to same."

The noxious habit of spelling words out and putting numerals in parentheses decreases the readability of much legal writing, especially DRAFTING. Following is a genuine example from a Canadian court order:

> That of the sum of twelve thousand five hundred dollars ($12,500) payable to the Infant, the sum of twelve thousand dollars ($12,000) be paid to the District Registrar of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia, to the credit of the Infant to be held on behalf of the Infant until further order or until she shall attain the age of nineteen (19) years and that the remaining sum of five hundred dollars ($500) together with the sum of one thousand eight hundred and nineteen dollars and ninety-two cents ($1,819.92) be paid to X.Y. Clarke, Solicitor for the Petitioners and the Infant on account of legal fees and disbursements." (Can.)

This belt-and-suspenders practice seems to have originated in a fear of typographical errors: hence, words were used instead of numbers. (And we gained the canon of construction holding that, if ever a discrepancy emerges between spelled-out numbers and numerals, the words control.) But the words did not readily draw the eye to all the important numerical figures, so these were added in parentheses to alert readers. The result is often a bog.

Modern teachers of drafting tend to prefer using the numerals alone. They caution drafters about the urgent necessity of reviewing numerals carefully because, as they note, a misplaced decimal or an added zero (or three) can give rise to malpractice claims. But if clarity and readability are to be primary goals, the belt-and-suspenders approach must be rejected.

If, on the other hand, clarity and readability are not one's primary goal as a drafter—if one is more concerned with unmistakable meaning, however hard a reader might have to work to get at it—then the belt-and-suspenders approach makes perfect sense.

C. Not Beginning Sentences with Numerals. It is stylistically poor to begin a sentence—or, as in the following example, a paragraph—with numerals. E.g., "1984 saw the publication of three substantial books on the subject . . . ." George D. Gopen, The State of Legal Writing: Res Ipsa Loquitur, 86 Mich. L. Rev. 333, 364 (1987). Some journals, such as The New Yorker, would make that sentence begin, Nineteen-eighty-four saw the publication . . . . But most writers and editors would probably simply begin the sentence some other way, as by writing, In 1984, three substantial books on the subject appeared.

D. Round Numbers. Except when writing checks or other negotiable instruments, omit double zeros after a decimal: $400 is better form than $400.00.

E. Decades. As late as the 1970s, editors regularly changed 1970s to 1970's. Today, however, the tendency is to omit the apostrophe.

F. Judicial Votes. The preferred method for recording an appellate court's votes in a particular case is to use numerals separated by an en-dash  <voted 6–3 to reverse>. This method, which gives the reader more speed than spelling out the numbers <five-to-four decision>, is standard today—e.g.:

- "The majority was 6–3 and the opinion was by Chief Justice Warren—in itself significant, for the Chief Justice normally reserves for himself those onerous tasks likely to draw the most controversy." Robert A. Liston, Tides of Justice: The Supreme Court and the Constitution in Our Time 168 (1966).
- "In the 1974 Term, both Rehnquist and Powell wrote heavily in 6–3 and 5–4 cases, Powell writing in five 5–4 and three 6–3 rulings." Stephen L. Wasby, The Supreme Court in the Federal Judicial System 178 (1978).
- "Some would argue that one Justice or two would not make that much difference—and that even the many 5–4 splits would gradually disappear—if the Supreme Court were staffed, as they believe it should be, with men and women who understand that constitutional adjudication is simply the job of correctly reading the Constitution." Laurence H. Tribe, God Save This Honorable Court 49 (1985).

For more on the en-dash, see PUNCTUATION (D).

If one prefers to spell out to instead of using the en-dash, the phrase must be hyphenated if it functions as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—e.g.: "[M]ost of the dissenters in this 5 to 4 [read 5-to-4] ruling feared that the majority had gone a long way in that direction." Gerald Gunther, Constitutional Law 1606 (11th ed. 1985). But if the numbers function adverbially in the sentence, there are no hyphens <voted 5 to 4 to affirm>.

numerous is often merely an inflated equivalent of many—e.g.: "Numerous [read Many] learned and brilliant men have believed in witchcraft."

Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 246 (2d ed. 1953).

nunc pro tunc (lit., "now for then") is used in reference to an act to show that it has retroactive legal effect. E.g., "The Commission of Appeals refused to treat the lower court decision as a judgment nunc pro tunc." The LATINISM is useful legal JARGON, not a TERM OF ART, usu. appearing when a court has exercised its "inherent power . . . to make its records speak the truth by correcting the record at a later date to reflect what actually occurred [in earlier court proceedings]." Ex parte Dickerson, 702 S.W.2d 657, 658 (Tex. Crim. App. 1986).

nuncupative will. See oral will.

nuptial(s). Although nuptial is in good use as an adjective, the noun nuptials (= wedding) is generally a pomposity to be avoided. It should be left to its ineradicable place in newspaper reports of weddings, in which it allows ambitious young journalists to practice INELEGANT VARIATION.

nurturance looks like a NEEDLESS VARIANT of nurture, but the words have diverged in their connotations. Whereas nurture means either "upbringing" or "food," nurturance—a 20th-century NEOLOGISM dating from 1938—means "attentive care; emotional and physical nourishment." If this DIFFERENTIATION persists, then nurturance may earn a permanent position in the language. For now, it remains relatively uncommon—e.g.: "Albert was also depressed and needed environmental stimulation and nurturance." In re Albert B., 263 Cal. Rptr. 694, 696 (Ct. App. 1989)./ "He added that applicant's childhood of extreme emotional and economic deprivation and [of] growing up in a household where there was no nurturance was important." Ex parte Lucas, 877 S.W.2d 315, 321 (Tex. Crim. App. 1994) (Overstreet, J., dissenting).

oath. A. And *affirmation. Apart from its nonlegal sense denoting a profane expression, oath has two different meanings: (1) a swearing to God that one's statement is true or that one will be bound to a promise; or (2) a statement or promise made when one so swears. An affirmation is a similar declaration without the religious invocation. See affirmant.

B. Under oath and on oath. The former is AmE as well as BrE; the latter is primarily BrE.

obiit sine prole. See OSP.

obiter dictum. A. Plural Form. The plural of obiter dictum (= a judge's passing remark) is obiter dicta. E.g., "Any comment in Pegues I regarding the merits of Pegues' Singleton claim was obiter dicta [read dictum]." A tangential comment is dictum; tangential comments are dicta. See dictum (C).

B. Obiter as a Shortened Form. Obiter is primarily a BrE shortening of the phrase obiter dictum. This elliptical form can be confusing when standing for the noun phrase, since obiter alone means "by the way"—e.g.: "In The Christina three out of five law lords expressed obiter doubts about the correctness of the previous English decisions . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 193 (5th ed. 1955).

If the phrase must be shortened, dictum is the usual form in AmE and in BrE—e.g.: "The appellees and the trial court cite Defreese v. Lake, which, by obiter [read in dictum], quotes the passage above from Washburn."/ "What Megaw, J. said in Yeoman Credit Ltd. v. Gregory was obiter [read dictum]." (Eng.)/ "This was certainly the intention in that case and therefore it is submitted that the statement within the parenthesis was obiter [read dictum]." See dictum (A).

C. In Dissenting Judicial Opinions. A British writer states that the phrase obiter dicta includes "the content of dissenting judgments made by a particular judge." Stephen Foster, Business Law Terms 73 (1988). That statement is itself misplaced obiter dictum. As generally used, obiter dictum relates to nondispositive remarks in a majority opinion.

object, n. Only in legal writing may persons be objects—e.g.: "If B is not a natural object of A's bounty, a presumption arises that A did not intend to make a gift of the property to B, but had some other reason for causing B to be named as grantee."/ "The rule that admits objects born after the testator's death and before the period of distribution, to share in the bequest, applies only where the total amount of the gift is independent of the number of objects among whom it is to be divided." (Eng.)

pher, addressed this point head-on: "Certain writers . . . consider that the object of a right means some material thing to which it relates; . . . others admit that a person, as well as a material thing, may be the object of a right." Salmond on Jurisprudence 265 (Glanville Williams ed., 11th ed. 1957). To Salmond's way of thinking, the subject of a right is its content (e.g., an entitlement to claim damages), whereas the object of a right is the person or thing for whose benefit the right exists.

Moreover, in the legal idiom, some persons may be objects while others are nonobjects: "If a donee of a special power makes an appointment to an object of the power in consideration of a benefit conferred upon or promised to a nonobject, the appointment is ineffective to whatever extent it was motivated by the purpose to benefit the nonobject."

objectant; objector. Both words mean "one who contests a will." For purposes of DIFFERENTIATION, objectant is perhaps preferable in this sense, inasmuch as objector has other uses in the language of the law, such as "one who objects to the admission of certain evidence at trial," or in the phrase conscientious objector.

In the context of wills, then, objector might be called a NEEDLESS VARIANT: "Objectants, who are the decedent's next of kin, appeal from a decree of the Surrogate's Court of King's County, which adjudged the bequest in that paragraph to be a valid charitable trust and directed that letters of trusteeship issue."/ "The language of the will and the actions of the objectors [read objectants] compel the conclusions that the objectors [read objectants] are entitled to $1.00 each and are not entitled to share in the residue of the estate because of the in terrorem clause." See caveator & contestant. Cf. protestant.

objectify; objectivize. Objectify, dating from the mid-19th century, means either (1) "to make into an object," or (2) "to render objective." Objectivize, dating from the late 19th century, means "to render objective." It would be convenient for the words to undergo DIFFERENTIATION, so that objectify would be confined to its sense (1), while objectivize would preempt objectify in the latter's sense (2). See reify.

objector. See objectant.

OBJECT-SHUFFLING. This term, in the words of its inventor, "describes what unwary writers are apt to do with some of the many verbs that require, besides a direct object, another noun bearing to them a somewhat similar relation, but attached to them by a preposition" (Fowler, MEU1 393). For example:

- "He continued the medicine a few days longer, and then substituted the penicillin with tetracycline [read substituted tetracycline for the penicillin or replaced the penicillin with tetracycline]." (This use of substitute for replace, resulting from a confusion over the type of object that each verb may take, is labeled "incorrect" in the OED.)
- "[T]he probability is that the judge himself will instruct a verdict of Not Guilty to be returned . . ." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 21 (1983). (The judge will instruct the jury, not the verdict. See HYPALLAGE.)
- "Counsel does not cite us a case that is any way analogous to the present case." (Counsel is citing not the court but a case.)

Unfortunately, there is no simple rule for determining which verbs are reversible and which are not; one must rely on a sensitivity to idiom and a knowledge of what type of subject acts upon what type of object with certain verbs. It is perfectly legitimate, for example, either to inspire a person with courage or to inspire courage in a person Impress, likewise, is a reversible word. A court may impress a constructive trust on property, or impress property with a constructive trust. Cf. oust & serve.

But the switch does not work with similar words such as instill or inculcate. Good teachers instill or inculcate values into students but cannot properly be said to instill or inculcate students with values. See inculcate.

object to ——ing. The modern idiom uses a present participle, not an infinitive. E.g., "If any person called to give evidence objects to take [read objects to taking] an oath, such person must make the following promise and declaration."

obligable. So spelled. See -ATABLE.

obligant. See obligee (D).

obligate. See oblige.

obligatio. This Roman-law term carries no meaning that is not equally well conveyed by the ordinary English word obligation. "Being valid, the state law created an obligatio, a personal liability of the owner of the Hamilton,' to the claimants." (Holmes, J.) Rarely did Justice Holmes so indulge himself in such unnecessarily recherché terms.

obligation, a basic word in the civil-law tradition, carries a double sense: (1) a duty to perform or to refrain from acting; or (2) a mutual legal relationship imposing a complex of rights and duties. Maine pointed out a "puzzling peculiarity" relating to sense (2)—a peculiarity because we are accustomed to acquainting obligation with duty: " 'Obligation' [in Roman law] signified rights as well as duties, the right, for example, to have a debt paid as well as the duty of paying it." Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 270 (17th ed. 1901; repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910). In civil law, the term obligation embraces contracts, torts, and quasi-contracts. See duty.

obligative. See obligatory.

obligator. See obligee (D).

obligatory; obligative. The general term is obligatory (= required; mandatory). Obligative is a grammatical term for the mood of verbs expressing obligation or necessity.

oblige; obligate. The differences between these terms lie more in their uses than in their senses. Both words may mean "to bind by law or by moral duty." In legal contexts, the sense of both words is usually "to bind by law"—obligate occurring more frequently—whereas in lay contexts the sense of moral duty predominates.

Oblige is used in the sense "to bind by legal tie" only in legal writing. E.g., "While one, by making an entry to the other's debit, lays him under an obligation, it is only the latter that is obliged." Oblige has the additional sense "to do a favor for; to bind (someone else) by doing a favor"—a sense not shared by obligate.

Obliged (= bound by law, duty, or moral tie) often functions adjectivally in a way that obligated ordinarily does not—e.g.: "The California Court of Appeals felt obliged to yield to the supremacy of a federal treaty over state law."

Oblige is a casualism in the sense "to favor, bestow, or entertain." E.g., "Appellant wrote the clerk of the court of appeals and requested that all motions filed by his counsel be withdrawn and that a mandate of affirmance issue forthwith; the court obliged and the mandate issued."/ "The court requested the government to summarize the evidence that would be offered at trial, and the government obliged with a description of the surveillance."

obligee; obligor. A. General Policy for Handling These Terms. The wisest policy is probably not to handle them at all: use creditor (= obligee) and debtor (= obligor) instead. A leading jurist explains why: "Etymologically, 'obligee' suggests the idea of a person's being obliged, but in current usage this meaning is actually more commonly attached to the term 'obligor'; but where usage is neither logical nor securely established, one should avoid using potentially misleading expressions." D. Neil MacCormick, "General Legal Concepts," in 11 The Laws of Scotland: Stair Memorial Encyclopaedia 1029, at 371 n.3 (1990). For an example in which obligee and obligor are given senses opposite their ordinary current senses, see George J. Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland § 26, at 14 (10th ed. 1899).

B. Pronunciation. Obligee has a soft -g- /ob-li-jee/, whereas obligor has a hard one /ob-li-gohr/. Cf. subrogee.

C. Senses. Several dictionaries, such as The Random House College Dictionary (rev. ed. 1988) and Webster's New World Dictionary (1979), define obligee in its etymological sense, as if it were synonymous with obligor. Random House, for example, defines obligee as "a person who is under obligation," but that meaning ought to be reserved for obligor. An obligee, in modern usage, is one to whom an obligation is owed.

D. Variations on obligor. Obliger and obligator are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of obligor, the usual and therefore the preferable form in legal writing. Obliger /a-blī-jər/ is the nonlegal form. Obligant is also a NEEDLESS VARIANT, except in Scots law, in which it is the predominant form.

oblivious takes the preposition of in its strictest sense of "forgetful." (Oblivion = forgetfulness or forgottenness, not momentary distraction.) The more popular meaning of oblivious today is "unmindful; unaware; unobservant." This semantic shift represents a grave attenuation in meaning. Today to is the more common mate of oblivious, though fastidious speakers and writers continue to use of.

Oblivious is here used correctly with regard to the preposition, and less correctly from an etymological point of view: "The law does not discriminate between the rescuer oblivious of peril and the one who counts the cost." (Cardozo) obnoxious today generally means "offensive, objectionable." In legal writing, however, it often carries the sense "contrary," as here: "To give effect to the limitation in favor of C's heir, when he is ascertained, would be obnoxious to the cardinal principle that a man cannot create a springing interest."

An even rarer sense of the word, used only in legal and literary contexts, is "exposed to harm or liable to something undesirable." E.g., "This is a similar case, and it is obnoxious to similar criticism" (Eng.) (adapted from OED quotation).

obrogate. See abrogate.

obscenity. A. Sense. The multipronged tests for obscenity have evolved considerably since Justice Potter Stewart remarked, "[P]erhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly [defining obscenity], but I know it when I see it." Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 197 (1964) (Stewart, J., concurring). In 1973, the U.S. Supreme Court spelled out a three-part test: if the average person applying contemporary community standards would find that, taken as a whole, the material appeals to the prurient interest in sex, portrays sexual conduct in a patently offensive way, and lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973).

Because that test involves a variable standard—"contemporary community standards"—the equation varies from locale to locale. In 1983, a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reluctantly concluded that "the community standards in New York are so low that nothing is obscene." U.S. v. Various Articles of Obscene Merchandise, 709 F.2d 132, 138 (2d Cir. 1983) (Meskill, J., concurring).

B. And indecency. Neither obscenity nor indecency named a common-law crime, but each described acts that were considered crimes. The two are sometimes considered interchangeable, although indecency is arguably broader because it may encompass anything that is outrageously disgusting.

The High Court of Justiciary, in Scotland, has held that indecent and obscene are not synonymous. See McGowan v. Langmire, 1931 J.C. 10, 13 (1930). Indecency was held to be the milder term: nudity, for example, is indecent but not necessarily obscene. As a matter of degree, therefore, obscene is the term to which stronger disapproval attaches.

C. And obsceneness. If there is a DIFFERENTIATION between the two, obscenity is more of a static fact and obsceneness more of a quality. The latter is more rare—e.g.: "[T]he search warrant (1) authorized seizure of all copies of the books in question and (2) was issued without an adversary hearing on the issue of their obsceneness." A Quantity of Copies of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205, 215 (1964) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

OBSCURITY, generally speaking, is a serious offense. Simple subjects are often made needlessly difficult, and difficult subjects are often made much more difficult than they need be.

Obscurity has myriad causes, most of them rooted in imprecise thought or lack of consideration for the reader. Following is an example of the kind of obscurity typically found in the worst of legal writing: "Upon the other hand, if the defendant in error could not possibly, by the use of reasonable means and due diligence, have procured the information necessary for her to have, in order to make due proof of the death of Archie Hicks, the law did not impose upon her, as a duty, the attempted doing of an impossible thing." This obtuseness is due perhaps partly to the metaphysical notion involved, but certainly also to the pompous phraseology. See WOOLLINESS & PLAIN LANGUAGE

Indeed, the main root of the problem is purely psychological: "Most obscurity, I suspect, comes not so much from incompetence as from ambition—the ambition to be admired for depth of sense, or pomp of sound, or wealth of ornament." F.L. Lucas, Style 74 (1962). More bluntly still: "The truth is that many writers today of mediocre talent, or no talent at all, cultivate a studied obscurity that only too often deceives the critics, who tend to be afraid that behind the smokescreen of words they are missing the effectual fire, and so for safety's sake give honour where no honour is due." G.H. Vallins, The Best English 106 (1960).

A. Overelaboration. One cannot improve upon what Cardozo wrote about the MYTH OF PRECISION: "There is an accuracy that defeats itself by the overemphasis of details. I often say that one must permit oneself, and that quite advisedly and deliberately, a certain margin of misstatement. . . . [T]he sentence may be so overloaded with all its possible qualifications that it will tumble down of its own weight." Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 471, 474 (1939). Edgar Allan Poe put the same point a little differently: "In one case out of a hundred a point is excessively discussed because it is obscure; in the ninety-nine remaining it is obscure because excessively discussed." (As quoted in Ashbel G. Gulliver, Cases on Future Interests 13 (1959).) See OVERPARTICULARIZATION.

B. Initialese. Another kind of obscurity results from the overuse of acronyms, with which the reader must repeatedly try to become familiar. E.g., "This memorandum examines the effect of a P.U.C. determination of L.C.R.A. standing to be an intervenor contestant as it affects plaintiff's claim that L.C.R.A. lacked sufficient interest to justify its opposition to the Texland application for C.C.N." One's writing should be more accessible to readers than that. If it is to contain acronyms, these should be few and should appear one at a time, not all together. See INITIALESE & ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS.

C. Abstractness. See ABSTRACTITIS.

obsequies; obsequious. These words are unrelated in meaning. Obsequies, the noun, is a FORMAL WORD for funeral. Obsequious, the adjective, means "toadying, servilely attentive."

observance; observation. The DIFFERENTIATION between these two words is complete. Observance = heeding; obeying; the act of following a custom or rule—e.g.: "The defendant had a right to insist upon an observance of the terms of the contract." Observation = (1) scrutiny; study; or (2) a judgment or inference from what one has seen—e.g.: (Sense 2) "She made three original observations about the doctrine."

Observation is frequently misused for observance—e.g.: "[W]e would be fulfilling our obligation to locate the proper balance between competing demands for effective police protection and strict observation [read observance] of a suspect's fundamental constitutional rights." People v. Knapp, 441 N.E.2d 1057, 1064 (N.Y. Ct. App. 1982) (Jasen, J., dissenting)./ "If the testator's intent can be determined from the will itself, rigid observation [read observance] of precedent and other rules is not absolute and controlling." Hudspeth v. Hudspeth, 756 S.W.2d 29, 32 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 1988).

Less commonly, observance sometimes mistakenly displaces observation—e.g.: "This proceeding was heard ore tenus by the court, and its questions indicated its keen observance [read observation] of the demeanor of each and every witness who testified in the case." Jenkins v. Jenkins, 232 So. 2d 680, 681 (Ala. Ct. Civ. App. 1970).

obstetric(al). The common and preferred form is obstetric.

obstruction of justice (= interference with the orderly administration of law) is a broad phrase that captures every willful act of corruption, intimidation, or force that tends somehow to impair the machinery of the civil or criminal law.

obstructive; obstructional; obstructionary. The second and third forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

obtain is a FORMAL WORD for get.

obtainment; obtainance; obtainal; obtention. Though all four have appeared in legal writing, obtainment is the most natural and the most frequent. The others are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

obverse. See converse.

obviate. Modern dictionaries that define obviate as meaning "to make unnecessary" are unduly restrictive (see, e.g., the OAD). The OED does not even list this sense. Although obviate may well carry this meaning, it means more usually "to meet and dispose of or do away with (a thing); to prevent by anticipatory measures" (OED). E.g., "The trial court can obviate the problem by approving appeals only regarding issues that have an adequate record."/ "The semblance of vindictiveness that arises from the imposition of a harsher sentence the second time around must he obviated so that the proceedings do not leave the impression of unfairness to the defendant."/ "Defendant cites the equitable maxim, 'equity acts in personam,' invoked since the days of Coke and Bacon to obviate open conflicts hetween law and equity courts."

In the sense "to make unnecessary," obviate often appears correctly in the phrase obviate the necessity of or need for. These phrases are not REDUNDANCIES, for the true sense of obviate the necessity is "to prevent the necessity (from arising)," hence to make unnecessary: "This posture of the case obviates the necessity of our attempting to articulate a generally applicable principle of 'finality' or 'ripeness' beyond what has already been said in the cited cases."/ "Professor Easterbrook would move us away from this core of first principles toward the periphery populated by managerial techniques—a realm in which the bureaucratic task of punching figures into a supposedly passive and neutral machine obviates the need for judges to make and defend hard choices."

Obviate is sometimes misunderstood as meaning "to make obvious" or "to remedy"; the latter error occurs here: "If the company realized that the slipperiness constituted an unreasonable risk to business visitors, it should have either taken steps to obviate [read remedy] the condition or given visitors warning thereof."

obviously, like other dogmatic words (clearly, undoubtedly, undeniably), is one that "lawyers tend to use when they are dealing with exceptionally obscure matters." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 116 n.63 (1974). See clearly & doubtless(ly).

occupancy. Most speakers of English, when they hear this word, are likely to think about how full a building is, as in the "occupancy rate" of a hotel. But occupancy has a technical legal sense that nonlawyers are likely unaware of: "the taking possession of something having no owner, with a view to acquiring it as property." The term therefore appears often in the context of adverse possession—e.g.: "[W]e are of the view that the inquiry must focus on the events that led to defendant's exclusive occupancy of the property, which serves as the basis for his adverse possession claim." Pitson v. Sellers, 613 N.Y.S.2d 1005, 1006 (Sup. Ct. 1994)./ "Montana law requires occupancy and payment of taxes to prove adverse possession . . ." Lindey's, Inc. v. Goodover, 872 P.2d 767, 771 (Mont. 1994).

occupant; occupier. These synonyms are both old, and both have historically been used in legal writing to denote "one who takes possession of property." If any distinction in use exists, it is that occupier is more common in BrE than in the AmE. E.g., "The scheme of the Act at least allows, if it does not encourage, agreement between the land occupier and the local planning authority." (Eng.) Nevertheless, occupant is also used with great frequency in BrE.

occurrence. So spelled; occurence and occurance are fairly common misspellings.

ochlocracy. See mobocracy.

-OCRACY. See GOVERNMENTAL FORMS

octopus forms the plural octopuses, not octopi—e.g.: "This Court does not find the prosecutor's remark that defense counsel were 'trying to cloud the waters' as squid and octopi [read octopuses] are reputed to do . . . to be anything more than useless bloviation . . . ." Snow v. Reid, 619 F. Supp. 579, 585 (S.D.N.Y. 1985). See PLURALS (A) & HYPERCORRECTION (A) ocular is turgid for with one's eyes; labeling it a FORMAL WORD is too tepid a description. E.g., "The testator must have the opportunity, through the evidence of ocular [read visual] observation, to see the attestation." The word is sometimes misspelled occular. Cf. inoculation.

odiferous. See odorous.

odious (= hateful) derives from odium (= hatred; the reproach that attaches to an act that people despise). E.g., "[D]iscrimination on the basis of race is odious and destructive . . . ." Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 418 (1989)./ "Dred Scott has the odious distinction of holding that slaves were still property, subject to return to their owners, even if they managed to find their way to non-slave states." In re Marriage of Moschetta, 30 Cal. Rptr. 893, 899 n.14 (Ct. App. 1994).

Though odious has nothing to do with odor, many writers mistakenly believe that it does. The result is nothing short of a MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "There is an odious [read odorous or malodorous] smell emanating from this case and one wonders for whose benefit the motion to dismiss Vaccaro was filed." State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Noble, 430 S.E.2d 804, 808 (Ga. Ct. App. 1993) (Blackburn, J., dissenting)./ "O'Connell testified that her offices were not provided daily cleaning service, as required under her lease, and that an odious stench [read stench] had permeated the hallways as a result of the flooding in the restrooms." Columbus Properties, Inc. v. O'Connell, 644 A.2d 444, 446 (D.C. Ct. App. 1994). See odorous.

odorous; odoriferous; malodorous. Odorous = smelly. Malodorous carries even stronger negative connotations. Odoriferous, a frequently misused term, has historically almost always had positive connotations in the sense "fragrant." It should not be used in reference to foul odors. Odiferous is an inferior, shortened rendering of odoriferous. See odious.

-O(E)S. See PLURALS (C).

of. A. Signaling Verbosity. However innocuous it may appear, the word of is, in anything other than small doses, among the surest indications of flabby writing. Some fear that of, and the flabbiness it produces, are spreading: "Clearly, of is now something more than a mere preposition. It's a virus." All About Of, N.Y. Times, 8 March 1992, at 14. The only suitable vaccination is to cultivate a hardy skepticism about its utility in any given context. If it proves itself, fine. Often, though, it will fail to do so.

Some otherwise excellent writers have, on occasion, caught the virus:

- "The second clause of the second section of the second article empowers the President of the United States . . . ." The Federalist No. 67, at 409 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961). [A possible revision: The second clause of Article II, § 1 empowers . . . . (From three ofs to two.)]
- "On another occasion I have spoken more fully of the attempt of a leader among American teachers of law to give an economic interpretation of a well known English case . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 88 (1938). [A possible revision: On another occasion I have discussed how American law teachers have tried to give an economic interpretation of a well known English case. (From four ofs to one.)]
- "Henry II had genius of a high order, which never manifested itself more clearly than in his appreciation of the inevitability of the divergence of the paths of crime and of tort . . . ." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 43 (2d ed. 1953). [A possible revision: Henry II had rare genius, which never manifested itself more clearly than in his appreciation that the paths of crime and of tort would inevitably diverge. (From six *of*s to two.) The revision also fixes the REMOTE RELATIVE and uncovers a BURIED VERB (divergence).]

- "To one innocent of knowledge of the history of religions, the preoccupation of ecclesiastics, many of them celibate, with sexual matters may seem inexplicable." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 48 (1957). [A possible revision: To one who knows nothing about the history of religions, the preoccupation of ecclesiastics—many of them celibate—with sexual matters may seem inexplicable. (From five *of*s to two.)]
- "[I]n the judicial task of supervising the administration of estates of deceased persons, or of controlling the actions of trustees, judges are called upon to make simple orders [that] in practice will often be uncontested, and the task is then of an administrative character." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 37 (1983). [A possible revision: In the judicial task of supervising the administration of decedents' estates, or of controlling trustees' actions, judges are called upon to make simple orders that in practice will often be uncontested, and the task is then administrative. (From six *of*s to three.)]

As the examples illustrate, reducing the *of*s by 50 percent or so can, even at the sentence level, greatly improve the briskness and readability of the prose.

B. Superfluous in Dates. December of 1987 should be December 1987. See DATES (B).

C. Difficult of, etc. This construction, illustrated in the examples that follow, is now peculiar to the legal idiom. It is also easily improved by making the wording more direct: "We cannot say that this effort was so improbable of success [read unlikely to succeed] that all discovery ought to have been denied."/ "To attempt to catalogue the ways and means would be undesirable, and impossible of attainment [read impossible to attain]." (Eng.)/ "He has been guilty of inability to do that which in the case of such a store in such a place must be far from easy of performance [read far from easy to perform] in the absence of skilled clerical aid." (Eng.)/ "The question posed at first blush would appear to be one easy of answer [read easy to answer]."/ "The legislature does not intend a result that is absurd, impossible of execution [read impossible to execute], or unreasonable." Cf. NOUN PLAGUE. See difficult of.

D. Of a . . . nature. This phrasing is almost always unnecessary, for the adjective may always be used alone—and with greater force; e.g., act of a tortious nature reads better tortious act.

E. For from. This usage, an ARCHAISM, still appears with some frequency in legal writing—e.g.: "If I order mutton of [read from] X, and he supplies me with beef, or decomposed mutton, the failure of performance is as complete as if X had supplied nothing." It is commonly seen in the DOUBLET to recover of and against. See purchase (C).

of and from. This phrase is a hallmark of—not to say from—musty LEGALESE. The word from generally suffices as a replacement—e.g.: "Owner and Broker jointly covenant and agree to indemnify and hold such person harmless of and from [read from] any claim arising from the compliance with this authorization." That sentence could use a thorough overhaul, but the phrase of and from is as good a place to start as any.

of counsel. This anglicization of the LAW LATIN a consiliis is still sometimes applied to "the counsel employed by a party in a cause, and particularly to one employed to assist in the preparation or management of a cause, or in its presentation on appeal, but . . . not the principal attorney of record" (Black's).

But the term is more commonly used in the U.S. in reference to a lawyer (usu. semiretired) who is affiliated with a private law firm, though not as a member, partner, or associate. The phrase always indicates relationship, and often status as well. The phrase is often shortened to counsel. See counsel.

The phrase is becoming a title in the minds of American lawyers, many of whom therefore capitalize Of Counsel in midsentence. Otherwise, the phrase will create what for many readers is a MISCUE—e.g.: "As of 1991, Judge Gee became Of Counsel with Baker & Botts." Some writers delete the of: "As of 1991, Judge Gee became Counsel [or counsel] with Baker & Botts."

of course. This phrase, interestingly, seems to have originated as a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY. It appears to have been a LOAN TRANSLATION of the medieval phrase writ de cursu (= a writ issued as a matter of course), which in due time became writ of course. E.g., "The barons feared this growth of royal power and it was provided that, henceforth, the Chancellor would seal no writ, which was not an existing writ (known as writ 'of course'), except with the sanction of the king and council." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 28 (2d ed. 1979)./ "When trespass became a writ of course, about 1250, the recovery of unliquidated damages was a well-known practice . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 7 (1930). See as of course.

From the sense "as a matter of course," the phrase of course took on the sense "naturally; obviously; clearly." Like those defining words, it is sometimes used to fortify lame propositions. It therefore requires careful, responsible use. See clearly.

offence. See offense.

offendant is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of offender—e.g.: "But once again, many offendants [read offenders] do well in this category." George D. Gopen, The State of Legal Writing: Res Ipsa Loquitur, 86 Mich. L. Rev. 333, 348 (1987).

offense; offence. The first is the AmE spelling, the second the BrE spelling. In BrE and AmE alike, the word is preferably accented on the second syllable /ə-fents/. Unfortunately, because American sports-talk puts the accent on the first syllable (/of-ents/), many American police officers, criminal lawyers, and criminal-court judges have adopted this pronunciation even in the legal sense of the word. The sound of it puts the literate person's teeth on edge.

The word is sometimes used synonymously with crime, but at other times it is intended to have a broader meaning. Jeremy Bentham, for example, defined offense in two ways: (1) an act that "appear[s] . . . to have a tendency to produce mischief" (Jeremy Bentham, The Principles of Morals and Legislation 178 (1823 ed.; repr. 1948)); and (2) "an act prohibited, or, (what comes to the same thing) an act of which the contrary is commanded by the law" (id. at xix, § 1).

In BrE, and to a lesser extent in AmE, lawyers commonly distinguish crimes (at common law) from offenses (created by statute). It is common in both speech communities to use offense for the less serious infractions and crime for the more serious ones. Lawyers would not speak of the "offense" of murder. Nor would they refer to the "crime" of parking a car in the wrong place.

Even so, because offense is generally so closely associated with the idea of crime, the phrase civil offense is needlessly confusing. The phrase civil wrong (q.v.) is preferable. See criminal offense.

offer. A. And *promise. "There is surely a difference," wrote a 19th-century English scholar, "a profound difference in legal significance, between an offer and a promise. An offer is an expression of willingness to be bound by contract to the person to whom the offer is made, if he accepts the offer unconditionally and within a reasonable time. The offer then becomes a promise. A contract is made up of one or more promises and when a contract is made, and not till then, the parties are bound. Therefore an offer is revocable, a promise is not." William R. Anson, Some Notes on Terminology in Contract, 7 Law Q. Rev. 337, 337 (1891). See promise (A).

B. And invitation to treat. "The distinction between an offer and an invitation to treat is often hard to draw as it depends on the elusive criterion of intention." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 11 (8th ed. 1991). In BrE, the phrase invitation to treat denotes an invitation to make an offer, as opposed to an offer in itself; examples include a menu in a restaurant, wares displayed in a storefront window, and an auctioneer's request for bids. In AmE, the phrase is rarely if ever used; instead, writers on the law of contract generally use roundabout wordings such as entertainment of bids, proposal made to the public, and invitation to make an offer. The last of these has much to be said in its favor because it is immediately comprehensible to a broad spectrum of readers.

C. Firm offer. A "firm" offer contains a promise not to revoke it for a specified period.

D. Offer in Criminal Law. Criminal lawyers have given offer an odd meaning by making it synonymous with attempt, q.v. Thus an offer to commit battery is a threat that makes a person reasonably apprehend that he or she is about to be battered. One unfamiliar with this strange phraseology might mistakenly assume that the phrase offer to commit battery is contractual in nature and relates to sadomasochism.

offer of evidence; offer of proof. An offer of evidence is the last step in the introduction of evidence. The proponent of tangible evidence (writings, photographs, murder weapons, and the like), after evidence has been marked for identification, allows the judge and opposing counsel the courtesy of examining it before a witness authenticates it. Once the evidence has been authenticated, the proponent says, for example, "Your Honor, we now offer into evidence what has been marked Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 5." One "offers" testimonial evidence simply by engaging in direct examination or cross-examination.

An offer of proof is a means of preserving the record for appeal. It consists in a lawyer's adducing what that lawyer expects to be able to prove through a witness's testimony, and it usually occurs outside the jury's presence and only after a judge has sustained an objection to the introduction of the evidence. An offer may be made of tangible evidence, of testimony through questions and answers, or of testimony through the lawyer's own narrative description.

offeror; offerer. The former is now standard in legal texts, although the latter was much used in the 19th century. See -ER (A).

office, v.t., has become a commonplace expression among American lawyers in the southwestern U.S., but not among fastidious users of language. E.g., "Although the defendant was officed there [read Although the defendant had an office there] for a while, the business address of the company is the office on 51st Street." This is a classic example of the problem discussed under NOUNS AS VERBS.

officer of the court, in the sense "a lawyer," is an Americanism that evokes the close supervision and control that courts exercise over practicing lawyers, the considerable professional duties that lawyers owe to the judicial system, and the privileges that they receive. Although the courtroom lawyer is not an officer in the same sense as a bailiff, a marshal, or a police officer, he or she is nevertheless obligated to serve the disciplinary function of controlling the client in court.

The phrase most commonly crops up when one lawyer chides another for an alleged lapse in ethics or etiquette, or when a judge admonishes counsel to keep to a higher standard.

OFFICIALESE = the language of officialdom, characterized by bureaucratic turgidity and insubstantial fustian. The defining characteristic of officialese is the habitual use of inflated language that could be readily translated into simpler terms: "Let us now proceed to perambulate down the corridor to procure our midday comestibles." As translated: "Let's go down the hall for lunch."

Among the linguistically unsophisticated, puffed-up language seems more impressive. Thus, police officers never get out of their cars; instead, they exit their vehicles. They never smell anything; rather, they detect it by olfaction. They proceed to a residence and observe the suspect partaking of food. Rather than sending papers to each other, officials transmit them (by hand delivery, not by fax). And among lawyers, rather than suing, one institutes legal proceedings against or brings an action against. For sound guidance on how to avoid officialese, see Ernest Gowers, The Complete Plain Words (2d ed. 1973); and J.R. Masterson & W.B. Phillips, Federal Prose: How to Write in and/or for Washington (1948).

official misconduct. See misconduct in office.

officious. In Dr. Johnson's day, officious had positive connotations ("eager to please"). Today, however, it means "meddlesome; interfering with what is not one's concern." E.g., "When the necessary goods or services are furnished without the knowledge of the trustee, who is supporting the beneficiary, recovery should be denied on the ground that the person supplying the goods or services is acting officiously." In legal contexts, the word frequently appears in the phrase officious intermeddler: "People who fertilize other people's land or play the good Samaritan are 'officious intermeddlers'—volunteers whom even equity will not aid." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 73 (1974).

In the context of diplomacy, the word has a strangely different sense: "having an extraneous relation to official matters or duties; having the character of a friendly communication, or informal action, on the part of a government or its official representatives" (OED) <an officious communication>.

The term is often misused, however. In the following sentence it is difficult to discern what meaning the writer intended it to have, but it is impossible for a policy to be officiously applicable: "It is upon this assumption, that the case will be tried in a convenient forum so that the forum's policies are properly and not officiously applicable [read arbitrarily applied?] to the case, that Professor Ehrenzweig advances his central suggestion for solution of choice-of-law problems."

Here the writer apparently mistook its meaning as being "official-looking": "He still lived in the same old dormitory, in a bigger and more officious room." The same error is plain in one court's reference to an officious translation of a Belgian statute; presumably official translation would have been the appropriate phrase.

offing. The traditional phrase is in the offing (= about to appear). On the offing is incorrect and unidiomatic.

offload, v.t., of South African origin, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of unload or dump. E.g., "The court finds that orders given to offload [read dump] garbage cannot possibly constitute unseaworthiness of the vessel."

off of is inferior to off without the preposition. E.g., "He jumped off of [read off] the bridge." The only exception occurs when off is part of a PHRASAL VERB, such as write off—e.g.: "This is a serious difficulty, but it need not lead to the writing off of the subjective definition of recklessness."

Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 78 (1978). Cf. outside of.

off point has, in AmE, become the antonym of on point—e.g.: "The Ohio case is so far off point on its facts that one must stretch his imagination to compare that Court's holding and facts to the instant case." Geurin Contractors, Inc. v. Bituminous Casualty Corp., 636 S.W.2d 638, 643 (Ark. Ct. App. 1982)./ "The dissent's cases are off-point [read off point]." LeCroy v. Hanlon, 713 S.W.2d 335, 342 n.10 (Tex. 1986)./ "The plaintiff's argument is off point." U.S. Leasing Corp. v. City of Chicopee, 521 N.E.2d 741, 744 n.4 (Mass. 1988).

offrecord. See off-the-record.

offset, n., is perfectly acceptable in American legal writing. This usage is first recorded in the OED as an Americanism from 1769. Nearly fifty years later, John Pickering wrote: "This is much used by lawyers of America instead of the English term set-off; and it is also very common, in popular language, in the sense of equivalent. . . . It is not in the dictionaries." J. Pickering, A Vocabulary 142 (1816) (emphasis omitted).

Today the word is commonplace, in dictionaries and elsewhere—e.g.: "Allowable offsets are subtracted from the consumer's actual damages before trebling, necessarily reducing the amount of damages subject to trebling." Deborah J. Bullion, An Understanding of Damages Recoverable Under the DTPA, 20 St. Mary's L.J. 667, 685 (1989)./ "Finally, the Trustee argues that . . . we are, in effect, sanctioning an impermissible offset of a fraudulent conveyance against general unsecured claims." United Energy Corp. v. Rider, 944 F.2d 589, 597 (9th Cir. 1991)./ "[T]he only statutorily permissible offset to an approved progress payment is 'an amount necessary to satisfy any claims, liens or judgments' . . . ." Christ Gatzonis Elec. Contractor, Inc. v. New York City Sch. Constr. Auth., 23 F.3d 636, 641 (2d Cir. 1994).

offset, v.t., is generally inferior to set off, although it cannot rightly be condemned as an error. E.g., "[T]he division of property was, or will be, approximately equal and the two amounts would offset each other." Welsh v. Welsh, 869 S.W.2d 802, 807 (Mo. Ct. App. 1994)./ "Specifically, Austin Mutual contends [that] the $100,000 collected from Leichtenberg's insurer should offset the $100,000 in total underinsured motorist limits under King's policy, leaving no remaining coverage due by Austin Mutual." Austin Mut. Ins. Co. v. King, 29 F.3d 385, 388 (8th Cir. 1994).

What can be condemned as an error—and a gross one—is using offsetted as a past tense or past participle. E.g., "NFO then refused to pay Smith, . . . contending that the amount NFO owed Smith was offsetted [read offset] by the damage caused by Smith's breach of his January 9, 1973 contract." Nat'l Farmers Org. v. Smith, 526 S.W.2d 759, 763 (Tex. Civ. App.—Corpus Christi 1975)./ "[T]he lower court . . . properly considered . . . the disparity between appellee's earning capacity and appellant's substantial income offsetted [read offset] by his reasonable expenses and direct support of Eric." Steenland-Parker v. Parker, 544 A.2d 1010, 1013 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1988). See set-off.

off-the-record, adj. This is the standard phrase for any comment explicitly not for recordation or attribution. As a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE preceding what it modifies, it should be hyphenated, but not when it follows what it modifies <an off-the-record statement> . Some writers have experimented with offrecord; that word is not yet standard.

of opinion. See opinion, of (the).

often, as an adverb, need not be hyphenated in phrases such as the one in the following sentence: "Occurring at the end of eight days of often-starry [read often starry] and emotional deliberation in State Supreme Court in Manhattan, the verdict ended a highly publicized and sensational murder trial in New York." Ronald Sullivan, Steinberg Is Guilty of First-Degree Manslaughter, N.Y. Times, 31 Jan. 1989, at A1.

oftentimes is, in all cases, unnecessary for often. E.g., "Both of these statutory schemes were in harmony with the common-law doctrine of sovereign immunity, but had the effect of lessening the oftentimes [read often] harsh results achieved in applying that doctrine."/ "The plaintiff gave no evidence of an intent that oftentimes [read often] appears to establish an enterprise independent of profits or losses." See REDUNDANCY.

of the essence. In the law of contract, this phrase makes certain stipulations more important than others; any failure to perform such a stipulation justifies a rescission. See time is of the essence.

of (the) opinion. See opinion, of (the).

olfaction, detect by is a laughable pomposity for smell. E.g., "The marijuana was discovered in plain view during the course of a subsequent maritime search of the vessel, and, in any event, the distinctive odor of the contraband weed apparently was ubiquitous and easily detected by olfaction on board and well beyond the Lady Mar." Here we also have INELEGANT VARIATION (marijuana . . . the contraband weed) and misuse of ubiquitous (= universal). Cf. ocular.

oligopoly; oligopsony. The former denotes control or domination of a market by a few large sellers; the latter, control or domination of a market by a few large customers. Cf. monopoly (D).

olograph. See holograph.

ombudsman; ombuds; ombudsperson. Ombudsman = (1) an official appointed to receive, investigate, and report on private citizens' complaints about the government; or (2) a similar appointee in a nongovernmental organization. Originally a Swedish word denoting a commissioner, ombudsman spread throughout the world during the mid-20th century as governments saw the wisdom of having such an official. Though the word entered the English language only as recently as 1959, it caught on remarkably well.

But, despite its prevalence throughout the English-speaking world, this word may prove to have a short life-span. Because of the -man suffix, many writers consider it sexist. Some have taken to lopping off the suffix, and, though the word ombuds looks distinctly un-English and remains unrecorded in most English dictionaries, it is surprisingly common—e.g.: "In Denmark, the Consumers' Ombuds has been given statutory responsibility for handling consumer complaints . . . ." Evaluating Electronic Payment Systems in the UK, American Banker, 28 Sept. 1987, at 25.

Several writers have tried ombudsperson, but that form should be allowed to wither. (See SEXISM (B).) Others have experimented with ombuds officer, which at least satisfies one's desire to have a word that looks as if it denotes a person—e.g.: "Columbia University last week named its first 'ombuds officer' as a reference point on campus for people who have grievances within the university and are looking for options to deal with them." Campus Life: Columbia, N.Y. Times, 14 July 1991, § 1, pt. 2, at 31.

omissible; omittable. The latter is incorrect.

omission. A. Generally. Among nonlawyers, this word has a narrower sense than it does among lawyers. To the nonlawyer, an omission is either something left out (as of a brief or program) or the act of leaving something out. To the lawyer, this word, serving as a useful antonym of commission, ordinarily denotes the failure to do something. E.g., "Nor will the surety be discharged by the creditor's omission to inform him . . . ." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 406 (1950).// "When we speak of an omission we mean something that the accused could have done if he had been minded to do so and had prepared himself in time, or at least something that another in his place could have done." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 4 (2d ed. 1961). See omit [+ infinitive].

B. And forbearance. An omission is an unintentional negative act, whereas a forbearance is an intentional negative act. Unfortunately, some legal writers use omission when they mean forbearance—a habit contributing to sloppy analysis.

omit [+ infinitive]. This construction, in which omit means "to neglect," appears today primarily in legal prose. E.g., "A person who wrongfully omits to perform a particular act required of him is liable in damages for all the consequences that may ordinarily ensue therefrom." It is a lawyers' expression that is neither JARGON nor LEGALESE, but an obsolescent grammatical construction. See omission (A).

omnibus, adj. (= relating to or serving for numerous distinct objects at once; comprising a large number of items or particulars [OED]) is a LEGALISM most often used in the legislative phrase omnibus bill. But omnibus also has other uses in legal writing—e.g.: "The appeal brings up for review the denial, after a hearing, of . . . defendant's omnibus motion . . . ." People v. Lopez, 497 N.Y.S.2d 452, 452 (App. Div. 1986).

on; upon. These synonyms are used in virtually the same ways. The distinctions are primarily in tone and connotation. On, the more usual word, is generally preferable: it is better to write service on a defendant than service upon a defendant. E.g., "As this case centers upon [read on] the strength of local Mississippi policies, this course is mandated by the principles of federalism."// "The burden is upon [read on] the petitioner to show that this is true."// "Plaintiff alleged that in reliance upon [read on] an inaccurate FHA inspection made in approving FHA mortgage insurance, he was induced to buy a house for an excessive price."

But upon is the better word for introducing a condition or event—e.g.: "Upon being served with a request, a party must . . . ."

One should never alter an idiom in which on appears by making it upon, as here: "The plaintiff received an assignment of a mortgage which upon its face [read on its face] provided it was secured by a note described in the mortgage." See face, on its, upon (A) & SET PHRASES.

on a . . . basis. See basis (B).

on all fours (= squarely on point with regard to both facts and law) is useful legal JARGON that refers to highly pertinent legal precedents. The phrase began as a LOAN TRANSLATION of an old Latin maxim, Nullum simile est idem nisi quatuor pedibus currit ("No similar thing is the same, unless it runs on all four feet"). The metaphor, as the OED explains, is that of a quadruped running evenly—not limping like a lame dog. E.g., "Judges in this way are constantly reasoning not by explicit authority 'on all fours,' but by analogy . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 308 (7th ed. 1964)./ "Once you found cases 'on all fours' you could sustain a good argument." Frank Maher, Words, Words, Words, 14 Melbourne U.L. Rev. 468, 469 (1984). Cf. whitehorse case.

Because of the special legal sense, lawyers may create a MISCUE if they suddenly use the phrase in reference to a person on hands and knees: "Coke made an ardent defense of the common-law courts that angered King James so violently that all the judges trembled and Coke himself 'fell flat on all fours.' " René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 279 (1962).

on and after (a date) is usually unnecessary for from, after, or since (a date), unless it is important to convey explicitly the nuance that the date mentioned is included within the scope of applicability. See on or about.

on appeal; on the appeal. The former phrase is today considered more idiomatic in AmE. E.g., "On the appeal [read On appeal], the counterclaimants petitioned and were granted leave to intervene, argue, and file a brief." See appeal (A).

on behalf of. See behalf.

on circuit. See circuit, to ride.

one. A. The Overdone one, n. "[O]ne has an affirmative responsibility toward others when one has taken an active part in directing the manner in which these others perform their tasks or when one creates or is generally responsible for a dangerous situation that causes harm. . . . One is not liable, however, simply because one uses the services of an independent contractor. Nor is one liable because of the mere fact that the contractor performs his work on one's land or, as in this case, on one's ship." Futo v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 742 F.2d 209, 215 (5th Cir. 1984). Enough said.

B. One . . . he. This expression is inferior to one . . . one, partly because of the questionable grammar and partly because of the generic masculine pronoun. (See SEXISM (A).) But the infelicity is common—e.g.: "A constructive trust, on the other hand, arises when one obtains the legal title to property in violation of a duty he [better: one] owes to another."/ "If one were thoughtless, he [better: one] would be apt to say that this is a case in which part of the operative facts creating the original obligation are directly presented to the senses of the tribunal."

Even worse are constructions on the order of one . . . such person, as here: "The United States Supreme Court has held that one may be in custody for habeas corpus purposes despite the fact that such person [read one] has been released from jail or on personal bond." Cf. one . . . you.

C. One [+ name]. Using one as an adjective before a proper name, as in "one Howard James," is a pretentious LEGALISM with a valid pedigree in English, but generally without justification in modern prose. It might even hint at BIBLICAL AFFECTATION, for the OED quotes from the Bible: "and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive." Today, however, the word one looks askance at any name following it.

one another. See each other.

one bite at the apple; one bite at the cherry. The first is the usual AmE idiom today, the latter the invariably BrE idiom. Each one denotes the idea that a litigant gets but one chance to take advantage of certain opportunities or rights. American courts sometimes use cherry in place of apple, but the latter fruit vastly predominates. The American version is that rare SET PHRASE that is not so well set, variations on the phrase being more common than the main phrase itself—e.g.: "[U]nless a litigant gets a real bite at the apple of discord he should not be foreclosed from another attempt." Angel v. Bullington, 330 U.S. 183, 207 (1947) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)./ "Because 'one fair opportunity to litigate an issue is enough,' . . . we generally will not allow a second bite at a single apple." A.J. Canfield Co. v. Vess Beverages, Inc., 859 F.2d 36, 37 (7th Cir. 1988) (citation omitted)./ "The interest of finality requires that parties generally get only one bite at the Rule 59(e) apple for the purpose of tolling the time for bringing an appeal." Charles L.M. v. Northeast Indep. Sch. Dist., 884 F.2d 869, 871 (5th Cir. 1989).

Some British lawyers insist that their idiom—one bite at the cherry—makes more sense because the cherry is a fruit that, by its nature, is eaten in only one bite: it makes little sense to think of multiple bites at a cherry.

But it was not logic that seems to have led American lawyers to speak of apples. Up to the late 1940s, American lawyers, like their British counterparts, regularly said one bite at the cherry: dozens of examples appear in the law reports. But, from the 1920s on, cherry had assumed another sense in AmE, namely "hymen" or "virgin." The OED quotes an American book from the 1970s explaining that "'[t]o take or eat a cherry' means to deflower a virgin."

Thus, one bite at the cherry may well be the only legal idiom that has changed because its users felt embarrassment over a newfound double entendre.

one . . . his. See one (B).

one of those ——s who (or that). This construction requires a plural, not a singular, verb. Why? Because in this construction, who (or that) acts as the subject of the upcoming clause, and the relative pronoun takes its number from the plural noun immediately preceding—e.g.: "It is one of the few admiralty texts that is [read are] worth reading." The reason for this construction becomes apparent when we reword the sentence: "Of the few admiralty texts that are worth reading, it is one."

This point of usage trips up even the best writers. Thus, it is common—e.g.: "One of the few people who continues [read continue] to insist that he is a liberal in its original and true sense is Nobel laureate Friedrich Hayek." Thomas Sowell, "Conservative" Means Even Less Than "Liberal," Dallas Morning News, 10 Feb. 1989, at 19A./ "One of the most important and difficult questions which arises [read that arise] in examining the extent of the parties' duties under a contract is to decide whether the parties are absolutely bound . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 184 (3d ed. 1981)./ "Martin Marietta, however, has not claimed that it was one distributor among many who was [read were] terminated for failing to price-fix . . . ." O.K. Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. Martin Marietta Corp., 819 F. Supp. 771, 797 (S.D. Ind. 1992). For similar errors, see crime (last par.) & each (A) (last par.).

one's self is an ARCHAISM for oneself. "One should learn to pace one's self [read oneself]."

one . . . you. This shift from third person to second is even worse than one . . . he. (See one (B).) E.g., "One hears—and if you are like me, you acquiesce in—many complaints about the decline of civility in Western society." Clifford Orwin, Civility, 60 Am. Scholar 553, 553 (1991). [One possible revision: You hear—and if you are like me, you acquiesce in—many . . . .] only is perhaps the most frequently misplaced of all English words. Its best placement is precisely before the words intended to be limited. The more words separating only from its correct position, the more awkward the sentence; and such a separation can lead to ambiguities. (Cf. solely.) E.g.:

- "A pro se complaint can only be dismissed for failure to state a claim if it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." (Put only after the first claim.)
- "These public rights can only be destroyed by proper municipal action." (Put only after destroyed.)
- "Erie is only applicable where there is no controlling federal statute." (Put only after applicable.)
- If the intestate were a married woman and her husband became administrator, he succeeded to the only personalty that was not already his by the marital right." (Put only after succeeded.)
- "Suffice it to say that I am quite satisfied that the court in that case was saying that an interrogatory may only be administered as to the contents of a written document if secondary evidence of that document would be admissible at the trial or hearing." (Eng.) (Put only after the first occurrence of document.)
- "A conditional promise is one which the promisor need only perform if a specified condition occurs." (Put only after perform.) on or about is the lawyer's hedge-phrase for dates, used esp. in pleadings. E.g., "On or about August 31, 1981, plaintiff and defendant entered into an assignment and assumption agreement." If the date is known with reasonable certainty, on is preferable. See FUDGE WORDS & on and after.

on the other hand. It is pure pedantry to insist that this contrastive phrase must always be paired with on the one hand.

on the part of. This phrase is usually verbose—e.g.: "Remedies can be lost by delay, by the intervention of third-party interests, or by a lack of complete probity on the part of the plaintiff." [Read or by the plaintiff's not being completely honest.] onus, lit. "a burden" (L.), usually carries the extended meaning "a disagreeable responsibility; obligation." In law, it also acts as an elliptical form of onus probandi, meaning burden of proof. E.g., "The mode of suing for and recovering penalties and forfeitures does not necessarily include any rules . . . as to the onus probandi." The Abigail, 1 F. Cas. 36, 37 (C.C.D. Mass. 1824) (No. 18).

Onus of proof is a BrE compromise between onus probandi and burden of proof: "The onus of proof should be put the other way round where a question of status of this nature arises." (Eng.) See burden of proof (B) & LOAN TRANSLATIONS op. cit. is the abbreviation for opere citato (= in the work cited). It is no longer used in legal citations and is obsolescent in other scholarly writing.

open court, in. This phrase, sometimes contrasted with closed court or in camera, means "during the public proceedings of a court." E.g., "Only once was Judge Taylor ever seen at a dead standstill in open court, and the Cunninghams stopped him." Harper Lee, To Kill a Mockingbird 167 (1960)./ "[I]t is difficult to imagine acceptance of a system under which, instead of trial in open court, a quiet and secluded inquiry by a committee of social scientists would determine whether an individual should be subjected to compulsory detention." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 55 (1968). Cf. in camera.

open the door. This legal CLICHÉ generally denotes one of two ideas: (1) that one party makes it possible (i.e., "opens the door") for the other party to do something tending to be prejudicial; or (2) that a court or policy-maker is embarking on a slippery slope, q.v. Sense (1): "It would be ironic to hold that when a State embarks on such desirable experimentation it thereby opens the door to scrutiny by the federal courts, while States that choose not to adopt such procedural provisions entirely avoid the strictures of the Due Process Clause." Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 471 (1983). Sense (2): "In adopting the rule it does, the Court opens the door to countless similarly situated prisoners to withdraw their guilty pleas many years after they were entered." Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637, 659 (1976) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

operable; operative; operational. Operable is now commonly used in the sense "practicable; capable of being operated." Operatable for operable is an occasional error—e.g.: "The fact that [the machinery] was not 'operatable' [read operable] after some repairs had been completed did not render it 'unrepairable.'" Arizona Container Corp. v. Consolidated Freightways, 522 P.2d 772, 774 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1974).

Operative = (1) having effect; in operation; efficacious <the statute is now operative>; or (2) having principal relevance <may is the operative word of the statute>.

Operational = engaged in operation; able to function; used in operation. E.g., "While a rate of slightly under ten violent incidents per month may seem shocking at first even for a large correctional institution, this figure must be evaluated in light of the fact that no operational definition of 'violence' has been established."

ophthalmology is sometimes misspelled ophthamology or opthamology.

ophthalmologist; oculist; optometrist; optician. The first two designate an M.D. whose specialty is the eye, although ophthalmologist is now more usual. An optometrist (with the degree of O.D.) is licensed to prescribe glasses and contact lenses. An optician makes the glasses in accordance with the prescription.

opine today usually connotes the forming of a judgment on insufficient grounds. It suggests the giving of an idle opinion, and thereby cheapens the opinion given. Formerly, however, the word was used in the sense "to express or pronounce a formal or authoritative opinion" (OED). The OED calls this sense rare; yet, in American law at least, this usage could hardly be accurately described as rare. Examples abound in which the verb is used of courts' pronouncements, without any suggestion of insufficiency of evidence. E.g., "None of the justices appear to have opined that the equal protection clause does not apply to illegal aliens."/ "The Supreme Court of New Jersey opined, in Santor v. A. & M. Karaghensian, that a cause of action under strict liability could be utilized to recover economic losses." We should not restrict opine because of its negative lay connotations; the term is a useful one in law.

It is unclear whether cheapening was here intended: "A plaintiff who does not have asbestos-related cancer may find a medical witness who will opine that there is a reasonable probability that he may later develop the disease." One cannot really opine about one's own thoughts: "I merely opine that I am hard-pressed to imagine a more appropriate case for the use of legislative history than the present one." [Read I would be hard-pressed to imagine . . . .] See opinion, v.t.

opinion is the AmE term for a judicial deliverance, i.e., the court's statement explaining its decision, including points of law, statements of fact, rationes decidendi, and dicta. The BrE equivalent is judgment, but the word opinion is also frequently used. (See judgment (B).) In BrE, opinion more commonly refers to advice given by counsel on facts set out in a case or in a memorandum submitted to counsel. See decision & deliverance.

opinion, v.t., is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of opine, q.v. "An F.B.I. document opinioned [read opined] that some of the writing on the government's exhibit was the same as handwriting exemplars taken from the defendant." (Note that to say a document opines is to engage in HYPALLAGE.)

opinion, of (the). Modern idiom requires of the opinion; to omit the definite article is to use an ARCHAISM that survives only in the law. In each of the following specimens, the should be inserted in the italicized phrase: "We are of opinion that the findings of fact by the district court entitled the appellee to the equitable relief sought."/ "If the court is of opinion that any evidence was improperly admitted or rejected, it must set aside the conviction." (Eng.)

Today, of the opinion seems to outnumber of opinion in legal opinions by three or four occurrences to one, in both BrE and AmE, despite what the examples just quoted might suggest. E.g., "We are of the opinion that plaintiff does not have a cause of action against this defendant."/ "For reasons to be stated, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia should be affirmed."

opinion of the court. This phrase denotes the American-style judicial opinion that, though written usually by a single judge, speaks for the court as a whole. Within the common-law tradition, the alternative is seriatim opinions, in which each judge on the bench pronounces an individual opinion. For a brief history of how Chief Justice John Marshall established the opinion of the court in American law, see Bryan A. Garner, "Opinions, Style of," in The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States 607, 608–09 (Kermit L. Hall ed. 1992).

opinions, rule against. This rule of evidence carries different senses in G.B. and in the U.S., primarily because of the different understandings of the word opinion:

> The opinion rule, though it developed from practices and expressions of the English courts, seems to be emphasized more generally and enforced more inflexibly here [in the U.S.] than in the mother country. In the first place a rule against 'opinions' may have had a different meaning for the English judge. We are told that in English usage of the 1700's and earlier opinion had the primary meaning of "notion" or "persuasion of the mind without proof or certain knowledge." It carried an implication of lack of grounds, which is absent from our present-day term opinion in this country. We use the word as denoting a belief, inference, or conclusion, without suggesting it is well- or ill-founded.

> Charles T. McCormick, Handbook of the Law of Evidence 22 (E. Cleary ed., 2d ed. 1972)

OPINIONS, JUDICIAL. Writing a judicial opinion is a peculiar task—quite different in many ways from writing other types of discursive or persuasive prose. The primary difficulty lies in giving either a "yes" or a "no" answer to what is often an extremely complicated problem. The decision generally must be consistent with previous judicial decisions, and must at the same time conform to the judge's notions of what justice dictates. Often, and especially in difficult cases, the doctrine of stare decisis plays tug-of-war with conscientious fairness. The dilemma is especially acute inasmuch as some of the most complex problems of society and of individual human lives must be reduced to the simplest of dichotomies: yea or nay. Not all the uncertainties can be plumbed by the judge writing an opinion; the task is to justify one's determination, crude as the framework may be for minimizing the possibly substantial merits of the losing side.

Wigmore identified six shortcomings of judicial opinions: (1) undiscriminating citation of authority; (2) unfamiliarity with controlling precedents;

(3) mechanical treatment of judicial questions; (4) misconception of the doctrine of precedents; (5) overconsideration of points of law; and (6) certain deficiencies peculiar to one-judge opinions. 1 Wigmore, Evidence § 8, at 615–18 (3d ed. 1940). There are so many aspects of writing effective judicial opinions that no short treatment could pretend to cover even the primary ones. A few short observations may be helpful, however. The reader who needs more detailed guidance may read any number of articles, or the one serviceable book on the subject. (See LEGAL WRITING STYLE (D).) But, all in all, we must await production of a first-rate treatise on this subject.

A. Tense. It is generally best in judicial opinions to write in the present tense when referring to the parties or facts before the court that have continuing validity, or seem to from all that appears in the record. Thus, if a judge writes, "The defendants were citizens of Clarksville, Tennessee," the reader must wonder whether they have moved or died. What the judge here doubtless meant is that these persons were defendants, but now that the trial is over they are no longer. Use of the past tense in this way needlessly puzzles the reader, even though the author knows that the past tense is technically correct because the opinion is being written some time after the trial or sitting.

Less troublesome, but also to be avoided, is the mannerism of using the future tense, as in "The judgment will be affirmed." Such statements often appear toward the beginning of an opinion, so that at the end, the court may conclude, "The judgment will be, and hereby is, affirmed." This messing about with tenses is unnecessary. The writing judge should be direct: "We affirm the judgment below."

B. Judicial Humor. Drollery and judicial opinions almost invariably make an unhappy combination. "[T]he form of opinion which aims at humor from beginning to end is a perilous adventure, which can be justified only by success, and even then is likely to find its critics almost as many as its eulogists." Benjamin N. Cardozo, Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 472, 483 (1939). One of those critics of judicial humor was Justice George Rose Smith, formerly of the Arkansas Supreme Court, who observed, "Judicial humor is neither judicial nor humorous. A lawsuit is a serious matter to those concerned in it. For a judge to take advantage of his criticism-insulated, retaliation-proof position to display his wit is contemptible, like hitting a man when he's down." George R. Smith, A Primer of Opinion Writing, for Four New Judges, 21 Ark. L. Rev. 197, 210 (1967). Justice Smith cited an egregious example of attempted stream-of-consciousness humor: Hampton v. North Carolina Pulp Co., 49 F. Supp. 625 (E.D.N.C. 1943); it is one of the worst opinions that have come to my attention. For an example of failed poeticism and wasteful drivel, see U.S. v. Sproed, 628 F. Supp. 1234 (D. Or. 1986).

Lest we assume, however, that judicial writing should be cheerless and sober-sided, it is worth noting Cardozo's tempered judgment: "In all this I would not convey the thought that an opinion is the worse for being lightened by a smile. I am merely preaching caution." Law and Literature, 52 Harv. L. Rev. 472, 484 (1939).

C. Concurrences. Judges, and especially appellate judges, write not just for themselves, but for the entire court. In concurring opinions, of course, the writing usually becomes more individualistic:

> If a judge is occasionally possessed of an uncontrollable desire to express his personal views instead of having them continually absorbed in the compromise pronouncements of the court, he may gratify that urge by the writing of concurring or, if so disposed, even dissenting, opinions. But a concurring opinion must justify itself by furnishing a different reason for the court's decision, and even then should not be resorted to unless the writer of the majority opinion refuses to accept and incorporate the suggested additions or amendments. A concurring opinion which merely says the same thing in other language is not only valueless as a contribution to the science of the law but is somewhat of a reflection on the colleague to whom was assigned the duty of explaining the views . . . of the court.

oppress; repress. Oppress, which has connotations that are more negative, means "to subject (a person or a people) to inhumane or other unfair treatment; to persecute." Repress, a closely related word, means either: (1) "to keep under control"; or (2) "to reduce (persons) to a subordinate position."

oppression = (1) in criminal law, any harm, other than extortion, that a public officer corruptly causes to a person; or (2) in the law of contract, coercion to enter into an illegal contract—used as a basis for allowing a person to recover money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract. In sense (2), as G.H. Treitel notes, oppression is "used in a somewhat broad sense." The Law of Contract 437–38 (8th ed. 1991).

opt (in) (out) (for). Opt = to choose or decide. It is usually followed by for or to—e.g.: "Thiessen opted to receive the lump-sum payment." Nebraska Equal Opportunity Comm'n v. State Employees Retirement Sys., 471 N.W.2d 398, 400 (Neb. 1991)./ "By opting for a Pierringer-type release, Unigard obviously was interested in more protection than the covenant not to sue or the general release would provide." Unigard Ins. Co. v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 516 N.W.2d 762, 765 (Wis. Ct. App. 1994).

In the language of class actions, however, plaintiffs are said to have the choice of opting in or out of the class. E.g., "Some states instead provide opt-in provisions for these rights; for example, a corporation's shareholders will not have preemptive rights unless the articles of incorporation specifically provide for them." In fact, the phrase has been extended to the persons who opt in or out; in modern American legal JARGON, they are known as opt-ins or opt-outs.

optimum is the noun, optimal the adjective. The adjective should be used in adjectival senses where it idiomatically fits. E.g., "The optimum solution [read optimal solution] is an adjudication of the permission question." Cf. maximum.

opt in. See opt.

option; right of preemption; first option to buy; right of first refusal. These terms are usefully distinguished in the law of contract. An option is an offer that, specifying the amount of consideration, becomes a contract when the offeree (or optionee) accepts it. For example, if Beverly has a three-year option to buy Charlie's house for $200,000, she may exercise that option, and make the sales contract binding, at any time within that period.

A right of preemption is a potential buyer's contractual right to have the first opportunity to buy, at a specified price, if the seller chooses to sell. For example, if Beverly has a right of preemption on Charlie's house for five years at $200,000, Charlie can keep the house for five years (in which case Beverly's right expires); but if he wishes to sell during those five years, he must offer the house to Beverly for $200,000. Beverly, in turn, can either buy or refuse to buy; if she refuses, Charlie can sell to somebody else. Nonlawyers often call Beverly's right an option, but lawyers ought to be more fastidious in their use of language. Of course, the synonymous phrase, first option to buy, is perfectly apt and perhaps even more descriptive than right of preemption.

A right of first refusal is a potential buyer's contractual right to meet the terms of a third party's offer if the seller intends to accept that offer. For example, if three conditions are met—Beverly has a right of first refusal on the purchase of Charlie's house, Ted offers to buy the house for $300,000, and Charlie intends to accept Ted's offer—then Beverly can match Ted's offer and thereby trump it.

option, v.t. (= to grant or take an option on), dates from ca. 1926, but remains a VOGUE WORD. E.g., "Her first screenplay was optioned for a mere $300,000." It may be useful legal slang or JARGON, but it is best restricted to speech.

optionee; optioner. See optionor.

option-giver; option-holder. These terms are more comprehensible than optionor and optionee. E.g., "In the present context, an option may be defined as a right possessed by one person (the option-holder) to insist that another person (the option-giver) grant or transfer a specified interest in land." Peter Butt, Land Law 171 (2d ed. 1988).

option-holder. See option-giver.

optionor; optioner. The -or form is now prevalent. It has the advantage of being more strictly accurate as a correlative of optionee (= the grantee in an option contract), although option-giver, q.v., is clearer.

optometrist. See ophthalmologist.

opt out. See opt.

-OR, -ER. See -ER (A)

-OR, -OUR. All agent nouns but saviour (BrE) take -or in both the AmE and BrE (e.g., actor, investor). The distinction between AmE (-or) and BrE (-our) usage occurs in abstract nouns. Hence the British write behaviour, colour, flavour, and humour, whereas Americans write color, flavor, and humor. The following words, however, end in -or on both sides of the Atlantic: error, horror, languor, liquor, pallor, squalor, stupor, terror, torpor, and tremor. Glamour is the primary exception to the rule of -or in the AmE.

In BrE, nouns ending in -our change to -or before the suffixes -ation, -iferous; -ific, -ize, and -ous (e.g., coloration, honorific). But -our keeps the -u- before -able, -er, -ful, -ism, -ist, -ite, and -less (e.g., honourable, labourer, colourful).

or. A. And and. "Every use of 'and' or 'or' as a conjunction involves some risk of ambiguity." Maurice B. Kirk, Legal Drafting: The Ambiguity of "And" and "Or," 2 Texas Tech L. Rev. 235, 253 (1971) (emphasis in original). Thus, in the main text of Words and Phrases (1953)—excluding pocket parts—the word "and" takes up 61 pages of digested cases interpreting it in myriad ways, and the word "or" takes up another 84 pages of digested cases interpreting it in an equally broad array of senses. Virtually every book on drafting legal documents contains a section on the ambiguity of the two words.

Authorities agree that and has a several sense as well as a joint sense, and that or has an inclusive sense as well as an exclusive sense. Hence:

- The "several and": A and B, jointly or severally.
- The "joint and": A and B, jointly but not severally.
- The "inclusive or": A or B, or both.
- The "exclusive or": A or B, but not both.

See Scott J. Burnham, The Contract Drafting Guidebook 163 (1992). "The meaning of and is usually several . . . . The meaning of or is usually inclusive." Id. See and (B).

B. For or else. E.g., "[E]very clause in the contract is 'understood and agreed' or [read or else] it would not be written into it." Richard Wincor, Contracts in Plain English 29 (1976).

C. Beginning Sentences with. Like and and but, the word or is a perfectly appropriate word with which to begin a sentence—e.g.: "Thus a politically organized society may be under a patriarchal king, or, as so frequently in a Greek city-state, a tyrant, a more or less absolute ruler with no title to be king. Or it may be under an oligarchy, a caste derived from priestly heads of kin-groups." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 4–5 (1957).

D. Or/and. See and/or.

oral. See verbal & parol.

oral argument (AmE & BrE) = oral debate (BrE). In AmE, the phrase is ordinarily in or at oral argument, but on oral argument also appears, esp. in New York. E.g., "The disclosure proposed and described by Wallenstein on oral argument would go only to particulars as to the results of the committee's investigation and work . . . ." Auerbach v. Bennett, 393 N.E.2d 994, 1004 (N.Y. 1979). See debate.

oral contract; verbal contract. The former—the correct phrase—outnumbers the latter by more than ten to one in American judicial opinions. See verbal & parol (A).

oral deposition. See deposition (C). oral will; nuncupative will; sailor's will; soldier's will. The broadest term is oral will, of which there are two types, both obsolescent: nuncupative wills and soldiers' and sailors' wills.

Nuncupative will is an English adaptation of the LAW LATIN phrase testamentum nuncupativum (= an oral will). If nuncupative wills are valid in a given jurisdiction, the amount that may be conveyed in them is usually limited by statute. Customarily, the will must be made in the testator's last illness, and usually at home unless the testator falls ill elsewhere. Two competent witnesses are usually required.

Soldiers' and sailors' wills derive from ancient military and maritime custom; in England the privilege derives from statute. The soldier must be in military service, or the sailor at sea, and, in some jurisdictions, a single witness must be present. In Great Britain, the phrases soldier's will, mariner's will, and military testament are used.

Nuncupative is often used as broadly as oral, that is, to encompass soldiers' and sailors' wills—e.g.:

> A nuncupative will is not required to be in writing. It may be made by one who, at the time, is in actual military service in the field or doing duty on shipboard at sea, and in either case in actual contemplation, fear, or peril of death, or by one who, at the time, is in expectation of immediate death from an injury received the same day. It must be proved by two witnesses who were present at the making thereof, one of whom was asked by the testator, at the time, to bear witness that such was his will, or to that effect.
> Cal. Prob. Code § 54 (repealed).

The usual practice, however, is to use nuncupative only in reference to the second type of will mentioned in the statute just quoted—i.e., an oral will made in contemplation of imminent death from an injury recently incurred—to distinguish it from soldiers' and sailors' wills. Oral encompasses every one of these types.

orate. See perorate & BACK-FORMATIONS.

orchestrate, in nonmusical contexts, is a CLICHÉ and a VOGUE WORD. It is, however, arguably useful in indicating that an (apparently spontaneous) event was clandestinely arranged beforehand. Cf. choreograph.

ordain (= to establish by law; enact) has an archaic flavor in other than religious contexts <an ordained minister>. The word does not mean "to provide," as the author of the following sentence mistakenly thought: "Article 2106 ordains that [read Article 2106 provides that], if the affair for which the debt has been contracted in solido concerns only one of the co-obligors in solido, that one is liable for the whole debt." (La.)

ordain and establish. This DOUBLET has a fine pedigree: "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." U.S. Const. pmbl. In most modern contexts, establish alone suffices, ordain being archaic in all but its religious senses.

order = (1) a command or direction; (2) a judge's written direction; or (3) a written instrument (such as a check), made by one person and addressed to another, directing that other to pay money or deliver something to someone named in the instrument. In sense (2), a court's order may be either interlocutory (on some intermediate matter) or, more broadly, final (and thus dispositive of the entire case).

ordered, adjudged, and decreed. In many American jurisdictions, this wordy phrase routinely appears in court orders. The simple word ordered is generally much preferable—e.g.: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed [read ordered] that the Plaintiff take nothing by her suit." See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

orderee is an unnecessary NEOLOGISM that surely will not survive with the fittest words in the language—e.g.: "The formal requirements of Rule 34 are . . . a safeguard by means of which the orderees are insured adequate apprisal of the terms of the court's mandate to them." SEC v. Los Angeles Trust Deed & Mortgage Exch., 24 F.R.D. 460, 464 (S.D. Cal. 1959). [A possible revision: Rule 34 ensures that the ordered persons will be adequately apprised of the court's mandate.]/ "May [court orders] be ignored or disobeyed without sanction as here, creating a weakening of the court's authority through deliberate superimposition of the orderee's own judgment?" Lamons v. State, 335 S.E.2d 652, 656 (Ga. Ct. App. 1985) (Beasley, J., dissenting). [A possible revision: May court orders be ignored and disobeyed with impunity? If so, a person under court order can weaken the court's authority merely by ignoring the order.] See -EE (C).

order of licence. See parole.

Order of the Coif. This was the name, formerly, of the order of serjeants-at-law, the highest order of counsel at the English Bar. Through the mid-19th century, they had a monopoly over practice in the Court of Common Pleas. But when, by statute, that court was opened to the whole Bar in 1846, the Order began to wither. Nathaniel Lindley was the last serjeant to be appointed (1875) and to die (1921).

In the U.S. today, the origins of this order are not widely known among lawyers. But they all know that one must excel in law school to be elected to the Order of the Coif, an honorary legal fraternity composed of a select few law students with the highest grades. See coif.

ordinance; ordnance; ordonnance. Ordinance (= a municipal [i.e., city] law) is common in the AmE but rare in BrE, where by-law serves this purpose. In AmE, bylaw is generally used to mean "a corporate rule or regulation not included in the articles of incorporation." See bylaw.

Ordnance = military supplies; cannon; artillery. Ordonnance = the ordering of parts in a whole; arrangement.

ordinar(il)y prudent person. With compound modifiers, either two adjectives before a noun or an adverb and an adjective before a noun, one must look closely at the sense to determine whether the first word is properly an adjective or an adverb. One such problematic phrase in law is ordinar(il)y prudent person, familiar in discussions of torts. One sees both ordinary and ordinarily in the cases, but the latter is more logical, because ordinary modifies person, whereas ordinarily modifies the adjective prudent.

The intended meaning, of course, is person of ordinary prudence. We do not mean an ordinary person; we mean a person who is prudent to an ordinary degree. One problem is that ordinarily in one sense means "often, usually." And if we (incorrectly) give it that sense, we end up with a person who is ordinarily (but not always) prudent—i.e., one who sometimes may be given to imprudence. Because of that slight AMBIGUITY, one cannot be dogmatic in preferring ordinarily prudent person over ordinary prudent person. But it is preferable nevertheless—e.g.: "Ordinarily prudent persons . . . would not run at a rate of 20 to 25 miles per hour onto such a crossing ordinary law. In the U.S.—though not in England—this phrase is contrasted with organic or constitutional law. Ordinary law consists primarily of regular statutes, which may prove unconstitutional; organic law, or constitutional law (as it is more generally called), is superordinate and relatively fixed in its words, if not in its interpretation. Cf. organic law.

On the variant phrase, ordinarily prudent man, see SEXISM (B).

Ordinary, Lord of Appeal in. See Lord of Appeal in Ordinary.

ordnance; ordonnance. See ordinance.

ore tenus = by word of mouth. Either oral or orally is generally preferred to this term, which in most contexts ought to be considered a FORBIDDEN WORD. E.g., "Judge Wyzanski has referred to the 'enormous, nearly cancerous, growth of exhibits, depositions, and ore tenus [read oral] testimony' in antitrust cases . . . ." John R. Allison, Arbitration Agreements and Antitrust Claims, 64 N.C.L. Rev. 219, 247 (1986) (quoting U.S. v. Grinnell Corp., 236 F. Supp. 244, 247 (D.R.I. 1964)).// "Following an ore tenus proceeding, the trial court determined that the employee's injury did not 'arise out of and in the course of his employment' . . . ." Strickland v. Marshall Constr. & Repair, Inc., 553 So. 2d 591, 592 (Ala. Ct. Civ. App. 1988).

The phrase ore tenus rule now serves, in AmE, as the name for the presumption that a trial court's findings of fact are correct and should not be disturbed on appeal unless clearly wrong or unjust. The phrase seems to have come about through the realization that live witnesses, testifying orally, may make a very different impression from that which their words on paper make. E.g., "[A]s the evidence before the trial court was by stipulation of the parties and no testimony was taken orally, the ore tenus rule of review is not applicable to this appeal." Kessler v. Stough, 361 So. 2d 1048, 1049 (Ala. 1978). In this phrase alone is ore tenus arguably useful; even so, however, it is JARGON.

organic law = (in a civil-law jurisdiction such as Louisiana) decision(al) law. E.g., "Louisiana organic law allows an individual to contract concerning liability for negligence in all cases where such a contract is not contrary to public policy." See decision(al) law.

But the phrase has an entirely different sense in the common-law tradition: Bouvier defined organic law as "the fundamental law or constitution of a state or nation" and used the phrase in that sense. For example, in defining the "United States of America," Bouvier stated: "the republic whose organic law is the constitution adopted by the people of the thirteen states which declared their independence of the Government of Great Britain on the fourth day of July, 1776." The phrase is still used in this sense: "[A]t the time when our organic laws were adopted, criminal trials both here and in England had long been presumptively open." Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 569 (1980). Cf. ordinary law.

Confusingly, the phrase organic statute is used of a legislative act establishing an administrative agency.

organization. Many legal writers use this as a general term that includes companies, partnerships, foundations, nationalized industries, government departments, and the like. Cf. firm.

orient; orientate. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of orient, which means "to get one's bearings or sense of direction." Sadly, the longer variant (a BACK-FORMATION from orientation) seems esp. common in BrE: "Not everyone, even in market-orientated [read market-oriented] America, is wholly happy with what is happening." Sunday Times, 11 Dec. 1988, at H1. Cf. disorient(ate).

original evidence. See direct evidence.

original instance. See first instance.

original intent, doctrine of; strict constructionism. These doctrines, which apply to constitutional and statutory constructions, differ significantly. The doctrine of original intent signifies that the interpreter tries to recapture the mental state of the enactors or drafters who were responsible for the Constitution, legislation, or other document. Strict constructionism—a more general term—signifies that one interprets the Constitution, legislation, or a document narrowly so as to make as little change in the law as possible. Both doctrines are founded on notions of judicial conservatism. Original intent is a controversial doctrine often founded also on conservative political notions. See strict construction.

original jurisdiction; primary jurisdiction. The first phrase, meaning "jurisdiction to take cognizance of a case at the outset, to try it, and to decide the issues," is usually contrasted with appellate jurisdiction. In the U.S., primary jurisdiction is original jurisdiction that lies in an administrative agency.

orphan. Although, in the popular mind, orphan refers to a child whose mother and father are both dead, courts have sometimes interpreted the word differently. Depending on the facts at hand, orphan may be held to include a child who has lost only one parent. See Jackman v. Nelson, 17 N.E. 529, 530 (Mass. 1888). But the courts seem uniformly to have included in their definition of orphan the idea that the person so described be a minor.

orphanhood; orphancy; orphandom. The first is the usual word, the other two being NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

orphan's court. In some American states today—such as Delaware, Maryland, and Pennsylvania—this phrase denotes a probate court. (The orphan's courts originated in England but have long since become defunct there.) Generally speaking, the jurisdiction of an orphan's court is not limited to orphans or even to minors—a good reason, perhaps, to jettison the phrase in the few places where it still occurs.

Although the plural possessive form orphans' court might have made better sense, the singular possessive orphan's has long been standard. The form without an apostrophe is poor—e.g.: "At this point Judge Terzian had to point out rather sadly to Mrs. MacFarlane that even though she was chief judge of the probate court—called orphans court [read orphan's court] in Maryland—she couldn't do any more . . . ." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 215 (1970).

orse. is the abbreviated form of otherwise, q.v. "In his judgment, Sir Jocelyn Simon referred to some of the earlier decisions, including H. v. H. and the more recent decision of Scarman J. in Buckland v. Buckland (orse. Camilleri)." (Eng.)

OSP; obiit sine prole. The Latin phrase means "he died without issue"; the translation suffices if we are to write out a phrase. The abbreviation may sometimes be justified, if the targeted readers are certain to understand its import.

As with many other LATINISMS, American lawyers often get it wrong. Black's (5th ed.), for example, defines obit sine prole in the past tense, when in fact it is present tense. The past-tense form is obiit.

ostensible authority. See apparent authority.

ostensively for ostensibly (= from all that appears) is a solecism. E.g., "Although deposit insurance coverage is a function that ostensively [read ostensibly] could be handled by private enterprise, the United States also wanted to and did direct the FDIC to protect the public interest . . . ." Rauscher Pierce Refsnes, Inc. v. FDIC, 789 F.2d 313, 315 (5th Cir. 1986).

ostrich defense is a colloquialism that disparages a criminal defendant's claim not to have known of the criminal activities of his or her associates. E.g., "Whether or not Ramirez's implicit ostrich defense was credible is not for this court to determine . . . ." State v. Amezola, 741 P.2d 1024, 1033 (Wash. Ct. App. 1987) (Swanson, J., dissenting)./ "Instead, [the appellees] have simply ignored [the estoppel issue] and adopted the ostrich defense in addition to their attempted use of the Archimedean Lever." Capitol Fish Co. v. Tanner, 384 S.E.2d 394, 396 (Ga. Ct. App. 1989) (Deen, P.J., concurring).

other. See otherwise (A).

other good and valuable consideration. See and other good and valuable consideration.

otherwise. A. And other. Most properly, other is the adjective, otherwise the adverb—e.g.: "CPL 2.25B has no cognizable impact, substantial or otherwise [read or other; better: or not], on any right or interest of Kast."/ "An interested person may appear before an agency in a proceeding, whether interlocutory, summary, or otherwise [read or other; better: or of some other kind], or in connection with an agency function." Follett believed that "to pronounce this otherwise inadmissible would be to fly in the face of a strongly established usage. But usage, which can allow on sufferance, cannot prevent it from being rejected by more exact writers." Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 242–43 (1966).

B. Otherwise than. This phrase is often misused for other than. Driedger is wrong to characterize otherwise than generally as "useful to specify one predicate modifier and expressly exclude all others." Elmer A. Driedger, The Composition of Legislation 86 (1957). Its legitimate uses are few.

In the sentences that follow, other is called for. "Transactions by dealers subject to Section 16 are exempted if the transactions are part of ordinary trading activities in the company's securities and incident to the dealer's establishment and maintenance of a primary or secondary market, otherwise than [read other than] on a national securities exchange or an exempt exchange."/ "What we must ensure in the welfare state, otherwise than [read other than] the welfare of almost half the nation, is the virtual certainty that only the members of the government, and those who implement their orders, shall be reputed intelligent." (Eng.)

C. Other . . . other than. A fairly common mistake is to repeat other in the phrase other than. E.g., "Payment may be made pursuant to a differential based on any other factor other than sex." Either one of the *other*s should be dropped.

D. Otherwise expressed. This is cumbersome and jarring for "in other words." E.g., "Otherwise expressed, the law is that . . . ." See to put it another way.

E. As a Conjunction. This slipshod usage occurs primarily in BrE—e.g.: "If a promise is not made under seal, it must be supported by 'consideration' (that is, something given or undertaken in return for the promise), otherwise no contract will arise . . . ." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 9 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950)./ "[I]t is essential that the promises themselves should be regarded as consideration for each other, otherwise there could be no such thing as a contract consisting of mutual promises at all." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 96 (3d ed. 1981). In each sentence, a semicolon should precede otherwise. For further elucidation of this common error, see RUN-ON SENTENCES otiose /oh-shee-ohs/ = unneeded; not useful. The word is used more by lawyers than by other writers. E.g., "The question whether the assignees of the reversion were bound would have been wholly otiose."/ "The words of the application for appointment are not to be struck out as being merely otiose; they are specific words." (Eng.)/ "If Mr Wiggins's argument is correct, the words 'as though the driver were in the hirer's direct employ' are otiose, since there is no need to import the notion of a vicarious responsibility in a matter in which the hirer has by his own direction caused the damage." (Eng.) Cf. nugatory.

-OUR. See -OR.

ought. A. Infinitive Following. Ought should always be followed by an infinitive, whether the phrase is ought to or ought not to—e.g.: "It was argued that theaters that patronized the union ought not to be patronized by the public."/ "Nor can I see how it can possibly be proved that we ought not to feel that way." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 104 (1961)./ "Ought it to be made punishable when adultery is not?" Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 1 (1968).

As some type of sham badge of scholasticism, American law professors tend to omit the particle to when the expression is in the negative or interrogative. But there is no warrant for this usage: "What ought the lawyers do to [read to do to] preclude litigation?"/ "A judge ought not cease [read ought not to cease] to be a citizen merely because he becomes a judge."/ "We ought not [read ought not to] impute to others instincts contrary to our own."

A few legal writers extend this precious oddity beyond negatives and interrogatives—e.g.: "We extend our efforts, as we ought [read ought to], toward effectuating the testator's intentions."/ "[N]either need the laws be interpreted so as to protect those who ought [read ought to] know better from their own indolence." Hamel v. Prudential Ins. Co., 640 F. Supp. 103, 105 (D. Mass. 1986).

B. And should. Ought should be reserved for expressions of necessity, duty, or obligation; should, the weaker word, expresses mere appropriateness, suitability, or fittingness.

our federalism is an odd name for a legal doctrine, but in AmE this phrase denotes the controversial doctrine "that federal courts must refrain from hearing constitutional challenges to state action under certain circumstances in which federal action is regarded as an improper intrusion on the right of a state to enforce its laws in its own courts." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 320 (4th ed. 1983). The leading case on this point is Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971). Perhaps because of its strange appearance—with the possessive first-person pronoun—the phrase is sometimes written Our Federalism, with initial capitals. See federalism.

ourself; theirself. Ourself is technically ill-formed, inasmuch as our is plural and self is singular. But it is established in the editorial or royal style. Theirself is indefensible, however.

oust = (1) to eject, dispossess, or disseise (construed with of); or (2) to exclude, bar, or take away (construed with from or of). Hence, idiomatically speaking, one may either oust a court of jurisdiction or oust jurisdiction from a court. Today the former expression is more common—e.g.: "A contract that makes a certain person a final arbiter of all disputes that may arise under it cannot oust the court of jurisdiction." But the alternative wording has persisted—e.g.: "The section obviously envisages action in a court on a cause of action and does not oust the court's jurisdiction of the action . . . ." The Anaconda v. American Sugar Ref. Co., 322 U.S. 42, 44 (1944). See OBJECT-SHUFFLING.

In the language of nonlawyers, oust is generally confined to figurative uses. But lawyers continue to use the word in literal, concrete senses—e.g.: "[C]ourts have treated the tenant-shareholder as an owner or landlord, rather than a tenant, for the purpose of permitting him to oust a preceding tenant under provisions permitting such action by a landlord." 1 American Law of Property § 3.10, at 201 (A.J. Casner ed. 1952).

ouster. See ejectment.

out. A. As an Unnecessary Particle in Phrasal Verbs. Out commonly appears superfluously in phrases such as distribute out, cancel out, calculate out, segregate out, and separate out. (Colloquially, it occurs in lose out, test out, and try out.) E.g., "Judge Critz with his energy to study out [read study or study thoroughly] a legal question did much to promote the orderly development of law in this state." See PHRASAL VERBS & PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

But sometimes out is necessary, as here: "Generally speaking, a manufacturer can design out danger only on the basis of the technology reasonably available at the time the design was made." The phrase design out (= to rid of [an undesirable characteristic]) is common in patent and products-liability contexts.

B. As a Noun. This usage <counsel was looking for an out> is a casualism.

outcomes, a formerly uncommon plural form, has all the flavor of voguish GOBBLEDYGOOK. E.g., "The central issue, which began in discipline research but has direct corollaries for policy research, concerns the effects of variations in school programs on schooling outcomes." Cf. PLURALS (B).

outer bar; utter bar. The former is the more usual form of this English phrase meaning "junior barristers, collectively, who sit outside the bar of the court, as opposed to Queen's Counsel, who sit within it" (CDL). Though an American should perhaps hesitate to tell English lawyers which of the two terms to use, outer bar at least makes literal sense to any reader or listener. Cf. inner bar.

Utter bar, an older form, is still occasionally used. When students are "called to the Bar" they are called to the degree of the Utter Bar and become Utter Barristers.

outlawry = (1) the action of putting a person out of the protection of the law; or, more usually, (2) defiance of the law. It is not synonymous with proscription—i.e., as a noun corresponding to the verb to outlaw—though here it is erroneously used in that sense: "Wright came to believe that the proponents of the outlawry [read proscription] of war did not expect immediate effects from the Pact but rather were thinking in terms of generations." The context makes it clear that renunciation of war is the subject of discussion (hence the outlawing of war); outlawry does not work, although one might feebly argue that war here is being personified. See ANTHROPOMORPHISM.

out-of-court. See extrajudicial (A).

out of time. Generally, this phrase refers to persons and means "having no more time available" <you're out of time>. In law, however, the phrase sometimes refers to things other than persons and means "untimely" <the motion was ruled to be out of time>. E.g., "The question was whether s. 8(1) of the Foreign Judgements (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933 applied in favour of the defendant to a claim for money due on bills of exchange bought in England against a German company in whose favour a judgment had been given by a German court on an identical claim because, by German, unlike English law, it was out of time." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 137 (1976).

outside of is always inferior to outside—e.g.: "History of a system of law is largely a history of borrowings of legal materials from other legal systems and of assimilation of materials from outside of [read outside] the law." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 94 (1938). Cf. off of.

over. A. Special Legal Uses. In the law of property, particularly of vested and contingent interests, over when used after a noun denotes that the interest named, whether vested or contingent, is preceded by some other possessory interest. For example, a limitation over includes a second estate in the same property to be enjoyed after the first estate granted expires. E.g., "A conveyance by a grantor with a limitation over to his heirs was said to be governed by the doctrine of worthier title, under which a limitation over to a grantor's heirs resulted in an automatic reversion in the grantor and nullified the limitation over."

A gift over is one that follows another's life estate or fee simple determinable. E.g., "A few courts have taken the position that a provision for the forfeiture of a bequest upon contest is in terrorem and will not be enforced unless there is a provision for a gift over in case forfeiture occurs."/ "Since the sisters all predeceased George, the defendants assert that the alternative gifts over failed."

Remainder over is one type of gift over. Although remainder itself connotes a preceding estate, the phrase remainder over is a common one. E.g., "When a life estate with the remainder over is created in property, especially personal property of the nature that may be transferred or appropriated, a risk exists that the remainderman might not receive the property the testator intended he should have."/ "The chancellor found the effect of the deed was to convey a life estate to the husband's daughter, with a contingent remainder over to the wife's children." The plural form is remainders over: "She gave her husband a life estate in the family plate belonging to her, with remainders over after his decease."

B. For more than. This casualism is to be avoided in formal writing. E.g., "In Coburn, a class action was certified on behalf of the over [read more than] 200 victims of the Beverly Hills Supper Club fire."/ "The burden of proof is on the party claiming trademark abandonment, but when a prima facie case of abandonment exists because of nonuse of the mark for over [read more than] two consecutive years, the owner of the mark has the burden to demonstrate that circumstances do not justify the inference of intent not to resume use."/ "The auditorium was filled to capacity with over [read more than] eight hundred persons present." Cf. above (A) & more than.

C. In pay over. See pay over.

D. Over- as a Combining Form. See overly.

E. Over . . . under. See VERBAL AWARENESS

overall is invariably a VOGUE WORD, often a lame SENTENCE ADVERB. E.g., "Overall, the argument was quite compelling."/ "Conclusory findings as to each of the Zimmer criteria are no more helpful than an overall conclusory finding of dilution."/ "The overall effect of the Gibbs decision has been to broaden pendent jurisdiction." All three quoted sentences would read better without overall.

overarching. The -ch- is not pronounced like a -k-.

overbreadth; vagueness. In American law, these terms are usefully distinguished. The vagueness doctrine, based on due process, requires that a penal statute state explicitly and definitely what acts are prohibited, so as to preclude the lack of fair warning and arbitrary enforcement. Overbreadth, by contrast, concerns the first amendment and relates to civil as well as criminal law. A statute is overbroad if it seemingly prohibits not only acts that it may legitimately forbid but also acts protected by First Amendment freedoms.

overbroad. See overbreadth & overly.

overflown is the correct past participle for overfly, q.v., but not for overflow, which properly makes overflowed.

overfly (= to fly over in an airplane) is uncommon except in legal usage and pilots' jargon. Following are examples from legal writing: "No prescriptive easement to overfly plaintiff's land was acquired."/ "During these five years plaintiffs did not actually use the overflown land; thus the airplanes harmed no one." See aviate.

overlook; oversee. The first is sometimes misused for the second. To overlook is to neglect or disregard. To oversee is to supervise or superintend. Look over is also differentiated from overlook; it means "to examine."

overly. Although this word is old, dating from about the 12th century, it is best avoided. Overly is almost always unnecessary because over- may be prefixed at will: overbroad, overrefined, overoptimistic, overripe, etc.; when it is not unnecessary, it is merely ugly. Some usage authorities consider overly semiliterate, although the editors of the Merriam-Webster dictionaries have used it in a number of definitions. Certainly this adverb should be avoided whenever possible, though admittedly over- as a prefix is sometimes ill-sounding. Yet it usually serves well—e.g.: "It assists the legislature to avoid cumbersome and overelaborate wording." (Eng.) When over- is awkward or ugly-sounding, one might have recourse to too.

Another possible substitute is unduly <an unduly lax standard>. E.g., "In our own country, the grand jury system has been looked upon as inflexible and overly [read unduly] formal." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 109–10 (1963)./ "We are not scientists—not even social scientists—nor were meant to be. Let us not be overly [read unduly] depressed at that not altogether depressing thought." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 4 (1974).

In any event, one should always be consistent within a piece of writing: In one U.S. Supreme Court opinion, we find, in successive paragraphs: "The Supreme Court affirmed, rejecting the contention that the statute violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments as being vague and overbroad. . . . It was held that a person could attack a statute as being overly broad." (Overbroad is always preferable to overly broad.)

doctrine [read as an overtechnical doctrine or as too technical a doctrine]."/ "The loss must be foreseeable when the contract is entered into; it cannot be overly [read unduly] speculative."/ "Courts have been eager to prevent direct interference without forcing one tribunal to be overly cautious [read overcautious] about the possibility that a prior suit in another forum may involve the property." See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (D).

OVERPARTICULARIZATION. This word describes, better than any other, the besetting sin of practicing lawyers' prose. One judge, satirizing the overparticularized style, deduces that lawyers work on the following principles (among others): "[E]very sentence should begin with a date, or at least have a date somewhere in it. No attempt should be made to explain the facts in relative time, such as several months before or several days after. Dates are important, even if they have nothing to do with any issue in the case. . . . Please do not try to limit the factual summary to subjects material to the issues in the case, since the Court's curiosity about irrelevancies is unbounded." Nathan L. Hecht, Extra-Special Secrets of Appellate Brief Writing, 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 27, 29 (1992).

Hence, the wise admonition of Judge Thomas Gibbs Gee, whose formulation gave this sin its name: "No overparticularization, which can throw your reader off by causing him to try to keep track of things that do not matter. For example—do not write 'On April 1, 1990' unless the day is significant. Instead, write 'Last spring.'" A Few of Wisdom's Idiosyncrasies and a Few of Ignorance's: A Judicial Style Sheet, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 55, 57 (1990).

To illustrate the contrast between an overparticularized style and a more pointed style, consider these alternative versions of the opening paragraph in an appellate brief:

1. This is an appeal by Plaintiff, Trenton Medical Center, under section 19 of the Administrative Procedure and Texas Register Act, Article 6252-13a, V.T.C.S., from an order of the Texas Health Facilities Commission granting a Certificate of Need to Charter Fenton, Inc., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Acland Medical Corporation for Fenton Hospital, Houston, Texas. On December 10, 1984, the Commission accepted and dated the application of Fenton for a Certificate of Need to construct, equip and operate an 80-bed psychiatric and addictive disease facility containing 43,410 square feet to be located in northwest Houston. Fenton originally proposed 60 psychiatric and 20 addictive disease beds but later amended its application to 64 psychiatric and 16 addictive disease beds. Plaintiff filed a Notice of Intent to become a party to the application of Fenton which request was accepted by the Commission on January 11, 1985. Defendants, Post and Hospital Group, also filed and were accepted as parties to the application of Fenton.
2. This case involves contradictory decisions by the Texas Health Facilities Commission concerning three applications to build new 80-bed psychiatric hospitals in Houston.

   The hearing officer who heard all the evidence found a "proven need for two of the three" new hospitals. The Commission voted 3–0 to adopt her report but voted 2–1 to deny as "unnecessary" one of the two hospitals she recommended.

   Neither the Commission majority's stated findings of fact nor substantial record evidence supports this illogical result. The real reason for the majority's action arbitrarily violated the Commission's own rules of procedure. The result, if not rejected, would prevent elderly psychiatric patients in a 21-county area from receiving care that neither the newly approved hospital nor any existing hospital will provide.

The second version contains none of the clutter that plagues the first. Instead of worrying about the number of beds and the number of square feet—not to mention Article 6252-13a—the writer of the second version focuses immediately on the true issues in the case and on the human drama that gave rise to the dispute.

The sad fact is that, although virtually every lawyer and judge who examines the two will pronounce the second version far superior, every one of them hailing from the U.S. will also confess that the first is conventional and the second unusual. See OBSCURITY (A) overreach = (1) to circumvent, outwit, or get the better of by cunning or artifice; (2) to defeat one's object by going too far; or (3) in BrE, to replace (an interest in land) with a direct right to money. Sense (1) often applies in legal contexts—e.g.: "If, from a consideration of all the facts concerning the situation of the parties at the time the contract was made, the trial court concludes that the intended wife was not overreached, the contract should be sustained."

Most American lawyers would likely be puzzled by sense (3)—e.g.: "Any equitable interest . . . may be 'overreached'; that is, transferred from one form of capital to another as the trustees, having the legal estate, may decide." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 401 (1966).

overrule; overturn; reverse; set aside; vacate. Overrule is often employed in reference to procedural points throughout a trial, as in evidence <"Objection!" "Overruled.">. Overrule also denotes what a superior court does to a precedent that it expressly decides should no longer be controlling law, whether that precedent is a lower court's or its own.

Overturn is somewhat broader: it describes any judicial reasoning, including express overruling, by which a court partly or completely abolishes an earlier rule of law. Whereas overruling and overturning are both ordinarily abrupt, one-time acts, overturning may also (in its broadest use) indicate a long-term process by which courts gradually whittle away the authority of a precedent.

Reverse, by contrast, is much narrower than either overrule or overturn: it describes an appellate court's change to the opposite result from that by the lower court in a given case.

Set aside and vacate are synonymously used to denote an appellate court's wiping clean the judgment slate. The effect is to nullify the previous decision, usually of a lower court, but not necessarily to dictate a contrary result in further proceedings. See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT & set aside (B). overrulement, an unlikely and unsightly American NEOLOGISM, was coined apparently because of a perceived need for a noun corresponding to the verb to overrule. A better phrasing is invariably possible if one merely uncovers the BURIED VERB—e.g.: "[T]he statute in such a case expressly allows a discretionary appeal on the overrulement of a demurrer [read when a demurrer is overruled]." State ex. rel. Southerland v. Town of Greeneville, 297 S.W.2d 68, 71 (Tenn. 1956)./ "[T]here are at least two reasons why this Court should reverse the trial court's order for a new trial in this case, even without overrulement of [read overruling] Javis." Snow v. Freeman, 315 N.W.2d 125, 126 (Mich. 1982) (Ryan, J., dissenting). Cf. overthrowal.

oversight = (1) an unintentional error; or (2) intentional and watchful supervision. For sense (2), oversight is an unfortunate choice of word: supervision is preferable. Indeed, administrative oversight sounds less like a responsibility than like a bureaucratic botch. See overlook.

OVERSTATEMENT. Such words as clearly, patently, obviously, and indisputably are generally rightly seen as weakening rather than strengthening the statements they preface. They have been debased. Some legal scholars have noted that when a writer begins a sentence with one of these words, he or she is likely to be leading up to something questionable. See clearly.

Unconscious overstatement is also a problem in legal discourse. It is never good to overstate one's case, even in minor unconscious ways, for the writing will thereby lose credibility. Good writers remain wary of injudicious exaggeration. Perhaps the most common pitfalls involve comparisons, relative evaluations, and missing qualifications:

- "More black students are presently enrolled at the University of Texas Law School than have attended the school in all its history [read than have attended the school in previous years cumulatively, or than have, all told, been heretofore admitted, or in all its history up to three years ago]."
- "The approach used in the United States [read in the judicial system of the United States] to achieve information input [q.v.] and accurate output is mainly adversarial in nature."
- "In 1971, Congress enacted two important statutes—the Federal Election Campaign Fund Act and the Federal Election Campaign Act—both designed to reduce the corrupting influence of money on the political process." (No doubt the writer intended to say that 1971 saw the enactment of two major statutes designed to reduce financial corruption in campaigns; what the writer has said, however, is that 1971 saw the enactment of two major statutes, which, incidentally, had to do with reducing . . . . The problem is most easily identifiable if one reads the sentence without the names of the statutes set off by long dashes. The root of the problem is both, which makes the clause it introduces nonrestrictive rather than restrictive. The unconscious misstatement is eliminated when we omit both.)

Shoddy overstatement occurs frequently in popular journalism: "Perhaps Senator Kennedy is at his best with those who count most in the world—his family." Though one might get the impression from various catchpenny tabloids that the Kennedy family does comprise "those who count most in the world," this is not what the writer intended to convey. [Read who for him count most in the world or who count most in the world to him.] See ILLOGIC (A).

overt act is sometimes used in criminal-law contexts, particulary in treason, as an equivalent of actus reus or corpus delicti. The phrase overt act, as opposed to the synonymous phrases, emphasizes the idea that the act is "open," and thus perceptible to anyone who is there to observe it. But no one need be there to perceive it: "For legal purposes an act done in complete secrecy is an overt act or actus reus if later it can be proved against the defendant (as if he confesses to it)." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 32 (1978).

Because overt act is more widely comprehensible than either of the LATINISMS just mentioned, writers on the criminal law might achieve greater clarity if they uniformly adopted it. See actus reus* & corpus delicti.

overthrow is a synonym of overturn, but it is more picturesque—e.g.: "Tax laws were queried and sometimes overthrown on the ground that the state had no 'jurisdiction to tax' the source in question . . ." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 152–53 (1960).

overthrowal, like overrulement (q.v.), is a NEOLOGISM that is neither recorded in most English-language dictionaries nor needed as part of the legal vocabulary. The noun overthrow or the participle overthrowing will serve in virtually any context in which one might be tempted to use overthrowal—e.g.: "It is entirely clear that what was done herein . . . is not an overthrowal [read overthrow or overthrowing] of the state assessment and levy upon discernible grounds of illegality." In re Gould Mfg. Co., 11 F. Supp. 644, 651 (E.D. Wis. 1935)./ "Overthrowal of [read Overthrowing] the verdict is unwarrantable." Sears v. Mid-City Motors, Inc., 136 N.W.2d 428, 431 (Neb. 1965).

overturn. See overrule.

OVERWRITING. See PURPLE PROSE.

owing, adj.; owed. Although owing in the sense of owed is an old and established usage, the more logical course is simply to write owed where one means owed. The active participle may sometimes cause ambiguities or mislead the reader, if only for a second. E.g., "In the present case, we must consider whether to recognize a new liability owing from [read owed by] parents to their children for negligent supervision."/ "This was a claim for the sum of £1108 alleged to be owing [read owed] by the defendant to the plaintiff under a contract alleged to have been made between the plaintiff and the defendant for the construction of concrete foundation work." (Aus.)/ "No claim was filed in the estate by the mortgagee of the real property, although a balance of approximately $5,000 was still owing [read owed]."/ "A promise will normally be implied from an unqualified acknowledgment that the debt is owing [read owed], or from a part payment of the debt." See PASSIVE VOICE (B).

owing to is an acceptable dangling modifier now primarily confined to BrE—e.g.: "No doubt until the time of Lord Nottingham the application of precedents was uncertain, owing largely to the scarcity of reliable reports . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 380 (7th ed. 1964). See DANGLERS (D). Cf. due to.

own, in the sense "to admit," is now chiefly confined, in AmE, to the PHRASAL VERB own up to. But Learned Hand and several other accomplished legal writers have showed fondness for the one-word verb—e.g.: "[I]t must be owned that the law upon the subject is not free from doubt." Schmidt v. U.S., 177 F.2d 450, 451 (2d Cir. 1949) (per L. Hand, J.). ownership (= title) implies the right of control over an object, quite apart from any actual or constructive control. The word has both a physical sense (e.g., ownership of a house) and a figurative sense (e.g., ownership of a copyright). See possession (B).

The word ownership is subject to nearly the same doubleness of meaning as property (q.v.): "While it is usual to speak of ownership of land, what one owns is properly not the land, but rather the rights of possession and approximately unlimited use, present or future. In other words, one owns not the land, but rather an estate in the land. This is, in some degree, true of any material thing. One owns not the thing, but the right of possession and enjoyment of the thing." 1 H.T. Tiffany, The Law of Real Property § 2, at 4 (B. Jones ed., 3d ed. 1939).

OXYMORONS are immediate contradictions in terms, as in the word bittersweet. Any number of relative oxymorons exist in legal parlance, such as ordered liberty, equitable servitude (servitude in equity), all deliberate speed (from the U.S. desegregation cases), substantive due process (substantive process?), involuntary bailee (not actually a bailee at all), attractive nuisance, innocent fraud, intentional negligence, compelled consent, and premeditative afterthought. One criminal-law writer tried to invent the phrase partial absolute liability, which (understandably) did not take root. See Gerhard O.W. Mueller, On Common Law Mens Rea, 42 Minn. L. Rev. 1043, 1068 (1958). Cf. consideration (H), unearned income, contract of record, unenforceable contract, unknown suspect & void contract.

Nonlegal examples are more ostensibly contradictory—e.g.: "The Government is advancing backwards toward the regulation of share dealing."/ "They have increasingly less time." See suicide victim.

oyer and terminer (lit., "to hear and determine") is a phrase still sometimes encountered in modern legal writing. At common law, the commissioners of oyer and terminer heard criminal cases. In some American states, the phrase courts of oyer and terminer formerly denoted the higher criminal courts. (Delaware, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania had such courts through the mid-20th century.) The pure LAW FRENCH form—oyer et terminer—is less frequently seen.

When Lord Eldon was Lord Chancellor, from 1801 to 1827, the Chancery was so hypertechnical and slow that it became known as a court of "oyer sans terminer." See J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 130 (3d ed. 1990).

oyez, oyez, oyez. This is the cry heard in court to call the courtroom to order when a session begins. The word oyez was the LAW FRENCH equivalent of hear ye, q.v., in the Middle Ages. The pronunciation was first /oh-yets/, later /oh-yes/ or /oh-yez/. Hence in Anglo-American courts the word has traditionally been pronounced "oh yes" (the pronunciation given in the OED). Sometimes today oyez is given the Frenchified pronunciation /oh-yay/. For Blackstone's view on pronouncing this word, see countez.

It was no doubt this triplet incantation to which Clarence Darrow alluded when he wrote, "When court opens, the bailiff intones some voodoo singsong words in an ominous voice that carries fear and respect at the opening of the rite." "Attorney for the Defense," in Verdicts Out of Court 313, 314 (1963). The incantation and surrounding pomp typical of many appellate courts is as follows: "At precisely 1:00 p.m. the marshal announced, 'The Honorable, the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! All persons having business before the Honorable, the Supreme Court of the United States, are admonished to draw near and give their attention, for the Court is now sitting. God save the United States and this Honorable Court.'" Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 202–03 (1988).

Oyes, a variant spelling, is not now widely current.

pace /pay-see/ or /pah-chay/ [L. "with peace to"] = with all due respect to. This term is used most often when the writer expresses a contrary position—e.g.: "It is true, pace Savigny, that the reason and utility on which such customs rest often arise from purely local conditions . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 98 (7th ed. 1964).

pacifist; pacificist. Pacifist is the established form. Etymologists formerly argued that pacificist is the better-formed word, but it is almost never seen.

pact. See treaty.

paction = (1) the act of making a bargain or pact; or (2) the pact so made. In sense (2), the word is merely a NEEDLESS VARIANT of pact or agreement or bargain. In sense (1) the word is useful, but rare.

paid over. See pay over.

pain of, on. The phrase on pain of death was once common in law to express a prohibition the violation of which would result in punishment by execution. The phrase has passed into lay contexts, in which it is ordinarily facetious. But it remains as a shortened phrase on pain of in legal usage. In this phrase, pain means "suffering or loss inflicted for a crime or offense; a punishment ranging from death to a small fine." E.g., "Is it reasonable to require prison employees to have foreseen, on pain of section 1983 damage liability, the future of prisoners' rights to the degree evolved under Ruiz?"/ "According to the principles of scientific jurisprudence, a rule [that] people are called upon to obey, on pain of some disagreeable consequence if they fail, ought first to be clearly and plainly stated . . . ." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 23 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). See LOAN TRANSLATIONS.

pair is incorrect as a plural form in sentences such as "He bought two pair [read pairs] of shoes."

On the question whether a phrase such as pair of shoes, as a subject, takes a singular or a plural verb, see SYNESIS.

pais (lit., "country") = the district or vicinage where the accused lives or where a crime was committed. A remnant of LAW FRENCH (fr. pays), this word sometimes signifies, in a transferred sense, the jury drawn from the district. Hence a conclusion to the country (a LOAN TRANSLATION) is a jury request and a trial per pais is a jury trial. See in pais.

pale, beyond the. This phrase, which has passed into lay parlance in the sense "bizarre; outside the bounds of civilized behavior," derives from the legal sense of pale from English history ("a district or territory within determined bounds, or subject to a particular jurisdiction"). In medieval Ireland, the district around Dublin, settled by the English and considered a law-abiding area, was known as the Pale or within the Pale. The land beyond that area was characterized as wild "bandit country."

In legal writing the phrase is often used figuratively but with ETYMOLOGICAL AWARENESS, as here: "The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals below turned on its determination that an interpretation of Rule 68 to include attorneys' fees is beyond the pale of the judiciary's rulemaking authority." See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.

palimony (= a court-ordered allowance paid by one member to the other of a couple that, though unmarried, formerly cohabited) is a PORTMANTEAU WORD first recorded in 1979. Though it has become fairly common, it is jocular in most contexts. E.g., "Trimmer v. Van Bomel . . . [was] a 'palimony' case concerning an alleged oral agreement by which a wealthy widow was to pay her former male companion 'costs and expenses for sumptuous living and maintenance for the remainder of his life.'" Gregg v. U.S. Indus., Inc., 715 F.2d 1522, 1537 (11th Cir. 1983). Galimony, a similar form that is even more jocular, has been used in reference to palimony between lesbians.

palming off; passing off. The two terms are perfectly synonymous ("putting into circulation or dispersing of fraudulently" [OED]), both being used with almost equal frequency in AmE and BrE. Passing off is more peculiarly legal. E.g., "Unfair competition is almost universally regarded as a question of whether the defendant is passing off his goods or services as those of the plaintiff."/ "Passing off may be found only where the defendant subjectively and knowingly intended to confuse buyers." Palming off is used additionally in lay senses, and might be called a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY—e.g.: "Have you not tried to palm off yesterday's pun?" palpable (lit., "touchable") = tangible; apparent. There is nothing wrong with using this word in figurative senses <palpable weaknesses in the argument>, as it has been used since at least the 15th century.

pamphlet. This word is pronounced with the -ph- as if it were an -f-. A great many people incorrectly say /pam-plət/. Similar mispronunciations occur with ophthalmology and amphitheater.

panacea (= cure-all; nostrum) is sometimes confused with other words. E.g., "To allow the state to raise new matters not brought out in the original appeal or on rehearing would open up a panacea [read bring on a plethora? or open up a pandora's box?] of problems by way of precedent." This is a MALAPROPISM.

pandemic = (of a disease) prevalent over the whole of a country or continent, or over the whole world. The word is usually adjectival, but may be used as a noun: "The strain was related to the one that was prevalent during the 1918–19 swine flu pandemic that was responsible for 20 million deaths worldwide, including the deaths of 500,000 Americans." See epidemic.

panel-shopping, analogous to forum-shopping (q.v.), refers to panels usually consisting of three members of a court. E.g., "[T]he 'law of the case doctrine' discourages panel shopping at the circuit level, for in today's climate it is most likely that a different panel will hear subsequent appeals." Lehrman v. Gulf Oil Corp., 500 F.2d 659, 662 (5th Cir. 1974). The hyphenated form is preferable.

panic, v.i., makes panicked and panicking. Usually intransitive, panic has also appeared as a transitive verb, meaning "to affect with panic." E.g., "She did not want to panic the audience."

paper has a special legal sense in the phrase commercial paper (= negotiable documents and bills of exchange). The plural papers often refers to pleadings and other court documents <We filed all the necessary papers>. See negotiable instrument & court papers.

paperwork. One word.

parachronism. See anachronism.

paradigm. The preferred plural is paradigms, not paradigmata. See PLURALS (A). paragraph. In DRAFTING, a paragraph is a subdivision usu. numbered for reference and sometimes, in citations, indicated by the character "¶." The term can be confusing, however, because a drafted paragraph often consists of many individual paragraphs in the conventional sense of the word. At other times, it may consist of a two- or three-word phrase. When using cross-references, then, it is often more helpful to give the full citation—as, for example, by referring to "Rule 4(A)(4)(b)(ii)." That way, the terminology for each subdivision does not impede clarity.

parajudge has been used to refer to U.S. Magistrate Judges, who have some adjudicative power, but not the extent of power vested in Article III judges: "Under the 'para-judge' rationale, the Magistrates Act comports with Article III [of the U.S. Constitution] because it subjects magistrates' rulings to de novo determination by a federal district judge." U.S. v. Saunders, 641 F.2d 659, 663 (9th Cir. 1980). The unhyphenated one-word form is best in AmE.

paralegal. A. Senses and Usage. Paralegal = (1) (adj.) of, relating to, or associated with law in an ancillary way; or (2) (n.) a paralegal aide.

In BrE, the term is sometimes spelled as two words, as it was repeatedly in the following article: "Compare that with the UK's largest single law firm Clifford Chance with 985 fee earners comprising 195 partners, 577 assistant solicitors, 206 articled clerks and 7 para legals." Robert Rice, Profession Still Bashful About the Business of Making Money, Fin. Times, 9 April 1990, at 12.

B. And legal assistant. In sense (2), paralegal is rivaled in AmE by the term legal assistant. Some prefer calling themselves paralegals; others prefer calling themselves legal assistants. The two terms are about equally common.

paralegaling is a colloquialism to name what it is that a paralegal (or legal assistant) does. The term is similar to bailiffing (see bailiff). See NOUNS AS VERBS.

One text uses the more formal term paralegalism (= the calling of a paralegal)—see William P. Statsky, Introduction to Paralegalism (3d ed. 1986).

paralegalism. See paralegaling.

PARALEIPSIS is a rhetorical tactic whereby a speaker or writer mentions something in disclaiming any mention of it. For example, a less than scrupulous cross-examiner would engage in paraleipsis if he stated, "Mr. Smith, I won't bring up your unsavory past as a drug-dealer, but I would like to ask you some questions about your prior business dealings with the plaintiff." To which the fitting response is "Objection!" preferably after unsavory. Among the most common phrases introducing a paraleipsis are to say nothing of, not to mention, and needless to say.

In the following example of judicial paraleipsis, the judge appears to be suggesting a tactic to one of the parties: "I purposely refrain from commenting on the possibility of any relief against Malcolm Devers' attorney, Dalonas, which may be available to the defendants, or any title company that may have insured a Radnor Heights fee for one of them." Devers v. Chateau Corp., 792 F.2d 1278, 1299 (4th Cir. 1986) (Murnaghan, J., dissenting).

And in the following example, Morris Cohen may have had in mind the difference between referring and alluding, but the resulting paraleipsis is nevertheless damning: "We need not refer to the Texas governor who pardoned hundreds of criminals for his political advantage." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 65 (1961). The unfortunate thing about this passage is that Cohen shifts the reader's negative impression away from the individual perpetrator and onto the state. For a brief account of Governor Pa Ferguson's malfeasances in granting pardons—and his subsequent impeachment—see T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans 638–39 (1968).

PARALLELISM refers to matching parts, i.e., analogous sentence-parts that must match if the sentence is to make strictly logical sense—and the best grammatical sense. The problem of unparallel sentence-parts usually crops up in the use of CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS and in lists. Following are a number of examples, with corrections in brackets within quotations or in parentheses following the quotations:

- "For federal diversity purposes, a corporation is a 'citizen' of not only [read not only of] the state in which it is incorporated, but also of the state where it has its principal place of business."
- "[M]arketing quotas not only embrace [read embrace not only] all that may be sold without penalty but also what may be consumed on the premises." Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 119 (1942).
- "No person in this country who is committed to prison on a charge of crime can be kept long in confinement because he can insist upon either being let out on bail or else of being [read or else being] brought to speedy trial." Alfred Denning, Freedom Under the Law 9 (1949).
- "Its continuance is contingent upon legally recognized rights of tenure, transfer, and of succession [delete second of or insert of before transfer] in use and occupancy."
- "Defendants object to the request for production of documents on the grounds of relevancy, over-breadth, burdensome [read burdensomeness], oppression, and confidentiality." (This sentence contains ILLOGIC as well, because each item in the list spells out why the defendants object to it—hence irrelevancy should appear where relevancy does.)

- "The trial court was correct in excluding both the testimony of V.T.W. and in excluding [delete in excluding and insert the] defendant's exhibits 7 and 11."

Failures of parallelism are especially common in cumulative sentences, as here: "The defendants admitted that they published the article; disavowed any intention to defame and injure the plaintiff in his good name and reputation; denied that the article was maliciously composed, printed, or published; [read and asserted] that the article appeared simply as a news item and was brought in by one of their news-gatherers."/ "Cars may be seized if they constitute a traffic hazard, are evidence, or if they are [read or are] subject to forfeiture proceedings." A writer who wished to be more emphatic, whatever the cost of repetition, could write: "Cars may be seized if they constitute a traffic hazard, if they are evidence, or if they are subject to forfeiture proceedings."

Less troubling is a lack of parallelism where two or more sentence-parts are balanced by and; but even this should be avoided: "The boy's operation of the car was unlawful and negligence [read negligent] per se."/ "Johann was a tall, thin man, dark-haired, near-sighted, not bad-looking, and a fop [read foppish]." (Here we have a string of adjectives—all implicitly modifying man—but the writer changes the last in the string to a noun phrase.) See PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

paralyze; paralyse. The former spelling is the only one used in AmE; the latter (as well as the former) is used in BrE.

parameters. Technical contexts aside, this jargonistic VOGUE WORD is not used by those with a heightened sensitivity to language. To begin with, only a specialist in mathematics or computing knows precisely what it means: it is a mush word. Second, when it does have a discernible meaning, it is usurping the place of a far simpler and more straightforward term. Though the word does not appear in the best legal writing, it does abound—e.g.:

- "Since the parties have become legally obligated through their expression of assent, the parameters [read boundaries?] of their assent must be established, at least primarily, by their expressions."
- "The terms of its consent to be sued define the parameters [read limits] of the court's jurisdiction to entertain suit."
- "Within broad parameters [read guidelines], families are free to choose their method of child-rearing and to pick the values and aspirations transmitted to their offspring."
- "The purpose of pleadings is to put one's opponent on notice as to the parameters [read grounds] of the forthcoming battle."
- "Although it would have been appropriate to outline the parameters [read elements] of agency for purposes of the entrapment charge, a reading of the court's instructions satisfies us that the jury was neither misled nor confused."

Rarely is the word used in the singular, but it does occur: "The dismissal in the instant case falls within the parameter of the present rule." Clifford Ragsdale, Inc. v. Morganti, Inc., 356 So. 2d 1321, 1323 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1978).

Sometimes writers use perimeter, whose meaning has influenced the senses of parameter, ostensibly to sidestep any criticisms for the use of parameter. E.g., "The plurality held that the immunity extended even to malicious acts that were within the outer perimeter of the federal employee's line of duty."/ "All that is left for the district court to decide on is whether specific acts and allegations fall within this perimeter." Although this usage makes literal sense, limit or boundary or border would be a simpler term for the same notion.

paramountcy is the noun corresponding to the adjective paramount. It is not often seen but is quite proper—e.g.: "One of these principles is undoubtedly the paramountcy of EEC law over municipal or national law." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 62 (1983). Paramouncy is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

paraphrase is occasionally misrendered paraphraze, as in Eades v. Drake, 332 S.W.2d 553, 556 (Tex. 1960). See rephrase.

parasitic, in reference to damages, does not mean merely "additional." Rather, the term means, in the words of Lord Denning, M.R., > that there are some heads of damage which, if they stood alone, would not be recoverable: but, nevertheless, if they can be annexed to some other legitimate claim for damages, may yet be recoverable. They are said to be parasitic because, like a parasite, in biology, they cannot exist on their own, but depend on others for their life or nourishment . . . . I do not like the very word parasite. A parasite is one who is a useless hanger-on sucking out the sub> stance of others. Parasitic is the adjective derived from it. It is a term of abuse. It is an opprobrious epithet. The phrase parasitic damages conveys to my mind the idea of damages which ought not in justice to be awarded, but which somehow or other have been allowed to get through by hanging on to others. If such be the concept underlying the doctrine, then the sooner it is got rid of the better . . . . I hope it will disappear from [the textbooks] after this case.

> Spartan Steel & Alloys Ltd. v. Martin & Co., [1973] Q.B. 27, 34–35.

Parasitic should not be used as a fancy variant of dependent, as here: "The legal characteristics of an individual's mental state under Rees are parasitic [read dependent] on the factual conclusions rendered by those testifying on the issue." The quotation from Lord Denning makes plain the metaphorical baggage that parasitic carries with it; and unless the metaphor is perfectly apt, the word should not be used.

parcel, n. (= a tract of land), is now primarily a LEGALISM. E.g., "This is a suit for a declaratory judgment to establish a trust in a two-fifths interest in five parcels of land devised absolutely to the respondent."

parcel out is a common PHRASAL VERB in the legal idiom. E.g., "It is not our job to decide whether the FSLIC could parcel out Old North's assets in this particular manner."

parcenary. See coparcenary.

parcener. See coparcener (A).

pardon, v.t. See commute (B).

parens patriae (= the father of a country) refers in Great Britain to the king or queen, particularly as the sovereign (historically speaking) was thought to have a kind of guardianship over the nation and persons in need of care. E.g., "At common law the king is parens patriae, father of his country, which is but the medieval mode of putting what we mean today when we say that the state is the guardian of social interests." Roscoe Pound, The Spirit of the Common Law 68 (1921; repr. 1963).

In the U.S., parens patriae refers to the state as a sovereign—e.g.: "The Attorney General of Georgia was made a party after remand from this court, and, acting as parens patriae in all legal matters pertaining to the administration and disposition of charitable trusts in the State of Georgia in which the rights of beneficiaries are involved, he opposed the reversion to the heirs . . . ."

parentelic method; parentelic system. These phrases denote one scheme of computation used to determine the paternal or maternal collaterals entitled to inherit. The name derives from the technical term parentela (= a person's issue). E.g., "Under the laws of succession and marriage there are three different methods for determining degrees of relationship. The most common is the civil law method, used in Virginia to determine relationships in succession law. The second is the parentelic method, used in succession law in other states. The third is the canon law method, developed to establish the limits of permissible marriages between relatives." William J. O'Shaughnessy, Jr., Note, Proxy Decisionmaking for the Terminally Ill: The Virginia Approach, 70 Va. L. Rev. 1269, 1292–93 (1984)./ "This pattern of intestate inheritance resembles the common law's parentelic system for the descent of land." Carolyn S. Bratt, A Primer on Kentucky Intestacy Laws, 82 Ky. L.J. 29, 49 (1993–1994).

parentelic system. See parentelic method.

PARENTHESES. A. Syntactic Effect. Words contained within parentheses do not affect the syntax of the rest of the sentence. E.g., "We must determine whether each (or both) appellants are entitled to immunity." The writer of that sentence could have avoided this error (each appellants are) by reading the sentence without the parenthetical phrase. See PUNCTUATION (G).

B. Overuse of. Virtually any punctuation mark is subject to an annoying overuse, but this is especially true of parentheses—and long dashes—which to be effective must be used sparingly. When they appear at all frequently in writing, they tire the reader's eye, add to the burden of decoding, and cloy the reader's interest. The sentence begins to sag with the qualifications here and there. The following is a two-sentence example from an opinion published in 1985:

> Marshall also relies upon his cross-examination of the government investigator (Ms. Sandlin) and of a government witness (Bitner; the Four Seasons manager and the custodian of its records—although he was not called upon by the government to authenticate the Four Seasons lawn-mower records) as showing the unreliability of Ms. Sandlin's opinion that three (or any) lawn mowers were actually missing, as she had testified on the basis of her deductions from the (incomplete) Four Seasons records . . . . However, in the first place, if the testimony of Marshall's witnesses was to be believed (which was for the jury to determine), Marshall could not have been at the Frederick Street residence at the time Lee (thus mistakenly) believed that he saw him there.
> U.S. v. Marshall, 762 F.2d 419, 422 (5th Cir. 1985).

None of these parenthetical interpolations is syntactically or stylistically justified pari passu (= with equal pace, equally, at the same time) is an adverb as well as an adjective The phrase is frequently used in contracts when several persons are paid at the same level or out of a common fund E.g., "Hence when this £25 is withdrawn and mixed with £175 in the second account, the charges extend over the whole resulting £200, but only to* [illegible] contract is any contract that is not under seal See informal contract.

Parol may also act as a noun meaning "word of mouth " E g , "To permit such subsequent declarations to have such effect would be to convey an estate in land by parol, which is expressly prohibited by statute." By parol (= by word of mouth) is the most common construction with the noun parol, but in parol (= in something said or spoken, in a statement or declaration) is also used "Such agreements were often in parol, and where an unenforceable agreement in parol is attended by certain special circumstances, equity resorts to the remedial device of a constructive trust to accomplish justice "/ "Certainly it was not in-tion being whether, if admitted, the evidence will have the legal effect of varying the instrument.

parricide; patricide. Parricide is the more usual word meaning (1) "the murder of one's own father"; or (2) "one who murders his own father." E.g. (Sense 2): "The contention that quadriplegia is 'punishment enough'—like the parricide's claim that he deserves mercy as an orphan—is one addressed to the sentencing court's discretion alone." U.S. ex rel. Villa v. Fairman, 810 F.2d 715, 717–18 (7th Cir. 1987).

It is also used in extended senses, such as "the murder of the ruler of a country" and "the murder of a close relative." These are not examples of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, however, for even the Latin etymon (parricida) was used in these senses.

part. See portion & city part.

part, in. See in pertinent part.

partake is construed with either in or of in the sense "to take part or share in some action or condition; to participate." In is the more common preposition in this sense: "As lawyers are partakers in a common enterprise, the honor and reputation of every member should be the cause of all."

Of is common when the sense is "to receive, get, or have a share or portion of; to have something of, possess a certain amount of": "The view that the defendant's fault partakes of wanton and intentional wrong was questioned."/ "The venture does not come within the purview of a special business arrangement partaking of some essentials of partnership."/ "The restrictive view is that the court's interpretation partakes of the same quality as the statutory text itself."

part and parcel is an idiomatic DOUBLET and CLICHÉ that emphasizes the sense of "an essential or integral portion; something essentially belonging to a larger whole." E.g., "We specifically held in Barksdale that a revoking clause in a will is part and parcel of the will itself, without independent and immediate life or power, and that it survives or perishes with the will." See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS partially; partly. Whenever either word could suffice in a given context, partly is the better choice. Partially occasionally causes AMBIGUITY because of its other sense "in a manner exhibiting favoritism." AHD notes that partly, which has wider application, "is the choice when stress is laid on the part (in contrast to the whole), when the reference is to physical things, and when the sense is equivalent to in part, to some extent" <partly to blame> . "Partially is especially applicable to conditions or states in the sense of to a certain degree; as the equivalent of incomplete, it indirectly stresses the whole" (AHD) <partially dependent> <partially contributory>.

partial payment; part payment. Although part payment is common in the lawbooks, partial payment is more idiomatic today.

partial performance; part performance. Although part performance, like part payment, can be found throughout many fine books, partial performance is the more natural-sounding phrase.

partible; partitionable. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT not recorded in the dictionaries. Partible = subject to partition; separable <the concurrent estate is partible>.

particeps criminis is an unjustified LATINISM in view of our simpler equivalent accessory. E.g., "A particeps criminis [read accessory] in the fraud has been permitted to recover in his own name against one who was no more guilty than he, when the marriage had taken place by reasons of such fraud." (Eng.) The plural form is participes criminis.

PARTICIPLES, PROBLEMS WITH. See ADJECTIVES (H), DANGLERS (B), FUSED PARTICIPLES & MISPLACED MODIFIERS.

PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY. Any number of English verbs are regularly given particles in informal or colloquial contexts, and these particles often help to establish the informality or colloquiality of the writing. Thus a Good Samaritan helps out a person rather than merely helping that person, litigants fight out a dispute rather than merely fighting it.

Unnecessary particles seem to find a more hospitable climate in BrE than in AmE—e.g.: "By a strange coincidence, on the very same day, so-called animal rights activists injured up [read injured] a 13-month-old baby in Bristol . . . ." Richard Ingrams, Observer, 24 June 1990, at 18./ "Competition in high schools . . . has not slackened off [read slackened]." Roger Buckley, Japan Today 93 (2d ed. 1990).

The following examples are best avoided in legal prose: award over (award), continue on (continue), convey away (convey), and proceed on (proceed).

Slight DIFFERENTIATION is possible with a number of phrases, such as die off (die), face up to (face), meet up with (meet), lose out (lose), pay off or pay out (pay) (see pay & pay over); with these phrases, the particles arguably add a nuance to the verb. One must always be on guard to ask whether the particles in one's writing pull their weight or give, instead, a breezy, slangy quality to the prose.

PARTICLE VERBS. See PHRASAL VERBS.

particularized is sometimes misused for particular—e.g.: "Note that the doctrine of partial performance antedated the general concept of promissory estoppel and has its own particularized [read particular] rules." The sense there is not "made particular" but "particular"; hence particularized is the wrong word for the context. Cf. generalized.

parties hereto is, 99 times out of 100, a rank REDUNDANCY. The one other time, either parties to this case or parties to this agreement would be preferable.

partisan; partizan. The former is the preferred spelling in both AmE and BrE. Although the term denotes "one who takes part or sides with another," it has connotations of "a blind, prejudiced, unreasoning, or fanatical adherent" (OED).

partition. To a nonlawyer this is something that separates, esp. one part of a space from another; to a lawyer, partition = a division of real property into severalty.

The word is also commonly a verb in legal writing; it means "to divide (land) into severalty" <action for partitioning an inheritance>. E.g., "Any one of a number of co-owners was entitled to have the property 'partitioned,' i.e. divided, or at any rate to have the property sold and his share paid out to him." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 78 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). See partible.

Both as a noun and as a verb, the word petition is sometimes misused for partition, the result being a gross MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "Children over approximately age 9 sat in an 11 by 14 enclosure, partially petitioned [read partitioned] off from the main waiting room." Doe v. New York City Dep't of Social Servs., 670 F.Supp. 1145, 1181 (S.D.N.Y. 1987)./ "Structural components include walls, petitions [read partitions], floors, ceilings, windows, doors, [etc.] . . . ." Jacob Mertens, Mertens Law of Federal Income Taxation § 45.51, at 120 (1990).

partitionable. See partible.

partizan. See partisan.

partly. See partially.

partner. See copartner & coparcener (B).

partnership = (1) a voluntary joining together for business purposes by two or more persons of money, goods, labor, and skill, upon an agreement that the gain or loss will be divided proportionally between them; or (2) the relation that exists between those who carry on a business in common for the purpose of profit.

part payment. See partial payment.

party is a LEGALISM that is unjustified when it merely replaces person. If used as an elliptical form of party to the contract or party to the lawsuit, party is quite acceptable as a TERM OF ART. E.g., "Either party may enforce the terms of this contract, and in the event that either party must use attorneys to effect such enforcements, then such expenses and other fees may be charged against the other party." See party of the first part.

Fred Rodell's quip is worth remembering: "Only The Law insists on making a 'party' out of a single person." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 28 (1939; repr. 1980). See third(-)party.

PARTY APPELLATIONS. Generally, in briefs and opinions, it is best to humanize parties by calling them by their names—e.g.: "Jones" and "Smith." Otherwise, the reader is forced continually to rethink who is the petitioner and who the respondent; who the appellant and who the appellee; or, worse yet, who was plaintiff below, now appellee (or is it appellant?). It is easier to remember that Mr. Gulbenkian is the appellant than that the appellant is Gulbenkian, for every case has an appellant, but not every case has a Gulbenkian. See Fed. R. App. P. 28(d).

Problems arise, however, with matters of procedure. "Gulbenkian failed to preserve error" is an invidious legal fiction, since it was Gulbenkian's attorney, not Gulbenkian, who failed to preserve error. Judicial opinions should avoid obscuring the responsibility for procedural mistakes. In such contexts, appellant, appellee, plaintiff, and other such appellations are preferable, for they more nearly connote attorney and client jointly. Even phrasing the statement thus, "Counsel for appellant failed to preserve error," would be appropriate, although from the lawyer's perspective it is a harsher statement. See plaintiff, defendant.

party in interest = a natural or juristic person having a legal or economic interest in litigation or arbitration. E.g., "The trouble with appellant's position in this case is that no stipulation was presented to the court signed by all parties in interest." party litigant. See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

party of the first part; party of the second part. These phrases—which have traditionally appeared in many types of instruments—are the worst types of ARCHAISMS. Not only are they cumbersome and verbose; they also invite mistakes. A glance at volume 31 of Words and Phrases (1957) hints at the amount of litigation caused by drafters who have inadvertently transposed first and second.

The best modern practice, in contractual drafting, is to use either real names or functional labels such as buyer and seller; licensor and licensee; publisher and author; and the like.

The most that can be said for the old phrases is that they have a mildly interesting history. Parties entering into contracts were once divided into classes, or "parts," according to their property interests in the transaction. Generally, the owner or seller was the party of the first part and the buyer was the party of the second part—e.g.:

- "Know all men by these presents, that John Doe, of the county of Arapahoe, in the state of Colorado, party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of $5,000, to him in hand paid by Richard Roe, of the county of Arapahoe and state aforesaid, party of the second part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, does hereby grant, bargain and sell unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, the following goods and chattels, viz. . . . ." W.S. Walker, Sayler's American Form Book 97 (4th ed. 1913) (from a form chattel mortgage).
- "[T]he said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of $1,000, in hand paid, at and before the sealing of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has granted, bargained, sold, aliened, conveyed and confirmed, and by these presents does grant, bargain, sell, alien, convey and confirm, unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, all [describe property]." W.S. Walker, Sayler's American Form Book 132 (4th ed. 1913) (from a form warranty deed to secure a loan).
- "This agreement entered into between _____ party of the first part, and _____ party of the second part." Samuel G. Kling, The Legal Encyclopedia for Home and Business 93 (1957; repr. 1959) (simple form contract so punctuated).

These are the once-common uses, but there are two historically unwarranted variations.

First, during the 20th century the historical divisions between buyers and sellers fell apart: contract drafters came to use party of the first part for whichever party was named first. Often, that party was the one with the greatest degree of bargaining power—e.g.:

> "The party of the first part covenants and agrees to drill for the party of the second part [i.e., the landowner], its successors or assigns, a well for petroleum or gas . . . . The party of the second part covenants and agrees to pay to the party of the first part, provided the party of the first part shall complete said well in the manner, to the depth, and of the dimensions hereinafter specified, and when the said well shall be so completed, at the rate of [$____]."
> Robert T. Donley, Coal, Oil and Gas in West Virginia and Virginia 360 (1951) (from a form contract for drilling an oil or gas well).

Second, the idea of a party of the third part gradually arose, though this would have traditionally been considered a solecism. In most contracts, there were but two sides (or "parts"), so that in multiparty contracts there would be parties of the first part and parties of the second part. The idea was that a third party was a stranger to the contract. Thus, a turn-of-the-century dictionary described third parties as a "term used to include all persons who are not parties to the contract, agreement, or instrument of writing by which their interest in the thing conveyed is sought to be affected." Walter A. Shumaker & George F. Longsdorf, The Cyclopedic Dictionary of Law 909 (1901). But by the mid-20th century, drafters were using party of the third part to describe not a stranger, but another party to the contract—e.g.:

> Whereas the party of the first part has made certain discoveries relating to the manufacture of synthetic rubber, apparently of material commercial value, and has associated the party of the second part with him to further the marketing thereof, and the party of the third part is willing to form and finance a company to manufacture and market the same, if he finds to his satisfaction, after investigation, that said discoveries are valuable commercially . . .
> Samuel G. Kling, The Legal Encyclopedia for Home and Business 101 (1957, repr. 1959) (from a form agreement to organize a corporation).

Any question about whether party of the third part is proper usage is best answered by saying that all these ancient expressions are poor usage in modern DRAFTING. See chirograph, party & PERSON.

party-opponent is generally hyphenated, as in Fed. R. Evid. 613(b), though there is hardly a good rationale for writing it this way.

pass. A. Judicial Senses. The phrase pass on or pass upon has a peculiar meaning in legal writing, namely, "to decide." It is used primarily of questions of law: "When our courts first came to pass upon constitutional questions, what they read in Coke's Second Institute . . . appeared but a common-law version of what they read in French and Dutch publicists as to an eternal and immutable natural law . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Spirit of the Common Law 75 (1921; repr. 1963)./ "The state courts have power to pass on both state and federal questions . . . ." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 752 (4th ed. 1983).

Yet the phrase has been used also in reference to juries, which of course decide questions of fact: "It is not the province of this court to pass upon the weight of the evidence; we think there was a fair question for the jury, and they must pass upon it uninfluenced by any intimation from us."/ "Some courts have nearly gone to the extent of holding that where the language is severe, the jury should pass upon the case under proper instructions."

B. Testamentary Senses. In the context of wills and estates, pass (= to transfer or be transferred) may be either transitive or intransitive. Ordinarily it is intransitive—e.g.: "The purpose of the makers was that the property of the one first to die pass at his or her death as he or she directed . . . ."/ "Intestate real property passes by descent and intestate personal property passes by distribution."

But it may also be transitive—e.g.: "The instrument is supposed to pass property only upon death."/ "The judgment of the county court construing the first paragraph of the will to pass all personal property possessed by the testator at his death to his widow is affirmed."

passable; passible. The former means "capable of being passed; open"; the latter means "feeling; susceptible to pain or suffering." Cf. impassible. See -ABLE (A). passerby. Pl. passersby.

passim (= here and there) is used in citing an authority in a general way and indicates that the point at hand is treated throughout the work. Specific references are preferred in legal citations; when a general reference is called for, see generally is the signal most frequently used. Passim is especially useful in the index of authorities contained in the front matter of a brief.

passing off, as a noun phrase, should be two words. A few writers have hyphenated the phrase—e.g.: Suman Naresh, Passing-Off, Goodwill, and False Advertising, 45 Cambridge L.J. 97 (1986)—but this rendering of the phrase is recommended only when it acts as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE. See palming off.

PASSIVE VOICE. "Avoid the passive," one often hears; yet many do not really understand what voice is in grammar, let alone what the passive voice is. "Voice" refers to the relationship between the subject of a clause and its verb: if the verb performs the action of the subject (as in "Jane hit the ball"), the verb is active, whereas if it is acted upon (as in "The ball was hit by Jane"), the verb is passive.

True, the two sentences say essentially the same thing, but the emphasis is changed. The passive results in a wordier sentence, disrupts the ordinary sequence of events in the reader's mind, often causes DANGLERS, and often obscures the actor. Consider: "The ball was hit." As in that sentence, passive voice may lead to vagueness, or lend itself to purposeful obfuscation (see (E) below). Small wonder that politicians find so many uses for the passive (e.g., "Mistakes were made"—President Reagan's response to intense questioning about the Iran-Contra debacle). See PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

More to the point, although the passive voice has its occasional legitimate uses—usually, when the actor is either unimportant or unknown—its frequent use makes a piece of writing much less interesting and readable. Avoiding the passive is good general advice; but one should not make a fetish of it. Following are different types of passive voice with their own peculiar problems, along with suggested remedies.

A. The Otiose Passive. This is the type of passive that results from lazy thinking, as in "The ball was hit by Jane." This syntax subverts the English-speaking reader's reasonable expectation of a direct actor-action-consequence sequence, unless a departure from that sequence is somehow an improvement. E.g., "Common trust fund legislation is addressed to [read addresses] a problem appropriate for state action."/ "The fee simple interest could have been conveyed by her to the defendant." [Read She could have conveyed the fee simple interest to the defendant.]/ "It is not found that [read The court does not find that] defendant did so with the intent and purpose of destroying the value of plaintiff's interest in the promissory note, as the complaint alleges."/ "After both sides had rested, a conference was had between the trial judge and counsel [read the trial judge and counsel conferred (or had a conference)]."/ "It is insisted by Sue [read Sue insists] that the power

B. Confusion of Active and Passive Constructions. Consider the following sentences: "Assuming Hager drew up the contract, it becomes even more clear that it was done so without [read he did so without] any approval by us."/ "Either review can be summarized, as did Judge Rubin, with the following observations." If the first clause is to be passive in the latter specimen quoted, then the second must also be passive [read as was done by Judge Rubin] to make the clauses parallel. But the best version would be to write both clauses in the active voice: "One can summarize either review, as Judge Rubin did, with the following observations."

Here the combination of active and passive constructions leads to problems of syntax and logic: "In his affidavit in opposition to defendants' motion, plaintiff Nishimura acknowledges that plaintiffs were never interested by, much less sought [read that plaintiffs never had an interest in, nor sought], rights to produce and distribute the teams' games on an exclusive, metropolitan-wide basis."

C. The Ambiguous Passive. Here an AMBIGUITY is caused by the writer's failure to specify who is acting in each instance: "To avoid dermatitis, skin contact with the epoxy must be minimized, rigorous personal cleanliness encouraged [by the user?], and suitable protective equipment used by the operator." The operator, hardly the one to encourage personal cleanliness, must practice it. The manufacturer is encouraging cleanliness.

D. Active Wrongly Used for Passive. With a few verbs, it has become voguish to use the active construction where, according to sense, the passive should appear. Thus the following statement was made to a psychiatric patient: "At the time you were counseling [read receiving counseling or being counseled], were you contemplating suicide?" Cf. the colloquial British usage, "You need your head examining [read examined]."/ "The video deposition is now filming [read being filmed]."/ "The cases divide [read can be divided] into two categories, roughly paralleling the sometimes fuzzy distinction between legislative and interpretative rules."

For a discussion of the amount owing and amount owed as idiomatic alternatives, see owing.

E. The Dishonest Passive. Sometimes the passive is used (but not as there!) in a way that is of questionable honesty. In a negligence case in which plaintiffs—a minor and his mother—have accused the retailer defendant of negligence in selling lighter fluid to the minor, this sentence occurs: "The minor plaintiff attempted to fill said lighter and was caused to set himself on fire." Was caused to is superfluous and misleading, for one immediately wonders, by whom?

F. The Double Passive. The problem here is using one passive immediately after another. E.g., "This article refers to the portion of the votes entitled to be cast by virtue of the articles of incorporation." (Votes are not entitled to be cast; rather, persons are entitled to cast votes.)/ "Had an absolute liability theory been intended to have been injected into the Act, much more suitable models could have been found." Fowler writes that "monstrosities of this kind . . . are as repulsive to the grammarian as to the stylist" (MEU2 138).

In legal writing, the problem is especially common where the verb attempt appears: "The possibility that such a pleading informality may occur in a proceeding of this nature has been attempted to be prevented by our Rule 27(a)." [A suggested revision: Preventing such informality in pleading in a case like this one is precisely the purpose of our Rule 27(a).]/ "The second ground on which this action is attempted to be supported fails also." (Eng.) [A suggested revision: The plaintiff's second ground fails also.]/ "Explosions were not what was attempted to be guarded against by the statute." [A suggested revision: The statute did not purport to guard against explosions.]

This construction is likewise common with seek: "The defendant against whom the option was sought to be exercised was in fact the assignee of the reversion." (Eng.) [A suggested revision: Williams sought to exercise the option against the defendant who was in fact the assignee of the reversion.]/ "A distinction is sought to be drawn between this case and those cases in which the decedent was an infant and the negligent parent a beneficiary." [A suggested revision. Bronson seeks to distinguish this case from those in which the decedent was an infant and the negligent parent a beneficiary.]

Some double passives are defensible—e.g.: "Offerings made in compliance with Regulation D are not required to be registered with the SEC under the Securities Act." As Fowler notes, "In legal or quasi-legal language this construction may sometimes be useful and unexceptionable: Diplomatic privilege applies only to such things as are done or omitted to be done in the course of a person's official duties./ Motion made: that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question" (MEU2 139). But these are of a different kind from are sought to be included and are attempted to be refuted, which can be easily remedied by recasting. "The rule," states the Oxford Guide (p. 148), "is that if the subject and the first passive verb can be changed into the active, leaving the passive infinitive intact, the sentence is correctly formed." Here, for example, a recasting of the first passive verb form into the active voice results in a sentence that makes sense:

Passive / Passive: The prisoners were ordered to be shot.
Active / Passive: He ordered the prisoners to be shot.

But in the following example, a recasting of the first passive verb into the active voice does not make sense:

Passive / Passive: The contention has been attempted to be made.
Active / Passive: He attempted the contention to be made (un-English).

Sense can be restored to this sentence by casting both parts in the active voice:

Active / Active: He attempted to make the contention.

G. Special Active Use with issue. In contexts discussing mandamus and other writs, issue is used actively where most nonlawyers would make it passive: "At the last term, viz., December term, 1801, William Marbury [et al.] severally moved the court for a rule to James Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue [a nonlawyer would write be issued] commanding him to cause to be delivered [better: commanding him to deliver] to them respectively their several commissions as justices of the peace." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 137–38 (1803) (per Marshall, C.J.)./ "Mandamus will not issue to compel performance of an act that involves exercise of discretion." See issue.

pass muster. See muster.

pass on; pass upon. See pass (A). past. This word occurs in many redundant phrases, such as past history, past track record, past record, and past experience. All these are REDUNDANCIES because the noun denotes something that by its very nature is rooted in the past.

past consideration. See consideration (H).

past experience is a common REDUNDANCY. See past.

pastime is sometimes misspelled pasttime. The misspelling derives from a misunderstanding of the word's origin, pass (v.t.) + time, not past + time.

PAST-PARTICIPIAL ADJECTIVES. See ADJECTIVES (H).

patdown, n., (= frisk) is one word.

patent, n., v.t. & adj. In the adjectival sense of "obvious, apparent," the preferred pronunciation is /payt-ənt/. In all other senses and uses the pronunciation is /pat-ənt/.

patentable began as a 19th-century Americanism but is now widely used in BrE as well as AmE.

patent ambiguity. See AMBIGUITY.

patentee. See -EE.

paterfamilias. In the usual English-language sense ("the male head of the household"), the preferred plural is paterfamiliases. In the Roman-law senses ("the head of a Roman household" or "a free Roman citizen"), the plural is patresfamilias.

pathos. See bathos.

patricide. See parricide.

paucital; multital. Paucital = in personam, multital = in rem. These legal terms were used by Wesley N. Hohfeld and other legal philosophers but are not recorded in most dictionaries. Now generally disused, the terms appeared mostly in early 20th-century academic writing—e.g.: "If B owes A a thousand dollars, A has an affirmative right in personam, or paucital right, that B shall do what is necessary to transfer to A the legal ownership of that amount of money. If, to put a contrasting situation, A already has title to one thousand dollars, his rights against others in relation thereto are multital rights, or rights in rem." (Hohfeld)/ "Some of the overspreading classifications consist in the following: relations in personam (paucital relations) and relations in rem (multital relations)." (Hohfeld)/ "[W]e should not allow any fiction of unity or jointness to blind us to the fact that the legal relations between joint promises and a promise are 'paucital'. . . ." Editor's Note, William R. Anson, Principles of the Law of Contract 388 n.1 (Arthur L. Corbin ed., 3d Am. ed. 1919). See in rem & in personam.

paucity means "dearth; fewness" . The word indicates a small quantity, not a complete lack of something, as the following sentences erroneously suggest:

- "Since there is a complete paucity of [read no] decisional law on the issue involved here, it might be wise, at this juncture, to defer to certain language contained within the preface of the AMA Guides themselves . . . ." Adams v. Industrial Comm'n, 547 P.2d 1089, 1096 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1976) (Wren, J., dissenting).

- "In the court's view, it was not necessary to reach this issue, which is essentially a matter of affirmative defense, because of the total paucity [read absence] of evidence probative of the basic elements of the plaintiff's case." Murphy v. Owens-Corning Fiberglass Corp., 447 F. Supp. 557, 572 (D. Kan. 1977).
- "We are therefore unwilling, based on the complete paucity [read absence] of the evidence in the record, to reach the question . . . ." State v. Repp, 362 N.W.2d 415, 421 (Wis. 1985).
- "[T]here was a complete paucity of [read no] proof relating to a proximate cause between Plaintiff's minority age and his injuries." Tierney v. Black Bros. Co., 852 F. Supp. 994, 1001 (M.D. Fla. 1994).

pauper is no longer used in lay contexts except for historical or humorous purposes. It is still used, however, by straight-faced judges of impecunious parties in litigation. E.g., "I am of the opinion that the defendant should pay the costs of this House to a successful pauper appellant." (Eng.) See in forma pauperis.

pawnor; pawnee. The pawnor is the owner of an item of goods who transfers it to another (the pawnee) as security for a debt. E.g., "Chattels could pass on death in other ways than those here described: e.g., on the death of a pawnor before redemption, the property passed to the pawnee." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 435 (3d ed. 1990). Nonlegal writers and dictionaries use the spelling pawner.

pay; pay up. The latter means "to discharge completely (a debt)." The former may refer to partial or total payments. Thus, because of this slight DIFFERENTIATION, up is not a needless particle. Cf. pay over. See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

payor. Although the OED and W3 have their main entries under -er, -or is more common in American legal writing. E.g., "If the payor raises a purchase money resulting trust, the oral agreement is regarded as confirming the presumption of surplusage." Ironically, the spellings are payor but taxpayer. In BrE the spelling payer is common.

pay over. Though appearing to be a REDUNDANCY, this common legal idiom is often justifiable. Over signifies in this phrase the perfective aspect of the verb (the payment is completed); pay alone is imperfective. This is not to say that pay over is justified in all the examples quoted below, but it might well be in the first and fourth: "When sovereigns or banknotes are paid over as currency, as far as the payer is concerned, they cease ipso facto to be the subjects of specific title as chattels." (Eng.)/ "During the first three quarters of 1978, appellee failed to pay over [read pay] to the United States certain withheld income taxes."/ "The fact that the money was paid over [read paid] to the wife, for her support and the support of the children, certainly does not conflict with the order of this court."/ "Upon her death, the principal was to be paid over by the trustees to such persons as the settlor might appoint by will, or, in default of such appointment, to the settlor's heirs at law and next of kin as in intestacy." See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

peaceable; peaceful. Generally, peaceful refers to a state of affairs; peaceable refers to the disposition of a person or a nation. The two words overlap some, but a strict DIFFERENTIATION is worth encouraging.

peace, against the. See against the peace.

peace of mind; piece of (one's) mind. Whereas peace of mind is calm assurance, a piece of one's mind is something a person says in a fit of pique. But the two are surprisingly often confused—e.g.:

- "The policyholder should recover for mental distress caused by the insurance company's bad faith conduct because insurance is purchased to provide piece [read peace] of mind." D'Ambrosio v. Pennsylvania Nat'l Mut. Casualty Ins. Co., 431 A.2d 966, 972 (Pa. 1981).
- "[T]he weaker party does not enter into the contract primarily for profit, but to secure an essential service or product, financial security or piece [read peace] of mind . . . ." Henry H. Perritt, Jr., Implied Covenant: Anachronism or Augur? 20 Seton Hall L. Rev. 683, 710–11 (1990).
- "Kansas courts have allowed recovery under nuisance theory to include annoyance, discomfort, inconvenience, endangerment of health, and loss of piece [read peace] of mind." Charles C. Steincamp, Note, Toeing the Line: Compliance with the National Contingency Plan for Private Party Cost Recovery Under CERCLA, 32 Washburn L.J. 190, 233 (1993).
- "Restrictions on obnoxious noise and public indecency protect people's sensibilities and piece [read peace] of mind, not their liberty." Samuel Freeman, Criminal Liability and the Duty to peak; peek. The distinction is so elementary as not to call for explanation. But mistakes do occur—e.g.: "[The court held] that citizens must be notified of entries and seizures pursuant to 'sneak and peak [read peek]' warrants which authorize a surreptitious entry for purposes of looking around or taking photographs." Ronald J. Bacigal, The Right of the People to Be Secure, 82 Ky. L.J. 145, 186 n.272 (1993–1994).

On the misuse of peak for pique, see pique.

peccadillo. Pl. -oes. See PLURALS (C).

peccavi (lit., "I have sinned") = an acknowledgment or confession of sin. The word is pronounced /pə-kah-vee/.

pectore, in. See LOAN TRANSLATIONS peculate. See defalcate.

peculation is essentially a fancy equivalent of—perhaps even a polite EUPHEMISM for—embezzlement. But the OED suggests a narrower meaning for peculation: "the appropriation of public money or property by one in an official position." If that were correct, then a public official peculates whereas a corporate employee embezzles.

Indeed, peculation was once used in this narrower sense—e.g.: "The power to control and direct the appropriations, constitutes a most useful and salutary check upon profusion and extravagance, as well as upon corrupt influence and public peculation . . . ." 2 Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §1348, at 222 (5th ed. 1891).

Today, however, the word routinely refers to violations of private trusts—e.g.: "But to analogize petitioners' scheme to a conventional case of peculation by an employee, whether public or private, is to disregard the facts of this case." Parr v. U.S., 363 U.S. 370, 398–99 (1960) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). That being so, there is little to commend the word in comparison with the ordinary term embezzlement. See defalcate & embezzle.

pecuniary; pecunious. The suffixes distinguish these words. Pecuniary = relating to or consisting of money. Pecunious = moneyed; wealthy. (Its opposite is impecunious, meaning "destitute.")

The adverb corresponding to pecuniary is pecuniarily: "They were quite unaware of the fact that it was to the plaintiff's advantage, pecuniarily or otherwise, to deal with Watson's rather than with Ritchie's." (Eng.)

pedal. See peddle.

peddle (= to sell) is sometimes misused for the verb pedal, esp. in the phrase soft-pedaling (orig., the practice of using the muffling pedal on a piano while playing it). E.g., "[T]hey adopted a strategy of soft-peddling [read soft-pedaling] the issue during the submission of evidence all with a view to seeking a mistrial . . . ." Ginns v. Towle, 361 F.2d 798, 801 (2d Cir. 1966).// "It seems clear that the Court was soft-peddling [read soft-pedaling] language in the EEOC guidelines . . . ." E. Clayton Hipp, Jr., Now You See It, Now You Don't: The "Hostile Work Environment" After Meritor, 26 Am. Bus. L.J. 339, 346 (1988).// "Almost always a smarmy, soft-peddling [read soft-pedaling] overvoice purring something like: 'This magic moment has been brought to you by . . . .'" Patricia J. Williams, Commercial Rights and Constitutional Wrongs, 49 Md. L. Rev. 293, 307 (1990).

pederasty. So spelled. Cf. buggery.

pediatrician; pediatrist. The former is the common, preferred term, meaning "a physician who specializes in children's medicine." The latter, a NEEDLESS VARIANT, has the liability of causing confusion with podiatrist (= a foot doctor).

peek. See peak.

pejorative. So spelled, though sometimes mistakenly spelled perjorative, as in the following examples: "The majority resorts to perjoratives [read pejoratives] . . . ." Compagnie des Bauxites de Guinea v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 651 F.2d 877, 889 (3d Cir. 1981) (Gibbons, J., dissenting).// "[T]he female-gendered term is slightly perjorative [read pejorative] of this species of prosecution." Helen Leskovac, Legal Writing and Plain English, 38 Syracuse L. Rev. 1193, 1202 (1987).

penal; punitive; penological. Penal = of or relating to punishment or retribution. Punitive = serving to punish; intended to inflict punishment. Penological = of or relating to the study of the philosophy and methods of punishment and treatment of persons found guilty of crime. The words thus have distinct senses.

Penological is often used inappropriately for penal, perhaps because the usual phrase is the state's penological interest, and the state's interest sounds more clinical and dispassionate if penological rather than penal is used. That is not, however, a justification for misusing the word. E.g., "The state by this statute imposing a fine has declared its penological [read penal] interest—deterrence, retribution, and rehabilitation—satisfied by a monetary payment, and disclaimed, as serving any penological [read penal] purpose in such cases, a term in jail." See EUPHEMISMS.

penal institution is a EUPHEMISM for prison.

pend, v.i., (= [of a lawsuit] to be awaiting decision or settlement; to be pending) is a sense unrecorded by the OED and W3. In this novel AmE legal sense pend is really a BACK-FORMATION from the present participial form pending <the case has been pending for three years>.

The word dates from the early 20th century—e.g.: "The matter is really not procedural or controlled by the rules of court in which the litigation pends." Oklahoma Natural Gas Co. v. Oklahoma, 273 U.S. 257, 259–60 (1927)./ "[W]hile plaintiff's case pended [read was pending] in the trial court, . . . the defendant had presented itself as contestant of any right of the plaintiff to obtain valid judgment . . . ." Car & Concepts, Inc. v. Funston, 601 S.W. 2d 801, 803 (Tex. Civ. App.—Ft. Worth 1980). Pending sounds more natural in most contexts in which pend appears.

pendant. See pendent.

pendency (= the state or condition of being pending or continuing undecided) is largely a legal term. E.g., "The district court erred in awarding appellant interest during the pendency of the first appeal." Pendence is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "A severance will not be granted for the purpose of making a judgment final which otherwise would be interlocutory because of the continued pendence [read pendency] of other claims in the case." Dallas Civ. Court Rules § 1.4(a) (1981).

pendens. See lis pendens.

pendent; pendant. The first is an adjective literally meaning "hanging, suspended"; the second is a noun meaning "something suspended, as a chain around one's neck."

Pendent, common in the legal phrase pendent jurisdiction, is occasionally misspelled -ant. E.g., "[T]he Court is not inclined to grant injunctive relief on plaintiff's pendant [read pendent] State anti-dilution claim." Home Box Office v. Showtime, 665 F. Supp. 1079, 1087 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

pendent jurisdiction. See concurrent jurisdiction.

pendente lite (= while the action is pending) is sometimes misspelled pendent lite. See lis pendens.

penetrable is preferable to penetratable. See -ATABLE penitentiary (= a reformatory or correctional prison) originally referred to an ecclesiastical office (i.e., a person appointed to deal with penitents). The idea of reform is embedded in the root meaning. Although for some time rehabilitation was not a major objective of American prisons, today it is on the rise.

penological. See penal.

pensioner. See annuitant.

penultimate; antepenultimate. The former means "next to the last," the latter "second from the last." Penultimate is common among educated writers, both lawyers and nonlawyers. E.g., "The penultimate paragraph of this opinion is deleted and the following is substituted."

penumbra. Though most English-language dictionaries list only the plural -ae, one could hardly be faulted for anglicizing the term and using -as (See PLURALS (A).) Justice Douglas did just that in the quotation immediately following: "The foregoing cases suggest that specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations that help give them life and substance." Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 483 (1965)./ "[W]e see no persuasive reason to extend the right of privacy, based as it is on 'penumbras and emanations' of other more explicit constitutional rights, to evidentiary matters protecting marital relationships . . . ." Port v. Heard, 764 F.2d 423, 430 (5th Cir. 1985).

penumbral; penumbrous. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

people. A. And persons. People is general, persons specific. One refers to English-speaking people (or peoples) but to the twelve persons on the jury. Persons should virtually always be used with small, specific numbers.

B. And state. A people (collectively) is a great many persons united by a common language and by similar customs—usu. the result of common ancestry, religion, and historical circumstances. A state is a great many persons, generally occupying a given territory, among whom the will of the majority—or of an ascertainable class of persons—prevails against anyone who opposes that will. A state may coincide exactly with one people, as in France, or may embrace several, as in the U.S.

peoplekind is an unnecessary formation for mankind or humankind. E.g., "While this solution would make everyone truly equal, it would be undesirable, because there would be no extraordinary individuals to lead peoplekind [read humankind] to new frontiers or new ideas." See humankind.

people's court. This phrase originated, oddly enough, as a propagandistic phrase for totalitarian regimes—e.g.: "The custom of prejudging guilt or innocence and of injecting evidence and opinions upon the trial by publicity can easily proceed to such a point that verdicts in highly publicized American cases will no more really represent the jurors' dispassionate personal judgment on the legal evidence than do those of 'People's Courts' we so criticize abroad." Robert H. Jackson, The Advocate: Guardian of Our Traditional Liberties, 36 A.B.A. J. 607, 609 (1950).

In the 1980s, a television show named "The People's Court" (Wapner, J., presiding) became extremely popular. Since that time, the phrase has come to mean a court in which ordinary people can solve their petty and not-so-petty disputes.

PER-. This prefix may mean "through" (perspicuous, impervious), or it may act as an intensive (perfervid, perforce, perchance).

per. A. In Citations. Per is used to indicate the judge who has written a majority opinion. E.g., In re City of Houston, 745 F.2d 925 (5th Cir. 1984) (per Reavley, J.). The Bluebook now recommends omitting per; it is sometimes useful, however, when a writer cites a case and believes that the authorship of the opinion is in some way noteworthy.

Even so, per should be avoided in text when no citation is involved—e.g.: "The dissent, per [read by] Justice White, objected that the majority's discussion of summary judgment rules is confusing and inconsistent . . . ." Steven A. Childress, A New Era for Summary Judgments, 116 F.R.D. 183, 187 (1987).

B. For a. Per may become a necessary substitute for a when it is used as part of a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—e.g.: "Entwistle calculated a per-winch profit figure of $3.20."/ "Defendants appeal, contending that the award of $150,000 per parent is excessive." See a (B).

peradventure is archaic in what used to be its primary sense, "perhaps." In the hackneyed phrase beyond peradventure, it means "doubt." E.g., "It is clear beyond peradventure that the income tax on wages is constitutional."/ "The meaning of the term in that subdivision is plain beyond all peradventure."

Beyond peradventure of a doubt is a REDUNDANCY: "But it is clear beyond peradventure of a doubt that [read beyond peradventure that] appellant and Nelda considered these weekends as devoted to recreation and refreshment." Cf. cavil, beyond.

per annum is unnecessary for a year, per year, or each year. Cf. per diem.

per anum (= through the anus), a EUPHEMISM appearing in contexts relating to sex crimes, is so spelled—not per annum (= per year), as some writers mistakenly render it: "Buggery is copulation per annum [read per anum] by a man with either another man or with a woman." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 465 (3d ed. 1982). A better, more straightforward phrase than copulation per anum would be anal copulation or anal sex.

per capita. A. And per caput. The first is the frequently used plural ("by heads"), the second the rare singular ("a head; by the head").

B. And per stirpes. Both phrases (meaning, respectively, "by heads" and "by stocks") are commonly used in the context of wills and estates. They denote different methods for calculating what the heirs or next-of-kin will receive. For example, in an intestate succession per capita, all claimants entitled to intestate shares take equally regardless of the share to which an ancestor through whom they claim would have been entitled. In succession per stirpes, the shares are determined usu. at the first generation of takers: thus, if one family stock has skipped a generation because a child has predeceased the decedent, the grandchildren of the decedent would divide among themselves an amount equal to what their deceased parent would have been entitled to.

Per stirpes (= by family stocks) is sometimes cited as a term of art that cannot be simplified. In fact, though, the phrase is ambiguous in ways explained in the entry TERMS OF ART. Leading writers on wills and estates generally recommend avoiding it. See, e.g., Stanley M. Johanson, In Defense of Plain Language, 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 37, 37–38 (1992).

percent; per-cent; per cent; per cent.; per centum. This sequence illustrates in reverse the evolution of this word, originally a phrase. Today it is best spelled as a single word. The plural of percent is percent; adding an -s, though not uncommon, is substandard.

In most writing, 75% is easier to read than 75 percent or (worse yet) seventy-five percent.

percentage of, a. One writes, "A high percentage of it is there," but "A percentage of them are there." Cf. proportion. See SYNESIS.

perceptible. See perceptive.

perceptive (= keenly intuitive) for perceptible (= appreciable, recognizable) is an infrequent error—e.g.: "Those professions that have tried that solution have paid handsomely without perceptive [read perceptible] improvement in their images." Bob Dunn, Contemplating Our Future, Tex. B.J., May 1992, at 448.

perchance is an ARCHAISM for perhaps—e.g.: "For if your system, perchance, lacks absolute utility, it is so much more efficient than that which we have had in our own country as to lead some to look to you for the solution of many of our common problems." (Eng.)

per contra (= on the other hand; to the contrary; by contrast) may seem to be a useful LATINISM because of its brevity, but the English words are much more widely understood. E.g., "That doctrine . . . had as its major premise the idea that the shipowner's liability for unseaworthiness is based on negligence. Per contra [read By contrast], both Mahnich and Sieracki had made clear that negligence had no part in the brave new world of unseaworthiness." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 395 (2d ed. 1975).

per curiam (= by the court) is primarily an adjective <per curiam opinion>, but is sometimes used as an elliptical form of per curiam opinion. E.g., "In the per curiam denying rehearing in Bennett, the en banc court for this circuit unanimously agreed on the statement of governing criteria by which a municipality's section 1983 liability is to be determined."

In still other contexts, the phrase is used adverbially—e.g.: "Presumably no one would have quarreled with the Calbeck majority if it had . . . reversed the Fifth Circuit per curiam . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 422 (2d ed. 1975). See by the court & per incuriam.

per diem = for or by the day <per diem fee>. Generally, it makes more sense to write a day <$50 a day> or daily <daily fee>. (See a (B).) Per diem, a LATINISM, has been defended when it is positioned before the noun it modifies, but daily is undoubtedly an improvement. In no legal context, one can safely say, is per diem the best available phrase.

perempt, v.t., in legal slang, is sometimes used as a BACK-FORMATION from peremptory challenge, the sense being "to exercise a peremptory challenge against"—e.g.: "We feel that under Batson, to perempt all the blacks on the panel . . . ." Barfield v. Orange County, 911 F.2d 644, 646 (11th Cir. 1990) (quoting counsel at trial). For another sense of the word, see preempt.

peremption. See preemption.

peremptory, adj., = admitting no contradiction or denial; incontrovertible. "The trial court erred in refusing to give the peremptory instruction that asked it to return a verdict of not guilty." Peremptory was originally a term from Roman law, meaning "that destroys, puts an end to, or precludes all debate, question, or delay" (OED) <peremptory edict>.

Since the early 20th century, peremptory has often been used as an elliptical form of peremptory challenge or strike, which denotes the removal of a veniremember without a showing of cause—e.g.:

- "[T]he trial judge went upon the theory that . . . plaintiff should have exhausted his peremptories upon the other two [jurors]." Martin v Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 102 N.W. 656, 658 (Mich. 1905).
- "After all peremptories have been taken, or the parties satisfied, the jury shall then be sworn as a body to try the cause." Avila v. U.S., 76 F.2d 39, 41 (9th Cir. 1935).
- "'You had peremptories still left that you could have exercised, had you thought you were not getting a fair jury.'" People v. Hancock, 40 N.W.2d 689, 698 (Mich. 1950) (quoting the trial judge).
- "While the fact that the jury included members of a group allegedly discriminated against is not conclusive, it is an indication of good faith in exercising peremptories, and an appropriate factor for the trial judge to consider in ruling on a Wheeler objection." People v. Turner, 32 Cal. Rptr. 2d 762, 777 (Cal. 1994) (en banc).

Cf. causal challenge.

The word is sometimes mistakenly written preemptory, no doubt as a result of the writer's mistakenly associating the word with the verb preempt—e.g.: "On Friday, Judge John Ouderkirk of State Superior Court dismissed a black woman after a challenge for cause and a black man after a pre-emptory [read peremptory] challenge by the prosecutor. In making pre-emptory [read peremptory] challenges, lawyers do not have to give a reason for wanting a prospective juror dismissed." Jury Queries Resume in Beating Case, N.Y. Times, 8 Aug. 1993, at 17./ "The State may not exercise its preemptory [read peremptory] challenges for purely racial reasons." Wilson v. State, 884 S.W.2d 904, 907 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 1994). For the correct use of preemptory, see preemptive.

perfect /pər-fekt/, v.t., = to bring to completion; to complete, finish, consummate, to carry through, accomplish (OED). This sense, now mostly legal, usu. appears in reference to perfecting appeals and perfecting liens. E.g., "[A] cadre of lawyers in Albany specializes in the art of perfecting bar appeals." Stephen Labaton, At the Bar, N.Y. Times, 18 Aug. 1989, at 20.

perfectible. So spelled. See -ABLE (A) perfect-tender rule = the less-than-robust rule that, in contracts between merchants, every aspect of the seller's performance is a condition of the buyer's liability, so that the buyer is privileged to reject the goods if the seller deviates even slightly from the contractual requirements. The phrase should be hyphenated thus. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

per incuriam is not the opposite of per curiam (= by the court); rather, it means "through inadvertence; in ignorance of the relevant law." Today it is used more commonly in BrE than in AmE. E.g., "As a general rule the only cases in which decisions should be held to have given per incuriam are those of decisions given in ignorance or forgetfulness of some inconsistent statutory provision or of some authority binding on the court concerned . . . ." Morrelle Ltd. v. Wakeling, [1955] 2 Q.B. 389, 406./ "When the essence of a pervious decision with which a judge disagrees cannot so easily be dismissed as obiter dictum, the judge may, as a desperate last resort, categorize the previous decision as per incuriam (an acceptable legal euphemism for a judgment [that] was obviously wrong)." David Pannick, Judges 159 (1987).

periodic tenancy; tenancy from month to month; tenancy from year to year. The phrase periodic tenancy is the genus of which both tenancy from month to month and tenancy from year to year are species. A periodic tenancy continues for a year—or any fraction of a year—and for successive equivalent periods until terminated by either party with proper notice. This type of tenancy most commonly arises when a lease term ends and is automatically (and repeatedly) renewed another month or year.

Within the Anglo-American classifications of property rights, the periodic tenancy has a dual nature: "[P]eriodic tenancies of all types are now considered to be non-freehold 'estates in land,' although they are also 'chattels real'—i.e., personal rather than real property." Roger A. Cunningham et al., The Law of Property 82 (2d ed. 1993). See chattels & estate.

Though periodic tenancy is a general term, it is often used interchangeably with the more specific phrases (tenancy from month to month and tenancy from year to year), as periods other than months or years are highly unusual. The more specific phrases are often preferable because they are more universally comprehensible.

The more specific terms are often written month-to-month tenancy and year-to-year tenancy, the hyphens being necessary in a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE that precedes the noun.

period of time is usually unnecessary in place of either period or time.

PERIPHRASIS = a roundabout way of writing or speaking. Many a legal writer uses "jargon to shirk prose, palming off periphrasis upon us when with a little trouble he could have gone straight to the point." Arthur Quiller-Couch, On the Art of Writing 108 (1916; repr. 1961). See JARGON, EUPHEMISMS & REDUNDANCY perjorative is a misspelling of pejorative. See pejorative.

PERIPHRASTIC COMPARATIVES. See COMPARATIVES AND SUPERLATIVES (B).

perjure is now used only as a reflexive verb—e.g.: "The petitioner maintains that he was unable to discover that these witnesses perjured themselves." See perjury.

perjured; perjurious; perjurous; perjurial. Perjured is now the usual adjective corresponding to perjury—e.g.: "The evidence must show beyond the existence of a reasonable doubt that the alleged perjured testimony of the person suborned was under oath duly and legally administered." The word perjurious is somewhat broader because it means "involving perjury" as opposed to the more specific sense of perjured (= characterized by perjury). Thus, it is possible to speak of a person's perjurious tendencies but not of perjured tendencies.

Perjurous is an obsolete spelling of perjurious, which is analogous in formation to injurious. E.g., "[A]n affidavit . . . was [allegedly] 'false and perjurious . . . .'" Sprecher v. Graber, 716 F.2d 968, 970 (2d Cir. 1983)./ "[T]he Supreme Court of Arizona has held that succumbing to a client's demand to elicit obvious perjurious testimony . . . amounts to ineffective assistance of counsel . . . ." Sanborn v. State, 474 So. 2d 309, 313 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985).

The form perjurial, a NEEDLESS VARIANT, has no warrant: "There is a sea of motions, demands, claims, counterclaims and plenty of innuendoes on each side as to the perjurial [read perjurious] aptitude of the other . . . ." Rocket Mining Corp. v. Gill, 417 P.2d 120, 120 (Utah 1966).

perjurer. So spelled—not perjuror.

perjurial; perjurious. See perjured.

perjury; false swearing; forswearing. The popular meaning of the first two terms is the same, namely, "swearing to what the witness knows to be untrue." Forswearing is a little-used equivalent of false swearing; forswearing also means, of course, "repudiating, renouncing." The technical DIFFERENTIATION at common law between perjury and false swearing, apart from their being separate indictable offenses, is that perjury connotes corruption and recalcitrance, whereas false swearing (or false oath) connotes mere falsehood without these additional moral judgments.

permanence; permanency. Both forms are used frequently. The two share the sense "the quality or state of being permanent." But while permanence emphasizes durability <the permanence of the snow>, permanency emphasizes duration <the permanency of fees tail>.

permission; acquiescence. Permission connotes an authorization to do something, whereas acquiescence connotes the passive failure to object to someone's doing something.

permissive; permissory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

permit. See allow (B).

permit of = to leave room for <the words permit of more than one interpretation>. This phrase is common in contexts involving the interpretation of drafted documents, or statutes.

permittee. See -EE.

permute; permutate. Permute, v.t., is—apart from specialized mathematical uses—merely a fancy equivalent of the verb to change. Permutate is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

perorate; orate. The former means "to conclude a formal address," although it is infrequently misunderstood as meaning "to declaim rhetorically or emotionally." Orate, a BACK-FORMATION, was once widely considered objectionable or merely humorous; yet it is losing this stigma.

peroration refers, most strictly, to the concluding part of a speech. And the word ordinarily bears that sense—e.g.: "In an eloquent peroration, Brennan concluded by observing . . . ." Geoffrey R. Stone, Justice Brennan and the Freedom of Speech: A First Amendment Odyssey, 139 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1333, 1352 (1991)./ "At the time, I thought my peroration was brilliant. I concluded my argument by rising with oratorical fervor . . . ." Stanley Mosk, Culpability, Restitution, and the Environment: The Vitality of Common Law Rules, 21 Ecology L.Q. 551, 554 (1994).

But, through SLIPSHOD EXTENSION—primarily because the closing of a speech is typically the most impassioned and rhetorical part—some writers have used the word as if it referred to any rhetorically charged speech or writing. E.g.: "Professor Tribe's perorations [read comments? rhetoric?] about the not-so-absolute absolutes should seem a very sorry affair against at least the science of general relativity . . . ." Stanley L. Jaki, Patterns over Principles: The Pseudoscientific Roots of Law's Debacle, 38 Am. J. Juris. 135, 144 (1993).

In any event, the word is unacceptably strained when asked to refer to opening remarks—e.g.: "After opening with a passionate peroration [read After opening passionately], the dissent begins its technical-legal analysis by quoting a New Deal dissent in United States v Butler, one of the Old Court's last desperate struggles on behalf of a Madisonian understanding of limited national powers." Bruce Ackerman, Liberating Abstraction, 59 U. Chi. L. Rev. 317, 327 (1992). Was Ackerman perhaps straining for an alliteration that led him astray of the sense?

Some writers seem to use the word with little idea of its true meaning. One can only guess at the authors' intentions in the following passages: "Harvey cites one judge's peroration [read praise?] of the merits of the British law of evidence as evidence that the judge was 'certifiable,' and, in the style of Rumpole, alludes to the law in general as a sort of formality." Richard H. Underwood, Logic and the Common Law Trial, 18 Am. J. Trial Advoc. 151, 199 n.12 (1994)./ "The Cooney court preceded its discussion of interest analysis with a similar peroration [read allusion or reference?] to the fact that the conflict did not involve conduct-regulating rules . . . ." Aaron D. Twerski, A Sheep in Wolf's Clothing: Territorialism in the Guise of Interest Analysis [etc.], 59 Brook. L. Rev. 1351, 1361 (1994).

perpetrator; abettor; inciter; criminal protector. These terms name the four different kinds of criminally culpable parties at common law. Perpetrator = one who, with mens rea (q.v.), has caused a socially harmful occurrence either personally or through some tool or innocent agent. Abettor = one who is present at the scene of a crime, either actually or constructively, and who, with mens rea, either helps the perpetrator commit the crime or stands by with intent—known to the perpetrator—to help if needed, or otherwise encourages the perpetrator. Inciter = one who, with mens rea, helps, commands, or encourages another to commit a crime without being either actually or constructively present when it is carried out. Criminal protector = one who is in no way tainted with guilt of a crime when perpetrated but who, with full knowledge of the facts, later conceals the offender or helps prevent detection, arrest, trial, or punishment. See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 723–26 (3d ed. 1982).

In the crime of treason, all such parties are principals. In misdemeanors, the first three are principals, and criminal protectors are not punishable. In felonies:

- Perpetrators are principals in the first degree.
- Abettors are principals in the second degree.
- Inciters are accessories before the fact.
- Criminal protectors are accessories after the fact.

Cf. accomplice. See principal (B).

perpetuable. So spelled—not perpetuatable. See -ATABLE.

perpetuate (= to make last indefinitely, prolong) and perpetrate (= to commit or carry out) are surprisingly often confounded. E.g., "In 1988, Federal District Judge James L. Kluf dismissed the suit as baseless, accused Mr. Shean of knowingly perpetuating [read perpetrating] a fraud and fined the Christie Institute . . . ." Michael Kelly, Perot Shows Penchant for Seeing Conspiracy, N.Y. Times, 26 Oct. 1992, at A10./ "This allowed Ogle to use said document to perpetuate [read perpetrate] a fraud on a bank lending institution in connection with a $100,000 loan." Taylor v. Sullivan, 613 N.Y.S.2d 397, 398 (App. Div. 1994).

The word perpetuate is correctly used in the following sentence: "Amassing wealth over an extended period of time may have been attractive to some of the landed gentry of England who sought to perpetuate family fortunes in the feudal tradition, unhampered by income or estate taxes."

per procurationem = by proxy. The phrase is abbreviated per pro., p. proc., p. pro., or p.p.

perquisite; prerequisite. Perquisite, often shortened to perk, means "a privilege or benefit given in addition to one's salary or regular wages." Prerequisite = a previous condition or requirement.

per quod*; per se. Literally, per quod = whereby. In all tort actions, per quod once introduced the allegations giving rise to special damages by a showing of consequences stemming from the defendant's acts. Per se violations required no such showing. The phrases survive in defamation cases. See, e.g., Kurz v. The Evening News Ass'n, 375 N.W.2d 391, 394 (Mich. Ct. App. 1985). E.g., "The law has always made a distinction between false imputations that may be actionable in themselves, per se, and those that may be actionable only on allegation and proof of special damage, or per quod."

Unfortunately, though, the use of per se in defamation contexts is ambiguous because it invites confusion with another distinction in the law of defamation: that between words that are facially defamatory ("You're an embezzler") and words that amount to subtle, veiled defamations. Statements of the latter type require some pleading and proof of innuendo or explanation. But this distinction, valuable as it is, has nothing whatever to do with whether special damages must be proved. Even so, some American courts have been misled by the linguistic similarity between actionable per se and defamatory per se. See Charles T. McCormick, Handbook of the Law of Damages § 113, at 417–18 (1935).

per se (lit., "through [or in, by, of] itself") = (1) standing alone; in itself; or (2) as a matter of law. The phrase is both adverb and adjective. Formerly used almost always after the adjective or noun it modifies, today it is commonly used before: "The district court submitted the case to the jury on the theory that such a conspiracy, if proved, is per se illegal."/ "The case is being closely watched by antitrust specialists, because the decision may revise an old and important antitrust doctrine known as the per se rule."/ "Appellant asserts that his back ailment is per se disabling."/ "There is no longer a presumption of specific deadly intent when a per se deadly weapon is used by the defendant."

The phrase usually takes no punctuation, even though its English equivalent in itself or of itself is ordinarily set off by commas. When, however, per se is used as a direct functional equivalent of one of these phrases, it should be set off: "That the propriety, per se, of searches of law offices is an area of some controversy makes it more, not less, imperative that public officials not disregard the strictures of the fourth amendment."

When used before the noun it modifies, per se often means "absolute." E.g., "This inquiry calls for line-drawing, but no fixed per se rule can be expressed or applied in any particular case."/ "We are not disposed to fashion a per se rule requiring reversal of every conviction following tardy appointment of counsel."

Per se has become a TERM OF ART in antitrust law, referring to an outright violation of the antitrust statutes. The Supreme Court of the United States has defined per se antitrust violations as those "which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use." Northern Pac. Ry. v. U.S., 356 U.S. 1, 5 (1958). Per se is not absolute in American antitrust law: there may be behavior that is a per se violation of the statute, yet the violator may still raise defenses, such as impossibility due to market conditions.

The phrase has been extended in antitrust contexts well beyond its usual sense, from per se illegality to per se rules or analysis to per se language—e.g.: "Per se language expresses a mood of undoubted hostility to a practice." 7 Phillip Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1510, at 417 (1986). See per quod.

persecute. See prosecute.

persevere. Because this word is frequently a victim of the intrusive -r-, it is often mispronounced (and misspelled) perservere.

-PERSON. For a discussion of this suffix, see SEXISM (B).

person. This word illustrates the tendency lawyers have to take an ordinary English word and give it an unnatural meaning: "So far as legal theory is concerned, a person is any being whom the law regards as capable of rights and duties. Any being that is so capable is a person, whether a human being or not, and no being that is not so capable is a person, even though he be a man." J.W. Salmond, Jurisprudence 299 (P.J. Fitzgerald ed., 12th ed. 1966). Lon Fuller, among others, has questioned whether person is the most desirable word for the concept. See Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 12–14 (1967). What term might be better? Fuller suggests legal subject or right-and-duty bearing unit. Id. On second thought, perhaps person is not quite so bad.

PERSON. It is important in any piece of writing, and especially in DRAFTING, not to confuse one's references to persons, as by switching the voice through which the prose is set down. The writer should not change the person through whom the writing speaks, as by slipping in and out of third person, with first person interspersed.

Following is an example from a will quoted in an opinion:

> The party of the first part . . . does hereby remise, release, and forever quitclaim unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever, all the real estate of the said Ella F. Sherwood [the party of the first part], wherever situate, to have and to hold the same unto the party of the second part, his heirs, executors, and administrators and assigns forever, and for the same considerations, I do hereby sell . . . unto the party of the second part all personal property

Here is another specimen, in which testator = party of the first part. "This conveyance and transfer is made upon the condition that the party of the second part, my husband, survive me, and the same is intended to vest and take effect upon my decease and until said time the same shall be subject to revocation upon the part of the party of the first part." In both of these examples, certainly, use of the first person would be preferable throughout. See FIRST PERSON & party of the first part.

persona is singular, not plural—personae being the plural. Hence: "Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law in two volumes is quite detailed and because of its articles on long forgotten legal persona [read personae or, better yet, personages], incidents and maxims is an amusing read in itself." P.H. Kenny, Studying Law 47 (1985).

personal injury. When used as a noun phrase, two words unhyphenated; when used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, hyphenated—e.g.: "But over the past year, personal-injury attorneys have been successful in having a number of such laws overturned." Court in Washington Voids a Law Limiting Some Jury Awards, Wall St. J., 1 May 1989, at B5.

personal law — the law that governs a given person in family matters, usu. regardless of where the person goes. In common-law systems, personal law refers to the law of the individual's domicile. (See lex domicilii.) In civil-law systems, it refers to the law of the individual's nationality (and is sometimes called lex patriae). E.g., "[S]uccession to immovables on the basis of the personal law of the decedent, as distinct from the law of the situs, has long been the rule in a substantial number of civilian jurisdictions." Alfred Hill, The Judicial Function in Choice of Law, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 1585, 1647 (1985). The effect of the differing systems is that, in civilian countries, personal law follows the person, whereas in common-law countries it does not.

Still other, religion-based systems establish a personal law for some aspects of life such as marriage, divorce, inheritance, legitimacy, adoption, and many types of capacity—e.g.:

- "While the Hindu Code retains personal law for Hindus, that personal law has almost entirely eliminated traditional caste distinctions." Jamie Cassels, Bitter Knowledge, Vibrant Action: Reflections of Law and Society in Modern India, 1991 Wis. L. Rev. 109, 137 (book review).
- "While article 44 of the constitution envisages the eventual adoption of a uniform civil code, Hindus, Muslims and other religious communities are still subject in many respects to their personal law . . . ." Id. n.9.
- "All members of a religious community, whether a majority or minority—Jews, Muslims, and members of different Christian communities in Israel; Muslims and Hindus in India—may be subject to a religion-based family law that is applied by religious courts. Like power sharing, a personal law can provide an important degree of autonomy and cohesion even for minorities that are territorially dispersed." Henry J. Steiner, Ideals and Counter-Ideals in the Struggle over Autonomy Regimes for Minorities, 66 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1539, 1542 (1991).

Though limited in Anglo-American law, the concept still applies to some degree: although American and English courts look chiefly to the law of the person's domicile, a person of full age and capacity may establish a desired personal law merely by choosing a given place—the place where that law is in effect—as a domicile.

personal property. For the historical basis for the distinction between real property and personal property, see real.

personal representative is a broad term for a person who, on another's death, collects the decedent's property, pays the debts, and distributes what is left among those entitled under a will or under the rules of succession on intestacy. The two types of personal representatives are executors and administrators. See administrator.

personalty (= personal property) is contrasted with realty. E.g., "Personalty is transferred, leased, hired, mortgaged, lent in very simple ways. As a rule it can be done by word of mouth. It is very different with realty." Max Radin, The Law and You 124–25 (1948). The word should not be confused with personality.

perspicuous; perspicacious. Perspicuous is to perspicacious as intelligible is to intelligent. Perspicuous may be defined etymologically as "see-through-it-ive-ness"; it means "clear; lucid; seen readily," and is applied to thought and expression. E.g., in the nominal form: "The former term indicates with tolerable perspicuity a right available in personam." Perspicacious = penetrating in thought; acutely discerning; keen; shrewd .

persuade; convince. One persuades another to do something, but one convinces or, archaically, persuades another of something. Either persuade or convince may be used with a that-phrase object, although persuade that occurs seldom outside law. American judges seem addicted to the expression. E.g., "If the statutory language were not enough to persuade us that the Secretary's interpretation is incorrect, these limitless consequences would certainly give us pause."/ "We are persuaded that the indemnity provision clearly encompasses negligence of the indemnitee and losses arising from strict liability." pertinence; pertinency. The first is now the usual and preferred form—e.g.: "I concede that a testator cannot prescribe in his will that an act to be performed by him, indifferent in itself and having no pertinency [read pertinence] except its effect on his testamentary dispositions, shall change such dispositions."/ "To appreciate the pertinency [read pertinence] of these statements, we may ask ourselves what the duty of counsel would have been had they been true." petit jury. A. And petty jury. The former is now the accepted spelling in AmE; the development is perhaps a favorable one, for nonlawyers are likely to read petty in its modern sense even though they are familiar with the phrase. (See petty offense.) A petit jury (= a trial jury) is contrasted with a grand jury (= the jury that decides whether to hand down an indictment or information). E.g., "It would, of course, be impossible to obtain a petit jury that reflects all the distinctive groups in a community."/ "The Supreme Court has stated that the systematic exclusion of persons based upon race from the grand jury pool, the petit jury pool, or the petit jury through the prosecutor's use of peremptory challenges, violates a defendant's equal protection rights guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment." Cf. grand jury.

In BrE, petty jury seems to be the predominant spelling—e.g.: "A prisoner who is indicted is tried by a petty jury." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 25 (3d ed. 1955).

B. Pronunciation. Petit jury should be pronounced in the same way as petty jury. But in some American jurisdictions—such as Texas, alas—the pronunciation /pet-it/ has taken hold. See HYPERCORRECTION (K) petit larceny; petty larceny. The former is now the predominant spelling. See larceny (C).

petitory is an adjective used in reference to suits seeking to try title to real property or to a vessel, independently of possession. E.g., "Former Admiralty Rule 19 dealt with possessory and petitory actions."/ "Real actions were brought to recover lands, tenements, or hereditaments. They were of two classes, petitory and possessory. In petitory actions the controversy was concerning the property and right. In possessory actions the dispute was in relation only to the possession." Edwin E. Bryant, The Law of Pleading Under the Codes of Civil Procedure 4 (1899).

pettifogger; shyster. Both are contemptuous words for lawyer, but there is a difference, as explained here, rather magniloquently:

> The pettifogger, as a lawyer, is an unlearned, little, mean character, lacking in ability, sound judgment or good common sense, while the shyster may be possessed of much learning, great ability or an abundance of shrewdness and cunning, but he is a trickster and a dishonest schemer; he is a fomenter of litigation, strife and discord in the community; he is a manufacturer of evidence, a fosterer of perjury and a promoter of bribery; he is a cunning thief, who conceals his perfidy and rascality under the cloak of the law; he cunningly abuses the noble profession to which he has been admitted as a weapon of offense in deeds of unjust oppression, scheming knavery and the procurement of confidence and the repose of trust, which he basely abuses, when there is opportunity to profit by so doing
> R. L. Harmon, addressing Alabama Bar Ass'n in 1897 (quoted in George W. Warvelle, Essays in Legal Ethics 69 (1902)).

Modern lawyers and judges use the term pettifogger with some frequency—e.g.: "Quite the contrary, counsel in that case were not pettifoggers . . . ." Nebeker v. Piper Aircraft Corp., 747 P.2d 18, 38 (Idaho 1987). See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR.

pettifoggery (= legal chicanery) is the noun corresponding to the agent noun pettifogger, q.v. E.g., "The opposition of Goodman and Dorsey to the motion to compel discovery was specious, replete with linguistic legerdemain, half truths and pettifoggery." In re Marriage of Lemen, 170 Cal. Rptr. 642, 649 (Ct. App. 1980).

petty jury. See petit jury.

petty larceny. See petit larceny.

petty offense. In G.B., this phrase (spelled petty offence in BrE) has dropped from the criminal law because it was thought to minimize unduly a serious infraction of the law. In the U.S., some have wondered whether a petty offense is actually a crime. It is, despite the misleading terminology: a repealed federal statute provided that any misdemeanor "the penalty for which . . . does not exceed imprisonment for a period of six months or a fine of not more than $5,000, or both, is a petty offense." 18 U.S.C. § 1(3) (1988). See petit jury (A).

phantasy. See fantasy.

phase for faze (= to disconcert) is an increasingly common blunder—e.g.: "The fact that the Ohio Supreme Court had ignored this slip and treated the tax as what, practically speaking, it was, didn't phase [read faze] the U.S. Supreme Court." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 81 (1939; repr. 1980). In Rodell's case, the mistake was probably an editor's error; on page 134 of the same book appears a correct use: "[T]hat will not faze the law schools."

The mistake often appears in the form unphased (for unfazed)—e.g.: "NYCERS, apparently unphased [read unfazed] by the absence of any express legislative authority, maintains that it is nevertheless empowered to carve out substantial exclusions from the statutorily constituted membership class." Doctors Council v. New York City Employees' Retirement Sys., 514 N.Y.S.2d 922, 933 (App. Div. 1987)./ "The people who are not dissuaded, however, are strongly attracted to the absence of constraints, and relatively unphased [read unfazed] by the absence of support." James M. Doyle, "It's The Third World Down There!": The Colonialist Vocation and American Criminal Justice, 27 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 71, 105 (1992)./ "Unphased [read Unfazed] by the absence of those critical terms, the court simply decided to superimpose 18 U.S.C. § 2's broad accomplice liability onto 21 U.S.C. § 848(e)(1)(B)." Brian Serr, Of Crime and Punishment, Kingpins and Footsoldiers, Life and Death, 25 Ariz. St. L.J. 895, 910 (1993).

Ph.D. (= Philosophical Doctor, Doctor of Philosophy) requires the internal period.

phenomena is a plural noun, phenomenon being the singular—e.g.: "The Supreme Court recently explained this phenomena [read phenomenon] in Powers v. Ohio . . . ." People v. Boston, 586 N.E.2d 326, 332 (Ill. App. Ct. 1991) (Johnson, J., dissenting). "The terminology for this phenomena [read this phenomenon or these phenomena] is 'mandates without funding.'" Montie Hasie, School Boards Bearing Brunt of Taxpayers' Anger, Amarillo News-Globe, 11 Oct. 1992, at 29A.

Philadelphia lawyer. In colonial America, Philadelphia was the center of legal, literary, and scientific endeavors. During that period, the phrase Philadelphia lawyer took on the meaning "a shrewd and learned lawyer." Why? One explanation is that the phrase resulted from Andrew Hamilton's successful defense of the New York printer John Peter Zenger against libel charges in 1735—a case that helped establish freedom of the press in the U.S. Observers are said to have noted that a Philadelphia lawyer got Zenger off. But the OED records no uses of the term until 1788, so the origin remains obscure.

Even today, though, the term is used in much the same way as it was in the late 18th century—e.g.: "[E]mployers say the rules are hopelessly complex and costly. 'A Philadelphia lawyer can't even figure these out,' says Kenneth Morrissey, FMC Corp. employee benefits manager." Labor Letter, Wall St. J., 11 Feb. 1992, at 1A. In other contexts, predictably, the phrase merely denotes a lawyer who hails from Philadelphia. What is difficult to say is what the phrase connotes in such a context. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A). philosophical; philosophic. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

PHRASAL ADJECTIVES. A. General Rule. When a phrase functions as an adjective—an increasingly frequent phenomenon in late-20th-century English—the phrase should ordinarily be hyphenated. Seemingly everyone in the literary world knows this except lawyers. For some unfathomable reason—perhaps because they are accustomed to slow, dull, heavy reading—lawyers resist these hyphens.

But professional editors regularly supply them, and rightly so. The primary reason for them is that they prevent MISCUES and make reading easier and faster. Thus:

affirmative-action policy agency-enabling statute breach-of-contract claims child-support payments civil-rights case conspiracy-law dispute federal-question case good-faith exception grand-jury probe
health-care provider health-care-related issues horse-and-buggy days in-court testimony paid-in capital personal-injury lawyer purchase-money mortgage real-estate practice stop-and-frisk procedures subject-matter jurisdiction third-degree assault
two-party check

When the reader encounters such a phrasal adjective, he or she is not misled into thinking momentarily that the modifying phrase is really a noun itself. (See MISCUES (D).) The following examples demonstrate the hesitation caused by a missing hyphen:

- "The benefit of insurance and waiver of subrogation clauses [read benefit-of-insurance and waiver-of-subrogation clauses] in the affreightment contracts are invalid because they conflict with the plaintiff's marine cargo insurance policy."
- "Merely because a court made rule [read court-made rule] has been in effect for many years does not render it invulnerable to judicial attack once it becomes obsolescent."
- "The applicable one year statute of limitations [read one-year statute of limitations] started to run from December 13, 1959."
- "Perhaps . . . it would have been possible to harmonize the presumption of authority provisions [read presumption-of-authority provisions] with the duty to inquire provision [read duty-to-inquire provision]." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 674 (2d ed. 1975). (Elsewhere in their book, Gilmore and Black show better stylistic judgment—see (C).)
- "As the legal community and press became more interested in comparative law firm economics [read comparative law-firm economics], public service [read public-service] and pro bono [read pro-bono] representation decreased in importance." Paul J. Bschorr, Challenges for the Decade, Litig., Summer 1991, at 1, 1.

Hyphenating these phrasal adjectives also minimizes NOUN PLAGUE. For instance, common law is the noun phrase and common-law the adjectival phrase; when the phrase has no hyphen, the reader does not expect a noun to follow it.

One sees the pronounced improvement in readability especially when two compound adjectives modify one noun:

- common-law mirror-image rule
- long-latency occupational-disease cases
- 13-year-old court-ordered busing plan.

Following are examples in which enlightened legal writers supplied the necessary hyphens:

- "To the law-of-nature school, lawmaking was but an absolute development of absolute principles." Roscoe Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law 44 (1922).
- "[T]he main plea was that the entire separate-but-equal doctrine be discarded . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 323 (1955).
- "Rank-and-file lawyers were too untrained for Chitty." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 146 (2d ed. 1985).
- "The petition . . . argues that the ruling 'took a major step away from settled law' in the First Amendment's free-exercise-of-religion clause." Wall St. J., 11 May 1990, at B2.

When a compound modifier begins with an adverb that ends in -ly, the hyphen is dropped—e.g.: "This is the legally-relevant [read legally relevant] feature . . . ." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 20 (2d ed. 1961)./ "With the hotly-contested [read hotly contested] Second Congressional District primary six days away, supporters of Sen. Bob Smith gathered last night . . . ." M.L. Elrick, Kemp Coy on Plans for 1996, Concord Monitor (N.H.), 8 Sept. 1994, at B1.

B. Phrasal Adjectives of Foreign Origin. A few phrasal adjectives, such as bona fide, ex officio, mens rea, pro rata, and res ipsa loquitur—in which the words generally have no English meaning when taken alone—are usually treated as exceptions to the rule of hyphenation.

Still, some writers grant them no exemption from hyphens—e.g.: "An entirely different approach to the problem of distinguishing preparation from attempt is suggested by the res-ipsa-loquitur test." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 134 (1982)./ "The origins of the common-law mens-rea requirement are obscure." Id. at 200./ "On one view, there is a prima- facie duty of care . . . ." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 45 (4th ed. 1991). Cf. alter ego.

C. Snakelike Compounds. Instead of toying with snakelike compounds, writers are usually well advised to rework the sentence: "Each contract included a waiver-of-all-rights-to-subrogation clause [read a clause waiving all rights to subrogation]."/ "We found no merit in any other issue raised, including an ineffective-assistance-of-counsel claim [read including a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel]." Here is a particularly ugly specimen: "We are law-of-the-case-bound in this matter and thus cannot reconsider this contention." [Read We are bound by law of the case and thus cannot reconsider this contention.]

Some writers do use them, usually to create a jocular or self-mocking tone—e.g.: "For the political law of Holmes's time was, with a few . . . lapses and interludes, merely a more concentrated continuation of the let-business-alone-and-let-it-run-the-country jurisprudence that had come to full flower late in the preceding century." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 185 (1955)./ "The no-lien-for-partial-execution-of-affreightment-contracts rule of the Pacific Export case does have the merit of running both ways, as the so-called 'dead freight' cases show." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 639 (2d ed. 1975).

Sometimes phrasal adjectives incorporate so many disparate elements that, when combined with the noun that follows, they have an effect similar to NOUN PLAGUE—e.g.: "A child-sex-abuse defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses against him was violated . . . ." Screening Defendant from Accuser Violates Confrontation Clause, 57 U.S.L.W. 1003, 1003 (5 July 1988).

D. Suspension Hyphens. When two phrasal adjectives have a common element at the end, and this ending portion (usu. the last word) appears only with the second phrase, insert a suspension hyphen after the unattached words to show their relationship with the common element. The hyphens become especially important when the phrases are compounded in this way—e.g.: "The government argues that this designation is ineffective because it reflects a ten- rather than a two-year federal sentence."/ "A court faced with enforcing a general- or public-interest law, however, should give vent to its imagination, since such a law is designed to vest discretion in the judicial branch."

Here the hyphens are not supplied, to the reader's puzzlement: "The situs of this case is the small city of Apopka, Florida, located in the fern and foliage growing region [read in the fern- and foliage-growing region] north of Orlando."

For more on the use of hyphens, see PUNCTUATION (F).

E. Amount or Period of Time. With compound adjectives denoting periods of time and amounts, plurals should be dropped in the adjectival phrase. Hence, "The record is silent as to whether Annie Bell was born after a normal nine months pregnancy [read nine-month pregnancy]." Likewise, one should write three-week hiatus, fourteen-hour-a-day schedule, and four-year decline. The exception is with fractions .

F. Proper Noun. When a name is used attributively as a phrasal adjective, it ordinarily remains unhyphenated. E.g., "The Terry Maher strategy put immediate pressure on rival bookshop chains . . . ." Raymond Snoddy, Book Price War Looms in Britain, Financial Times, 28–29 Sept. 1991, at 1.

G. Phrasal Adjectives Following the Noun. When predicative, phrasal adjectives are not usually hyphenated: "This rule is well worn," but "This is a well-worn rule." An exception is short-lived, which is always hyphenated.

H. Phrases with Only One Element Joined. When the first or second element in a phrasal adjective is compound, it too needs to be hyphenated: post-cold-war norms, not post-cold war norms. Otherwise, as in the example just quoted, post appears more closely related to cold than war does. E.g., "Palumbo wants a Domesday book-style appraisal [read Domesday-book-style appraisal] of all cultural buildings with a cash breakdown of the needed repairs." Geordie Grieg, £1 Billion to Restore Britain's Heritage by AD 2000, Sunday Times, 1 July 1990, at 1-1.

PHRASAL VERBS are verbs that are made up of more than one word, often a verb and a preposition. When using a phrasal verb, one must be certain to include the entire phrase and not just the primary verb. Thus statutes are struck down, not just struck. Likewise, contracts are entered into, not just entered. Sue out, q.v., means something different from sue. We must respect, then, the latter part of phrasal verbs as much as the earlier. Prove up, make whole, hold over, hand down or out (an opinion), make payment for, and work out (a settlement) are a few of the phrasal verbs common in law. Generally, writers should not be timid in using phrasal verbs; they are usually not substandard or even colloquial, unless the particle is unnecessary. (See PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.) For a full collection of verbs of this kind, see G.W. Davidson, Chambers Pocket Guide to Phrasal Verbs (1982).

When one phrasal verb is part of a DOUBLET, an AMBIGUITY may arise if an adverb occurs in the midst of the phrasal verb—e.g.: "In no case may a corporation purchase or make payment, directly or indirectly, for its own share when there is reasonable ground for believing that the corporation is insolvent." Does the phrase directly or indirectly apply to purchase? If so, read purchase or make payment for, directly or indirectly.

In the following specimen, the writer left the phrasal verb incomplete, apparently out of fear of using an unnecessary particle: "Drawing [read Drawing on] the principle that the acquisition of monopoly power is illegal only if not accomplished by legitimate means such as business acumen or historical accident, appellee observes that appellant's sole theory of exclusionary conduct is unsupported by the record." Cf. strike.

PHRASING refers to syntactic structures, their graceful logic or maladroit clumsiness. The writer should have some sense of how best to order the parts of a sentence, so that it will be logically, and preferably even elegantly, constructed. Many of the specific maladies of construction are discussed throughout this work. Hence this entry can do little more than exemplify some of the general problems and offer remedies—e.g.:

- "The plaintiff having conveyed away by deed, purporting to grant a fee simple interest in the lands in question, and having had them conveyed back to her, is now seized of a fee simple interest." This sentence can be greatly improved by repositioning the subject directly before the verb and by making the participial phrase an introductory one that leads into the main clause. [Read Having purported to convey (less redundant than having conveyed away) a fee simple interest in the lands in question, and having had them conveyed back to her, the plaintiff is now seised (the better spelling) of a fee simple interest.] See ANFRACTUOSITY.
- "The jury made a special finding that the defendant, in firing the bomb, exercised reasonable care." This sounds as if the bomb was fired in order to pursue such care! [Read The jury made a special finding that the defendant exercised reasonable care in firing the bomb.]
- "Clearly, if the policy was to be preserved some means was needed adapted to the new types of interest made possible by new methods of transforming ownership." [Read If the policy was to be preserved, what was needed was some means adapted to the types of interest made possible by novel methods of conveyancing.]
- "In the case of a vested remainder, there is a person in being ascertained and ready to take, has a present right of future enjoyment." This is downright ungrammatical. [Read . . . there is a person in being, ascertained and ready to take, who . . . .]
- "The Erie had contended that application of the Pennsylvania rule was required, among other things, by section 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789 . . . ." Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 71 (1938). This phrasing suggests that the Pennsylvania rule was not just required, but mandated, demanded, necessitated ("among other things"). [Read The Erie had contended that application of the Pennsylvania rule was required by, among other things, section 34 . . . .]

P.I., in lawyers' slang, refers to "personal-injury law." E.g., "Tingey finally quit Galane's firm in frustration over his mentor's refusal to take the steady, well-paying personal injury (PI) cases that would have amply subsidized Galane's other legal work." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 18 (1989). This initialism is best written with periods after each letter. See ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS.

picaresque; picturesque. These words are quite different. Picaresque = roguish. Picturesque = fit to be the subject of a picture; strikingly graphic.

picnic, v.i., makes picnicking and picnicked. Cf. panic & mimic.

picturesque. See picaresque.

piece of (one's) mind. See peace of mind.

piercing the corporate veil; lifting the corporate veil. The former is the AmE phrase, the latter the BrE phrase, meaning "the act of disregarding the veil of incorporation that separates the property of a corporation from the property of its security holders."

Sometimes pierce is used in extended, elliptical senses, as here: "Were a corporation to attempt to perpetrate a fraud on the court by improperly creating or destroying diversity jurisdiction, we would not elevate form over substance but would accomplish whatever piercing and adjustments were considered necessary to protect the court's jurisdiction." (The piercing referred to apparently would entail judicial directives or sanctions against corporate officials—in effect, the court would disregard the veil of incorporation.)

pinpoint citation; jump citation; dictum page. The first is the most usual of these synonymous phrases, which denote the page on which a quotation or relevant passage appears, as opposed to the page on which a case or article begins. For example, in the following citation, the number 595 denotes the pinpoint citation: Groh v. Brooks, 421 F.2d 589, 595 (3d Cir. 1970). Sometimes, the pinpoint citation coincides with the first page of the case or article cited, as here: Groh v. Brooks, 421 F.2d 589, 589 syl. 1 (3d Cir. 1970).

Today, jump citation is nearly as common as pinpoint citation. But dictum page appears to be obsolescent; it was used in the Bluebook in the 1950s but has long since been abandoned, perhaps because it misleadingly suggests that the quoted matter is dictum as opposed to the holding of the court. See dictum.

pique ([1] to irritate; or [2] to excite or arouse) is sometimes confused with peak. The proper phrase is to pique someone's interest—e.g.: "This court has held that statements designed to gain the trust and assurance of co-conspirators, to provide incentives for negotiations and to peak [read pique] interest are also in furtherance of a conspiracy." U.S. v. Blakeney, 942 F.2d 1001, 1020–21 (6th Cir. 1991).

For still another misuse, see peak.

pitiable; pitiful; piteous; pitiless. Pitiable = calling for or arousing pity. E.g., "The vast majority of criminals who come into the dock at Assizes or Sessions are pitiable creatures, a nuisance rather than a danger to the state." Patrick Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 112 (1960)./ "[T]he fiction always seems pitiably obvious and naïve—in retrospect." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 93 (1967).

Pitiful, strictly, means "feeling pity," but in modern speech and writing it is almost always used in the sense "contemptible." The word piteous "had become misused as a form of pitiable as early as Shakespeare's time: for him hearts could be piteous in the active sense and corpses in the passive." Ivor Brown, I Give You My Word & Say the Word 235 (1964). Today piteous is archaic and poetic—not a word for ordinary uses. Pitiless = showing no pity.

PLAIN LANGUAGE. A. Generally. Albert Einstein once said that his goal in stating an idea was to make it as simple as possible but no simpler. If lawyers everywhere adopted this goal, the world would probably change in dramatic ways.

But there is little reason for hope when so many legal writers seem to believe that to seem good or competent or smart, their ideas must be stated in the most complex manner possible. Of course, this problem plagues many fields of intellectual endeavor, as the philosopher Bertrand Russell noted:

> I am allowed to use plain English because everybody knows that I could use mathematical logic if I chose. Take the statement, 'Some people marry their deceased wives' sisters.' I can express this in language [that] only becomes intelligible after years of study, and this gives me freedom. I suggest to young professors that their first work should be written in a jargon only to be understood by the erudite few. With that behind them, they can ever after say what they have to say in a language 'understanded of the people.' In these days, when our very lives are at the mercy of the professors, I cannot but think that they would deserve our gratitude if they adopted my advice.
> Bertrand Russell, "How I Write," in The Basic Writings of Bertrand Russell 63, 65 (Robert E. Egner & Lester E. Denonn eds., 1961).

But the professors have not heeded Russell's advice. Since Russell wrote that essay in the mid-1950s, things have gotten much worse in fields such as biology, linguistics, literary criticism, political science, psychology, and sociology. And they have gotten worse in law.

Consider the following statutory provision, a 272-word tangle that is as difficult to fathom as any algebraic theorem:

> 57AF(11) Where, but for this sub-section, this section would, by virtue of the preceding provisions of this section, have in relation to a relevant year of income as if, for the reference in sub-section (3) to $18,000 there were substituted a reference to another amount, being an amount that consists of a number of whole dollars and a number of cents (in this sub-section referred to as the 'relevant number of cents')—
>
> (a) in the case where the relevant number of cents is less than 50—the other amount shall be reduced by the relevant number of cents;
>
> (b) in any case—the other amount shall be increased by the amount by which the relevant number of cents is less than $1.
> (12) where, but for sub-section (5), this section would, by virtue of the preceding provisions of this section, have effect in relation to a relevant year of income as if, for the reference in sub-section (3) to $18,000, there were substituted a reference to another amount, being an amount that consists of a number of whole dollars and a number of cents (in this sub-section referred to as the 'relevant number of cents') then, for the purposes of the application of paragraph 4(b)—
>
> (a) in a case where the relevant number of cents is less > than 50—the other amount shall be reduced by the relevant number of cents, or

>
> (b) in any case—the other amount shall be increased by the amount by which the relevant number of cents is less than $1.
> Income Tax Assessment Act [Australia] § 57AF(11), (12) (as quoted in David St. L. Kelly, "Plain English in Legislation," in Essays on Legislative Drafting 57, 58 (David St. L Kelly ed. 1988)).

That is the type of DRAFTING that prompts an oft-repeated criticism: "So unintelligible is the phraseology of some statutes that suggestions have been made that draftsmen, like the Delphic Oracle, sometimes aim deliberately at obscurity . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 486 (7th ed. 1964).

With some hard work, the all-but-inscrutable passage above can be transformed into a straightforward version of only 65 words:

> If either of the following amounts is not in whole dollars, the amount must be rounded up or down to the nearest dollar (or rounded up if the amount ends with 50 cents):
>
> (a) the amount of the motor-vehicle-depreciation limit; or
>
> (b) the amount that would have been the motor-vehicle-depreciation limit if the amount had equaled or exceeded $18,000.
>
> Revision based on that of Gavin Peck (quoted in Kelly, supra at 59)

Few would doubt that the original statute is unplain and that the revision is comparatively plain. True, the revision requires the reader to understand what a "motor-vehicle-depreciation limit" is, but some things can be stated only so simply.

When it comes to the legislative jungle of the tax code, as Justice Robert H. Jackson once wrote, "It can never be made simple, but we can try to avoid making it needlessly complex." Dobson v. C.I.R., 320 U.S. 489, 495 (1943).

Still, some might protest that, after all, the law is a learned profession. Some seem to find an insult in the suggestion that lawyers should avoid complex verbiage. They want to express themselves in more sophisticated ways than nonprofessionals do.

Their objection needs a serious answer because it presents the most serious impediment to the plain-language movement. There are essentially four answers.

First, those who write in a difficult, laborious style risk being unclear not only to other readers but also to themselves. When you write obscurely, you're less likely to be thinking clearly. And you're less likely to appreciate the problems that are buried under such involuted prose. For the private practitioner, this could increase the possibility of malpractice.

Second, obscure writing wastes readers' time—a great deal of it, when the sum is totaled. An Australian study conducted in the 1980s found that lawyers and judges take twice as long deciphering legalistically worded statutes as they do plain-language revisions. Law Reform Comm'n of Victoria, Plain English & the Law 61–62 (1987).

Third, simplifying is a higher intellectual attainment than complexifying. Writing simply and directly is hard work, but a learned profession ought not to shrink from the challenge. In fact, the hallmark of all the greatest legal stylists is precisely that they take difficult ideas and express them as simply as possible. No nonprofessional could do it, and most lawyers can't do it. Only extraordinary minds are capable of the task. Still, every lawyer—brilliant or not—can aim at the mark.

Fourth, the very idea of professionalism demands that we not conspire against nonlawyers by adopting a style that makes our writing seem like a suffocating fog. Unless lawyers do the right thing and reform from within, outside forces may well cause a revolution that will marginalize the legal profession. See LEGALESE, LEGALISMS AND LAWYERISMS & OBSCURITY.

B. Definitions. "Plain language," generally speaking, is "the idiomatic and grammatical use of language that most effectively presents ideas to the reader." Garner, The Elements of Legal Style 7 (1991). Some have tried to reduce "plain language" to a mathematical formula, but any such attempt is doomed to failure. And that is no indictment of the idea: "[I]t is no criticism that Plain English cannot be precisely, mathematically defined. Neither can 'reasonable doubt' or 'good cause.' Like so many legal terms, it is inherently and appropriately vague." Joseph Kimble, Plain English: A Charter for Clear Writing, 9 Thomas M. Cooley L. Rev. 1, 14 (1992).

The fundamental principle is that anything translatable into simpler words in the same language is bad style. That may sound like a facile oversimplification that fails when put into practice—but it isn't and it doesn't.

C. An Old Idea. Of course, legal discourse has long been ridiculed for its incomprehensibility. Jonathan Swift skewered LEGALESE when he wrote of a society of lawyers who spoke in "a peculiar cant and jargon of their own, that no other mortal can understand." Gulliver's Travels 154 (1726; repr. 1952).

What is less well known than the ridicule is that good legal writers have long advocated a plain-language style. In the mid-19th century, for example, the leading authority on legislative drafting said that most legal documents can be written in "the common popular structure of plain English." George Coode, On Legislative Expres- sion xxx (1842). A generation later, an English lawyer explained that good drafting "says in the plainest language, with the simplest, fewest, and fittest words, precisely what it means." J.G. Mackay, Introduction to an Essay on the Art of Legal Composition Commonly Called Drafting, 3 Law Q. Rev. 326, 326 (1887). Other writers could be cited, decade by decade, up to the present day. In short, there is nothing new about the idea.

D. Plain-Language Principles. "No lawyer can now safely navigate," writes a well-known law professor, "without knowing the problems of legalese and the principles of plain English." Robert W. Benson, The End of Legalese, 13 N.Y.U. Rev. Law & Soc. Change 519, 573 (1984–1985). Experienced editors have arrived at these plain-language principles through induction—through carrying out the principles again and again. Once you have revised hundreds of legal documents for the purposes of clarifying and simplifying, you can fairly accurately predict what problems the next document might hold in store.

Of these principles, perhaps the most important is to reject the MYTH OF PRECISION Traditionally, lawyers have aimed for a type of "precision" that results in cumbersome writing, with many long sentences collapsing under the weight of obscure qualifications. That "precision" is often illusory for two reasons: (a) ambiguity routinely lurks within traditional, legalistic language; and (b) when words proliferate, ambiguities tend to as well.

Of course, where clarity and precision are truly at loggerheads, precision must usually prevail. But the instances of actual conflict are much rarer than lawyers often suppose. Precision is not sacrificed when the drafter uses technical words where necessary and avoids JARGON that serves no substantive purpose. As one commentator puts it, "[W]hat is often called 'legal phraseology' is no more than inept writing or the unnecessary use of obscure or entangled phrases." Samuel A. Goldberg, "Hints on Draftsmanship," in Drafting Contracts and Commercial Instruments 7, 8 (Research and Documentation Corp. ed., 1971).

As a rule, whether one is drafting legislation, contracts, or other documents, clarity is just as important as precision. In fact, clarity helps ensure precision because the drafter with an obscure style finds it less easy to warrant what the draft itself says.

The main work of the legislative drafter is "to state the law in a form clearer and more convenient than that in which it has hitherto existed, and that is a task for experts . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 80 (5th ed. 1955). Of course, some influences leading to complexity cannot be overcome; among these are the difficulty of the subject matter itself and the fact that a final draft may reflect a compromise between different points of view. But, with hard work, other obscurantist influences—the ones that are linguistically based—can be overcome: long-windedness, needless jargon, and inconsistent style resulting from collaborative efforts.

1. Achieve a reasonable average sentence length. Strive for an average sentence length of 20 words—and, in any event, ensure that you are below 30 words. Doing this involves following a maxim that, unfortunately, makes some legal drafters unnecessarily nervous: "[I]f you want to make a statement with a great many qualifications, put some of the qualifications in separate sentences." Bertrand Russell, "How I Write," in The Basic Writings of Bertrand Russell 63, 65 (Robert E. Egner & Lester E. Denonn eds., 1961). See SENTENCE LENGTH.
2. Prefer short words to long ones, simple to fancy. Minimize jargon and technical terms so that you achieve a straightforward style that nonlawyers as well as lawyers can understand. This means rejecting LEGALISMS such as pursuant to (under, in accordance with), prior to (before), subsequent to (after), vel non (or not, or the lack of it).
3. Avoid double and triple negatives. No reader wants to wrestle with a sentence like this one: "The investments need not be revalued at intervals of not more than two years if the trustee and the beneficiaries do not disagree." [Read: If the trustee and beneficiaries agree, the investments need not be revalued every two years.] See NEGATIVES (A)
4. Prefer the active voice. Notice must be given compares poorly with The tenant must give notice because (a) the first version does not spell out who must give notice, and (b) readers take in a sentence more easily if it meets their expectation of a subject-verb-object structure. See PASSIVE VOICE
5. Keep related words together. In well-constructed sentences, related words go together—especially subject and verb, verb and object. See PHRASING.
6. Break up the text with headings. Headings and subheadings make the structure of a document overt, allowing readers to find their way around the document quickly and easily. See DOCUMENT DESIGN (C).
7. Use parallel structures for enumerations. See PARALLELISM, ENUMERATIONS & DOCUMENT DESIGN (F), (G).
8. Avoid excessive cross-references. The writer who becomes zealous about cross-referencing usually creates linguistic mazes. The problem is that readers are asked to hold in mind the contents of several different provisions simultaneously. For a choice example, see WOOLLINESS.

9. Avoid overdefining. Although definitions are sometimes helpful, legal drafters grossly overuse them. Whenever you send the reader elsewhere in a legal document to understand what you're saying in a given provision, you impede understanding. And many drafters "pass the buck" in this way repeatedly for a single term, by using cross-references in definitions. See—if you like, but this is not intended as a pass-the-buck cross-reference—DEFINITIONS (A).
10. Use recitals and purpose clauses. In contracts, recitals help the reader understand what the drafter hopes to accomplish; in legislation, purpose clauses serve this function. Except in the simplest drafting projects—such as straightforward buy-sell agreements—you should generally presume that these orienting devices are necessary. And even simple documents should have descriptive titles (not Agreement, but Agreement Restricting Stock Transfers).

Finally, to gauge how effectively the principles are carried out, plain-language advocates recommend that certain documents be tested on typical readers. For documents that go out by the thousands and hundreds of thousands (like government forms) and for major legislation, time spent in testing at the front end can save enormous amounts of time and money in the long run.

E. Efforts to Use Plain Language. Since the 1970s, most American states have passed some type of plain-language legislation, and several federal statutes exist as well. See Joseph Kimble, Plain English: A Charter for Clear Writing, 9 Thomas M. Cooley L. Rev. 1, 31–35 (1992). Statutes of this type have not caused the problems that skeptics once warned of—unworkable standards, fatal ambiguities, decline in the quality of drafting. In fact, an empirical study would probably confirm precisely the opposite effects.

In addition to plain-language legislation, lawyers in many English-speaking jurisdictions have formed commissions and committees to promote plain language. In the U.S., for example, the State Bar of Michigan formed such a committee in 1979 and the State Bar of Texas in 1990; other state bar associations have begun to follow suit. In Australia, the Centre for Plain Legal Language has done much to promote the movement. In British Columbia, the Plain Language Institute thrived for a time and produced much good literature before being disbanded in 1993 for lack of governmental funding; other Canadian groups soon took up the slack. In England, the Plain English Campaign—a grassroots consumer organization—has met with considerable success. England is also the home of Clarity, an international organization that studies and promotes plain language in law. All these efforts have depended primarily on the determination of specific individuals.

Their opponents—the naysayers—have an increasingly difficult time as more and more excellent work is published in the field of plain language. For example, in 1994 Martin Cutts, an English writing consultant, redesigned and rewrote an act of Parliament: the Timeshare Act 1992. In doing so, he convincingly showed what immense improvements are possible in legislative drafting if only the official drafters approached their task with a greater command of plain-language principles. See Martin Cutts, Lucid Law (1994). The enduring problem—here as elsewhere—is whether reform can take place while the old guard remains in place.

In some places, though, official and semi-official bodies are changing standard forms. For example, the English Law Society's 1990 and 1992 editions of the Standard Conditions of Sale use "language that is as direct as the subject-matter allows, sentences that are relatively short and jargon-free, and a layout that is clear." Peter Butt, Plain Language and Conveyancing, Conveyancer & Property Lawyer, July–August 1993, at 256, 258. Similarly, in 1992 the Law Society of New South Wales issued a "plainer" form of contract for the sale of land—"plainer" than its predecessor, though not yet quite "plain." Id. In the early 1990s, the Real Estate Forms Committee of the State Bar of Texas issued plain-language forms for deeds, deeds of trust, leases, and other forms. These are but a few examples.

For a challenging but partly tongue-in-cheek approach to a legislative mandate for plain language, see David C. Elliott, A Model Plain-Language Act, 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 51 (1992).

F. The Trouble with the Word "Plain." It is unfortunate that the SET PHRASES plain language and plain English contain the word plain. For that word, to many speakers of English, suggests the idea of "drab and ugly." But plain language is not drab: it is powerful and often beautiful. It is the language of the King James Version of the Bible, and it has a long literary tradition in the so-called Attic style of writing. See Garner, The Elements of Legal Style 7–15 (1991).

Despite the unfortunate associations that the word plain carries, it has become established and is without a serious competitor. As a result, plain-language advocates must continually explain what they mean by "plain" language—or else critics and doubters will misunderstand it.

G. Prospects. We can point to significant progress in this area, but it remains sporadic. In the end, E.B. White may have been prescient: "I honestly worry about lawyers. They never write plain English themselves, and when you give them a bit of plain English to read, they say, 'Don't worry, it doesn't mean anything.'" E.B. White (as quoted in Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 149 (2d ed. 1979)).

There are those who say that "lawyers spend half their time trying to understand what other lawyers wrote; and the other half of their days writing things that other lawyers spend half their time trying to understand." Samuel A. Goldberg, "Hints on Draftsmanship," in Drafting Contracts and Commercial Instruments 7, 10 (Research & Documentation Corp. ed., 1971). That cynical view holds true only when poor writing becomes pervasive; and, alas, there is some truth in it today.

Beyond the mere inconveniences of obscurity, however, people actually suffer from it. Not least among the sufferers are judges who must try to make sense out of nonsense. But the vexation that judges feel pales in comparison with the economic and emotional suffering that clients often experience.

It is hardly an overstatement to say that plain-language reform is among the most important issues confronting the legal profession. And until this reform occurs, the profession will continue to have a badly tarnished image—no matter how many other altruistic endeavors it carries out. If we want the respect of the public, we must learn to communicate simply and directly.

plainly. See clearly & obviously.

plaint = a written statement of a cause of action, used to bring suit in a county court in England. Following is a 19th-century example of this term as still used in England: "The defendant refused to deliver them up, and the plaintiff consequently brought a plaint . . . to recover the notes." Bridges v. Hawkesworth, (1851) 21 L.J.Q.B. 75, 76.

The term is used in AmE only in nonlegal senses—e.g.: "I already hear the querulous plaint that questions dealt with in this opinion have not been raised in the court below or in the briefs on appeal."

plaintiff; complainant; demandant; objectant; exceptor. Plaintiff the party who brings suit in a court of law. This party may have other special names, depending on the jurisdiction and the cause of action asserted. (See, e.g., pursuer.) Complainant is used in even more general senses of any party who brings a complaint. Demandant = one who makes a demand or claim, usu. a creditor.

The remaining terms are quite distinct from the others. Objectant = one who objects. Exceptor = one who objects or takes exception. See exceptor & objectant.

plaintiff, defendant; petitioner, respondent; appellant, appellee. A. Capitalizing. The American lawyer's conventions are generally as follows. To refer to a party in the present case, write: "Wisely, Plaintiff has chosen . . . ." It is generally better, of course, to use the party's real name. (See PARTY APPELLATIONS.) To refer to a party in some other (usu. reported) case, write: "In Jones v. Smith, the plaintiff . . . ."

B. Articles before. It is often useful in legal writing to omit the, a, or an before Plaintiff and other designations of parties in the present dispute, for cutting even such slight words can lead to leaner, more readable sentences.

Still, omission of articles can cause problems where two party denominations are proximate: "The motion preserves no error because it fails to specify which plaintiff defendant contends failed to prove a prima facie case." Inserting the before defendant removes the impediment to reading. See ARTICLES (A).

C. Relative Pronouns with. Though personal relative pronouns (i.e., who and whom) are normally used with these denominations, when plaintiff, etc., is a company, corporation, or entity other than an individual or a set of easily identifiable individuals, then which is correct in nonrestrictive clauses. The restrictive relative pronoun that, of course, may be used with either persons or companies. See PARTY APPELLATIONS & RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES (A).

plaintiff in error; defendant in error. In some jurisdictions, the first is an equivalent of appellant or petitioner, the latter an equivalent of appellee or respondent, when the appeal is by writ of error. E.g., "The railway company and Mercer each filed an application for a writ of error and each application was granted, from which it results that in this court each party is both plaintiff in error and defendant in error." See error (A).

plaintiff's lawyer; plaintiffs' lawyer; plaintiff lawyer. For one who regularly represents plaintiffs—in the U.S., usu. on contingent fees—the predominant form is plaintiff's lawyer. But plaintiffs' lawyer might be better for this purpose, since the singular possessive (plaintiff's lawyer) is often used in reference merely to one who represents a plaintiff in a particular action.

Plaintiff lawyer misleadingly suggests one who is a party to a lawsuit, as opposed to the one handling the lawsuit. E.g., "[S]anctions were sought in some 700 federal cases and granted in just over half. It's usually the plaintiff lawyer [read plaintiff's lawyer] who's fined." L. Gordon Crovitz, Lawyers Make Frivolous Arguments at Their Own Risk, Wall St. J., 20 June 1990, at A17.

plaintive was for centuries used interchangeably with plaintiff in legal prose. But now the sense "being or pertaining to the plaintiff in a suit" (OED) is an ARCHAISM, probably obsolete. The sole current meaning of plaintive is as an adjective: "sorrowful; mournful."

playwrighting; playwriting. The second is a corrupt form of the first. E.g., "[P]oets and playwrites [read playwrights] often use different meter and rhyme schemes when dealing with different characters." Paul T. Wangerin, Skills Training in "Legal Analysis," 40 U. Miami L. Rev. 409, 438 (1986). For a similar error, see copywrite.

plea; pleading, n. A plea is now given only in criminal cases, although at common law a defendant's answer to the plaintiff's complaint was termed a plea. In U.S. federal courts today, the only criminal pleas are guilty, not guilty, and nolo contendere. A pleading is the complaint or answer in a civil case, or the criminal indictment and the answer in a criminal case.

plea bargain, n.; plea-bargain, v.i. As a noun, the phrase means "an agreement between the prosecution and the defense in a criminal case to allow the defendant to plead guilty or testify against others in return for a reduced charge or some other prosecutorial concession." The phrase dates only from the 1960s—e.g.: "This is not the usual case of an asserted plea bargain . . . ." People v. Bannan, 110 N.W.2d 673, 675 (Mich. 1961). The noun phrase plea bargaining is slightly older, dating from the 1950s.

As an intransitive verb, plea-bargain (hyphenated) means "to make a plea bargain."

plead. A. Sense. Plead does not ordinarily mean, as some nonlawyers think, "to argue a case in court." Eric Partridge amended his note on lawyer in Usage and Abusage by quoting a British lawyer who corrected Partridge's "layman's misusages" as follows: "A barrister does not 'plead' in Court. He argues a case in Court, or—colloquially—does a case in Court. Pleadings are the written documents preparatory to a case, e.g., Statement of Claim, Defence in a civil action, Petition or Answer in divorce." Usage and Abusage 379 (1973). See pleaded.

B. Loose Usage with Objective Complement. In AmE, criminal lawyers increasingly say that they will plead a client guilty. Hence: "I had made a deal with the District Attorney's office to plead him guilty for four years in the State penitentiary for all cases." Aubrey Holmes, The Wake of a Lawyer 43 (1960)./ "Defendant contends, therefore, that in so doing defense counsel effectively pleaded defendant guilty to first-degree murder." People v. Clark, 565 N.E.2d 1373, 1380 (Ill. App. Ct. 1991).

Instead of this slipshod use of plead, the better phrasing in the sentences above would have been have my client plead guilty and pleaded guilty on defendant's behalf.

pleaded; pled; plead. Traditionally speaking, pleaded is the best past-tense and past-participial form. Commentators on usage have long said so, pouring drops of vitriol onto has pled and has plead:

- "Say, 'He pleaded guilty' (not 'pled' or 'plead')." Sherwin Cody, Dictionary of Errors 118 (1905).
- "Careful speakers use pleaded." Frank H. Vizetelly, A Desk-Book of Errors in English 167 (1906).
- "The past tense is pleaded. The use of pled or plead is colloquial." C.O. Sylvester Mawson, Style-Book for Writers and Editors 178 (1926).
- "These past tense forms [plead and pled] are by some authorities condemned as entirely incorrect, and by others classified as colloquial. The correct past tense of plead is pleaded, as 'He pleaded illness as an excuse.'" Maurice H. Weseen, Crowell's Dictionary of English Grammar and Handbook of American Usage 470 (1928).
- "The surely correct forms of the verb to plead in the past tense and past participle are pleaded, has pleaded. Colloquially, plead and pled are used as the past tense." Clarence Stratton, Handbook of English 245 (1940).
- "Pleaded is the approved past tense of plead. THUS: He pleaded (not 'pled' or 'plead') not guilty." Alexander M. Witherspoon, Common Errors in English and How to Avoid Them 135 (1943).

The problem with these strong pronouncements, of course, is that pled and plead have gained some standing in AmE, as the Evanses noted in mid-century: "In the United States pleaded and pled are both acceptable for the past tense and for the participle. In Great Britain only the form pleaded is used and pled is considered an Americanism." Bergen Evans & Cornelia Evans, A Dictionary of Contemporary American Usage 372 (1957). The variant forms might not be the best usage, but neither can they be condemned as horrible.

Nevertheless, pleaded is the predominant form in both AmE and BrE—e.g.:

- "Elsewhere, it is generally required that the mitigating circumstances be pleaded." Edwin E. Bryant, The Law of Pleading Under the Codes of Civil Procedure 248 (1899).
- "Contentions of law do not have to be pleaded." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 56 (1979).
- "No case was to be pleaded at Superior Court for less than a three pound fee . . . ." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 100–01 (2d ed. 1985).
- "Harding pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge in the attack on Olympic silver medalist Nancy Kerrigan and resigned from the U.S. Figure Skating Association." Bob Baum, Harding Pleads Guilty, San Diego Union-Tribune, 17 March 1994, at A1.

The spelling plead as a past tense (for pled) appeared in the 18th century, apparently on the analogy of read > read. (Cf. lead.) E.g., "The legal proposition plead [read pleaded] by plaintiff is unpersuasive." One problem with this form is that many readers will suffer a MISCUE by seeing plead at first as a present-tense verb.

The other variant form, pled, dates from the 16th century. It is nearly obsolete in BrE except as a dialectal word. Nor is it considered quite standard in AmE, although it is a common variant in legal usage—e.g.: "In the second count of their petition, they pled [read pleaded] their title specially." Jensen v. Wilkinson, 133 S.W.2d 982, 983 (Tex. Civ. App.—Galveston 1939)./ "Defendant pled [read pleaded] guilty to the lesser offense . . . ." State v. Carlberg, 375 N.W.2d 275, 277 (Iowa Ct. App. 1985).

pleader; pleador. Only the former is correct.

plead guilty to is sometimes misrendered plead guilty of, which is really just a confusion of two legal idioms: one pleads to a charge but is guilty of a crime. E.g., "Mr. Krikava's wife, Carol, and son, Kevin, pleaded guilty of [read to] perjury and received only probation, since the guidelines allow leniency for defendants who plead guilty." Dirk Johnson, A Farmer, 70, Saw No Choice; Nor Did the Sentencing Judge, N.Y. Times, 20 July 1994, at A1, A9.

pleading. A. Senses. Pleading = (1) the art of preparing formal written statements in lawsuits; (2) a document containing the written allegations of fact that each party is required to communicate to the opponent before trial, so that each will know what contentions must be met by the evidence; or (3) oral advocacy of a case in court. Sense (3) is found more frequently in nonlawyers' writing than in lawyers'—unless one goes back to the 14th century, when pleadings were oral.

B. And court paper. In sense (2), pleading should be distinguished from court paper, which is a broader term. Motions, briefs, and affidavits are court papers, not pleadings. Examples of pleadings are complaints, petitions, counterclaims, and answers. A late-19th-century writer's explanation shows that this usage is time-honored: "Pleadings are the formal allegations of the parties of their respective claims and defences." Edwin E. Bryant, The Law of Pleading Under the Codes of Civil Procedure 178 (1899).

C. And prayer. The pleading is the document in which a party in a legal action sets out the cause of action or defense. A pleading consists of (1) a commencement; (2) a body (or charging part); (3) a prayer, or demand for judgment; (4) a signature; and, when required, (5) a verification. The prayer, which usually appears at the end of the pleading, is the request for relief from the court. E.g., "The court merely held that if there is a requirement that the complainant specifically plead for prejudgment interest, a prayer for general relief will not satisfy the requirement if the pleadings also contain a specific prayer for a different kind of interest."

A typical prayer reads: "Wherefore, defendant prays that plaintiff take nothing in this action (etc.)." A plain-language equivalent might read: "For these reasons, defendant requests that the court enter judgment that the plaintiff take nothing (etc.)." See prayer.

D. And plea. See plea.

E. Pleadings in Various Forums. See COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS, EQUITY PLEADINGS & WORLD COURT PLEADINGS.

pleading, inconsistent. See Codd's Puzzle.

plead innocent. It used to be that only journalists made the mistake of writing plead innocent rather than plead not guilty, but now this phrase has made it even into judges' writing: lawyers should avoid the phrase, as there is no such thing as a plea of innocent. Journalists, on the other hand, avoid not guilty merely because the word not might get accidentally dropped or changed to now. See not (C).

pleador. See pleader.

plea in abatement; plea of abatement. In jurisdictions in which the plea is used, plea in abatement is the usual form.

please find enclosed, like its inverted sibling, enclosed please find, is an old-fashioned, stilted phrase that lawyers are fond of using in letters. Better, more modern substitutes include I am sending with this letter, I have enclosed, I am enclosing, and Enclosed are (or is). See enclosed please find.

pled. See pleaded.

pledge. See lien.

pledgeable. So spelled.

pledgee = (1) one with whom a pledge or pawn is deposited; or (2) a person who takes a pledge (esp. an American college student who undertakes to enroll in a fraternity or sorority). Sense (1) makes some sense, but sense (2) is apt to bother careful readers (the college student really being a pledger, not a pledgee). See -EE (A).

pledg(e)or; pledger. The most logical spelling is pledger, not pledgor or pledgeor. Even so, pledgor is more than 50 times as common as pledger in American judicial opinions, largely because it is the regular correlative of pledgee. See MUTE E.

plenary is a FORMAL WORD for full, complete, or entire. E.g., "A plenary trial is hardly necessary to apprise the court that what it saw really happened." Here full trial would be better.

plenitude. So spelled. A common misspelling is plentitude—e.g.: "The rule is a salutary one in view of the different jurisdictions of the state courts and of this court. It leaves in both the full plentitude [read plenitude] of their powers." Adams v. Russell, 229 U.S. 353, 361 (1913).

plentiful; plenteous. No distinction in meaning being possible, writers should prefer the prevalent modern form, plentiful. Plenteous is archaic and poetic—in modern prose, a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

plentitude. See plenitude.

PLEONASM. See VERBOSITY.

plurality opinion = an appellate opinion without enough judges' votes to constitute a majority, but having received the greatest number of votes of any of the opinions filed. E.g., "Three justices, in the plurality opinion of Justice Rehnquist, took the position that § 16 of the Clayton Act does not meet the second half of the Mitchum text . . . ." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 283 (4th ed. 1983). The term dates from about 1960, when Justice Whittaker used it in U.S. v. Kaiser, 363 U.S. 299, 328 (1960) (Whittaker, J., dissenting). See majority (A).

PLURALS. A. Borrowed Words. Words transported into the English language from other languages, especially Greek and Latin, present some of the most troublesome aspects of English plurals. At a certain point borrowed words become thoroughly anglicized and take English plurals. But while words of Latin and Greek origin are still new and only questionably naturalized, writers who see the words as primarily foreignisms use the native-language plurals. Then again, with certain words, the foreign plurals become so well established that anglicization never takes place.

So many variations on this theme have occurred that it is impossible to make valid generalizations. Minimum makes minima but premium makes premiums; pudendum makes pudenda but memorandum makes either -dums or -da; colloquium generally makes -quia in BrE, -quiums preferably in AmE. The only reliable guide is a certain knowledge of specific words, or habitual reference to a usage guide.

In words with a choice of endings, one English and the other foreign, we should generally prefer the English plural. It is an affectation for college professors to insist on using syllabi rather than syllabuses. The fear of being wrong or sounding unacademic even leads some of them to use forms like auditoria and stadia.

Fowler called the benighted stab at correctness "out of the frying pan into the fire." Many writers who try to be sophisticated in their use of language are susceptible to writing, e.g., ignorami and octopi, unaware that neither is a Latin noun that, when inflected as a plural, becomes -i. The proper plural of the Greek word octopus is octopodes; the proper English plural is octopuses. Ignoramus makes only ignoramuses, for in Latin the word is a verb, not a noun. For several similar examples, see HYPERCORRECTION (A).

French words also present problems. Fait accompli becomes faits accomplis and force majeure becomes forces majeures. But then we have the LAW FRENCH words such as feme sole, which becomes femes sole, and feme covert (or femme couverte), which as a plural becomes femes covert (or femmes couvertes). The best policy is to make a habit of consulting a good dictionary, and to use it discriminatingly.

B. Mass (Noncount) Nouns. A recent trend in the language is to make plurals for mass nouns—general and abstract nouns that cannot be broken down into discrete units, and that therefore should not have plural forms. One example of this phenomenon is the psychologists' and sociologists' term behaviors, as if the ways in which one behaves are readily categorizable and therefore countable. Granted, one can have good or bad behavior, but not, properly, a good behavior or a bad behavior. Following are examples of other words infected by the contagion.

1. Coverages. "The policy allowed for separate coverages of the three cars."
2. Discriminations. "The statute disadvantages those who would benefit from laws barring racial, religious, or ancestral discriminations as against those who would bar other discriminations or who would otherwise regulate the real estate market in their favor." See discrimination.
3. Inactions. "The findings of the district court on the actions and inactions by the defendants are supported by substantial evidence and are not clearly erroneous."
4. Languages. Referring to different passages in a statute, a writer states: "The statutory languages are not enough to persuade us that the Secretary's interpretation is incorrect." See language.
5. Litigations and attentions. "Indeed, just as antitrust actions occupied the attentions of the litigation bar in the 1960s and class-action litigations proliferated in the 1970s, insurance-coverage litigations are currently engaging the attentions of many of the nation's most prominent litigators."/ "Under the circumstances, there need not be two litigations when one will suffice." See litigation.
6. Managements. "If followed, these procedures would have a beneficial effect on the managements of brokerage firms and those charged with supervision." (Does managements refer to managerial departments, or to methods of management? The plural causes this ambiguity.)
7. Outputs. "Interpersonal relations of the justices have been shown to have measurable effects on the court's public outputs."
8. Participations. Sometimes this phenomenon occurs through attributive uses, as where participation is substituted for unit of participation: "The D.C. Circuit has declared that the Glass-Steagall Act does not prohibit banks from marking participations in collective investment trusts for I.R.A. assets." The same principle is at work when proofs is substituted for elements of proof. See proof (C).

C. Words Ending in -o. Fowler laid down a number of guiding principles for words ending in -o: first, monosyllables and words used as freely in the plural as in the singular usually have -oes (embargoes, heroes, noes, potatoes, vetoes); second, alien-looking words, proper names, words that are seldom used as plurals, words in which -o- is preceded by a vowel, and shortened words (e.g., photo) do not take the -e- (hippos, kilos, embryos, ratios). Good dictionaries guide users to the preferred spellings.

D. Nouns Formed From Past-Participial Adjectives. These are usually awkward and alien-looking to nonlawyers. But they are commonplace in legal writing—e.g.: "The firm represented one of the company's insureds in an action that had been brought against the insured in county court." See condemned, deceased & insured. See also POSSESSIVES (F)

E. Compound Nouns. Plurals of compound nouns made up of a noun and a POSTPOSITIVE

ADJECTIVE are formed by adding -s to the noun: courts martial, heirs presumptive. The British and Americans differ on the method of pluralizing attorney general, q.v. Those words in which the noun is now disguised add -s at the end of the word, as with all compounds ending in -ful: lungfuls, spoonfuls, handfuls.

F. Proper Names. Although few books on grammar mention the point, proper names often cause problems when writers try to make them plural. The rule is simple: most take a simple -s, while those ending in s, x, or z, or in a sibilant ch or sh, take -es. Thus:

Singular Form	Plural Form
Adam	Adams
Adams	Adamses
Bush	Bushes
Church	Churches
Cox	Coxes
Flowers	Flowerses
Jones	Joneses
Levy	Levys
Lipschutz	Lipschutzes
Mary	Marys
Rabiej	Rabiejs
Shapiro	Shapiros
Sinz	Sinzes
Thomas	Thomases

Plurals like these are often erroneously formed by calling (say) Mr. and Mrs. Sinz either the Sinz or the Sinz'. The latter form, with the apostrophe, merely results from confusion with possessives—and even the Sinz' is not a good possessive (the correct forms being Sinz's in the singular and Sinzes' in the plural).

ply (= layer; fold) forms the plural plies. Plys is incorrect—e.g.: "These [characteristics] included the tire's size, its maximum inflation pressure, its maximum load, the number of plys [read plies] . . . ." Jerry L. Mashaw & David L. Harfst, Regulation and Legal Culture: The Case of Motor Vehicle Safety, 4 Yale J. on Reg. 257, 316 n.70 (1987).

poetic justice, nowadays a CLICHÉ, refers to the system exemplified in older fiction in which villains always receive condign punishments, and heroes their fitting rewards.

point, in. See in point.

point of fact. See in point of fact.

point of law. This phrase refers to a discrete proposition or issue of law arising from the facts established in a given case. It is often shortened to the one word point.

point of view. See viewpoint.

point, on. See in point.

point out; point to; point up. Point out = (1) to observe; or (2) to call to others' attention. Point to = to direct attention to (as an answer or solution). Point up = to illustrate. Point up is perhaps comparatively more frequent in legal than in nonlegal writing. E.g., "For Mr. Lucas, the case points up a key pitfall of seeking capital punishment . . . ." Dan R. Barber, Law Could Curb Texas Executions, Dallas Morning News, 18 April 1993, at 35A.

police, though a COLLECTIVE NOUN, is generally construed as a plural both in AmE and in BrE.

policy; polity. Policy, by far the more common of these words, means "a concerted course of action followed to achieve certain ends; a plan." It is more restricted in sense than polity, which means (1) "the principle upon which a government is based"; or (2) "the total governmental organization as based on its goals and policies." Sense (2) is more usual—e.g.: "The ancient doctrine of the common law, founded on the principles of the feudal system, that a private wrong is merged in a felony, is not applicable to the civil polity of this country."/ "As to the practicing lawyer, in our polity he is potentially law-writer, law teacher, legislator, or judge." (Roscoe Pound)

policy-making should be hyphenated. Cf. decision-making.

policyowner. See policyholder.

politic, adj.; political. The adverbial forms are politicly (= in a politic manner; shrewdly; prudently) and politically (= in a political or partisan way or manner).

politic(al)ize. See politick (2d par.).

political rights. See civil rights.

politick, v.i.; politicize. Politick, a BACK-FORMATION from politics, at one time was not recognized as an acceptable word. Today it is more common in AmE than in BrE, and means "to engage in partisan political activities."

Politicize has a similar sense "to act the politician," but also the broader sense "to render political" <politicizing judicial races>. Politicalize is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

politics may be either singular or plural. Today it is more commonly singular than plural <politics is dirty business>, although formerly the opposite was true.

polity. See policy.

pollicitation is an antique civilian LEGALISM meaning "an offer not yet formally accepted, and therefore usually revocable." E.g., "By a promise we mean accepted offer as opposed to an offer of a promise, or, as Austin called it, a pollicitation." William R. Anson, Principles of the Law of Contract 6 (Arthur L. Corbin ed., 3d Am. ed. 1919)./ "Conventional obligations were subdivided into promise, pollicitation or offer, paction and contract." William W. McBryde, The Law of Contract in Scotland 2 (1987).

polygamy; polyandry; polygyny. The first is the broadest term, referring to a person's being simultaneously married to more than one spouse. Polyandry is the practice of having more than one husband; polygyny is the practice of having more than one wife. See bigamy.

pompous ass is a hackneyed phrase that could use a rest among lawyers and, especially, law students (usu. applying it to law professors). We might be tempted to characterize many fellow practitioners and academics in this way, but we should perhaps show more originality than to mouth this shopworn epithet.

pony case. See whitehorse case.

Ponzi scheme = a fraudulent investment scheme in which money placed by later investors pays artificially high dividends to the original investors, thereby attracting even larger investments. The scheme takes its name from Charles Ponzi, who in the late 1920s was convicted and punished for fraudulent schemes he conducted in Boston. E.g., "This was a proposal to furnish services on a commercial basis, and since we have always refused to distinguish for First Amendment purposes on the basis of content, it is no different from an advertisement for a bucket shop operation or a Ponzi scheme which has its headquarters in New York." Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809, 831 (1975) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting)./ "[T]he scheme was kept afloat by paying interest on existing certificates with the proceeds of new certificate sales . . . . It was . . . a massive Ponzi scheme." Tim O'Brien, Some Firms Never Learn, Am. Law., Oct. 1989, at 63, 64.

pooling; unitization. See communitize (A).

POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES. Fowler observed that when technical terms pass into everyday speech and writing, two things often occur. First, the popular use more often than not misrepresents the original meaning; second, free indulgence in terms of this sort results in a tawdry style. These observations are no less true with legal technicalities than with those of other kinds.

The prime example is alibi, which in law refers to the defense in a criminal case of proving that one was elsewhere when the crime was committed. Nonlawyers snatched up the term and, through misunderstanding perhaps coupled with SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, came to use it as a synonym for excuse, especially a lame excuse. Today even lawyers misuse the term in this way. See alibi (A).

As the OED will confirm, any number of common expressions have their origins in law, such as these:

For other, mostly historical examples from the legal lexicon, see the discussions under alias, compound, gist, ignoramus, hue and cry & pale, beyond the.

populous (= thickly populated) for populist (= of or relating to a movement claiming to represent the whole of the people) is a startling error. E.g., "The advent of the Jacksonian era and its emphasis on democratic populous [read populist] ideals . . . promoted . . . the notion that . . . judges should be popularly elected . . . ." Norman Krivosha, Acquiring Judges by the Merit Selection Method, 40 Sw. L.J. (Special Issue), May 1986, at 15, 15.

pore (= to read carefully) should not be confused with pour, as it frequently is—e.g.: "Appellants' representatives spent about two and one-half years pouring [read poring] over the books and records of the Cincinnati School System in an effort to find something that was wrong." Deal v. Cincinnati Bd. of Educ, 419 F.2d 1387, 1394 (6th Cir. 1969)./ "Ms. Besso . . . now spends her evenings pouring [read poring] over brochures from Boston, Boulder, Colo., and Nashville." Sara Rimer, Fleeing Los Angeles: Quake Is the Last Straw, N.Y. Times, 18 Feb. 1994, at A1, A10. This error may well occur because poring appears less often in print than in speech.

portend (= to foretell or foreshadow) should not be used as a substitute for mean. "The term 'beneficial shareholders' portends [read means] something different from 'shareholders.'" The word portend necessarily has negative connotations.

portentous (= [1] prophetic; [2] wondrous; [3] solemn; or [4] pompous) is so spelled. But the word is sometimes incorrectly written portentious or portentuous—e.g.: "[T]he court made a significant observation portentious [read portentous] of things to come . . . ." O'Brien v. Barnes Bldg. Co., 380 N.Y.S.2d 405, 420 (Sup. Ct. 1974)./ "Can anyone imagine . . . a responsible government administrator . . . issuing regulations with as portentuous [read portentous] [an] effect as here on the same factual certainties that EPA had?" Ethyl Corp. v. Environmental Protection Agency, 541 F.2d 1, 87 n.81 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (en banc) (Wilkey, J., dissenting).

portion; part. There are connotative differences. Portion = share (as of an estate or of food). It is an entity cut or as if cut away from the whole <his portion of the contract> <her portion of the grain>. Part, in contrast, merely connotes a constituent part of the whole <part of a house, a country, etc.>.

In a common-law "strict settlement," a portion is a lump sum paid in trust to a settlor's children and receivable by them once they reach the age of majority or marry.

Portmanteau Words. Lewis Carroll improvised this term to denote words formed by combining the first part of one word with the last part of another. (Linguists use the term blend to name an example of this phenomenon.) Thus insinuendo was arrived at by combining insinuation with innuendo; quasar is from quasi and stellar; aerobicise derives from aerobic exercise. Other recent innovations are avigation, from aviation and navigation, pictionary for picture-filled dictionary, and videbut for video debut. Most portmanteau words are nonce words that do not gain currency; others, like brunch (breakfast + lunch), become standard. Among 20th-century portmanteau coinages are these:

breathalyzer (breath + analyzer), q.v. brotel (brothel + hotel)
defamacast (defamatory + broadcast), q.v. galimony (gal + alimony) gazwelcher (gazump + welcher) litigotiation (litigation + negotiation) palimony (pal + alimony), q.v.

posit (= [1] to set in place, fix; or [2] to postulate or lay down as the basis for argument) should not be used for to present, as here: "The purpose is not to study procedure for its own sake; the procedural issues are raised and considered primarily as indicia of the overall problems posited [read presented] by the unique nature of complex litigation."

positive (= having real existence) is a common meaning of the word in law, but little used in nonlegal writing today. E.g., "The wrong was actuated by a positive design to injure the third person to whom the duty was due."

positive law. This term is sometimes used with little idea of its precise sense. Positive law, referring primarily to statutes and regulations, might be defined as "coercively implemented law laid down within a particular political community by political superiors, to govern members of the community, as distinct from moral law or law existing in an ideal community or in some nonpolitical community."

Associated originally with John Austin's jurisprudence, positive law is frequently used by common-law writers. E.g., "Positive law, the law applied and enforced in the courts, is the means by which the state [secures people in their natural rights] and is morally binding only so far as it conforms to natural law." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 74 (1957)./ "Something like efficient breach theory is part of our positive law to this limited extent, but we do not need the irreparable injury rule to implement it." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 248–49 (1991).

Unfortunately, as several writers have pointed out, Austin used positive differently in different phrases. In positive law, it means "set by a political superior"; in positive morality (also an Austinian phrase), it means "set by human authority." See W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 84–85 (1945). Hence Buckland's barb: "One may use a term in any sense one will, provided one uses it always in the same sense. Austin makes considerable use of the right, but is not very careful of the proviso." Id. Cf. natural law (A). positive mental attitude. See mental attitude.

positivism. H.L.A. Hart once bemoaned that issues can be "clouded by the use of grand but vague words like 'Positivism' and 'Natural Law.' Banners have been waved and parties formed in a loud but often confused debate." H.L.A. Hart, Law, Liberty, and Morality 2 (1963). The confusion has not abated, and positivism has remained vague—if not downright ambiguous. Whereas general philosophers tend to use the word as shorthand for logical positivism (a system involving formal verification of empirical questions), legal philosophers use the word to denote the theory of positive law (which postulates that legal rules are valid only because they are enacted by an existing political authority). E.g., "In the literature of legal positivism it is of course standard practice to examine at length the relations of law and morals." Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law 204 (rev. ed. 1969)./ "What, then, is law? The basic answer, which is the essence of legislative positivism, is that only statutes enacted by the legislative power could be law." John H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 24 (1969). Cf. natural law (A). See positive law.

posse, in. See in esse.

posse comitatus (lit., "the power of the county") = a body of able-bodied citizens called together by the sheriff to suppress riots, pursue felons, or act in military defense of the country. E.g., "Horizontal and nationwide class divisions had by 1700 made the posse comitatus unusable as a police force, since it included the very classes [that] were prone to riot." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 270 (1966). The American frontier term posse originated as a shortened form of this early common-law term.

possess. The passive construction to be possessed of is a LEGALISM for the active verb to possess. E.g., "[I]f A was possessed of land [read possessed land] under a ten-year lease from B, the owner of the fee, B, and not A, was said to be seised." 1 American Law of Property 12–13 (A.J. Casner ed. 1952).

possession. A. Senses. Of this CHAMELEON-HUED WORD, a legal philosopher pessimistically states: "[T]he search for [its] 'proper' meaning . . . is likely to be a fruitless one." G.W. Paton, A Textbook of Jurisprudence 553 (4th ed. 1972). Generally speaking, it can have three senses: (1) "the fact of having or holding property in one's power"; (2) "the right under which one may exercise power over something at pleasure, to the exclusion of all others"; or (3) esp. in pl., "something that a person owns or controls; property."

Sense (1) is the classic sense; sense (2) is commonly considered a corruption (see (B)); and sense (3) is a predictable extension of meaning similar to the extension that property has undergone. See property (A).

B. And ownership. In sense (2), possession becomes confused with ownership—and legal writers ought to distinguish the two rigorously. Technically, ownership is a legal status: the aggregate of rights that give a person the fullest power to enjoy, destroy, or dispose of a thing; one of these rights is to possess the thing. Possession, meanwhile, is purely a matter of fact: a thief may acquire possession of a billfold, but the owner retains the rights of ownership. Ownership is always rightful, whereas possession might not be so. See ownership.

C. And custody. Possession and custody are usefully differentiated in criminal law. A person who takes shoes to a shoe-repair shop may leave the shoes for a few days to have new soles put on; in that event, the shoe-repairer takes possession. A shoe-repairer who can fix the shoes on the spot, while the customer waits, takes custody only.

Why the distinction? At common law, the cobbler with possession of shoes would, upon proof of misappropriation, be guilty of embezzlement. But the cobbler with custody would, on the same proof, be guilty of the lesser crime of larceny. See custody.

For more on these words in a different context, see possession, custody, or control.

possession, custody, or control. This phrase commonly appears in discovery requests that require another party to produce documents: one party asks another to produce all documents or things in the other's possession, custody, or control. The broadest of the three is generally considered control, since a person could turn something over to a fiduciary, thereby relinquishing possession and custody, but retaining control. See possession (C) & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

possession is nine-tenths of the law. Originally, in the 17th century—and well into the 19th—the catchphrase was possession is nine parts (or points) of the law, there supposedly being ten parts or points of the law. The substance of the idea was that one's having possession threw onto any other claimant the burden of showing an even better claim to possess. Throughout the 20th century, the phrase has generally been nine-tenths (not nine parts) in AmE and BrE alike.

It is a popular phrase, not really a legal one, and legal writers often slight the idea behind it when using it: "This rule partakes of the old adage that so frequently guides laymen in practical action, that possession is nine tenths of the law." In re Estate of Barassi, 71 Cal. Rptr. 249, 254 (Ct. App. 1968)./ "Although we are familiar with the maxim, 'possession is nine-tenths of the law,' we prefer to apply the remaining one-tenth . . . ." U.S. v. One 1985 Cadillac Seville, 866 F.2d 1142, 1146 (9th Cir. 1989). See MAXIMS.

possessive; possessory; possessorial. The terms possessive and possessory have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. Possessive = (1) exhibiting possession or the desire to possess; (2) [in grammar] denoting possession. Possessory = (1) of or pertaining to a possessor <possessory rights>; (2) arising from possession <possessory interest>; or (3) that is a possessor <possessory conservator>.

On possessory as opposed to petitory actions, see petitory.

POSSESSIVES. A. Singular Possessives. The best practice, advocated by Strunk and White in The Elements of Style and by every other authority of superior standing, is to add -'s to all singular possessives, hence witness's, Vitex's, Jones's, Congress's, testatrix's. So misunderstood is the rule that witness's actually gets a "[sic]" in Yeager v. Greene, 502 A.2d 980, 982 (D.C. Cir. 1985).

Legal stylists generally follow the rule just stated—e.g.: "We may summarize the foregoing by considering Holmes's much-cited dictum . . . ." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 13 (1961)./ "Holmes's thinking may have been influenced by his membership in a group of young men who, calling themselves the Metaphysical Club, met regularly in Boston and Cambridge from 1870 to 1872." Grant Gilmore, The Ages of American Law 50 (1977)./ "It is this recognition, I think, that accounts for the resonant chord struck by John Rawls's Theory of Justice in American law schools." Bruce A. Ackerman, Reconstructing American Law 94 (1984).

There are two exceptions to this rule. The first is that biblical and classical names ending in -s take only an apostrophe, hence Jesus' suffering, Moses' discovery, Aristophanes' plays, Grotius' writings. Some writers ill-advisedly ignore this exception—e.g.: "From its very beginning, the aim of Justinian's legislation was more ambitious than that of Theodosius's [read Theodosius'] codification had been." Hans J. Wolff, Roman Law 170–71 (1951). See Gaius.

The second exception is for singular terms formed from a plural. Thus Scribes, the name of the organization devoted to improving legal writing, makes Scribes' as a possessive (Scribes' president). The same holds true for General Motors: "A merger by General Motors will excite great interest in an enforcement agency simply because of General Motors's [read General Motors'] size." E.W. Kintner, An Antitrust Primer 95 (2d ed. 1973).

B. Plural Possessives. To form the plural possessive, an apostrophe is added to the -s- of the plural, e.g. bosses', Joneses', Sinzes', octopuses'. The one exception is for plurals not ending in -s-, for which -'s is added as in the singular possessive: brethren's, children's, men's, women's.

The apostrophe is surprisingly often misplaced or omitted—e.g.: "The so-called 'Married Womens' [read Women's] Acts' permit them to sue and be sued as if they were femes sole." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 32 n.29 (1916).

C. Units of Time or Value and the Genitive Adjective. The idiomatic possessive should be used with periods of time and statements of worth. E.g., "The court said the holding was a tenancy from year to year ordinarily requiring 60 days[']notice to terminate, but the special statute was held controlling." (The correct phraseology is sixty [or 60] days' notice, just as it is several years' experience and two months' time.)/ "The initial six months confinement [read six months' confinement] was to be followed by eighteen months probation [read eighteen months' probation]."/ "This lawsuit arises out of the alleged misappropriation of a million dollars' worth of equipment." (If the number is given in Arabic numerals, a possessive apostrophe is not used.)

D. Of Inanimate Things. Possessives of nouns denoting inanimate objects are generally unobjectionable. Indeed, they allow writers to avoid awkward uses of of—e.g.: the book's title, the article's main point, the system's hub, the envelope's contents, and the car's price tag. See of (A).

The old line was that it is better to use an "of phrase rather than the 's to indicate possession when the possessor is an inanimate object. Write foot of the bed, not the bed's foot." Robert C. Whitford & James R. Foster, Concise Dictionary of American Grammar and Usage 96 (1955). The foot of the bed, of course, is a SET PHRASE, so the example is not a fair one. Whenever it is not a violation of idiom, the possessive in 's is preferable—e.g.: "The constitutional claim is rooted in the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of due process."

But such possessives can be overdone: "Section 922(f)'s unambiguous language regarding the section's applicability requires us to decline the invitation to extend 922(f)'s coverage; 922(f)'s first sentence defines the statute's scope." In fact, it is often best to avoid use of possessives with statutes: "Relying on section 1471(a)'s legislative history [better: the legislative history of section 1471(a)], the court found that the regulation was not reasonably adopted."

The practice of using possessives with case names becomes preposterous when later courts interpolate full citations, as here: "'Consistent with Milliken [v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 97 S. Ct. 2749, 53 L. Ed. 2d 745 (1977)]'s teachings, a remedial order must be carefully tailored to correct the constitutionally infirm condition. . . .'" U.S. v. Crucial, 722 F.2d 1182, 1189 (5th Cir. 1983) (quoting Valley v. Rapides Parish Sch. Bd., 702 F.2d 1221, 1226 (5th Cir. 1983)).

E. Incorrect Omission of Apostrophe. It seems that possessive apostrophes are increasingly omitted nowadays. This sloppy habit is to be avoided. E.g., "Brown had hired Jack Rogers, a Lake Charles attorney, to procure Governor Edwards [read Governor Edwards's] signature." Brown v. Maggio, 730 F.2d 293, 294 (5th Cir. 1984). Where two possessives are proximate, writers will often inadvertently omit one: "We have considered the import and admissibility of the Alexanders' expert witnesses testimony [read witnesses' testimony] touching on the drilling of additional wells." See attorney's fees.

F. Past-Participial Adjectives as Attributive Nouns. These can become awkward. With such phrases as the insured's death or the deceased's residence, it is better to use an of-phrase; hence the death of the insured and the residence of the deceased. (Better yet, one might prefer decedent to deceased.) See accused, condemned, insured & deceased. See also PLURALS (D).

G. Phrasal Possessives. These are to be avoided when possible, so that one does not end up with sentences like this, "That strange man who lives down the block's daughter [read The daughter of that strange man who lives down the street] was arrested last week." Genitives with of are only slightly longer; more important, however, they are correct:

- "The plaintiff in error's mother [read mother of the plaintiff in error] died before the trial court's decision was appealed."
- "The court below's error [read error of the court below or trial court's error] was in granting summary judgment."
- "The trier of fact's award [read fact-trier's award] is not to be disturbed unless it is entirely disproportionate to the injury sustained." (See trier of fact.)
- "These statements do let women in on the man in question's view of [read how the man in question views] our half of humanity."
- "The three of us have, naturally, divided up our writing by subjects. But each of us read and commented freely upon the other two's [read others'] work." Roger A. Cunningham et al., The Law of Property iv (2d ed. 1993).

With a phrase such as court of appeals, the possessive is acceptable and widely used—e.g.: "The court of civil appeals' opinion uses substantially the same alter ego test that is stated in the briefs." The other established forms of phrasal possessives are variations on anybody else's: "The court's ruling disposed of no one else's claim." See else's.

H. Followed by Relative Pronouns. The relative pronoun who should not follow a possessive noun. E.g., "Or there may have been inimical voices raised among the committee, such as Palffy's or Nikolaus Esterhazy's, who just then had had an unpleasant brush with the composer." [Read Or there may have been raised among the committee inimical voices, such as those of Palffy or Nikilaus Esterhazy, who just then had had an unpleasant brush with the composer.] See ANTECEDENTS, FALSE (C).

I. Attributive Possessives. Businesses are often named with a proper single name in possessive form, as McDonald's or Sambo's. Although possessive in form, these are functionally nouns, as in Sambo's brings this action, etc. How, then, does one make a possessive of the noun Sambo's? One court did it this way: "On February 26, 1973, Sambo's Certificate of Authority to do business in this state was forfeited . . . ." Farris v. Sambo's Restaurants, Inc., 498 F. Supp. 143, 147 (N.D. Tex. 1980). The judge should have written Sambo's', because Sambo's certificate = certificate of Sambo, whereas Sambo's' certificate = certificate of Sambo's, the latter being the desired sense. Likewise, when Buddy's Food Store is shortened to Buddy's, one writes of Buddy's' manager. But good PHRASING requires the manager of Buddy's.

J. With Appositives. See APPOSITIVES (A).

possessor (= one who possesses) has the special legal sense "one who takes, occupies, or holds something without ownership, or as distinguished from the owner" (OED). Hence the following specimen in reference to a life estate: "The materials that follow are not intended to cover either the substantive law of waste under which the possessor may be liable to the holder of the future interest or the substantive law relating to liability of a nonpossessor."

possessory. See possessive.

possibility of reverter. See reversion.

possible; practicable. The author of the following advice was ill informed: "Do not use possible when you should use practicable, as it may make a world of difference whether an act is to be done if possible or only if practicable." Notes on the Art of Drafting Contracts 11 (Cornell Law School 1934). Rather, practicable (= feasible) is virtually a synonym of possible; the words to be distinguished are practical and practicable. See practical.

For distinctions involving possible, likely, and probable, see probable.

POSSLQ /pos-əl-kyoo/ is an ACRONYM standing for "person of the opposite sex sharing living quarters." Used in the 1980 U.S. census, POSSLQ has received criticism because, although it is intended to include only unmarried couples, it literally includes "married couples and communal livers, neither of which is a meretricious relationship." In re Eggers, 638 P.2d 1267, 1270 n.2 (Wash. Ct. App. 1982). In the early 1980s, the word tended to be in lower case (posslq), but in more recent writing it is usually set in all capitals.

POST-, when used for since or after to create a SENTENCE ADVERB, is a sloppy way of achieving brevity. "Post-Flanagan [read Since Flanagan], only two circuits have spoken to the precise question." See PRE-.

post. See ante.

post facto. See ex post facto.

posthaste is archaic in all but its adverbial sense.

post hoc (= [of or relating to] the fallacy of assuming causality from temporal sequence) for ex post facto or after the fact is a common error. E.g., "Petitioners observe correctly that if the lawyer's brief for the ICC had simply announced its clarifying analysis in the form of allegations or new explanations, such would constitute pure post hoc [read after-the-fact] rationalization not entitled to any consideration by this court. The clarifying opinion of the Commission, however, differs sharply from after-the-fact rationalizations made by attorneys or by courts." Public Serv. Co. of Indiana, Inc. v. ICC, 749 F.2d 753, 759 (D.C. Cir. 1984)./ "In applying these criteria, it is important that the district court resist the understandable temptation to engage in post hoc [read after-the-fact] reasoning by concluding that, because a plaintiff did not ultimately prevail, his action must have been unreasonable or without foundation." See post hoc, ergo propter hoc.

post hoc, ergo propter hoc denotes the fallacy of confusing sequence with consequence. Literally, the phrase means "after this, therefore because of this." Two common usages, since for because (acceptable) and consequent for subsequent (unacceptable), exemplify the fallacy: they originated when speakers and writers confused causality with temporality. The following specimen demonstrates a canny use of the maxim: "Here, as elsewhere in the law, propter hoc must be distinguished from post hoc." Hennigan v. Ouachita Parish Sch. Bd., 749 F.2d 1148, 1152 (5th Cir. 1985) (per Rubin, J.). See post hoc.

postjudgment. One word.

postman. At early common law, this word was equivalent to lawyer; more particularly, it referred to a barrister in the Court of Exchequer who had precedence in motions except in Crown business. The OED records that "the name was derived from the post, the measure of length in excise cases, beside which he took his stand." Surely this sense of the word was unrelated to another sense recorded by the OED: "a hireling writer of libels or scurrilous falsehoods." But see LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR. See also attorney (A) & SEXISM (B).

postmortem. See autopsy.

postnuptial (= made, occurring, or existing after marriage) refers to the time after the wedding, not after a divorce. E.g., "The trend is toward upholding postnuptial agreements, even where obsolete statutes codify the common-law rules on jointure." See antenuptial.

POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES come after the nouns they modify, generally because they follow Romance rather than Germanic (or English) syntax. They exist in English largely as a remnant of the Norman French influence during the Middle Ages, and especially in the century following the Norman Conquest. The French influence was most pronounced in the language of law, politics, religion, and heraldry.

In law as in these other fields, French phrases were adopted wholesale—syntax and all—and soon passed into the English language unchanged, though in English, adjectives almost invariably precede the nouns they modify. Following is a list of frequently used law-related phrases with postpositive adjectives:

accounts payable accounts receivable act malum in se annuity certain appearance corporal attorney general body corporate body politic brief amicus curiae chattels personal chattels real condition precedent condition subsequent corporation de facto corporation de jure court martial date certain decree absolute easement appurtenant fee simple fee simple defeasible fee simple determinable fee tail gap certain heir apparent law merchant letters patent letters rogatory (U.S.) letters testamentary notary public offense mala prohibita parties defendant parties litigant
postmaster general
president-elect queen regent (or regnant) secretary general sum certain sum total
twelve men good and true

On the troublesome issue of pluralizing the nouns in phrases such as these, see PLURALS (E).

At least two common English nouns, things and matters, often take postpositive adjectives that are ordinarily prepositive. Thus we say that someone is interested in things philosophical, or matters philological. And the adjective alive is always postpositive <the cattle were still alive>.

Sometimes a writer will attempt to create a prepositive adjectival phrase where properly the phrase would normally and most idiomatically be postpositive. The result is ungainly indeed: "The complained of summaries [read The summaries complained of] in this case are contained in the government's exhibit."

There is, however, a tendency in modern writing to make prepositive adjectival phrases out of what formerly would have been postpositive. Thus, instead of having payments past due, we just as often see past-due payments: "The precise issue is whether a bankruptcy court may decline to approve a Chapter 13 plan solely because a debtor proposes to pay off in installments during the term of the plan past-due payments on a promissory note."

posttrial. One word.

post-sentencing should be hyphenated for visual reasons. See PUNCTUATION (F).

potence; potency. Oddly, potency is more common in the positive, and impotence in the negative. See impotence.

potentiality is jargonistic when used merely for potential, n.

potential juror; prospective juror. These phrases are equally good plain-language translations of veniremember—e.g.: "Although he did not mention the Federal sentencing, the judge instructed a group of more than 50 prospective jurors that a verdict in the Denny case would not be reached . . . ." Jury Queries Resume in Beating Case, N.Y. Times, 8 Aug. 1993, at 17./ "The decision by Judge Glenn Berman in New Brunswick forced 'attorneys to begin qualifying additional candidates for a pool of potential jurors to sit on the trial of Nathaniel Harvey, 44." Jim O'Neill, 12 Potential Jurors Get Boot at Murder Trial, Star-Ledger (N.J.), 29 Oct. 1994, at 19. See venireman.

pour. See pore.

pouree trust. See pourover.

pourover, a term used in estate planning, refers to testamentary assets that are incorporated into a living trust. E.g., "The doctrines of incorporation by reference and nontestamentary acts, both potentially involved in pourovers from wills to living trusts, are considered here with modern statutes designed to permit pourovers without complications produced by the Wills Acts."

Sometimes, by transference, pourover is used as an adjective denoting a statute that allows this type of incorporation of testamentary assets into a living trust—e.g.: "The enactment of pourover statutes may result in decreased reliance on the doctrine of incorporation by reference; but at the same time pourover statutes may induce the courts to become more liberal in applying the doctrine . . . ."

At least one writer considers pourover a misnomer because, he says, "wills and insurance contracts do the pouring; the trust is pouree." Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 207 (2d ed. 1979). He therefore uses the phrase pouree trust, but this phrase seems unlikely to catch on. And, in any event, pourover trust is no less logical than spillover pond, in which the pond does no spilling but instead holds the water that is spilled.

power. For lawyers, the most important senses are these: (1) "the ability to do something, esp. to alter a legal relation by doing or not doing a given act"; (2) "legal authorization"; (3) "a document giving legal authorization"; and (4) "political ascendancy or influence."

When used in sense (2), the word is frequently coupled with right. But the coupling is often superfluous, as Jeremy Bentham explained:

> Powers, though not a species of rights . . . , are yet so far included under rights that wherever the word power may be employed, the word right may also be employed: The reason is, that wherever you may speak of a person as having a power, you may also speak of him as having a right to such power: but the converse of this proposition does not hold good: there are cases in which, though you may speak of a man as having a right, you cannot speak of him as having a power, or in any other way make any mention of that word. On various occasions you have a right, for instance, to the services of the magistrate: but if you are a private person, you have no power over him: all the power is on his side. This being the case, as the word right was employed, the word power might perhaps, without any deficiency in the sense, have been omitted."
> Jeremy Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation 224 n.1 (1823; repr. 1948).

power of attorney; letter of attorney. The former is the usual phrase in both AmE and BrE. Letter of attorney is a BrE variant that refers more properly to the document giving one authority to act on another's behalf, rather than to the authority itself. Power of attorney, however, is used both for the document and for the authority given by the document. The plural is powers of attorney. See PLURALS (E).

power of termination. See right of entry for condition broken & fee simple (G).

p.p. is an ambiguous abbreviation, for it may be short for propria persona (= in one's proper or own person), or per procurationem (= by proxy). (The abbreviation for pages (pp. or pp), of course, has no internal period.) For other abbreviations of the second phrase, see per procurationem.

practicable. See possible & practical.

practical; practicable. Though similar, these words should be distinguished in use; in both words, the first syllable is stressed. Practical = manifested in practice; capable of being put to good use. The word is most frequently contrasted with theoretical.

Practicable = capable of being accomplished; feasible; possible. E.g., "As a matter of construction, the court must, irrespective of what is practicable by way of financial provision, determine whether grave financial hardship will be caused to the respondent as a result of dissolution." (Eng.)

Occasionally the two words are confused—e.g.: "Not only might it be unfair to give general guidance without knowledge of the day-to-day practicability [read practicality] of such guidance, but also in depriving itself of such knowledge the court might well deprive itself of the opportunity of giving the best guidance." (Eng.) See possible.

practice; practise. In AmE, the former is both the noun and verb; in BrE the former is the noun, the latter the verb. Occasionally practise is used by American writers, but practice, n. & v.t., is the preferred spelling. One well-known exception to the general rule in the U.S. is the lawyers' organization called the Practising Law Institute.

practitioner; practiser. The former is the term primarily used in AmE and BrE for "one who exercises a profession or occupation." The latter is used almost exclusively in BrE, though not commonly. E.g., "This cause has been carefully instructed with evidence by the practisers." (Eng.) The variant practicer sometimes occurs in AmE.

praecipe /pre-sə-pee/ (lit., "command") denoted, at common law, a writ ordering a defendant to do some act demanded by the plaintiff or demandant, or to explain why (ostensurus quare) he or she should not do it. A praecipe action aims not at compensation for misconduct but at restoration of a right. For example, praecipe in capite was, at common law, the principal writ for the recovery of land in the King's court. Praecipe quod reddat was used (1) to claim chattels or debts that the defendant held unjustly; (2) to make the defendant perform a covenant; or (3) to obtain an accounting of moneys received. Praecipe quod permittat was used to order the defendant to allow the plaintiff to have or do something.

A modern example occurs in a court paper filed in the Supreme Court of British Columbia: "Praecipe. Required: To search for an Appearance entered on behalf of the Defendant XYZ Corporation. DATED _____. [Signature] Solicitor for the Plaintiff." (Can.)

A Pennsylvania judge writes that "praecipe may be correctly used as a verb as well as a noun . . . ." T.J. Terputac, A Handbook of English Usage 250 (1989). Primarily in Michigan and Pennsylvania, the word is used as a verb in three senses: (1) "to move for entry of judgment"; (2) "of a court, to rule (a case) ready for trial"; or (3) "of a lawyer, to move for a trial setting on the court's docket."

The use as a verb seems to have originated in Michigan, in senses (2) and (3)—e.g.: (Sense 2) "The defendant Runnells filed a plea September 12, 1924, and the case was praeciped on that date as ready for trial." Robinson v. Sample, 219 N.W. 661, 661 (Mich. 1928)./ (Sense 3) "During this period of time petitioners could have praeciped the cause for trial." Hatley v. Wolf, 30 N.W.2d 437, 439 (Mich. 1948). Later, these senses appeared in Pennsylvania—e.g.: (Sense 2) "[A] notice of rehearing by the Board . . . [stated] that the case had not been praeciped for trial or otherwise disposed." Cudo v. Hallstead Foundry, Inc., 539 A.2d 792, 797 (Pa. 1988) (Flaherty, J., dissenting).

Sense (1) however, is more common today in Pennsylvania—e.g.: "On May 23, 1979, Evans, as attorney for Fitelson praeciped the arbitration award for judgment, because the time period for entry of an appeal from the arbitration award had passed." Becker v. Evans, 496 F. Supp. 20, 20 (M.D. Pa. 1980)./ "The Stricklers . . . praeciped for entry of judgment and the instant timely appeal by Royal Insurance Company followed." Strickler v. Huffine, 618 A.2d 430, 432 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1992)./ "When no responsive pleading was received from DPW within thirty days, the claimant praeciped for entry of default judgment . . . ." Pennsylvania Inst. Health Servs., Inc. v. Commonwealth, 647 A.2d 692, 694 n.2 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 1994).

Most American lawyers would doubtless consider these uses of the word obscure, to say the least. In most parts of the U.S., lawyers don't praecipe a case for trial; they simply ask for a trial setting. Nor do they praecipe for entry of judgment; they move for entry of judgment.

pr(a)edial /pree-dee-əl/ (= consisting of or pertaining to or attached to the land), the rough equivalent of real in the phrase real property, is usu. spelled predial in Louisiana and praedial in Scotland.

The usual phrase in law is predial servitude, which means, in Scots and civil law, "a servitude affecting land, such as a right of way, of light, of support, and the like." E.g., "A predial servitude is a charge on a servient estate for the benefit of a dominant estate." La. Civ. Code Ann. art. 646 (West 1980). See servitude (A).

pray, in the legal sense "to request earnestly," is a survival from Elizabethan usage, as in Shakespeare's "a conqueror that will pray in aid for kindness, where he for grace is kneeled to." Antony & Cleopatra, 5.2.27–28. The religious sense of pray grew alongside the broader secular sense, and neither it nor prayer, q.v., should be viewed as symptomatic of BIBLICAL AFFECTATION. E.g., "Appellants pray for an injunction restraining defendant from making the patented device."/ "The wife by her answer cross-prayed for a divorce on the ground of desertion." (Eng.)

prayer = (1) a request addressed to the court that appears at the end of a pleading; or (2) in British parliamentary practice, a negative resolution that challenges a statutory instrument. E.g.: (Sense 1) "Taking up first the prayer for an injunction pendente lite, I cannot find that any case has been made out for enjoining action by the two corporate defendants."/ (Sense 2) "But even if a group of Members decide to challenge such an instrument (by what is called a 'prayer')—there is no guarantee that the government will provide time for a debate or the opportunity of a vote." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 70 (2d ed. 1985). See pray & pleading (C).

PRE- [+ NOUN]. Such a construction may be used adjectivally, as in the following examples: "But the prosperous fur-trading days of Astor and Chouteau were, in a sense, pre-law." Robert MacCrate, The Making of the American Lawyer, 34 S.D. L. Rev. 227, 227 (1989)./ "The neutral mechanism, far from being the discriminatory act, is merely the means by which the pre-act and pre- limitations disparate treatment is carried forward into the actionable time frame." Sobel v. Yeshiva Univ., 839 F.2d 18, 29 (2d Cir. 1988).

But making the pre- phrase into an adverb modifying a verb is a poor substitute for the idiomatic construction: before plus the noun. E.g., "Not so with respect to the harm that many States believed, pre-Roe [read before Roe], and many may continue to believe, is caused by largely unrestricted abortion." Webster v. Reprod Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 535 (1989) (Scalia, J., concurring in part)./ "[D]efendant could have responded that he did inform the police and this statement was made prearrest and pre-Miranda [read before they arrested him and read him his rights]." People v. Sutton, 464 N.W.2d 276, 277 n.3 (Mich. 1990)./ "Any number of specific programs effective now were not pre-Ruiz established [read established before Ruiz]." See POST-.

preachify is a derogatory word for preach; the OED defines it as "to preach in a factitious or a tedious way." See argufy & speechify.

preamble takes the preposition to or, less commonly, of. The corresponding adjective is preambular.

precatory (= of, relating to, or expressing entreaty or supplication) is a word not much used outside the law. Precatory words in a will, or in motions at shareholders' meetings, are words praying or expressing a desire that a thing be done; ordinarily, precatory words are not binding. The word is usu. opposed to or contrasted with mandatory. E.g., "Testators frequently annex precatory words to devises or bequests and thus create doubt whether an absolute gift or trust is intended."/ "I vote to reverse and to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that the words of the will on which plaintiff's cause of action is based are precatory but not mandatory."

precautionary; precautious. These terms have undergone DIFFERENTIATION since they were first used in the 18th century. Precautionary = (1) suggesting or advising provident caution; or (2) of, relating to, or of the nature of a precaution. Precautious = using precaution; displaying previous or provident caution or care (OED). See cautionary.

precede. A. And proceed. These words are sometimes confused even by otherwise literate professionals. Both may mean "to go ahead," but in different senses. Precede = to go ahead, of; to come before. Proceed = to go ahead; to continue. For a common misspelling, see (B).

B. Misspelled preceed. This misspelling seems to result from confusion with proceed. It occurs in print surprisingly often: see, e.g., Drennen Land & Timber Co. v. Angell, 475 So. 2d 1166, 1172 (Ala. 1985).

C. For preface. This seems to be an anomalous error—e.g.: "The publisher precedes [read prefaces] its collection of documents with an essay about the entire editorial process."

precedence; precedency. Today the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former; it was used through the beginning of the 19th century, but today -ce serves more ably for all purposes.

precedence; precedents. Pronunciation of these words is traditionally distinguished in AmE. The former is often thought to be best pronounced with the second syllable stressed, i.e., /prə-seed-ənts/, whereas the latter has the primary accent on the first syllable, i.e., /pres-ə-dənts/. Precedence is nevertheless acceptably pronounced /pres-ə-dənts/ in AmE, as it is usually sounded in the common phrase take precedence over. In BrE, /pres-ə-dənts/ is the only known pronunciation.

precedency. See precedence.

precedent, adj., is inferior to prior or previous, except when used as a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE in a phrase such as condition precedent. E.g., "This rule in no respect impinges on the doctrine that one who makes only a loan on such paper, or takes it as collateral security for a precedent [read prior] debt, may be limited in his recovery to the amount advanced or secured." This adjective is best pronounced /pri-seed-ənt/, although /pres-ə-dənt/ is acceptable.

The adjective precedent (= preceding in time or order) should not be used for precedential (= of the nature of, constituting, or relating to a precedent): "Under the precedent [read precedential] theory of this court, one panel may not overrule the decision of another panel of this court squarely on point and in the absence of intervening and overruling Supreme Court decisions."

precedent, n. A. And *stare decisis. A precedent is a decided case that furnishes a basis for determining an identical or similar case that may arise later, or a similar question of law. Stare decisis, by contrast, is the practice of applying precedents to later cases.

B. As a Shortened Form of binding precedent. The word precedent alone is ambiguous, since it is a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD. That is, we have both binding precedents and persuasive precedents, and they do not carry the same weight of authority: a binding precedent must be followed, whereas a persuasive precedent need not be. Usually, a lawyer who uses the word precedent means binding precedent.

Without the qualifying adjective, however, the term can be very broad indeed: "If the term 'precedent' is construed sufficiently broadly, there are very few cases in which there is literally none to serve as an analogy, however remote." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 204 (4th ed. 1991).

C. And custom. Plucknett, like other writers, has emphasized the distinction: one case constitutes a precedent, whereas several cases serve as evidence of a custom. Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 347 (5th ed. 1956).

D. Original precedent; declaratory precedent. Some writers distinguish between judicial deliverances that merely declare existing law (declaratory precedents) and those that lay down new law (original precedents). In fact, though, the difference is one of degree and not of kind: "If we have a case [that] deals with certain facts by applying an acknowledged rule, we really have an addition to the rule, because we now know that a certain kind of fact falls within it, and in the nature of things we can never have two sets of facts [that] are precisely similar. No precedent is purely 'declaratory' or purely 'original.'" William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 11 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

E. Meaning "a legal form." In England, Australia, and Canada, lawyers use precedent to refer to a legal form. American lawyers speak of a form, while Scots lawyers speak of a style. See style.

precedential ordinarily means "furnishing a guide or rule for subsequent cases." (See precedent, n.) E.g., "The conferees believe the case does not comport with the legislative intent of the statute or with its interpretation from 1927 through 1983; the case should not have any precedential effect."

precedents. See precedence.

preceding, when used simply for before, is best replaced by that word. E.g., "Appellants alleged in their complaint that preceding [read before] their arrests they were engaged only in peaceful and constitutionally protected protest activities." Cf. next preceding.

preceed. See precede (B).

precipitancy; precipitance; precipitation. Precipitancy = excessive or unwise haste in action; rashness. Precipitance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Precipitation = (1) haste, hurry; (2) the act of precipitating <the precipitation of the riot is still a mystery>; or (3) something precipitated (as rain or snow).

precipitate, adj.; precipitous. These words are quite different, though often confused. Precipitate = sudden; hasty; rash; showing violent or uncontrollable speed. This word is applied to actions, movements, or demands. E.g., "Henry ensured that the only effect of precipitate action by a claimant should be the delay of the fulfillment of his claim, and the increase of its cost . . . ." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 39 (2d ed. 1953).

Precipitous = like a precipice; steep. It is properly applied to physical things—rarely to actions, except when the metaphor of steepness is apt. But precipitous is frequently misused for precipitate—e.g.: "A federal court should await a definitive construction by a state court rather than precipitously [read precipitately] indulging a facial challenge to the constitutional validity of a state statute."/ "Within weeks the price of yarn began a precipitous decline." Perhaps this last usage is excusable, if we picture a graph with a sharp drop, or if we visualize a decline; but if "sudden" is meant, precipitate is the word.

Precipitant is a NEEDLESS VARIANT for precipitate—e.g.: "The stakeholder may have instituted interpleader proceedings precipitantly [read precipitately] and without any reasonable fear of adverse claims."

precipitation. See precipitancy.

precision; precisian; precisionist. Precision = accuracy; precisian = a person who adheres to rigidly high standards (often with regard to moral conduct); precisionist = a person who prizes absolute correctness of expression and performance, esp. in language and ritual.

preclusive; preclusory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

precondition is usu. unnecessary in place of condition—e.g.: "For months the Government tried in vain to persuade him that he and the ANC should abandon some of the cornerstones of their strategy as a pre-condition [read condition] for future negotiations." Fred Bridgland, Freedom Brings Mandela His Greatest Challenge, Sunday Telegraph, 11 Feb. 1990, at 3.

precontractual; precontract, adj. Contract scholars—not contractual scholars—disagree in their practice: Grant Gilmore refers to precontrac- tual duties, whereas G.H. Treitel refers to precontract negotiations. Gilmore's practice is probably better for two reasons: first, precontract is also a noun meaning "an agreement to marry," and thus may give rise to ambiguities; and second, it is better to use a genuinely adjectival form when it is available.

predacious; predaceous; predative; predatory; predatorial. Predatory = preying on other animals. The word is applied figuratively in the phrase from antitrust law, predatory pricing. The forms predaceous, predatorial, and predative are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. The spelling predacious has undergone DIFFERENTIATION and means "devouring; rapacious."

predate. See antedate.

predative; predatory; predatorial. See predacious.

predecease (= to die before), a Shakespearean coinage, has become a legal genteelism: "She predeceased him leaving a husband and two children." Anthony R. Mellows, The Law of Succession 515 (3d ed. 1977). And it surely has a place: if one says, She died before him . . ., the words She died resonate in the mind—the reader wonders how and why. But the legal writer usu. wants to focus on something else entirely: "Should she predecease her husband, even this incipient right is automatically extinguished." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 226 (1946). The writer who used die before in that sentence would lose some readers. Lawyers, in short, sometimes need to talk about death without thinking about it.

predecisional (of, relating to, or occurring during the time before a decision) is a mid-20th-century legal NEOLOGISM. E.g., "Total predecisional acceptance of Dr. Williams' report and Dr. Peltier's testimony is revealed by the following . . . ." Lee v. Gardner, 267 F. Supp. 578, 583 (W.D. Mo. 1967)./ "[O]ccasionally, on particular facts, a predecisional release has been criticized for the outside appearances it created . . . ." FTC v. Cinderella Career & Finishing Schs., Inc., 404 F.2d 1308, 1323 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

predial. See pr(a)edial.

predicable; predicative; predicatory. The first means "that may be predicated or affirmed." The second means "having the quality of predicating, affirming, or asserting." The third means "of or pertaining to a preacher."

predicate, v.t. (= [1] to affirm a statement or proposition; or [2] to found, base), is usu. construed with on in modern writing. E.g., "Even without Leavell, we would decline to predicate a broad immunity on the basis of the narrow holding of Miller."

PREDICATE NOMINATIVES are nouns or pronouns in the nominative or subjective case that appear after linking verbs—usually be-verbs. "It is I," one writes, for instance, or, in formal contexts: "It seems to be she," "You appeared to be I," and so on. When the situation is formal, these constructions are not affectations; they are obligatory. For example, the following error occurred merely because of an imperfect knowledge of grammar, together with aspirations to correctness: "The description 'plaintiff-appellee' or 'respondent below' forces us to keep looking at the title block on the opinion's first page to keep track of who is whom [read who]."

Nevertheless, in informal contexts and primarily in speech, it is quite acceptable today to say "It's me." On formal occasions, or if one is particularly fastidious in language, one should feel perfectly comfortable saying "It is I." See NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES.

predicative; predicatory. See predicable.

predominate, adj., is a NEEDLESS VARIANT for predominant. In good usage, predominate is the verb, predominant the adjective. Readers may be confused when predominate is used adjectivally: "These facts were predominate [read predominant] in the court's decision to pierce the corporate veil."/ "The Roth opinion referred to the Model Penal Code definition of obscenity—material whose predominate [read predominant] appeal is to 'a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion.'" Cf. preponderantly.

preempt; perempt. These words should be distinguished. Preempt (now generally spelled as one word without a hyphen) is a BACK-FORMATION from its noun, preemption. To preempt is to acquire beforehand to the exclusion of others, or to take precedence over.

To perempt, by contrast, is to quash, do away with, or extinguish. The OED and W3 record perempt as an obsolete or archaic term, but it is current at least in Louisiana in intransitive uses: "The privilege contained in article 3237 perempts or dies at the end of six months."

preemption; peremption. Preemption, by far the more common word, means: (1) "the right to buy before others"; (2) "the purchase of something under this right"; (3) "an earlier seizure or appropriation"; (4) "the occupation of (public land) so as to establish a preemptive title"; or (5) in AmE, Congress's legislatively taking over of an entire subject matter so as to make it inherently federal. See preempt. For more on sense (5), see preemption, federal. For right of preemption, see option.

Peremption is a rare legal term meaning "the act or process of quashing" (W3), "a nonsuit." It is rare everywhere, apparently, but in Louisiana. E.g., "[P]eremption is but a form of prescription, a species thereof, but with the characteristic that it does not admit of interruption or suspension . . . ." Flowers, Inc. v. Rausch, 364 So. 2d 928, 931 (La. 1978)./ "Actually, peremption is a common law term which has crept into our [civil] jurisprudence. Its counterpart in the civil law is really forfeiture." Id. at 931 n.1. Peremption and its derivatives are used throughout Equilease Corp. v. M/V Sampson, 756 F.2d 357 (5th Cir. 1985). See N. Stephan Kinsella, A Civil Law to Common Law Dictionary, 54 La. L. Rev. 1265, 1285 (1994).

preemption, federal; exclusive federal jurisdiction. Though many American legal writers fail to distinguish between these phrases, and use preemption for both senses, one jurist insists that, properly speaking, federal preemption should be kept distinct from exclusive federal jurisdiction: "In the former, federal substantive law supplants state law, but, absent other provisions, both state and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction of actions arising under that law; in the latter, only the specified federal instrumentalities have jurisdiction of the matter, irrespective of the law to be applied." 1A Moore's Federal Practice ¶ 0.160, at 189 (2d ed. 1981).

preemptioner; preemptor. These words should be differentiated. A preemptioner holds the right to purchase public land by preemption—e.g.: "A preemptioner acquires no present right to affect the property, but holds only a general contract right to acquire a later interest should the property owner decide to sell." Old Nat'l Bank v. Arneson, 776 P.2d 145, 148 (Wash. Ct. App. 1989).

A preemptor actually acquires land by using this right. Of course, preemptor serves also as the general agent noun corresponding to the verb preempt.

preemptive; preemptory; peremptive; peremptory. The adjectives most commonly used and distinguished are preemptive (= relating to or of the nature of preemption) and peremptory, q.v.

The two other forms have bona fide existences, however. Preemptory correctly means "of or relating to a preemptor" (but is sometimes misused for preemptive). (For the correct use, see preemptioner; for the incorrect use, see preemptory.) Peremptive = of or relating to peremption. E.g., "Authority exists in Louisiana cases to support the proposition that a prescriptive period defined in a statute conferring a right is actually a peremptive period." See preemption.

PREEMPTIVE PHRASES. See ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE

preemptor. See preemptioner.

preemptory for peremptory is a fairly common mistake. Properly, the former means "of or relating to a preemptor." See preemptioner & preemptive.

preestablished. So spelled.

preexisting. So spelled.

preface. See foreword.

prefatory; prefatorial; prefatial. The last two terms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of the first.

prefer, which generally means "to like better," survives in a number of older senses in legal writing. For example, the OED records the sense "to advance oneself or one's interests," exemplified in this quotation: "People can properly prefer their own self-interests." Additionally, prefer has the sense "to lay (a matter) before anyone formally for consideration, approval, or sanction; to bring forward (as an indictment)" <to prefer charges>. Hence: "A state's attorney is under a moral duty to enter a nolle prosequi whenever he is satisfied that a prisoner is innocent of the charge preferred against him."/ "Informations were also preferred against the first defendant that he did aid and abet each of the other defendants to engage in retail trading on Sunday by providing them with a stall and pitch for the sale of their goods." (Eng.)

preferable is inherently a comparative adjective; therefore it should not be used with more. E.g., "Unsatisfied with the steps toward first use protection that have thus far occurred under the Federal Trademark Act of 1946, he suggests a more flexible interpretative approach by the courts and administrative agencies or, more preferably [read or, preferably], congressional amendment." See COMPARATIVES AND SUPERLATIVES & ADJECTIVES (B).

Preferable is accented on the first, not on the second, syllable.

pregnancy termination. See abortion.

pregnant, negative. See negative pregnant.

prejudge. See forejudge.

prejudice, n. & v.t., is a LEGALISM for harm, n. & v.t. In ordinary discourse, it is a lawyer's pomposity—e.g.: "I doubt that he will prejudice [read hurt or harm] her chances of getting a job by advancing too quickly." In the following two specimens, the reference is to legal harm: "The critical inquiry is whether, for whatever reason, counsel's performance was deficient and whether that deficiency prejudiced the defendant."/ "A stay of the plaintiff's action here will not prejudice him." (Eng.)

Sometimes the past participle prejudiced almost gives rise to a MISCUE, as some readers might take it to mean "having a strong bias against (something)"—e.g.: "The Louisiana revocatory action is available to a creditor who is prejudiced [i.e., harmed] at the time by a fraudulent transfer made by his debtor." Albert Tate, Jr., "The Revocatory Action in Louisiana Law," in Essays on the Civil Law of Obligations 133, 133 (Joseph Dainow ed., 1969).

prejudice, with(out). These terms are used in reference to whether a future action is barred. For example, if a court dismisses a lawsuit with prejudice, the court has adjudicated the merits of the case, so the dismissal constitutes a bar to future action. A dismissal without prejudice is not an adjudication on the merits; hence no right or remedy is foreclosed to the parties.

Increasingly, writers are placing with(out) prejudice before the noun dismissal—but the resulting PHRASAL ADJECTIVE jars the reader familiar with the legal idiom: "Government counsel told the justices that the district judge erred by not performing the balancing test the act mandates for choosing between with- and without-prejudice dismissal." Supreme Court Ponders Sanction for Violation of Speedy Trial Act, 56 U.S.L.W. 1176, 1176 (17 May 1988).

prejudicial. A. And prejudiced. Prejudicial (= tending to injure; harmful) applies to things and events; prejudiced (= harboring prejudices) applies to people. The meaning of a sentence can frequently be made clearer by using harmful in place of prejudicial.

Occasionally, writers misuse prejudicial for prejudiced—e.g.: "Indeed the rule shields the deliberations and conclusions of the chosen representatives of the board only if they possess a disinterested independence and do not stand in a dual relation which prevents an unprejudicial [read unprejudiced] exercise of judgment." Auerbach v. Bennett, 393 N.E.2d 994, 1001 (N.Y. 1979).

B. And pre-judicial. The hyphen makes an important difference. Pre-judicial was used in Roman law in reference to a class of preliminary actions in which questions of right or fact, usually as relating to status, were determined. Today the hyphenated form is often used somewhat differently, in reference to a time before a given person became a judge—e.g.: "Professor Schwartz opens his book with a brief chapter on Warren's pre-judicial career." See PUNCTUATION (F)

The more usual term is prejudicial, discussed in (A). E.g., "The allegedly prejudicial remarks pointed to by appellee were clearly made in the context of a hypothetical involving a worker who becomes disabled after a second accident."/ "The trial judge should have made a determination of the relative probative value of the 23-year-old conviction as against the prejudicial effect on the jury."

preliminary injunction. See temporary restraining order.

preliminary to, when used merely as an equivalent of before, is a silly pomposity—e.g.: "Preliminary to [read Before] the date set for trial a pretrial hearing was held by the state court." Cf. preparatory to, prior to & antecedent.

premeditated (= consciously considered beforehand) appears mostly in criminal-law contexts <premeditated murder>. Because it invariably precedes a bad act of some kind, the word has taken on strongly negative connotations.

premeditatively, adv., is used much more often than the corresponding adjective, premeditative. The adverb provides an alternative to the awkward term premeditatedly, which is also common. E.g., "Defendant was charged with willfully, deliberately, and premeditatively murdering her with malice aforethought . . . ." State v. Hansen, 225 N.W.2d 343, 345 (Iowa 1975). See -EDLY premise; premiss. Both refer to "a previous statement or proposition from which another is inferred as a conclusion." The first is the AmE, the second the BrE spelling.

premises. A. As a Popularized Legal Technicality. Premises (= a house or building) has a curious history in legal usage. Originally, in the sense of things mentioned previously, it denoted the part of a deed that sets forth the names of the grantor and grantee, as well as the things granted and the consideration. Then, through HYPALLAGE in the early 18th century, it was extended to refer to the subject of a conveyance or bequest as specified in the premises of the deed. Finally, it was extended to refer to a house or building along with its grounds. In short, someone who says, "No alcohol is allowed on these premises," is engaging unconsciously in a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY.

The term always takes a plural verb—e.g.: "The premises were put under surveillance." And it is improper to shorten premises—in the sense of a building together with its grounds—to the singular premise. E.g., "[A no-knock provision allows] law-enforcement officers to enter a premise [read premises] forcibly, without announcing their presence before entering, under certain circumstances." Ralph De Sola, Crime Dictionary 103 (1982).

B. Other Senses in Drafting. The word premises is sometimes used in the sense of matters (usu. preliminary facts or statements) previously referred to in the same instrument. In practice, this usage is often inarticulate and confusing, since the subject matter constituting the premises is rarely specified in the instrument. For example, one who writes wherefore, premises considered in the prayer of a court paper would be hard pressed to say what the premises are, other than everything that has gone before.

Occasionally, too, lawyers use premises in the logical, syllogistic sense of the grounds or bases for a legal argument or legal reasoning. See ISSUE-FRAMING.

premiss. See premise.

premium. Pl. -iums. The form premia is hopelessly pedantic: "Tender offers entail substantial premia [read premiums] compared with the prices shares carry before the bids—and afterward, should the offers be defeated." Flamm v. Eberstadt, 814 F.2d 1169, 1174 (7th Cir. 1987). See PLURALS (A).

premortal; premortem. See antemortem.

premortgage. So spelled, without a hyphen.

prenuptial. See antenuptial.

pre-owned for used. See EUPHEMISMS.

preparatory; preparative. As an adjective, preparative is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of preparatory. It is a legitimate noun, however, meaning "something that prepares the way for something else."

preparatory to, used in the sense "in preparation for," is legalistic—e.g.: "The demolition of the two-story building and the four-story building constituted work preparatory to [read in preparation for] the construction of the building . . . " Waikiki Resort Hotel, Inc. v. City & County of Honolulu, 624 P.2d 1353, 1360 (Haw. 1981)./ "An admission made in court or preparatory to [read in preparation for] trial by a party or his attorney . . . removes the fact from the field of disputed issues in the particular case in which it is made." Rice v. State Farm Ins. Co., 885 S.W.2d 775, 779 (Mo. Ct. App. 1994)./ "On April 6, 1994 defendant mailed proxy materials to its shareholders preparatory to [read in preparation for] the annual meeting scheduled for May 11, 1994." Smith v. Orange & Rockland Utils., Inc., 617 N.Y.S.2d 278, 279 (Sup. Ct. 1994).

The phrase is likewise pretentious in place of before—e.g.: "Upon the appellant's conviction and preparatory to [read before] sentencing, the trial court ordered a presentence report pursuant to Code § 19.2-299." Robinson v. Commonwealth, 413 S.E 2d 661, 661 (Va. Ct. App. 1992). Cf. preliminary to, prior to & antecedent to.

prepense. The phrase malice prepense is obsolete for malice aforethought. See aforethought & malice aforethought.

preplan is illogical for plan because one can plan something beforehand only. E.g., "Ninety percent of wasting time and standing in line can be eliminated with a little preplanning [read planning] and some common sense." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 212 (1984). See ILLOGIC & REDUNDANCY.

preponderance of the evidence; clear and convincing evidence. The former, denoting the greater weight of the evidence, is the "traditional measure of persuasion in civil cases." John W. Strong et al., McCormick on Evidence § 340, at 575 (4th ed. 1992). The phrase clear and convincing evidence—as well as half a dozen or so variations, such as clear, convincing, and satisfactory evidence—denotes a "more exacting measure." Id. But this heightened standard, however expressed, remains fuzzy: "It has been persuasively suggested that [the standard] could be more simply and intelligibly translated to the jury if they were instructed that they must be persuaded that the

preponderantly; preponderately. The better form is preponderantly, though the NEEDLESS VARIANT preponderately is becoming commonplace—e.g.: "For an award of supplemental earnings benefits, the claimant must preponderately [read preponderantly] prove an inability to earn 90 percent of pre-injury wages." Britton v. Morton Thiokol, Inc., 604 So. 2d 130, 134 (La. Ct. App. 1992).

Preponderate should be used only as a verb, not as an adjective—or, by derivation, as an adverb. Cf. predominate.

PREPOSITIONS. A. Ending Sentences with. The spurious rule about not ending sentences with prepositions is a remnant of Latin grammar, in which a preposition was the one word that a writer could not end a sentence with. But Latin grammar never should have been thought to straitjacket English grammar. If the SUPERSTITION is a "rule" at all, it is a rule of rhetoric and not of grammar, the idea being to end sentences with strong words that drive the point home. That principle is sound, of course, but not to the extent of meriting lockstep adherence.

Churchill's witticism about this preposterous bugaboo should have laid it to rest. When someone once upbraided him for ending a sentence with a preposition, he rejoined, "That is the type of arrant pedantry up with which I shall not put." Avoiding a preposition at the end of the sentence sometimes leads to just such a preposterous monstrosity.

Perfectly natural-sounding sentences end with prepositions, particularly when a verb compounded with a preposition appears at the end (as in follow up or ask for). E.g., "The act must have some causal connection with the injury complained of." When one decides against such formal (sometimes downright stilted) constructions as of which, on which, and for which—and instead chooses the relative that—the preposition is necessarily sent to the end of the sentence: "I must respectfully dissent, for this is a point on which I must insist" becomes far more natural as, "I must respectfully dissent, for this is a point that I must insist on."

Moreover, good writers often end their sentences with prepositions—e.g.:

- "But the admission of consuls into the United States, where no previous treaty has stipulated it, seems to have been nowhere provided for." The Federalist No. 42, at 265 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).
- "At first sight it is little to the credit of Montesquieu's and Vico's contemporaries that their work was not followed up." Frederick Pollock, "The History of Comparative Jurisprudence," in Essays in the Law 1, 22 (1922; repr. 1969).
- "Sound objectives became confused and were even lost sight of." Fleming James, Civil Procedure § 2.5, at 66 (1965).
- "There is always some unrepealed junk that nobody will make an effort to get rid of." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 126 (1968).
- "The trouble is that Holmes failed to keep in mind his own profound insight into the complex interplay between new materials drawn from life and old materials from the past which have not yet been sloughed off." Grant Gilmore, The Ages of American Law 53 (1977).
- "The involuntary bailee can be quickly disposed of. He is one who has been sent goods that he did not ask for." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 694 (1978).
- "Perhaps it is possible for a particular case to be either within or without the judicial power, depending on the court it is in." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 45 (4th ed. 1983).
- "The result of this was that agreements in restraint of trade were frequently made and frequently abided by." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 248 (3d ed. 1986).

See HYPERCORRECTION (I) & SUPERSTITIONS (A).

For an interesting—and incorrect—example involving where it is at, see at.

B. Redundancy of. Writers often repeat prepositions unnecessarily when there are intervening phrases or clauses. E.g., "The Massachusetts court argued that promoters stand in as much in [omit the first in] a fiduciary position to the corporation when uninformed shareholders are expected to be brought in after the wrong has been perpetrated as when there are current shareholders to whom no disclosure is made." Cf so as + [infinitive].

C. Wrongly Elided. Just as often, however, necessary prepositions are wrongly omitted, usually because of the proximity of the same preposition performing a different function—e.g.: "An acceptance that requests a change [of] or addition to terms of the offer is not thereby invalidated unless the acceptance is made to depend on assent to the changed or added terms."/ "Maxi Corporation is a Texas corporation [of] which Smith owns sixty percent of the stock."

Occasionally prepositions are omitted for fear of ending a sentence with one: "There are no unasserted claims and assessments of any nature that we are aware [of]." (Or, one might say, of which we are aware.]/ "The courts recognize that the seller and buyer are not the only persons interested in this transaction and have imposed duties on the selling shareholder with respect to whom he sells [to]." The writers should not have feared writing aware of and sells to. See (A).

There is at least one other type of problem caused by prepositions wrongly omitted: an AMBIGUITY may result. For example, Attorney Solicitation is the title of a law review article; yet from the title, one does not know whether the article refers to the solicitation of, or solicitation by, attorneys. That anyone with legal knowledge would presume the latter does not vindicate the writer's vagueness. See NOUN PLAGUE. See also (E) below.

D. Correctly Matching with Verbs. A useful rule of thumb—by no means to be taken as an absolute rule—in determining what preposition to use with a given verb is to follow the prefix of that verb. Hence inhere in, comport with (L. com- "with"), attribute to (L. ad- "to"), and so on. There are many exceptions, however. Impute takes on, oblivious takes of, and in respect can take either of or to, though with respect takes only to.

The verbs used in criminal law are sometimes tricky. Following are the correct prepositions for some of the common verbs:

acquitted of burglary acquitted on an indictment, count, or charge of burglary charged in (AmE) or on (BrE) an indictment or count charged with murder convicted of burglary convicted on an indictment, count, or charge of burglary indicted for embezzlement indicted on a charge of embezzlement pleaded guilty to a charge or count of murder pleaded guilty to murder sentenced on an indictment, count, or charge tried on an indictment, count, or charge

Many other verbs are treated throughout this work. Readers with an interest in a more detailed, comprehensive treatment of this subject may benefit from the following works: Morton Benson et al., The BBI Combinatory Dictionary of English: A Guide to Word Combinations (1986); Frederick T. Wood, English Prepositional Idioms (1967); and A.P. Cowie & R. Mackin, The Oxford Dictionary of Current Idiomatic English (1975).

E. Repetition of After Conjunctions. Often it is useful in avoiding AMBIGUITY to repeat the preposition governing the noun after or or and. E.g., "Is it a question of law or of fact?"

A statute drafter's failure to repeat such a preposition resulted in litigation that worked its way to the U.S. Supreme Court. The question arose whether an agency could remove a case under the following provision:

> (a) A civil action or criminal prosecution commenced in a State court against any of the following persons may be removed by them to the district court of the United States . . . .
> (1) Any officer of the United States or [of] any agency thereof . . . .

The Supreme Court used grammatical analysis in concluding that the removal by an agency was improper: "We find that . . . the first clause of § 1442(a)(1) grants removal power to only one grammatical subject, '[a]ny officer,' which is then modified by a compound prepositional phrase, 'of the United States or [of] any agency thereof.'" International Primate Protection League v. Tulane Educ. Fund, 500 U.S. 72, 79–80 (1991). See (C) above.

F. Getting It Wrong. Writers often use the incorrect preposition—e.g.: "To get upset about Begelman in Hollywood is to get upset about [read at] a cannibal for chewing his own cuticles."/ "In sum, the common-law widow's election has no tax consequences to [read for] the surviving spouse." See as to (A).

prerequisite; requisite. Rarely is prerequisite used with the degree of punctilio that Eric Partridge prescribed: "Properly, a prerequisite has to be obtained or fulfilled before a requisite can be attended to. In short, prerequisite is rarely permissible." Vigilans [Eric Partridge], Chamber of Horrors 114 (1952). Probably it is more accurate to say that prerequisite simply includes a time element, whereas requisite does not.

prerogative; prerogatory. Prerogative (= of, relating to, or exercising an exclusive right or privilege) is the standard term. Prerogatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "At this time, a prerogatory [read prerogative] writ is not before the court in this case." Mott v. England, 604 P.2d 560, 564 (Wyo. 1979).

prerogative writs. During the 16th century, this name was given to administrative writs such as mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus, and prohibition—each of which was originally in the nature of an administrative order from a superior official commanding a subordinate to do something, give some information, or the like. As a major legal historian notes, however, the name prerogative writs "was not altogether apt, because in the early stages of their expansion these writs were mainly used to curb prerogative activity by councillors and conciliar courts." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 165–66 (3d ed. 1990).

The phrase extraordinary writs, which is perfectly equivalent, is more genuinely descriptive, and therefore preferable.

prerogatory. See prerogative.

prescribe, v.i. In lay writing, prescribe is transitive only: doctors prescribe drugs and moralists prescribe rules of conduct. In Louisiana and Scots law, prescribe has a special intransitive sense: "[of an action] to suffer prescription; to lapse, to become invalid or void by passage of time; to be no longer capable of prosecution" (OED). Hence: "We need not unravel this jurisprudence to determine whether any of his trespass claims for damages for the actual taking of his property have prescribed [i.e., become void by passage of time]."/ "Appellee's right to claim just compensation for this interest does not prescribe [i.e., cease to be capable of prosecution] until two years from the date of the judgment of the district court."/ "The district court correctly held, therefore, that appellee's claims for damages incident to the taking of his property for use as a gas storage reservoir had prescribed [i.e., lapsed]." Cf. prescription.

The civilian sense of prescribe has also been employed transitively—a sense not listed in the OED: "It was shown that the property involved was the same property as that in a suit brought in the Louisiana court a few years earlier where the same restrictive covenant was held to have been prescribed by two years['] continued violation." Warner v. Walsdorf, 277 F.2d 679, 680 (5th Cir. 1960). See proscribe.

prescription. In law, this term frequently refers to the legal effect that the passage of time has on a person's rights or obligations. That effect may be to establish those rights or obligations (positive prescription), fortify them (another type of positive prescription), or extinguish them (negative prescription). For example, under the (English) Prescription Act 1832, a right to an easement may be established through continual use over 20 years' time. In the U.S., periods for prescription vary from state to state: they are sometimes 10, 15, or 20 years. Cf. proscription.

present. Phrases such as the present testator and the present trust have become common spin-offs of the present case and the present writer. (See FIRST PERSON (A).) Rarely, however, does present serve any purpose. See instant case.

presentable has nearly opposite senses in nonlegal and legal contexts. Whereas fops go to great lengths to make themselves "presentable," criminals subject to presentment are also said to be "presentable"—e.g.: "By the laws of New Jersey the Court of Oyer and Terminer and general jail delivery has 'cognizance of all crimes and offences whatsoever which, by law, are or shall be of an indictable or presentable nature . . . .'" Andrews v. Swartz, 156 U.S. 272, 275 (1895) (quoting a New Jersey statute).

present case. See instant case.

presenter; presentor. The preferred spelling is -er. The two legal senses are (1) "a person who makes a presentment"; and (2) "a person who presents a petition, bill, etc. (i.e., makes a presentation)." For more detail on sense (1), see presentment.

presentiment. See presentment.

presenting jury. See grand jury (A).

presently contains an AMBIGUITY. In the days of Shakespeare, it meant "immediately." Soon its meaning evolved into "after a short time" (perhaps because people exaggerated about their promptitude); this sense is still current. Then, chiefly in the AmE, it took on the additional sense "at present; currently." Some writers deprecate this sense, but the Oxford Guide states that it is "widely used and often sounds more natural than at present." It certainly appears in formal legal prose in this sense, esp. in AmE: "Enough instances of self-enrichment presently occur, even in the case of managers of public corporations, to suggest that the market cannot fully control this phenomenon."/ "Presently pending before this court is an appeal from the decision of the district court that denied appellants' application to present a next-friend petition for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of their son, a death-sentenced prisoner." Cf. momentarily.

presentment; presentiment. The first means "the act of presenting or laying before a court or other tribunal a formal statement about a matter to be dealt with legally." (For the special sense of presentment in criminal law, see indictment.) The second means "a vague mental impression or feeling of a future event."

presentor. See presenter.

presents, know all men by these. See know all men by these presents.

present time, at the. This phrase is wordy for now.

present writer is today generally considered inferior to I or me. See present & FIRST PERSON (A). preservation; preserval. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

presidence; presidency. The former means "the action or fact of presiding"; the latter means "the office or function of president."

president. In corporate law, the term is used differently in AmE and BrE. In AmE, president often denotes the chief executive director of a company; but in BrE, it is a title usu. given to a nonexecutive former head of a company.

presiding judge. See chief judge.

presiding juror. See foreman & SEXISM (B). prestatutory. So spelled. See PUNCTUATION (F). presumably. See presumptively.

presume. See assume.

presumption = a judicially applied prediction of factual or legal probability. E.g., "After adjudication of insanity, a presumption of insanity continues, but a subsequent adjudication of restoration to sanity by competent authority restores the previous presumption of sanity until the contrary is made to appear."/ "By the provisions of the Restatement of the Law of Contracts it is expressly provided that there is a presumption that the offer is to enter into a bilateral contract."

In American law, the most basic distinction is between a presumption of law and a presumption of fact. A presumption of law is a rule of law by which the finding of a basic fact gives rise to a presumed fact capable of being rebutted. A presumption of fact is simply an argument; it is an inference that may be drawn from the establishment of a basic fact, but need not be drawn as a matter of law—e.g., that the possessor of recently stolen goods is the thief. This distinction is increasingly rejected. See rebuttable presumption.

British lawyers distinguish between the following types: (1) presumptions juris et de jure, which are irrebuttable; (2) presumptions juris, which are rebuttable by evidence; and (3) presumptions of fact, which are merely inferences.

presumptive; presumptuous. Presumptive = (1) giving reasonable grounds for presumption or belief; warranting inferences; or (2) based on presumption or inference. E.g., in sense (2): "The interest limited in that case was a remainder and the settlor's intent to revoke the instrument was ineffective since presumptive remaindermen were not parties to the revocation." (For heir presumptive, see heir (B).) Presumptuous = arrogant, presuming, bold, forward, impudent.

presumptively; presumably. These words are often used synonymously in English prose, but in legal writing are commonly differentiated. Presumptively = by legal presumption. E.g., "The literal words of the statute are presumptively conclusive of legislative intent, but that presumption may be defeated by contrary indications of intent also evident on the face of the statute." Presumably = as one may presume or reasonably suppose; by presumption or supposition.

presumptuous. See presumptive.

pretence. See pretense.

pretend as though for pretend that (by analogy to act as though) is unidiomatic.

pretense; pretence. The AmE spelling is -se, the BrE spelling -ce. See false pretenses.

pretentious (= making claim to great merit or importance) for pedantic (= overrating or parading book-learning or technical knowledge) is an unthinking blunder: "The line between owner and repairman is dull and elusive at best; fortunately, Congress has for future cases ended this sometimes pretentious [read pedantic] distinction."

preterмit. A. Connotation of Purposefulness. Pretermit generally connotes "to overlook or ignore purposely," as here: "Our deliberate choice, however, is to dispose finally of the appeal on its merits and pretermit a difficult jurisdictional issue."/ "Pretermitting other problems with appellant's claim, we find based on these facts that appellant's failure to present evidence of the existence of the vodka bottles was due to his own lack of diligence and that of his counsel."

Yet in the legal phrase pretermitted child statutes, the word pretermitted means "neglected or overlooked accidentally." E.g., "Pretermitted heir statutes are designed to prevent inadvertent disinheritance of a child or other descendant by the testator; the statutes are not intended to prevent the testator from disinheriting a child if he desires to do so." This sense derives from Roman law, which had the special term preterition for the omission by a testator to mention in his will one of his children or natural heirs.

B. For prevent. Pretermit does not properly mean "to prevent, preclude, or obviate"—though legal writers commonly seem to attribute those meanings to the word. E.g., "We do not read Weeks as mandating remand in all cases where a removal petition is untimely; we are unwilling to allow a model defect to pretermit [read prevent] our substantive inquiry."/ "It is incorrect to read the 'subject only to' language as pretermitting [read precluding] a reading of the contract as a whole to flesh out the extent of Global Marine's obligation under this provision."/ "The disposition [that] we have made . . . pretermits [read obviates] the necessity for discussion of the third point." Gray County v. Warner & Finney, 727 S.W.2d 633, 640 (Tex. App.—Amarillo 1987).

pretextual (= constituting a pretext), though not recognized in the OED, W10, or W3, is common in American legal writing. E.g., "Whether the purpose of the statute is to screen the courts against pretextual grievances or to protect the respondent . . . , we need not inquire." Cameron v. Cameron, 56 S.E.2d 384, 388 (N.C. 1949)./ "There is no evidence to support a contention that the arrest for the traffic violation was pretextual." State v. Moody, 443 S.W 2d 802, 804 (Mo. 1969)./ "[The] employer's proffered reason for her discharge was merely 'pretextual.'" Chavis v. Whitehall Labs., Inc., 664 F. Supp. 413, 413 (N.D. Ind. 1986) (case summary). See nonpretextual.

pretrial should not be hyphenated. See PUNCTUATION (F).

pretty, used as an adverb, is still considered informal or colloquial. E.g., "Handicapped as counsel was by a defendant under present confinement and with a rich history of earlier state convictions, it was pretty clear that counsel could not run the risk of putting the defendant on the stand." Pretty adds nothing to the sentence, unless it conveys a shade of doubt—pretty clear being less certain in some readers' minds than clear. See WEASEL WORDS.

prevent now ordinarily takes from, although archaically it is used with a direct object and a participle. E.g., "There are various matters that interfere with this normal course and prevent the action proceeding to final judgment." In BrE this usage remains common.

Prevent there causes ugly and ungrammatical constructions—e.g.: "Their action prevented there from being a quorum." [Read Their action prevented a quorum from being reached.] prevent(at)ive. The correct form is preventive—both as noun and adjective—although the corrupt, extra-syllabled form preventative is unfortunately common. E.g., "As for . . . misplaced words—possibly the best preventative [read preventive] is a secretary who majored in English composition . . . ." Mortimer Levitan, Confidential Chat on the Craft of Briefing, 1957 Wis. L. Rev. 59, 62./ "It is in no sense a preventative [read preventive] remedy, but is prospective merely . . . ." 52 Am Jur. 2d Mandamus § 9, at 337 (1970)./ "[G]reater willingness to make doctors liable means that they are forced to practise what is called 'preventative [read preventive] medicine' and order costly, complicated, and often unnecessary tests." R.W.M. Dias & B.S. Markesinis, Tort Law 3 (1984).

preverdict. So spelled—without a hyphen. See PUNCTUATION (F).

previous. See prior.

previously; before, adv. Although previous to is much inferior to before as a preposition, just the opposite holds true for the adverbs. Previously is better than before, at least when the adverb comes before the verb—e.g.: "M. S. was then operating the filling station on lot three as before [read previously] mentioned."

previous to for before is unnecessarily highfalutin—e.g.: "Previous to [read Before] her service on the Supreme Court, Ginsburg served on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia."

One sometimes even finds previously to—e.g.: "Judge Critz was a member of the three-judge court, as well as having been a commissioner previously to [read before] becoming a judge." (An overhaul would greatly improve this sentence: After serving as a commissioner, Judge Critz became a member of a three-judge court.)/ "Throughout 1938 and for many years previously and subsequently [read before and after], defendants carried on their business in Newark."/ "Previously to [read Before] December 1950, appellants carried on business at Liverpool." (Eng.) See prior to. Cf. anterior to & antecedent.

prevision = foresight. E.g., "Life will have to be made over, and human nature transformed before prevision so extravagant can be accepted as the norm of conduct, the customary standard to which behavior must conform." Palsgraf v. Long Island Ry., 162 N.E. 99, 100 (N.Y. 1928) (per Cardozo, C.J.). The word is not to be confused with the ordinary term, provision.

prideful. See proud.

prima facie (= at first sight) may function as either an adjective or an adverb, here as an adverb: "Publication of this language prima facie constitutes a cause of action and prima facie constitutes a wrong without any allegation or evidence of damage other than what is implied or presumed from the fact of publication." Occasionally, the phrase even serves as a SENTENCE ADVERB—e.g.: "Prima facie, a crime will be tried in the county in which it was committed . . . ." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 50 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).

Adjectival uses are perhaps even more common today—e.g.: "The cases at most attributed but prima-facie meaning to such words, and a competent draftsman would not deliberately pick a word that instead of controlling the context is easily colored by it."/ "On one view, there is a prima-facie duty of care where damage is within reasonable contemplation . . . ." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 45 (4th ed. 1991). On hyphenating this phrase when it functions as an adjective, see PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (B).

Sometimes the phrase appears to have been misused for per se, as here: "There are certain exceptional cases where a communication is privileged, though prima facie libelous [read libelous per se?]." See at first blush.

prima-facie case = (1) the establishment of a legally required presumption that may be rebutted; or (2) the plaintiff's burden of producing enough evidence to permit the fact-trier to infer the fact at issue. Texas Dep't of Community Affairs v. Burdine, 450 U.S. 248, 254 n.7 (1981). The CDL defines prima-facie case as "a case that has been supported by sufficient evidence for it to be taken as proved in the absence of adequate evidence to the contrary." E.g., "Until he has proved that the defendant will in that case profit at his expense, he has not made out a prima-facie case to be paid anything, and until he has proved how much that profit will be, his prima facie case is not complete."

primary, in the JARGON of insurers, is sometimes used as an attributive noun for primary beneficiary. Following is an example from a life-insurance policy: "When the insured dies, payment will be made in equal shares to the primary beneficiaries living when payment is made. If a primary dies after the first payment is made, that primary's unpaid share will be paid in equal shares to other primaries living when payment is made."

primary jurisdiction. See original jurisdiction.

prime (= to take priority over) is a usage unknown to lay writing. E.g., "It is undisputed that the 1977 and 1979 mortgages were preferred mortgages that primed Belcher's lien."/ "The letter states only that the rights of Rivercity under the option agreement will prime the rights of Whitney under the Act of Collateral Mortgage."

primer, in the sense of "an introductory or refresher book," is always pronounced /prim-ər/. The undercoat to paint is pronounced /prī-mər/.

primogenital; primogenitary; primogenitive. For the adjective corresponding to primogeniture, the prevailing form—though it may breed MISCUES—is primogenital. The other choices are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. See primogeniture.

primogeniture; primogenitureship; primogenitor. Primogeniture means (1) "the fact or condition of being the first-born of the children of the same parents"; or (2) (at common law) "the right of succession or inheritance belonging to the first-born, often involving the exclusion of all other children." In many civil-law countries, the equivalent term for sense (2) is majorat.

Primogenitureship is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of primogeniture—e.g.: "Considering that the purpose of introducing the words 'heirs and assigns' into deeds and wills was to prevent the operation of the principle of primogenitureship [read primogeniture]. . . . it becomes readily apparent that the words as used here are meaningless and inaptly used." Whitehead v. McCoy, 29 A.2d 729, 731 (N.J. Ch. 1943).

Primogenitor denotes "the first parent; earliest ancestor." (Loosely, it is used for progenitor [= forefather, ancestor].) See progenitor.

principal. See corpus.

principal, n. A. And principle, n. In lay usage, it is usually enough to remember that principal (= chief, primary, most important) is almost always an adjective, and principle (= a truth, law, doctrine, or course of action) is virtually always a noun. Although principle is not a verb, we have principled as an adjective. (See principled.)

In legal language, principal is often a noun, an elliptical form of principal person or actor, primarily in agency law and criminal law. Principal also acts as a shortened form of principal investment in the context of investments, banking, and trusts. See corpus & res.

Misusing principal for principle is fairly common—e.g.: "The principals [read principles] underlying the anti-trust laws are as old as the early English statutes against combinations in restraint of trade and price-fixing agreements." Stephen Pfeil, "Law," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 86, 92 (1953).

Likewise, the opposite error sometimes occurs—e.g.: "My principle [read principal] disagreement is . . . ." Lloyd L. Weinreb, Fair's Fair: A Comment on the Fair Use Doctrine, 103 Harv. L. Rev. 1137, 1140 (1990)./ "[The] portfolio of currently available securities . . . will return principle [read principal] and interest in future years to replace the lost nominal earnings." George A. Schieren, On Using Minimum-Cost Portfolios to Determine Present Value, 4 J. Legal. Econ. 47, 51 (1994).

B. And accessory in Criminal Law. At common law, principal in the first degree = the perpetrator of a crime; principal in the second degree = one who helped at the time of the crime; accessory before the fact = one who successfully incited a felony; and accessory after the fact = one who, knowing a felony has been committed, tried to help the felon escape punishment.

American and English experts in criminal law have written how advantageous it would be to speak in terms other than principals and accessories to crimes. In the U.S., for example, it "is much less confusing . . . to speak of a perpetrator of second degree murder, or an abettor of first degree murder, than it is to refer to a principal in the first degree to murder in the second degree, or a principal in the second degree to murder in the first degree." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 735 (3d ed. 1982). Thus the Model Penal Code is not worded in terms of principals and accessories.

In Great Britain, the Criminal Law Act 1967 abolished the distinction between felonies and misdemeanors, consequently abolishing accessories and making every participant a principal. The better English authorities recommend perpetrator (= the person who in law performs the offense). See Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 285–86 (1978). See perpetrator.

principled, as often used of decisions and judgments, means "resting on reasons that in their generality and neutrality transcend the immediate result involved." See Herbert Wechsler, Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law, 73 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 19 (1959). When used of persons, principled means "having principles or scruples."

prior; previous. The adjective prior or previous for earlier is within the stylist's license; prior to and previous to in place of before are not. See antecedent, previous to & prior to.

prioritize. Writers with sound stylistic priorities avoid this word. See -IZE.

prior restraint = censorship before publication. E.g., "The photo processor thus becomes the censor of the nation's photographers; worse yet, his actions become a particularly obnoxious form of prior restraint: he condemns the photo before anyone, including the photographer or a neutral magistrate, has had an opportunity to see the final print."

prior to is a terribly overworked lawyerism. Only in rare contexts is it not much inferior to before. Even the U.S. Supreme Court has suggested that the phrase is "clumsy," noting that "[l]egislative drafting books are filled with suggestions that . . . prior to be replaced with the word before." U.S. v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84, 96 n.11 (1985). Nevertheless, examples abound in virtually any piece of legal writing: "Prior to [read Before] hearing in the Appellate Division, we certified the cause on our own motion."/ "Up to December 24, 1936, and for many years prior thereto [read For many years up to December 24, 1936], petitioner and his wife were domiciled in the State of Oklahoma."

As Bernstein has pointed out, you should feel free to use prior to instead of before only if you are accustomed to using posterior to for after. Theodore M. Bernstein, The Careful Writer 347 (1979). Cf. antecedent, anterior to, preliminary to, previous to & subsequent to.

prise. See prize.

prisoned is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of imprisoned.

prisoner. English and American judges formerly referred in open court to criminal defendants as prisoners, but in the 20th century this usage fell into disuse because it can be highly prejudicial to the accused (also a negatively emotive word). Defendant, q.v., is a more appropriately neutral term.

privacy, right of. See right of privacy.

private bill. See public Act.

private international law. See conflict of laws & international law.

private prosecutor. See prosecutor.

privation. See deprivation.

privilege is a slippery legal word most commonly denoting a person's legal freedom to do or not to do a given act.

The word is often misspelled priviledge. The pages of American reporters are riddled with examples followed by "[sic]." And it even appears in law reviews—e.g.: "The court accepted his argument that the disclosure would violate his priviledge [read privilege] against self-incrimination since he was charged with violating the plaintiff's trademark." Sue Holloway, "Black Box" Agreements: The Marketing of U.S. Technical Know-How in the Pacific Rim, 23 Cal. W. Int'l L.J. 199, 211 n.98 (1992)./ "The assignee argued that the priviledge [read privilege] only encompassed the specific machines manufactured prior to the application date." F. Andrew Ubel, Who's on First?—The Trade Secret Prior User or a Subsequent Patentee, 76 J. Pat. & Trademark Off. Soc'y 401, 410 (1994).

privileges and immunities; privileges or immunities. The former phrase appears in Article 4, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution; the latter appears in the Fourteenth Amendment. The privileges and immunities clause is the important one: "The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States." This seminal clause prohibits a state from favoring its own citizens by discriminating against nonresidents who come into the state. See Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 396 (1948).

The privileges or immunities clause, by comparison, is obscure and unimportant: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States . . . ." Five years after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, the Supreme Court read this clause as being limited to privileges of national, as opposed to state, citizenship. See The Slaughter House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36, 55 (1873). And these privileges, while not trivial, are extremely limited; they encompass such liberties as being able to cross state lines freely and being able to vote in national elections.

privity; privy. To nonlawyers, a privity is something that is kept secret. To a lawyer, it is a relationship between two parties that is recognized by law, usually a mutual interest in a transaction or thing <in privity of contract>.

Privy likewise has different associations for nonlawyers and lawyers. To nonlawyers it is an adjective meaning "secret; private," or a plural noun (privies) meaning "outhouse; toilet." Lawyers mean no harm in calling other people privies; a privy in law is one who is a partaker or has any part or interest in any action, matter, or thing. E.g., "Respondents cite the portion of Stiller in which the New York court (the new forum) acknowledged that the Ohio court (the original forum that issued the injunction) lacked jurisdiction over the New York respondents who were privies with the enjoined party."

The word is also used adjectivally in this legal sense—e.g.: "Admissions may be made on behalf of the real party to any proceeding by any party who is privy in law, in blood, or in estate to any party to the proceeding on behalf of that party." (Eng.) Still, privy is used in its lay senses in legal writing—most commonly "participating in the knowledge of something private"—and the legal reader must be adept at discerning which sense is intended: "The jury was not privy to the parties' settlement negotiations."

prize; prise. The second is the better spelling in the sense "to pry or force open," although in AmE prize often appears in this sense. The DIFFERENTIATION is worth promoting, however. Prize is the spelling for all other senses.

pro and con; pro et con. The latter phrase is the LATINISM for "for and against." The English rendering—pro and con—is preferred. The phrase may be used nominally: "We are satisfied that the Commission adequately considered the pros and cons of the new grants of authority with a view toward the industry's economic well-being." Or it may be adverbial: "A number of affidavits are filed pro and con, which it is not necessary to consider." Or, again, it may be adjectival: "A number of pro and con briefs have been filed." One should not depart from the SET PHRASE: "Now we are obliged to advert to those elements of proof and legal concepts pro and contra [read pro and con] bearing upon the validity of the instrument in question." In re Estate of Powers, 134 N.W.2d 148, 151 (Mich. 1965).

Pro and con has also been used as a verb phrase <to pro-and-con the issue>, and although today this use sounds somewhat odd, it has the sanction of long standing. The OED and W3 record another use not here recommended: the phrase has been used prepositionally <arguments pro and con the proposal>, but in such a phrase for and against would be better.

probable; likely; possible. These words—in order of decreasing strength—express gradations of the relative chance that something might happen. With a coin toss, for example, you cannot say that it is probable that it will turn up heads, though you might say that it is likely. (Of course, it would be equally likely to turn up tails.) The word likely, then, as Glanville Williams puts it, is "a strong 'possible' but a weak 'probable.'" Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 59 (2d ed. 1961). And the word possible, of course, embraces a wide gamut: everything from the remotest chance to a 100% certainty.

probable cause. The Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution states that neither arrest warrants nor search warrants may issue without a prior showing of "probable cause." The standard probably began as a looser one than good cause—looser because more guesswork is involved in deciding whether cause is "probable" (i.e., "provable," from the Latin probabilis—not merely "likely") than whether it is "good."

Today, however, probable cause is such an important constitutional standard that it is rarely thought of in conjunction with good cause. It now has an established place as a TERM OF ART, though its precise contours will probably always remain vague. Cf. good cause shown.

probate, n., = the act by which a testamentary document is judicially established as having been a testator's final will. But the word has been extended well beyond that traditional sense. Today it often includes everything that a personal representative does in handling a decedent's estate.

As an adjective, the word takes on still other shades of meaning. Probate code = the entire written law of decedents' estates, substantive as well as procedural. Probate law = the law of succession, including both statutes and caselaw. See probatum & proof (B).

probate, as a transitive verb, is an Americanism. The word means "to admit (a will) to proof" <the will was probated in 1992>. By extension, it is sometimes said that a lawyer probates an estate.

During the 20th century, probate has acquired an unrelated sense, as the BACK-FORMATION from probation: "to grant probation to (a criminal), to reduce (a sentence) by means of probation." E.g., "[A] suspended sentence shall have the effect of probating the defendant . . . ." Wood v. State, 21 S.E.2d 915, 918 (Ga. Ct. App. 1942)./ "[T]he conviction['s] . . . validity plays no necessary part in the consideration of whether a probated prison term should be continued . . . ." U.S. v. Francischine, 512 F.2d 827, 828 (5th Cir. 1975).

probatee is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of probationer—e.g.: "Oregon's statutes required that a probatee [read probationer] not be required to pay said fees unless he is or will be able to do so . . . [and] that the probatee [read probationer] may petition to have the unpaid portion 'forgiven' . . . ." White Eagle v. State, 280 N.W.2d 659, 661 (S.D. 1979).

probation = (1) a procedure by which a convicted offender is released, subject to court-imposed conditions, rather than being sent to prison; or (2) the act of proving judicially (a will, etc.).

Sense (2), recorded in Scottish law dictionaries but rarely elsewhere, is attested in the OED by two 16th-century citations and nothing more recent. Although it is still used in some stock phrases such as admit to probation (Scot.), it is otherwise fairly uncommon. But it has been revived in 20th-century AmE—e.g.: "[W]hen an estate is in process of probation, the authority to sue for its assets rests in the administrator or executor." Demmer v. Stroude, 40 F. Supp. 795, 796 (N.D. Tex. 1941)./ "[T]he district court . . . remanded the estate to the probate court for completion of administration thereof, which in effect ordered probation of the will without limitation as to the property to be administered." In re Estate of Jones, 366 P.2d 792, 793 (Kan. 1961)./ "The caveators further alleged that 'their rights will be affected to their prejudice by the probation of said instruments as the Last Will and Testament and First Codicil.'" In re Will of Ashley, 208 S.E.2d 398, 399 (N.C. Ct. App. 1974).

probationary; probational. The latter form is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, as is probatory. See probative.

probationer; parolee. Probationer = one on probation. (See probation & probatee.) Parolee = one released on parole. See parole.

probative; probatory. Probative = (1) tending or serving to prove; (2) exploratory; serving to test; or (3) in Scots law, self-proving . In the law of evidence, sense (1) is invariably the one intended, though it is of more recent origin. E.g., "In this circuit, we have found probative the fact that a hospital district was financed through levies that were separate from other county or state taxes and through bonds sold upon the full faith and credit of the district." See probity.

Probatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of either probative (most commonly) or probationary.

probativeness. See probity.

probatum = something proved or conclusively established. (Cf. ipse dixit.) It sometimes appears in its plural form (probata) and is usually nothing but a highfalutin equivalent of proof—

e.g.: "Defendant Griffin contends there is a fatal variance between the allegata [read allegations] and the probata [read proof], arguing that the State's proof that he struck Dexter Harper with his feet and fists is insufficient to support his conviction for aggravated assault by shooting Dexter Harper with a handgun . . . ." Griffin v. State, 449 S.E.2d 341, 343 (Ga. Ct. App. 1994). See LATINISMS probity means "honesty; integrity." E.g., "It is beyond either human capacity or the demands of justice that the trial judge decide correctly every issue arising in the trial. What is required is not a perfect score, but fairness, probity, and the avoidance of substantial prejudice." Ruiz v. Estelle, 679 F.2d 1115, 1132 (5th Cir. 1982).

Unfortunately, probativeness, which means "the quality of tending to prove something," and its adjective, probative, are frequently confused with probity. E.g., "The majority addresses the trial court's ruling admitting cancer evidence; relevance, probity [read probativeness], and prejudice are dealt with separately."/ "Proof that the inhalation of asbestos fibers can cause cancer is not the sine qua non of plaintiff's case; it has only incremental probity [read probativeness]."/ "The probative value of the extrinsic offense correlates positively with its likeness to the offense charged; we cannot say that the district court abused its discretion in determining that the probity [read probativeness] of this proof outweighed its prejudice."

Probity is also occasionally misused for propriety—e.g.: "Although the probity [read propriety] of using affidavits to resolve fact issues is perhaps open to question, reliance upon the prosecutor's affidavits in this case is appropriate."

problematic(al). Both forms appear in modern writing. Though problematic is now more usual, euphony may sometimes lead a writer to choose problematical.

problem-solving, a VOGUE WORD among lawyers and social scientists, is best avoided when possible. E.g., "The emphasis is on the method or technique of problem-solving [read solving problems]."

pro bono publico. A. Historical and Grammatical Development. The phrase pro bono publico is an old one in Anglo-American law. Originally, it was not restricted to a lawyer's duty, but instead referred to anything done for the public good. The phrase can be found in Coke's 17th-century commentary on Littleton's Tenures: "[I]t appeareth that owners are in that case bound pro bono publico to maintain houses and mills which are for habitation and use of men." Co. Litt. 200b (1628). As in that example, the early British and American uses of the phrase were adverbial, and they related to anything done for the public good—e.g.:

- "[I]n the case of charity, the King, pro bono publico, has an original right to superintend the case thereof, so that, abstracted from the statute of Eliz., relating to charitable uses, and antecedent to it, as well as since, it has been every day's practice to file informations in Chancery, in the Attorney-General's name, for the establishment of charities." Eyre v. Countess of Shaftsbury, 2 P. Wms. 103, 119, 24 Eng. Rep. 659, 664 (1722).
- "Indeed, I know of no case, where the doctrine of relation, which is a mere fiction of law, is allowed to prevail, unless it be in furtherance and protection of rights, pro bono publico." In re Richardson, 20 F. Cas. 699, 702 (C.C.D. Mass. 1843) (No. 11,777).
- "[I]t is sought here to hold a municipal corporation, acting pro bono publico, responsible not only for its own neglect to repair, but also for that of its officer in failing to observe the ordinance for the inspection of the bridge." Weightman v. Corporation of Washington, 66 U.S. (1 Black) 39, 44–45 (1861).

Today, of course, the phrase refers primarily to a lawyer's services performed for the public good (see (B)), but this usage is comparatively recent. Few reported decisions predating the 1970s refer to this lawyerly duty. But there is a late-19th-century reference in an Illinois opinion to a lawyer's acting for a client pro bono publico: "McKenzie & Calkins, pro bono publico." Board of Educ. v. Arnold, 1 N.E. 163, 163 (Ill. 1884).

The adverbial uses have persisted, but most often when the full phrase appears, as opposed to the shortened form pro bono (see below)—e.g.: "[I]n a time when the need for legal services among the poor is growing and public funding for such services has not kept pace, lawyers' ethical obligation to volunteer their time and skills pro bono publico is manifest." Mallard v. U.S. Dist. Ct. for S. Dist. of Iowa, 490 U.S. 296, 310 (1989).

The adjectival uses, however, are perhaps the most common today—e.g.:

- "Although one proposal requiring mandatory pro bono publico work by attorneys was recently voted down by the American Bar Association, the very proposal itself indicates the awareness of the bar of its obligation to protect the right of indigent litigants." Caruth v. Pinkney, 683 F.2d 1044, 1049 (7th Cir. 1982).

- "A lawyer should aspire to render at least (50) hours of pro bono publico legal services per year." Model Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 6.1 (1994).
- "The Commission sought to accentuate the duties of lawyers that transcended their responsibilities to clients—for example, by . . . requiring lawyers to devote a portion of their time to pro bono publico work." Marc Galanter, Predators and Parasites: Lawyer-Bashing and Civil Justice, 28 Ga. L. Rev. 633, 642 (1994).

To avoid the awkward three-word PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—typically, alas, unhyphenated, as in the three examples just quoted—lawyers have shortened the phrase to pro bono—e.g.:

- "It is reasoned that an attorney, as an officer of the court, has the duty to assist the court, without compensation, in the administration of justice and, similarly, that every attorney is deemed to have consented to pro bono appointments by virtue of having accepted his license to practice law." State v. Oakley, 227 S.E.2d 314, 318–19 (W. Va. 1976).
- "[A]t the time that the 1853 law was passed, there was no clear conception of 'pro bono work.' Those who debated the bill appeared to contemplate that one might do some uncompensated service for a constituent, a friend or a relative, but not for a needy stranger." Lisa G. Lerman, Public Service by Public Servants, 19 Hofstra L. Rev. 1141, 1176 (1991).
- "[L]awyers tend not to find time to fulfill their pro bono obligations." Harry T. Edwards, The Growing Disjunction Between Legal Education and the Legal Profession, 91 Mich. L. Rev. 34, 68 (1992).
- "Pro bono work will, by definition, take some time away from ordinary law practice, but there is no reason to think that it will compromise the 'ethic of excellence' with regard either to free or paying clients." Steven Lubet, Professionalism Revisited, 42 Emory L.J. 197, 204 (1993).
- "I have never found a case of a lawyer disbarred for not performing pro bono service." Patrick L. Baude, An Essay on the Regulation of the Legal Profession and the Future of Lawyers' Characters, 68 Ind. L.J. 647, 658 (1993).
- "A lawyer has an obligation to render public interest and pro bono legal service." N.Y. Jud. Law app., Code of Professional Responsibility EC 2–25 (McKinney Supp. 1994).

At times, the phrase pro bono is even used as an attributive noun, that is, as a short form of pro bono work or pro bono services, as in the title to the following article: Lewis S. Calderon et al., Mandatory Pro Bono for Law Students: Another Dimension in Legal Education, 1 J.L. & Pol'y 95 (1993).

B. Arguments over Modern Meaning. For a phrase whose modern content was only fairly recently acquired, pro bono has generated many hot debates about meaning. Broadly speaking, there are two camps: those who support a wide definition and those who support a narrow one.

Broadly, pro bono legal services include any uncompensated work that a lawyer performs for the public good. Some guides adopt the broad definition. For example, a Georgia guide defines pro bono service as "any uncompensated services performed by attorneys for the public good . . . , [including] civic, charitable and public service activities, as well as activities that improve the law, the legal system, and the legal profession." State Bar of Georgia Handbook 10 (Supp. 1993).

The narrow definition, by contrast, limits the work specifically to services performed for indigents, as opposed to charitable organizations such as symphonies, museums, and the like. E.g., "The purpose of a narrow definition of pro bono is to ensure that legal aid is provided to those who need it most—the poor." Kim Schimenti, Pro Choice for Lawyers in a Revised Pro Bono System, 23 Seton Hall L. Rev. 641, 694 n.254 (1993). / "At Tulane, pro bono work is synonymous with poverty law and hence pro bono projects may not encompass work for the government such as working for the offices of the Public Defender or the District Attorney." Lewis S. Calderon et al., Mandatory Pro Bono for Law Students: Another Dimension in Legal Education, 1 J.L. & Pol'y 95, 103–04 (1993).

One reason for preferring the broad over the narrow definition is that specialists—such as those lawyers who work exclusively in corporate mergers and acquisitions—may find it difficult to take up the cause of the indigent, especially if that work were to involve court appearances. The literature on pro-bono work reflects this very problem: "The focus must be on the definition of 'pro bono services.' Such a term should be broadly defined to provide ample opportunities for contributions by all types of lawyers engaged in different specialties." '. . . In the Spirit of Public Service': A Blueprint for the Rekindling of Lawyer Professionalism, 112 F.R.D. 243, 297 (1986). Also, though one can hardly imagine more important work than what is done on behalf of the poor, society inarguably benefits from many other public services that lawyers perform. It is therefore difficult, if not impossible, to justify a dogmatic insistence on the narrow definition on historical grounds or linguistic grounds—indeed, on any grounds other than one's modern view of sound public policy.

In any event, of course, it is quite misleading to define pro bono as meaning merely "unpaid," as here: "[H]e was a strong proponent of requiring lawyers to perform 'pro bono'—unpaid—services." Glenn Fowler, Robert McKay, 70, Legal Scholar and Head of 1971 Attica Panel, N.Y. Times, 14 July 1990, at 11.

C. Roman or Italic? Most legal writers today treat the phrase pro bono as being fully anglicized; therefore, they do not italicize it. (It is italicized in the preceding sentence only because it is a phrase being referred to as a phrase.)

D. Hyphenating the Phrasal Adjective. Some writers sensibly hyphenate pro bono when it serves as an adjective—e.g.: "In Atlanta, for example, five local bar associations have recruited 1,025 attorneys to do pro-bono indigent defense as part of the 1,000 Lawyers for Justice, which has taken on 305 cases thus far this year." Peter Applebome, Indigent Defendants, Overworked Lawyers, N.Y. Times, 17 May 1992, at 18./ "[T]he U.S. legal profession, more than any other, has fostered the idea of countervailing legal power, supporting legal services for the poor, [and] imposing a generalized obligation of pro-bono service . . . ." David M. Trubek et al., Global Restructuring and the Law, 44 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 407, 426 (1994).

Others, however, see pro bono as a SET PHRASE that needs no hyphen. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (B).

E. Mandatory pro bono. Some writers have suggested that the phrase mandatory pro bono is an OXYMORON—e.g.: "Because pro bono publico service historically has referred to charitably donated assistance, the term 'mandatory pro bono' is itself a problem—a classic oxymoron, not unlike jumbo shrimp and military intelligence." Esther F. Lardent, Mandatory Pro Bono in Civil Cases: The Wrong Answer to the Right Question, 49 Md. L. Rev. 78, 79 (1990)./ "In a sense, the concept of mandatory pro bono is an oxymoron, like military music." Roger C. Cramton, Mandatory Pro Bono, 19 Hofstra L. Rev. 1113, 1132–33 (1991).

The reason, of course, for seeing the phrase as a contradiction in terms is that, in the modern American lawyer's mind, pro bono equates with "voluntary." It has always been hard to compel charity—and impossible to compel charitableness.

proceduralist (= a specialist in legal procedure) is a 20th-century legal NEOLOGISM. E.g., "So wrote one of America's greatest proceduralists, Judge Charles E. Clark, in a 1945 dissent." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 678 (4th ed. 1983)./ "My friend was shocked. 'He's against diversity!!??' 'Diversity jurisdiction,' I said, realizing she was not a proceduralist." Ann Althouse, Late Night Confessions in the Hart and Wechsler Hotel, 47 Vand. L. Rev. 993, 994 (1994).

procedural law; substantive law. Separating these two phrases presents no small conundrum. The problem, as Justice Frankfurter once observed, is that "substance and procedure are the same keywords to very different problems. Neither substance nor procedure represents the same invariants. Each implies different variables depending upon the particular problem for which it is used." Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, 326 U.S. 99, 108 (1945). The decision whether a particular issue is "substantive" or "procedural" may vary depending on whether the context relates to a court's rulemaking power, to resolving a question concerning conflict of laws, or to applying state or federal law.

Traditionally, substantive law (one of Bentham's coinages) denotes the law that lays down people's rights, duties, liberties, and powers. Thus substantive law addresses such issues as what rights one has against trespassers. Procedural law (also called adjective law), by contrast, consists of the rules by which one establishes one's rights, duties, liberties, and powers—either by litigation or otherwise. How to start an arbitration or a lawsuit and proceed with it—or how to get a clerk to issue a writ—is a matter of procedural law. See adjective law.

In some contexts—usually involving the law of a single jurisdiction—the dichotomy seems admirably straightforward. In criminal law and procedure, substantive law declares what acts are crimes and imposes penalties, while procedural law sets the steps by which a violator is brought to punishment. Similarly, in civil law and procedure, substantive law defines the rights and duties of persons, while procedural law defines the steps in having a right or duty judicially defined or enforced.

proceed. See precede (A). proceeding(s). In reference to the business done by tribunals of all kinds, the proceeding and the proceedings are interchangeable. And both are so common that it would be impossible to brand either one as inferior.

proceeds, n. (= the value of land, goods, or investments when converted into money) takes a plural verb. But some writers want to write proceeds is instead of the correct form, proceeds are.

Also, this noun is accented on the first syllable (/proh-seedz/), not the second.

process has the special legal senses (1) "the proceedings in any action or prosecution" <due process>, and (2) "the summons by which a person is cited to appear in court" <service of process>. Sense (2) is especially baffling to nonlawyers unfamiliar with legal procedures. E.g., "An execution is a process of the court issued to enforce the judgment of that court."

In sense (2), process may serve either as a count noun (as in the preceding example) or as a mass noun (as in service of process).

processual (= of or relating to a legal process) began as a 19th-century term used by legal historians writing about Roman law. In the latter half of the 20th century, though, American legal writers adopted it—e.g.: "That court would . . . promptly have reversed and remanded for due hearing and with firm suggestion that the board examine and then conform to the processual religion of the act of 1952." Superx Drugs Corp. v. State Bd. of Pharmacy, 125 N.W.2d 13, 18 (Mich. 1963)./ "The clear statement and the standardless delegation doctrines are processual in nature." Franklin E. Fink, Note, Abourezk v. Reagan: Curbing Recent Abuses of the Executive Immigration Power, 21 Cornell Int'l L.J. 147, 178 (1988).

prochein ami (= a "next friend" who represents an underage plaintiff's interests in litigation) is preferably so spelled. E.g., "Sugimoto also represents Kristy Lacaran-Chong, a minor, as prochein ami or next friend . . . ." Wong-Leong v. Hawaiian Indep. Refinery, Inc., 879 P.2d 538, 541 n.2 (Haw. 1994). Prochein amy (used by Blackstone), prochain ami, and prochain amy are variant spellings to be avoided. See next friend & LOAN TRANSLATIONS.

prochronism. See anachronism.

proconsulate; proconsulship. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

procreative; procreational. The former is standard, procreational being a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

procuration; procurement; procurance; procuracy. Traditionally, procuration has meant "the act of appointing another as one's attorney-in-fact or agent." By transference the term has referred also to the authority vested in a person so appointed. E.g., "If a bill be drawn by procuration, no acceptor of the bill is permitted to deny the authority of the agent, by whom it purports to be drawn, to draw in the name of the principal." (Eng.)

Finally, procuration has been used as the generic noun for procure, but this broad sense is best reserved for procurement, as in the following examples: "Jureczki argues that White's improprieties in the procurement of the arrest warrant . . . place the defendants outside the immunity of Baker v. McCollan."/ "The evidence of contestant failed to show any activity on the part of Mrs. Logan in the procurement of the will of decedent."/ "Appellee filed the motion to remand the contractual indemnity claim to permit procurement of documentary evidence."

Procurement has had another, more restricted sense in legal contexts: "persuading or inviting a woman or child to have sexual intercourse." E.g., "Defendant, Linda Sue Esch, appeals the judgment of conviction entered on a jury verdict finding her guilty of . . . two counts of procurement of a child for sexual exploitation . . . ." People v. Esch, 786 P.2d 462, 464 (Colo. Ct. App. 1989). Procurance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Procuracy = a letter of agency; the document empowering an attorney-in-fact to act.

procurator. See attorney (A). procure is a FORMAL WORD for get (the ordinary word) or obtain (a semiformal word).

procurement. See procuration.

procuring breach of contract. See tortious interference with contractual relations.

procuring cause. See CAUSATION (C).

prodigality; profligacy. Prodigality means "lavishness; extravagance." Profligacy means primarily "salaciousness; licentiousness," but it also shares the sense of prodigality.

prodigious for prestigious is a MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "The American Law Institute is one of the most select and prodigious [read prestigious] legal organizations in this country."

producible. So spelled; producable is an infrequent misspelling.

producing cause. See CAUSATION (C).

production burden. See burden of proof (A).

productive of, be. See BE-VERBS (B).

product(s) liability. The general area of law is known as products liability. Occasionally one sees the singular form product liability, usually in reference to a particular product of a particular manufacturer. When the phrase is used adjectivally, it should be hyphenated <products-liability case>. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

pro et con. See pro and con.

profane; profanatory. That which is profane is irreverent or blasphemous; that which is profanatory tends to make (something) profane.

proferens = the party that proposes or adduces a contract or a condition in a contract. E.g., "If the clause contains language which expressly exempts the person in whose favour it is made (hereinafter called 'the proferens') from the consequence of the negligence of his own servants, effect must be given to that provision . . . ." Smith v. South Wales Switchgear Ltd., [1978] 1 All E.R. 18 (H.L.). The plural is proferentes. See contra proferentem (A).

profession. This word has been much debased of late, primarily at the hands of egalitarians who call any occupation a profession. In any American city today, a person seeking a job as a barber, manicurist, or manager of a fast-food store turns in the classified advertisements to the section "Professions." A lawyer looking for a change in jobs turns to "Advanced Degree Required," a section of its own rather than a subsection of "Professions."

Traditionally there have been but three professions: theology, law, and medicine. These were known either as the three professions or as the learned professions. The term was ultimately extended to mean "one's principal vocation," which embraces prostitution as well as medicine. (The oldest profession originally had an irony much stronger than it has today.)

The restricted sense of profession no doubt strikes many people as snobbish and anachronistic. What about university professors, atomic physicists, and engineers? Perhaps three professions are not enough, but we ought at least to use some discrimination, with emphasis on "prolonged specialized training in a body of abstract knowledge." William J. Goode, Encroachment, Charlatanism, and the Emerging Profession, 25 Am. Soc. Rev. 902, 903 (1960). Professional training "must lead to some order of mastery of a generalized cultural tradition, and do so in a manner giving prominence to an intellectual component." Talcott Parsons, "Professions," 12 International Encyclopedia of Social Science 536, 536 (1968).

Notably, the traditional, artificially restricted view of the term has long been considered archaic. Holmes wrote in 1896: "It is not likely . . . that anybody will be prejudiced against business or will take formal views of the dignity of callings such as a hundred years ago put the ministry first, law and medicine next, and below them all other pursuits." Oliver W. Holmes, "The Bar as a Profession," in Collected Legal Papers 153, 153 (1952).

On the other side of the Atlantic, hardly a generation later, Lord Justice Scrutton wrote that, although profession used to be confined to the three learned professions, by 1919 it had a broader meaning: "[A] 'profession' in the present use of language involves the idea of an occupation requiring either purely intellectual skill, or of manual skill controlled, as in painting and sculpture, or surgery, by the intellectual skill of the operator, as distinguished from an occupation which is substantially the production or sale or arrangements for the production or sale of commodities." Commissions v. Maxse, [1919] 1 K.B. 647, 657 (C.A.).

proffer is chiefly a literary and legal term; it is equivalent to offer, and like that word, may be both noun and verb. Thus, as a noun: "Because of Delaware's absolute rule, its courts did not have occasion to consider the proffer put forward by petitioner Franks."/ "Because the expert testified during the proffer of proof that he was not aware of the agreement, the district court's exclusion of the evidence was not an abuse of discretion." And as a verb: "The daughter proffered her own testimony to show, among other things, that the parents intended the conveyance to be an absolute gift and not an advancement."/ "We reject the proffered [i.e., suggested] distinctions."

It is occasionally misspelled profer—e.g.: "But the very point of the article, of course, is based on the proferred [read proffered] fact that Rehnquist is rapidly becoming the chief declarer of what the Constitution requires . . . ." Sanford Levinson, Law as Literature, 60 Tex. L. Rev. 373, 398–99 (1982).

profferer. So spelled—not -or.

profits. In DRAFTING, this word is often vague, so it is generally best defined. Gross profits, for example, is usually different from gross receipts, and whatever is to be deducted ought to be mentioned explicitly in the definition. Even more obviously in need of definition is net receipts, which patently involves deductions of some kind.

profits à prendre, known also as right of common, denotes the right exercised by one person to enter another's land and take away some part of the soil, such as the profits from the soil. As its form suggests, profits à prendre is a LAW FRENCH survival; it remains fairly common. E.g., "For example, trust property may consist of a life estate in land, a profit à prendre to remove minerals, an undivided interest in land as a tenant in common, or an absolute interest in a specific bond or share of stock."

Profit à prendre has been rendered profit a' prendre by some for whom the grave accent apparently was not typographically possible. See, e.g., McDonald v. Board of Miss. Levee Comm'rs, 646 F. Supp. 449, 469 (N.D. Miss. 1986). Omitting the accent completely from this phrase is preferable, however, to using an apostrophe in its stead.

profligacy. See prodigality.

pro forma (– as a matter of form; for the sake of form) usu. has a slightly depreciative tone in modern usage. The term need not be hyphenated as an adjectival phrase. See ADJECTIVES (C). progenitor. A progenitor is one that yields progeny—e.g.: "As March 1, 1913, receded in time, the 1913 basis became increasingly moot, and the other initial basis rules, the illegitimate progeny of 1913 basis, became far more important than the progenitor rule itself." Calvin H. Johnson, The Legitimacy of Basis from a Corporation's Own Stock, 9 Am. J. Tax Pol'y 155, 174 (1991). See primogenitor.

progeny. A. Plural in Sense. Progeny is usually plural in sense and thus takes a plural verb. E.g., "The progeny of Williamson v. U.S. indicates [read indicate] that Williamson requires reversal only when the specific defendant was picked out for the informer's effort by a government agent." Another word is required when the sense is singular, as in the following sentence: "In a Blanchard progeny [read In a case that follows the rule in Blanchard], Chavers v. Exxon Corp., we quoted from and explained Blanchard's holding."

B. Insensitively Used. In the context of the famous abortion case, Roe v. Wade, this metaphor shows a lack of VERBAL AWARENESS: "Part I of this Note examines the doctrine set forth in Roe v. Wade and its progeny . . . ." Note, Potential Fathers and Abortion, 55 Brook. L. Rev. 1359, 1363 (1990).

prognosis; prognostication; prognostic, n. Prognosis is ordinarily used in medicine to mean "a forecast of the probable course and termination of an illness." (See diagnosis.) Prognostication is more general, denoting "a prediction or prophecy" or "a conjecture of some future event formed upon some supposed sign." E.g., "Some kinds of prognostications simply are not possible: it is foreseeable that a thirsty man will drink, but it may not be possible to foretell his choice of beverage."/ "A picture of the future size of this accumulation can be painted with gigantic lines; such a prognostication is not without precedent." Prognostic = an advance indication or omen.

program(m)atic. The word is spelled -mm- in both BrE and AmE.

program(me). Program is the AmE, programme the BrE spelling. The ending -am is used in BrE, however, in reference to computer programs.

program(m)er; program(m)ing. The best spellings are in -mm- whether in AmE or in BrE. The double -m- in AmE appears to be descended from programme, the BrE spelling. A few American dictionaries give priority to programer and programing, but these forms are rare in practice. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

pro hac vice. A. Meaning and Uses. This LATINISM, meaning "for this occasion or particular purpose," is not easily simplified in much legal writing. Often it is used adjectivally—e.g.: "The question narrows therefore to whether Litton was the owner pro hac vice of the vessel."/ "Plaintiff alleges that defendant was the pro hac vice owner of the barges involved." The phrase is also used adverbially when a lawyer who has not been admitted to practice in a particular jurisdiction is admitted for the purpose of conducting a particular case—e.g: "Butler entered an appearance pro hac vice for respondent on January 26, 1981; his partner Allis was admitted pro hac vice on October 19, 1982." Cf. ad hoc.

B. Pronunciation. The phrase is usually pronounced /proh-hak-vIs/ or /vI-see/ or /vee-chay/.

C. Incorrect Form. The phrase is sometimes misspelled pro haec vice—e.g.: "Chappee also argued to the SJC that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because his local lawyer neglected to move Simon's admission pro haec vice [read pro hac vice] . . . ." Chappee v. Vose, 843 F.2d 25, 33 n.5 (1st Cir. 1988). The difference between hac and haec is that haec is nominative, while hac is ablative (the case governed by pro). Cf. in haec verba.

prohibit takes the preposition from. Formerly, this verb could be construed with to <the law prohibits persons to litter>, but this construction is now an ARCHAISM.

prohibition. A. Writ of Prohibition. This writ was a prerogative order issued to prevent either a lower court from exceeding its jurisdiction or a tenant from committing waste. Unlike certiorari, q.v., prohibition is anticipatory and preventive rather than after-the-fact and remedial. See prerogative writs.

B. And proscription. Proscription implies a written prohibition, whereas prohibition, in its everyday sense, connotes nothing about whether it appears in writing. See proscription.

prohibitive; prohibitory. These terms have undergone a latent DIFFERENTIATION that needs to be further encouraged. Prohibitive may mean generally "having the quality of prohibiting," but more and more in modern prose it has the sense "tending to preclude consumption or purchase because of expense" <the costs are prohibitive>. Thus the phrase prohibitively expensive is a REDUNDANCY: "Today, the economics of law practice make it prohibitively expensive [read prohibitive] to litigate small claims." Roger J. Miner, Confronting the Communication Crisis in the Legal Profession, 34 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 1, 7 (1989).

Frequently used in the phrase prohibitory injunction, the word prohibitory has carved out a niche in the law in the sense "expressing a prohibition or restraint." E.g., "It is established in New York that violation of a prohibitory statute gives rise to tort liability."/ "Appellee seeks a prohibitory injunction restraining appellant from operating the sign and a mandatory injunction requiring appellant to remove the sign."/ "One of the tests for determining whether a statute is directory or mandatory is the presence of negative or prohibitory words plainly importing that the act should be done in a particular manner or at a particular time, and not otherwise."

prohibitory injunction. See mandatory injunction.

prolificacy; prolificness. The first is the better-formed and more usual word—e.g.: "Perfection over prolificacy is Def Leppard's mode: No whine before its time." Robert J. Hawkins, Def Leppard Wants to Be Perfect, Not Prolific, San Diego Union-Tribune, 17 Sept. 1992, at 12.

The NEEDLESS VARIANT prolificness is a poorly formed HYBRID (a Latin base with an Anglo-Saxon suffix)—e.g.: "[Judge Richard A. Posner's] prolificness [read prolificacy] is no surprise to anyone familiar with his academic output: 11 books and more than 100 articles." David Ranii, The Next Nominee? Nat'l L.J., 26 Nov. 1984, at 1./ "In Irving, there would have been no dispute because all Indians would have had equal claims in all land, irrespective of the prolificness [read prolificacy] of their ancestors." T. Nicolaus Tideman, Takings, Moral Evolution, and Justice, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1714, 1729 (1988). Cf. generic(al)ness.

PROLIXITY. See VERBOSITY

promise. A. Moral and Legal Senses. Promise is frequently used in two different senses in law. One is the lay sense, in which promise denotes a pledge to which the law attaches no obligation. In the other, the legal sense, promise is synonymous with contract. One commentator insists on the latter meaning as the only one appropriate to legal contexts: "It is not conceivable . . . that the term promise as a legal idea can mean anything except words of promise to which the law annexes an obligation." Clarence D. Ashley, What Is a Promise in Law? 16 Harv. L. Rev. 319, 319 (1903). Because those words frequently remain unheeded, the acute reader must carefully determine what the word means in a given context; the acute writer should take pains to make that meaning clear. For more on this distinction, see the Anson quotation under pollicitation. See also offer & contract (C).

B. Promises and Policies in Drafting. The drafter often has a choice between stating an obligation either as a promise or as a policy. For example, a credit-card agreement might say: "The cardholder must make at least the minimum payment by the fifth day of each month." In signing the agreement, the cardholder makes what is in the nature of a promise.

To phrase the same obligation as a policy, the agreement might say: "The minimum balance is due on the fifth day of each month."

The difference, of course, is that the promissory language puts the obligation more emphatically. The policy language is more polite and slightly more vague. The substantive content is likely the same, but the language of promise is more likely to result in a common understanding of who must do what. See DRAFTING promisee is the preferred spelling, not promissee.

promisor; promiser. The usual legal spelling is -or (as the correlative to promisee), but -er is equally good. E.g., "To allow him to keep such a payment or other consideration would be giving the promisor something for nothing." Cf. purchaser. See -ER (A).

The spelling promissor is an inferior ARCHAISM: "[T]he promissor [read promisor] denied he had ever made the contract under consideration . . . ." Burford v. Pounders, 199 S.W.2d 141, 144 (Tex. 1947).

promissee. See promisee.

promissory. So spelled.

promissory estoppel. A. And *quasi-contract. These phrases are closely related but distinct. Promissory estoppel ordinarily refers to the situation in which a plaintiff seeks recovery for loss or damage suffered as a result of relying on the defendant's promises or representations. Quasi-contract, q.v., refers to the situation in which a plaintiff seeks reimbursement for some benefit that he or she has conferred on the defendant. One well-known writer believed that the law might have done well with one or the other but not both: "It would seem, as a matter of jurisprudential economy, that both situations could have been dealt with under either slogan but the legal mind has always preferred multiplication to division." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 88–89 (1974).

B. And equitable estoppel. The phrase equitable estoppel is an outmoded equivalent of promissory estoppel. See estoppel (B).

promissory note (= an unconditional promise in writing to pay a person a sum of money) formerly had the synonym writing obligatory, but that phrase has long since become an ARCHAISM.

promoter. So spelled—not promotor.

promotive = tending to promote. E.g., "It is claimed that the two yearly payments to be made to the children just before Christmas and Easter produce a 'desirable social effect' and are promotive of public convenience and needs, and happiness and contentment." See BE-VERBS (B).

promulgate, a word perhaps too well liked by lawyers, means (1) "to make known by public declaration"; or (2) "to disseminate (some creed or belief), or to proclaim (some law, decree, or tidings)" (OED). E.g., (Sense 2) "It is my desire that any disbursements made under this paragraph shall be made to persons who believe in the fundamental principles of the Christian religion and in the Bible and who are endeavoring to promulgate the same."

prong. Courts often use this word to describe one part of a multifaceted—and often formalistic—legal test. The METAPHOR effectively shows that each part of the test must be met for a particular doctrine to apply: just as prongs are necessary to hold a stone in a piece of jewelry, so each element of a test (i.e., each "prong") must be satisfied before the legal doctrine applies. Justice Wiley B. Rutledge was one of the earliest American users of this word in this figurative sense. See Oklahoma Press Pub. Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 192 (1946).

Since the mid-20th century, the word has all but become a VOGUE WORD. From 1970 to 1975, it appeared in only 9 opinions of the U.S. Supreme Court; from 1985 to 1990, though, it appeared in some 55. Meanwhile, the other federal courts and state courts have come to use it with great frequency. For a discussion of the opinion-writing style typified by layered sets of "prongs" and "hurdles" and other tests, see Garner, "Opinions, Style of," in The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States 607, 607–08 (1992).

PRONOUNS. A. Underused in Legal Writing. "It is not simply that referential pronouns are avoided only where their use could raise genuine confusion; [in legal writing] they seem to be eschewed as a species." David Crystal & Derek Davy, Investigating English Style 202 (1967). The result is often a sentence that no native speaker of English—other than a lawyer—would ever perpetrate, such as: "Then Tina became very lethargic, at which time Tina was taken to the emergency room."

Why the fear of pronouns? Because lawyers have overlearned the lesson that pronouns sometimes have ambiguous referents. That being so, they (the lawyers, not the referents) swear off using them (the pronouns, not the lawyers) altogether. The result, to paraphrase Fred Rodell, is that many legal sentences read as if they have been translated from the German by someone who barely knows English.

Clunkers can be avoided by judiciously using pronouns and by finding other ways to avoid repeating nouns—e.g.: "After the persons obligated under the loan failed to pay the loan [delete the previous two words] as required, the bank foreclosed on the collateral and caused the collateral [read it] to be sold."

B. Pronouns, Preemptive. See ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE (C).

C. Restrictive and Nonrestrictive Relative Pronouns. See RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES.

PRONUNCIATION. A. General Principles. The best course is to follow the pronunciation current among educated speakers in one's region. The Texas pronunciation of voir dire /vohr-dir/ differs markedly from the New York pronunciation /vwah-deer/, and it would be inappropriate for a Texas lawyer to affect the New York pronunciation. On this point, Fowler still speaks to us with clarion wisdom: "The ambition to do better than our neighbours is in many departments of life a virtue; in pronunciation it is a vice; there the only right ambition is to do as our neighbours" (MEU1 466). See HYPERCORRECTION (K).

A few words have universally accepted pronunciations and rejected mispronunciations; where prescriptions on pronunciation appear in this book, the preferred pronunciation is generally preferred, regardless of the jurisdiction.

When it comes to words that are seldom pronounced by English-speaking people—as with any learned word, such as those from the law—the advice to conform with our neighbors' pronunciation becomes problematic. For here we find diversity, not uniformity—the result of the infrequency with which the words are pronounced. "Where there is a diversity of opinion and practice among reasonable [and educated] people, there must be also an equally broad charity in judgment. Could anything be more absurd than to stigmatize as incorrect a pronunciation which is actually in general use . . ?" George P. Krapp, The Pronunciation of Standard English in America iv (1919).

B. Commonly Mispronounced Lawyers' Words. Many words that prove troublesome to lawyers are listed throughout this work, with the correct pronunciation noted. Among the most frequently mispronounced words in the law are err /ər/, substantive /səb-stən-tiv/, and (formerly) cestui /set-ee/. See pamphlet.

C. Latin Terms. Pronunciation of Latin terms that survive in the language of the law is always troublesome for lawyers, since so few are trained in Latin and all are compelled to use such terms in the course of practice. The difficulty is—depending on one's point of view—exacerbated or ameliorated by the existence of three distinct methods of Latin pronunciation. As an example, sub judice, q.v., is pronounced in two quite different ways, with minor variations on each.

Of the three methods of Latin pronunciation—Anglo-Latin, classical Latin, and Italianate—only one has found a permanent home in law: Anglo-Latin. For those who have studied Latin in high school and college, this legal preference can be bothersome because the resulting pronunciations can sound uncouth—e.g.:

Law-Latin Term	Anglo-Latin Pronunciation	Classical Pronunciation
nisi prius	/nI-sI-prI-əs/	/nee-see-pree-əs/ratio decidendi	/ray-shee-oh-dees-i-den-dI/	/rah-tee-oh-day-see-den-dee/
sine die	/sI-nee-dI-ee/	/see-nay-dee-ay/

Further, several of legal LATINISMS are primarily read and not spoken (e.g., inclusio unius est exclusio alterius). Most of the common Latinisms, such as de minimis, de facto, and ipso facto, have readily apparent pronunciations. One should attempt to cultivate a sensitivity to the way Latin terms are pronounced within the professional community of one's geographic area, and stay within the mainstream in that community. Of course, using dictionaries is always helpful. (See LAW LATIN.) For more on this interesting subject, see H.A. Kelly, Lawyers' Latin: Loquenda ut Vulgus? 38 J. Leg. Educ. 195 (1988).

D. Law French. Lawyers generally pronounce Law-French words just as they were pronounced in the Middle Ages. To give them a modern French pronunciation, as by mouthing oyez as if it were /oh-yay/ instead of /oh-yes/ or /oh-yez/, is a type of vulgarism.

E. BrE Idiosyncrasies. Glanville Williams notes several instances in which "lawyers still jealously retain the archaic pronunciations of English words." Learning the Law 63–64 (11th ed. 1982). Among them are these:

assured, n.	/ə-shur-əd/
cognisance (BrE spelling)	No -g- pronounced.
recognisance (BrE spelling)	No -g- pronounced.
record, n.	/ri-kord/ proof. A. Evidence Carrying Conviction. Whereas evidence includes all the means by which any alleged matter of fact can be established or disproved, proof is the result of evidence: the evidence may or may not be sufficient to establish the alleged facts—that is, may or may not amount to proof. See evidence (B).

B. For probate. Proof has the general legal senses (1) "evidence that determines the judgment of a court," and more specifically, (2) "an attested written document that constitutes legal evidence." In practice, sense (2) translates into the idiomatic equivalent of probate: "Bearing these opposing considerations in mind, the court is of the opinion that the will should be admitted to proof." Eaton v. Brown, 193 U.S. 411, 414 (1904) (per Holmes, J.). Proving a will = obtaining probate of a will. See probate, n.

C. For element of proof. Generally, of course, proof is a mass noun. But when proof is used as an ellipsis for element of proof (as a type or a piece of evidence), it often takes the plural form proofs, as here: "A case is made for the jury whenever the proofs justify with reason the inference desired."/ "It is also the product of a procedure in which the litigant is assured of an opportunity to present proofs and arguments for a decision in his favour." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 159 (1968). See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS & PLURALS (B)

D. Meaning "hearing" in Scots Law. In Scotland, proof also means "a hearing at which evidence is heard," as when a judge rules by saying, "I will allow a proof."

E. Ambiguity of the Phrase burden of proof. See burden of proof (A).

F. Proof beyond a reasonable doubt. See balance of probability.

propaganda, a singular noun, makes the plural -das. It is sometimes mistakenly thought to be a plural in the class of data and strata.

propagate (= to reproduce or extend) is occasionally confused with promulgate (= to proclaim; put [a law] into action)—e.g.: "The Department determined that the F.L.S.A. governed the wage claims, but did not then look to the regulations propagated [read promulgated] under the Act." Stewart v. Region II Child & Fam. Servs., 788 P.2d 913, 916–17 (Mont. 1990)./ "Commissioner Beman testified that the issuance of the preliminary injunction would have dire consequences for the PGA. He testified that the PGA would not be able to propagate [read promulgate] any rules for the professional tournaments that it oversees." Gilder v. PGA Tour, Inc., 936 F.2d 417, 421 (9th Cir. 1991).

propelment. See propulsion.

pro per. See pro persona.

proper. See indispensable.

properly. Placement of this word in relation to a linking verb or copula may affect meaning in significant ways: be properly means something different from properly be. The latter phrase means that the thing in question (the subject) is proper, or that it is proper for the thing to be done <this question may properly be raised on appeal>, whereas the former means that the thing should be done in a proper way <briefs should be properly submitted>. See BE-VERBS.

pro persona (= for one's own person, on one's own behalf) is a LATINISM used in some jurisdictions as an equivalent of pro se and in propria persona. E.g., "Defendant has raised a number of other issues in a pro persona brief." State v. Kreps, 706 P.2d 1213, 1218 (Ariz. 1985). The phrase is sometimes shortened to pro per . See pro se & in propria persona.

property. A. Legal Meaning. Hohfeld elucidated uses that were conventionally viewed to be correct and incorrect. The traditional legal meaning of the term is "a right over a determinate thing, either a tract of land or a chattel." The transferred sense that nonlawyers commonly attach to the term is "any external thing over which the rights of possession, use, and enjoyment are exercised." See Wesley N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions 28–29 (1919; repr. 1946). Thus the correct emphasis was seen as being on the rights over a thing, and not on the thing itself.

Today, however, even in legal writing, property generally carries the nontechnical sense Hohfeld disapproved of. Felix Cohen, for example, graphically defined the term as a thing that could be labeled: "That is property to which the following label can be attached. To the world: Keep off unless you have my permission, which I may grant or withhold. Signed: Private citizen. Endorsed: The state." Dialogue on Private Property, 9 Rutgers L. Rev. 357, 374 (1954).

B. As a Count Noun. Generally, property used as a count noun is realtors' cant in AmE. E.g., "It was the second marriage for the bridegroom, a real estate lawyer with properties [read property] in Mexico, Italy, and Palm Beach."/ "People won't realize the effect of this act until they try to buy a property [omit a]."/ "That word is exceedingly comprehensive and covers every property [read all the property] that the decedent might have had."/ "Because only one adjacent property [read one adjacent piece of property] was flooded, the court properly concluded that the damage resulted from a condition solely related to appellant's premises and within appellant's control." See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

property-settlement. See estate planning.

prophesy; prophecy. Prophesy is the verb meaning "to predict or foretell," prophecy the noun meaning "a prediction or foretelling." Some writers mistake the noun and the verb—e.g.: "Prophesy [read Prophecy] as to whether there will be speedy and widespread adoption can not be safely indulged in at this early time." Joseph J. O'Connell, 1 Samuel Williston, The Law Governing Sales of Goods (1948) (1960 Supp. at 3)./ "Plaintiffs thus acknowledge that their prophecied [read prophesied] losses may readily be compensated by money damages." Schmidt v. Enertec Corp., 598 F. Supp. 1528, 1544 (S.D.N.Y. 1984).

The words are pronounced differently. The last syllable in prophesy is pronounced "sigh," whereas the last syllable in prophecy is pronounced "see."

prophylactic, n. To an educated nonlawyer, this word is synonymous with condom. Doctors use the term for anything that prevents disease. To lawyers, it means "anything that is designed to prevent (something undesirable)." E.g., "The Court recognized that the predeprivation notice and hearing were necessary prophylactics against a wrongful discharge." Findeisen v. North East Indep. Sch. Dist., 749 F.2d 234, 238 (5th Cir. 1984). The example quoted does not demonstrate the keenest linguistic sensitivity: in view of the nonlawyer's understanding, it is perhaps unwise to use prophylactic in the same sentence with discharge. See VERBAL AWARENESS.

Prophylactic is also frequently an adjective in legal writing .

proponent; propounder. Both mean "one seeking to have a will admitted to probate." The usual term is proponent, the form propounder being a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

proportion, n., should not be used when part or portion is intended. See portion.

One writes, "A high proportion of it is," but "A high proportion of them are." Cf. percentage of, a. See SYNESIS.

proportion, v.t.; proportionalize; proportionate, v.t. The second and third are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

proportionate; proportional; proportionable. The distinction to be observed is between proportional and proportionate; admittedly, at times the distinction is foiled by the frequent interchangeability of the terms. Nevertheless, it is possible to formulate the nuance that proportional = (1) of or relating to proportion; (2) in due proportion; whereas proportionate = proportioned, adjusted in proportion. As a Latinate perfect passive participle, proportionate suggests the conscious proportioning of an agent.

This nice distinction aside, proportionate seems to be used more commonly in legal writing than proportional. E.g., "The court rejected appellant's contention that appellee's claim for compensation had also prescribed and awarded appellee his proportionate share of the value of the recoverable reserves."/ "Defense fees and costs incurred in defending personal injury actions are assessable as an element of damages in proportionate-fault collision cases." Especially is this so in the negative form of the word: "If the provision made for the prospective bride is unreasonably disproportionate to that which she would receive out of her husband's estate but for the agreement, it will be presumed that the prospective bride was not sufficiently informed about the extent, nature, and value of her husband's property."

Proportionable is an ARCHAISM that still sometimes occurs in legal writing—e.g.: "The note for additional interest shall be proportionably [read proportionately] reduced." Cf. commensurate.

propound (= [1] to put forward [a will] as authentic; [2] to put forth for consideration or discussion; or [3] to make a proposal, to propose) is easily used correctly, as the examples following demonstrate. E.g., "The jury initially gave inconsistent answers to special interrogatories propounded to it by the court."/ "Where one party opposes summary judgment by propounding a reasonable interpretation of a disputed matter, it may be sufficient to defeat the motion."/ "Petitioner married the decedent on February 10, 1951; the propounded instrument was executed on May 18, 1951 and the decedent died on July 1, 1951."/ "The privilege of cross-examination does not carry with it the right to indulge in irrelevant investigations of the private life of the witness, or to propound questions intended only to degrade and humiliate him before the jury."

For the misuse of this verb, see expound.

propounder. See proponent.

proprietary; proprietorial; proprietory. The last is an erroneous form. The adjectival form corresponding to the noun proprietor is either proprietary or proprietorial. Proprietary also means "of, relating to, or holding as property."

In the following sentence, proprietorial is almost certainly misused for proprietary: "[T]he contracts were negotiated not with the band's company, The Beatles, Ltd., which held the rights, but with NEMS, which did not possess any proprietorial [read proprietary] rights whatsoever, being simply a management organization." Albert Goldman, The Lives of John Lennon 335 (1988).

propulsion; propelment. The former is the usual term, the latter a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

propulsive; propulsory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

pro rata, adv., should be spelled as two words. E.g., "Appellant argues that the will shows that the testator intended his debts and estate costs to be paid pro rata." Proportionately will sometimes serve in place of pro rata.

On the question whether to hyphenate pro rata when it functions as a phrasal adjective—that is, pro-rata distribution as opposed to pro rata distribution—see PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (B).

prorate (= to divide or assess proportionately) is an Americanism, although the British have now adopted the noun form proration. Instead of the AmE prorating, common in the law of oil and gas, the British use prorationing.

prorogue; prorogate. Prorogue = (1) to postpone; (2) to discontinue the meetings of (a legislative assembly, usually Parliament) for a definite or indefinite time without dissolving it; or (3) to discontinue meeting until the next session. Prorogate is a NEEDLESS VARIANT except in Scots and civil law, in which the term means "to extend by consent (the jurisdiction of a judge or court) to a cause in which jurisdiction would otherwise be incompetent."

proscribe; prescribe. The former means to prohibit, the latter to impose authoritatively. Here both are correctly used: "[D]ue process of law requires that a penal statute or ordinance state with reasonable clarity the act it proscribes and must also prescribe fixed standards for adjudging guilt when that person stands accused." State v. Bloss, 637 P.2d 1117, 1128 (Haw. 1981). See prescribe.

proscription; prescription. Like the corresponding verbs, these nouns are sometimes confused. Sometimes it is difficult to determine whether the use is proper or improper, as here: "The thrust of her argument is that she could not have been constitutionally arrested under the disorderly conduct statute because her conduct did not fit the proscriptions [read prescriptions?] of that statute." If the writer meant to say her conduct did not match the types of conduct prohibited by the statute, proscription was the correct word; but if the writer meant to say that her conduct did not fall within the definitions of disorderly conduct laid down by the statute, prescription would have been the correct word.

Even more serious is the MISCUE caused by medical proscription in the following example: "Gill . . . alleges only that Rudnickey forced him to paint despite his complaints that paint fumes made him 'dizzy and nauseous.' In the absence of any medical proscriptions known to Rudnickey, his decision to ignore Gill's complaints amounted to nothing more than a mere negligent act . . . ." Gill v. Mooney, 824 F.2d 192, 195 (2d Cir. 1987). See prohibition (B).

pro se = on one's own behalf. The phrase is two words, and should not be hyphenated. Functionally, the phrase may be either adjectival or adverbial. Here it is the former: "In this pro se action, plaintiff contends that defendant absconded with personal property and household goods belonging to him, in violation of a temporary restraining order." Just as frequently it is adverbial, as here: "The taxpayer-petitioner appeals pro se from an order and decision of the United States Tax Court." See in propria persona* & pro persona.

prosecutable. So spelled.

prosecute; persecute. Heaven forbid that one with legal training should confuse these terms. Prosecute = to begin a case at law for punishment of a crime or of a legal violation. Persecute = to oppress, coerce, or treat unfairly, often out of religious hatred.

Today prosecute is largely confined to criminal contexts (= to institute legal proceedings against [a person] for some offense), but the word survives as an ARCHAISM in civil contexts in the sense "to carry out or engage in a legal action; to follow up on a legal claim." E.g., "A statute of Illinois provided that no action should be brought or prosecuted in that State for damages occasioned by death occurring in another State in consequence of wrongful conduct." Kenney v. Supreme Lodge of the World, Loyal Order of Moose, 252 U.S. 411, 414 (1920) (per Holmes, J.)./ "Appellants have prosecuted an appeal to this court."/ "There was a jury trial, resulting in a verdict and judgment in behalf of appellee, from which this appeal is prosecuted."/ "Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from a judgment of dismissal entered after sustaining of defendants' general demurrer."

When used in reference to something other than law, prosecute generally means "to carry on." In this sense, the term is a LEGALISM and an ARCHAISM <he continued to prosecute his business> E.g., "All unexpended balances of appropriations prior to May 15, 1928, made for prosecuting work of flood control on the Mississippi River, are made available under this title."

prosecution meant originally (fr. 16th c.) "the following up, continuing, or carrying out of any action, scheme, or purpose, with a view to its accomplishment or attainment." Then it came to be associated with criminal law in the 18th century and took on the meaning "a criminal proceeding in which an accused person is tried."

Today, both in AmE and in BrE, it is also used for prosecutor or prosecutors, the process of HYPALLAGE having done its usual work—e.g.: "The prosecution made improper arguments."/ "The prosecution marshaled evidence tending to link appellant with these practices." In BrE, the word often takes a plural verb: "It is not altogether clear from the authorities what is the degree of risk that the prosecution have to prove" prosecutional; prosecutive. See prosecutorial.

prosecutor = (1) a legal officer who represents the state in criminal proceedings; or (2) a private person who institutes and carries on a suit—esp. a criminal suit—in court. Sense (2), though increasingly rare, persists primarily in BrE—e.g.: "A private prosecutor may relieve the local authority of some expense, but here the private prosecutor may receive from the local authority part of the cost he incurs." R.M. Jackson, The Machinery of Justice in England 324 (5th ed. 1967)./ "In some types of criminal case the title of the case will not contain Rex or Reg. before the 'v.,' but will contain the name of a private person. This happens when the case is tried summarily before magistrates (i.e. justices of the peace); here the name of the actual prosecutor (e.g. a policeman) appears instead of the nominal prosecutor, the Queen." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 17 (11th ed. 1982). See prosecution.

prosecutorial; prosecutory; prosecutive; prosecutional. The most common term in criminal-law texts is prosecutorial; but this variant is not included in W3. Prosecutory and its NEEDLESS VARIANT prosecutive—less common words in legal writing—are defined as "of or pertaining to prosecution." A distinction might obtain if we restricted prosecutorial to be the adjective for prosecutor, already its primary function. E.g., "The prosecutorial decision not to prosecute has a deterrent effect on police misconduct." See, e.g., Bennett L. Gershman, Prosecutorial Misconduct (1985); Joseph F. Lawless, Prosecutorial Misconduct: Law, Procedure, Forms (1985).

But sometimes prosecutorial appears where prosecutory might be more appropriate—e.g.: "Miranda does not interfere with the prosecutorial [read prosecutory] function."/ "The bar committees are composed of private 'competitors' and perform both prosecutorial [read prosecutory] and adjudicative functions in enforcing a self-regulatory disciplinary process."/ "Todaro contends that this case presents such circumstances and invites us to iguore the government's asserted prosecutorial [read prosecutory] interest in the witnesses."

Prosecutional is but a NEEDLESS VARIANT not countenanced by the dictionaries.

prosecutrix /pro-sə-kyoo-triks/, a word traditionally used in reference to a female who brings criminal charges against a sexual assailant, has been objected to on grounds that it is sexist and obscurantist. See Allen v. State, 700 S.W.2d 924, 935–36 (Tex. Crim. App. 1985) (Miller, J., concurring). Judge Miller offers victim as a clearer, more sympathetic term. But victim would surely be prejudicial and ineffective if, for example, it has not been established that a rape actually took place or who the rapist was. (Cf. complainant.) Judge Miller observes that "if prosecutrix is used to refer to the female victim of a sexual assault, would not the term prosecutor be appropriate for a male victim of a sexual assault?" Id. at 936 n.2

Of course, prosecutor is not today much used in that sense (but see sense (2) under that headword). And it is that lack of equivalency that lends some credence to the charge that the word evinces a discriminatory bias in the language. (See SEXISM (C).) More likely, however, the language of the law has not needed a word for adult male victims of sex crimes.

One admirable device that judges have begun using when writing about rape cases—a device that doesn't attach an awkward, aggressive-sounding epithet to the victim—is to use a pseudonym, such as Mary Doe, when presenting a factual narrative.

proselytize; proselyte, v.t. The former is preferred, the latter being a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

prospective heir. See heir (B).

prospective juror. See potential juror.

prospectus. A. Plural Form. The correct English plural is prospectuses—and it is the only form listed in English dictionaries. The Latin plural is prospectus (a fourth-declension noun), not prospecti, the product of ignorant hypercorrection: "Bismarck Realty prepared prospecti [read prospectuses] on the property . . . ." Bismarck Realty Co. v. Folden, 354 N.W.2d 636, 638 (N.D. 1984)./ "Put and call option trading on an underlying security is directly affected by the prospecti [read prospectuses], representations and omissions of the issuer of the underlying security." Tolan v. Computervision Corp., 696 F. Supp. 771, 775 (D. Mass. 1988). Cf. apparatus. See HYPERCORRECTION (A).

B. For perspective. This is a MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "The players were able to keep everything in prospectus [read perspective]." Properly, of course, prospectus = a printed document describing the chief features of a school, commercial enterprise, forthcoming book, or the like. See conspectus.

prostate. See prostrate.

prostitution, meaning in one sense "the act of debasing," is connotatively charged with its other sense of harlotry. E.g., "Solicitation of clients by following accidents and soliciting retainers from the injured is a vile prostitution of the advocate's calling." Where the tone is intentionally provocative or connotatively charged, it may be the right word. Prostitution should not be used, however, wherever debasement might adequately be used.

In criminal law, the word was once confined to a female's taking money in exchange for sexual intercourse with a man. Today, however, the law recognizes that males as well as females engage in prostitution.

prostrate, vb. & adj.; prostate, n. These are very different words, but they are sometimes confused. In its verb sense, to prostrate oneself is to kneel down in humility or adoration. As an adjective, prostrate means either "lying face down" or "emotionally overcome." The noun prostate, by contrast, refers to the gland found in male mammals, surrounding the urethra at the base of the bladder.

The most common mistake is to say prostrate gland when one means prostate gland—e.g.: "He described acid phosphatase as an enzyme from the prostrate [read prostate] gland of a male person." State v. Williams, 196 S.E.2d 248, 249 (N.C. 1973)./ "The Connell plaintiff alleged that defendant physician breached a 'continuing duty to disclose material facts' (the physical examination findings, specifically, enlargement of the prostrate [read prostate] gland) relevant to the decedent's condition (eventually diagnosed as cancer)." Jennifer S.R. Lynn, Connecticut Medical Malpractice, 12 Bridgeport L. Rev. 381, 440 (1992)./ "One strain of mice, whose males develop enlarged prostrate [read prostate] glands, will be used to test potential drug treatments for prostrate [read prostate] enlargement as well as suspected carcinogens." Michael E. Sellers, Note, Patenting Non-naturally Occurring, Man-Made Life, 47 Ark. L. Rev. 269, 271–72 (1994).

protagonist. Literally, protagonist = the chief character in a drama; by extension, it means "a champion of a cause." It should not be used loosely of any upholder or supporter of a cause; it should refer to a prominent and active supporter. E.g., "The complexity of the community property system is not offset by those values claimed for the system by its most ardent protagonists [read supporters]."

Protagonist is all too frequently confused with antagonist. E.g., "On this point there was an internecine struggle in the Second Circuit, with Judges Clark and Friendly as the protagonists [read antagonists]." (Note that internecine means "mutually deadly," and that is hardly the intended meaning here.)/ "On this promising note the two protagonists [i.e., now angry litigants] parted." (This sentence contains an example of the rhetorical figure prolepsis—the representation of a future fact as presently existing; that is, when the two persons parted on a promising note, they were not antagonists or opponents; only in retrospect or from a current perspective may they be seen as angry litigants.)

In the following sentence, the writer attempted to use protagonist figuratively in its dramatic sense but failed in the metaphor because a drama has only one protagonist: "Slugs, larvae, nematodes, and rodents form the supporting cast in this trademark drama; the protagonists [read principal characters] are the terms Larvacide and larvicide." Soweco, Inc. v. Shell Oil Co., 617 F.2d 1178, 1181 (5th Cir. 1980).

Perhaps the most objectionable watering-down of the meaning of protagonist occurs when it is used as an equivalent of proponent: "Protagonists [read Proponents] of a more active role and greater freedom of technique for courts in private law reform have sometimes failed to recognize the need to revise, too, prevailing attitudes about the role and technique of legislatures."

pro tanto (= to that extent; as far as it goes) is a defensible LATINISM commonly used in law. No other word quite works without substantial rewording. It may be used adjectivally: "There may be a pro tanto ademption by satisfaction if the evidence indicated that the testator so intended the inter vivos gift to work such an ademption."/ "It would be a matter of pure speculation whether—whatever the change of conditions since her death—she would not want part of the corpus of the trust turned over to the petitioner, involving, as it would, the pro tanto depletion of the fund from which the income was to be derived."/ "It was an offer capable of being accepted and turned into a contract pro tanto on the occasion of each discount." (Eng.)

The phrase may also be used adverbially: "The bequest would be deemed pro tanto void if the testator had deliberately used unmeaning words." (Eng.)/ "We deal of course with a later Congress and an Act that sets aside by section 208(b) pro tanto the earlier Act."/ "If defendant received less than the value of plaintiff's work, as defendant seems to contend, then plaintiff should recover pro tanto." protectable; protectible. The former is preferred. Inconsistencies often arise even within one piece of writing. See, e.g., headnotes 1 and 5 of protective; protectory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Velo-Bind, Inc. v. Scheck, 485 F. Supp. 102, 102 (S.D.N.Y. 1979). See -ABLE (A).

pro tem. is the abbreviation for pro tempore (= for the time being). This fairly common LATINISM is used as a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE in phrases such as mayor pro tem.

protest, n.; protestation. The difference is that protest, the ordinary word, usually refers to a formal statement or action of dissent or disapproval, whereas protestation, a learned word, generally denotes a solemn affirmation.

protest, vb., is transitive or intransitive in AmE but is solely intransitive in most BrE writing. In G.B., one writes, "They protested against discrimination," but not, "They protested discrimination." Eric Partridge considered the latter, which is acceptable AmE usage, incorrect and quoted an American writer as an offender against idiom. See Usage and Abusage 248 (1973). The phrase protest against is common also in AmE. E.g., "Appellants were protesting against American policy in Vietnam." In AmE, however, against is regularly omitted. An exception to the general British legal idiom is the phrase protest a bill of exchange.

protestant /prot-ə-stənt/ (= a protesting person) is often used in law to mean "one who protests an administrative decision." E.g., "In arguing that the ICC's method of evaluating any protestant's proof of inconsistency with public convenience and necessity violates the national transportation policy, Steere insists that under current Commission policy it is impossible for a protestant to demonstrate that inconsistency."/ "Once a petitioner makes out a prima facie case, a presumption is created that the new authority will be consistent with the public convenience and necessity, and the burden of proof is shifted to the protestant that it will not." Cf. caveator, contestant & objectant.

protocol. See treaty.

prot(h)onotary means generally "the chief clerk of a court of law." The word is pronounced /proh-thon-ə-tar-ee/ or /proh-thə-nod-ə-ree/.

The spelling with the -h- is prevalent in both AmE and BrE—to the extent that this obsolescent word can be called "prevalent" at all. The office was abolished in England in 1837, the last holder surviving until 1874. But the term lingers in some American jurisdictions. E.g., "The trustee may, on the other hand, obtain an adjudication of his management of the trust by filing his account in the office of the prothonotary of the court . . . " Princess Lida v. Thompson, 305 U.S. 456, 463 (1939)./ "As in Florida, a private party may obtain a prejudgment writ of replevin through a summary process of ex parte application to a prothonotary." Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67, 75–76 (1972) prototype. See archetype.

prototyp(ic)al. The usual and preferred form is prototypical, not prototypal. Cf. archetyp(ic)al.

protuberate is frequently misspelled and mispronounced as if it were protruberate, perhaps out of confusion with protrude. The adjective, likewise, is protuberant, not protruberant—e.g.: "Physical examination revealed plaintiff to be a very healthy appearing person with a protruberant [read protuberant or protruding] abdomen." Coleman v Califano, 462 F. Supp. 77, 79–80 (N.D.N.Y. 1978).

proud; prideful. The connotative distinction to bear in mind is that prideful suggests excessive pride, haughtiness, and disdain. A favorite word of charismatic and evangelical Christians, prideful is also moralistic in tone.

prove; prove up. Generally, it is sufficient to use prove transitively, and hence to write, "He attempted to prove his title to the land." A common Americanism in law, however, is the phrasal verb prove up (= to adduce or complete the proof of right to (something); to show that one has fulfilled the legal conditions). E.g., "He attempted to prove up his title to the land." The OED indicates that this usage has spread to Canada. See PHRASAL VERBS & PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY proved; proven. Proved is the universally preferred past participle of prove. Often, however, proven ill-advisedly appears—e.g.: "In Beaumont v. Feld, a bequest to 'Catharine Earnley' was proven [read proved] to have been intended for Gertrude Yardley, and was given to the latter."/ "Since the serious bodily injury suffered by complainant at the hands of appellant was proven [read proved] beyond a reasonable doubt, the error, if any, was harmless."

In AmE and BrE alike, the past participle proved is much more common than proven—e.g.: "Our system does not interfere till harm has been done and has been proved to have been done with appropriate mens rea." H.L.A. Hart, "Punishment and the Elimination of Responsibility," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 158, 182 (1968).

Like stricken, however, proven is properly used only as an adjective. E.g., "Evidence may be offered, not to show its already proven existence, but . . . ."/ "In judging human conduct, intent is an elusive subjective concept, and its existence usually can be inferred only from proven facts." See stricken.

Proven has survived as a past participle in legal usage in two phrases: first, in the phrase innocent until proven guilty; second, in the verdict Not proven, a jury answer no longer widely used except in Scots law. As for Not proven, one writer has defined this verdict as meaning, "Not guilty, but don't do it again." William Roughead, The Art of Murder 131 (1943).

provenance; provenience. Both are FORMAL WORDS for origin or source. Provenience is chiefly an Americanism, but provenance prevails throughout the English-speaking world—including AmE.

proves the rule, the exception. See exception proves the rule, the.

prove too much – to make an overbroad argument; (of an argument) to be overbroad. E.g., "A very common criticism of Vaihinger is to say that he proves too much. If everything is a 'fiction,' then the meaning of the word 'fiction' has been lost, and 'as if' has become simply 'is.'" Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 123 (1967)./ "[T]he government's argument proves too much. If an 'acquisition' as that term is used in the acquisition clause is also required under the notice clause, then the notice alternative would be rendered surplusage." Cole v. Harris, 571 F.2d 590, 596 (D.C. Cir. 1977).

prove up. See prove.

provided that. A. Provisos Generally. Writers on drafting have long cautioned drafters not to use provisos. In fact, the words provided that are a reliable signal that the draft is not going well.

The problem—recognized five centuries ago by Coke—is that the phrase means too many different things: provided that may create an exception, a limitation, a condition, or a mere addition. Sometimes the phrase is the functional equivalent of an adjectival phrase—e.g.: "Provided that an order under this section is approved, it shall be binding upon all persons concerned." [Read An order approved under this section binds all persons concerned.]

The matter contained in the proviso is often preferably integrated into a subordinate clause introduced by but—e.g.: "No person who has not attained the age of twelve years shall be competent to testify, provided that, if the court finds that any such person understands the nature and obligation of the oath, such person shall be competent to testify." This statute is best rephrased: "Persons over the age of twelve years are competent to testify, but a person under that age is also competent if the court finds that the person understands the nature and obligation of the oath." (Ex. fr. Irving Younger, Persuasive Writing 6, 6–7 (1990).) See proviso.

B. And providing that. As between provided that and providing that—assuming one wants to create a proviso despite what is said under (A)—the former is the preferred phrasing.

province, the peculiar, is a legal CLICHÉ throughout common-law countries. E.g., "It is, of course, within the peculiar province of the Queen's Proctor to know all that bears on his office, and he does." (Eng.)

provincial, in a country without provinces, has been narrowed primarily to its extended meaning, "parochial, narrow." Yet it still carries its primary sense, "of or relating to a province." Hence, "As the preparations for the provincial tour progressed, William became morose."

proving a will. See proof (B).

provision. See prevision & proviso.

provision of law is usually unnecessary for law or provision.

proviso generally has a narrower sense than provision (= a contractual term). In DRAFTING, a proviso is either a clause that is inserted in a legal or formal document and that makes some condition, stipulation, exception, or limitation, or a clause upon whose observance the operation or validity of the instrument depends. E.g., "When there is no accuracy or promptitude, the company should answer for all injury resulting, subject to the proviso that the injury must be the natural and direct consequence of the negligent act." For the reasons to avoid provisos, see provided that (A).

The plural is provisos, not provisoes.

provocation; revenge. In criminal law, killing in provocation is one type of killing in revenge, but generally provocation is considered quite separate. It gives rise to action in the heat of the moment, whereas revenge refers to planned, cold-blooded killing.

provocative; provocatory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

prox. See ult.

proximate; proximal. Both mean "lying very near or close." Yet proximal is primarily a technical, scientific term, whereas proximate is the ordinary term with the additional senses (1) "soon forthcoming; imminent"; (2) "next preceding" <proximate cause>; and (3) "nearly accurate; approximate." See approximate.

proximate cause, an anglicization of the LATINISM causa proxima, is a TERM OF ART having little to do with physical causation, emphasizing instead the continuity of the sequence that produces an event. The meaning is elusive: "a cause of which the law will take notice." The phrase is basic to tort law in AmE and is also used, though much less frequently, in BrE. One commentator rather uncharitably terms proximate cause "concise gibberish." David Mellinkoff, The Language of the Law 401 (1963). See CAUSATION (A).

Synonymous phrases—now, for the most part, rejects—are primary cause, efficient cause, efficient proximate cause, efficient adequate cause, legal cause, and jural cause.

proxy, in corporate law, has three distinct senses: (1) "a person who is authorized to vote another's shares"; (2) "the grant of authority by which a person is so authorized"; or (3) "the document granting that authority."

prudent(ial). Prudent = exhibiting prudence. Prudential = pertaining to, considered from the point of view of, or dictated by prudence. E.g., "This limitation is not constitutionally mandated but a rule of self-restraint justified by a prudential concern that courts should not adjudicate constitutional rights unnecessarily."/ "Prudential guidelines govern the administration of this rule."

"To call an act prudent," wrote Fowler, "is normally to commend it; to call it -ial is more often than not to disparage it. A prisoner's refusal to go into the witness-box is prudential but not prudent if he refuses for fear of giving himself away but actually creates prejudice against himself, prudent but not prudential if it deprives the prosecution of a necessary link in the evidence but is dictated merely by bravado, and both or neither in conditions as easy to invent" (MEU1 473).

prurience; pruriency. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

pseudonym = a fictitious name. In law, common pseudonyms for persons involved in suits are John Doe, Jane Doe, and Richard Roe. Here the word is wrongly used for euphemism: "Graglia implies that affirmative action is a pseudonym [read euphemism] for preferring blacks and browns over whites." See EUPHEMISMS. See also anonym(e).

PSITTACISM is the parrotlike use of language. If there is a malady endemic in legal writing, it is the practice or habit of mechanically repeating previously received ideas or images that reflect neither true reasoning nor feeling. Many legal opinions and law-review articles seem little more than ready-made legal phrases strung end on end to justify a given proposition. The clichés give themselves away with the first couple of words in the line, so that the adept reader knows what the psittacistic writer will say before reading the end of the line. In derogation of is rarely followed by anything other than the common law; and so endemic are such phrases as case of first impression, it is well established that, and notwithstanding anything herein to the contrary that they finally numb the intellect of both reader and writer. For more examples, see CLICHÉS.

George Orwell's thinking was as penetrating here as elsewhere: "[M]odern writing at its worst does not consist in picking out words for the sake of their meaning and inventing images in order to make the meaning clearer. It consists in gumming together long strips of words [that] have already been set in order by someone else, and making the results presentable by sheer humbug." George Orwell, "Politics and the English Language," in Shooting an Elephant and Other Essays 77, 85 (1945).

The best legal writers attempt to formulate their thoughts anew. Their writing is fresh and original. And it is rare.

psychic; psychal; psychical; psychological. Psychic = (1) of or relating to the psyche; (2) spiritual; or (3) paranormal. Psychical (= of or relating to the mind) is contrasted with physical. Psychal is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Psychological = (1) of, pertaining to, or of the nature of psychology; dealing with psychology; or (2) of or pertaining to the objects of psychological study; of or pertaining to the mind, mental (OED). The OED states that sense (2) of psychological is a loose usage, but it is now firmly established.

psycholegal (= involving the psychological implications of the legal process) is a late-20th-century NEOLOGISM—e.g.: Wallace D. Loh, Psycholegal Research: Past and Present, 79 Mich. L. Rev. 659 (1981); Gary B. Melton & Ralph B. Pliner, "Adolescent Abortion: A Psycholegal Analysis," in Adolescent Abortion, Psychological and Legal Issues 1 (G.B. Melton ed. 1986); Richard L. Wiener, A Psycholegal and Empirical Approach to the Medical Standard of Care, 69 Neb. L. Rev. 112 (1990). Cf. medicolegal.

psychological. See psych(ic).

pubes, a term that occasionally arises in criminal cases, refers either to the area surrounding a person's external genitals or to pubic hair. It is sometimes mispronounced /pyoobs/, though properly it has two syllables /pyoo-beez/.

public, a COLLECTIVE NOUN, usually takes a singular verb in AmE <public is> and a plural verb in BrE <public are>.

public Act; private Act; public bill; private bill. In British statutory law (or "statute law" as it is known in BrE), a public Act is one that a court may take judicial notice of, whereas a private Act is one whose terms must be proved in court. But every Act passed since 1850 is considered public in this sense unless the Act expressly provides otherwise (a rarity). (For the reason behind capitalizing Act, see act (c).)

A public bill is one brought by a government minister or by a private member who has won a place on the ballot allowing him or her a chance to bring in the bill. A private bill is one promoted by a person or body (such as a local authority) to regulate its own affairs. Public and private bills are subject to different parliamentary procedures.

publication = (1) (in the law of defamation) the communication of defamatory words to someone other than the person defamed, or (2) (in the law of wills) the formal declaration made by a testator at the time of signing the will that it is the testator's will. Following are examples of sense (2), in which the word is a TERM OF ART: "Some states require the testator to indicate to the attesting witnesses that the document executed or to be executed by him is a will; this action is called publication."/ "There is no point in 'publishing' the will at the beginning; the witnesses will not be likely to see the publication there. It should be at the end of the will. In any case, 'I delcare that this is my will' is a publication." Thomas L. Shaffer, The Planning and Drafting of Wills and Trusts 171 (2d ed. 1979).

In sense (1) as in sense (2), the verb corresponding to publication is to publish. In the law of defamation, to publish is to make public. E.g., "The libel was published by the attorney to persons having no relationship to the pending judicial proceeding." Spoken as well as written defamation is said to be published.

publicist (= one who is learned in public or international law; a writer on the law of nations [OED]) ordinarily means "publicity agent" to nonlawyers. Hence the legal use of the term generally requires explanation if the audience is a broad one.

public law = (1) constitutional law, criminal law, and administrative law taken together; or (2) published law. Sense (2) is far less common—e.g.: "A case decided is called a 'precedent,' and becomes at once public law, which, under many circumstances, binds a court to make the same decision in any future case similar to it." William M. Lile et al., Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 26 (3d ed. 1914).

publicly, not publically, is the adverb: "Marlin Fitzwater, the President's spokesman, said Mr. Bush felt assured that Dr. Sullivan, whatever his private views might be, would publically [read publicly] support the President's policy of opposing abortion in almost all cases." Steven V. Roberts, Bush Will Stand by Nominee to Health Post, Officials Say, N.Y. Times, 25 Jan. 1989, at 1.

public person. To most speakers of English, this phrase suggests a celebrity. But legal theorists use it quite differently: "By a 'Public person' we mean either the State, or the sovereign part of it, or a body or individual holding delegated authority under it." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 127 (13th ed. 1924).

public policy. In the context of policy-making, this phrase connotes the art of ruling wisely <implementing sound public policy>. The phrase refers vaguely to matters regarded by the legislature or by the courts as being of fundamental concern to the state and the whole of society.

In the context of contract law, public policy connotes an overriding public interest that may justify a court's decision to declare a contract void. In this context, too, the phrase is vague: "Public policy is a variable notion, depending on changing manners, morals and economic conditions. In theory, this flexibility of the doctrine of public policy could provide a judge with an excuse for invalidating any contract which he violently disliked." G.H Treitel, The Law of Contract 424 (8th ed. 1991).

Today this term, when used as a noun, is not preceded by an article: "Generally, the duty of a parent to support children is grounded on the public policy [read on public policy]."

publish. See publication.

pudendum (= a genital organ) forms the plural pudenda (= genitals). See PLURALS (A).

puffing (= the action of praising a thing excessively but in general terms, esp. to advertise it) is perfectly appropriate in formal contexts; it is not a casualism. E.g., "Ours may be, for puffing purposes, a 'government of checks and balances,' but there is no check at all on what the Supreme Court does . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 4 (1955)./ "General commendations, commonly known as dealer's talk, seller's statements, or puffing, do not amount to actionable misrepresentations where the parties deal at arm's length and have equal means of information and are equally well qualified to judge the facts." 41 Tex. Jur. 3d Fraud & Deceit § 28 (1985).

puisne (= younger or of lower rank), sometimes used in reference to a superior court judge who is less than a chief judge, is pronounced like puny. Etymologically, the LAW FRENCH puisne is puis-né (= later-born). The term has been extended in English legal usage to apply to mortgagees and other incumbrancers; it is also used in England as an attributive adjective in the sense "a puisne judge" <five puisnes upheld the plea>. E.g., "Often the court consisted of the Lord Chief Justice and two puisne judges, with a second and third court consisting of three puisnes . . . ." R.M. Jackson, The Machinery of Justice in England 123 (5th ed. 1967)./ "The motions were heard by Lord Chief Justice Mansfield sitting with his puisnes, Willes and Ashurst." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 122 (1979).

PUNCTUATION. Judges and jurists have written more nonsense about punctuation than about any other facet of the language. The well-known dictum that "punctuation is not a part of the statute" has given rise to even more surreal pronouncements: "[P]unctuation at any rate is not a part of the English language." Kansas City Life Ins. Co. v. Wells, 133 F.2d 224, 227 (8th Cir. 1943). Just as surreally, courts have minimized the effect of punctuation with bizarre statements: "[P]unctuation or the absence of punctuation will not of itself create ambiguity." Anderson & Kerr Drilling Co. v. Bruhlmeyer, 136 S.W.2d 800, 803 (Tex. 1940).

Can that be so? The resolution of at least two capital cases has rested on no more than how the court interpreted a comma. See U.S. v. Palmer, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 610, 636 (1818) (in which Johnson, J., dissenting, stated: "[M]en's lives may depend upon a comma"); Rex v. Casement, [1917] 1 K.B. 98 (1916).

And consider the following statement shorn of the punctuation marks: "Woman—without her, man would be a savage."

The fallacies underlying the statements quoted in the first paragraph are too obvious to require extensive explanation. And occasionally—though not often enough—the courts refute them: "Punctuation is a rational part of English composition, and it is sometimes quite significantly employed. I see no reason for depriving legal documents of such significance as attaches to punctuation in other writings." Houston v. Burns, [1918] A.C. 337, 348.

Lawyers and judges have long mistrusted punctuation as a guide to meaning. See Richard C. Wydick, Should Lawyers Punctuate? 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 7 (1990). Historically speaking, there are three primary reasons for this mistrust. (1) the uncertain state of English punctuation during the 17th and 18th centuries, a formative period for modern law; (2) the fact that printers typically controlled punctuation more than drafters; and (3) the age-old canard that English statutes were traditionally unpunctuated. See id. at 16–19. Wydick persuasively concludes that judges "should create a rebuttable presumption that legal documents have been punctuated in accordance with ordinary English usage, and they should use the punctuation, along with all of the other guides to meaning, when they interpret legal documents." Id. at 24.

Following, then, are the basic principles for punctuating in accordance with ordinary English usage. These principles are adapted, with elaboration, from the Oxford Guide (pp. 193–97). First, though, a warning. Poor punctuation often signals writing problems that go deeper than one might think: "[M]ost errors of punctuation arise from ill-designed, badly shaped sentences, and from the attempt to make them work by means of violent tricks with commas and colons and such like." Hugh Sykes Davies, Grammar Without Tears 167 (1951).

A. The Apostrophe [']. This punctuation mark is used in English for either of two purposes: (1) to indicate the possessive case—e.g.: "Lord Mansfield['s speech"; "Mother Jones['s recipe"; and (2) to mark the omission of one or more elements and the contracting of the remaining elements into a meaningful expression—e.g.:

"ever" into "e[']er"; "we will" into "we[']ll"; "1969" into "[']69." See POSSESSIVES.

On the misuse of an apostrophe to denote a plural, see PLURALS (F).

B. The Colon [:]. This mark may link two grammatically complete clauses by indicating a step forward from the first to the second: the step may be from an introduction to a main theme, from a cause to an effect, from a general statement to a particular instance, or from a premise to a conclusion. E.g., "The remedy is simple[:] enact legislation that discourages American employers from hiring illegal aliens." The colon is also used, and perhaps more commonly, to introduce a list of items, often after expressions such as "for example"; "namely"; "the following"; "as follows"; and "including." E.g., "The following judges were present[:] Hickman, C.J., Griffin, J., Calvert, J., and Smedley, J."

C. The Comma [,]. This is the least emphatic mark of punctuation, and the one used in the greatest variety of circumstances:

1. To separate adjectives that each qualify a noun in the same way . E.g., "Is there to be one standard for the old, repulsive laws that preferred whites over blacks, and a different, more forgiving standard for new laws that give blacks special benefits in the name of historical redress?" Linda Greenhouse, Signal on Job Rights, N.Y. Times, 25 Jan. 1989, at 1./ "It almost goes without saying that the job of the president of the L.I.R.R. is not a weekday warrior's position—it is not a five-days-a-week, 9-to-5 job." Matthew L. Wald, Senator Assails L.I.R.R. Chief as Out of Touch, N.Y. Times, 21 April 1994, at B6.

   But when adjectives qualify the noun in different ways, or when one adjective qualifies a noun phrase containing another adjective, no comma is used—e.g.: "a distinguished [no comma] foreign journalist"; "a bright [no comma] red tie." E.g., "I could quote dozens of similar remarks by eminent, legal scholars [read eminent legal scholars] and lawyers." Jerome Frank, Courts on Trial 61 (1949).
2. To separate items (including the last from the penultimate) in a list of more than two—e.g.: "the defendants, the third-party defendants[,] and the counterdefendants." The question whether to include the serial comma has sparked many arguments in law offices and judges' chambers. It is easily answered in favor of including the final comma, for its omission may cause ambiguities, whereas its inclusion never will—e.g.: "A and B, C and D, E and F[,] and G and H." When the members are compound, calling for and within themselves, clarity demands the final comma. See ENUMERATIONS (B).
3. To separate coordinated main clauses—e.g.: "Cars will turn here[,] and coaches will go straight." There are two exceptions: first, when the main clauses are closely linked (e.g., "Do as I tell you [no comma] and you will not regret it."); and second, when the subject of the second independent clause, being the same as in the first, is not repeated (e.g., "Remedies that prevent harm altogether are often better for plaintiffs [no comma] and are always closer to the ideal of corrective justice.").
4. To mark the beginning and ending of a parenthetical word or phrase—e.g.: "I am sure[,] however[,] that it will not happen."/ "Fred[,] who is bald[,] complained of the cold."

   Some writers mistakenly omit the second comma—e.g.: "Scienter, or knowledge of the falsity of representation[,] is required . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 490 (1930). "Mr. Rifkin's lawyer, John Lawrence[,] insisted that Mr. Rifkin did not know what he was doing and often drove around in a haze after strangling victims . . . ." John T. McQuiston, Rifkin Guilty of Murder as Long Island Jury Rejects Insanity Defense, N.Y. Times, 10 May 1994, at A16.

   Still others leave out both commas, often creating a MISCUE: "[S]uch warrantor must as a minimum remedy such consumer product within a reasonable time and without charge . . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 2304(a)(1) (1988). (A comma is needed after must and after minimum; otherwise, one reads as a minimum remedy as a single phrase.)

   Note that with restrictive clauses—that is, those that are necessary to define the antecedent or to limit it—no commas are used. E.g., "Men [no comma] who are bald [no comma] should wear hats."/ "Facts [no comma] not unlike those found in this record [no comma] were considered in that case.") See RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES.
5. To separate a participial or verbless clause, a salutation, or a vocative—e.g.: "Having had breakfast[,] I went for a walk."/ "The sermon over [or being over], the congregation filed out."/ "Fellow lawyers[,] the bar must unite in seeking reform of the system of electing judges." (N.B.: Not "The sermon[,] being over[,] . . ."; and no comma with restrictive expressions like "My friend Judge Smith" or "my son John.")
6. To separate a phrase or subordinate clause from the main clause so as to avoid misunderstanding. E.g., "In the valley below[,] the villages looked very small."/ "In 1982[,] 1918 seemed like the distant past." (N.B.: A comma should not be used to separate a phrasal subject from its predicate, or a verb from an object that is a clause. E.g., "A car with such a high-powered engine, should [read engine should] not fail on that hill."/ "They believed, that [read believed that] nothing could go wrong.")

7. To distinguish indirect from direct speech. E.g., "They answered[,] 'Here we are.'"
8. To mark the end of the salutation, e.g., "Dear Mr. Crosthwaite[,]"; "Dear Rebecca[,]", etc. and the complimentary close, e.g., "Very truly yours[,]": "Yours sincerely[,]"; etc. In formal letters, the salutation is separated from the body by a colon "Dear Sir[:]"; "Dear Madam[:]"; etc.

Writers cause needless confusion or distraction for their readers when they insert commas erroneously:

- The Archaic Comma Preceding a Verb. Formerly, it was common for writers to insert a comma in the main clause before the verb, but this practice has been out of fashion since the early 20th century. Today it is considered incorrect. E.g., "Whether or not a contract has been modified, [omit the comma] is a question of fact for the jury."/ "Only if this were true, [omit the comma] could it be said that plaintiffs received their bargained-for equivalent of the $30,000 payments."

  Even those who understand this principle are tempted sometimes to place a comma after a compound subject. That temptation should be avoided—e.g.: "Co-owners who are not joint tenants, tenants by the entireties, or owners of community property, [omit the comma] are tenants in common." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 222 (1946).
- Misplaced Emphasis. "I, accordingly, [read accordingly without the embracing commas] dissent."/ "We, therefore, [read therefore without the embracing commas] conclude that the ancient doctrine of sovereign immunity has lost its underpinnings." (N.B.: If the emphasis in the preceding sentence is to fall on We—as clearly separated from some other group and its thinking—the commas should stand; but if the emphasis is to fall on the therefore as a simple consequence of our reasoning from the evidence, then the commas should be omitted. See therefore (D).)
- Compound Sentences. As explained above (#3 in the preceding list), no comma appears before the conjunction in a compound sentence when the second clause has an understood subject—e.g.: "The problem has not yet arisen, [omit comma] and is of little practical importance." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 57 (3d ed. 1981)./ "These are cases in which plaintiff seeks some equitable remedy, [omit comma] and is remitted to a legal remedy instead . . . ." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 100 (1991).
- Dates. No comma is needed between the month and year in dates written "December 1984" or "18 December 1984"; a comma is required when the date is written "December 18, 1984." See DATES (B).
- The Comma Splice. See RUN-ON SENTENCES.

The omission of commas can often blur the sense of a sentence, as in the following examples: "Substantial performance cannot occur where the breach is intentional [insert a comma] as it is the antithesis of material breach."/ "Because, prior to their filing [insert a comma] consignor's claims will be subordinate to those of lien creditors, in practice the consignee's creditors will have effective claims to the consigned goods."/ "Something may be said for it, since it furnishes a simple, if arbitrary [insert comma] test."

D. The Dash (— ; –). There are two kinds of dashes, which typesetters are able to distinguish by their length. First, the em-dash, which is as wide as the square of the type size, is used to mark an interruption in the structure of a sentence. In typewriting, it is commonly represented by two hyphens, often with a space at either end of the pair (- -). A pair of em-dashes can be used to enclose a parenthetical remark or to mark the ending and the resumption of a statement by an interlocutor. E.g., "He was not[—]you may disagree with me, Henry[—]much of an artist."/ "[T]he courts were endeavouring to find the compromise—always difficult—between substantial justice and a proper discipline of form." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 401 (7th ed. 1964). The em-dash can also be used to replace the colon.

In legal writing, em-dashes are the second most underused mark of punctuation (periods being the most underused). Whether in DRAFTING or in persuasive writing, dashes can often clarify a sentence that is clogged up with commas. Imagine the following sentences if commas replaced the well-chosen em-dashes:

- "He may make no pretension -he generally makes no pretension—to be an expert in any of these fields, but he would be a little ashamed if he was crassly ignorant of them." Max Radin, The Law and You 11 (1948).
- "In some jurisdictions, the judge, when using a special verdict, need not—should not—give any charge about the substantive legal rules beyond what is reasonably necessary to enable the jury to answer intelligently the questions put to them." Jerome Frank, Courts on Trial 141 (1949).

- "If this be the correct principle—and, so far as we are aware, it has never before been laid down in terms—there seems to be no reason why it should not apply equally to the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench." Carleton K Allen, Law in the Making 240 (7th ed. 1964).
- "Why should not all people—Blacks as well as Whites—be allowed to appear, by right, before a tribunal that is impartial and not a stooge for the powerful Highway Lobby, to air their complaints and state their views?" William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 86 (1970).
- "When the plaintiff's attorney files a certificate stating that he or she believes a defendant cannot be personally served, because after diligent inquiry within the state where the complaint is filed the defendant's place of residence cannot be ascertained—or, if ascertained, that it is beyond the territorial limits of personal service as provided in this rule—this defendant must be served by publication in a newspaper published in the county where the property is located." Fed. R. Civ. P. 71A (1992 draft of Style Subcommittee, Standing Committee on Federal Practice and Procedure).

Second, the en-dash, which is half as wide as an em-dash, is distinct (in print) from the hyphen. It is ordinarily equivalent to the word to. In typewriting, it is commonly represented by one hyphen, occasionally with a space at either end (–). E.g., "The 1914[–]1918 war"; "Dallas[–]Toronto[–]Quebec route"; "pages 68–70."

Sometimes, the en-dash suggests tension and carries the sense "versus." For example, in circumstances involving a disjunction, the en-dash is usu. preferable to the slash—e.g.: "If we manage to get that far, the absurdity of attempting to preserve the nineteenth-century contract–tort dichotomy [not contract/tort dichotomy] will have become apparent . . . ." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 90 (1974).

E. The Exclamation Mark [!]. This mark is used after an exclamatory word, phrase, or sentence. It usually counts as the concluding full stop, but need not. E.g., "Hail, Source of Being! Universal Soul!" It may also be used within square brackets, after or in the midst of a quotation, to express the editor's amusement, dissent, or surprise. Rarely is the exclamation mark called for in legal writing.

F. The Hyphen [-]. In all but one context, AmE is much more inhospitable to hyphens than BrE. Words with prefixes are generally made solid: nonstatutory (not non-statutory), pretrial (not pre-trial), posttrial (not post-trial), preemption (not pre-emption). This no-hyphen style seems aesthetically superior, but reasonable people will differ on such a question. They can agree, however, that the hyphen must appear when an AMBIGUITY, MISCUE, or eyesore results without it—e.g., pre-judicial (career), re-sign (the petition), post-sentencing. See RE- PAIRS.

And what is that one context in which AmE is hospitable to the hyphen? See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

G. Parentheses [(. . .)]. These marks enclose words, phrases, and even whole sentences (but usually not more than a whole paragraph). If what is enclosed is a full sentence, the closing parenthesis includes the end punctuation; if not, the end punctuation is swept outside, as in the previous sentence here. More specifically, parentheses are used as follows:

1. To indicate interpolations and remarks by the writer of the text, e.g., "Mrs. X (as I shall call her) now spoke."
2. To specify, in one's own running text, an authority, definition, explanation, reference, or translation.
3. To indicate, in the report of a speech, interruptions by the audience.
4. To separate reference letters or figures that do not need a full stop, e.g., (1) (a).

H. The Period or Full Stop [.]. This mark is used in two ways. First, it ends all sentences that are not questions or exclamations. The next word should normally begin with a capital letter.

Second, it indicates abbreviations (see ACRONYMS and INITIALISMS). If a point marking an abbreviation comes at the end of a sentence, it also serves as the closing full stop. E.g., "She also kept dogs, cats, birds, etc[.]" But where a closing parenthesis or bracket intervenes, a period is required: "She also kept pets (dogs, cats, birds, etc[.].)" When a sentence concludes with a quotation that ends with a period (i.e., a full stop), question mark, or exclamation mark, no further period is needed. E.g., "He cried, 'Be off!' [no period] But the child would not move."

I. The Question Mark [?]. A question mark follows every question that expects a separate answer; the next word should begin with a capital letter. "He asked me, 'Why are you here?' A foolish question." (N.B.: A question mark is not used after indirect questions, e.g., "He asked me why I was there.") A question mark may be placed in brackets after a word, etc., whose accuracy is doubted, e.g., "Sangad Anurugsa[?]"

J. Quotation Marks [" "]. In using quotation marks (or "inverted commas" as the British call them), writers and editors of AmE and BrE have developed conventions that are markedly different.

1. In AmE, double quotation marks are used for a first quotation; single marks for a quotation within a quotation; double again for a further quotation inside that, etc. In BrE, the practice is exactly the reverse at each step.
2. With a closing quotation mark, practices vary. In AmE, it is usual to place a period or comma within the closing quotation mark, whether or not the punctuation so placed is actually a part of the quoted matter. E.g., "Joan pointedly said, 'We do not intend to see "Les Miserables." ' " In BrE, by contrast, the closing quotation mark comes before all punctuation marks, unless these marks form a part of the quotation itself (or what is quoted is less than a full sentence in its own right). E.g., 'Joan pointedly said, "We do not intend to see 'Les Miserables'." ' / 'She looked back on her school years as being "unredeemably miserable".' (N.B.: In both of these specimens the outermost quotation marks indicate that a printed source is being quoted directly.)

   When question and exclamation marks are involved, AmE and BrE practice is the same. E.g., (AmE) "Did Nelson really say 'Kiss me, Hardy'?"; (BrE) 'Did Nelson really say "Kiss me, Hardy"?' But when the question or exclamation mark is an integral part of what is being quoted, it is swept inside of all quotation marks (i.e., inverted commas). E.g., (AmE) "Banging her fist on the table, she exclaimed, 'And that's that!' "; (BrE) 'Banging her fist on the table, she exclaimed, "And that's that!" ' (N.B.: When the ending of an interrogatory or an exclamatory sentence coincides with the ending of another sentence that embraces it, the stronger mark of punctuation is sufficient to terminate both sentences; i.e., a period [i.e., a full stop] need not also be included after the question mark or exclamation mark inside the final quotation mark.)

   As to quotations that are interrupted to indicate a speaker, AmE and BrE again show different preferences. In AmE, the first comma is swept within the quotation mark. E.g., "Sally," he said, "is looking radiant today." In BrE, the first comma (usually) remains outside the inverted comma, just as though the attribution could be lifted neatly out of the speaker's actual words. E.g., 'Sally', he said, 'is looking radiant today'. See QUOTATIONS (B).
3. In nonlegal citations, quotation marks (and roman type) are often used when citing titles of articles in magazines, chapters in books, poems not published separately, and songs. (Titles of books and magazines are usually printed in italics in nonlegal citations.) See CITATION OF CASES.

K. Semicolon [;]. This mark separates those parts of a sentence between which there is a more distinct break than a comma can signal, but which are too closely connected to be made into separate sentences. Typically these will be clauses of similar importance and grammatical construction. E.g., "To err is human; to forgive, divine." (N.B.: The comma here flags the dropping of a word: is.)

L. Square Brackets ([ ]). These enclose comments, corrections, explanations, interpolations, notes, or translations that were not in the original text but have been added by subsequent authors, editors, or others. E.g., "My right honorable friend [John Smith] is mistaken."

In legal writing, brackets are customarily used for adjustments in quoted matter, such as making lowercase a letter that was uppercase in the source of the quotation ("The court stated that '[a]nother problem in determining the existence of apparent authority relates to the extent of the knowledge of the person invoking the doctrine.' ") or signifying an omission of an inflection in a word ("If the trustees 'fail[ ] to re-elect or re-employ the superintendent' without giving notice, his contract is automatically reviewable.").

This last use—bracketing empty space—should not supplant the ellipsis, as here: "The choice of [ ] forum [read choice of . . . forum] was made in an arm's-length negotiation . . . ." Snyder v Smith, 736 F.2d 409, 419 (7th Cir. 1984) (quoting The Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1, 12 (1972)).

For further inquiry, the following works are useful: Karen E. Gordon, The Well-Tempered Sentence: A Punctuation Handbook for the Innocent, the Eager, and the Doomed (1983); G.V. Carey, Mind the Stop (1977 ed.), Harry Shaw, Punctuate It Right! (1963); and Eric Partridge, You Have a Point There. A Guide to Punctuation and Its Allies (1953; repr. 1978).

punies. American trial lawyers use this shortened word as a slang for punitive damages—e.g.: "Klausner, who says he has at least six clients with whistleblower actions, says last week's ruling is terrific. 'It's great if you know you can get punies from a government agency.' " Henry Gottlieb, Whistleblower Punitives Allowed in Public Sector, N.J.L.J., 6 Dec. 1993, at 1 (quoting Stephen Klausner, a lawyer in Somerville, N.J.) / "[A] San Francisco County Superior Court jury awarded secretary Rena Weeks $6.9 million in punies from Baker & McKenzie—with 1,642 attorneys, the world's largest law firm—and $225,000 from rainmaker Martin Greenstein, whom Ms. Weeks had accused of unwanted sexual attention." Thom Weidlich, Baker Verdict Not Major Concern, Nat'l L.J., 19 Sept. 1994, at A6. Cf. punitives.

punishable. When used in reference to a person, punishable means "liable to punishment" <she is not legally punishable>. When used in reference to a crime, it means "entailing punishment" <an offense punishable by a $500 fine>. The latter sense—a good illustration of how HYPALLAGE works—is now the more common one.

punitive; punitory. Punitory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of punitive, a word much more common in legal than in nonlegal texts. These two forms are commonly used by those who practice INELEGANT VARIATION. E.g., "Florida cases follow the orthodox theory that punitive damages are punitory [read punitive] and deterrent." Even worse: "The law with respect to punitive damages is that in order to justify the infliction [read imposition?] of punitory damages [read punitive damages] for the commission of a tort, the act complained of must have been done wantonly or maliciously." Stenson v. Laclede Gas Co., 553 S.W.2d 309, 315 (Mo. Ct. App. 1977).

punitive damages; exemplary damages; vindictive damages; aggravated damages; retributory damages. The first two terms are by far the most common in both AmE and BrE. Each one tells only half the story, for the two-pronged rationale for awarding such damages in civil cases is (1) to punish the defendant, and (2) to make an example of the defendant so as to deter others. Exemplary damages appears to be the more usual phrase in BrE (although the CDL and the OCL mention only punishment as the basis), whereas in AmE the term punitive damages is slightly more frequent. (Colloquially, the phrase is sometimes shortened in AmE to punitives and even punies, qq.v.)

The other forms, sometimes used in strings (as in the following example), should be avoided as NEEDLESS VARIANTS. "Much has been written by the courts and by text writers upon the question whether punitive, vindictive, exemplary, aggravated, or retributory damages should be allowed in any case without reaching a generally accepted conclusion."/ "The question distinctly arises whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover punitive or vindictive damages against the defendants." See parasitic & smart money.

punitives, a shortened form of punitive damages, is a casualism—e.g.: "Not only that, Corboy wanted juries to concentrate on the compensatory damages, because that money was tax-free to the client (unlike punitives, which were taxed just like one huge paycheck) . . . " John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 369 (1989)./ "Richard B. Miller led the defense team that saw the jury award Pennzoil more than $7 billion in compensatory damages and another $3 billion in punitives." Pennzoil v. Texaco, Litig., Winter 1991, at 14, 14. Cf. punies & exemplaries.

punitory. See punitive.

PUNS. Plays on words—known popularly as puns and professorially as paronomasia—can add zest to writing if artfully used. Fowler and Bernstein have dispelled the notion that puns are the lowest form of wit. Bad puns, of course, create a bad impression in either speech or writing. But the well-wrought pun often serves to reinforce the point one is making. The good pun gives the sentence added meaning in both (or all) its senses, and it is not too obvious.

Puns seem increasingly popular in American legal prose. Some are good and some are not. The title of a law-review article by Robert P. Mosteller, Simplifying Subpoena Law: Taking the Fifth Amendment Seriously, 73 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1987), plays effectively on two English idioms, to take the Fifth Amendment and to take (something) seriously. Both senses fit the purpose of the article, hence the aptness of the pun. A more strained but nevertheless clever pun occurred to the federal appellate judge who wrote: "Ticonic's cloth cannot be cut to fit Interfirst's suit," Interfirst Bank v. FDIC, 777 F.2d 1092, 1097 (5th Cir. 1985) (discussing Ticonic Nat'l Bank v. Sprague, 303 U.S. 406 (1938)). Here suit carries the double sense, on the one hand, of completing the tailoring metaphor (cutting cloth for a suit) and, on the other hand, of denoting the lawsuit at issue. Yet another aesthetically pleasing pun is this subtle one from the pen of Justice Frankfurter: "The liability rests on the inroad [that] the automobile has made on the decision of Pennoyer v. Neff, . . . as it has on so many aspects of our social scene." Olberding v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 346 U.S. 338, 341 (1953). Ordinarily, of course, inroad is an abstract word, but Justice Frankfurter's placement of automobile near it gives the word a new and unexpected concrete sense; again, the pun is felicitous.

Chief Justice Rehnquist has used puns that would probably delight some readers and perturb others—depending entirely on their views on issues other than linguistic matters. One case, for example, involved several Indiana nightclubs that wanted to feature totally nude dancers. When Indiana officials began enforcing an indecentexposure statute requiring dancers to wear "pasties" and G-strings, several dancers sued to enjoin enforcement of the statute on First Amendment grounds. Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion upholding the statute concluded in this way: "It is without cavil that the public indecency statute is 'narrowly tailored'; Indiana's requirement that the dancers wear at least pasties and a G-string is modest, and the bare minimum necessary to achieve the state's purpose." Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560, 572 (1991) (emphasis added).

Probably half the puns one sees in modern legal writing, though, are the empty kind of wordplay in which one of the senses is inapposite or, at worst, gibberish. Some ill-wrought specimens:

- "The bells do not toll the statute of limitations while one ferrets out the facts." (The pun here is toll, which on the obvious level [bells . . . toll] means, nonsensically, "to ring"; the legal sense of toll, the one that gives meaning to the sentence, is "to abate." The pun in no way contributes to the sense; in fact, it is more likely to confuse than to enlighten.)
- "The official cannot hide behind a claim that the particular factual predicate in question has never appeared in haec verba in a reported opinion; if the application of settled principles to this factual tableau would inexorably lead to a conclusion of unconstitutionality, a prison official may not take solace in ostrachism." (Ostrachism here apparently means "the practice of hiding one's head in the sand," foreshadowed earlier in the sentence in the phrase hide behind a claim. The pun is on ostracism [= exclusion from association with another or others], but this near-homophone has nothing to do with the meaning of the sentence. Hence the writer has been at pains to create a punning NEOLOGISM whose suggestiveness bewilders, rather than charms, the reader.)

As Charles Lamb once observed, "A pun is not bound by the laws which limit nicer wit. It is a pistol let off at the ear; not a feather to tickle the intellect." "Popular Fallacies—. . . That the Worst Puns Are the Best," in Essays of Elia and Last Essays of Elia 306, 306–07 (1906). Still, in punning one must not abandon the intellect, for then one becomes a nuisance to the reader. Lamb also cautioned that puns sometimes show "much less wit than rudeness," adding: "We must take in the totality of time, place, and person." Id. at 308.

pur autre vie — a LAW FRENCH phrase meaning "for another's life"—is pronounced /pər-oh-tər-vee/. E.g., "The grantee of a life tenant generally took an estate pur autre vie, measured by the grantor's life, not the grantee's." 1 American Law of Property 124 (A.J. Casner ed., 1952). The phrase is sometimes spelled per autre vie.

purchase. A. Meaning Generally "to buy." In legal writing, the verb purchase commonly appears as an equivalent of buy. So used, purchase is a FORMAL WORD that most good editors would probably want to change to buy.

B. Special Legal Sense. Purchase = to acquire real property other than by descent. Thus, in very technical legal parlance, gifts are purchased by those who receive them. The following sentence conveys this special legal sense of the word (here as a noun): "Every legal mode of acquisition of real property except by descent is denominated in law a purchase, and the person who thus acquires it is a purchaser." This legal technicality appears also in the phrases words of purchase and take by purchase.

C. Choice of Preposition. The verb purchase may take from or of, though the latter form is an ARCHAISM. E.g., "Bunguss purchased of Blades the tract of land in controversy." See words of purchase, buy & descent (A).

purchase money. Two words as a noun phrase <the return of the purchase money>; hyphenated as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE <purchase-money resulting trust> <purchase-money mortgage>.

purchaser; purchasor. The former is the only correct spelling. Usually, purchaser can advantageously be made buyer. See purchase (A).

PURPLE PROSE, or ostentatious writing, has a certain fascination for some legal writers, as it does for any number of aspiring novelists. Good writing uses words; purple prose parades them. The danger is that, "unless the pen be guided by the hand of genius, there is apt to result a sacrifice of legal sense to purely artificial verbiage. . . . An ornate, pretentious, grandiose style, replete with superfluous frills and rhetorical extravagances, can act only as an undesirable distraction." Horace Stern, The Writing of Judicial Opinions, 18 Pa. B. Ass'n Q. 40, 42 (1947).

Similes are especially likely to turn purple. Whereas METAPHORS are quite acceptable in legal writing, SIMILES tend to signal overwriting: "Getting information on the judgment-debtor's assets was like working at a deep archeological dig."

Rarely can a short sentence turn purple, but this one comes as close as any: "A miniscule [sic] error must coalesce with gargantuan guilt, even where the accused displays an imagination of Pantagruelian dimensions." Chapman v. U.S., 547 F.2d 1240, 1250 (5th Cir. 1977).

Purple prose is seductive: it may skew the literary sensibilities especially of those who purport to be stylists, and is most common among those who fancy themselves masterly writers. To name three guilty parties, Norman Brand and John O. White, in their otherwise solid book Legal Writing: The Strategy of Persuasion 111–12 (1976), offer up as an example of a "well-written decision" the following, by Justice Carlin of New York:

> This case presents the ordinary man—that problem child of the law—in a most bizarre setting. As a lowly chauffeur in defendant's employ he became in a trice the protagonist in a breath-bating drama with a denouement almost tragic. It appears that a man, whose identity it would be indelicate to divulge[,] was feloniously relieved of his portable goods by two nondescript highwaymen in an alley near 26th Street and Third Avenue, Manhattan; they induced him to relinquish his possessions by a strong argument ad hominem couched in the convincing cant of the criminal and pressed at the point of a most persuasive pistol. Laden with their loot, but not thereby impeded, they took an abrupt departure and he, shuffling off the coil of that discretion which enmeshed him in the alley, quickly gave chase through 26th Street toward 2d Avenue, whither they were resorting "with expedition swift as thought" for most obvious reasons. Somewhere on that thoroughfare of escape they indulged the stratagem of separation ostensibly to disconcert their pursuer and allay the ardor of his pursuit. He then centered on for capture the man with the pistol whom he saw board the defendant's taxicab, which quickly veered south toward 25th Street on 2d Avenue where he saw the chauffeur jump out while the cab, still in motion, continued toward 24th Street; after the chauffeur relieved himself of the cumbersome burden of his fare the latter also is said to have similarly departed from the cab before it reached 24th Street . . . The chauffeur—the ordinary man in this case—acted in a split second in a most harrowing experience. To call him negligent would be to brand him coward; the court does not do so in spite of what those swaggering heroes, "whose valor plucks dead lions by the beard," may bluster to the contrary. The court is loathe [q.v.] to see the plaintiffs go without recovery even though their damages were slight, but cannot hold the defendant liable upon the facts adduced at the trial. Motions, upon which decision was reserved, to dismiss the complaint are granted with exceptions to plaintiffs. Judgment for defendant against plaintiffs dismissing their complaint upon the merits.
> Cordas v. Peerless Transp. Co., 27 N.Y.S.2d 198, 199, 202 (N.Y. City Ct. 1941).

This very opinion has been justly criticized for its purplishness in Ronald L. Goldfarb & James C. Raymond, Clear Understandings 142–43 (1982).

purport, n., = that which is conveyed or expressed, esp. by a formal document. As a noun, this term is now primarily a legal word (the verb to purport being common). E.g., "The circumstances of the publication must be such that either from the plain purport of what is published, or from the circumstances of the publication itself, the presumption of malice and injury is raised."/ "Other early decisions . . . are difficult to reconcile with the clear purport of Rule 12."

The verb—meaning "to profess or claim falsely" or "to seem to be"—is much more common—e.g.: "Hobart I. Arnold died leaving what purported to be a holographic will."/ "The result in this case ought to be intolerable in any society that purports to call itself an organized society."

purported, adj. = reputed, rumored. It does not mean "alleged," as here erroneously used: "There were many purported [read alleged] violations of the defendant's rights."

purpose, n. A. And object, n. A British writer suggests that purpose is more restricted than object. J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 16–17 (4th ed. 1945). That may be because object is more of a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD capable of bearing many meanings. But the two words are close synonyms in denoting "something one sets before oneself as a thing to be done; the end one has in view." In fact, the OED uses each word in defining the other.

B. And intention. Statutory drafters sometimes use purpose as if it were synonymous with intention. But, as Glanville Williams has observed, purpose ought not to include recklessness or a mere knowledge of probability, as intention generally does. See Textbook of Criminal Law 93 (1978). See intent(ion) (B).

purpose, v.t., = to set as a goal for oneself; to intend; to resolve. This FORMAL WORD is little used now in nonlegal contexts. Even in law it has a musty smell—e.g.: "Cardozo, as indicated, sees the case as presenting the purposed use of the car." Karl Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition: Deciding Appeals 434 (1960).

purposeful. See purposive.

purposely; purposefully. The former means "on purpose; intentionally"; the latter means "with a specific purpose in mind; with the idea of accomplishing a certain result."

Some writers fall into INELEGANT VARIATION with these words: "The State did not exceed its authority in defining the crime of murder as purposely causing the death of another with prior calculation or design. . . . [T]he jury's verdict reflects that none of her self-defense evidence raised a reasonable doubt about the State's proof that she purposefully [read purposely] killed with prior calculation and design." Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. 228, 233 (1987).

purposive; purposeful. Fowler and the OED editors objected to purposive as an ill-formed hybrid. Today, however, it is usefully distinguished in one sense from purposeful (= [1] having a purpose; or [2] full of determination). W10 records under purposive the sense "serving or effecting a useful function though not as a result of planning or design."

But in other senses it is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of purposeful, as in the following examples: "References to 'the purposive [read purposeful] use of ambiguity' are usually directed to the purposive [read purposeful] use of vagueness or generality."/ "There is ample evidence in this case of the correlation between municipal service disparities and racially tainted purposiveness [read purposefulness] to mandate a finding of discriminatory intent."

pursuance of, in. See pursuant to.

pursuant to = (1) in accordance with; (2) under; (3) as authorized by; or (4) in carrying out. Because the phrase means so many things, it is rarely—if ever—useful. Lawyers are nearly the only ones who use the phrase, and they often use it imprecisely. Following are some well-taken edits:

- "Appellant is a state prisoner incarcerated in the Louisiana State Penitentiary in Angola, Louisiana, pursuant to [read for] a 1964 aggravated rape conviction."
- "Pursuant to [read Under] the mandate of the Supreme Court in Escondido, the decision of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to grant a license in these proceedings is reversed."
- "The petitioners bring this petition pursuant to [read under] the provisions of the Infants Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 196." (Can.)
- "Prior to the execution of both the aforementioned letters, the County Court of Woodward County issued an order to disburse funds pursuant to an application authorizing payment [delete italicized language] of $33.00 per month . . . ." Western State Hosp. v. Stoner, 614 P.2d 59, 64 (Okla. 1980).

British legal writers often use in pursuance of—e.g.: "Notice was therefore given to the plaintiffs that after May 2, 1972, the council would, under and in pursuance of section 15 of the Act of 1936, by their contractor proceed to construct the sewer." (Eng.) /"[S]ervices [were] rendered in pursuance of that request . . " William R. Anson, Principles of the Law of Contract 152 (Arthur L. Corbin ed., 3d Am. ed. 1919). This usage was formerly common in the U.S.

Partridge was wrong to call this phrase "OFFICIALESE for after." Usage and Abusage 257 (1973). It may be officialese, but it does not, ordinarily, mean "after." Still, at least one American lawyer has privately admitted making the mistake of treating the phrase as an antonym of prior to. See under.

pursuer; defender. These are the names equivalent to plaintiff and defendant in Scots and canon law. E.g., "My Lords, the pursuers supply to local authorities litter bins which are placed in the streets. The defender carried on a garage in Clydebank and in 1954 he made an agreement with the pursuers . . . ." (Scot.)

purview. In the context of STATUTE DRAFTING, this neglected word denotes the body of a statute following the preamble, traditionally beginning with the language, Be it enacted that . . . . It was therefore an easy extension in meaning that gave purview its most common sense today (i.e., "scope; area of application")—a sense that borders on CLICHÉ. "The Hughes Court held that the right to dissent, protest, and march for that purpose was within the purview of the First Amendment." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 5 (1970).

put, n.; call, n. Put is often used as a noun in securities law in the sense "an option to sell securities." E.g., "'Puts' and automatic buybacks at the same price should be avoided."/ "Although the uncertainty in Murchison's engagement to develop a potentially more lucrative put option may evidence an intent not to contract, we cannot say that the agreement lacks sufficient definiteness on that ground alone." In such contexts, put is usually contrasted with call (= an option to buy securities).

put, v.t., often means either (1) "to hypothesize for purposes of illustration" <in the case put>; or (2) "to argue (a case)" <even bishops appeared in court personally to put their cases>.

put another way. See to put it another way.

putative = supposed, believed, reputed. E.g., "The facts of causation were in the control of the putative defendant but unavailable to the plaintiff or at least very difficult to obtain." Putative marriage, a term originally from canon law, denotes a marriage that, though legally invalid, was contracted in good faith by at least one of the parties. E.g., "The court of civil appeals held that the putative wife's knowledge of pending divorce involving the husband terminated the putative marriage."/ "A putative marriage is one into which one or both spouses enter in good faith but which is invalid because of an existing impediment."

put on = (1) to call (a person) as a witness; or (2) to adduce (evidence)—e.g.: (Sense 1) "If a man has a record, you just don't put him on the stand. Put on his wife, his brother, his father and mother, but don't let him take the stand." Aubrey Holmes, The Wake of a Lawyer 51 (1960)./ (Sense 2) "'We just put on the evidence and went ahead without him,' said Assistant District Attorney Tom D'Amore . . . ." Melvin Belli, Courts Specialize in Drugs, Dallas Morning News, 1 July 1990, at 33A.

put oneself upon the country (= to demand a jury trial) is an ARCHAISM that still occasionally appears in modern defense pleadings. For an explanation of its common-law origins, see country.

put option. See put.

putrefy; putrify. The latter is a misspelling.

put to one's law. At common law, this phrase meant "to compel a person to undergo a judicial test, such as compurgation, ordeal, or combat." Magna Carta (1215), for example, contains a provision that states: "Let no bailiff be able to put any one to his law by his own simple word without credible witnesses." More modernly, the phrase means "to put a person to trial."

pyramiding inferences, rule against. This rule, followed in some jurisdictions, prohibits a fact-finder from piling one inference on another to arrive at a conclusion. But it is a confusing and unhelpful metaphor, as Judge John Minor Wisdom has aptly observed: "The so-called rule against pyramiding inferences, if there really is such a 'rule' and if it is anything more than an empty pejorative, is simple legalese fustian to cover a clumsy exclusion of evidence having little or no probative value." NLRB v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d 803, 811 (5th Cir. 1965). Other leading authorities likewise cast doubt on it: "Whatever the vitality of the supposed rule against pyramiding inferences, it ought not to be taken as forbidding the use of one presumption as the mechanism for establishing the basic fact of another." 21 Charles A. Wright & Kenneth W. Graham, Jr., Federal Practice and Procedure § 5125, at 603 (1977). See LEGALESE.

Q.B.D. = Queen's Bench Division. See Queen's Bench.

Q.C. = Queen's Counsel. A. Plural Form. Though some writers make the plural form Q.C.s, the better form is Q.C.'s.

B. Punctuation with. When the title appears in midsentence, a comma goes before and after it: "I hereby authorize Donald W. Zee, Q.C., to enter an appearance on behalf of the infant defendant."

Some writers omit the periods in this abbreviation—e.g.: "If a client wants to employ a Queen's Counsel or senior barrister, he must also employ—at two-thirds the QC's fee—a junior barrister as well." Anthony Sampson, Anatomy of Britain 149 (1962). The prevailing style—in BrE and AmE alike—is to include the periods.

Q.E.D. is the abbreviation for quod erat demonstrandum (= which was to be proved or demonstrated).

Q.E.F. is the abbreviation for quod erat faciendum (= which was to be done).

qq.v. See quod vide.

qua (= in the capacity of; as; in the role of) is often misused and is little needed in English. "The real occasion for the use of qua," wrote Fowler, "occurs when a person or thing spoken of can be regarded from more than one point of view or as the holder of various coexistent functions, and a statement about him (or it) is to be limited to him in one of these aspects" (MEU1 at 477). Fowler's example of a justifiable use of the term is this: "Qua lover he must be condemned for doing what qua citizen he would be condemned for not doing." This proper use of the term is seldom seen today, esp. in AmE.

One is hard-pressed to divine any purpose but rhetorical emphasis in the examples following: "We seek simply to keep the government, qua government, neutral with respect to any religious controversy."/ "The question of res, qua res, causes us no difficulty."/ "The only immunities in an official-capacity action are forms of sovereign immunity that the entity, qua entity, may possess."

Nor do most unemphatic modern uses justify the choice of qua over as. Indeed, these are the very types of uses that Fowler rightly objected to: "Hudspeth can challenge the FSLIC's behavior qua [read as] receiver before the FHLBB and, if unsatisfied, can seek judicial review under the APA."/ "Qua [read To test its claim as a] patent, we should at least have to decide, as tabula rasa, whether the design or machine was a new and required invention."/ "The right of fair comment, though shared by the public, is the right of every individual who asserts it, and is, qua [read as claimed by] him, an individual right whatever name it be called by, and comment by him which is coloured by malice cannot from his standpoint be deemed fair." (Eng.)

quadrennial; quadriennial. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

quaere;* query. Quaere is the Latin word meaning "question." The original form of query, quaere is now but a NEEDLESS VARIANT in any sense other than a technical one: it is sometimes appended or prefixed to doubtful statements. E.g., "Whether a plea in abatement is not the proper mode of defense when the facts relied on do not appear of record, quaere." Engelke & Feiner Milling Co. v. Grunthal, 35 So. 17, 18 (Fla. 1903).

The term is used occasionally in modern writing: "Quaere, whether the bank would have been allowed . . . to plead a Section 7426 counterclaim." U.S. v. National Bank of Commerce, 726 F.2d 1292, 1298 (8th Cir. 1984)./ "One can affix one's signature to a document by writing thereon, and one can affix one sheet of paper to another with a staple or sticky tape; but quaere as to a paper clip." Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1969 (1985).

Using quaere for query is precious—e.g.: "The decision on these two quaeries [read queries] . . . will render moot the necessity for a discussion of the Government's remaining contentions . . . ." U.S. v. Certain Parcels of Land, 67 F. Supp. 780, 789 (S.D. Cal. 1946). The form quere is a misspelling.

quai. See quay.

qualified fee = fee simple defeasible. See fee simple (E).

qualifiedly (= in a qualified fashion) is an adverb that often ought to be made back into an adjective—e.g.: "Although the sheriff is not qualifiedly privileged, [read Although the sheriff has no qualified privilege], the summary judgment was entered in favor of the parish and not the sheriff." Unfortunately, adverbs in -edly are unqualifiedly fashionable in modern legal writing. See -EDLY.

QUALIFIERS, PREEMPTIVE. See ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE

qualit(at)ive. The longer form is preferred. The adjective corresponds to quality in the sense of character or nature, not in the sense of merit or excellence. See quality. Cf. quanti(ta)tive.

quality, adj., meaning "of high quality" is a VOGUE WORD and a casualism . One is better advised to use good or fine or some other mundane adjective that is not branded as a cant term.

quamdiu se bene gesserint (= for as long as they behave themselves) is so spelled. This LATINISM, apparently introduced in the Act of Settlement of 1700, has traditionally been used in the appointment of judges for life, but today we use the sensible English-language equivalent: during good behavior. See good behavior.

quandary—a word of unknown origin—refers to a mental state of perplexity or confusion. E.g., "[T]he juror was left in a quandary as to whether to follow that instruction or the immediately preceding one it contradicted." Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 324 (1985)./ "Meanwhile, the trial courts have rendered divergent judicial interpretations of the attorney-client privilege and thereby created a quandary for patent agents and their clients." James J. Merek & David A. Guth, The Attorney-Client Privilege and U.S. Patent Agents: A Workable Rule for Protecting Communications, 76 J. Pat. & Trademark Off. Soc'y 591, 594 (1994).

As a result of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, however, the word is often misapplied as if it referred to a difficult problem, dilemma, or enigma detached from any state of mind—e.g.:

- "[W]hile Exxon's definition accords more readily with everyday notions of 'natural gas,' these notions do not, without more, resolve the definitional quandary [read problem]." Exxon Corp. v. Lujan, 970 F.2d 757, 760 (10th Cir. 1992).
- "The quandary [read difficulty or problem] in this case is that case law has combined and shuffled the definitions of domicile, bona fide residence, legal residence and residence into a mix that resulted in the declaration by the court in In re Ozias' Estate . . . that residence and domicile are interchangeable and synonymous." Genrich v. Williams, 869 S.W.2d 209, 210 (Mo. Ct. App. 1993).

- "Crucial medical facts . . . would be presented, the shape of the ethical quandary [read problem or dilemma] would be sketched, and the care provider's position clarified." John D. Arras, Principles and Particularity: The Role of Cases in Bioethics, 69 Ind. L.J. 983, 987 (1994).

quanta. See quantum.

quantificational. See quanti(ta)tive.

quantify; quantitate. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT newly popular with social scientists, whose choice of terms has never been a strong recommendation for the use of those terms.

quanti(ta)tive. The preferred form is quantitative, not quantitive. Variants such as quantificational should be avoided. Cf. qualit(at)ive.

quantity (usu. "portion, amount") is used by legal theorists in a sense borrowed from logic: "the extent in which a term in a given logical proposition is to be taken" (W3). E.g., "While, no doubt, in the great majority of cases no harm results from the use of such expressions, yet these forms of statement seem to represent a blending of non-legal and legal quantities which, in any problem requiring careful reasoning, should preferably be kept distinct."/ "If, however, the problem is analyzed, it will be seen that as of primary importance, the grantor has two legal quantities: the privilege of entering and the power, by means of such entry, to divest the estate of the grantee."

The OED notes that quantity in the sense "length or duration of time" exists now only in the legal phrase quantity of estate <the quantity of estate is 99 years>.

quantum, a favorite word of lawyers and judges, means "amount; share, portion; the required, desired, or allowed amount." Ordinarily in legal writing it appears as an inflated synonym of amount—e.g.: "The agent had been given that quantum [read amount] of reliable information necessary to application of the collective knowledge doctrine."/ "Although incarceration immediately following conviction is disadvantageous, it does not change the quantum [read amount] of punishment attached to the offense."/ "The only question remaining, then, is the quantum [read amount] and value of the commercially recoverable reserves."/ "My Lords, it is well established that in considering questions as to the quantum [read amount] of damages that have been awarded, the approach of an appellate court must differ according to whether the assessment has been by a judge or by a jury." (Eng.)

Occasionally the word causes problems in sense. The term should not be used for degree, as here: "The injury suffered by Lyons was several quanta [read degrees] greater than Raley's." And the writer should beware of creating a MISCUE by pairing it with amount—e.g.: "The consequences of that failure will amount to [read determine] the quantum of the compensation he will have to pay." See VERBAL AWARENESS.

The only accepted plural of this word is quanta. The erroneous form quantums is occasionally seen. E.g., "Without regard to the number of rungs that appellant may climb on an appellate ladder, if minimum evidentiary quantums [read quanta] have been satisfied, the American tradition generally does not permit a reviewing court to disturb findings of facts." This foreign plural is one of the exceptions to the general rule enunciated in the entry PLURALS (A). Following are examples of the correct plural. "There is a difference in the quanta and modes of proof required to establish guilt and probable cause."/ "Absent hard data, I would rather err on the side of receiving little additional benefit from imposing additional quanta of liability than err by adhering to Robins's inequitable rule."

quantum meruit; quantum valeba(n)t. These counts were used at common law by pleaders in suits in assumpsit, and they are still used today. Quantum meruit = the reasonable value of services; quantum valebant = the reasonable value of goods and materials. Quantum meruit means literally "as much as he or she had earned," and shows no signs of waning in legal use. The term, however, "is ambiguous; it may mean (1) that there is a contract 'implied in fact' to pay the reasonable value of the services, or (2) that, to prevent unjust enrichment, the claimant may recover on a quasi-contract (an 'as if' contract) for that reasonable value." Martin v. Campanaro, 156 F.2d 127, 130 n.5 (2d Cir. 1946).

The distinction between quantum meruit and quantum valeba(n)t is that the former (often termed quasi-contract) is used of an action to recover for services that the plaintiff has performed, and the latter is used to recover for the value of goods that the plaintiff has supplied without a price having been set. E.g., "Although such fees are recoverable in an action based on quantum meruit or valebant, no attorneys' fees are recoverable if the quantum meruit or valebant claim is an insignificant part of the relief sought by a party." See quasi-contract.

Quantum valebant and quantum valebat both appear in the cases; and both are correct Latin: quantum valebant means "as much as they were worth," whereas quantum valebat means "as much as it was worth." Hence the choice is between using the singular or plural Latin construction. As a matter of usage, valebant predominates among American legal writers who use the phrase, and valebat among British legal writers. (Scots lawyers tend to use quantum valeat [= as much as it may be worth].) But gradually the phrases are falling into disuse.

quare clausum fregit (= whereas he or she has broken the close) is often the short form for trespass quare clausum fregit, which is the technical term for unlawfully entering land that is visibly enclosed. See trespass.

quash = (1) to suppress or subdue; to crush out, beat into pieces; or (2) to annul; to make void (as a writ or indictment); to put an end to (as legal proceedings). Sense (2) is the more frequent legal meaning: "Their petition for writ of certiorari was granted on December 11, 1980, but was subsequently quashed for lack of prosecution."

In AmE, a motion to quash is usu. a motion to nullify a writ or subpoena. In BrE, by contrast, quash has broader uses. For example, an indictment or a conviction may be said to be quashed—e.g.: "[T]he indictment can and must be quashed." Patrick Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 102 (1960)./ "[T]he Court of Appeal Criminal Division unanimously quashed a conviction where the jury foreman had announced that the conviction was agreed to by ten of the jury but failed to state that two had dissented!" Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 95 (2d ed. 1985). Though convictions are quashed in BrE, lower-court decisions are said to be reversed, and jury verdicts are set aside. See set aside (A).

quashal, the American noun corresponding to the verb to quash, is recorded in no major English-language dictionary. Yet it is fairly common in legal writing in the U.S. <quashal of the writ>, and it is useful.

The word first appeared in the late 19th century—e.g.: "[Y]et the judgment might . . . have been put there nunc pro tunc, even during the pending of the motion, with the effect of removing the ground of quashal . . . ." Adams v. Higgins, 1 So. 321, 324 (Fla. 1887)./ "When the appellate proceeding is irregular, . . . the policy of our statutes as to a regular hearing on the merits in due course of procedure is not contravened by a quashal or summary disposition . . . ." Holland v. Webster, 29 So. 625, 630 (Fla. 1901) (Mabry, J., dissenting)./ "It is urged by relator as his grounds for quashal, that the opinion of the Court of Appeals is in conflict with [another] case . . . ." Mergenthaler Linotype Co. v. Davis, 251 U.S. 256, 258 (1920).

Since those early uses of the word, of course, it has come to be used occasionally in most American jurisdictions. E.g., "Like the quashal of the subpoena, this injunctive relief was related to the central purpose of a proceeding that is essentially criminal in nature." Lee v. Johnson, 799 F.2d 31, 42 (3d Cir. 1986) (Becker, J., dissenting). Fowler might find fault with its formation in -al, but the etymon is appropriately Latin and there appears to be no serviceable alternative. Even if there were, quashal has taken hold.

quasi—pronounced /kwah-zee/ or /kway-zI/—means "as if; seeming or seemingly; in the nature of; nearly." It has been called "senseless jargon" by an 18th-century judge and "that ancient question-beggar" by a 20th-century legal theorist (Lon Fuller). Corbin wrote sensibly (though not quite idiomatically) of quasi: "The term quasi is introduced as a weasel word that sucks all the meaning of [read from] the word that follows it; but this is a fact the reader seldom realizes." Corbin on Contracts 27 (1st ed. 1952). See WEASEL WORDS.

Maine, by contrast, wrote idiomatically but took a great many words to say merely that quasi signals a strained (though not violently strained) analogy:

> This word 'quasi,' prefixed to a term of Roman law, implies that the conception to which it serves as an index is connected with the conception (being compared, and that) the comparison is instituted by a strong superficial analogy or resemblance. It does not denote that the two conceptions are the same or that they belong to the same genus. On the contrary, it negatives the notion of an identity between them, but it points out that they are sufficiently similar for one to be classed as the sequel to the other . . .
> Henry S. Maine, Ancient Law 286 (17th ed. 1901, repr. [New Universal Lib.] 1905, 1910).

In legal writing, quasi should generally appear as a hyphenated prefix. E.g., "Damages being insufficient, quasi-specific performance should be awarded in order to remedy the wrong."/ "We can hardly fail to recognize that for this purpose, and as between them, the news must be regarded as quasi-property, irrespective of the rights of either as against the other."/ "In such cases the communication is classified as privileged or quasi-privileged in the law."

The term has been prefixed to any number of adjectives and nouns, such as the following:

quasi-compulsory quasi-contract (q.v.)
quasi-contractual quasi-corporation

quasi-criminal quasi-delict quasi-domicile quasi-estoppel quasi-heir quasi-judge quasi-judicial quasi-larceny quasi-legal quasi-legislation quasi-legislative quasi-monopoly quasi-negotiable quasi-possession quasi-proprietary quasi-public quasi-remainder quasi-rent quasi-right quasi-rule quasi-theft quasi-tort

quasi-contract; contract implied in law. The terms are now regarded as synonymous in referring not to a contract at all, but to the FICTION necessary to promote justice by preventing unjust enrichment. See U.S v. Neidorf, 522 F.2d 916, 919 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1087 (1976). Some writers express a strong preference for the phrase quasi-contract: "What is best called quasi-contract our lawyers call contract implied in law, though there is no agreement." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 63 (1945). See implied contract.

The irony, of course, is that whichever name one chooses, the thing being described is not a contract at all: "Quasi-contracts are a heterogeneous collection of cases [that] themselves have little more in common than the fact that one person is held obliged to restore or pay for some benefit received from another in order that a just result should be reached in the circumstances of the case." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 35 (3d ed. 1981). See promissory estoppel (A), assumpsit, quantum meruit & unjust enrichment.

The phrase quasi-contract should be hyphenated.

quasi-domicile. See domicil(e) (C).

quasi ex contractu = (1) as if from a contract; or (2) in the nature of quasi-contract. E.g., "Surely, if a man is bona fide obliged to refund whatever money he has unlawfully received, an implied question is thereby raised, quasi ex contractu." See ex contractu* & quasi-contract.

quaternary, adj. & n., is often misspelled quartenary. The adjective means "consisting of four parts," the noun "a set of four things." quay; quai. the first spelling is preferred.

que, in the phrases cestui que trust and cestui que use, is pronounced /kee/ or /kə/, not /kyoo/.

Queen. See King & R.

queen regnant; queen regent; queen consort; queen dowager. Queen regnant denotes a queen who rules in her own right. Queen regent denotes a queen who rules on behalf of another, such as a child king. Queen consort denotes the wife of a reigning king. And queen dowager denotes the widow of a deceased king. The plural forms are queens regnant, queens regent, and queens consort.

Queen's Bench. At common law, the Court of Queen's Bench was one of three central courts that administered different branches of the law; it issued prerogative writs to inferior courts and public officers, heard trespass cases as well as some personal actions, and had appellate jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases by writ of error. In 1875, when the English court system was reorganized, the Queen's Bench Division became one of the five divisions composing the High Court of Justice. Then, in 1880, two other divisions—Common Pleas and Exchequer—were merged into the Queen's Bench Division, which today hears actions founded on contract or tort, applications for judicial review, and some appeals from magistrates' courts. For more on the High Court, see high court.

Queen's Counsel. See Q.C. & silk.

Queen's evidence, to turn. See turn state's evidence.

querist. See questioner.

querulous (= apt to complain; whining) is a MALAPROPISM when used for query-like. E.g., "His statement was querulous; that is, it was framed as a question." [Read His statement was framed as a question.] quere; query. See quaere.

questionary. See questionnaire.

question (as to) whether; question (of) whether. The best phrasing is question whether—e.g.:

- "[I]f a person is accused of murder the question whether he was or was not legally responsible for the death may be intended to raise the issue whether the death was too remote a consequence of his acts for them to count as its cause." H.L.A. Hart, "Postscript: Responsibility and Retribution," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 210, 220 (1968). On issue whether, see issue (B).
- "This leaves the question whether there are any impersonal or institutional measures available that may serve as a kind of prophylaxis against the introduction of distortions into the law at the level of enforcement." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 37 (1968).
- "The real difference between the majority and the dissentients in Maunsell v. Olins was over the question whether there was an ambiguity." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 145 (1976).

The phrases question as to whether and question of whether are common prolixities. Examples of question as to whether are legion in the prose of lawyers and judges—e.g.: "The question sometimes arises as to whether [read arises whether] today a man may by a conveyance to himself and his wife create a tenancy by the entirety."/ "The question as to whether [read question whether] the equitable defense of unclean hands applies as a defense to a legal action appears to be one of first impression."

Even where question means "doubt," the preferred form is question whether: "There is some question as to whether [read question whether] the defendant could be held personally liable."

The only context in which question as to whether might be justified is where an intervening phrase might cause an ambiguity or awkwardness: "There may be a question of statutory interpretation as to whether this 'consent' comprehends only those actions done within the state or is broad enough to cover all personal actions."

The other common prolixity is question of whether—e.g.: "The answer to the question of whether [read question whether] the state courts of Ohio are open to a proceeding in personam rests entirely upon the law of Ohio."/ "Without mentioning the question of whether [read question whether] an adequate remedy at law was available, we have held that rights similar to those of the plaintiff in this case may be enforced by actions in the nature of specific performance." Yet question of whether is preferred when one uses the idiom it is a question of . . . , as in "a question of ethics" or "a question of materiality"—e.g.: "It is a question of whether the defendant is passing off his goods as those of the plaintiff."

question-begging is the adjectival form of the phrase begging the question. The phrase is commonly found in the writing of dissenting judges—e.g.: "Until this case I would have agreed with the majority's repeated, but question-begging assertion that the contours of the Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause are identical to those of Missouri's face-to-face guarantee, but only because I had not imagined, and this Court had not faced, a statutory procedure that so clearly abrogates a constitutional guarantee." State v. Naucke, 829 S.W.2d 445, 465 (Mo. 1992) (Robertson, C.J., dissenting)./ "Indeed, Justice Brickley's conclusion that, since there is no evidence that Juillet was a drug dealer, the only reason for his 'delivery of drugs' was Bleser's incessant requests, . . . is classical question-begging." People v. Juillet, 475 N.W.2d 786, 817 (Mich. 1991) (Boyle, J., concurring in part & dissenting in part). See begging the question.

questioner; querist. The former is the ordinary, more natural term.

questionnaire; questionary. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

question (of) whether. See question (as to) whether.

quia timet (lit., "because he or she fears") denotes a legal doctrine under which a party seeks equitable relief because of a concern over future probable injury to certain rights or interests. Quia timet often forms a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE; when it does, the words ought to be hyphenated <quia-timet injunction>.

quick originally meant "alive," as in the surviving phrase the quick and the dead, used by one judge to turn a nice phrase: "There are only two conduits, the statute of wills and intestate succession, by which the transmission of property and estate to the quick from the dead may be effected."

Up to the 19th century, quick was used as an equivalent of live or alive in general contexts, as in the "Apostles' Creed": "From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead." Here is a specimen from 1865: "The defendant then proved that Dygert was arrested January 2, 1862, and held to bail upon a criminal warrant charging him with the criminal offense of assisting in procuring an abortion of a quick child upon the person of the plaintiff, at Ilion, July 5, 1861." Today this usage would be an affected ARCHAISM.

The illogical phrase quick with child—referring to a pregnant woman—began in the 15th century as an inversion of the strictly logical phrase, with quick child. The OED labels the phrase "rare or obsolete," but naturally legal writers continue to use it: "A woman is 'quick with child' . . . after she has felt the child alive within her." Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law 100 (1957).

quid pro quo (= this for that; tit for tat) is a useful LATINISM, for the only English equivalent of this LATINISM is tit for tat, which is unsuitable in formal contexts. "The settlor seeking to revoke or modify the trust may supplement his appeal to equity with a quid pro quo offered to the heirs for their consent."/ "Assumpsit would lie in any case in which there was a promise to pay a sum certain upon receipt of a benefit (the quid pro quo)." The word exchange does not quite capture the right sense.

Quid pro quo is wrongly used in the following example: "The employer's liability under the act is made exclusive to counterbalance the imposition of absolute liability; there is no comparable quid pro quo [read no comparable balancing] in the relationship between the employer and third persons."

The best plural is quid pro quos; quids pro quos is a pedantic alternative. Quids pro quo is incorrect—a good example of HYPERCORRECTION.

quiescence; quiescency. The -ce form is standard, quiescency being a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Quiesence is a fairly common misspelling. See, e.g., Alison A. Clarke, Note, State Legislation Denying Subsistence Benefits to Undocumented Aliens, 61 Tex. L. Rev. 859, 866 (1983).

quiet, adj. In the so-called covenant for quiet enjoyment, the word quiet means "free from disturbance" or "peaceful," not merely "free from noise." Plucknett equates quiet enjoyment with seisin (q.v.): "If A unjustly and without a judgement disseised B of his free tenement, then it seemed reasonable that B should be restored to the enjoyment of his property upon satisfactory proof, first, that he was in quiet enjoyment (that is to say, seised), and secondly, that A had turned him out." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 358 (5th ed. 1956).

quiet, v.t.; quieten. The preferred verb form is quiet, as in the phrase to quiet title. E.g., "The same issue may be presented in other types of litigation such as a suit to quiet title."/ "The assignee of an automobile conditional sales contract sued to quiet title."/ "That was an action to recover possession of land, and to quiet title." Chiefly a Britishism, quieten was considered a superfluous word by the great British writer on usage, H.W. Fowler; it is to be avoided.

Adjectivally, the phrase quiet title is hyphenated: "In the earlier quiet-title case in which the government's conduct was found to be unreasonable, the 'innocent spouse' issue was raised." Sliwa v. Commissioner, 839 F.2d 602, 610 (9th Cir. 1988).

quietus /kwI-ee-təs/ forms the plural quietuses.

qui facit per alium facit per se. See MAXIMS.

quiritary; quiritarian. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former term, which means "in accordance with Roman civil law; legal, as opposed to equitable."

quit = (1) to stop; or (2) to leave. For sense (1), the past tense is quit <the defendant then quit making the harassing phone calls>. For sense (2), the past tense is quitted. E.g., "It must now be considered clear law that a person who wrongfully or maliciously interrupts the relation subsisting between master and servant by harbouring and keeping him as servant after he has quitted it and during the time stipulated for as the period of service, commits a wrongful act for which he is responsible at law." (Eng.)/ "These authorities and practices were to the effect that alimony decreed to a wife would be enforced by a writ of ne exeat, but only to the extent of arrears actually due, against a husband before he quitted the realm."

qui tam [L. "who as well"] = an action under a statute that allows a private person to sue for a penalty, part of which the government or some specified public institution will receive. Etymologically speaking, the plaintiff is a suitor "who as well" sues for the state. E.g., "The False Claims Act . . . includes provisions allowing private citizens to bring civil suits on behalf of the government. They're based on a principle called qui tam . . ." Rick Wartzman & Paul Barrett, For Whistle-Blowers, Tune May Change, Wall St. J., 27 Sept. 1989, at B1./ "A statutory qui tam action is one brought against a public official to recover [441] a penalty (treble damages) for the commission of injurious acts or for a failure to act in obedience to some duty." State v. Town of Canute, 858 P.2d 436, 440–41 (Okla. 1993) (Opala, J., dissenting).

Qui tam lawsuits originated in the 13th century—when private persons would seek to protect the King's interest—and were embodied in statutes during the 15th century. In the U.S., qui tam lawsuits have "been in existence . . . ever since the foundation of our government." Marvin v. Trout, 199 U.S. 212, 225 (1905). They are usually reported as being in the name of the government ex rel. (= on the relation of) the private citizen. See ex rel.

quitclaim, vb. & adj. [L.F. "to proclaim free"]. Quitclaim, v.t., = (1) to renounce or give up (a claim or right); or (2) to convey all one's interest in (property) to whatever extent one has an interest. These senses are closely related, sense (2) having grown out of sense (1). Today, sense (2) is the most usual one—e.g.:

- "[This] tract of land [was] quitclaimed by R.E. Janes to R.E. Janes Gravel Co . . . ." Thompson v. Janes, 245 S.W.2d 718, 723 (Tex. Civ. App.—Austin 1952).
- "The Objectors fail to recognize that those 200 landowners are not part of this class since USRV quitclaimed any interests to those rights-of-way prior to this action, and those landowners may pursue any possible claims independent from this action." Hefty v. All Other Members of the Certified Settlement Class, 638 N.E.2d 1284, 1292 (Ind. Ct. App. 1994).
- "The record reveals that Raymond quitclaimed the property to Esther on September 10, 1990." Ross v. Ross, 638 N.E.2d 1301, 1303 (Ind. Ct. App. 1994).
- "Hocherl subsequently quitclaimed her interest in the ranch to Pete Stampter." Sandstrom v. Sandstrom, 880 P.2d 103, 104 (Wyo. 1994).

Occasionally the verb is used intransitively—e.g.: "[T]he undersigned hereby remises, releases and forever quitclaims unto [plaintiff], all right, title and interest of the undersigned in and to the [adjoining] property." Davis v. Nelson, 880 S.W.2d 658, 663 (Mo. Ct. App. 1994) (quoting release).

The traditional way of quitclaiming property is to convey all of one's "right, title, and interest." See right, title, and interest.

The word quitclaim—formerly two words, then hyphenated, and now invariably one word—functions as an adjective as well, usually in the phrase quitclaim deed. E.g., "Northrup had previously conveyed all her right, title and interest in The Strip to the Wallaces by virtue of the 1962 quitclaim deed referenced above." Cloer Land Co. v. Wright, 858 P.2d 110, 112 (Okla. Ct. App. 1993)./ "Two years later, while the parties were still separated but not yet divorced, Mr. Clark prepared, executed and delivered to Mrs. Clark a quitclaim deed which said that he was conveying to Mrs. Clark 'all of [his] right, title, and interest' in the house they had purchased." Clark v. Clark, 644 A.2d 449, 450 (D.C. Ct. App. 1994).

Occasionally, it even functions as a noun, as a shortened form of quitclaim deed—e.g.: "[B]ecause Campbell's conveyance was only by quitclaim and transferred only whatever 'right, title, and interest' he had in 1960, Campbell's heirs have a claim to their proportionate share of the land in question." Rogers v. Ricane Enterprises, Inc., 884 S.W.2d 763, 769 n.5 (Tex. 1994).

quite = (1) entirely, completely; (2) very; or (3) fairly, moderately. Sense (3) occurs in BrE only, in which the word has undergone pejoration. To say that something is quite good is a compliment in AmE but nearly the opposite in BrE: "Some years ago I was hired by an American bank. I received a letter from the head of human resources that started: 'Dear John, I am quite pleased that you have decided to join us.' That 'quite' cast a cloud. Then I discovered that in American English 'quite' does not mean 'fairly' but 'very.'" John Mole, Body Language of World Business, Sunday Times, 8 July 1990, at 6-1.

quittance = (1) the discharge from a debt or obligation; or (2) the document serving as evidence of the discharge. For the related word acquittance, see acquittal.

quitter; quittor. For "one who quits," quitter is preferred. Quittor = an inflammation of the feet, usu. in horses.

quoad (= as regards; with regard to) is a LATINISM that is easily Englished. E.g., "It seems to me that, if anything, this was a case of wilful refusal; invincible repugnance is a lack of capacity quoad [read as regards or with regard to] this man." (Eng.) The term often appears in the phrase quoad hoc (= with regard to this). E.g., "When a justice undertakes the issuing of a warrant of arrest which commands and secures the arrest, and possibly the imprisonment, of the person charged, he quoad hoc [omit quoad hoc, which is superfluous] acts ministerially."

quo animo (lit., "with what intention or motive"), an arcane LATINISM, is used by some legal writers as an equivalent of animus, q.v. "Such acts are against the express declarations of the quo animo." Those legal writers are, happily, becoming rarer.

The correct use of the phrase is not as a noun, but as an adverb—e.g.: "Indeed, once it is established that a payment has been accepted as rent, which is a question of fact, waiver results as a matter of law, and the question of quo animo [i.e., with what intention] the payment was accepted is irrelevant." Peter Butt, Land Law 284 (2d ed. 1988). Even this use, though, is questionable in modern writing.

QUOTATIONS. A. Use of Quoted Material. The deft and incidental use of quotations is a rare art. Legal writers—especially the bad ones—are apt to quote paragraph after paragraph in block quotations (see B). Those who do this abrogate their duty, namely, to write. Readers tend to skip over single-spaced mountains of prose, knowing how unlikely it is that so much of a previous writer's material pertains directly to the matter at hand. Especially to be avoided is quoting another writer at the end of a paragraph or section, a habit infused with laziness. The skillful quoter subordinates the quoted material to his or her own prose and uses only the most clearly applicable parts of the previous writing. And even then, one must weave it into one's own narrative or analysis, not allowing the quoted to overpower the quoter

B. Handling Block Quotations. The best way to handle them, of course, is not to handle them at all: quote smaller chunks. Assuming, though, that this goal is unattainable—as most legal writers seem to think—then the biggest challenge is handling the quotation so that it will actually get read. The secret is in the lead-in.

Before discussing how a good lead-in reads, let us look at how 98% of them read. They are dead:

- The court observed: . . . .
- The court held: . . . .
- The court further held: . . . .
- As stated by the court: . . . .
- Rule 54(d) states: . . . .
- As the court specifically stated: . . . .
- The statute reads in pertinent part: . . . .
- The Miranda court stated: . . . .
- According to the 5th Circuit: . . . .
- That opinion enunciated the definition of the term "fixture" as follows: . . . .

Anyone who wants to become a good legal stylist must vow to try never to introduce a quotation in this way. Readers are sure to skip the quotation.

The better practice is to state the upshot of the quotation in the lead-in. With this method, the lead-in becomes an assertion, and the quotation becomes the support. The reader feels as if the writer has asserted something concrete and often, out of curiosity, wants to verify that assertion.

Consider, for example, how differently the following passage would read if the colon introducing the quotation followed observed instead of bystanders:

> As one Texas court has observed, modern legal practice is designed to prevent the vexatious suing of innocent bystanders:
>
> > Our statutes of limitation afford ample time for investigation before the institution of suit. Before and after that point, our rules of practice afford many means of investigating the circumstances of the case and of ascertaining the proper identity of the parties sued. We are unable to find any legal excuse for appellant's having sued the wrong corporation or for his delay in ascertaining this fact.

When the writer gives the upshot in the introductory words, readers are not left hunting for the central idea of the quotation.

This method has the benefit not only of ensuring that the quotation is read, but also of enhancing the writer's credibility. For if the lead-in is pointed as well as accurate, the reader will agree that the quotation supports the writer's assertion.

C. Punctuating the Lead-In. Writers usu. have four choices: the colon, the comma, a period (i.e., no lead-in, really—only an independent sentence before the quotation), or no punctuation. A long quotation ordinarily requires a colon. Some writers, though, let the lead-in and the quotation stand as separate sentences, as in the following example:

> As part of the "balancing" of equities, the Act provides that the statutory remedies shall serve as the employee's exclusive remedy if that employee sustains an injury compensable under the Act.
>
> > No common law or statutory right to recover damages from the employer, his insurer . . . or the agents or employees of any of them for injury or death sustained by any employee while engaged in the line of his duty as such employee, other than the compensation herein provided, is available to any employee who is covered by the provisions of this Act, to anyone wholly or partially dependent on him . . . or anyone otherwise entitled to recover damages for such injury
> Ill. Rev. Stat. ch. 48, ¶ 138.5(a) (1986).

The writer there crafted a good lead-in by summarizing the provision in plain English. Letting the lead-in stand as one sentence, though, can leave the quotation in a sort of syntactic limbo. A colon, by contrast, helps the reader see how the quotation fits into the text: the quotation simply amplifies the lead-in.

When is it best to use no punctuation at all?

Only when the introductory language moves seamlessly into the quoted material—e.g.:

> Professor Bobbitt thinks that the view that moral arguments should generally be excluded from constitutional discourse > > justifies, for example, the phenomenon of federal habeas corpus, for which it is otherwise difficult to give good grounds. Habeas corpus severs the constitutional decision from the moral question of guilt or innocence, so that the former can be dispassionately weighed as one suspects it seldom can be in the context of a trial. At the same time federal habeas corpus gives the matter to a group of deciders whose customary business is, by comparison to state courts, largely amoral
>

The mere fact that what is being introduced is a block quotation does not mean that some additional punctuation is necessary.

D. American and British Systems. In AmE, quotations that are short enough to be run into the text (usu. fewer than 50 words) are set off by pairs of double quotation marks (". . ."). In BrE, quoted text that is not long enough to be a block quotation is set off by single quotation marks ('. . .'). See PUNCTUATION (J).

E. Ellipses. A good way to trim down a bloated quotation—and thus to increase the odds of having it read—is to cut irrelevant parts. When you omit one or more words, you show the omission by using ellipsis points (a series of three period-dots) with one space between them:

> The court may require any attorney . . . who vexatiously multiplies the proceedings to personally satisfy the excess costs, expenses, and attorneys' fees reasonably incurred because of that conduct.

Use a fourth period-dot when the omission falls between sentences in the quoted material or when your ellipsis ends a sentence.

The spacing between the last word of the sentence and the first ellipsis point depends on whether the last word before the ellipsis ends a sentence. In the following example, intent is the last word of the first sentence, and it therefore ends with a period followed by three ellipsis points:

> A circuit court must initially determine, as a question of law, whether the language of a purported contract is ambiguous as to the parties' intent. . . . If the terms of an alleged contract are ambiguous or capable of more than one interpretation, however, parol evidence is admissible to ascertain the parties' intent.

But if intent were not the last word of the first sentence, then the three ellipsis points would come first, and the (typographically identical) period after. The only difference would be the space between intent and the first dot:

> A circuit court must initially determine, as a question of law, whether the language of a purported contract is ambiguous as to the parties' intent . If the terms of an alleged contract are ambiguous or capable of more than one interpretation, however, parol evidence is admissible to ascertain the parties' intent.

That distinction—a hairsplitting distinction, in the minds of some—is one that careful legal writers adhere to. In nonlegal writing, though, the convention is to close up the space before the first of four ellipsis points: "Note that there is no space between the period or other terminal punctuation and the preceding word, even though that word does not end the original sentence." The Chicago Manual of Style § 10.55, at 373 (14th ed. 1993).

Finally, when you omit more than one paragraph in a block quotation, use a whole line for the three ellipsis points (centered), which should have five to seven spaces between them—e.g:

> Everyone is familiar with the general distinction between what people mean to say and what they expect or hope will happen as a result of their having said it. People often say "Don't bother" when they hope the person they are speaking to will ignore what they have said and will indeed bother. The distinction is especially important when people give orders to make requests in language that is normally understood as abstract or in some other way requiring judgment.
>
> . . .
>
> The late-eighteenth-century authors of the Eighth Amendment (as we have defined them) declared that "cruel and unusual punishments" are unconstitutional. What did they intend to say?
> Ronald Dworkin, Life's Dominion: An Argument About Abortion, Euthanasia, and Individual Freedom 134–35 (1993).

quote (properly a verb) for quotation is a casualism that sometimes appears in formal contexts—e.g.: "This quote . . . clearly draws a distinction . . . ." U.S. v. Sells Eng'g, Inc., 463 U.S. 418, 463 (1983). The problem with quotation is that, to the writer who hopes to deliver goods quickly, the three syllables sound and read as if they are taking too much time. The single syllable of quote, meanwhile, sounds apt to such a writer. And it sounds more and more natural all the time, as it seems to predominate in spoken English.

The negative form, too, is a casualism—e.g.: "The good brief-writer does not belabor misquotes in an opponent's brief." See cite (B).

quo warranto (lit., "by what authority?") is the HYBRID name (L. quo + A.S. warrant) of the common-law writ enshrined in two statutes enacted in 1289, each known as Statutum de Quo Warranto. Through this writ, a relator sought to discover either the extent of royal manors or the warrants by which royal rights and royal estates had passed to corporations or private individuals. Today, the writ is obsolete in England but persists in the U.S., where it is generally used to inquire into the authority by which a public office is held or a franchise is claimed. See prerogative writs.

The hybrid nature of this LAW LATIN term is apt to throw the linguist into a fit: "The term . . . is to a linguist a horripilating hybrid, using an English term like 'warrant' with a Latin ablative ending and combining it with a Latin interrogative pronoun." Mario Pei, Double-Speak in America 73 (1973).

R., the abbreviation for either Regina (= Queen) or Rex (King), is often used in G.B. in place of The Queen or The King in criminal case names.

racial discrimination; race discrimination. The former phrase is slightly better, because, other things being equal, the adjective (racial or race) should have the form as well as the function of an adjective (hence racial). But, predictably, idiomatic English is not entirely consistent: we speak of racial equality but race relations. Cf. sex.

rack. See wrack.

racketeer, n. & v.i. The noun racketeering = the business of racketeers, a system of organized crime traditionally involving the extortion of money from business firms by intimidation, violence, or other illegal methods. Oddly, this noun, as well as the verb racketeer, is characterized by the OED as an Americanism, whereas the adjective racketeering is exemplified in that dictionary only by British quotations. If the verb and its derivative forms began as Americanisms, they will inevitably spread to BrE, given the inroads already made.

In 1970, the U.S. Congress passed the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961–68 (1988), which led to a resurgence of the word in AmE. Today racketeering often has the broad sense "the practice of engaging in a fraudulent scheme or enterprise."

radiocast. See broadcast.

railroad; railway. As nouns these words are virtually equivalent. W2 makes the following distinction: "Railroad . . . is usually limited to roads [with lines or rails fixed to ties] for heavy steam transportation and also to steam roads partially or wholly electrified or roads for heavy traffic designed originally for electric traction. The lighter electric street-car lines and the like are usually termed railways." In G.B., however, streetcar lines are commonly called trainlines or tramways, and the vehicles traincars, tramcars, or trams.

The two words are abbreviated R.R. and Ry. Railroad is used universally as a verb <passenger railroading>, figuratively as well as literally—e.g.: "An attempt is being made, while wartime psychology for national security is high, to railroad through Congress a bill providing for compulsory military training for one year of all young men between the ages of 18 and 22." This sense is now used in BrE as well as AmE.

rainmaker, in AmE, refers to a lawyer who, generally through wide contacts within the business community, generates a great deal of business for a law firm. E.g., "Ms. Miller . . . said that more and more firms are capitulating as Wilmer Cutler did, and are courting rainmakers from other firms." Kathleen Sylvester, D.C. Firms Sporting a New Look, Nat'l L.J, 26 March 1984, at 1, 26./ "It is well known that law firms often have partners who are socially prominent due to their civic, charitable, or political activities. They may do little legal work; their job is to bring in new clients. They are the 'rainmakers' . . . ." Frederick C. Moss, The Ethics of Law Practice Marketing, 61 Notre Dame L. Rev. 601, 670 (1986).

raise. A. And rear. The old rule, still to be observed in formal contexts, is that crops and livestock are raised and children are reared.

B. "Raising" a Use. In the traditional legal idiom, to create a use (in the sense of equitable ownership) was to raise a use—e.g.: "The rule requiring a consideration to raise a use, has become merely nominal . . . ." Jackson ex. dem. Hudson v. Alexander, 3 Johns. 484, 492 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1808)./ "At the beginning of the sixteenth century it was settled that a use could be raised without a transfer of the seisin by means of a bargain and sale." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 176 (2d ed. 1988). See use.

Rambo. This is the name of the "hero" in David Morrell's novel First Blood, which was popularized in the film by that name and in Rambo:

First Blood Part II and Rambo III. The character Rambo is a Vietnam veteran who is madly bent on violent revenge.

By an almost natural extension, the term came in the 1980s to denote ultra-aggressive lawyers, especially litigators. The SOED defines Rambo (with the initial capital) as "a man given to displays of physical violence or aggression, a macho man." But among American lawyers, the term has lost its sex-specific character, so that it is perfectly natural to speak of a female litigator as being a Rambo.

Sometimes, as in the first example quoted below, Rambo appears alone, but more often it is used attributively in the phrases Rambo litigator, Rambo lawyer, or Rambo tactics—e.g.:

- "I do not say to trust the untrustworthy or to retreat before Rambos." Thomas M. Reavley, Response to "One Year After Dondi": Time to Get Back to Litigating? 17 Pepperdine L. Rev. 851, 852 (1990).
- "Rambo lawyers, the critics say, are perhaps the most blatant example of a widespread deterioration of professional legal standards." Dona Rubin, The Rambo Boys, Dallas Life Mag., 25 Feb. 1990, at 7.
- "If no one hires Rambo-lawyer, maybe he'll drop his arsenal of bad ethics and sleaze." Bruce Vielmetti, New Wave Hopes for Kinder, Gentler Litigants, St. Petersburg Times, 20 Dec. 1993, at 9.
- "This is the last refuge of Rambo litigators, a group that didn't appreciate the irony when Ambrose Bierce described lawyers as those 'skilled in circumventing the law.'" Richard M. Hunt, Goodbye to the Warrior, Texas Law., 12 Dec. 1994, at 19.
- "In addition, a new book by Mary Ann Glendon of the Harvard Law School contends that lawyers are becoming 'Rambo litigators' in an effort to maximize billable hours." Marcia M. McBrien, Fax Poll: Unhappy Lawyers Cite Hard Work, Few Rewards, Mich. Law. Weekly, 26 Dec. 1994, at 1.
- "'The fact that 'Rambo' lawyers get results, no matter what the personal cost in lawyer relations, begets more 'Rambos' as client expectations and loyalties change,' according to the [Seventh Circuit's 1991] study which often is cited as the most thorough on the subject." Chris Conley, Order in the Court, Commercial Appeal (Memphis), 26 Jan. 1995, at 1B.

Cf. LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR.

rape. A. Defined. Some authorities, especially older ones, define rape as "carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly against her will." 4 Blackstone, Commentaries *210. But the better view is that force should not be an element of the definition because if it is, then one must resort to a fictional "constructive force," which includes the threat of force. See constructive.

A better traditional, common-law definition is as follows: "A man commits rape when he engages in intercourse (in the old statutes, carnal knowledge) with a woman not his wife; by force or threat of force; against her will and without her consent." Susan Estrich, Real Rape 8 (1987). Gradually, the definition has been simplified. One criminal-law text defines it simply as "sexual intercourse with a female person without her consent." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 197 (3d ed. 1982). See marital rape.

This definitional change took place in many American states during the 1970s. The pre-1974 rape statute in Texas defined rape as "the carnal knowledge of a woman without her consent and obtained by force, threats or fraud . . . ." Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 1183 (Vernon 1961). A 1974 amendment changed the definition so that a person is guilty of rape "if he has sexual intercourse with a female not his wife and without the female's consent . . . ." Id. § 21.02 (Vernon 1974). For the more modern development, see (C).

B. And seduction. Traditionally, the law has distinguished between rape and seduction. If consent is altogether lacking, the offense is called rape. If the consent is unfairly obtained—as through phony tenderness or false promises of an enduring relationship—the act is called seduction.

Many modern writers reject this definitional dichotomy, even if they accept its consequences in the punishability of one versus the other—e.g.: "But where does rape begin and seduction end? Germaine Greer has argued that the commonest form of rape is 'rape by fraud—by phony tenderness or false promises of an enduring relationship, for example.' Dr. Greer, however, acknowledged that this was non-criminal rape and nobody has ever argued that an attempt to get sexual intercourse through sweet but insincere words should be made an indictable offence." Kathy Marks, Rape, Independent, 23 Feb. 1992, at 19.

C. And sexual assault; indecent assault. During the 1980s, many American jurisdictions have abolished rape as a separate offense. Statutes have created a new offense called sexual assault, defined in Texas as follows: "a person commits an offense if the person intentionally or knowingly caused the penetration of the anus or female sexual organ of another person who is not the spouse of the actor by any means, without that person's consent." Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 22.011(a) (Vernon 1983). The result is that the statute covers not just females, but also males who are homosexually assaulted.

There are several variations. In New Jersey, simple sexual assault is defined as an act of sexual penetration committed when the "actor uses physical force or coercion, but the victim does not sustain severe personal injury." N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:14-2(c)(1) (West 1982). The Model Penal Code, however, is drafted much more broadly:

> A person who has sexual contact with another not his spouse, or causes such other to have sexual contact with him, is guilty of sexual assault, a misdemeanor, if . . . he knows that the contact is offensive to the other person . . . . Sexual contact is any touching of the sexual or other intimate parts of the person for the purpose of arousing or gratifying sexual desire.
> Model Penal Code § 213.4 (1980).

One state—Pennsylvania—even uses the term indecent assault as opposed to sexual assault. Under the Pennsylvania statute, a person who has "indecent contact" with another not his or her spouse is guilty of indecent assault if:

- the other person does not consent;
- the actor knows that the other person has a mental defect that impairs consent;
- the actor knows that the other person is unaware of the act;
- the actor has drugged the person;
- the other person is in custody in a hospital or other institution where the actor has supervisory or disciplinary authority;
- the actor is more than 18 years old and the other person is under 14.

See 18 Pa. C.S.A. § 3126 (1994). Under that same Pennsylvania statute, indecent contact is defined as "any touching of the sexual or other intimate parts of the person for the purpose of arousing or gratifying sexual desire, in either person." Id. § 3101.

In G.B., indecent assault is the usual term for a lesser offense than rape: touching without consent. It is punishable by up to two years' imprisonment. See Tony Honoré, Sex Law 65–68 (1978).

rara avis [lit., "rare bird"] is, as H.W. Fowler once noted, "seldom an improvement on rarity" (MEU1 at 483).

rarefy is often misspelled -ify—e.g.: "[T]he intricate arguments of counsel . . . have by now reached a rarified [read rarefied] plane." Anthony Sampson, Anatomy of Britain 156 (1962)./ "This was high ground indeed; the Supreme Court found the air too rarified [read rarefied] . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, The Law of Admiralty 224 (2d ed. 1975). Cf. stupefy.

rarely ever is incorrect for rarely or rarely if ever.

ratable; rateable. In AmE, the spelling ratable is preferred, whereas in BrE rateable is more common.

The adverb ratably is frequently used in legal writing in the sense "pro rata, proportionately" <they will share ratably in the assets>. E.g., "Co-owners must, as a rule, contribute ratably toward payment of taxes, special assessments, mortgages and repairs of the property." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 223 (1946; repr. 1950)./ "Those [withdrawals] . . . from the deposit accounts were . . . to be borne rateably . . . ." Lord Goff of Chieveley & Gareth Jones, The Law of Restitution 75 (3d ed. 1986). See MUTE E rate(-)making, n. & adj., is best hyphenated.

rather. See but rather.

rather unique. See ADJECTIVES (B).

ratification = (1) in contract law, a person's binding adoption of an act already completed, but either not done in a way that originally produced a legal obligation or done by a stranger having at the time no authority to act as the person's agent; (2) in domestic law, the process by which a state indicates acceptance of the obligations contained in a treaty; or (3) in international law, the final confirmation by the parties to an international treaty, usu. including the documents reflecting the confirmation. See adoption.

ratio frequently serves as a shorthand form of ratio decidendi—e.g.: "Fully considered dicta in the House of Lords are usually treated as more weighty than the ratio of a judge at first instance in the High Court." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 135 (1983). "The ratio . . . of a case is its central core of meaning, its sharpest cutting edge." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 225 (2d ed. 1985). The plural is rationes. See ratio decidendi.

ratiocination; rationalization. Ratiocination /ray-shee-oh-sə-nay-shən/ = the process or an act of reasoning. Rationalization = (1) an act or instance of explaining (away) by bringing into conformity with reason; or (2) (colloq.) the finding of "reasons" for irrational or unworthy behavior. Sense (2) is responsible for the negative connotations of rationalization among nonlawyers.

ratiocinative; ratiocinatory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

ratio decidendi /ray-shee-oh-des-i-den-dee/ (lit., "the reason for deciding") = (1) the rule of law on which a court says its decision is founded; or (2) the rule of law on which a later court thinks that a previous court founded its decision. So, even though this term is basic to the common-law system of precedents, it is more than a little ambiguous. Still, sense (2) is much less common in practice than sense (1). As the OCL notes, a literal translation of the phrase ("the reason for the decision") is unsatisfactory "because the reason may in fact be something other, such as the judge's dislike of the defendant. Nor is the ratio the decision itself, for this binds only the parties [by res judicata, q.v.] whereas the ratio is the principle which is of application to subsequent cases and states the law for all parties."

Judicial opinions often contain no clearly ascertainable ratio decidendi, and therefore finding it often demands creativity and independent judgment. But many writers use this term without concerning themselves with the ambiguity or the subtleties—e.g.: "Lower courts read the opinions of this Court with a not unnatural alertness to catch intimations beyond the precise ratio decidendi." Johnson v. U.S., 333 U.S. 46, 56 (1948) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting in part)./ "The words of an opinion are not scriptural admonitions or statutory mandates; we are bound by the rationale of a decision, its ratio decidendi, not its explanatory language."/ "The observations of Lindley L.J. are less to the purpose, but indicate no dissent from the views of his brethren, which as part of our ratio decidendi cannot in our opinion be dismissed as merely obiter." (Eng.)/ "The actual point in this case did not arise in Ringrose v. Bramham, but still the ratio decidendi clearly applies." (Eng.)

The plural form of ratio is rationes: "[T]he substitution of negligent non-military personnel in place of military personnel would have no effect on these rationes decidendi." Sheppard v. U.S., 294 F. Supp. 7, 9 (E.D. Pa. 1969). "[A] general rule of interpretation, unlike other common law rules, can never be rendered more specific by the rationes decidendi of later cases." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 168 (1976). See stare decisis. Cf. dictum (A) & obiter dictum (B).

rational. See reasonable.

rationale (= a reasoned exposition of principles; an explanation or statement of reasons) is not to be confused with rationalization (see ratiocination).

Rationale is regularly three syllables, although Fowler believed that it should be four syllables based on etymology (-ale being two syllables). Today, his preferred pronunciation would be considered terribly pedantic in most company. The final syllable is pronounced like that in morale or chorale. See ratio decidendi.

rationalization. See ratiocination.

rationalize for analogize or harmonize is an unlikely error. E.g., "Since the argument in this case, appellants have called our attention to the recent Supreme Court case of Indian Towing Co. v. United States, but it is difficult to rationalize that case with [read, depending on the sense, analogize that case to or harmonize that case with] the one at bar."

ration allotment is a REDUNDANCY. E.g., "Many people came up at night and asked, even demanded, a drink of water beyond their ration allotment." Either word would be sufficient.

ravish (= to rape) is now more literary or archaic than is appropriate for modern legal contexts. E.g., "When a man is presented for rape or an attempt to ravish [read rape], it may be shown that the woman against whom the offence was committed was of a generally immoral character, although she is not cross-examined on the subject." (Eng.)

One problem with ravish is that it has romantic connotations: it means not only "to commit rape," but also "to fill with ecstasy or delight." The latter sense renders the word unfit for acting as a technical or legal equivalent of rape. The term describing the act should evoke outrage; it should not be a romantic abstraction, as ravish is.

reaction. A. For response. Several usage critics have objected to this use of the term, as in "What was the judge's reaction to this argument?" on grounds that reaction is primarily a scientific term that in any event is not applicable to people. The objection is a pedantic one.

B. For effect. Justice Holmes once nodded and made this mistake: "The question then is narrowed to whether the exercise of its otherwise constitutional power by Congress can be pronounced unconstitutional because of its possible reaction [read effect] upon the conduct of the States in a matter upon which I have admitted that they are free from direct control." Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 278 (1918) (Holmes, J., dissenting).

reactionary; reactionist; reactionarist. The second and third are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

reading the Riot Act. The English "Riot Act," 1 Geo. I, stat. 2, c. 5 (1714) (repealed 1973), made it a capital offense for 12 or more rioters to assemble for an hour after a magistrate proclaimed that the rioters must disperse. As a 19th-century commentator observed, the magistrate's proclamation "is commonly, but very inaccurately, called reading the Riot Act." 1 James F. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law of England 203 n.1 (London, Macmillan & Co., 1883). Why inaccurately? Because the statute itself was not read. Instead, a proclamation was read, calling on rioters to disperse.

By the early 19th century, the phrase read the riot act (usu. with the last two words in lower case) had become a catchphrase meaning "to tell someone off." See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.

ready, willing, and able is a phrase that traditionally refers to a prospective buyer of property who can legally and financially consummate the deal. A less common variant is ready, able, and willing. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

real is casualism when used for very—e.g.: "Competition in recent years hasn't been real [read very] friendly . . . ." L. Gordon Crovitz, Even Gentlemanly Yachtsmen Go to Court, but Why Let Them? Wall St. J., 16 May 1990, at A17.

real; personal. The distinction between real property (or realty) and personal property (or personalty) is as old as Roman law, but the curious terminology is much more recent. From the early 17th century on, land was commonly called real property and chattels were called personal property merely because land could be recovered specifically in a real action, but chattels could be made the subject only of a damage action. See real action.

real action; personal action; mixed action. The distinctions between these three were fundamental to the common law. Real actions involved a res, or land, and a plaintiff (or demandant) claiming some interest in the land. Personal actions involved debts, personal duties, or damages arising from any cause. Mixed actions partook of the nature of the other two, as when the plaintiff claimed both real property and damages. See demandant & real.

real contract. This phrase, common among civilians, is rarely used by common-law writers and judges. Still, it describes an obligation enforced at common law from the earliest times: "A real contract is an obligation arising from the possession or transfer of a res. The real contracts known to the common law were enforced by the actions of account, detinue, and debt." 1 Samuel Williston & Walter H.E. Jaeger, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 8, at 19 (3d ed. 1957). For the most part, these forms of action fell into disuse with the rise of assumpsit. See assumpsit.

real covenant = a covenant running with the land. See covenant.

real estate. Richard Grant White's (19th-century) view of this phrase—"a pretentious intruder from the technical province of law"—remains surprisingly apt:

> Law makes the distinction of real and personal estate; but a man does not, therefore, talk of drawing some personal estate from the bank, or going to Tiffany's to buy some personal estate for his wife; nor, when he has an interest in the national debt, does he ask how personal estate is selling. He draws money, buys jewels, asks the price of bonds. Real estate, as ordinarily used, is a mere big-sounding, vulgar phrase for houses and land, and, so used, is a marked and unjustifiable Americanism. Our papers have columns headed in large letters, 'Real Estate Transactions,' the heading of which should be Sales of Land.

real party in interest. So written, though a few judges have ill-advisedly made this noun phrase real-party-in-interest or real party-in-interest. Only as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE—as in real-party-in-interest provision—does the phrase need hyphens.

real property. For the historical basis for the distinction between real property and personal property, see real.

realtor (= a real estate agent or broker) has two syllables, not three. This Americanism is a MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITY, since the -or suffix in Latin is appended only to verb elements, and realt- is not a verb element, but the term is too well established in AmE to quibble with its makeup. The shortness of the word commends it.

Some authorities suggest that it should be capitalized and used only in its proprietary trademark sense, that is, "a member of the National Association of Realtors"; the organization invented and registered the trademark in 1916. Seemingly few people know about the trademark, and consequently in AmE the term is used indiscriminately of real-estate agents generally. In BrE, real-estate agents are known as estate agents; realtor is virtually unknown there, and real estate is only a little better known to British nonlawyers.

realty. A. Sense. The only current sense of this term is the legal one, "real property." Formerly, the term could denote both "royalty" and "a reality." See real estate.

B. Precise Difference Between realty and personalty. Anglo-American courts have disagreed about whether an estate in land less than a freehold is properly considered realty or personalty. (At common law, a tenant for years was not regarded as having an interest in realty.) Today, courts most often "use the expressions real estate and real property in a broad sense as applicable to any estates in land, whether freehold or less than freehold, as well as to land itself, regarded as the object of rights." 1 Herbert T. Tiffany, The Law of Real Property § 3, at 7–8 (B. Jones ed., 3d ed. 1939). The increasing use of realty and its cognates in the broader sense, to include nonfreehold as well as freehold estates, is attributable to "the fact that it corresponds to the ordinary use of the expression . . . among members of the community in general" (id. at 8), otherwise known as SLIPSHOD EXTENSION.

rear. See raise (A).

reasonability. See reasonableness.

reasonable; rational. Generally, reasonable = according to reason; rational = having reason. Yet reasonable is often used in reference to persons in the sense "having the faculty of reason" <reasonable person>. When applied to things, the two words are perhaps more clearly differentiated: "In application to things reasonable and rational both signify according to reason; but the former is used in reference to the business of life, as a reasonable proposal, wish, etc.; rational to abstract matters, as rational motives, grounds, questions, etc." George Crabb, Crabb's English Synonymes 589 (John H. Finley ed., 2d ed. 1917).

reasonable doubt, beyond a. See balance of probability.

reasonable man. See reasonable person.

reasonable-minded is prolix for reasonable—e.g.: "Second, the Court says that the intrusion was not a serious one because a reasonable-minded [read reasonable] citizen would in fact want to be present at a search of his house unless he was fleeing to avoid arrest." Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 711 n.4 (1981) (Stewart, J., dissenting)./ "The appropriate standard of review is whether the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, is such that reasonable-minded [read reasonable] jurors in the exercise of prudent judgment could not differ in their decision as to the facts." Conam Alaska v. Bell Lavalin, Inc., 842 P.2d 148, 157 n.22 (Alaska 1992). See REDUNDANCY.

reasonableness; reasonability. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former.

reasonable person. Most modern American opinions refer to a reasonable person instead of a reasonable man, the age-old sexist standard, which Lord Radcliffe called "the anthropomorphic conception of justice." Davis Contractors Ltd. v. Fareham U.D.C., [1956] A.C. 696, 728. (See SEXISM (B).) The reasonable person—a hypothetical legal standard—acts sensibly, takes proper but not excessive precautions, does things without serious delay, and weighs evidence carefully but not overskeptically. The reasonable person is neither perfect nor indifferent.

When the locution functions as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it should be hyphenated—e.g.: "If Parliament had intended to require people to live up to the objective, reasonable-man standard it would surely have said so . . . ." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 145 (2d ed. 1961).

reason . . . is because. This construction is loose, because reason implies because and vice-versa. After the noun reason plus a be-verb or other linking verb, a noun phrase, predicate adjective, or clause introduced by that should appear. E.g., "The reason that most of us chatter so much is not because [read that] we suppose ourselves more competent than counsel." Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr., "A Trial Judge," in Whereas—A Judge's Premises 3, 3 (1965)./ "The reason why words are so important is because [read that] words are the vehicle of thought." Lord Denning, The Discipline of Law 5 (1979).

Better yet, in the latter example, would be to delete The reason why . . . is: "Words are important because they are the vehicle of thought."

Variations on the phrase, such as reason . . . is due to, are no better—e.g.: "Two prosecutors stated in affidavits that the reason the state moved to dismiss the enhancement counts was due to [omit due to] difficulty of proof."

reason of for rationale for is an ARCHAISM. "Clearly, the reason of [read rationale for] section 2-202 is sensible and should be applied by analogy to article eight."

reason why; reason that. Both forms are correct—e.g., "The district court found that there was no reason that [or why] Hauser could not have joined in her husband's earlier action."

It is an unfortunate SUPERSTITION that reason why is an objectionable REDUNDANCY. True, it is mildly redundant—in the same way as time when and place where—but it has long been idiomatic, and good writers regularly use the phrase:

- "The reason why a lawyer does not mention that his client wore a white hat when he made a contract . . . is that he foresees that the public force will act in the same way whatever his client had upon his head." Oliver W. Holmes, "The Path of the Law" (1897), in Collected Legal Papers 167, 168 (1952).
- "There is another reason why Austin's 'General Jurisprudence' cannot be called a philosophy." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 42 (1945).
- "And if he goes there and gets divorced there is no reason why the divorce should not be valid." Max Radin, The Law and You 65 (1948).
- "There are also various reasons why certain people may by rule be exempted from the normal workings of the criminal law." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 51 (1961).
- "The other reason why we tend to relegate the fiction to the past lies in our failure to realize that the law will be faced, in the future, with essentially new situations." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 94 (1967).
- "Packer captured the reason why the humanitarian focus is erroneous . . . ." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 26 (1982).
- "[T]he reason why the other is not liable is that he is an undisclosed principal . . . ." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 634 (8th ed. 1991).

Moreover, reason that is often a poor substitute—as in any of the examples just quoted—just as time that and place that are poor substitutes when adverbials of time and place are called for. But cf. the indefensible REDUNDANCY in the phrase reason . . . is because.

rebellion. See sedition.

rebound; re-bound. See RE- PAIRS.

rebus, in. See in rem.

rebut; refute. Rebut means "to attempt to refute." Refute means "to defeat (countervailing arguments)." Thus one who rebuts certainly hopes to refute; it is immodest to assume, however, that one has refuted another's arguments. Rebut is sometimes wrongly written rebutt. See refute.

rebuttable presumption (= a legal presumption subject to valid rebuttal) becomes illogical when the phrase is turned into an adverb and a verb—e.g.: "Texas courts rebuttably presume such warnings will be read and heeded." This suggests that the courts presume in a rebuttable manner, which is not the sense; a better way of phrasing the thought is to write: "Texas courts adopt the rebuttable presumption that such warnings will be read and heeded." See presumption.

rebuttal; surrebuttal. Rebuttal (= the act of rebutting) is often used in legal writing, and with good reason: it is much broader than rebutter, q.v., which is the name of the pleading intended to rebut.

Surrebuttal is not an answer to a rebuttal; it is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of surrebutter, a common-law pleading. See COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS.

rebutter = (1) (formerly) a defendant's answer to a plaintiff's surrejoinder; the pleading that followed the rejoinder and surrejoinder, and that might in turn be answered by the surrebutter; or (2) one who rebuts. Sense (1) is the only strictly legal sense of the term. See -ER (B) & COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS.

receipt, as a verb, began as an Americanism in the 18th century and has now spread to BrE. It is commercialese, but there is no grammatical problem in writing, "The bill must be receipted," or "The sale was receipted." Receipt is ordinarily used in the PASSIVE VOICE: "The preceding sentence shall not be construed [see STATUTE DRAFTING (A)] to mean that new receipts are to be obtained each year from continuing employees who have previously been receipted for copies of identical provisions." Still, the PHRASAL VERB to be receipted for is a REDUNDANCY, as well as a graceless phrase—e.g.: "Each certificate issued by the corporation shall be receipted for by the person receiving it or by his or her duly authorized agent." [Read The person who receives a certificate issued by the organization, or his or her duly authorized agent, shall execute a receipt for it.] Cf. receiptor.

receipt and sufficiency of which are hereby acknowledged. This recital, common in contractual language, is almost always unnecessary and unhelpful. And, when is appears instead of are, it is ungrammatical.

receipt of, be in. This insipid phrase, which usually occurs in letters, is to be avoided as OFFICIALESE or commercialese or LEGALESE.

receiptor (= a person who receipts property attached by a sheriff; a bailee) is noted as being an Americanism by the OED. It dates from the early 19th century. The -or spelling is preferred to -er. See receipt.

receivables (= debts owed to a business and regarded as assets) began in the mid-19th century as an Americanism but is now current in BrE as well. It is the antonym of payables. See ADJECTIVES (C). receive. See reception.

receiver is used in both AmE and BrE in the specific legal sense of "a person appointed by a court, or by a corporation or other person, for the protection or collection of property." Usually the receiver administers the property of a bankrupt, or property that is the subject of litigation, pending the outcome of a lawsuit.

recense. See revise.

recension (= the revision of a text) is not to be confused with rescission. (See rescission.) E.g., "The recension of statute law is not only destructive but constructive when it takes the form of codifying and consolidating acts." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 476 (7th ed. 1964).

reception is the term commonly used to denote the adoption of an existing legal system originally developed elsewhere. E.g., "It is more remarkable that this revived Justinian law should find a similar reception in Germany." James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 38 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co. 1881)./ "Despite the efforts of early law reformers, all of the original states, and most of the later ones, adopted English common law insofar as it was deemed applicable to local conditions. This 'reception' of the common law, as it came to be called, was accomplished either by express statutory or constitutional provision or by judicial decision." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 40 (1982).

The corresponding verb, of course, is receive—e.g.: "[A]ccording to a theory [that] was popular half a century ago, the Canon Law of the Western Church was, even before the Reformation, not regarded as wholly binding on the ecclesiastical courts in England, but only to the extent to which it was 'received' or acknowledged by courts in England." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 30 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967)./ "To this day, an occasional case still turns on whether some statute or doctrine had been 'received' as common law in this or that state." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 111 (2d ed. 1985).

receptioning (= to do the job of a receptionist) is American law-firm cant that illustrates the same tendency in modern usage as paralegaling and bailiffing, qq.v. See NOUNS AS VERBS.

recidivate is a fancy word for relapse, backslide, fall back into crime, or rape (etc.) again. Invented in the early 1500s, it fell into disuse toward the end of the following century, but 20th-century legal writers have revived it—e.g.:

- "Dr. Bohn would not testify to a reasonable degree of medical or psychological certainty that there was a substantial likelihood Tweedy would recidivate." In re Tweedy, 488 N.W.2d 528, 532 (Neb. 1992).
- "Because the issue under the Guidelines is whether the offender engaged in past criminal conduct and, thus, is likely to recidivate, such a challenge is relevant only if the offender did not engage in the underlying conduct." U.S. v. Roman, 989 F.2d 1117, 1124 (11th Cir. 1993) (Tjoflat, C.J., concurring).
- "[T]he trial court . . . should consider . . . the base rate statistics for violent behavior among individuals of this person's background (e.g., data showing the rate at which rapists recidivate, the correlation between age and criminal sexual activity, etc.) . . . ." In re Linehan, 518 N.W.2d 609, 614 (Minn. 1994).

recidivous; recidivist. The former is the preferred adjective. The latter is the noun meaning "one who habitually relapses into crime" (OED).

reciprocity; reciprocation. Reciprocity = (1) the state of being reciprocal; or (2) the mutual concession of advantages or privileges for purposes of commercial or diplomatic relations. Reciprocation = the action of doing something in return. Though reciprocity is by far the more common term, some legal writers seem to use reciprocation in its place, esp. in sense (2): "[N]either statute requires a reciprocation [read reciprocity] of the regional limitation." Northeast Bancorp, Inc. v. Federal Reserve Sys., 472 U.S. 159, 175 (1985). See mutual.

recision; recission. See rescission.

recital; recitation. These words overlap, but are distinguishable. The DRAFTING term is recital, referring to the preliminary statement in a deed or contract explaining the background of the transaction and showing the existence of facts, or, in pleading, introducing a positive allegation. E.g., "This version of the parties' proposed consent decree contains no recital, finding, or adjudication of any illegality."/ "Recitations [read Recitals] of consideration and use in a recorded deed are not binding upon a complainant who seeks a purchase money resulting trust." More generally, recital may mean "a rehearsal, account, or description of some thing, fact, or incident." E.g., "The facts are sordid, but a brief recital of them must be made."

Recitation often connotes an oral delivery before an audience, whether in the classroom or on stage. Yet it is more often the general noun meaning "the act of reciting": "The interrogator's recitation of the suspect's rights was sufficient."/ "The carnage caused by drunk driving is well documented and needs no detailed recitation here."

reckless. See wanton. For an interesting error, see wreckless.

recklessness. In legal contexts, this term is used with several gradations of meaning, but the primary emerging sense is that recklessness occurs when the actor does not desire the consequence but foresees the possibility and consciously takes the risk. Another term for recklessness is advertent negligence. Cf. carelessness.

reckon (= to count or compute) is probably an ARCHAISM. E.g., "The law reckons in days, not commonly in fractions of days, and an agreement made at six o'clock in the morning stands on the same footing with one made at eleven o'clock in the evening." The word is dialectal in the sense "to suppose, think" <I reckon the judges will affirm>.

reclaim; re-claim. See RE- PAIRS.

recognizance; reconnaissance; reconnoisance. Recognizance = a bond or obligation, made in court, by which a person (called the recognizor) promises to perform some act or observe some condition (as to appear when called on, to pay a debt, or to keep the peace). E.g., "The suspect was released on his own recognizance."

In BrE, the -g- in recognisance (as it is usu. spelled in BrE) is silent, reflecting that the current spelling is really only a latter-day Latinization of the spelling of the LAW FRENCH term conusance. But in AmE, the -g- is regularly sounded.

Reconnaissance = a preliminary survey; a military or intelligence-gathering examination of a region. Reconnoisance is an older spelling of reconnaissance; it is also a NEEDLESS VARIANT of recognizance and of recognition. The verb corresponding to reconnaissance is reconnoiter, -re, Q.V. See cognizance (A).

recollect. A. And remember. The distinction is a subtle one worth observing. To remember is to recall what is ready at hand in one's memory. To recollect is to find something stored further back in the mind.

B. And re-collect. See RE- PAIRS.

recommend against. Recommend is a word with positive connotations; in all the examples in the OED, it is construed with to. The antonym of recommend is discommend, which should appear in place of recommend against in the following sentence: "Shortly thereafter, 45 college hours were required for applicants, even though civil-service officials recommended against [read discommended] this increase in the number of required hours." See discommend.

recompensable is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of compensable—e.g.: "The determination of the recompensable [read compensable] cost of the cleanup remains to be determined at a hearing subsequent to the filing of this opinion and order." State ex rel. Celebrezze v. Specialized Finishers, Inc., 604 N.E.2d 842, 852 (Ohio Ct. Common Pleas 1991). See compensable (A).

recompense. A. Generally. This word, both a transitive verb ("to repay, compensate") and a noun ("payment in return for something"), is a FORMAL WORD that is equivalent to but more learned than compensate or compensation. In BrE the noun is sometimes spelled -ce.

Recompense is used more frequently as a noun than as a verb—e.g.: "As recompense for the loss of the M(O)ther, the child is promised access to other women and entrance into the society of Fathers through exchange." Jeanne L. Schroeder, Virgin Territory: Margaret Radin's Imagery of Personal Property as the Inviolate Feminine Body, 79 Minn. L. Rev. 55, 160 (1994)./ "For students who are the victims of peer harassment, a variety of means (failing formal resolution), exist to ameliorate the abusive environment or to seek recompense for injuries." Gail Sorenson, Peer Sexual Harassment: Remedies and Guidelines Under Federal Law, 92 Ed. Law Rep. 1, 16 (1994).

Although compensate is a much more common verb than recompense, the latter does frequently appear—more commonly in law than elsewhere. E.g., "It is possible to find exceptions, to be sure: a famous author tells a dunce tale at the expense of an industrial worker who loses a finger by accident, is recompensed, and decides to lose another . . . " Richard Delgado & Jean Stefancic, Scorn, 35 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 1061, 1092 (1994)./ "Section 1983 damages have the dual advantages over Rule 11 sanctions of (1) providing a discrete harm to be recompensed, and (2) supporting an award that incorporates the significance of constitutional violations." James W. Harper, Note, Attorneys as State Actors, 21 Hastings Const. L.Q. 405, 436 (1994). See compensate (B).

B. And Its Needless Variants. Both as a noun and as a verb, recompense has its NEEDLESS VARIANTS. The variant noun is recompensation—e.g.: "[T]he trial court is not compelled to order total recompensation [read recompense or compensation], but may order a modification with respect to any period . . . ." Reid v. Reid, 409 S.E.2d 155, 169 (Va. Ct. App. 1991)./ "Also, the trial court awarded Travelers $70,330.78 in recompensation [read compensation]." Scamardo v. New Orleans Stevedoring Co., 595 So. 2d 1242, 1245 (La. Ct. App. 1992).

The needless verb is recompensate—e.g.: "If the employee is then unable to utilize her partial earning capacity because of her disability, an award of temporary disability benefits does not recompensate [read recompense or compensate] her for her permanent disability and no double compensation takes place." Ahoe v. Quality Park Prods., 258 N.W.2d 885, 890 (Minn. 1977).

recompensive (= compensatory) is a rare term whose use in modern prose strikes the reader as a straining for the recherché term.

reconnaissance; reconnoisance. See recognizance.

reconnoiter; reconnoitre. The verb form corresponding to the noun reconnaissance is preferably spelled -er in AmE and -re in BrE. See recognizance.

record. A. Usage and Sense. Record frequently occurs in law in the phrases in the record and of record <attorney of record>. Usually record refers to the official report of the proceedings in any case, and it has three parts: all the filed papers in the case; the verbatim transcript of hearings, conferences, and testimony; and the tangible exhibits that the parties put in evidence. The record is read on appeal by the judges who review it for reversible errors. In administrative law, record refers to all considerations actually taken into account in deciding an issue.

Record has come to be used adjectivally as shorthand for in the record. E.g., "We find no record support [i.e., support in the record] for this contention." It is preferable not to collapse the prepositional phrase into a nominal adjective in this way because some readers will likely have a MISCUE. See NOUN PLAGUE.

B. And transcript; report of proceedings; statement of facts. Generally, a transcript or report of proceedings is an official copy of the recorded proceedings in a trial or hearing. But in Texas, the phrase statement of facts carries that sense, whereas transcript refers to the following: "in civil cases, the live pleadings upon which the trial was held; in criminal cases, copies of the indictment or information, any special pleas and motions of the defendant which were presented to the court and overruled, and any written waivers; the court's docket sheet; the charge of the court and the verdict of the jury, or the court's findings of fact and conclusions of law; the court's judgment or other order appealed from; any motion for new trial [etc.] . . . ." Tex. R. App. P. 51(a). In other words, Texas lawyers use transcript when other lawyers would use record. See report of proceedings.

C. BrE Pronunciation. In British legal English, the noun record "is pronounced like the verb, with the stress on the second syllable." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 63 (11th ed. 1982).

recordation; recordal. The latter is not a proper word, though it has erroneously appeared in such phrases as "recordal of a trademark with the Treasury Department." Recordation is the word. E.g., "The supplemental complaint requests that both the Customs Service and Art's Way remove the recordal [read recordation] of the DION registration to permit unimpeded entry of the machinery into the United States." B & R. Choiniere Ltd. v. Art's-Way Mfg. Co., 207 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 969, 971 (N.D.N.Y. 1979).

recorder = (1) in BrE, a practicing barrister who acts as a usu. part-time judge, esp. in a crown court; or (2) in AmE, a person with whom a deed or mortgage to be recorded is deposited.

record reveals that, the. This phrase is responsible for more sprawling sentences than perhaps any other stock phrase in appellate judicial opinions. And it is redundant: any facts being related by an appellate court must (with a few exceptions) be revealed in the record.

recount; re-count. See RE- PAIRS recourse; resort. Recourse (= (1) application to a person or entity for help; or (2) the right of a holder of a negotiable instrument to demand payment from the drawer and indorsers when the first liable party fails to pay. The term is used in the idiomatic phrases have recourse to and without recourse. The latter is the peculiarly legal phrase that, when added to the indorsement of commercial paper, protects the indorser from liability to the indorsee and later holders. Resort (= that which one turns to for refuge or aid) is closely related to sense (1) of recourse.

recover (= to secure by legal process) takes from or against in modern usage. The collocation recover of is an ARCHAISM for recover from. E.g., "It is equally well settled that the reasonable expenses incurred by an indemnitee in defending a claim against him may be recovered of [read recovered from] his indemnitor."/ "This is an action of tort to recover of [read recover from] the defendant damages for a malicious abuse of process." Cf. of (E).

recoverable = compensable, q.v. The term originally meant "capable of being recovered or regained," but was extended in legal usage, because of the nature of damages, to "capable of being legally obtained." E.g., "The rule is that special damages for breach of contract are not recoverable unless they can fairly and reasonably be considered as arising naturally from the breach." Strictly speaking, the special damages are not to be recovered, for they are being awarded for the first time to the complainant; but this usage is quite permissible in the legal idiom.

recover back might appear to be a legal REDUNDANCY. E.g., "Generally, a co-owner who pays a disproportionate share of the necessary expenses of the property may recover back the excess in an action for contribution, accounting, or partition."

But in common-law terminology a distinction exists between to recover (= to obtain, as in recovering damages) and to recover back (= to secure the return of, as in recovering back money paid incorrectly, as by mistake). E.g., "The general rule is that money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract cannot be recovered back."

recover of. See recover.

recreate; re-create. The former means either "(of a pastime or relaxation) to refresh or, agreeably occupy" or "to amuse oneself, indulge in recreation" (COD); the latter means "to create anew." The hyphen makes a great difference: "The words of the witness cannot 'give' or recreate [read re-create] the 'facts,' that is, the objective situations or happenings about which the witness is testifying."/ "The company's termination of the positions was a pretext for unfair labor practices, which demonstrates that these positions must now be re-created to provide an efficacious remedy." See RE- PAIRS.

recreational; recreative. The former is the preferred adjective corresponding to the noun recreation. E.g., "During this additional time the employees variously slept, ate, played cards or engaged in other recreative [read recreational] activities." Madera Police Officers' Ass'n v. City of Madera, 194 Cal. Rptr. 648, 651 (Ct. App. 1983).

recriminatory; recriminative. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

rectification — a court's equitable correction of a contractual term that is misstated, as where the rent is wrongly recorded in a lease or the area of land is recited incorrectly in a deed. To a degree, this term applies also to statutory construction—e.g.: "[I]t would be a mistake to suppose that the Courts never indulge in milder acts of rectification. Something of the sort happens whenever 'and' is read as 'or' or vice versa; but these milder acts of rectification are most exceptional." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 25 (1976).

recur. See reoccur.

recurrence; recurrency; reoccurrence. Recurrence is the preferred form, reoccurrence being a secondary variant meriting only careful avoidance. Recurrency is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

recusal; recusation; recusement; recusancy; recusance. The preferred nominal form of the verb recuse (= to remove [oneself] as a judge considering a case) is recusal, though its earliest known use is as recent as 1950: "On the 13th of April, Judge Longshore filed an order of recusal accompanied by an order vacating his former order . . . ." Methvin v. Haynes, 46 So. 2d 815, 817 (Ala. 1950).

Recusation and recusement (the latter not listed in the OED) are now NEEDLESS VARIANTS in common-law contexts. Recusation is not uncommon, esp. in civil-law writing. See, e.g., State v. DeMaio, 58 A. 173 (N.J. 1904); Stewart v. Reid, 38 So. 70 (La. 1905). Although recusation is understandably common in Louisiana, it persists, oddly, in other jurisdictions. E.g., "[T]he plaintiff asserts the 'essence' of his motion for recusation [read recusal] is what the trial justice 'himself said and how he has ruled.'" Barber v. Town of Fairfield, 486 A.2d 150, 152 (Me. 1985)./ "The trial judge admitted making these remarks upon defendant's motion for . . . continuance and recusation [read recusal]." State v. Majors, 325 S.E.2d 689, 690 (N.C. Ct. App. 1985)./ "[O]nce a prosecutor recuses himself, the recusation [read recusal] applies to all aspects of the case." Daugherty v. State, 466 N.E.2d 46, 49 (Ind. Ct. App. 1984)./ "Canon 3C(1)(a) is basically a broad standard by which a judge should sua sponte [q.v.] determine the matter of self-recusation [read recusal]." State v. Smith, 242 N.W.2d 320, 323 (Iowa 1976). For an example of INELEGANT VARIATION with recusal and recusation, see Reilly v. Southeastern Pa. Transp. Auth., 489 A.2d 1291, 1297–98 (Pa. 1985).

Recusement appears far less commonly—e.g.: "[P]laintiff filed a challenge for Mr. Booker's recusement [read recusal] upon the ground that he had prejudged the case." Cobble Close Farm v. Board of Adjustment, 92 A.2d 4, 10 (N.J. 1952)./ "Following our opinion . . . , the Honorable Paul M. Marko . . . entered an order of recusement [read recusal] in the fall of 1982 . . . ." Irwin v. Irwin, 455 So. 2d 1118, 1119 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1984).

Recusancy is a different word, meaning "obstinate refusal to comply." Recusance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of recusancy.

recuse; disqualify. The two words are not quite interchangeable in modern legal usage. Disqualify might always be used in place of recuse, but the reverse does not hold true. Disqualify, the broader term, may be used of witnesses, for example, as well as of judges, whereas recuse is applied only to someone who sits in judgment (usu. judges or jurors).

Recuse is almost invariably reflexive; that is, judges are said to recuse themselves. Disqualify may also be used reflexively <under these circumstances, the judge should disqualify herself from sitting in the case>. Just as commonly, though, lawyers use this verb nonreflexively <his years began to disqualify him from more active work>.

Recuse is by far the more interesting word, primarily because of its inadequate treatment in English-language dictionaries. Both recuse and its legal cognates are missing from AHD and were not included in Merriam-Webster dictionaries until the publication of W10 (1993). The word might seem to be moribund in BrE, for the Chambers 20th Century Dictionary says: "to reject, object to (e.g. a judge) (arch.)." The sense of objecting to is fairly rare—e.g.: "[One-half of the plantation] with lien privilege to contribute to or recuse the contribution of the sum of [$7,347.30] . . . ." Grant v. Buckner 172 U.S. 232, 237 (1898) (quoting trial-court decree).

How the word evolved from that sense of objecting, as reflected in the OED, to the modern sense is curious indeed. Today, when we say recuse, we almost always mean "to remove (oneself) as judge in a legal matter." The one exception appears to be the phrase motion to recuse, in which the meaning is "to seek to have (a judge) removed from participating in the adjudication of a legal matter." Thus we encounter specimens such as these:

- "This motion denied, the trustee moved to recuse the examiner for bias and prejudice." N.L.R.B. v. Phelps, 136 F.2d 562, 565 (5th Cir. 1943).
- "Motion to recuse THE CHIEF JUSTICE denied." Kerpelman v. Attorney Grievance Comm'n, 450 U.S. 970, 970 (Order of 2 March 1981).
- "Motion to recuse JUSTICE POWELL denied." Ernest v. United States Attorney, 474 U.S. 1016, 1016 (Order of 9 Dec. 1985).

These are the exceptions, however, in modern usage. Today, 99% of the occurrences of recuse are reflexive.

How, then, did we get from (1) "to object to (a judge) as prejudiced" (OED), to (2) "to remove (oneself) as an adjudicator"? Surprisingly, the Supreme Court appears to have deprecated the newer meaning just after the turn of the 20th century, by enclosing the word in telltale quotation marks: "The plaintiffs, when the case was called for trial, filed a written motion or petition, challenging the right of the presiding judge to hear the case, and praying that he 'recuse' himself." McGuire v. Blount, 199 U.S. 142, 143 (1905).

Yet a reporter of the Court's opinions had used the word in this sense more than a half-century before, in what appears to be the earliest use of the reflexive: "The judge recused himself, and the suit, by consent of the parties, was transferred for trial to the District Court." Fourniquet v. Perkins, 48 U.S. (7 How.) 160, 165 (1849) (reporter's rendition of appellant's argument).

In the 19th and early 20th centuries, the word was not at all common. In fact, a computer search reveals only 38 cases in which the uninflected verb recuse appeared before 1950, and 3,219 cases between 1950 and 1989. The paucity of uses before 1950 may explain the notation in W2 that recuse is "obs. exc. in Civil and Canon Law."

Because recuse is virtually always reflexive today, it cannot be used in the PASSIVE VOICE, unlike disqualify. To say that a judge is disqualified is perfectly idiomatic, but to say one is recused is not.

When used reflexively, both verbs sometimes take an understood object. These are nothing more than lawyers' elliptical expressions: "Had Black disqualified, he would have departed from the traditions of 150 years." John P. Frank, Disqualification of Judges, 56 Yale L.J. 605, 636 (1947)./ "[R]elief . . . for failure to recuse on the merits." 13A Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 3550, at 627 n.8 (1984).

recusement. See recusal.

redact. See revise.

redeemable; redemptible. Writers should eschew the latter; it is pedantic, unnecessary, and irredeemable.

redemption, equity of. See cloud on title.

redemptive; redemptory; redemptional. Redemptive = tending to redeem, redeeming. Redemptory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Redemptional = of or pertaining to redemption—e.g.: "Having been divested of ownership prior to the sale and having incurred penalties for delinquent nonpayments which it has paid, its personal obligation for the redemptional penalty became a myth." Weston Inv. Co. v. State, 180 P.2d 962, 965 (Cal. Ct. App. 1947).

redhibition. Louisiana is the only American jurisdiction in which this civil-law term is used. It denotes the voidance of a sale as the result of an action brought on account of some defect in something sold, on grounds that the defect renders the thing sold either useless or so imperfect that the buyer would not have purchased it if the buyer had known of the defect. Redhibitory is the usual adjectival form. redintegration. See reintegration.

redirect is a common shorthand form of redirect examination, which in American usage follows cross-examination. E.g., "Often the attorney, in cross-examination of a witness, produces from him statements that create an impression favorable to his own client. If the impression is misleading, it may lodge in the minds of the jurors and become ineradicable unless corrected; to correct it, the opposing attorney may readdress additional questions to his own witness. This is called the redirect." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 121 (1963)./ "On redirect, the Government inquired whether Lowe had any reason to try to protect himself . . . ." U.S. v. Edwards, 716 F.2d 822, 825 (11th Cir. 1983). The equivalent BrE term is re-examination, q.v. Cf. direct.

redound, now used most commonly in the CLICHÉ to redound to the benefit of (which is verbose for to benefit), may also be used in negative senses <to redound against or to the shame of>.

redressable; redressible. The former spelling is standard.

red tape. Lawyers and government officials formerly used red ribbons (called "tapes") to tie together their papers. Gradually during the 19th century, these red ribbons came to symbolize rigid adherence to time-consuming rules and regulations. Writers such as Scott, Longfellow, and Dickens used the term red tape, and now it has become universal—but its origins are widely forgotten.

reduce should not be used as a reflexive verb when the subject is inanimate—e.g., "The question reduces itself [read is reducible or may be reduced] to one of statutory interpretation."/ "The government's case reduces itself [read is reducible] to this: the defendant was in a public restaurant at a time when someone said that a drug deal might be going on."

REDUNDANCY. Washington Irving wrote that "redundancy of language is never found with deep reflection. Verbiage may indicate observation, but not thinking. He who thinks much says but little in proportion to his thoughts." Lawyers should think much about those words, and begin to write less. (See CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF.) Following are some of the typical manifestations of redundancy in legal writing.

A. General Redundancy. This linguistic pitfall is best exemplified, rather than discoursed on:

- "No one need fight city hall unnecessarily." [Read One need not fight city hall. Or: It is unnecessary to fight city hall.]/ "This type of obligation imposes an undue restriction on alienation or an onerous burden in perpetuity." (Onus = burden, hence onerous burden is redundant.)
- "National is discharged from all its obligations as obligor." [Read National is discharged as obligor. Or: National is discharged from all its obligations.]
- "By allowing representatives of the tenants, who obviously shared a common interest [read shared an interest or had an interest in common], to maintain a single action, the equity court eliminated the necessity of trying the common questions repetitively in separate actions."
- "These two paragraphs are the least legible and the most difficult to read [omit and the most difficult to read] in the instrument, but they are most important in the evaluation of the rights of the contesting parties." (In context, the sentence related exclusively to legibility and had nothing to do with readability.)

- "The mere fact that the association acquired its knowledge later in point of time [omit in point of time] gave the appellant no superior legal position over the association."
- "The purpose of the statute is to ensure a high standard of education for Texas citizens while at the same time [omit at the same time] lessening the incentive for aliens to enter the United States illegally."

See while at the same time & oftentimes.

B. Awkward Repetitions. Samuel Johnson once advised his readers to "avoid ponderous ponderosity." The repetition of roots was purposeful, of course. Many legal writers, however, engage in such repetitions with no sense of irony, as in the phrases build a building, refer to a reference, point out points, an individualistic individual. As great a writer as he was, Chief Justice Marshall seems not to have had a stylistic design in the following repetition, though he may have been striving for a rhetorical effect: "The question is, in truth, a question of supremacy [read is, in truth, one of supremacy] . . . ." McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 433 (1819). In the sentences that follow, however, the repetitions are mere thoughtless errors:

- "Said use of the trademark [read The trademark] has been used in foreign commerce and interstate commerce in the United States continuously since 1926." The use has not been used, but rather the trademark. This sentence exemplifies one strain of ILLOGIC.
- "The plaintiffs' number was number 37." [Read The plaintiffs' number was 37.]
- "This judicially required warrant requirement [read This judicial requirement of a warrant] has been described as a 'narrow one.'" / "Notice was mailed by registered mail." [Read Notice was sent by registered mail.]
- "The basis of his liability here was based [read His liability was based] on a legal relationship only, not his primary negligence."
- "The subdivided lots were sold as individual lots with deed restrictions restricting development to single-family homes [read with deeds restricting development to single-family homes]."
- "The resolution of the board of directors accepting property for shares must specify the specific [omit specific] property involved."
- "By cheating, he avoids pursuing knowledge that he, according to his transcript, should know [read have]." (One does not know knowledge; one has it.)

See injunction enjoining.

C. Common Redundancies. Many of these are treated in separate entries. It is useful to be aware that phrases such as the following are redundant: named nominee, adult parent (but maybe this is no longer redundant), to plead a plea, cost-expensive, active agent, end result, erroneous mistake, integral part, past history (arguably established), connect up or together, future forecast, merge together, mingle together, join together (arguably acceptable), mix together. For idiomatic redundancies in the form of coupled synonyms, see DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM STRINGS.

redundancy pay. See severance pay.

reek; wreak. These homophones are occasionally confused. Reek = to give off an odor or vapor. As a noun, reek = an odorous vapor. Wreak = to inflict <to wreak havoc>.

reenactment is now written as a solid—without a hyphen after re. See PUNCTUATION (F).

re-enforce. See reinforce.

re-enter; re-entry. Both terms are best hyphenated.

re-establish should be so hyphenated.

re-examination, primarily a BrE term, is equivalent to the AmE term redirect examination. Following are examples of the noun and verb forms: "In re-examination, as in examination in chief, leading questions are ordinarily not permitted, unless they concern some matter not in dispute, when they are allowed in order to save time." Pendleton Howard, Criminal Justice in England 367 (1931)./ "Witnesses examined in open court must be first examined in chief, then cross-examined, and then re-examined." (Eng.) See direct examination & redirect.

referable; referrable; referible. The preferred form is referable, which is accented on the first syllable; otherwise the final -r- would be doubled. The sense is "capable of being referred to." E.g., "The maxim of clean hands will not be invoked unless the inequitable conduct sought to be attributed to plaintiff is referable to the very transaction that is the source of the instant controversy."

Referrable often mistakenly appears; the form is old, but has long been held inferior to referable. E.g., "The only other causes of action pleaded by plaintiff referrable [read referable] to reimbursement are those of constructive fraud arising out of Tony's alleged operation of the corporation as his alter ego."/ "After review of the procedure followed, the board decided that the dispute was not referrable [read referable] to a public law board for reconsideration on the merits."

refer back is a common REDUNDANCY, refer alone nearly always being sufficient. E.g., "As to the use of memoranda, refer back to [read refer to] Ward v. Morr Transfer & Storage Co., at page 446 supra."/ "Section 72411.5 simply refers us back to [read refers us to] the contract." Cf. relate back. See return back & revert (B).

Refer back may be justified in those rare instances in which it means "to send back to one who or that which has previously been involved," as here: "The case is simply referred back to the arbitrator for a rewording of his opinion."

reference, as a verb meaning "to provide with references," is defensible. E.g., "The cross-referenced statute contains two subsections." It should not, however, be used for refer, as here: "He stated that, without referencing [read referring to] that file, he could not answer the question." See NOUNS AS VERBS reference, n. See allude (A) & referral.

referendum. Pl. -da, -dums. The English plural -dums seems to be on the rise—e.g.: "The most recent innovation of holding consultative referendums may also have come to have some impact . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 107 (1983)./ "The main novelty in the new agreement is that . . . referendums would be held . . ." Alan Riding, Muslims and Serbs in Bosnian Accord, N.Y. Times, 17 Sept. 1993, at A1. See PLURALS (A).

referrable. See referable.

referral; reference. Both mean "the act of referring." Reference is the broader, general term. Referral, which began as an Americanism in the early 20th century but now is used commonly in BrE as well, means specifically "the referring to a third party of personal information concerning another" or "the referring of a person to an expert or specialist for advice."

reflection; reflexion. The former spelling is preferred in both AmE and BrE. Reflexion was formerly common in British writing. Fowler recommended -ction in all senses (MEU1 at 489).

reform; re-form. See RE- PAIRS.

refoulement /ri-fowl-mənt/ is a French term meaning "expulsion or return of a refugee from one state to another where his or her life or liberty would be threatened." It originally appeared as a title for Article 33 of the 1951 Geneva Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, which reads: "No contracting state shall expel or return ('refouler') a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened." (See Lin v. Rinaldi, 361 F. Supp. 177, 183 (D.N.J. 1973).) The title of that article of the Convention, Refoulement, is enclosed in quotation marks, no doubt signifying that in 1951 it was taken as a foreign word.

Its earliest known use as an English term, in the negative form, appears in Chun v. Sava, 708 F.2d 869, 877 n.25 (2d Cir. 1983): "[T]he United States appears to recognize a liberty interest, the right of nonrefoulement for a refugee." See also Ramirez-Osorio v. I.N.S., 745 F.2d 937, 944 (5th Cir. 1984) ("[T]here is a sufficiently secured right of nonrefoulement . . . to give rise to a protectible liberty interest"). The word is yet to be recorded in an English dictionary.

refractory; refractive. These terms have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. Refractory = stubborn, unmanageable, rebellious. E.g., "Under such circumstances the disappointed legatee may in a court of equity compel the sequestration of the legacy to the refractory legatee for the purpose of diminishing the amount of his disappointment." Refractive = that refracts light.

refrain; restrain. Both mean generally "to put restraints upon," but refrain is used in reference to oneself in the sense "to abstain" <he refrained from exchanging scurrilities with his accuser>, whereas restrain is used of another <the police illegally restrained the complainant from going into the stadium>.

refutation; refutal. The latter is an ill-formed NEEDLESS VARIANT of refutation. It is hardly ubiquitous, but it has turned up in some unlikely places—e.g.:

- "The majority determined the second clause to be a direct refutal [read refutation] of the Court's holding in General Electric Co. v. Gilbert." Cathy M. Sellers, Note, State Laws Permitting Preferential Treatment of Pregnant Employees Are Valid Under the Pregnancy Discrimination Act, 15 Fla. St. U.L. Rev. 549, 561 (1987).
- "An evaluation is not subject to complete objective confirmation or refutal [read refutation]." U.S. v. Jones, 856 F.2d 146, 151 (11th Cir. 1988).

- "[A given book discusses] criticisms of Savigny's ideals and present[s] selected refutals [read refutations] by Savigny." Stephen A. Siegel, Lochner Era Jurisprudence and the American Constitutional Tradition, 70 N.C. L. Rev. 1, 76 n.384 (1991).

refutative; refutatory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

refute is not synonymous with rebut. It does not mean merely "to counter an argument," but "to disprove beyond doubt; to prove a statement false." Yet the word is commonly misused for rebut, as here: "The findings of the Commissioner carry a presumption of correctness and the taxpayer has the burden of refuting [read rebutting] them."/ "Appellant was allowed to put on witnesses to refute [read rebut] the sexual harassment charges, and he or his lawyer, or both, were present to cross-examine all the university's witnesses." See rebut.

In other contexts, the word seems to be misused for reject—e.g.: "Two-thirds of people refuted [read rejected] [Nicholas Ridley's] belief that European Monetary Union is a 'German racket to take over the whole of Europe' . . . ." Toby Helm, Majority Back Euro Ideals, Sunday Telegraph, 15 July 1990, at 1.

regard. A. As a Noun in the Phrases with regard to and in regard to. These two phrases are correct, but the forms with regards to and in regards to are, to put it charitably, poor usages—e.g.: "With regards to [read With regard to] the 1962 adoption of the at-large election scheme, plaintiffs argue with some merit that more should have been said about this event." The acceptable forms are best used as introductory phrases. Usually, however, they may advantageously be replaced by some simpler phrase such as concerning, regarding, considering, or even the simple prepositions in, about, or for.

The plural form, regards, is acceptable only in the phrase as regards. In other words, with regards to is bad form—e.g.: "With regards to [read With regard to] the 1962 adoption of the at-large election scheme, plaintiffs argue with some merit that more should have been said about this event."/ "He became furious at the mere mention of George F. Will, the columnist who accused him recently of 'judicial exhibitionism' with regards to [read with regard to] his trade-agreement ruling." Ruth M. Bond, At Center of Trade-Accord Storm, Judge Bristles but Watches Image, N.Y. Times, 17 Sept. 1993, at B11. See as regards, in regards to & respect.

B. As a Verb in the Phrases highly regarded and widely regarded. The verb regard commonly appears in these two combinations. The one phrase, highly regarded, is a vague expression of praise; the other, widely regarded as ——, usu. ends (i.e., the blank is usu. filled) with words of praise—though it would certainly be possible to say that someone is widely regarded as beneath contempt. It is a mistake, however, to truncate the latter phrase—to say widely regarded in place of highly regarded: "Crotty has had four major jury trials since leaving the firm, and he's widely regarded [read highly regarded] in both the plaintiffs' bar and the defense bar."

regardless (= without regard to) should not be used for despite (= in spite of). E.g., "The appellants voted to reject the plan, reiterating the grounds for their suit against Martin; regardless of [read despite] the appellants' vote, the plan was approved with two-thirds of the creditors voting for the plan." See irregardless.

regardless whether is incorrect for regardless of whether. E.g., "Regardless whether [read Regardless of whether] COGSA or Texas state law controls, appellee is not liable for any damages caused by the delay." See whether.

regards. See regard (A) & as regards.

regard to, in; with regard to. See in regards to & regard (A).

regist(e)rable. See registrable.

register; registrar. Both forms are used in referring to the governmental officer who keeps official records. The OED notes that register was commonly used in this sense from 1580 to 1800 and that registrar is now the usual word. But in AmE register retains vitality: various levels of government have registers of deeds, registers of wills, registers of copyrights, registers of patents, and the like. As a matter of AmE usage, a registrar is usu. a school official, whereas a register is usu. one who records documents for state or local government.

Apart from the agent-noun sense, the general meaning of register today is "a book or other record in which entries are made during the course of business." E.g., "A register of the proprietors of patents is kept at the Patent Office, and all assignments, licences, amendments, and revocations must be entered therein." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 160 (1951).

registrable, not registerable, is the preferred spelling—e.g.: "Since 1925 restrictive covenants have been registerable [read registrable] . . . " P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 284 (3d ed. 1981).

registrant /rej-i-strənt/ does not rhyme, in the final syllable, with restaurant.

registrar. See register.

registrate is an ill-conceived BACK-FORMATION from registration, the verb register being standard—e.g.: "[O]wners of realty interposed defense that broker had operated under an assumed name without filing or registrating [read registering] the name . . . ." Rathbun v. Hagn, 99 N.E.2d 567, 567 syl. 2 (Ill. App. Ct. 1951). It is true, however, that registrate is correctly used when denoting the setting of pipe-organ stops.

regress. See egress.

regretful; regrettable. Errors made are regrettable; the persons who have committed them, assuming a normal level of contrition, are regretful. But writers often misuse regretful for regrettable—e.g:

- "The psychiatrists all agreed that it was not likely that the appellant would have had a lucid moment on the date of this regretful [read regrettable] incident." Harris v. State, 648 S.W.2d 47, 50 (Ark. 1983) (Purtle, J., dissenting).
- "This is the fourth time the Court has sustained the imposition of the death penalty. Regretfully [read Regrettably], its decision does nothing to clarify the confusion or to harmonize the inconsistencies of the Court's capital-murder jurisprudence." State v. DiFrisco, 645 A.2d 734, 773 (N.J 1994) (Handler, J., dissenting).
- "Regretfully [read Regrettably], a legislature is seldom called upon to decide between right and wrong . . . ." State v. Gainer, 447 S.E.2d 887, 897 (W. Va. 1994).

regulable – able to be regulated; susceptible to regulation. Regulatable is incorrect, but it does occur—e.g.: "'[C]ommercial speech' . . . was regulatable [read regulable] under the law at that time . . . ." Insurance Adjustment Bureau v. Insurance Comm'r, 542 A.2d 1317, 1319 n.2 (Pa. 1988). See -ATABLE.

regulatory; regulative. The two forms of the adjective are both common, but regulatory predominates. That form is accented in AmE on the first syllable /reg-yə-lə-tohr-ee/, in BrE often on the third /reg-yə-lay-tə-ree/.

reify (= to make material, or convert mentally into a thing) is transitive only. It is sometimes misused as an intransitive verb—e.g.: "As soon as Schultz's objective reifies [read materializes], critics will have a more solid basis on which to evaluate his policies."

reign. See free reign & rein in.

reimbursement. See subrogation (C).

reinforce (= to strengthen) is the preferred form, though the base verb is enforce, not inforce. (Likewise with reinstate.) Rather than hyphenate or use a diaeresis and retain the -e- in such words (e.g., re-enforce, reënforce), the -e- in each word is changed to -i- when the prefix is added. Re-enforce (= to enforce again) is sometimes seen in AmE.

rein in, not reign in, is the correct form of the phrase meaning "to check, restrain." The metaphorical image is of the rider pulling on the reins of the horse to slow down (i.e., "hold your horses"). But many writers get it wrong—e.g.:

- "[A] scheme that mandates a death sentence either for a specific crime or when the sentencer finds the existence of specified aggravating factors and the absence of specified mitigating circumstances, while surely reigning in [read reining in] jury discretion, impermissibly limits the jury's ability to consider the moral culpability of the defendant . . . ." Williams v. Chrans, 742 F. Supp. 472, 498 (N.D. Ill. 1990) (citations omitted).
- "Regulatory schemes are necessary [for] . . . reigning in [read reining in] unbridled upset of the environment and its ecological systems by miners." U.S. v. Doremus, 658 F. Supp. 752, 755 (D. Idaho 1987). Notice the striking insensitivity to METAPHOR in this example: it is impossible to rein in (much less reign in) an unbridled horse—yet the writer has pushed the two images together. See VERBAL AWARENESS
- "This statement was but an echo which reigned in [read reined in] the defense encampment by which it was environed." Primeaux v. Leapley, 502 N.W.2d 265, 275 (S.D. 1993) (Henderson, J., dissenting).

Cf. free reign.

reintegration; redintegration. Reintegration is the usual form of the word in the sense "the act of restoring to a state of wholeness; renewal; reconstruction." Redintegration was formerly more common in this sense; it is still used in scientific and other technical contexts.

reiterate; iterate. It is perhaps not too literalistic to use iterate in the sense "to repeat," and reiterate in the sense "to repeat a second time [i.e., to state a third time]." The distinction is observed only by the most punctilious writers, reiterate being the usual term in either sense.

reject. In contract law, this is the verb ordinarily used to describe what an offeree does in turning down an offer, or a buyer in refusing tendered goods.

rejoinder; surrejoinder. A rejoinder, in former practice, was the pleading served by a defendant in answer to the plaintiff's reply (the pleading in answer to the defense). A surrejoinder was a plaintiff's pleading in reply to a defendant's rejoinder. See -ER (B) & COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS.

reknowned. See renowned.

relate back is not a REDUNDANCY in law; rather, the phrase invokes the doctrine of relation back, q.v. "Whenever the claim or defense asserted in the amended pleading arose out of the conduct, transaction, or occurrence set forth or attempted to be set forth in the original pleading, the amendment relates back to the date of the original pleading." Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(c)./ "Because the 1982 mortgages are between different parties from the 1977 mortgages, their priority does not relate back." relatedly is an adverb inferior even to reportedly—e.g.: "Relatedly, Idaho also adheres to the tenets of concurrent causation." Some better connective such as moreover or furthermore should be used. See reportedly.

relate to , when used as in the example just given, is a voguish expression characteristic of popular American cant in the 1970s and 1980s. It is unlikely to lose that stigma.

relater; relator. The former is the preferred spelling in the sense "narrator, one who relates." Relator is the legal term meaning "one who applies for a writ of mandamus or quo warranto on grounds that a defendant has breached—or threatens to breach—a public duty." E.g., "Members of the charitable organization can bring suit as relators in the name of the attorney general, but this is not always a practical remedy; not only do the relators bear the cost of the suit, but also the conduct of the litigation is controlled by the attorney general." See ex rel.

relation. A. And relative. These terms are interchangeable in the sense "a person who is kin," although currently relative is much more usual.

B. Legal Sense. Some legal scholars, most notably Professor Leon Green, have used relation as "the best term available to express the value of one human being to another. . . . Relations may be classified as family relations, trade relations, professional and political relations, labor relations, and general social relations." Leon Green, Cases on Injuries to Relations 1 (1940).

C. And relationship. Relation is the broader term in this pair, inasmuch as relationship refers either to kinship or to the fact of being related by some specific bond. The phrase in relationship with is almost always incorrect for in relation to. To be correct, the phrase would almost have to be in his (or her or its) relationship with, etc.

relation back, in legal JARGON, refers to the doctrine that an act done at a later time is considered in the eyes of the law to have occurred at an earlier time. E.g., "To the extent that a power of appointment has been thought of as a mere authority to act for the donor in the completion of a disposition initiated by the donor, the agency factor has dominated and the doctrine of relation back has been applied."/ "How a magistrate who has acted within his jurisdiction up to the point at which the missing evidence should have been, but was not, given, can thereafter be said, by a kind of relation back, to have had no jurisdiction over the charge at all, it is hard to see." (Eng.) See relate back.

One court has ill-advisedly hyphenated the phrase throughout, both when (as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE) it needs the hyphen <the relation-back rule> and when (as a noun) it does not <the doctrine of relation back>. See Lemelson v. Synergistics Research Corp., 669 F. Supp. 642, 647–48 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

relational = of or relating to relations between persons. E.g., "Out of the mass of decisions and scholarly writings it is now possible to chart a course of study for the lawyer whose professional activities will more and more be concerned with the protection of the relational interests of his clients" (i.e., interests in other human beings). The term is thus distinct from the adjective relative. See relation (C).

relationship. See relation (C).

relative, n.; relation. See relation (A). relative(ly) to. Relative to is a variant of in relation to or in comparison with; usually one of these longer phrases adds clarity. Partridge called relative to GOBBLEDYGOOK. In no event is relatively to proper. "Relatively to [read In relation to] her, his act was not negligent."

The phrase is also an awkward substitute for concerning or regarding: "The latter part of the paragraph contains language similar to that of paragraph (a) relative to [read concerning] the discharge of the corporation's liability if an agreement is signed by the parties."

relator. See relater.

relatrix. See SEXISM (C).

relay; re-lay. See RE- PAIRS.

release. A. Senses. Release = (1) liberation from an obligation, duty, or demand; (2) a written discharge, acquittance, or receipt; (3) a written authorization or permission for publication; (4) the act of conveying an estate or right to another, or of legally disposing of it; (5) a deed or document effecting a conveyance; (6) the action of freeing or fact of being freed from restraint or confinement; or (7) a document giving formal discharge from custody.

B. And re-lease. See RE- PAIRS.

releasee. The OED defines the word as "one to whom an estate is released," but the usual sense today—in AmE and BrE alike—is "one who is released," either physically or by contractual discharge. The following examples illustrate these two senses: "[A] hearing shall be held . . . within a reasonable time, unless a hearing is waived by the probationer, parolee or conditional releasee." Wyo. Stat. 7-13-408 (1985) (as quoted in Pisano v. Shillinger, 814 P.2d 274, 280 (Wyo. 1991)).// "[W]hen the actions or representations of the releasee so impair the mind and judgment of the releasor that he fails to understand the nature or consequence of his release, there has been no meeting of the minds." Haller v. Borror Corp., 552 N.E.2d 207, 210 (Ohio 1990).

The correlative word is usually releasor in legal usage, though most dictionaries record only releaser. The -or form follows the typical preference for such spellings in answer to an -ee form. See -EE.

releasement, once a fairly common word, is now merely a NEEDLESS VARIANT of release—e.g.: "Their dispute concerning the advisability of the releasement [read release] in lieu of calling the police continued throughout the remainder of the afternoon . . . ." Chavkin v. Rotter, 245 N.Y.S.2d 435, 436 (App. Div. 1963). See release (A).

release on licence. See parole.

releasor; releaser. See releasee.

relegate; delegate. To relegate is to consign to an inferior position or to transfer for decision or execution. E.g., "The administratrix of the prisoner's estate was not relegated exclusively to an FTCA remedy." To delegate is to commit (as powers) to an agent or representative.

relevance; relevancy. The former is preferred in both AmE and BrE. Relevancy was the predominant form in American and British writings on evidence of the 19th century, but now relevance is more common except in Scotland. See irrelevance.

relevant (= pertinent) is sometimes misused for applicable or appropriate. E.g., "The board of directors might then allocate such amounts among the several outstanding series of stock on the basis of any criteria it deems relevant [read applicable or appropriate]." See material.

relevant part, in. See in pertinent part.

relic; relict; relique. Relic = a surviving trace or memorial; something interesting because of its age. E.g., "The Rule in Shelley's Case is a relic, not of the horse-and-buggy days, but of the preceding stone-cart-and-oxen days."// "Today, decisions such as Mochan and Donoghue are widely viewed as relics." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law 41 (1982). Relique is an archaic spelling of the word.

Relict = widow; survivor. Because relict is used only in legal writing, is unknown to nonlawyers, is sometimes mistaken for relic, and invariably means merely "widow" or "widower," we might justifiably seek to conform to general English usage and write widow(er). Some legal writers have resorted to the tautologous DOUBLET widow and relict: "After the husband's death, the wife obtained probate of his will in common form in which she is described as 'widow and relict of the deceased.'" (Eng.) Widows and widowers unfamiliar with the term will not take kindly to being called relicts.

relief. See remedy.

relief over. See over (A).

relique. See relic.

relitigate. RH2 aside, relitigate (= to litigate again) is not recorded in most English-language dictionaries, but it has been widely used since the mid-19th century and is unquestionably useful. E.g., "[H]e would still be free to relitigate the issue whether the driver had had his permission and thus whether the insurance proceeds should not be credited against his personal liability . . . ." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 463 (4th ed. 1983). The corresponding noun, relitigation, is equally common.

rem. See in rem.

remainder. See rest, residue, and remainder & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

remainder; reversion. These terms are distinguishable on two grounds. First, a reversion always arises in the creator of a particular estate or in the creator's heirs; a remainder can never arise in the creator of the estate or in the creator's heirs. Second, a reversion may arise without any intent, express or implied, that the reversioner take; a remainder arises only when the instrument creating the present estate shows an intent that the remainderman take. See reversion.

remainderman (= the person to whom a remainder is devised) was formerly two words but is now regularly spelled as a single word. E.g., "A court may find, for example, that the donees take the property as joint tenants, as tenants in common, or that one donee takes as life tenant and the others as remaindermen."

A possible nonsexist equivalent is remainderer, but it is extremely rare—e.g.: "In the mean time the remainderer would have had a right to anticipate payment . . . ." Mellon's Appeal, 8 A. 183, 187 (Pa. 1887). See SEXISM (B).

remainder over. See over (A).

remainder subject to a condition precedent. See contingent remainder.

remand, n.; remandment. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, as is remission. See remission.

remand, v.t. A. Objects. People as well as cases may be remanded (or "sent back"): remand = (1) to send (a case) back to the court from which it came for some further action; or (2) to recommit (an accused) to custody after a preliminary examination. Sense (2) is more common in BrE than in AmE—e.g.: "Fagan, who pleaded not guilty to the charge, was remanded to Brixton Prison for psychiatric and medical reports." (Eng.)/ "If the accused is remanded in custody, the adjournment must not be for longer than eight days." Patrick Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 78 (1960).

B. Remand back as a Redundancy. Remand alone is preferable to remand back—e.g.: "Maine v. Thornton has been remanded back [omit back] to the Maine Supreme Judicial Court for action not inconsistent with the Supreme Court's decision."/ "The court remanded the case back [omit back] to the circuit court for a new hearing." See send back.

C. Pronunciation. Remand is pronounced /ra-mand/ both as a noun and as a verb.

remandment. See remand, n.

remanent. See remnant.

remark; re-mark. See RE- PAIRS.

remedial; remediable. Remedial (= providing a remedy; corrective; curative) is frequently pejorative in general English-language contexts <remedial learning>. In law, however, it usually acts as the adjective for legal remedy: "The constructive trust is a remedial device imposed to prevent a person from retaining title to property if the retention would unjustly enrich him at the expense of another."

Remediable = capable of being remedied. E.g., "A refusal to enforce that stems from a conflict of interest, that is the result of a bribe, vindictiveness, or retaliation, or that traces to personal or other corrupt motives ought to be judicially remediable." remediate is a BACK-FORMATION from remediation—and a NEEDLESS VARIANT of remedy: "[The agency is charged with the] solemn responsibility for remediating [read remedying] discrimination . . . ." Hinfey v. Matawan Regional Bd. of Educ., 391 A.2d 899, 907 (N.J. 1978)./ "In some legislative schemes designed to remediate [read remedy] or prevent harm to certain portions of the public, the doctrine of equitable tolling has been allowed . . . ." Dawe v. Old Ben Coal Co., 754 F.2d 225, 228 (7th Cir. 1985).

remediless; remedyless. As penny makes penniless, so remedy should make remediless (= without remedy; lacking any remedies)—e.g.: "The risk selected by the plaintiffs to pursue their tort claim under a collective liability theory which ultimately failed, thus leaving them remedyless [read remediless], was willingly assumed . . . ." Nina H. Compton & J. Douglas Compton, DPT Vaccine Manufacturer Liability, 20 N.M. L. Rev. 531, 549 (1990)./ "There were all sorts of problems with this characterization of marriage, including the fact that husbands would frequently desert their wives, leaving them remediless and without any property or other means of support." Margaret F. Brinig & Steven M. Crafton, Marriage and Opportunism, 23 J. Legal Stud. 869, 881 (1994).

remedy; relief. The latter has historically been more commonly used in the context of courts of equity, and the former in the context of courts of law. Thus one generally speaks of legal remedies and of equitable relief. See C.C. Langdell, A Brief Survey of Equity Jurisdiction (pt. 2), 1 Harv. L. Rev. 111, 111 (1887).

remember. See recollect (A).

remise = to give up, surrender, make over to another, release (any right, property, etc.) (OED). Though traditionally used in quitclaim deeds, the term is fast becoming a legal ARCHAISM. Several words—such as those just used in defining remise—are more specific and more widely understood.

remissible. So spelled. See -ABLE (A). remission. As a noun meaning "the act of remanding," remission is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of remand, n. Here is an example suggesting the writer's indulgence in INELEGANT VARIATION: "[A]n appellate court 'may remand the cause . . . .' The procedure for remission [read remand] of the cause to the lower court . . . is further regulated and controlled generally by the rules of the appellate courts." 14A Stephen M. Flanagan, Cyclopedia of Federal Procedure § 69.01, at 65 (1984). See remand, remit, remittance & renvoi.

In BrE, remission refers not only to the sending back of a case to a lower court, but also to the part of a prison sentence that a convict is allowed not to serve (e.g., remission for good conduct in prison).

remit = (1) to pardon; (2) to abate, slacken; mitigate; (3) to refer (a matter for decision) to some authority, send back (a case) to a lower court; (4) to send or put back; or (5) to transmit (as money). Senses (1) and (2) are uncommon today. Sense (4) is frequent in legal writing: "[T]he breach by the landlord of his covenant does not justify the refusal of the tenant to perform his covenant to pay rent. . . . The tenant is remitted to the right to recoup himself in the damages resulting from the landlord's breach of his covenant to repair." Mitchell v. Weiss, 26 S.W.2d 699, 700-01 (Tex. Civ. App.—El Paso 1930)./ "In remitting the members of this class to a solution at the ballot box, rather than dangling the carrot of reform by judicial injunction before them, the district court followed the course of wisdom and practicality."

Sense (5) is also quite common <upon receiving the demand letter, she promptly remitted the amount due>

Sense (3) was formerly common in legal prose, remit here being a synonym of remand: "The order should be reversed, with costs to the appellant payable out of the estate, and the proceedings remitted to the surrogate for entry of a decree in accordance with this opinion."/ "Nolan, Presiding Justice, dissents and votes to reverse and to remit the proceeding to Surrogate's Court for the entry of a decree as prayed for in the objections interposed by appellants."/ "The case is remitted to the Superior Court for the entry of a judgment on the verdict as directed." See remission.

remittance; remittal; remission; remitment. Remittance corresponds to sense (5) of remit, and means "money sent to a person, or the sending of money to a person." E.g., "On the other hand is the innocent shipper who paid the full amount of the charges to such defaulting party for remittance to the agent." Remitment is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Remission is the noun corresponding to senses (1) through (4) of remit, q.v.; it means either "forgiveness" or "diminution of force, effect, degree, or violence." Remittal is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

remitter; remittor; remittitur. Remitter = (1) one who sends a remittance; (2) a principle by which a person having two titles to an estate, and entering on it by the later or more defective of these titles, is held to hold it by the earlier or more valid one; or (3) the act of remitting a case to another court. (See remit.) The -or spelling is inferior.

Remittitur = (1) the process by which the court reduces the damages awarded in a jury verdict, or (2) the action of sending the transcript of a case back from an appellate to a trial court, or the notice for doing so. For sense (2), the usual phrase is remittitur of record.

remittitur; remittitur of record; remittor. See remitter.

remnant; remanent. The latter is an archaic spelling to be avoided.

remonstrate. The second syllable is accented /ri-mon-strayt/ in AmE, the first syllable /rem-ən-strayt/ in BrE.

remote has a special legal meaning in contexts involving the rule against perpetuities: "beyond the 21 years after some life in being by which a devise must vest." E.g., "In Leake v. Robinson, there actually were afterborn children with respect to whom the remainder might have vested remotely." See in being & in esse.

REMOTE RELATIVES. Surprisingly few grammarians discuss what has become an increasingly common problem: the separation of the relative pronoun (that, which, who) from its antecedent. For example, in the sentence "The files sitting in the courtroom that I was talking about yesterday are in disarray," the word that strictly modifies courtroom, not files. But many writers today would intend to have it modify files—they would loosely employ a "remote relative."

The best practice is simply to ensure that, whatever the relative pronoun, it immediately follow the noun that it modifies. As the following examples illustrate, lapses involving which are extremely common:

- "This work required a law court in the modern sense made up of a small number of judges of education and ability skilled in the law which sat regularly term after term, generally at Westminster, often at the Exchequer." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 3 (1930). Which modifies court (21 words and 7 nouns before). [A possible revision: This work required a law court in the modern sense: one that was made up of a small number of judges of legal education and ability and that sat regularly term after term, generally at Westminster, often at the Exchequer.]
- "States, like individuals, often put forward contentions for the purpose of supporting a particular case which do not necessarily represent their settled or impartial opinion . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 61 (5th ed. 1955). Which modifies contentions (9 words and 3 nouns before). [A possible revision: States, like individuals, often put forward contentions that support a particular case but do not necessarily represent their settled opinion.]
- "If a terrorist places a bomb by the front door of a Cabinet Minister, which does damage but fortunately does not kill anybody, could this be an attempt to murder?" Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 371 (1978). Which modifies bomb (9 words and 3 nouns before). [A possible revision: If a terrorist places a bomb by the front door of a Cabinet Minister and that bomb does damage but fortunately does not kill anybody, could this be an attempt to murder?]
- "The convenience of the litigants is the next quality in the administration of justice which I shall consider." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 59 (1979). Which modifies quality (6 words and 3 nouns before). [A possible revision. The convenience of the litigants is the next quality that I shall consider in the administration of justice.]
- "[T]here are today a great many other bodies exercising quasi-judicial powers which are not regarded strictly speaking as courts, though many of them do perform functions very closely analogous to those of ordinary courts." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 27 (1983). Which modifies bodies (4 words and 2 nouns before). [A possible revision: There are today a great many other bodies exercising quasi-judicial powers; these bodies are not regarded strictly speaking as courts, though many of them do perform functions very closely analogous to those of ordinary courts.]
- "People may have claims against each other and against the State which are of a moral or political character . . . ." Id. at 112. Which modifies claims (8 words and 3 nouns before). [A possible revision: People may have moral and political claims against each other and against the State.]
- "Legislators are constantly making decisions about law reform which depend on moral values." Simon Lee, Law and Morals 3 (1986). Which modifies decisions (4 words and 2 nouns before). [A possible revision: Legislators are constantly making decisions about law reform, and many of these decisions depend on moral values.]

But that is almost as troublesome, and when used remotely is even more likely to cause confusion—e.g.:

- "The law has a way of looking at family relationships that is different, or may be different, from the moral, the social, or the religious way." Max Radin, The Law and You 17 (1948). That modifies way (6 words and 2 nouns before). [A possible revision: The law has a way of looking at family relationships—a way that is different, or may be different, from the moral, the social, or the religious way.]
- "All groups seem to develop noticeable characteristics, so that some can recognize sailors, clergymen, actors and other occupational groups that are not at all hereditary and hardly attributable to any definite physical cause." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 42 (1961). That modifies characteristics (13 words and 6 nouns before). [A possible revision: All groups seem to develop noticeable characteristics that are not at all hereditary or attributable to any definite physical cause, but that allow some peo- ple to recognize sailors, clergy, actors, and other occupational groups.]

- "There is another important aspect of the case, and that is whether, in placing so heavy a burden on the jury, it has brought about a shift of responsibility for decisions in the moral field that affects the democratic process I have endeavoured to describe." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 98 (1968). What affects the democratic process? The moral field? The responsibility for decisions? The shift in that responsibility? The answer seems to be shift (9 words and 4 nouns before). [A possible revision: There is another important aspect of the case, and that is whether the heavy burden placed on the jury has brought about a shift of responsibility for decisions in the moral field—a shift that affects the democratic process I have endeavoured to describe.]
- "The plain fact is that in most cases where doubt can arise as to whether a particular situation is covered by a statute, no intellectual resources are available to the legislature in deciding the question that are not equally available to the judge . . . ." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 33 (1968). That modifies resources (10 words and 3 nouns before). [A possible revision: In most cases in which doubt can arise about whether a particular situation is covered by a statute, the legislature has no intellectual resources that are not equally available to the judge.]
- "The most important changes in the law of future interests that the Statute of Uses wrought may be summarized in one sentence." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 113 (2d ed. 1984). That modifies changes (7 words and 3 nouns before). [A possible revision: The most important changes that the Statute of Uses wrought in the law of future interests can be summarized in one sentence.]
- "Lee Feltman, Esq., . . . appeals from an order of the district court, Edelstein, J., that adopted the findings and recommendations of Magistrate Gershon . . . ." Sassower v. Sheriff of Westchester County, 824 F.2d 184, 185 (2d Cir. 1987). Does that sentence refer to an order that adopted or the district court that adopted? It looks as if the writer meant to refer to order (7 words and 3 nouns before), not court. [A possible revision: Lee Feltman, Esq., . . . appeals from a district-court order that adopted the findings and recommendations of Magistrate Gershon . . . .]

Even who is used remotely, but its meaning is much more frequently clear—e.g.:

- "Gibson was a Democrat of Jackson's type (Jackson wished to put him on the Supreme Court of the United States), the son of a prosperous and successful man of business in a frontier community, who was also a colonel in the Revolutionary army." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 85 (1938). Who may modify either son (13 words and 4 nouns before) or man (7 words and 3 nouns before). It seems to modify the more remote of the two—son. [A possible revision: Gibson was a Democrat . . . , the son of a prosperous and successful man of business in a frontier community. Gibson was also a colonel in the Revolutionary army.]
- "The question whether one of a gang who is arrested at the scene of the crime continues to be 'present' there is considered in § 134." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 354 (2d ed. 1961). Who modifies one (4 words and 2 nouns before.) [A possible revision: The question whether a gang member who is arrested at the scene of the crime continues to be 'present' there is considered in § 134.]
- "Patricia Buthmann and Tim Tyroler on Tuesday lost their effort to block being evicted from the Casa Carranza apartments . . . because they allowed a woman to stay with them who possessed two syringes suspected to be drug paraphernalia." Kris Mayes, Renters Run Afoul of Eviction Law, Phoenix Gazette, 29 Sept. 1994, at B1. At first, the relative pronoun who may seem to modify them as part of an archaic construction; in fact, it modifies woman (5 words and 2 nouns before). [A possible revision: . . . because a woman who stayed with them possessed two syringes thought to be drug paraphernalia.]

At times, the remote relative may even appear in a phrase such as in which—e.g.: "The unexpected announcement renewed speculation about the 74-year-old Pope's broader state of health, particularly because he planned an important speech at the United Nations on the family in which he was expected to discuss the Vatican's views of the recent population conference in Cairo." Alan Crowell, Pope, Citing His Health, Cancels His Planned Trip to New York, N.Y. Times, 23 Sept. 1994, at A1. In which modifies speech (8 words and 3 nouns before). [A possible revision: The unexpected announcement renewed speculation about the 74-year-old Pope's broader state of health, particularly because he planned an important speech at the United Nations on the family. In that speech, he was expected to discuss the Vatican's views of the recent population conference in Cairo.]

As in the example just quoted, remote relatives often seem to result from the writer's ill-advised combining of two sentences into one. Among the advantages of avoiding remote relatives—avoiding MISCUES and even AMBIGUITY—is that you also improve your average SENTENCE LENGTH. For more on using that and which correctly, see RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES removable. This is the preferred spelling in both AmE and BrE, not removeable. See MUTE E.

remove, re-move. See RE- PAIRS.

remove; removal. In law, these terms have procedural senses that are generally unknown to nonlawyers. Removal = the transfer of an action from a court on one jurisdictional level to a court on another level. Thus, in the U.S., some state-court actions may be removed to federal court if the proper statutory basis exists. (The correlative term for transferring the action back to state court is remand, q.v.) In England, removal is the transfer of a High Court action from a district registry to London (or vice versa) or of a county court action to the High Court (or vice versa) (CDL).

removeable. See removable.

remuneration. So spelled; renumeration is an all-too-common misspelling and mispronunciation.

renant; reniant. At early common law, renant (the more common spelling) meant "denying." Reniant is a variant form.

rencontre; rencounter. Very little is certain about these words. W10 lists the main entry for this word under rencontre; the COD lists the main entry under rencounter, as does W2. Under rencontre, the COD labels both archaic, although the Merriam-Webster dictionaries list rencontre as a current word in the senses (1) "a hostile meeting or contest between forces or individuals; combat"; and (2) "a casual meeting." The OED adds the sense "an organized but informal meeting of scientists," dating from 1975 in BrE.

rend. See heart-rending.

render = (1) to make, cause to be; or (2) to give. Render is a FORMAL WORD worthy of describing judicial actions, although generally it is used in this context primarily in the U.S. For example, with regard to sense (2), judicial decisions are rendered. Nonjudicial responses are given, not rendered: "The majority seizes upon the petitioner's seven-word response, 'Uh, yeah, I'd like to do that,' rendered [read uttered] during a colloquy that could not have taken five minutes." Such an inarticulate statement from a habeas corpus petitioner should hardly be said to have been rendered. See heart-rending.

In AmE, the usual expression is that judgment is rendered; in BrE it is commonly written that judgment is given. E.g., "Judgment accordingly was given for the plaintiffs for the balance of the claim." (Aus.)

rendezvous. A. Plural Form. The singular noun rendezvous has an identical plural form—i.e., rendezvous, not -vouses.

B. Verb Inflections. As a verb, rendezvous makes rendezvouses in the third-person present tense, and rendezvoused in the past tense. (In both inflected forms, the root -s- is silent.) The present participle is rendezvousing.

rendition. The prevalent meaning today—"the action of rendering, giving out or forth" began as an Americanism but has now become universal. BrE retains an older, quasi-legal sense as well: "the surrender of a suspected or convicted person, usu. betw. two Commonwealth countries."

rendition of judgment; entry of judgment. Courts have traditionally distinguished between rendition of judgment (= the oral or written ruling containing the judgment entered) and entry of judgment (= the formal recordation of a judgment by the court). It has been said that rendition is the ultimate judicial act, whereas entry is merely ministerial in nature and evidentiary in purpose.

This distinction at one time posed problems in some cases in which no terminal judicial act was required, as with a jury's general verdict. In current American practice (Fed. R. Civ. P. 58), the verdict rendered by a jury or the decision rendered by the judge is converted into an 'inchoate' judgment, effective upon entry.

renege; renegue; renig. The first is the preferred form in AmE, the second the standard spelling in BrE, although the first is making inroads. Renig is a variant spelling in AmE—a NEEDLESS VARIANT renewal. See extension.

renewal of judgment; revival of judgment. "[G]enerally speaking there exists an important distinction between revival and renewal of judgments. Revival, by judicial decree on scire facias, removes dormancy and authorizes belated issuance of a writ of execution. Conversely, renewal, by civil action on the judgment, consists [in] a new money judgment endowed with its own actionability, executability, and creation of a lien." Stefan A. Riesenfeld, Creditors' Remedies and Debtors' Protection 101 (1979).

reniant. See renant.

renig. See renege.

renouncement. See renunciation.

renowned. So spelled; reknowned is wrong but fairly common for renowned. E.g., "Byatt is reknowned [read renowned] for her intelligence." Mira Stout, What Possessed A.S. Byatt, N.Y. Times, 26 May 1991, § 6 at 13, 14. The noun form is renown; there is no verb, though the past participle renowned functions as an adjective.

rent, n.; rental, n. Generally, one should not use rental where rent will suffice. Rental denotes the amount paid as rent, the income received from rent, or a record of rental payments received (e.g., the Grossvener Estate rental). Rental sometimes encroaches on rent itself: "The lessee agrees to pay the agreed-upon rental." If the writer had merely meant that the lessee must pay the rent (as opposed to a specific sum due periodically, e.g., monthly), then rent would have been the better term.

rent, v.t., is ambiguous insofar as it may refer to the action taken by either the lessor or the lessee; the word has had this doubleness of sense from at least the 16th century. Both the lessee and the lessor are renters, so to speak, though usually this term is reserved for tenants. Cf. lease, v.t.

rental, n. See rent, n.

rent(-)charge = the right to receive an annual sum from the income of land, usu. in perpetuity, and to retake possession if the payments are in arrears. Hyphenated in the OED, this word is now one word in BrE (as in the Rentcharges Act of 1977) and two words in AmE.

renumeration. See remuneration.

renunciation; renouncement. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

renvoi /ren-voi/ (F. "sending back") = the problem arising in private international law when one country's rule on conflict of laws refers a case to the law of a foreign country, and the law of that country refers the case either back to the law of the first country (remission) or to the law of a third country (transmission) (CDL). Within federal systems such as that of the U.S., renvoi applies when one state's conflicts rule refers the case to the law of another state. See remission.

reoccur is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the much preferable recur. See recurrence.

reoccurrence. See recurrence.

repairable. See reparable.

RE- PAIRS. Many English words beginning with the prefix re- take on different meanings depending on whether the prefix is hyphenated or is closed up. Some of these words, whose two different senses with and without the hyphen should be self-explanatory, are as follows:

re(-)bound re(-)claim re(-)call re(-)collect
re(-)count
re(-)cover
re(-)create re(-)dress
re(-)form
re(-)lay
re(-)lease
re(-)mark
re(-)move re(-)place
re(-)prove re(-)search re(-)sign
re(-)sound re(-)store
re(-)treat

reparable; repairable. Of these two terms, the former term has acquired a broader meaning. Used of damages, losses, or injuries, reparable means "capable of being set right again." Used of things, repairable means "capable of being repaired." The antonyms of these words are irreparable and unrepairable.

reparative; reparatory. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

repay. A. Sense. This word means "to pay back"—it should not refer to paying something for the first time, however long the sum has been due: "Earlier this year, Michael took out a $45,000 loan to repay [read pay] the back taxes and interest he owed." For Special Cases, a "Tax Therapist," N.Y. Times, 8 Dec. 1989, at 27.

B. Repay back. This is a REDUNDANCY.

repealer = (1) one who repeals; or (2) a legislative act abrogating an earlier act. Sense (2), of recent origin, is the more common one—e.g.: "Another method of reviving the judgment lien was docketing and indexing a writ of execution, now subject to special repealer." See -ER (B).

repeat again; repeat back. Both are REDUNDANCIES.

repel; repulse. Repulse (= to drive or beat back [an assailant]) denotes primarily a physical act of resistance, or a metaphor based on such resistance—e.g.: "The attack upon the representatives, indeed, had already been launched, and, after an initial victory, had been repulsed." C.H.S. Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law: Tort and Contract 358 (1949). Repel, by contrast, is primarily figurative. Hence repel is the verb corresponding most closely in meaning to the adjective repulsive, and a person who experiences repulsion is repelled. In the following sentences, repel is acceptably used as a near-synonym of rebut: "In such cases the burden of proof rests upon the party claiming the benefit under the transaction to repel the presumption thus created by law by showing a severance of the relation."/ "The circumstances repel any thought of fraud and speak cogently of the integrity of the instrument under review."

repellent; repulsive. Both mean, lit., "causing to turn away." Repulsive is the stronger word; it applies to whatever disgusts or offends in the extreme. Repellant, a variant spelling of repellent, is to be eschewed. See repel.

repetitive; repetitious; repetitional; repetitionary. A certain DIFFERENTIATION is emerging between the first two terms. Repetitive generally means "repeating, containing repetition." It is a largely colorless term. Repetitious, which has taken on pejorative connotations, means "containing tedious repetitions." E.g., "The court's holding today has the effect of requiring precisely this kind of repetitious appellate review."/ "None of the discovery sought, which in some instances is repetitious, cumulative, and peripheral, is relevant."

Repetitional and repetitionary are NEEDLESS VARIANTS of repetitive.

rephrase for paraphrase. One cannot use these two words interchangeably. One may paraphrase either statements or persons, but one may rephrase only statements. The writer of this sentence incorrectly used rephrase for paraphrase: "To rephrase [read paraphrase] Justice Frankfurter, newspapers are inherently available to all as a mode of expression."

replace; re-place. Here replace is used for re-place: "Where land or chattels have been wrongfully taken from a person, he can be replaced [read re-placed] substantially in the position which he formerly occupied by restoring to him in specie that which was taken from him." See RE- PAIRS.

repleader. See -ER (B).

repleat. See replete.

replenish makes the noun replenishment, not repletion (= a surfeit, plethora).

replete means not "complete," but "abundantly supplied with; full to overflowing." Repleat is an infrequent misspelling committed, e.g., by the court in Commonwealth v. Belmonte, 502 A.2d 1241, 1252 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1985).

repletion. See replenish.

repleviable; replevisable. Blackstone was ahead of his time in using repleviable rather than replevisable, which is now rightly considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT. The antonym of repleviable is irrepleviable. See replevy.

replevin; replevy, n. Replevin is the name of both a writ and a cause of action.

Replevy is an archaic variant of replevin as a noun, although it still appears: "A plaintiff who sought to recover a firearm allegedly illegally seized by a treasury agent was precluded from replevy [read replevin] of the weapon by a statute providing that all property taken under any revenue law of the United States shall not be repleviable."/ "The statute was designed to aid the collection of federal taxes by preventing a replevy [read replevin] under a state law of property seized by the collector." See detinue.

replevin, v.t., is an obsolete variant of the verb replevy. (See replevy.) When replevin is used as a verb in modern American legal writing, it is simply an error—e.g.: "[T]he . manufacturer wrongfully replevined [read replevied] a printing press." Cummins v. Brodie, 667 S.W.2d 759, 766 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1983)./ "Purchase of replevined replevisable. See repleviable.

replevy, vb., - (1) v.t., to regain possession of (personal property) under a provisional remedy that allows the plaintiff, upon giving security, to regain the disputed property from the defendant and to hold it until the court decides who owns it; (2) v.t., to regain possession of (personal property) by a successful action in replevin; or (3) v.i., to bring an action for replevin.

Though sense (3) is fairly infrequent, senses (1) and (2) are common. The distinction between them involves merely the stage that the litigation has reached: if the lawsuit is still pending, sense (1) applies—e.g.:

- "The cardinal question in every replevin action is whether the plaintiff was entitled to immediate possession of the property replevied at the commencement of the action." International Harvester Credit Corp. v. Lech, 438 N.W.2d 474, 477 (Neb. 1989).
- "The mortgagee-finance company replevied the automobile from the purchaser, who then settled with the finance company by agreeing to pay the balance due on the mortgage." In re People, 505 N.W.2d 228, 233 (Mich. 1993).
- "The failure of the court to order a bond that complies with the replevin statute threatens the security of the person whose property is replevied." Child's Play Ltd. v. A & A, Inc., 642 A.2d 170, 172 (Me. 1994).

If, by contrast, the litigation has concluded and the plaintiff has prevailed, sense (2) applies—e.g.: "Lienholder replevied the vehicle and recovered attorney fees and costs from the wrecker service." Sharp v. State, 877 P.2d 629, 630 (Okla. 1994).

Sometimes one cannot tell, without the fuller context, whether sense (1) or sense (2) applies—e.g: "Homeowners allege that SCOF did not properly credit the individual accounts for items it replevied from the corresponding lots." Dave Kolb Grading, Inc. v. Lieberman Corp., 837 S.W.2d 924, 933 (Mo. Ct. App. 1992)./ "PCA 'picked up and sold' some cattle and defendant Hopkins replevied the 88 head and sold them." Central Prod. Credit Ass'n v. Hopkins, 810 S.W.2d 108, 110 (Mo. Ct. App. 1991).

Only personal property can be replevied, as the following statement acknowledges: "In any event, someone out there had better tell the creditors who repossessed and hauled away center pivot systems from debt-ridden irrigators that those creditors have replevied real estate—quite a legal phenomenon to say the least." Mapco Ammonia Pipeline, Inc. v. State Bd. of Equalization & Assessment, 471 N.W.2d 734, 749 (Neb. 1991). See replevin. Cf. detinue.

replicatable is incorrect for replicable—e.g.: "The feeders' argument assumes . . . the mechanical (and therefore replicatable [read replicable]) application of such fixed numbers . . . ." In re Beef Indus. Antitrust Litig., 542 F. Supp. 1122, 1141 (N.D. Tex. 1982). See -ATABLE.

report. A. And reporter. Traditionally, a law report is a written account of a proceeding and judicial decision, and the reporter is the person responsible for making and publishing that account. (Cf. court reporter.) In AmE, however, reporter has been blurred into report—primarily because of West Publishing Company's "National Reporter" system (established in 1879), each Reporter being a set of books containing judicial opinions from a geographic area within the country. Formerly, fastidious writers tried to distinguish the senses by capitalizing one but not the other, as the following quotation suggests, but this practice is not widely followed. E.g., "It may not come amiss to remark that the National Reporter System is usually spoken of as the 'Reporters,' and one of the component parts of that system is in like manner spoken of as a 'Reporter.' Wherever, in this or the succeeding chapters of this work, the word is used with a capital, it refers to one or more of the parts of the National Reporter System. When the word 'reporter' is used without capitalization, it refers to the person who reports or edits the cases in any series of reports to which reference is being made." William M. Lile et al., Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 37 (3d ed. 1914).

A similar extension of reporter occurred in 19th-century Scotland, where the Scottish Law Reporter appeared from 1865 to 1925.

B. The Reports. In BrE, "the Reports" are Coke's 13 volumes that began to appear in 1600. Coke tried to present every previous authority bearing on each case he reported, and thus his work has remained the historian's first entrance into the study of medieval caselaw.

reportedly. "Newspapermen and broadcasters live on a steady diet of this adverb," wrote Wilson Follett. "Yet it is so lacking in the characteristics of a respectable adverb that one would like to see its use confined to cable messages, where it saves money and can await translation into English." Modern American Usage 279 (1966). E.g., "Such convictions are extremely rare, and reportedly there had been only four previous ones [read, according to Follett, only four previous ones had been reported] since the law was passed."

To be sure, adverbs in -edly are often cumbersome and opaque (at first). Reportedly is not nearly as common in legal writing as allegedly, confessedly, and assertedly. All such forms ought to be avoided unless there is virtually no other concise way of saying what needs to be said. If that test is met, as it often is, we should use reportedly or any of the other terms without apology. See -EDLY, allegedly & confessedly.

reporter. See report (A). report of proceedings. This term is used in various American jurisdictions to refer to the verbatim transcript of any on-the-record proceedings before a judge. In Texas, the anomalous phrase statement of facts is used in this sense. See record (B).

repose is not "indefinite dormancy," but rather suggests temporary rest, after which there will again be activity. Hence, in the following pronouncement, the court was not aspersing the doctrine in question as strongly as it might have thought: "As to sovereign immunity, that doctrine, insofar as it has been created by courts, seems headed for a deserved repose." This is slovenly writing that makes little sense—why "insofar as it has been created by the courts," which is ambiguous? The judge might better have written, "Sovereign immunity as created by the courts seems to be moribund." This says the same thing in almost half the words. See CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF.

Statute of repose is a curious AmE legal usage for a statute that sets up a legal defense, usu. by the passage of time. It differs from a period of limitation, q.v., because it bars a suit a fixed number of years after the defendant acts in some way (as by manufacturing a product), whereas limitation bars an action if the plaintiff does not file suit within a set period of time from the date when the cause of action accrues. E.g., "[Article 5536a is] the ultimate statute of repose for architects, engineers, and builders. . . . [It] provides an absolute defense to a registered or licensed architect or engineer once more than ten years have passed since the substantial completion of any allegedly defective improvement to real property." Brown v. M.W. Kellogg Co., 743 F.2d 265, 267 (5th Cir. 1984)./ "[W]here injury or death is alleged to have resulted from disease, the six-year statute of repose is inapplicable." Guy v. E.I. DuPont de Nemours & Co., 792 F.2d 457, 460 (4th Cir. 1986).

repository; repositary. The former spelling is standard. Cf. depositary.

represent; re-present. See RE- PAIRS.

representation; misrepresentation. These two words require care: if by fraudulent representation one really means fraudulent misrepresentation, then the latter phrase should be used. Cf. false representation.

representee (= one to whom a representation has been made), a word that originated in the 17th century and then was disused for nearly two centuries, reemerged in 20th-century discussions of contract law. It has become fairly common as a correlative of representor—e.g.: "It is presumed that the representor in pursuing his own economic interest will necessarily protect the rights of the representees who have the same economic interest." In re Will of Levy, 496 N.Y.S.2d 911, 912 (Sur. Ct. 1985)./ "Each [doctrine] is based on a representation followed by reliance on the part of the representee . . . ." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 109 (8th ed. 1991). Cf. misrepresentee.

repress. See oppress.

reprise, n.; reprisal. Reprise = (1) an annual deduction, duty, or payment out of a manor or estate, as an annuity or the like; or (2) (in music) a repetition. Reprisal = an act of retaliation, usu. of one nation against another but short of war.

reprobate (= to reject [as an instrument or deed] as not binding on one) is, in Scots law, the antonym of approbate. See approbate.

republish; revive. In the law of wills, there is a distinction between these verbs. Republishing involves bringing forward in time a will that has remained continuously valid since its making. Reviving a will involves restoring to effectiveness a will or codicil that has been revoked.

repudiation; rescission. Repudiation = a contracting party's words or actions that indicate an intention not to perform the contract in the future. Rescission = a party's unilateral unmaking of a contract for a legally sufficient reason, such as the other party's material breach.

Though the definitions suggest precise meanings for these terms, they are frequently confused. The main problem is that repudiation is a common-law term, whereas rescission is an equitable one. Thus, as P.S. Atiyah points out, "most books on the law of Contract discuss the right to repudiate the contract for breach of condition in a section on Remedies, while they treat of the right to rescind a contract in the section on Misrepresentation. Indeed, so different are repudiation and rescission believed to be, that serious confusion is caused in the law of sale of goods by the fact that the Sale of Goods Act regulates the former but not the latter." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 294 (3d ed. 1981). To compound the trouble, lawyers indiscriminately use repudiation for both a rightful and a wrongful termination.

repudiatory; repudiative. Despite the OED's suggestion to the contrary, repudiatory is the usual term—repudiative being a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

repugn. See impugn.

repugnant. This word, in law, is frequently used in its oldest sense, "inconsistent with: contrary or contradictory to." Legal writers use the word most commonly when contrasting two things—e.g.: "The annexing of such incident to such contract would be repugnant to the express terms of the contract." (Eng.)/ "The idea of judicial application of constitutional provisions and of judicial refusal to give effect to legislation repugnant to the Constitution . . . goes back to refusal of the common-law courts to give effect to acts of Parliament 'impertinent to be observed' . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 96–97 (1957). In nonlegal usage, repugnant today denotes "causing distaste or aversion."

repulse. See repel.

repulsive. See repellent.

reputation. See character.

reputational (= of or pertaining to reputation) is not recorded in W3, but dates from 1921 in the OED. The term is useful to legal writers—e.g.: "Nor is any liberty or reputational interest implicated." Findeisen v. North E. Indep. Sch. Dist., 749 F.2d 234, 240 (5th Cir. 1984) (Garwood, J., concurring)./ "Management may well value more highly the time that would be expended in litigation and any reputational effects of a loss, whereas plaintiffs might well assign a high value to the potentially recoverable damages."

requestee. Though recorded in neither the OED nor other major English-language dictionaries, requestee has achieved limited currency in law as a correlative of requester (or, less good, -or). E.g., "The burden as to the first prong would be on the requestee as the movant, while the burden as to the second prong is on the requestor." Cielock v. Munn, 262 S.E.2d 114, 115 (Ga. 1979). See -EE.

requiescat in pace. See R.I.P.

require. See necessitate.

requisite. See prerequisite.

requisite requirement is a patent REDUNDANCY.

requisition = (1) an authoritative, formal demand; or (2) a governmental seizure of property.

requital; requitement. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

res; re; rem. Res (= thing), pronounced like race in AmE but like reese or rays in BrE, is used in a number of different ways in legal contexts. Most often it is a synonym of principal or corpus in reference to funds. E.g., "When the res of a gratuitous private express trust is excessive for the purpose specified by the settlor, a resulting trust of the excess is presumed for the benefit of the settlor or his successors in interest."/ "The difficulties of applying the common-law concept of joint tenancy to a fluctuating res prevent the traditional joint tenancy estate from providing a logical solution." See corpus.

Yet it is often used in its literal sense "thing," in reference to a particular thing, known or unknown. E.g., "We found, as a matter of trademark law, that the res in the case, the registered trademark of the Cuban corporation, was located in the United States."/ "Defendants argue that the superior court is without jurisdiction of the cause of action pleaded because the court does not have jurisdiction of the res—the realty in Illinois."

In more prudish days, res was even used in legal writing as a EUPHEMISM for "sexual organ": "[T]he weight of authority, both English and American, is that although [for rape to be proved] some penetration must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt, it need not be full penetration; nothing more than res in re being requisite." 44 Am. Jur. Rape § 3, at 903 (1942). In Latin, rem is the accusative case of the singular noun, and re is the ablative case (as in In re Snooks).

Res is the plural as well as the singular form: "German law uses the word 'thing' only for res that are corporeal." G.W. Paton, A Textbook of Jurisprudence 508 (4th ed. 1972). See jus in re(m) & in personam* (B).

res adjudicata. See res judicata (A).

res administrata is a NEOLOGISM meaning "res judicata as applied to administrative decisions." E.g., "Nor is there any agreement as to precisely what degree of similarity should exist between the received conventions of res judicata and what might be called the doctrine of 'res administrata.'" Frank E. Cooper, State Administrative Law 503 (1965)./ "Principles of res judicata—perhaps better dubbed 'res administrata'—can apply to successive proceedings before a single agency." 18 Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 4475, at 762 (1981) rescindable; rescissible. The first form is better because of its more recognizable relation to the verb. It is the only form listed in the OED; W3 contains both. Cf. rescissory.

rescindment is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of rescission.

rescissible. See rescindable.

rescission; recision; recission; rescision. In the sense "an act of rescinding, annulling, vacating, or canceling," rescission is the standard and the etymologically preferable spelling.

But some writers have been misled by their smattering of Latin: perhaps they have realized that recision is from the Latin noun recisio, meaning "a cutting back, or lopping off." And, through the process known as folk etymology, these writers may have wrongly thought recision to be the correct form, rescission a corruption. Yet rescission is the true Latin form (fr. the accusative rescissionem) as well as the true English form. Rescission is preferable also because of the consistency of spelling between verb and noun (rescind / rescission).

Yet the inferior spelling remains annoyingly common—e.g.: "The facts in the record on administrative review relate to the recision [read rescission] of the permit and whether the Zoning Board acted within the confines of the zoning ordinance." Warren v. Zoning Bd. of Appeals, 625 N.E.2d 1213, 1218 (Ill. App. Ct. 1994)./ "We are not called upon to address whether in an action for fraud in the inducement of a contract, Jones must elect between the remedies of damages and recision [read rescission] of the contract . . . ." DeCoatsworth v. Jones, 639 A.2d 792, 797 n.3 (Pa. 1994).

Some courts even mistakenly combine the misspelling recision with the correct spelling to arrive at still other, less frequent misspellings: recission and rescision. The former appears, e.g., in Malone v. Safety-Guard Mfg. Co., 748 F.2d 312, 314 (5th Cir. 1984).

The sound of the -ss- in rescission is like that in precision, not that in permission. This is one of very few words in the English language in which the -ss- has the sound /zh/ instead of /sh/. Two others are fission (in AmE) and abscission. Cf. -mission (with /sh/) in its many forms.

For the distinction between rescission and repudiation, see repudiation.

rescissory; rescissionary; rescissional. Rescissory is the standard adjective corresponding to the noun rescission and the verb to rescind. E.g., "Through its fraud action, Cinerama seeks . . . an award of rescissory damages . . . ." Cede & Co. v. Technicolor, Inc., 542 A.2d 1182, 1186 (Del. 1988). Rescissionary and rescissional are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Cf. rescindable.

research; re-search. See RE- PAIRS.

res gestae (lit., "things done") has, it seems, irrevocably ensconced itself in the terminology of the law of evidence. But Wigmore considered it "not only entirely useless, but even positively harmful." 6 J.H. Wigmore, Evidence in Trials at Common Law § 1767, at 255 (James H. Chadbourn ed., 4th ed. 1976). And recent writers have said that the "ancient phrase can well be jettisoned, with due acknowledgment that it served its era in the evolution of evidence law." E.W. Cleary, McCormick on Evidence § 288, at 836 (3d ed. 1984).

The phrase is generally defined as "the events at issue or others contemporaneous with them." In the law of evidence, res gestae may be either a rule of relevance that makes testimony about the events forming part of the res gestae admissible, or an exception to the hearsay rule allowing for the admissibility of res gestae (e.g., if they accompany or explain a declarant's contemporaneous state of mind or physical sensations). See TERMS OF ART residence; residency. Although both are used in the sense "domicile," only residence is used as a FORMAL WORD—some would say pomposity—for "house" .

Res gesta, the singular form, is also sometimes used, as in R.N. Gooderson, "Res Gesta" in Criminal Cases (pt. 2), 1957 Cambridge L.J. 55 (so spelled throughout).

It would be useful to restrict residence to that sense and to use residency in the sense "domicile," but there is little consistency in today's usage. Following are some typical uses, with suggested revisions in brackets for the first two specimens: "Both those favoring lengthy residence [read residency] requirements and those opposing all requirements pleaded their cases during the congressional hearings on the Social Security Act."/ "Thirty-three states required at least one year of residence [read residency] in a particular town or county."/ "Unlike those states which condition veterans' preferences on either residency at the time of service or length of residency in the state, New Mexico requires only that a veteran establish residency sometime before a cut-off date, and that he currently qualify as a state resident." See citizenship & domicil(e).

resident. See citizen (A). residuary; residual; residuous. In the context of residues of estates and trusts, residuary is the preferred adjective. E.g., "The instrument is signed by the testator and properly attested; the residuary dispositions are therefore revoked."/ "The codicil contained a bequest of his residuary estate to charity, but the bequest was not effective because the testator died within thirty days after the codicil was executed."

Yet there are many examples of residual used in such contexts. E.g., "We have before us taxpayers who have inherited what is effectively a residual [read residuary] estate."/ "On May 5, 1949, decedent executed a codicil partially revamping his testamentary scheme by establishing, in lieu of the outright residual [read residuary] gift, a trust for the benefit of his son Joseph." Residual and residuary are susceptible to INELEGANT VARIATION: "In 1965 the testatrix executed a holographic instrument distributing all the assets she controlled, the residual [read residuary] disposition omitting Mariana Erback, who was one of the residuary distributees in the 1945 will."

When one writes of a person's capabilities and functions remaining after an injury, residual is the correct term: "She retained a residual function to perform her relevant past work as a nurse's aid."/ "Dr. Barrio's final report stated that claimant's residual functional disability will interfere with her normal activities at work, which require significant physical effort as a sewing machine operator." Residuous is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the other two words.

residuary legacy. See legacy.

residue; residuum; residual, n.; residuary, n. Both residue and residuum mean "that which remains." Residue is the usual and preferred term for contexts involving decedents' estates. It means "the property comprising a decedent's estate after payment of the estate's debts, funeral expenses, costs of administration, and all specific and demonstrative bequests" (CDL). E.g., "I give, bequeath, and devise the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate of every description, of which I shall die seised and possessed, to my son X."/ "The unmistakable intention of the testatrix, apparent upon the face of the will, was that the residue of her estate should go to the person who should have given her the best care in her declining years." Although Blackstone wrote that "the surplus or residuum must be paid to the residuary legatee," residuum is now to be avoided in such contexts: "The court ordered the executor to divide the residuum [read residue] among the residuary legatees."

Residuum is a technical term used correctly in chemical contexts. E.g., "There is testimony that a blend of residuum and diesel fuel or kerosene would satisfy the definition of crude oil." The plural is residua.

Residue and residuum often tempt those who fancy INELEGANT VARIATION. In the phrase residue of a residue, there is nothing wrong with repeating the word residue. Varying the form of the word is an affectation: "Some courts have held that the gift passes by intestacy on the theory that there can be no residue of a residuum [read residue of a residue]."

Residual, n., = a remainder; an amount still remaining after the main part is subtracted or accounted for (OED). E.g., "Some residual of the old civic duty to 'cry out' remains."

Residuary, when used elliptically as a noun for such full phrases as residuary estate (= residue) is uncommon and possibly confusing. It should be avoided. E.g., "He received the residuary [read residue] of his parents' estate long after his mother's death."

The word sometimes even elliptically denotes residuary beneficiary, a usage that can cause confusion—e.g.: "It was this reversion which passed to the residuaries [read residuary beneficiaries]." Reeves v. American Sec. & Trust Co., 115 F.2d 145, 148 (D.C. Cir. 1940)./ "[This] conduct denied the nieces their inheritance as residuaries [read residuary beneficiaries] of the estate . . . ." Krevatas v. Wright, 518 So. 2d 435, 438 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1988).

residuous. See residuary.

residuum. See residue.

resign; re-sign. See RE- PAIRS.

resign is almost always intransitive in the U.S. <resign from office>, but is often transitive in England <resign the office>.

res integra; res nova. These terms are moderately common in legal writing. Both mean "an undecided question; a case of first impression"; res nova is used primarily in AmE and res integra in BrE. Following are examples of the latter: "If the matter were res integra in this jurisdiction I should, for my part, have felt very much tempted to follow the views expressed by the majority of the court in Skelton v. Collins." (Eng.)/ "If the matter were res integra it might not, to my mind, be a hopeless argument, but in the light of the long-standing law it is today an argument that must be rejected." (Eng.)/ "The court added that if it were res integra it would hold that calling a man a rogue or a woman a whore in public company is actionable."

American legal writers use res nova far more often than res integra. E.g., "[R]equiring the matter to be considered res nova by every single trial judge in every single case might seem to some to pose serious administrative difficulties." Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 65 (1987) (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting)./ "The case involves many issues that are res nova, and appellant feels that oral argument would be of great benefit to the court and to both parties." See first impression, case of.

The plural forms are res integrae and res novae.

res ipsa loquitur (= the thing speaks for itself) is known in G.B. but is far more common in the U.S., where it has become familiar enough that res ipsa case and even resipsy (also spelled resipsey) have become lawyers' elliptical colloquialisms. Res ipsa loquitur is one of those LATINISMS that have become so common in lawyers' JARGON, or more specifically as TERMS OF ART, that their usefulness is unquestioned.

The phrase refers to the doctrine allowing that, in some circumstances, the mere fact of an accident's occurrence raises an inference of negligence so as to establish a prima facie case. "The rule bearing this name warrants the inference of negligence but does not compel such an inference." Johnson v. U.S., 333 U.S. 46, 48 (1948) (quotations & brackets omitted).

Many writers tend toward the elliptical dropping of the final word in the phrase—e.g.: "Evatt J. held in Davis v. Bunn that res ipsa raises only a presumption of fact . . . ." G.W. Paton, Tort: Negligence—Res Ipsa Loquitur, 4 Res Judicatae 106, 106 (1948)./ "The doctrine of res ipsa does not relieve the plaintiff of the burden of proving negligence." Charles Kramer, The Rules of Evidence in Negligence Cases 35 (3d ed. 1963)./ "Criticism of the res-ipsa test may be directed to its feasibility." Peter W. Low et al., Criminal Law: Cases and Materials 135 (1982).

It may be just as well to leave the last word off, because it is commonly misspelled. American judicial opinions contain examples of locquitur, locquiter, locquitor, and loguitur, among other variations.

The phrase is often used attributively, as in, "She sought to recover on a res ipsa loquitur theory." Generally, because it is a foreign phrase, it is not hyphenated when so used. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (B).

resister; resistor. The former is the term meaning "one who resists." The latter is a technical electrical term.

resistible; resistable. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

res judicata. A. And res adjudicata. The phrase meaning literally "a thing adjudicated" is now universally spelled res judicata. The other form, res adjudicata, ought to be rejected as a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

But the spelling adjudicata was formerly common—e.g.: "[T]he jury's verdict of not guilty necessarily confirmed Bruce's title and rendered the issue res adjudicata." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 70 (1943)./ "[The] rule . . . involves a departure from the ordinary principles of res adjudicata . . . ." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 4 (1967). Though occasionally in use as late as the 1960s, adjudicata is almost never seen in contemporary legal writing.

B. And collateral estoppel. See collateral estoppel (A).

C. Preposition with. Res judicata, which needs no italics, takes of or to. E.g., "[A]n acquittal on one [indictment] could not be pleaded as res judicata of the other." Dunn v. U.S., 284 U.S. 390, 393 (1932) (per Holmes, J.)./ "If Stewart had been separately indicted and tried for armed robbery and a hung jury resulted in a mistrial, that could not be pleaded as res judicata to a subsequent separate indictment for attempted second degree murder." Stewart v. Blackburn, 746 F.2d 262, 264 (5th Cir. 1984).

In American legal writing the phrase is frequently used as a kind of predicate adjective, as here: "A judgment is not res judicata as to, or legally enforceable against, a nonparty." See res administrata & chose jugée.

D. Plural. The plural, rarely if ever used, is res judicatae—e.g.: "[I]t is therefore not surprising that Cicero's inclusion of res judicatae among the sources of law does not reappear in the later jurists." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 173 (7th ed. 1964).

res nova. See res integra.

resolvable; resolvible; resoluble. The first is far more common than the others in meaning "able to be resolved." E.g., "We held that the pilot base dispute was a 'major' dispute subject to the court's jurisdiction and not a 'minor' dispute resolvable by the Railway Labor Act's adjustment mechanism." Resoluble has the liability of meaning also "capable of being dissolved again." The variant spelling resolvible is to be avoided.

resort. See recourse.

resound; re-sound. See RE- PAIRS.

respect. A. In respect of and *with respect to. These phrases are usually best replaced by simpler expressions, such as single prepositions. See regard & as regards.

B. With respect, with great respect, etc. David Pannick sardonically remarks: "The barrister presents his arguments with respect, with great respect, or, on difficult occasions, with the greatest of respect. The degree of respect voiced is, of course, in inverse proportion to the willingness indicated by the judge to agree with the arguments being advanced." David Pannick, Judges 153 (1987).

respecter of persons. See no respecter of persons, the law is.

respectfully. The term is greatly overworked in lawyers' writing directed at judges. E.g., "If this court were to allow recovery based on such speculative evidence, then we would respectfully wonder where this might lead us." See I respectfully submit & respective.

respective; respectively. Legal writers tend to overuse these pedantic terms. Respectively ought to mean "each one in relation to that one's own situation." E.g., "Appellee's and appellant's respective citizenships of France and Georgia therefore supported diversity jurisdiction." It would be more natural, however, to write, "Appellee's citizenship of France and appellant's citizenship of Georgia therefore supported diversity jurisdiction."

Often, respectively is not needed at all—e.g.: "In fact their decisions are much more consistent and ours are much less consistent than they appear respectively [delete respectively] in theory." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 123–24 (1938). And the same criticism applies to the adjective respective: "The order in which contracting parties must perform their respective [delete respective] obligations depends on the distinction between conditions precedent, concurrent conditions, and independent promises." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 662 (8th ed. 1991). As Fowler wrote, "Delight in these words is a widespread but depraved taste; like soldiers and policemen, they have work to do, but, when the work is not there, the less we see of them the better; of ten sentences in which they occur, nine would be improved by their removal" (MEU1 at 500).

A well-known formbook contains a petition for recovery of unpaid rent with the closing, just before the line for the lawyer's signature, "Respectively submitted." One might have thought that everyone knows the difference between respective and respectful. See respectfully.

respondeat superior [L. "let the principal answer"] is a maxim that embodies the rule of vicarious liability. The phrase is invariably used as a noun—e.g.: "Under the ordinary rules of respondeat superior, the shipowner is responsible for his actions . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 520 (2d ed. 1975). The first word is sometimes misspelled respondiat.

respondent is the PARTY APPELLATION generally used opposite petitioner, whether the petitioner seeks a writ of error, a writ of mandamus, or some other type of relief. Both respondent and petitioner are used most often on appeal and not in the trial court. But that has not always been true of respondent: in equity cases, formerly, the orator was the complainant and the respondent was the defendant.

responsibility, when used in the sense "liability to be made to account or pay," is a LEGALISM not generally understood by nonlawyers, although its sense is sometimes deducible. Whereas nonlawyers use this term in moral senses, lawyers give it legal senses—e.g.: "The mayor's freedom from monetary responsibility stems from his sovereign immunity." See vicarious liability.

In criminal contexts, responsibility refers to either (1) guilt; or (2) a person's mental fitness to answer in court for his or her actions.

-RESS. See SEXISM (C).

rest, v.i., = (AmE) to voluntarily conclude presenting evidence in a trial <after that testimony, the defense rested>. The idiom that one or the other side to a lawsuit rests dates from the late 19th century.

restaters = authors of the Restatements of the American Law Institute. E.g., "Indeed, this very problem has been addressed by the learned restaters in Comment F to § 611, Restatement (Second) of Torts (1977) . . ." Hinerman v. Daily Gazette Co., 423 S.E.2d 560, 578 (W. Va. 1992).

As in the preceding quotation, the word often appears to be limited to the reporters on a particular Restatement, but sometimes the word appears to refer to the entire membership of the Institute, and sometimes with a sneering tone that says more about the writer than about the restaters—e.g.: "Just as legal realism undercut the symmetrical doctrines beloved of the restaters of the ALI, so law and economics and CLS, from different ends of the spectrum, have undercut much of the rationality that Hart and Sacks put into training the legal generation who were at law school in the fifties." Robert Stevens, Book Review, 44 J. Legal Educ. 152, 154 (1994) (reviewing Anthony T. Kronman, The Lost Lawyer: Failing Ideals of the Legal Profession (1993)).

restaurateur. So spelled; restauranteur is a common error—e.g.: "I would also have doubted seriously the advisability of excluding the ordinary restauranteur [read restaurateur] as an 'ultimate consumer' . . . ." Ray J. Aiken, Let's Not Oversimplify Legal Language, 32 Rocky Mtn. L. Rev. 358, 361 (1960).

rest in peace. See R.I.P.

restitution. According to the leading English authorities, "[t]he law of restitution is the law relating to all claims, quasi-contractual or otherwise, [that] are founded upon the principle of unjust enrichment." Robert Goff & Gareth Jones, The Law of Restitution 3 (3d ed. 1986). This modern use of the term restitution, derived from Roman law, began as an Americanism but is now established in BrE as well.

At common law, restitution was ordinarily used to denote the return or restoration of some specific thing or condition. But 20th-century usage has extended the sense of the word to include not only the restoration or giving back of something, but also compensation, reimbursement, indemnification, or reparation for benefits derived from—or loss caused to—another.

restitutional; restitutionary; restitutive; restitutory. Restitution being a common subject in law, we find any number of examples of restitutionary and restitutional in law reports, although our unabridged dictionaries record only restitutive and restitutory. These last two are little known to American and British lawyers.

The standard form is restitutionary, and all other forms can properly be regarded as NEEDLESS VARIANTS. E.g., "The earliest proceedings in common-law courts were restitutionary in nature." Restatement of Restitution 5 (1937)./ "From the time of Lord Mansfield restitutionary remedies were dependent on the dictates of 'natural justice and equity' on which he laid stress." Charles A. Wright, Cases on Remedies 59 (1955)./ "Restitutionary remedies are designed to restore to plaintiff all that defendant gained at plaintiff's expense." Douglas Laycock, Modern American Remedies 3 (1985)./ "Restitutionary claims are to be found in equity as well as at law." Robert Goff & Gareth Jones, The Law of Restitution 3 (3d ed. 1986).

restive, despite its misleading appearance, does not mean "restful." Formerly it meant "stubborn, refusing to budge," but now it has become synonymous with restless, a development that some language critics lament.

restoration; restoral. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

restore; re-store. See RE- PAIRS.

restrain. See refrain.

rest, residue, and remainder is a collocation beloved by drafters of wills. Those who strive for simplicity and PLAIN LANGUAGE usually write all other property instead. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS & residue.

RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES. Legal writers who fail to distinguish restrictive from nonrestrictive clauses—and especially that from which—risk their credibility with careful readers. It's therefore worthwhile to learn the difference so well that, when writing, you use the correct form automatically.

Consider the following sentence: "All the cases that were decided before the 1995 legislation support this argument." It illustrates a restrictive clause. Such a clause gives essential information about the preceding noun (here, cases) so as to distinguish it from similar items (here, cases that were not decided until after the 1995 legislation) with which it might be confused. In effect, the clause restricts the field of reference to just this one particular case or class of cases—hence the term restrictive. Restrictive clauses take no commas (for commas would present the added information as an aside)—e.g.:

- "The power to zone is a state power that has been delegated to cities."
- "The Consumer Installment Loan Act is the only statute that applies to the subsidiary."

- "Cases that have found inadvertent errors to be sanctionable did not involve clerical errors of the type committed by Fleischer."

Now let's punctuate our sample sentence differently and change the relative pronoun from that to which: "All the cases, which were decided before the 1995 legislation, support this argument." This version illustrates a nonrestrictive clause. Such a clause typically gives supplemental, nondefining information. Here, we already know from the context which court we are talking about. The sentence informs us that the cases support this argument—oh, and by the way, they were all decided before the 1995 legislation. The incidental detail is introduced by which and set off by commas to signal its relative unimportance. E.g.:

- "The land is contained in Burnham's City Charter, which was approved by the legislature in 1891 and again in 1926."
- "The motion for summary judgment deals with the entire breach-of-contract claim, which is the only cause of action under this civil-action number."
- "A body of law now deals with this question, which is still scarcely understood by the bar."

Restrictive clauses are essential to the grammatical and logical completeness of a sentence. Nonrestrictive clauses, by contrast, are so loosely connected with the essential meaning of the sentence that they might be omitted without changing the essential meaning.

Hence, three guidelines. First, if you cannot omit the clause without changing the basic meaning, the clause is restrictive; use that without a comma. Second, if you can omit the clause without changing the basic meaning, the clause is nonrestrictive; use which after a comma. Third, if you ever find yourself using a which that doesn't follow a comma, it probably needs to be a that.

For a good general discussion of these two relative pronouns, see Douglas Laycock, "That" and "Which," 2 Scribes J. Legal Writing 37 (1991).

The word who is likewise a relative pronoun. With it, we rely entirely on punctuation to denote whether it functions restrictively or nonrestrictively.

Some of the common errors that occur with the two types of relative clauses are discussed in the sections below.

A. Which for that. Using which for that is perhaps the most common blunder with these words. In none of the sentences that follow could the phrase introduced by which be omitted without a nonsensical result or one with a drastically different sense. The word which should therefore be that—e.g.:

- "Beaver came and made a dam which [read that] in time created a lovely pond . . . ." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 83 (1970).
- "Star Chamber did not usually try felonies which [read that] involved capital punishment." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 181 (2d ed. 1979).
- "For this reason, the [sentence] which [read that] follows this passage ought to be either much longer or very short." Richard A. Lanham, Revising Prose 15 (1979).
- "Liberty is another value which [read that] seems to lie at the heart of our concern." Simon Lee, Law and Morals 77 (1986).
- "Despite all the uncertainty which [read that] surrounded the 1994 season—and the doubts which [read that] still linger like a hangover that just won't quit—Paul O'Neill was sure of one thing." Don Burke, Yank's Ink O'Neill: 4 Years, $19M, Star-Ledger (N.J.), 29 Oct 1994, at 29.
- "In a shareholder's derivative suit, the cause of action which [read that] such a plaintiff brings before the court is not his own but the corporation's."
- "It is precisely the significance or lack of significance of these contacts which [read that] troubles us."
- "The injunction runs against only one of the parties of the dispute, a dispute which [read that] is of the kind which [read that] led to the passage of PKPA."
- "In such a case he would not be exercising his legal right, or doing an act which [read that] can be judged separately from the motive which [read that] actuated him."
- "For us to allow the judgment to stand as it is would risk an affirmance of a decision which [read that] might have been decided differently had the court below felt unconstrained."
- "We understand that every right which [read that] beneficiaries would otherwise have against the trust company is sealed and wholly terminated by the decree."

In the last sentence quoted, the first that made the writers want to vary the word in the second phrase, but they should not have succumbed to this misplaced desire.

B. Restrictive Clause Wrongly Made Nonrestrictive. This error is fairly common. The relative clauses illogically set off by commas are necessary to the meaning of the sentence; one could not drop those phrases out of the sentences and retain the intended meaning—e.g.: "A state will not exercise judicial jurisdiction, which [read jurisdiction that] has been obtained by fraud or unlawful force, over a defendant or his property."/ "The jury could find that a woman, who [read woman who] believed she had a special relationship with God and was the chosen one to survive the end of the world could believe that God would take over the direction of her life to the extent of driving her car."

C. Series. Some writers want to substitute and who or and which in place of and that for the last in a series of relative clauses beginning with a that-phrase. This tendency may result from a fear that the relative that may be confused with the demonstrative that; which and who, by contrast, are consistently relatives. Despite that concern, which is usually overblown, parallel phrasing is better—e.g.: "A corporation that has failed to pay its franchise taxes, that has persisted in its delinquency for mroe than one year, and which [read that] has had its charter revoked can no longer operate as a business within the state."

D. Remote Relative Pronouns. See REMOTE RELATIVES restrictive covenant = a private agreement, usu. in a deed or lease, that restricts the use and occupancy of real property, most commonly by specifying lot size, building lines, architectural styles, and the uses to which the property may be put. Formerly, such covenants were used in the U.S. to racist ends: "Finally, 'restrictive covenants'—whereby property-owners in 'white sections' of Northern cities contracted never to sell or rent to people 'not of the Caucasian race'—were dealt a long-range death-blow in a set of rulings which said that state courts could not enforce such contracts, even in private lawsuits, without violating the Fourteenth Amendment." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 295 (1955). See covenant.

resultant, n., for result is an ARCHAISM—e.g.: "For the legislative purpose is the resultant [read result] of the pressure of conflicting interests in the legislature." Jerome Frank, Courts on Trial 302 (1950)./ "Human preferences do not seem to be the resultants [read result or results] of a few simple causes, but rather of a large scale and measured under experimental conditions." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 105 (1961).

resulting trust. See constructive trust (C).

resurface, like surface, is both v.i. & v.t. Resurface = (1) to come to the top again <he resurfaced in the middle of the pond>; or (2) to put a new surface on <the state resurfaced the road>.

retainage; retainer. Retainage (AmE) = a percentage of what a landowner sets aside for a contractor, withholding the sum until the construction has been satisfactorily completed and all mechanics' liens either released or expired. Though the word is fairly common in American property law, it is omitted from every major English-language dictionary and from most law dictionaries.

Retainer = (1) a client's authorization for a lawyer to act in a case; (2) a fee paid to a lawyer to secure legal representation. A special retainer results in employment for a specific project. A general retainer results in employment for a specific length of time instead of for a specific project.

retaliatory; retaliative. The two forms have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. The former means "of, relating to, or constituting retaliation" <retaliatory eviction>, whereas the latter means "vindictive, tending to retaliation" .

reticence; reticency. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

reticent (= reserved; disinclined to speak freely; taciturn) is frequently misunderstood as being synonymous with reluctant. E.g., "Contemporary courts have been more reticent [read reluctant] to discard the privity requirement and to permit recovery in warranty by a remote consumer for purely economic losses." Occasionally, the line between taciturnity and reluctance is an extremely subtle one—e.g.: "[M]any cases go unreported because of a reticence on the part of the victims to publicly accuse close relatives, much like the silence that often cloaks child abuse . . . ." Jon Nordheimer, A New Abuse of Elderly: Theft by Kin and Friends, N.Y. Times, 16 Dec. 1991, at A1.

retire. In the legal idiom, a jury is customarily said to retire for deliberations—e.g.: "After the jury had retired to deliberate, the court informed counsel that some communication had been received from the jury . . . ." People v. Allen, 197 N.W.2d 874, 878 (Mich. Ct. App. 1972). The noun retirement is much less common in this sense, but it does appear from time to time, esp. in BrE: "The Judge's summing-up was brief but thorough, and after a short retirement the jury brought in a verdict of guilty." Stanley Jackson, The Life and Cases of Mr. Justice Humphreys 175 (n.d. [1951]).

retorsion; retortion. Both spellings are used in international law in referring to "retaliation in kind for discourteous, unkind, or unfair acts, such as high tariffs or discriminatory duties." The OED gives preference to retortion, but most international-law texts use retorsion. See 2 L. Lassa Oppenheim, International Law 134 (7th ed.

1952). Thus, retortion is now best considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT retract. See revoke.

retractable; retractible. The former spelling is correct. See -ABLE (A). retract(at)ion. In the figurative sense "the act of recanting" or "a statement in recantation," retraction is usual in AmE, retractation in BrE. In BrE, retraction is the noun corresponding to retract in literal senses ("to draw back," etc.).

retractible. See retractable.

retreat; re-treat. See RE- PAIRS.

retreat rule = the criminal-law doctrine holding that even the innocent victim of a murderous assault must choose a safe retreat, if there is one, instead of resorting to deadly force, unless either of the following circumstances exists: (a) the victim is in his or her "castle" at the time (see castle doctrine); or (b) the assailant is a robber or one whom the victim is trying to arrest. E.g., "The retreat rule occasioned strong controversy in the United States, where it was of practical importance because of the prevalence of handguns." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 460 (1978).

retribute, v.t. (= to pay back, visit retribution upon) is labeled "rare" in the OED, but modern writers on criminal law are reviving it after centuries of disuse. E.g., "[T]he just deserts principle does not prescribe a scale of penalties . . . beyond suggesting that punishments must be felt to be deserved, that is, felt somehow to retribute (pay back) for the moral and material injuries crimes cause." Ernest van den Haag, Punishment: Desert and Crime Control, 85 Mich. L. Rev. 1250, 1256 (1987)./ "Robbins had only retributed [read paid back] the past humiliations of William Jessup and other American sailors." Ruth Wedgwood, The Revolutionary Martyrdom of Jonathan Robbins, 100 Yale L.J. 229, 316 (1990).

retributive; retributory; retributional. Retributive = characterized by, or of the nature of, retribution (OED). E.g., "The fact that it is natural to hate a criminal does not prove that retributive punishment is justified." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 60 (1957)./ "Yet it is certainly something [that] should prevent our dismissing all retributive theory out of hand." H.L.A. Hart, Law, Liberty, and Morality 60 (1963).

Retributory = involving, producing, or characterized by retribution or recompense (OED). The only sense that -tory has that is lacking in -tive is that of causing or producing retribution; but euphony often governs the choice of term.

Retributional and retributionary are NEEDLESS VARIANTS not contained in the major English-language dictionaries. But they appear fairly frequently—e.g.: "[T]he connection . . . turns upon the conspiracy between the Texas defendants and Moses to subject the plaintiffs to retributional [read retributive] abuse without regard to constitutional rights." Williams v. Garcia, 569 F. Supp. 1452, 1454 (E.D. Mich. 1983)./ "Arguments in favor of the death penalty stress its deterrent, economic and retributionary [read retributive] effects." Gregory S. Brown, Comment, Constitutional Law, 27 Washburn L.J. 194, 196–97 (1987).

retributory damages. See punitive damages.

retroactive; retrospective; retrogressive. In law, the first two terms are used synonymously in reference to statutes that extend in scope or effect to matters that have occurred in the past. E.g., "[T]he court refused to give effect to a retroactive statute creating a special tribunal to try certain suits by a bank against its officers." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 57 (1938)./ "It is presumed that a statute does not have retrospective effect." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 128 (2d ed. 1985). The one advantage of retrospective is that it corresponds etymologically to its antonym prospective.

Retrogressive = retrograde; tending to go back to an inferior state; returning to a worse condition. E.g., "The court nevertheless upheld the procedures because they were not retrogressive—they would not exacerbate vote dilution in Lockhart."

retrofit, n. & v.t. The noun retrofit is a HYBRID meaning "a modification of equipment or a building to include developments not available at the time of original manufacture or construction." The term has been extended to use as a verb in both literal and figurative senses—e.g.: "On appeal Ronald has sought to retrofit his case by downplaying the degree to which his recovery was based on Bonnette's false statements of love and sexual desire." Askew v. Askew, 28 Cal. Rptr. 2d 284, 289–90 (Ct. App. 1994)./ "Plaintiff's position was that the astragal should have been removed by Coke and the door retrofitted with some sort of synthetic rubber cushion." Fontana v. Coca-Cola Enterprises, Inc., 632 So. 2d 811, 814 (La. Ct. App. 1994).

As in the immediately preceding example, the past-tense form should be retrofitted, not retrofit— e.g.: "To do so, Westinghouse has invested in a series of advanced technologies [that] are standard to new plant designs and [that] can be retrofit [read retrofitted] into existing units . . . ." Wholesale Power Contracts, Pub. Util. Fortnight, 16 March 1989, at 67, 72./ "Existing cars should be retrofit [read retrofitted] with meters, for an installation fee." Steven N. Brautigam, Note, Rethinking the Regulation of Car Horn and Car Alarm Noise, 19 Colum. J. Envtl. L. 391, 438 (1994). Cf. fit.

retrogressive. See retroactive.

retrospective. See retroactive.

return, n., = (1) a court officer's bringing back of an instrument to the court that issued it—as when a sheriff returns a citation; (2) the officer's indorsement on such an instrument, reporting what the officer did or found—as in a return of nulla bona, q.v.; or (3) an income-tax filing.

return back is a fairly common REDUNDANCY. Cf. refer back & revert (B).

returnee. See -EE reurge is solid—no hyphen.

reus; rea. These are the masculine and feminine forms of the term used in Roman, civil, and canon law to denote "a defendant." The plural forms are rei and reae. Reus is the more commonly encountered form.

re(-)use. In AmE, the word is solid: reuse.

revalidate; revive. These words, used in reference to reestablishing the validity of revoked wills, are distinguished in use. Revalidation consists in repetition of the formalities of execution of the will previously revoked. Revival consists in revocation of the superseding or revoking will (i.e., the will that displaced or invalidated the original will).

revenge. See avenge.

reverence, v.t.; revere. The first is a FORMAL WORD equivalent to the second. E.g., "No person more than the present writer reverences this internal mentor we call conscience, but the experience of the ages teaches us that it is a most fallible guide." See lapsus linguae.

reverie; revery. The former spelling is preferred.

reversal; reversion; reverter. The first is the noun corresponding to the verb to reverse. The second and third are nouns corresponding to the verb to revert. Fowler quotes the following misuse of reversion for reversal: "The reversion [read reversal] of our free trade policy would, we are convinced, be a great detriment to the working class." For the distinction between reversion and reverter, see reversion. Cf. revert.

reverse, n. See converse.

reverse, v.t.; overrule. An appellate court reverses a decision when it overturns what the trial court did below in the same case; it overrules a decision when it disapproves of the holding in an earlier case. See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT.

reverse discrimination. This term refers to treating minorities preferentially, usu. through affirmative-action programs, in a way that adversely affects members of a majority group. The term first became popular with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Regents of University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978).

But the word is older. The Second Barnhart Dictionary of New English (1980) traces it back to 1971, and neither John Algeo's dictionary of neologisms, Fifty Years Among the New Words (1991), nor Jonathon Green's Tuttle Dictionary of New Words Since 1960 (1992) takes it back any further.

In fact, though, the term was coined in the early 1960s, apparently by a state-court judge: "These constitutional guarantees mean that a non-white pupil has just as much right to be educated in a public school as a white pupil, but it also means, and equally so, that a child should not be enrolled or transported to a certain schoolhouse because he is white or non-white. To apply such a test, overtly or covertly, is reverse discrimination making racial membership a qualification for such a move, when it really should be irrelevant and immaterial." Strippoli v. Bickal, 248 N.Y.S.2d 588, 599 (Sup. Ct. 1964) (per William G. Easton, J.).

The next use in American caselaw—the first federal example—occurred four years later: "The history leads the court to conclude that Congress did not intend to require 'reverse discrimination'; that is, the act does not require that Negroes be preferred over white employees who possess employment seniority." Quarles v. Philip Morris, Inc., 279 F. Supp. 505, 516 (E.D. Va. 1968).

reversible. So spelled. See -ABLE (A).

reversible error has been wrongly criticized on grounds that "error cannot be reversed per se, although its results can be remedied." William F. Haggerty, Of Bards, Beguilers, and Barristers, 66 Mich. B.J. 784, 785 (1987). Yet this is an acceptable example of HYPALLAGE.

reversion; reverter. Both are reversionary interests in property having been conveyed. A reversion is an interest in land arising by operation of law whenever the owner of an estate grants to another a particular estate, e.g., a life estate or a term of years, but does not dispose of the owner's entire interest (OCL). A reverter is a lesser interest—a possibility that the land might revert—arising when a grant is limited so that it might terminate. A reversion occurs automatically upon termination of the prior estate (as when a life tenant dies), whereas a reverter—usually termed a possibility of reverter—under orthodox theory, does not occur automatically, but is subject to a return to the grantor when a condition is breached (as upon the lapse of a conditional fee).

Reverter and reversion are susceptible to INELEGANT VARIATION. Justice Brennan, in his dissent in Evans v. Abney, 396 U.S. 435, 450–59 (1970), switches back and forth between the terms in describing the single interest that heirs had in a fee simple subject to condition subsequent. The correct term to describe such an estate is power of termination or right of entry for condition broken. See remainder, reversal & -ER (B).

reversionary; reversional. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—not common but hardly unknown: "[T]hey do afford an inference of an intention to invest full power in his wife to effectuate a complete separation of the 'home place' by conveyance from any reversional [read reversionary] interest on behalf of his estate." Geyer v. Bookwalter, 193 F. Supp. 57, 61–62 (W.D. Mo. 1961).

reversioner = the grantor or heir in reversion; one who possesses the reversion to an estate. E.g., "Under the doctrine of destructibility the holder of the life estate could defeat the contingent remaindermen by a tortious feoffment or by effecting a merger with the reversioner."/ "A statement made by a declarant holding a limited interest in any property and opposed to such interest is deemed to be relevant only as against those who claim under him, and not as against the reversioner." See reversion & remainder.

revert = (1) (of property) to return by reversion; (2) to return to a former state; to go back to (as a former state or condition); or (3) to turn (eyes or steps) back.

A. Revert for refer. This is a curious mistake: "By reverting [read adverting or referring] to the language of the contestant's petition, we can see that the contestant admits that the document under consideration actually bears the testator's and attesters' signatures." Even if the writer intended in this sentence to say that we were "going back" to focus on particular words, the use of revert was ill-advised, for sense (3) subsumes the connotations of sense (2) of returning to a former state or condition.

B. Revert back. This REDUNDANCY is common in AmE, less so in BrE. E.g., "If Nathaniel T. Braswell should die leaving no lawful heir from his body, then the land herein conveyed shall revert back to the said James J. Braswell [read revert to James J. Braswell] or to his lawful heirs."/ "Medieval town centers, once built for people on foot and a few carts and carriages, have partly reverted back [read reverted] to strollers . . . ." Marlise Simons, Amsterdam Plans Wide Limit on Cars, N.Y. Times, 28 Jan. 1993, at A5. Cf. return back & refer back.

reverter. See reversal & reversion.

revery. See reverie.

revest = to vest a second time. E.g., "[B]y breaking bulk, the bailee determines the bailment, and . . . the goods at once revest in the possession of the bailor." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 177 (1881; repr. 1963)./ "Once control had been revested in the Assembly, the people realized that they must be alert in order to keep their power in the state." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 52 (1962).

The corresponding noun is revestment—e.g.: "[I]n addition to the State's right of revestment under the condition . . . , the reservation reserved to the State the right of entry and use . . . ." Turiano v. State, 519 N.Y.S.2d 180, 185 (Ct. Cl. 1987).

review, n. A. And *appeal; certiorari. The word review denotes a genus, of which appeal and certiorari are species. In reference, then, to all types of appellate scrutiny—however the cases may have arrived in the appellate court—review is the most accurate term. See appeal (B).

B. And reviewal. Reviewal is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

revisal. See revision.

revise; redact; recense. The first is the ordinary word that serves in most senses. The second and third terms are used especially of revising texts with close scrutiny. Redact = (1) to make a draft of; or (2) to edit. In American legal writing it is often used in the sense "to edit out or mask the privileged, impertinent, or objectionable matter in a document." Recense is more of a literary term in modern usage; it relates to scholarly editing of ancient texts and the like.

reviser; revisor. Both forms appear in modern legal prose. The -er form is preferred. E.g., "The revisors [read revisers] of the Code of 1919 had adopted some of the suggestions contained in the address but recommended no time limitation on probate."/ "As to the content of what constitutes revocation by implication of law, the Reviser's Note makes plain that the revision was merely an acceptance of Pascucci, which in turn merely accepted revocation by implication from a subsequent marriage and children as a common-law rule that had emerged before our Revolution."

revision; revisal. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "Before the general revisal [read revision] of laws in this state in 1849, it was generally held that the destruction of a will containing a revocatory clause revived a preserved uncanceled will with no proof to the contrary being allowed."

revisionary; revisional; revisory. Revisionary = of, pertaining to, or made up of revision <revisionary methods>. Revisional is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Revisory = having power to revise; engaged in revision .

revisor. See reviser.

revisory. See revisionary.

revitalize has become a VOGUE WORD among politicians and business people <to revitalize the inner city>.

revival of judgment. See renewal of judgment.

revive. See revalidate & republish.

reviver; revivor. The two forms mean different things. Reviver = one who or that which revives. Revivor is a primarily BrE legal term denoting a proceeding for the revival of a suit or action abated by the death of one of the parties, or by some other circumstance (OED). E.g., "A number of jurisdictions extend the process of revivor to judgment liens."

revocability is pronounced /rev-ə-kə-bil-i-tee/.

revocable; revokable. The first form is preferred; the word is pronounced /rev-ə-kə-bəl/. Revokable (as well as revokeable) is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. See irrevocable.

revocatory; revocative. The former is preferred, whether in common-law phrases such as revocatory acts or revocatory powers, or in the civil-law phrase revocatory action (see, e.g., Quebec Civ. Code art. 1032).

revokable. See revocable.

revoke; retract. These two words are nearly synonymous. Revoke = to annul by taking back; retract = to withdraw or disavow. In the idiom of contract law, an offer is revoked, while an anticipatory repudiation of a contract is retracted.

revolt; revolution. See sedition.

rewrite is both noun and verb, although write itself cannot be a noun. E.g., "The Reagan administration's Treasury Department says that its proposed rewrite of the Internal Revenue Code will make taxes simpler and fairer."

Rex; Regina. See R.

rhadamant(h)in(e) /rad-ə-man-thən/. This exotic term, meaning "of or relating to a rigorous or inflexible judge," is best spelled rhadamanthine. The word is a type of LITERARY ALLUSION (see (D)), Rhadamanthus being, in Greek mythology, Zeus and Europa's son who served as one of the judges in the lower world. E.g., "I do not suggest that every such rhadamanthine ruling restricting access to the courts is motivated solely by a desire to reduce judicial workload." Bernard S. Meyer, Justice, Bureaucracy, Structure, and Simplification, 42 Md. L. Rev. 659, 685 (1983)./ "In a series of cases . . . , some courts have utilized a rhadamanthine construction of the procedural requirements of the Rule." David S. Day, Discovery Standards for the Testimonial Expert Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(4), 133 F.R.D. 209, 217 (1990). See draconian.

RHETORICAL QUESTIONS (those posed without the hope or expectation of an answer, often because the answer is obvious), especially when not unusually long, should end with a question mark. E.g., "Who would deny that the victim of a nuisance may have it abated regardless of the intent of the offending party?" Rhetorical questions quickly become tiresome if overused.

rhodomontade. See rodomontade.

rhyme or reason is a CLICHE to be avoided. E.g., "Nor do we find that the jury's verdict was without rhyme or reason [read without reason]."

Richard Roe. See Doe, John.

RICO (an acronym for the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act) should be written in all capitals—not written Rico, as it predominantly appears in Chapman & Cole v. Itel Container Int'l B.V., 116 F.R.D. 550 (S.D. Tex. 1987) (using both forms).

Some writers, esp. journalists, have begun to use the acronym as a verb meaning "to sue under RICO"—e.g.: "The plaintiff can't sue under the substantive law—here, the securities law—but hopes to get into court anyway by RICOing someone." L. Gordon Crovitz, While Senate Fiddles, the Supreme Court Has Real Work to Do, Wall St. J., 9 Oct. 1991, at A15./ "In my view, reputable businesses would not be RICOed if injured plaintiffs had an across-the-board express federal commercial/consumer fraud damages remedy . . . ." Arthur F. Mathews, Shifting the Burden of Losses in the Securities Markets, 65 Notre Dame L. Rev. 896, 962–63 (1990). So used, the word is a casualism.

rid > rid > rid. The past-tense and past-participial form ridded is now obsolete.

ridden. See laden (B).

ridiculous has moved a long way from its etymological suggestion of "causing laughter," so that writers nowadays often term ridiculous what causes them anger, frustration, distress, or even sadness. In other words, by SLIPSHOD EXTENSION it is frequently used when people are far from laughing. Today it is unrealistic to insist on etymological rigor with this word.

right, adj.; righteous; rightful. Right = correct, proper, just. Righteous = morally upright, virtuous, or law-abiding. This term has strong religious connotations, often of unctuousness. Rightful = (1) (of an action) equitable, fair ; (2) (of a person) legitimately entitled to a position <the rightful heir>; or (3) (of an office or piece of property) that one is entitled to <his rightful inheritance>.

These terms are sometimes confused. In the following specimen, rightfully is misused for rightly: "The jury rightfully [read rightly] could reason that Marvin knew the conditions through which he had to fly." For a similar distinction—that between purposely and purposefully—see purposely.

right, n., is "one of the most ambiguous words in the English language." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 32 (1945). The most widely used definition is "an interest or expectation guaranteed by law." The nature of the guarantee—esp. its enforcement—leads to endless gradations in meaning.

right, as of. See as of right.

right but not obligation. This phrase, common in contracts, makes explicit that a party has the right but not the legal duty to do something. Because the conferment of a right sometimes implies an obligation to exercise that right, the phrase is a useful one.

righteous; rightful. See right, adj.

right, in one's own. Originally, this phrase referred to a person's particular title or claim to something. The phrase still sometimes bears this literal sense—e.g.:

- "[A]n association's standing depends upon a showing that its members would have standing to sue in their own right." Randolph-Sheppard Vendors v. Weinberger, 795 F.2d 90, 99 (D.C. Cir. 1986).
- "Mrs. Brayman lacks standing to assert this cause of action in her own right or on behalf of her daughter, and the appellees were entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law." Brayman v. DeLoach, 439 S.E.2d 709, 711 (Ga. Ct. App. 1993).
- "The possibility of collusive litigation can no longer justify a doctrine that in effect informs families that an injured child member thereof cannot obtain compensation in his or her own right for injuries which if caused by a nonparent would be so compensable . . . ." Terror Mining Co. v. Roter, 866 P.2d 929, 949 (Colo. 1994).

Today, however, the word has an extended sense referring to an individual characteristic or qualification that a person might otherwise be thought to hold in common with someone else—e.g.: "They had inherited considerable property from their father, an unsuccessful Congregational clergyman turned successful lawyer, and their mother, a wealthy woman in her own right." Carolyn C. Jones, Dollars and Selves: Women's Tax Criticism and Resistance in the 1870s, 1994 U. Ill. L. Rev. 265, 276. That sentence conveys the idea that the mother did not owe her wealth to her successful husband.

But if such distinction is not intended, the phrase is often merely a superfluity, the victim of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION—e.g.: "If Edell's redirect examination was devastating in its own right [delete in its own right], it also had far exceeded the bounds of permissible questioning . . . ." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 207 (1989)./ "At the Rule 29.15 hearing, trial counsel testified that McAffee had a criminal record in her own right [delete in her own right]." State v. Harris, 870 S.W.2d 798, 817 (Mo. 1994). See SUPERFLUITIES right of action. See cause of action.

right of common. See profits à prendre.

right of entry; right of re-entry. The former is the standard phrase, to which the latter adds nothing.

right of entry for condition broken; right of entry for breach of condition; power of termination. All three phrases refer to the rights of the grantor and the grantor's successors after conveyance of a fee simple conditional, which creates a possibility of reverter. Though the most common phrase is right of entry (for condition broken), the word right is something of a misnomer: "The right of entry is not, strictly speaking, a 'right' in the sense of being a present legally enforceable claim. It is rather a power to terminate the granted estate on breach of the specified condition." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 112 (2d ed. 1988). Hence, the trend is to use power of termination. See Restatement of Property § 24, at 60, special note to cmt. b (1936). See reversion & fee simple (G).

Some authorities use the phrase right of entry for breach of condition, but the modern trend is to prefer power of termination. See Roger A. Cunningham et al., The Law of Property 44–45 (2d ed. 1993).

right of first refusal; right of preemption. See option.

right of privacy; right to privacy. Although the phrase commonly appears with either preposition, right of privacy predominates.

When functioning as a noun, the phrase remains unhyphenated. But when it is used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it is preferably hyphenated <right-of-privacy case>.

right of re-entry. See right of entry.

right of survivorship (= a joint tenant's right to succeed to the whole estate upon the death of the other joint tenant—in the case of only two such tenants, and analogously when more than two are involved) is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the Latin phrase jus accrescendi. Deeds often make the right explicit by stating that the grantees are to hold "as joint tenants with the right of survivorship."

right of way – (1) a person's legal right, established by usage or by contract, to pass through grounds or property owned by another, or the land so used; (2) in AmE, the right to build and operate a railway line or highway on land belonging to another, or the land so used; or (3) the right to take precedence in traffic. The plural is rights of way. See easement (C).

right reason. An American court writes: "We conclude that, although the award as remitted by the trial judge was generous, it was not so gross as to be contrary to right reason." The OED states that the phrase right reason is now rare; yet it remains common in much legal writing. It ought to be rare, since reason alone suffices in most contexts—or so reason tells us.

As might be expected, the phrase has a history: it is a LOAN TRANSLATION of the Latin phrase rectam rationem. Borrowed by St. Thomas Aquinas directly from Aristotle, right reason was one method of discovering the essence of natural law. E.g., "Natural law, or jus naturale, as defined by Roman philosophers and jurists, is that law which is naturally discerned by right reason, as opposed to the law found necessary and made by man for the safe conduct of the state under localized conditions or by agreement for the preservation of international rights." "Law, Natural," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana, 104, 105 (1953)./ "[The] essence [of natural law] is that there is an abstract justice, either God-given or ascertainable by man's 'right reason,' and that laws are just or unjust in so far as they conform to or violate the pure, abstract, ultimate rules of conduct." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 482 (1962).

Whether the phrase right reason is outmoded depends largely on one's view of natural law. (See natural law.) In any event, though, the phrase hardly belongs in a context in which a court finds an award of damages reasonable, as in the sentence quoted at the outset of this entry.

right, title, and interest. This phrase, one of the classic triplets of the legal idiom, is the traditional language for conveying a quitclaim interest. (See quitclaim & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.) Technically, only one of the three words is necessary, as the broad meaning of interest includes the others: though you can have an interest without having title and perhaps without a given right, you cannot have title or a right without having an interest.

Therefore, the more modern DRAFTING style is to replace the triplet with the broadest of the three words—e.g.: "[W]hen a parcel of land is used or purchased in violation of federal narcotics laws, all of the offending owner's right, title, and interest [read interest] immediately transfer [read transfers] to the government, regardless of when the forfeiture action is instituted." Damon G. Saltzburg, Note, Real Property Forfeitures as a Weapon in the Government's War on Drugs, 72 B.U. L. Rev. 217, 221 (1992).

Still, some traditionalists prefer to keep from varying the age-old idiom, which uses only two additional words. Why, they reason, create a test case with their documents merely to find out whether interest is indeed broad enough to encapsulate right and title?

American lawyers, when given the choice in transactional drafting—the pros and cons on both sides of the argument—split about equally on the two sides.

right to die. As a noun phrase, right to die is three words <advocates of the right to die>; but as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it should be hyphenated: "Both sides of a right-to-die case received a skeptical hearing today at the Supreme Court . . . ." Linda Greenhouse, Right-to-Die Case Gets First Hearing in Supreme Court, N.Y. Times, 7 Dec. 1989, at 1.

right-to-lifer (= an opponent of abortion rights) is JOURNALESE. And it's generally pejorative—e.g.: "The cast of characters includes . . . Attorney General Dick Thornburgh, a strident right-to-lifer who took the questionable step of asking the court to reconsider Roe . . . ." The Battle over Abortion, Newsweek, 1 May 1989, at 28.

rigorous (= extremely strict, austere) should not be misused for rigid, as here: "The rigorous [read rigid], inflexible view of the majority rejects the improvements to be gained by changing the old rule."

riot; unlawful assembly. An unlawful assembly is a meeting of three or more persons who intend either to commit a violent crime or to carry out some act, lawful or unlawful, that will constitute a breach of the peace. A riot is an unlawful assembly that has begun to fulfill its common purpose of breaching the peace and terrorizing the public.

Riot Act, reading the. See reading the Riot Act.

R.I.P.; requiescat in pace; rest in peace. The phrase requiescat in pace means "may he (or she) rest in peace." The abbreviated form, though commonly taken to be a shortened form of the English phrase, stands for the Latin phrase.

rising of court. This increasingly rare term, generally used as an antonym of sitting or session, refers to the court's final adjournment of the term. Loosely, however, it is also used in reference to a recess or temporary break in the court's business, as at the end of the day. E.g., "[T]he court gave judgment to Fail and Otho L. Hays for the amounts due them respectively, and ordered, in default of payment of the judgments within ten days from the rising of court, a sale of the mortgaged property." Hays v. Galion Gas Light & Coal Co., 29 Ohio St. 330, 332 (1876).

risk = (1) the hazard of property loss covered by an insurance contract, or the degree of such a hazard; (2) a person or thing that the insurer considers a hazard; or (3) a known danger to which a person assents, thus foreclosing recovery for injuries suffered <assumption of the risk>. For more on sense (3), see assumption of the risk & volenti non fit injuria.

risk of nonpersuasion. See burden of proof (A).

rob; steal; burglarize. Persons are robbed; things are stolen; and places are burglarized. The words are occasionally confused—e.g.: "The prosecution claimed that he, with two others, had plotted to rob [read burglarize] the pawnshop of one Leo Goldstein on Doyers Street . . . ." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 324 (1943). See burglary.

robbery = aggravated larceny, i.e., larceny from the person by violence or intimidation. "The nonlawyer speaks of 'robbing a bank' by driving a tunnel into the strong-room; but this is not legal usage. In law, robbery implies force or the threat of it." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 791 (1978). See burglary (A).

rodomontade; rhodomontade. Pronounced /rod-ə-mən-tayd/, the word, meaning "boastful talk," is preferably spelled rodomontade.

Roe, Richard. See Doe, John.

rogatory letter. See letters rogatory.

role; roll. These two words are sometimes confused. Roll has many senses, including breadroll, but the only sense that seems to cause problems is "a list or register" <the teacher took roll>. Role, by contrast, means "a function or part, as in a drama."

The most common error is the use of roll where role belongs—e.g.: "Perhaps it is time once again to call to the prosecutor's attention the particularly sensitive roll [read role] played by the government attorney . . . ." U.S. v. Anchondo-Sandoval, 910 F.2d 1234, 1238 (5th Cir. 1990)./ "The court obviously . believed [that] the reason given by the State's attorney for striking Venireperson Austin was the real reason, and that race did not play a roll [read role] in the State's decision." State v. Davis, 835 S.W.2d 525, 527 (Mo. Ct. App. 1992). (On the use of Venireperson Austin in the preceding example, see TITULAR TOMFOOLERY & venireman.)

But the opposite blunder also occurs—e.g.: "She has no children with names such as Johnny, John, Peter, Paul, Mary or Martha. Instead, a sampling of names on one of her roles [read rolls] includes Tiana, Victoria, Carmen, Melissa, Christopher, Phillip, Tyler and Allegra." Marlene Feduris, What's in a Name? Amarillo Globe News, 24 May 1992, at D1.

Romanist = one who is versed in or practices Roman law; a lawyer of the Roman school. The term, generally capitalized, has also been a pejorative epithet for Roman Catholics.

Roman law = (1) the law of the Roman people; or (2) civil law. Max Radin calls sense (2) "improper," saying, "It is extremely important . . . to separate the two terms." Max Radin, Law Dictionary 302 (2d ed. 1970). But not all writers do separate them—e.g.: "By civil law—or Roman law, or Roman civil law—is meant that system of law in operation in the Roman Empire and set forth particularly in the compilations of Roman jurists (Justinian and his successors) and comprising the Institutes, the Codex, the Digest and the Novels collectively called the Corpus Juris Civilis." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 34 (1963). See civil law.

round. See around.

routinize is an -IZE neologism best avoided as GOBBLEDYGOOK. E.g., "Administration is a means of routinizing coercion [read making coercion routine]."/ "[B]usiness men . . . want to settle and routinize [read and to make routine] both practice and expectation." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 15 (2d ed. 1975).

royalty. See nonparticipating royalty.

ruin, n.; ruination. The former is the ordinary term; the latter is humorous and colloquial. E.g, "The failure of Congress to do so explicitly shows that such a suit may not be entertained merely because collection would cause an irreparable injury, such as the ruination [read ruin] of the taxpayer's enterprise."

rule, v.t. In AmE, it could not be said that a dissenting judge rules, because the dissenter sets forth no binding rule. In BrE, however, it is apparently permissible (though inaccurate) to say that a dissenter rules in a certain way—e.g.: "Indeed, Sir Laurence Street in dissent ruled in favor of no injunction but an accounting of profits." Letter of Malcolm Turnbull, TLS, 9–15 Dec. 1988, at 1371.

rule absolute. See decree absolute.

rule against opinions. See opinions, rule against.

Rule against Perpetuities*; rule against Perpetuities; Rule Against Perpetuities. "In Gray's book [John Chipman Gray, The Rule against Perpetuities (1886)] the Rule is capitalized Rule against Perpetuities, a style followed by the Blue Book until 1955. In that year, for mysterious reasons—perhaps merely a new font fetish—the Blue Book decreed that the Rule should be capitalized Rule Against Perpetuities." Jesse Dukeminier & Stanley M. Johanson, Family Wealth Transactions 970 n.1 (1978).

Dukeminier has identified three styles of capitalizing the phrase: the classic style (Rule against Perpetuities); the modern style (rule against perpetuities); and the Bluebook style (Rule Against Perpetuities), sanctioned by the Bluebook in the ninth edition of 1956. See Jesse Dukeminier, Perpetuities: Contagious Capitalization, 20 J. Legal Educ. 341 (1968). His research turned up no historical justification for the Bluebook style (no longer specifically included in the Bluebook), but long-sanctioned use of both the classic and modern styles (the only ones known in BrE). Dukeminier himself prefers the classic style, perhaps as a nod of respect to Gray. In fact, though, Gray's style merely reflects the predominant 19th-century method of initial capitalization, in which all prepositions (such as against), no matter how long, remained lowercase.

Today, though, prepositions of more than four letters are routinely capitalized, so Rule Against Perpetuities accords with the prevailing conventions for initial capitals. But why have the initial capitals at all? The lowercase version—rule against perpetuities—is now predominant in American legal writing. See CAPITALIZATION (A).

Rule in Shelley's Case; Rule in Shelley's Case. British writers tend to italicize the case name; American writers tend not to.

rulemaker. One word.

rulemaking serves best as an adjective <rulemaking authority>, or an abstract noun <rulemaking in administrative law>, but not as a concrete noun <three rulemakings today>. This concrete use—which makes the word a COUNT NOUN—derives from administrative law, in which it means "the act or an instance of administratively legislating, through promulgated rules." E.g.: "When the agency used statistics derived from this survey in a formal rulemaking to set minimum wages for government contractors, it made available for cross-examination the statistician who had tabulated the figures." The usage smacks of JARGON, but it may well become accepted as standard AmE legal terminology. See PLURALS (B).

rule nisi. See nisi & decree absolute.

rule of four. This phrase denotes, in AmE, the convention that for certiorari to be granted by the U.S. Supreme Court, four justices must vote in favor of the grant.

rule of law. A. Senses. Rule of law = (1) the supremacy of regular as opposed to arbitrary power; (2) the doctrine that every person is subject to the ordinary law of the realm enforced in the ordinary tribunals; (3) the doctrine that general constitutional principles are the result of judicial decisions determining the rights of private individuals in the courts; or (4) any substantive legal principle. See A.V. Dicey, The Law of the Constitution 110–16 (8th ed. 1915; repr. 1982).

Since the 1960s, and especially in popular contexts, sense (1) has taken on more and more concrete connotations. Thus the phrase often suggests, not the abstract principle of regular power, but the wielders of that power in a given society—the establishment and the police force. E.g., "Many jurists now complain that there has been a breakdown in respect for 'the rule of law.' Their failure to note that the inadequacy of the legal system caused the broad social protest has served only to widen the gulf. The call has gone out for new and stiffer criminal sanctions against civil disobedience." Stephen M. Nagler, "The Language of the Law," in Language in America 218, 227–28 (Neil Postman et al. eds., 1969).

B. And rule of construction. A rule of law is a rule that a court follows to determine the substantive position of the parties; a rule of construction is a guide to the court in interpreting a statute or legal instrument. E.g., "Before its abolition in England, the Rule in Shelley's Case seems to have been a rule of law rather than a rule of construction."

rule of optional completeness. Under this rule, when a party in an American trial uses deposition testimony, the opposing party may require that more of the passage be read to establish the greater context. E.g., "The part bracketed by us was introduced by appellant under the rule of optional completeness." Hobson v. State, 644 S.W.2d 473, 476 n.3 (Tex. Crim. App. 1983).

rule, the. When American lawyers in the South and Southwest refer to the rule, they invoke an evidentiary and procedural rule by which all witnesses are excluded from the courtroom while another witness is testifying. The purpose of the rule is to aid in ascertaining the truth from witnesses by preventing them from hearing what others say on the witness stand. The most frequent idioms containing the phrase are invoking "the rule" and being placed under "the rule"; legal writers generally use the quotation marks as just shown.

ruling. A ruling is the outcome of a court's decision either on some point of law (such as the admissibility of evidence) or on the case as a whole. The word is not synonymous with opinion, q.v., as here wrongly suggested: "The action by Mesa Partners II 'strongly suggests a studied effort by Mesa to conceal its true intent,' the judge wrote in a 33-page ruling [read opinion]." See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT.

ruling case = a reported case that determines an issue being litigated. The phrase appears more commonly in BrE than in AmE, in which the phrase leading case, q.v., is often used for this sense.

run. A. Statutes of Limitation. In AmE, a statute of limitation is said to have run when the time limit has passed. In BrE, the usual phraseology is that the period set by the statute of limitation has expired—e.g.: "[T]he writ had been issued before the six-year period of limitation in respect of a tort had expired." (Eng.) Run is also used in BrE, but is considered a casualism. See laches.

It is unidiomatic to speak of a statute of limitations running out, as opposed to merely running—e.g.: "The District 4-E Grievance Committee found [that] the respondent delayed filing suit in a personal injury matter and allowed the statute of limitations to run out [read run]." Disciplinary Actions, 53 Tex. B.J. 1309, 1309 (1990). The period allowed may properly be said to have "run out."

B. Running with the land. Covenants are said to run with the land when the duty to perform or the right to another's performance is assignable with the land. E.g., "In the case of sales of land the benefit of the vendor's covenants for title 'runs' with the land purchased." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 123 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). Cf. in gross.

C. Meaning "to apply." This is an idiom properly classed as a LEGALISM: "The injunction runs only against one of the parties in the dispute."

runnable, runnability. The words are so spelled—as opposed to the incorrect forms runable and runability.

RUN-ON SENTENCES do not stop where they should. Many readers will recognize the term from their schooldays, when teachers would scrawl "run on" in the margins of student papers. The problem usually occurs when the writer is uncertain about how to handle marks of PUNCTUATION, or how to handle such adverbs as however and otherwise, which are often mistakenly treated as conjunctions.

Some grammarians distinguish between a "run-on sentence" (or "fused sentence") and a "comma splice" (or "run-together sentence"). In a run-on sentence, two independent clauses are not joined by a conjunction such as and, but, for, or, or nor but are incorrectly written with no punctuation between them. In a comma splice, two such independent clauses have merely a comma between them. Thus a run-on sentence might read, "The decision was unprecedented the court had never heard such a case." As a sentence containing a comma splice, it would read, "The decision was unprecedented, the court had never heard such a case." And correctly, it might read, "The decision was unprecedented; the court had never heard such a case."

The presence or absence of a comma may seem hardly noteworthy, but true run-on sentences symbolize the writer's failure to grasp even the most fundamental rules of writing. They are rare in published legal writing, though they occur distressingly often in the writing of law students.

Comma splices, on the other hand, generally signal a less serious failing because the writer at least understands that some type of stop is necessary. That stop usually needs to be a period or a semicolon instead of a comma. Following are some specimens with suggested remedies in brackets:

- "In the final analysis, it fastens liability on the master where his servant is negligent, otherwise [read negligent; otherwise] there is no liability."
- "The competitors got together, that [read as, or drop comma and put an em-dash between together and that] happens in business, politics, and the theater."
- "State sovereignty is not a proper basis on which to rest jurisdiction, instead [read jurisdiction; instead] the focus is on whether the defendant's due process rights are infringed by the court's assertion of jurisdiction."
- "There are two levels of qualification prescribed by the NASD, one [read NASD; one] is for principals and the other is for registered representatives."
- "We do not now decide whether the INS has complied fully with its own regulations, rather [read regulations; rather] we decide that it must in the first instance address petitioner's specific factual claims that it failed to do so."
- "It is true that defendants' right to the insurance payment was a contract right embodied in the policies of insurance, nevertheless [read insurance; nevertheless,] the indemnity payment was based in part on a claim of loss that did not exist."
- "But the court has no power to do by indirection what it is doing directly, particularly [read directly; particularly] is that true in an action for specific performance in which a decree is given as a matter of grace and discretion."
- "The generator's analysis may be used to justify a less-than-complete waste analysis by the site operator, thus [read operator; thus,] incompatible wastes may be burned in the same subcells, or restricted wastes may be entering the landfill."
- "The operation of hauling gasoline is an inherently dangerous activity, therefore, the [read activity; therefore, the] standard of strict liability must be imposed."

Most usage authorities accept comma splices when (1) the clauses are short and closely related, (2) there is no danger of a MISCUE, and (3) the context is informal. Thus: "Jane likes him, I don't." But even when all three criteria are met, some readers are likely to object. Cf. INCOMPLETE SENTENCES.

run with the land. See run (B).

rush to judgment. Lord Erskine, among the greatest advocates ever to practice at the English Bar, was apparently the first to use this phrase, around 1800. He was defending a man accused of trying to assassinate George III: "An attack upon the King is considered to be parricide against the state, and the jury and the witnesses, and even the judges, are the children. It is fit, on that account, that there should be a solemn pause before we rush to judgment . . . ." Thomas Erskine, "Speech in Defence of James Hadfield," in 4 Erskine's Speeches 163, 167 (James L. High ed., 1876).

The term was popularized in 1966 when Mark Lane, a Washington lawyer, published Rush to Judgment, a book about the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. William Safire, the great linguistic detective, wrote Mr. Lane to inquire about the phrase, and Lane explained: "When I wrote the book back in '64, I was looking for a title that would have some historic resonance. I came upon the phrase I needed in a speech by Lord Chancellor Thomas Erskine . . . ." William Safire, On Language, N.Y. Times, 26 Feb. 1995, § 6, at 18.

Today, of course, the phrase is all but ubiquitous whenever an advocate wants to forestall rash judgments, or to keep minds open when public opinion takes an adverse turn.

sacrilegious. So spelled; sacreligious is a common misspelling. E.g., "Surely moral merit is at least as elusive as other terms the Court has declared infirm, such as 'gangsters,' 'sacreligious [read sacrilegious],' 'humane,' and 'credible and reliable.'" Deborah L. Rhode, Moral Character as a Professional Credential, 94 Yale L.J. 491, 571 (1985). The correct spelling can be remembered easily if one recalls the noun: sacrilege.

sadly. See SENTENCE ADVERBS.

safe; safety. In BrE, these words, when referring to criminal convictions or penalties, denote legal sufficiency. Safe = not liable to be overturned on any ground. E.g., "It is the opinion of this House on the safety of the verdict that is in debate."/ "The judge who tried the PC Blakelock murder case wrote the Home Office four years ago, stating that the verdict against one of the men convicted of the killing was unsafe, a defence lawyer claimed last night." David Rose, Blakelock Judge Told Hurd: Verdict Unsafe, Observer, 29 Sept. 1991, at 1./ "Mr. Simpson believes the trial judge expressed 'serious doubts about the safety of the conviction' of Braithwaite." Id.

safe harbor, a picturesque legal metaphor, has a general sense—"a means or area of protection"—as well as a number of specific applications, as in the law of sanctions and in tax law. Usually, the safe harbor is a potential wrongdoer's opportunity to correct a wrong before a penalty comes into effect.

safety. See safe.

said. A. Generally. Said should be rigorously eschewed as a substitute for the, that, this, or any other deictic or "pointing" word. Used for such a word, said typifies LEGALESE and is often parodied by nonlawyers. And lawyers occasionally fall into self-parody:

> A considerable number of persons were attracted to said square by said meeting, and said bombs and other fireworks which were being exploded there. A portion of the center of the square about 40 to 60 feet was roped off by the police of said Chelsea, and said bombs or shells were fired off within the space so inclosed, and no spectators were allowed to be within said inclosure. The plaintiffs were lawfully in said highway at the time of the explosion of said mortar, and near said ropes, and were in the exercise of due care. (Eng.)

> If the said Grant R. Shelley shall die, and leave surviving him children, it is my desire that, if my wife be then dead, or upon the death of my wife if she should survive said son, my trustee shall continue said trust for the benefit of said children of my son, Grant R. Shelley, and shall make periodic payments for their benefit at intervals of not less than three (3) months apart, and shall hold said estate in trust to and until the youngest child of Grant R. Shelley shall attain the age of twenty-one (21) years, thereupon, said trust shall terminate, and said estate shall be distributed to the children of my son, share and share alike; if any of said children die before the youngest attains the age of twenty-one (21) years, said distributable estate shall be distributed to the surviving children, share and share alike.
> Quoted in Shelley v. Shelley, 354 P.2d 282, 284 (Or. 1960).

This usage had its origins in LOAN TRANSLATION, said being the English equivalent of the Latin dicti, as in the 17th-century general demurrer: tam contra pacem dicti nuper Regis (= against the peace of the said late King).

Among the misinformation recently disseminated about this term is that of Richard Weisberg, who says that said "is bizarre, but it is irreplaceable not only to the drafter of wills but to other technical lawyers as well." When Lawyers Write

99 (1987). That statement is balderdash. Skilled drafters—no matter how "technical" the subject—have not relied on said in more than a century. Said never lends greater precision than the, this, that, these, or those—in many contexts it even introduces imprecision.

B. The said. As used in legal writing, the word said is a Middle-English sibling of aforesaid, having the sense "above-stated." Originally legal writers would write the said defendant—and still do in BrE—just as they would write the aforesaid defendant or the above-stated defendant. In AmE, however, the was dropped before said, which has come to act almost as an article. Hence the said seems redundant to American ears, though it was well established at one time. It still occasionally appears in American cases, but more often in British ones: "J.W.T. had induced his wife to furnish him money with which to acquire the said [omit said] property."/ "The transaction resulted in an exorbitant profit to the said [omit said] defendant." (Eng.)

One writer has stated that "the said person is better than said person." Elmer A. Driedger, The Composition of Legislation 87 (1957). Stylistically, however, both are so horrid that the question is better framed, "Which is less bad?"

C. His said, etc. This collocation is similar to the said; both *said*s are quite superfluous here: "He wrongfully, knowingly, intentionally, and maliciously induced said [omit said] McClure to violate, repudiate, and break his said [omit said] agreement with the plaintiff."

D. In Pleadings. Said appears at the beginning of legalistically worded pleadings in the SET PHRASE To the Honorable Judge of Said Court, the word said referring to the name of the court in the caption (usu. just above this phrase). Legal stylists generally discard this and similar jargonistic deadwood. Lawyers who want a simpler substitute—who are unwilling to abandon the phrase completely—often write To the Honorable Court.

E. As Referring to Preceding Matter. When said is used in the way here disapproved, as we must grudgingly accept that it will be, it should refer to something above ("already said"), not to what is about to be said: "Any person who does any of the acts hereinafter enumerated thereby submits himself to the jurisdiction of the courts of this State regarding any cause of action arising from any of said acts [read these acts]: [an enumeration follows]."

F. As a Noun. As suggested above, said is merely a pointing word. Thus it cannot stand on its own as a noun. In this sentence, the writer has misused said for same: "Defendants exercised control over Mobay's ownership interest in that property, and thereby converted said [read same]." See same (A).

G. Modifying Proper Names. Said is especially ludicrous when used to modify a proper name, where no confusion could result from the name alone: "The first count of the indictment alleged, in substance, that George Smith was an idiot, and under the care, custody, and control of the respondents; that the respondents assaulted said George [read George]. . . ." (Cf. said Chelsea in the first passage quoted in this entry.)

sailor's will. See oral will.

saith; sayeth. The phrase once common in affidavits and still sometimes used—Further affiant sayeth (or saith) not—is completely superfluous. If it is to be used, the next-to-last word may be spelled either saith or sayeth. (Sayeth is slightly more common in American caselaw.) These are alternative Elizabethan forms. But if we are to write contemporary modern English, and not early modern English, the -th forms should disappear altogether.

Why? The -th termination for the third person singular verb for the present tense (he maketh) originated in the Midland dialectal form of Middle English; the termination -s (he makes) originated in northern England and became the predominant form in Shakespeare's day. The -eth forms have long been obsolete in every field except religion and law—two fields in which they are obsolescent. See -ETH.

When the affiant hath nothing further to say, the affiant generally stoppeth testifying. On the question whether to say naught or not in this phrase, see not & further affiant (B).

sal(e)able; sellable. The preferred spellings are salable in AmE (W10 & W3), and saleable in BrE (OED & COD). Sellable, arguably a more logical form, was formerly used by some writers, but never gained widespread currency.

Salic law; Salique law. The body of law developed by the Salians (or Salian Franks), after they settled in Gaul under King Pharamond at the beginning of the 5th century, is generally referred to as Salic law. Holmes and Holland used this spelling, and so do most other legal writers. E.g., "Now a Salian, wherever he might be, in whatever part of France, was judged by the Salic law . . . ." James Hadley, Introduction to Roman Law 28 (N.Y., D. Appleton & Co. 1881).

salience; saliency. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

Salique law. See Salic law.

salutary; salutiferous; salubrious. Salutary = beneficial; wholesome. Salutory is a common misspelling. E.g., "The court must be careful to implement this sanction in a way that advances its salutory [read salutary] purpose while avoiding its potential danger." William W. Kilgarlin & Don Jackson, Sanctions for Discovery Abuse Under New Rule 215, 15 St. Mary's L.J. 767, 791 (1984)./ "It is a corollary to the necessary and salutory [read salutary] presumption that a child born during the pendency of a legal marriage is the legitimate offspring of the husband and wife."/ "Legal realism has probably, on the whole, had a salutary effect on the system." Salutiferous is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of salutary. Salubrious, a near-synonym of salutary, means "healthful; promoting health or well-being."

SALUTATIONS. See FORMS OF ADDRESS.

salvable. See savable.

salvage, n.; selvage. Salvage = the rescue of property (as at sea or from fire). Selvage = the woven edging that prevents raveling along either side of a width of cloth.

salvageable. See savable.

salvor; salvager; salvagor. Most dictionaries give preference to salvager, but salvor has long been the common term in admiralty law. E.g., "The last bottomry bond will ride over all that precedes it; and an abandonment to a salvor will supersede every prior claim." The St. Jago de Cuba, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 409, 416 (1824) (per Johnson, J.)./ "Salvors of human life . . . are entitled to a fair share of the remuneration awarded to the salvors of the vessel . . . ." 46 U.S.C. § 729 (1988).

salvo. See saving(s) clause (C).

same. A. As a Pronoun. This usage, commonly exemplified in the phrase acknowledging same, is a primary symptom of LEGALESE. Fowler wrote trenchantly that it "is avoided by all who have any skill in writing" and that those who use it seem bent on giving the worst possible impression of themselves. (MEU1 at 511.) The words it, them, or the noun itself (that is, the envelope, say, and not same) are words that come naturally to us all; same or the same is an unnatural English expression:

- "A will may be revoked by burning, tearing, cancelling or obliterating the same [read it]." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 246 (1946; repr. 1950).
- "[E]quity enabled them to hold any kind of property in trust for their own benefit, and to dispose of the same [read it] at pleasure." Stephen Pfeil, "Law," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 86, 90 (1953).
- "Tucker received said envelope and its said contents in due course the following day and he opened same and has refused to file same." [Read Tucker received the envelope the following day. He opened it and refused to file its contents.]
- "We should not write until the court below shows that it considered all the evidence by discussing same [read it] in full."

As these examples illustrate, the phrase is rendered sometimes (and preferably) with the definite article, sometimes without. See said (F).

B. Same . . . as are. Are often appears superfluously in statements that two or more things are identical: "The government here does not suggest that appellee is not entitled to the same Fourth Amendment protection as are [omit are] citizens."/ "Every member of the proposed class is in the same position with respect to that question as are [read as the] plaintiffs." See as . . . as (B).

C. Same difference. This phrase is an illogical AmE casualism that is to be avoided not only in writing but in speech as well. "It's all the same," "It's the same thing," etc., are better.

sanative; sanatory. See sanitary.

sanction = (1) to approve; or (2) to penalize. Nonlawyers usually understand sanction in sense (1); thus lawyers, who use it primarily in sense (2), are liable to be misunderstood. Yet sense (1) also appears in legal writing, as here: "The courts will not sanction a trust disposition if it is inimical to public policy."

As a noun, sanction is burdened by the same ambiguity, meaning either (1) "approval" <governmental sanction to sell the goods>, or (2) "penalty" <the statute provides sanctions for violations of the act>. In phrases such as give sanction to, the word means "approval"—while to issue sanctions against is a way of showing disapproval.

sanctionable. This word, like sanction, carries a double sense of approval and disapproval. Most often, sanctionable means "deserving punishment"—e.g.: "Specifically, the court found sanctionable: defense counsel's failure to supplement Mignona's deposition testimony . . . ." Perkinson v. Gilbert/Robinson, Inc., 821 F.2d 686, 688–89 (D.C. Cir. 1987).

But the word sometimes means "approvable," as here: "It was our visit to the Flower Children . . . that suggested to me the need for an alternative to the polar position—the need for a totally new and socially sanctionable drug." Matthew Huxley, Criteria for a Socially Sanctionable Drug, 1 Interdisciplinary Sci. Rev. 176, 182 (1976).

sandpapering, in American trial lawyers' JARGON, refers to the preparation of witnesses before trial. The metaphor, of course, suggests that counsel can help soften the rough edges of their witnesses—e.g.: "We are not unmindful of the trial court's observations regarding Ms. Haynie's candor, or lack of it, and we suppose that if Diogenes, searching for an honest man, had wandered into the courtroom during the trial of this case, he might not have considered his quest at an end on meeting the plaintiff—although the rough edges on the plaintiff's testimony may have stemmed more from a lack of pre-trial preparation ('sandpapering,' in the trial court's terminology) on the part of her badly overworked counsel than from any inherent defect in the plaintiff's character." Haynie v. Ross Gear Division of TRW, Inc., 799 F.2d 237, 242 (6th Cir. 1986). Cf. horseshed.

sanitary; sanatory; sanative. Sanitary = of or relating to health or, more usu., cleanliness. Sanative = health-producing; healthful. Sanatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

sank. See sink.

sans is an archaic literary GALLICISM to be avoided, unless a tongue-in-cheek or archaic effect is intended. Without should always be favored over sans (as long as one is using the English language). E.g., "Arrogation to an appointed official of the denial of the right to hear and see a controversial play cannot be accomplished sans [read without] standards."/ "Has Findeisen alleged a deprivation under color of state law of a federally protected property right, sans [read without] due process?"

sans recours. See without recourse.

sat, in legal slang, is short for satisfaction of judgment. E.g., "[When a] man finishes paying a judgment, the lawyer involved should send a 'sat'—a satisfaction of judgment to the county records section." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble With Lawyers 89 (1970) (quoting Robert E. Blackman). See sense (2) of satisfaction.

satellite litigation = (1) lawsuits related to a major piece of litigation being conducted in one court, while the others are conducted usu. in other courts and often with different parties; or (2) peripheral skirmishes involved in the prosecution of a lawsuit. The phrase is late-20th-century AmE—e.g.: (Sense 1) "To avoid satellite litigation, the statutory elements of the crime must necessarily involve untruthfulness or falsification." Paul F. Rothstein, Needed: A Rewrite, Crim. Just., Summer 1989, at 20, 21./ (Sense 2) "Mr. Bickel and Mr. Brewer call the sanctions 'satellite litigation,' drummed up by the opposition to deflect attention from the meatier issues." Dona Rubin, The Rambo Boys, Dallas Life Mag., 25 Feb. 1990, at 9.

satisfaction, as a LEGALISM, has nothing to do with being satisfied in the usual sense. It means (1) "the fulfillment of an obligation or claim, esp. the payment in full of a debt"; or (2) a document showing that an obligation, such as a mortgage or a court's judgment, has been fully paid. See accord and satisfaction & sat.

savable; salvable; salvageable. Savable = capable of being saved. Originally this word was used in theological senses, and it still carries religious connotations. Salvable, too, has the theological sense ("admitting of salvation"), as well as the sense (used of ships) "that can be saved or salvaged." Salvageable, dated from 1976 in the OED but actually much older in AmE, has become common in the sense "that can be salvaged"—e.g.: "[H]is agreement to the foregoing measure of salvageable value was not to be construed as an admission of liability . . . ." Wheeler v. Aetna Ins. Co., 4 F. Supp. 820, 823 (E.D.N.Y. 1933).

save, as an ARCHAISM equivalent to except, is best avoided, although, as the examples following illustrate, it is still common in legal prose: "The law-of-the-circuit rule forbids one panel to overrule another save [read except] when a later statute or Supreme Court decision has changed the applicable law."/ "The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on all of appellant's due process claims save [read except for] those alleging bias, which were tried to the court."/ "As long as the law requires disclosure, the scales come down decisively, in my opinion, in favour of a renewed inquiry on or very shortly before the day of the hearing, save [read except] in very exceptional circumstances." (Eng.) save and except is a common but unjustifiable REDUNDANCY. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

save harmless. See indemnify (A).

saving(s) clause; saving-to-suitors clause. A. Generally. Saving clause (= a statutory provision exempting from coverage something that would otherwise be included) is the preferred form of this phrase generally, and particularly in admiralty law. See Territory of Alaska v. American Can Co., 246 F.2d 493, 494 (9th Cir. 1957) (insisting that the proper form is singular, not plural). Savings clause is not an uncommon variant, but it is not as good, for it (1) suggests financial savings, and (2) makes savings a nominal rather than a participial adjective when the latter is more specific. E.g., "The note also contained a savings clause [read saving clause] providing that any charge that caused or was interpreted to cause the interest to exceed the maximum lawful rate was to be reduced to the extent necessary to eliminate the usurious violation."

The U.S. Constitution grants federal courts jurisdiction over "all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction." U.S. Const. art. III, § 2. The statutory grant of this admiralty jurisdiction negated exclusive jurisdiction by "saving to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common[-]law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." 28 U.S.C. § 1333 (1988). This language is known as the saving clause, or saving-to-suitors clause, which allows a plaintiff to bring an action in any forum that will exercise jurisdiction over the case.

Though known esp. to American lawyers as a term relating to admiralty jurisdiction, the phrase has long had broader applications—e.g.: "[W]e need only suppose for a moment that the supremacy of the State constitutions had been left complete by a saving clause in their favor." The Federalist No. 44, at 286 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961)./ "[I]f all the possible repercussions of the new statute were to be foreseen and provided for, the text necessarily became long, full of enumerations, exceptions, provisions, saving clauses and the like." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 324 (5th ed. 1956).

B. As a Synonym of severability clause. Saving clause is sometimes used as a synonym of severability clause, whether in a statute or in a contract. This usage is loose and confusing, however, because saving clause generally means something quite different, (see (A)) and severability clause prevails over saving clause in this secondary sense. See severability clause.

C. Other Terms. A saving clause is sometimes, esp. in older texts, called a salvo (common from the 17th to the 19th centuries). For a discussion of one category of saving clauses, see grandfather clause.

say. See hold.

sayeth. See saith.

sc., the abbreviation for scilicet (= that is to say: namely), is a pedantic abbreviation—namely or i.e. being preferable because they are more widely known. Even viz. is better known than sc. See viz.

scandalous. Court rules in the U.S. and G.B. have long forbidden advocates to put scandalous matter in their submissions. See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 12. The OED quotes a phrase from Vesey's Chancery Cases (1809)—"The introduction of irrelevant and scandalous matter upon affidavits"—defining scandalous here as meaning "irrelevant." In yet another sense, the OED defines scandalous as meaning "defamatory" <scandalous and seditious letters>. And, of course, it records the primary meaning: "grossly disgraceful; of the nature of a scandal."

But is the great dictionary correct in saying that scandalous matter refers merely to irrelevant matter? Some modern legal scholars have scoffed at the suggestion. And they are right: the OED definition is incomplete. The phrase scandalous matter refers to what is both grossly disgraceful (or defamatory) and irrelevant, as an early-20th-century scholar explained: "Scandal consists in the allegation of anything [that] is unbecoming the dignity of the court to hear, or is contrary to decency or good manners, or which charges some person with a crime not necessary to be shown in the cause, to which may be added that any unnecessary allegation, bearing cruelly upon the moral character of an individual, is also scandalous. The matter alleged, however, must be not only offensive, but also irrelevant to the cause, for however offensive it be, if it be pertinent and material to the cause the party has a right to plead it." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading 50–51 (1916).

scarify; scorify. Scarify means (1) "to make superficial incisions in, cut off skin from"; (2) "to pain by severe criticism"; or (3) "to loosen soil by means of an agricultural machine [a scarifier] with prongs for spiked road-breaking." Scorify means "to reduce to dross or slag."

scarlet-letter, adj., = of or relating to a type of punishment, esp. a condition of probation, that results in infamy or public scorn. The phrase alludes to Nathaniel Hawthorne's novella, The Scarlet Letter (1850), in which Hester Prynne is forced to wear a scarlet A on her blouse to proclaim her crime: adultery. In the 1980s, scarlet-letter punishments became fashionable in some parts of the U.S.—e.g.: "Of particular concern is the growing use of 'scarlet letter' probation conditions which require signs to be posted on the offender's property warning the public by announcing the crime committed." Leonore H. Tavill, Note, Scarlet Letter Punishment: Yesterday's Outlawed Penalty Is Today's Probation Condition, 36 Clevel. St. L. Rev. 613, 615 (1988)./ "[T]his Note argues that modern scarlet-letter probation conditions resembling the historical antecedents of punishment constitute punishment by humiliation." Jon A. Brilliant, Note, The Modern Day Scarlet Letter, 1989 Duke L.J. 1357, 1359. Recorded examples of scarlet-letter probation conditions include requiring child molesters to post warning signs on their cars and in their front yards; requiring drunk drivers to proclaim their crimes on T-shirts that they must wear or on bumper stickers; and requiring drunk drivers to place apologies, along with their photographs, in local newspapers.

scatter-gun. See blunderbuss.

sceptic(al). See skeptic(al).

schism (= division; separation) is best pronounced /siz-əm/, not /skiz-əm/. The term is now usually used figuratively—e.g.: "The dispute in this case grows out of the schism between 'professional' and 'commercial' optometrists in Texas."

science. See legal science.

scienter /sī-en-tər/ (= [1] the fact of an act's having been done knowingly, esp. as a ground for damages or criminal punishment; or [2] prior knowledge) is a noun in Anglo-American jurisprudence, although the Latin word scienter is an adverb meaning knowingly. The term has been common in legal writing since the 19th century.

The term is often stretched beyond its true sense to mean "guilty knowledge," esp. in contexts announcing the standard for intent in fraud contexts. E.g., "[T]he account executive's scienter, defined as intent to defraud or reckless disregard, must be established." Shad v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 799 F.2d 525, 530 (9th Cir. 1986). Two influential commentators decry this usage, which equates scienter with mens rea. See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 861 (3d ed. 1982).

sci. fa. See scire facias.

scilicet. See sc.

scintilla (= a spark or minute particle) is often applied to law in the phrase scintilla of evidence. Pl. -las. The redundant phrase mere scintilla has become a legal CLICHE.

scire facias, literally "that you cause to know," denotes the judicial writ (which contained these words) founded upon a matter of record requiring the person against whom it is issued to show cause either why the record should not be annulled or vacated, or why a dormant judgment against that person should not be revived. E.g., "Scire facias to revive a judgment being a continuation of the suit, jurisdiction thereon is in the court where the judgment was rendered, regardless of the residency of the parties." The phrase is abbreviated sci. fa.

scission. See dépeçage.

scofflaw (= one who treats the law with contempt) is a 20th-century AMERICANISM. Oddly enough, the word was coined by two entrants in a competition held in 1924 to characterize the "lawless drinker" of liquor illegally made or obtained. Scofflaw was chosen from more than 25,000 words, and since that time, of course, it has been extended beyond its original meaning, which lost its pungency with the repeal of Prohibition. Now scofflaw refers esp. to a person who avoids various laws that are not easily enforced E.g., "[S]ome scofflaws try to avoid detection by hauling make-believe passengers: mannequins, blow-up dolls and dummies." Cecile Sorra, It Takes Special Training to Tell They Aren't Federal Bureaucrats, Wall St. J., 19 July 1989, at B1.

score = twenty, though various other numbers are often mistakenly attached to the word. Four score and seven = 87.

scorify. See scarify.

Scotch law; Scottish law; Scots law. F.T. Wood, an Englishman, writes: "The Scots (or Scotch?) themselves are less particular than the English in the matter of these three words [Scotch, Scottish, and Scots]." Current English Usage 207 (1962). He recommends Scots for the noun denoting the people; and Scottish when referring to characteristics of the country.

Boswell, a Scottish lawyer, used Scotch law throughout his Life of Johnson, and occasionally Scottish law as well. Even modern British writers do not use the terms consistently. E.g., "It follows that, if the proper law of the arbitration is to be held to be Scots law, this conclusion must come about by some inference . . . from the contract. . . . There is absolutely nothing in this contract from which it could be said to be governed by Scottish law." James Miller & Partners Ltd v. Whitworth Street Estates Ltd, 1970 A.C. 583, 599 (H.L.).

One might defensibly say that the preferred forms are Scots law, but Scottish procedure, Scottish arbitration, Scottish legal forms. (Black's uses Scotch law in references throughout.) Scotch, recorded in the OED as a "contracted variant of Scottish," is best avoided by those in doubt. E.g., "When I look at the report, I find that Lord Cottenham abstains from laying down a rule in that case, but expresses a hope that the Scotch judges [Scottish judges would now be better] would take care to exercise the jurisdiction of the court with discretion and consistency." (Eng.)/ "Crawford sought to depose two principals of Hydrasum (Aberdeen) Ltd., a Scottish corporation."

It is sometimes said that Scotch should be used of material objects, as Scotch tartans, Scotch whisky, and Scotch thistle.

scot-free is a predicative adjective meaning "exempt from injury or punishment." E.g., "It would be contrary to the decided weight of authority to hold that since plaintiff has a cause of action against the company for breach of contract, Sander should go scot-free." (Eng.) The phrase derives from the early English "scot" or contribution or payment into a common fund.

It is a mistake to capitalize scot as if it referred to someone from Scotland—e.g.: "To allow people to get away with this sort of crime Scot [read scot] free is a very disturbing trend." James Langton, The Jury That Saw Two Wrongs as a Right, Sunday Telegraph, 24 May 1992, at 4 (quoting the Rev. Anthony Higton, rector of Hawkwell in Essex).

Scottish; Scots. See Scotch law.

scrivener; scrivenor; scribe. The spelling scrivener is preferred over scrivenor. E.g., "David Smith, an attorney, a witness and scrivener of the 1965 will, testified that the original will was executed near the vault in the Montellow State Bank."/ "The testator thought the attorney was trying to place him in a mental hospital and had another scrivener draft a will in which he left the attorney nothing."

Scrivener, as illustrated in the two sentences just quoted, and scribe, as evidenced in the name of the American lawyers' organization devoted to improved legal writing (Scribes), either are frequently taken by lawyers to be terms of praise for the person named, or are unusual lawyers' attempts at self-effacement. Technically, a scrivener is merely a copyist or amanuensis, not a legal drafter. In Bartleby the Scrivener, Herman Melville described a scrivener as "a mere copyist"—"[c]opying law papers being proverbially a dry, husky sort of business."

The same is true of scribe in all but historical senses; the OED notes that it is additionally "applied to a political pamphleteer or journalist; chiefly with contemptuous notion, a party hack."

scrutiny, strict. See strict scrutiny.

scul(l)duggery. See skul(l)duggery.

sculpture, v.t.; sculpt. The preferred verb is sculpture <to sculpture a bust>, although sculpt, a BACK-FORMATION from sculptor, is commonly seen in AmE. Sculptor is preferred over sculpturer as the agent noun.

Scylla and Charybdis, between. As described by Homer, Scylla was a sea monster who had six heads (each with a triple row of teeth) and twelve feet. Though primarily a fish-eater, she was capable of snatching and devouring (in one swoop) six sailors if their ship ventured too near her cave in the Straits of Messina. (In the accounts of later writers, she is depicted as a rocky promontory.) Toward the opposite shore, not far from Scylla's lair, was Charybdis, a whirlpool strong enough thrice daily to suck into its vortex whole ships if they came too close.

Thus, between Scylla and Charybdis is the literary CLICHÉ roughly equivalent to "between a rock and a hard place." E.g., "In my attempt to steer a safe course between the Scylla and Charybdis of opposing absolutisms, I am not likely to have escaped serious error and may not even have made my main points tolerably clear." Morris R. Cohen, Reason and Law 112 (1961)./ "[A] refusal on the part of the federal courts to intervene . . . may place the hapless plaintiff between the Scylla of intentionally flouting state law and the Charybdis of forgoing what he believes to be constitutionally protected activity to avoid becoming enmeshed in a criminal proceeding." Steffel v. Thompson, 415 U.S. 452, 462 (1974). See LITERARY ALLUSION (A)(4).

seal. A. Origin and Sense. At common law, the seal was an impression made upon wax, a wafer (i.e., gummed paper), or other adhesive substance; attached to a legal document as a formality; and having various types of legal significance, depending on the document. Today, a seal is generally an impression stamped or embossed on paper to authenticate a document or attest to a signature, such as a corporate or notary seal. Some jurisdictions—esp. U.S. states on the eastern seaboard—require deeds to be sealed. A few even require leases to be under seal. See L.S., signed, sealed, and delivered & wafer.

B. Contracts Under Seal. Generally, of course, valuable consideration is necessary to make an enforceable contract. But for a contract under seal, no consideration is necessary. Traditionally, such a contract carries with it an irrebuttable presumption of consideration: "The Law long ago decided that a seal, real or imitation, attached to a promise, amounted to good Consideration for that promise, despite the fact that the man who makes the promise puts the seal there." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 35 (1939; repr. 1980). But statutes in some jurisdictions, such as New York, have made the presumption of consideration rebuttable. In so changing the common law, these jurisdictions have progressed beyond "one of the quaintest freaks of legal conservatism, that the presence or absence of a gummed wafer or engraved mark on a document should, in this rationalistic age, make any difference in its legal effect." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 291 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). See L.S.

C. The Idiom the case is sealed. This phrase is a figurative extension of the literal contractual sense, the idea being that some occurrence fastens the outcome. E.g., "The legal errors he made representing himself in the wrongful-death suit probably sealed the case against him." Verdict Against White Supremacist, A.B.A. J., Jan. 1991, at 22.

sea lawyer. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (B).

seaman. The term is common in admiralty contexts, but mariner carries the same meaning without the -man suffix. (See SEXISM (B).) Seaman is so well entrenched, however, that many admiralty lawyers would not consider changing it. See mariner.

search and seizure. Enshrined in the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the individual's right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures derives ultimately from the Magna Carta. Roscoe Pound and others have connected this important constitutional right with "the clause in Magna Carta that the king would not 'send upon' a free man . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 49 (1957; repr. 1975).

Today, under the exclusionary rule (q.v.), evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment right is excluded from any prosecution. Of course, the purposely vague word unreasonable has been the source of steady litigation. Today, warrantless searches are generally considered "unreasonable," but there are several exceptions, involving consent, an otherwise lawful arrest, and exigency. See stop-and-frisk rule & Terry* stop.

When used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, search and seizure should be hyphenated: search-and-seizure rules.

search warrant. Preferably two words, though some writers have hyphenated the phrase.

seasonable. A. And seasonal. Seasonable = (1) occurring at the right season; opportune; or (2) (of weather) suitable to the time of year (OED). Seasonal = (1) pertaining to or characteristic of the seasons of the year, or some one of them; or (2) dependent on the seasons, as certain trades (OED). For the noun sense, see seasonal, n.

B. And timely. In legal contexts, seasonable is often used to mean "timely," whereas in lay contexts it ordinarily means "in season." One writer has insisted that "these terms [seasonable and timely] are not synonymous. That which is seasonable is in harmony or keeping with the season or occasion; that which is timely is in good time. A thing may be timely in appearance that is not seasonable." Frank H. Vizetelly, A Desk-Book of Errors in English 194 (1907). Yet in American legal writing, the word is regularly used as a synonym of timely, whether advisedly or not. E.g., "If the dominant party receives the benefit or donation during the existence of the confidential relation, the party reposing the confidence, on seasonable application to a court of equity, may obtain relief from the burdens and duties imposed simply by showing the transaction and the confidential relation."

seasonal, n., is sometimes used in AmE as an elliptical form of seasonal worker. E.g., "The policy that Congress adopted the adverse action protection to serve thus does not favor application of those protections to seasonals' layoffs." See ADJECTIVES (C). seaward(s). See -WARD(S).

seaworthy. One word—not hyphenated.

secede. See cede.

2d; 2nd. The former is preferred in legal citations.

second bite at the apple — a favorite expression of defense lawyers—is an especially tiresome CLICHÉ. E.g., "The plaintiffs should not be given a second bite at the apple because . . . ." See one bite at the apple.

second chair, n.; second-chair, v.t. In AmE, the second chair at trial is a lawyer who helps the lead counsel in court, often by examining some of the witnesses, arguing some of the points of law, and handling parts of the voir dire, opening statement, and summation. For lead counsel, see leader (at the bar).

Since the late 20th century, the phrase second chair has come to be used also as a verb, preferably hyphenated- e.g.: "I learned this lesson as a novice, second chairing [read second-chairing] an experienced trial lawyer." Denis McInerney, Counterclaims as Self-Inflicted Wounds, Litigation, Spring 1992, at 2, 2. See NOUNS AS VERBS second degree = the second most serious category of a crime, as in second-degree murder. See degree & murder (A).

second-guess, vb. Hyphenated thus.

secondhand(ed). The -ed suffix is not just unnecessary—it is wrong. E.g., "Harvey contributed a secondhanded [read secondhand] boiler and some machinery . . . ." Harvey v. Gartner, 67 So. 197, 201 (La. 1915).

secondhand evidence. See hearsay evidence.

secondment /sə-kond-mənt/, primarily a BrE term, means "a person's reassignment from his or her regular employment to some temporary assignment elsewhere." E.g., "A former Assistant Director of Public Prosecutions, he had to initiate systems, recruit staff, many on secondment for set periods . . . before the SFO could get down to business." The Fraud Buster with 66 Cases on His Hands, Sunday Telegraph, 11 Feb. 1990, at 28./ "He was a consultant on secondment from Bain & Co." Paul Durman, Jury Told to Imagine "Nasty Surprises," The Independent, 17 Aug. 1990, at 19.

secretary = a corporate officer who is concerned with the corporation's business management and administration. In corporate law, then, this term denotes an office considerably more elevated than those outside business and law might suspect.

secretaryship; secretarishiip. The former spelling is standard.

secrete = (1) to hide; or (2) to exude or ooze through pores or glands; to produce by secretion. Secrete away is redundant. Sense (1) is becoming increasingly learned or literary, but it is frequently used in legal writing—e.g.: "The plaintiffs also suffer a heavy burden in having to commence actions wherever the enjoined party and his agents choose to secrete the funds."

secretive; secretory. The first is the adjective ("inclined to secrecy, uncommunicative") corresponding to sense (1) of secrete; the second is the adjective ("having the function of secreting") corresponding to sense (2) of secrete. Secretive is best pronounced /see-krə-tiv/ /si-kree-tiv/, and secretory /si-kree-tə-ree/.

section. In DRAFTING, a section—often indicated by the character "§"—is either a subdivision of a document or a subdivision of an article in a document, statutory title, or code. The plural form of the abbreviation is §§.

In contracts, section is often used interchangeably with article or, more commonly (and unfortunately), paragraph. See article & paragraph.

sectionalize (= to divide into sections) has become commonplace in lawyers' cant. E.g., "The firm is sectionalized, so that each associate will know to whom he or she may turn for consultation and advice. Sectionalization facilitates orderly distribution of work and the opportunity for concentration." See -IZE.

secular, like lay, has been extended beyond the religious meaning, namely, "outside the ecclesiastical calling," and now can refer to persons and things outside a profession, most commonly the law. Cf. temporal.

securitize = (1) to package (a traditional loan, such as a mortgage) into bondlike securities for resale to investors; or (2) to secure (a debt) with assets. This commercial NEOLOGISM has not yet found its way into most dictionaries, such as the OED and W3. E.g., "Over the past few months, the casino and real estate mogul . . . has discussed selling, refinancing or securitizing virtually every major asset he holds." Neil Barsky, Trump's Growing Appetite for Cash, Wall St. J., 27 April 1990, at B1./ "[T]he rate cap legislation would make it unprofitable for card issuers to securitize their credit card receivables." Congress Backs Away From Credit Card Rate Cap, After Markets React, 57 BNA's Banking Rep. 840, 842 (1991).

security = (1) an instrument given to secure the performance of an act; (2) collateral used to guarantee repayment of a debt; (3) a surety, or person bound by some type of guaranty [though surety is the proper and the more usual term for this sense]; or (4) an instrument (such as a stock, a bond, or an option) indicating one of three things: (a) ownership in a firm, (b) a creditor relationship with a firm or with a national or local government, or (c) some other rights to ownership. Senses (1) and (2) are the traditional legal senses, but sense (4) is the most common modern sense—the investor's sense. Sense (3) ought to be avoided in modern writing.

secus (= not so; otherwise) is an ARCHAISM, a LATINISM, and a LEGALISM—e.g.: "If a person devises to trustees, and by express clause gives them the power to appoint agents to manage the land, and they appoint one then solvent and good, though afterwards he proves insolvent, they shall not answer for him; secus if he were not solvent when he was nominated."

sedition; treason; insurrection; revolt; rebellion; revolution. Sedition = an agreement or communication aimed at stirring up treason or some lesser commotion, or (in BrE) at defaming a member of the royal family or of the government. Treason = attempting, through an overt act, to overthrow one's government.

One authority incorrectly states that the distinction between sedition and treason is that, "though the ultimate object of sedition is a violation of the public peace, or at least such a course of measures as evidently engenders it, yet it does not aim at direct and open violence against the laws or the subversion of the constitution." Black's Law Dictionary 1523 (4th ed. 1968). But the distinction does not lie in the objective, even though the objective of sedition may be less serious than what is required for treason; rather, the true distinction is that sedition is committed by preliminary steps while treason requires some overt act directed toward execution. See Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 508 (3d ed. 1982). See treason & libel.

The term insurrection, denoting "an open uprising against the government," goes beyond sedition. Revolt is stronger still, being an attempt to overthrow the government, while an insurrection seeks only a change within the existing government. A large-scale revolt is called a rebellion, which, if successful, becomes a revolution.

seditious libel. See libel.

seduction; seducement. Although the latter is sometimes used for the former, the two are best kept separate. Seduction = the action or an act of seducing (a person, esp. a woman) to err in conduct or belief, esp. of enticing the person to engage in illicit sexual intercourse. It differs from rape, in which there is no consent; in seduction, the consent is unfairly obtained. English common law had no crime known as seduction, but many state statutes in the U.S. make it a misdemeanor (or, formerly, a felony).

Seducement = something that seduces or serves as a means of seduction; an insidious temptation (OED).

seem. A. As a Weasel Word. The verb seems can often destroy the power of a passage, as here: "Synanon makes the astonishing assertion that the alleged wrongdoing—perjured testimony, document destruction, and similar misconduct—constitutes mere discovery abuse for which Synanon has been adequately punished by dismissal of its two lawsuits. Such a characterization seems disingenuous . . . ." In re Sealed Case, 754 F.2d 395, 401 (D.C. Cir. 1985). Given the plaintiff's egregious conduct as catalogued by the judge, astonishing is appropriate but the later seems is inappropriately weak. See WEASEL WORDS.

B. Seem (to be) [+ noun phrase]. In formal writing it is best to include the infinitive to be. E.g., "There certainly seemed no enlightening purpose [read seemed to be no enlightening purpose] served by giving some slick operator from the K.K.K. a nationwide forum on which to spread his rancid twaddle."

see you in court. This phrase is a CLICHÉ to which litigious people are drawn. E.g., "To me . . . [the English system of 'loser pays'] discourages frivolous lawsuits and the knee-jerk business reaction of 'see you in court.'" Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 207 (1984; repr. 1988).

segment, v.t.; segment(al)ize. The latter forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Cf. sectionalize. See -IZE.

segregate for separate is often a puffed-up LEGALISM. E.g., "He then segregated [read separated] the few jewels that he wished to purchase from the rest of the lot." See separate.

segregate out. See out.

segregation, de facto; de jure segregation. These phrases denote two types of racial segregation. De facto segregation exists in fact but is not required by law. De jure segration, on the other hand, is required by law, as under the long-defunct rule of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896). (See separate but equal.) De jure segregation is the more invidious type. See de facto (A).

segregative = having the power or property of separating. In American legal writing, the term is used almost exclusively of racial segregation. E.g., "Confronted with segregative assignment of faculty and administrators, segregative bus transportation of students and other segregative post-Brown decisions of the Ector County I.S.D., the district court held that the Ector County School District not only continued to fail to meet its duty to dismantle its dual school system, but actually increased the segregation in its schools." See separate.

seignor(i)al; seigneurial. In referring to a feudal lord (a seignor) in early England, seignorial is the predominant adjective in texts dealing with English legal history. Seigneurial refers to a feudal lord in France, or to a member of the landed gentry in Canada.

seignory (= [1] feudal lordship; or [2] the relation of a lord to the tenants of a manor) is the usual spelling, seigniory being a secondary variant.

seise; seize. The two identically pronounced words are related, but they have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. In the legal sense "to put in possession, invest with the fee simple of," the spelling seise is preferred in both AmE and BrE—e.g.: "Each feoffee (recipient of a fief), having received the seisin from his feoffor, would be said to be seised, or possessed of an interest in the land." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 11 (2d ed. 1984). See disseise.

Seize is principally a nontechnical lay word meaning: (1) "to take hold of (a thing or person) forcibly or suddenly or eagerly"; (2) "to take possession of (a thing) by legal right" <to seize contraband>; or (3) "to have a sudden overwhelming effect on" <to be seized by fear> (OAD). Seize should be confined to these senses. Thus, in the following examples, seise would have been the better spelling:

- "In 1814 the New York courts decided that the mortgagor was seized [read seised] of the freehold . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 124–25 (1930).
- "Neither of them could have died intestate seized [read seised] and possessed of the property."
- "This is a suit to enjoin the sale of real estate at sheriff's sale under an execution issued on a judgment against an heir of an intestate who died seized [read seised] of the land, although the heir had filed a renunciation of all interest in the estate."

The spelling seize would make sense if the noun were predominantly spelled seizin; but it is not. See seisin.

Seize is not infrequently used in the lay sense (1) in legal writing, a fact that provides still greater impetus for strict differentiation between the spellings: "Equity seizes the property on its way from the donor to the appointee, and applies it to the satisfaction of the obligations of the appointor."

seised in law; seised in deed. At common law, when the person with seisin (q.v.) dies, the heir is said to be seised in law—and the heir is seised in deed only upon entering the land. Thus, during the interval, the heir has some—though by no means all—of the advantages of seisin.

seisin /see-zən/. A. Sense. This feudal word originally meant "possession," then grew into a TERM OF ART in 18th- and 19th-century land law, much of which is now defunct. The term seisin has persisted, however, the spoor of a complicated history. Today it generally denotes "possession of a freehold estate in land" and connotes peace and quiet. But the word is impossible to define in a way that adequately evokes its historical importance in English law while serving to guide modern lawyers, who speak of ownership as depending upon title (without any reference to physically entering the land). As the leading English textbook states, "Seisin is no longer of importance, for the distinctions [that] gave it its peculiar meaning no longer exist." Robert E. Megarry & H.W.R. Wade, The Law of Real Property 47 (5th ed. 1984).

The best advice is to study seisin as a historical concept and to use the word seisin in historical contexts in which the sense is well defined. If possession, ownership, or title is all that is meant by seisin, one of those other words usually serves better. In modern statutes that use seisin as a synonym of ownership, for example, the latter word is preferable. See covenant of seisin, livery of seisin, disseise & seise.

B. Alternative Spelling. The word is sometimes spelled seizin, as in RH2 (surprisingly) and in 2 B.W. Pope, Legal Definitions 1453 (1920). The -zin form was once more common than it is today, but it still appears from time to time. E.g., "If the grantor owns only part of the title, or if the grantor has only a life estate, the covenant of seizin [read seisin] is violated." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 45 (1946; repr. 1950).

C. Seisin of Personal Property. To speak of the seisin of chattels, or of a lessee's seisin, is a solecism. For centuries, seisin has been a term appropriate only to real property.

seisinee (= one to whom seisin is transferred), though omitted from the OED, W3, and other major dictionaries, has appeared in published legal writings—e.g., "The Statute was considered to have application only where a seisinee held to the use of another person and not himself." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 121 (2d ed. 1979). Seemingly a NONCE WORD—and not a very useful one, at that—it is perhaps best forgotten. See -EE.

seize. See seise.

seizin. See seisin (B).

select, adj.; selected. The former is the adjective meaning "choice; esp. excellent." Here the past-participial form of the verb (selected) is used inappropriately for the adjective: "These students are all educated young men, and—since the law school's standards are known to be high, and the work is notoriously difficult—it may reasonably be supposed that they are a selected [read select] group." (Prosser)

selectman is an Americanism dating from 1635 and meaning "one of a board of officers elected annually to manage various local concerns in a New England township." Today there is a tendency to change the word to selectperson, which is not necessarily a happy development. (See SEXISM (B).) The term selectman is a difficult one for which to find a nonsexist equivalent formed from the same root; hence one book recommends replacing it with representative. See Bobbye D. Sorrels, The Nonsexist Communicator 149 (1983). Yet some writers prefer to use selectman as if it were gender-neutral—e.g.: "Selectman Anita Davidson said last week that her telephone had been surprisingly quiet regarding the new assessments." Karen Corrente, Property Assessments Prompt Tax Questions, Derry (N.H.) News, 7 Sept. 1994, at 1, 11.

self-admitted, like self-confessed (q.v.), is a REDUNDANCY: "Rep. Gerry E. Studds, 53, and Rep. Barney Frank, 50 . . . are self-admitted [read admitted] homosexuals, but that is not automatically grounds for Congressional expulsion." Walter Scott's Personality Parade, Dallas Morning News (Parade Mag.), 22 July 1990, at 2.

self-complacent is redundant; complacent is sufficient.

self-confessed is a common REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "A court that frees a self-confessed [read confessed] murderer on a technicality would seem to bear responsibility for any harm that criminal may do in the future." Mario Pei, Words in Sheep's Clothing 86 (1969).

self-crimination. See criminate & incriminate.

self-dealing (= financial dealing that is not at arm's length; esp., borrowing from or lending to a company by a controlling individual primarily to that individual's own advantage [W10]) is an Americanism that originated in the mid-20th century. E.g., "The conferred right to exercise all these plenary powers of ownership necessarily modified or displaced the otherwise absolute limitation against self-dealing." self-defender = one who resorts to self-defense, q.v. E.g., "This testimony indicates that the victim was the only one in the position of a self-defender." Bedford v. State, 222 N.W.2d 658, 661 (Wis. 1974)./ "The negligent self-defender is arguably less culpable than the negligent rapist . . . ." Arnold H. Loewy, Culpability, Dangerousness, and Harm, 66 N.C.L. Rev. 283, 301 (1988).

self-defense = (1) the right to defend oneself with reasonable force against an attack, real or threatened; or (2) the right of a state to defend itself against an attack, real or threatened. Sense (1): "Not even self-defence [so spelled in BrE] would justify a defender in shooting the aggressor's wife in order to persuade him to desist." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 449 (1978)./ Sense (2): "Is the power of raising armies and equipping fleets necessary? . . . It is involved in the power of self-defense." The Federalist No. 41, at 256 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

self-deprec(i)ating. See deprecate.

self-executing = not requiring anything additional to make (a document) binding. E.g., "Despite his strong statement, Justice Story apparently believed that the Constitution, though mandatory, was not self-executing." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 38 (4th ed. 1983).

self-help. In lay usage, this phrase usu. represents something good (the work ethic, providing for oneself without relying on others). But in legal usage, it usu. represents something bad (redress of perceived wrongs without recourse to law)—e.g.: "Self-help is indeed but an unsatisfactory means of redress." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 323 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937)./ "Ideally, reform would come according to reason and justice without self-help and disturbing, almost violent, forms of protest." Archibald Cox, Civil Rights, the Constitution, and the Courts, 40 N.Y. State B.J. 161, 169 (1968).

Still, in the law of oil and gas, if the rule of capture applies, self-help is the only recourse available to prevent losing the rights to resources under one's land.

self-incrimination. See criminate.

self-inculpation is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of self-incrimination.

self-killing; self-murder. See suicide (A).

self-proving, not included in any of the major dictionaries, denotes a type of affidavit appended to modern wills. Self-proving affidavits are signed by the witnesses to the will, and state that the testator was under no compulsion and had a sound mind when signing the will. E.g., "A useful device for discouraging a will contest is the 'self-proving' affidavit, which is the sworn statement of the testator and witnesses about the execution ceremony." Barbara Child, Drafting Legal Documents 268 (2d ed. 1992).

self-slaughter. See suicide.

self-stultification = testifying about one's own bad morals. Hence rule against self-stultification. See stultify.

sell; sale. See hard sell.

sellable. See sal(e)able.

sell, contract to. See contract for sale.

seller. See vendor.

selvage. See salvage.

SEMANTICS. For solid treatments of general semantics as applied to law, see Glanville Williams, Language and the Law (pt. 4), 61 Law Q. Rev. 384–406 (1945); F.A. Philbrick, Language and the Law (1949); and Walter Probert, Law, Language and Communication (1972).

semble /sem-bəl/ (= it seems), a LAW FRENCH term, is used in law reports as a technical expression of uncertainty, usu. in introducing either an obiter dictum or the writer's less-than-confident interpretation of how a court's holding might be applied or extended. Today the term appears more often in BrE than in AmE—e.g.:

- "This judgment is not conclusive in an action by the owner of ship A for the damage done to ship B. (Semble, it is deemed to be irrelevant.)" (Eng.)
- "On a charge of attempting to sell meat in excess of the permitted price, it is not enough to show that the butcher had tickets in his drawer showing an excessive price; but, semble, it is sufficiently proximate if the tickets are applied to the meat." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 629 (2d ed 1961).
- "If statutory language makes no sense whatever, semble it can be treated as pro non scripto [= as not written]; but the Court cannot escape the duty of interpretation merely because the language is difficult or ambiguous." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 488 (7th ed. 1964).

semi-. See BI-.

semiannual (AmE); half-yearly (BrE). See biannual.

senatorial courtesy has traditionally had a restricted sense in AmE; it refers to the tradition that the president must take care in filling high-level federal posts, such as judgeships, with persons agreeable to the nominees' home-state senators, lest the senators defeat confirmation. E.g., "A nomination approved by them [i.e., by senators from the state in which the office lies] is practically certain of final confirmation by the Senate as a whole. The arrangement is a 'logrolling' one, which has been dignified by the name of 'Senatorial courtesy.'" Herbert W. Horwill, The Usages of the American Constitution 128–29 (1925)./ "No possible appointment could more have enraged the conservatives, in and out of the Senate, who had done the Court plan to death; but the silly rule of 'Senatorial courtesy,' whereby members of the club never question very deeply the qualifications of a fellow member named to a new post, made Black's confirmation—just as Roosevelt knew it would—almost automatic." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 252 (1955).

As popularized, however, the term refers to civility among senators. Some writers lament the "decline of senatorial courtesy" and cite either the defeat of John Tower as President Bush's nominee for secretary of defense, or the treatment of Anita send. For general purposes, this word is much preferable to transmit, q.v.

send back is occasionally used in place of remand, the more formal legal term—e.g.: "This was clearly error, and of such vital importance that the case must be reversed and sent back for a new trial." See remand (A). Cf. return back.

senior = a Queen's Counsel. See Q.C. & silk. Cf. junior.

sensitize; sensitivize. Although Fowler championed the latter, the former is now usual in AmE and BrE.

sensor. See censor.

sensory; sensatory; sensorial. Sensory = of sensation or the senses. Sensatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Sensorial = primarily responsive to sensations. For a misuse involving sensory, see sensuous (last par.).

sensuous; sensual. These words derive from the same root, meaning "appeal to the senses," but the precise meanings have undergone DIFFERENTIATION. Sensuous = of or relating to the five senses; arousing any of the five senses. The word properly has no risqué connotations, though it is gravely distorted by hack novelists. Here it is correctly used: "Words thus strung together fall on the ear like music. The appeal is sensuous rather than intellectual . . . ." W. Somerset Maugham, "Lucidity, Simplicity, Euphony," in The Summing Up 321, 322 (1938).

Sensual = relating to gratification of the senses, esp. sexual; salacious; voluptuous <sensual desires>. This is the word intended by the hack novelists who erroneously believe that sensuous carries sexy overtones—e.g.:

- "The spray painted drawings of female genitalia at issue here simply are not erotic or sensual." City of St. George v. Turner, 860 P.2d 929, 934 (Utah 1993).
- "Since the illustrations were selected by the female, feminist editors, this volume was designed to demonstrate that women and feminists may find sensual pleasure . . . in sexually explicit imagery . . . ." Nadine Strossen, A Feminist Critique of "the" Feminist Critique of Pornography, 79 Va. L. Rev. 1099, 1109 (1993).
- "The grounds for the motion were . . . [that] the facts alleged did not offer sufficient indicia of a 'wicked, lustful, unchaste, licentious or sensual design' on Mitchell's part . . . ." State v. Mitchell, 624 So. 2d 859, 859 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1993).
- "In order to satisfy her hot-blooded, passionate partner [the stereotype goes] . . . , the Latina must also be sensual and sexually responsive." Jenny Rivera, Domestic Violence Against Latinas by Latino Males, 14 B.C. Third World L.J 231, 241 (1994).

Still, some writers are oblivious of these associations. They misuse sensual for sensory—e.g.: "It would be stronger still if these witnesses could explain in detail the nature of the sensual [read sensory] perceptions on which they based their 'conclusion' that the person they had seen was the defendant and that he was responsible for the events they observed." Spinelli v. U.S., 393 U.S. 410, 429 (1969) (Black, J., dissenting).// "Its true 'converse' would seem to be 'involuntarily,' i.e., an unconscious bodily movement through convulsion, reflex or other sensual [read sensory or, perhaps, sensorial] phenomenon." Alford v. State, 866 S.W.2d 619, 625 (Tex. Crim. App. 1993) (en banc) (Clinton, J., concurring). See sensory.

sentence. In most jurisdictions, criminal sentences (as opposed to verdicts) are imposed by judges and not by juries. E.g., "The Supreme Court of Alabama agrees that 'the jury is not the sentencing authority in . . . Alabama,' and has described the sentencing judge not as a reviewer of the jury's 'sentence,' but as the sentencer." Baldwin v. Alabama, 472 U.S. 372, 384 (1985) (citations omitted). The term derives ultimately from Roman law. Cf. verdict. For the DIFFERENTIATION of concurrent, consecutive, and cumulative sentences, see concurrent sentences.

SENTENCE ADVERBS are adverbs conveying the writer's comment on the statement being made rather than adverbs qualifying a single word in the sentence. A sentence adverb does not resolve itself into the form in a —— manner, as most adverbs do. Thus, in Happily, the bill did not go beyond the committee, the introductory adverb happily conveys the writer's opinion on the message being imparted. The following words are among the most frequent sentence adverbs ending in -ly.

admittedly arguably concededly consequently curiously fortunately importantly interestingly ironically legally logically mercifully

oddly paradoxically regrettably sadly strangely
theoretically

Improvising sentence adverbs from traditional adverbs like hopefully (= in a hopeful manner) and thankfully (= in a thankful manner), qq.v., is objectionable to many stylists but seems to be on the rise. E.g., "Explanatorily [read By way of explanation], these consolidated causes were positioned as the ordinary and uncomplicated condemnation case." O'Neil Corp. v. Perry Gas Transmission, Inc., 648 S.W.2d 335, 341 (Tex. App.—Amarillo 1983). (For a similar example, see corollarily.) Newfangled sentence adverbs of this kind are to be discouraged. In formal prose, even those like hopefully and thankfully should be avoided: they are increasingly common, but they have a beleaguered history.

Because sentence adverbs reveal the writer's own thoughts and biases, lawyers often overuse them in argumentation—but danger lurks in words such as clearly, undoubtedly, and indisputably. See clearly & OVERSTATEMENT.

SENTENCE ENDINGS. It was Karl Llewellyn's understanding of rhythm and emphasis that led him to say that a "sentence must be so written that the punch word comes at the end." A Lecture on Appellate Advocacy, 29 U. Chi. L. Rev. 627, 628 (1962). He knew, as a rhetorical matter, that the end of a sentence is the position of primary emphasis.

Of course, one must first try to achieve a reasonable average SENTENCE LENGTH, or else there is likely to be no regular position of emphasis. Once the average sentence length hovers around 20 or fewer words, the artistry of stressing final words becomes possible.

But legal writers are often tone-deaf and arrhythmic, hence unemphatic—e.g.:

- "The association's attorney did everything she could under the circumstances to protect the association's interest in this matter." [A possible revision: The association's attorney did everything she could in this matter to protect the association's interest.]
- "As the Austin court observed, the gravamen of Plaintiffs' complaint is more properly directed to the legislature if they feel there is a deficiency in the statutory manner in which notice of such legislative proceedings is prescribed to be given." [A possible revision: As the Austin court observed, if the Plaintiffs believe that there is a deficiency in the statutory notice provision, then their complaint should be directed to the legislature.]
- "The application of the court's decision strongly dictates that ESCO cannot be properly sued in Nueces County under Texas Civil Practice and Remedies Code, § 15.037 for foreign corporations." [A possible revision: Under the Texas venue scheme and caselaw interpreting it, suing ESCO in Nueces County is improper.]
- "My advice to her would be that it is probably not worth the potential hassles involved in creating a two-tiered pricing system until Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 5060-1.12 is repealed or there are cases tried more adequately interpreting it." [A possible revision: I would advise her that, until article 5060-1.12 is repealed or new cases interpret it better, creating a two-tiered pricing system probably isn't worth the potential hassles.]
- "It is also the desire of Dr. Goodfellow to amicably resolve any questions or concerns that you may presently have with regard to the contract and your performance of obligations thereunder." [A possible revision: Dr. Goodfellow wants to resolve any remaining questions amicably.]

In choosing words that can bear emphasis and ending with them, writers can usually rule out ending sentences with the following: (a) dates; (b) citations; and (c) prepositional phrases.

SENTENCE FRAGMENTS. See INCOMPLETE SENTENCES.

SENTENCE LENGTH. Among the more supportable indictments of legal writing in general is that it reads too slowly. It is plodding. It wastes time.

Among the cures is to reduce the average sentence length in a given piece of writing. Whereas long sentences slow the reader down and create a solemn, portentous impression, short sentences speed the reading and the thought. It is therefore "a counsel of perfection never to write a sentence without asking 'Might it not be better shorter?'" F.L. Lucas, Style 103 (1962).

Many things converge to create overlong sentences in legal writing. One is OVERPARTICULARIZATION—the wretched habit of trying to say too many things at once, with too much detail and too little sense of relevance. Another is the fear of qualifying a proposition in a separate sentence, as if an entire idea and all its qualifications had to be fitted into a single sentence. A third is the ill-founded fear of being simple and, by implication, simple-minded—of perhaps seeming to be insufficiently sophisticated. Yet a fourth is the nonsense-baggage that so many writers lug around on their backs: the idea that it is poor grammar to begin a sentence with and or but. See and (A), but (A) & SUPERSTITIONS (D).

Of course, many lawyers suffer from these turns of mind. And those who do have much hard work ahead if they wish to pursue a readable or even a clear style. It is not just their sentence length that will suffer. Overlong sentences are merely symptomatic of other problems—chiefly clutter and VERBOSITY

What should the goal be? Experts in readability commonly say that, in technical writing, you want an average sentence length of 20 words or fewer. Some sentences ought to be 40 or 50 words, and some ought to be 3 or 4. There needs to be variety, but the average should be 20 or below. The writer who achieves this goal will generally achieve greater speed, clarity, and impact than the writer with longer sentences.

Of course, E.B. White and others have written much longer sentences that were perfectly readable. But they were typically writing in a different genre—fiction—and they typically had far greater skill in constructing sentences than most legal writers. Exceptions such as White do not disprove the point that legal writers ought to strive for an average sentence length of fewer than 20 words.

Is that goal realistic? Many good writers meet it, even when discussing difficult subjects. Consider how Buckland—with an average sentence length of 13 words—here sums up part of John Austin's philosophy:

> Austin's propositions come to this. There is in every community (but he does not really look beyond our community) a person or body [that] can enact what it will and is under no superior in this matter. That person or body he calls the Sovereign. The general rules [that] the Sovereign lays down are the law. This, at first sight, looks like circular reasoning. Law is law since it is made by the Sovereign. The Sovereign is Sovereign because he makes the law. But this is not circular reasoning; it is not reasoning at all. It is definition. Sovereign and law have much the same relation as centre and circumference. Neither term means anything without the other. In general what Austin says is true for us to-day, though some hold that it might be better to substitute 'enforced' for 'commanded.' Austin is diffuse and repetitive and there is here and there, or seems to be, a certain, not very important, confusion of thought. But, with the limitation that it is not universally true, there is not much to quarrel with in Austin's doctrine. [Total words: 184; avg words per sentence: 13.]

> W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 48 (1945).

The style is bold, confident, and quick. More legal writers ought to attempt such a style.

Instead, though, legal readers are too often fed lumpy, indigestible portions of words. Following are some examples, followed by possible revisions:

- "Though a clear case of continuing trespass exists for which the only relief at law, if ejectment should be impracticable, would be successive suits for damages, and therefore equity would intervene normally to prevent a multiplicity of suits, nevertheless equitable relief compelling the removal of the encroachment is denied because of the disproportionate loss to the defendant which would result." [Total words: 60; avg. words per sentence: 60.] [A possible revision: A clear case of continuing trespass exists for which the only relief at law—if ejectment is impracticable—would be successive suits for damages. Normally, therefore, equity would intervene to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Still, equitable relief compelling the removal of the encroachment is denied because it would result in a disproportionate loss to the defendant. [Total words: 57; avg. words per sentence: 19.]
- "Rules of morality are necessarily unstable and nearly always lacking in precision, changing from age to age, since they reflect mankind's emotional reaction to external conditions, and it should not be expected that the legal decisions and writings which have survived from those periods when a transgression of the current code of ethics was a requisite in criminal guilt can yield any precise definitions and distinctions, especially since the more ancient rule of strict accountability had not then, and indeed has not even now, entirely lost its force." J.W. Cecil Turner, Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law 21 (1952). [Total words: 88; avg. words per sentence: 88.] [A possible revision: *Rules of morality are necessarily unstable and nearly always lacking in precision. And we should not expect to yield any precise definitions and distinctions from legal decisions and writings that have survived from those periods when a transgression of the current code of ethics was a requisite in criminal guilt. - "In modern codifications, beginning with those of Germany and Switzerland, dating from the turn of the century, to those recent codes and separate. In the legal phrase to separate the jury, the verb separate means "to segregate." The OED suggests that this use of the word is "chiefly in Biblical language" and does not mention the legal use. See BIBLICAL AFFECTATION & segregate.

separate and apart; separate and distinct. Both phrases are common redundancies—e.g.: "[O]il and gas are subject to sale separate and apart from [read separate from or apart from] the surface of the earth." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 4 (1946; repr. 1950)./ "In all countries where constitutional law is a separate and distinct [read separate] body of jurisprudence its prescriptions take precedence over all statutory enactments in case of a conflict between the two." James W. Garner, "Law, Constitutional," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 96, 101 (1953). See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

separate but equal = the now-defunct legal doctrine that blacks could be segregated if granted "equal" opportunities and facilities in education, public transportation, and jobs. Deriving from the infamous decision in Plessy v. Ferguson, the term was originally phrased in reverse fashion: equal but separate. See 163 U.S. 537, 540 (1896). Notably, if the idea is phrased equal but separate, the idea of separateness receives emphasis, whereas separate but equal stresses the (supposed) equality. It is quite conceivable that the phrasing separate but equal gained easier acceptance in the popular mind of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. (For the rhetorical rationale for this speculation, see SENTENCE ENDINGS.) The famous civil-rights decisions of the 1950s and 1960s—beginning with Brown v. Board of Educ., 347 U.S. 483 (1954)—ended the de jure segregation that the separate-but-equal doctrine represented.

As in the previous sentence, when the words are used as a phrasal adjective, they should be hyphenated: "[I]n cases urging admission of Negroes to a white Texas law school, a white Oklahoma graduate course, and the white section of Southern dining-cars, the main plea was that the entire separate-but-equal doctrine be discarded . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 323 (1955).

separate out. See out (A). separate property = property that a married person owns in his or her own right during marriage. In AmE, the precise meaning of this term varies. In so-called common-law states, this term is contrasted with marital property; in community-property states, it is contrasted with community property. See community property.

separation = (1) an arrangement whereby a married couple stops living together while remaining married, either by mutual consent or by a judicial decree (often called legal separation or judicial separation); or (2) the status of a husband and wife having begun such an arrangement, or the judgment or contract that brings it about. Because the word separation may refer to arrangements involving various degrees of legal formality, on its own it is unclear.

separation of powers. The phrase is usu. associated with the U.S. Constitution's demarcation of powers in the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government. But the idea is much older. John Locke wrote about the separation of legislative and executive powers in his Two Treatises of Government (1690). The phrase itself is at least a generation older than the Constitution. In his Spirit of the Laws (1748; translated into English in 1750), Montesquieu refined the idea that the virtue of the English constitution was a system of checks and balances among executive, legislature, and judiciary—a separation of powers.

When used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, the words need hyphens: "On all the great separation-of-powers questions of our time—executive privilege, legislative vetoes, presidential appointment and impoundment power, and so on—the OLC has provided legal and constitutional guidance for the executive." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 52 (1988).

sepulcher; sepulchre; sepulture. The preferred spelling of the first term is sepulcher in AmE, -re in BrE. The word means "burial place; tomb," and is pronounced /sep-əl-kər/. Sepulture, sometimes a NEEDLESS VARIANT of sepulcher, justifies its separate form in the sense "burial." These words are very formal, even literary. They should be used cautiously.

sequential; sequacious. Sequential means "forming a sequence or consequence." Sequacious means "intellectually servile."

sequential order is often a REDUNDANCY. E.g., "The computer placed the checks in sequential order [read in order or in sequence] by account number."

sequester, n., = (1) in legislative parlance, an across-the-board cut in domestic spending; or (2) a person with whom litigants deposit the property being contested until the case has concluded. Sense (1)—"Darman ordered an across-the-board cut in domestic spending—called a sequester—of $2.3 million . . . ." Stuart Auerbach, Bill Gives Rostenkowski a Way to Settle Accounts, Wash. Post, 9 Oct. 1991, at F1.

In sense (2), the word is really a NEEDLESS VARIANT of sequestrator, q.v.—e.g.: "[It] concerned a former husband's suit against a receiver and sequester [read sequestrator] appointed by a state court to consolidate all the former husband's property available for fulfilling support obligations . . . ." Firestone v. Cleveland Trust Co., 654 F.2d 1212, 1216 (6th Cir. 1981).

sequester, v.t.; sequestrate. Generally, sequestrate means nothing that sequester, the more common term, does not also mean. Both terms are old: sequester dates from the 14th century, sequestrate from the early 16th century. In law, sequester = to remove (as property) from the possession of the owner temporarily; to seize and hold the effects of a debtor until the claims of creditors are satisfied (OED). The lay meaning of the term, of course, is "to set aside, separate," as to sequester (or separate) the jury. See separate.

Sequestrate is given two slightly different senses by the OED, in addition to the overlapping senses: (1) "to divert the income of an estate or benefice, temporarily or permanently, from its owner into other hands"; and (2) (in Scots law) "to place . . . lands belonging to a bankrupt, or [those] of disputed ownership, . . . in the hands of a judicial trustee, for the prevention of waste." These two senses are rare, however, and—except in Scotland—it is best to avoid sequestrate as a NEEDLESS VARIANT unless a nuance conveyed by one of these specialized senses is intended.

The sole weakness of this advice is that the agent noun is sequestrator and not, ordinarily, sequesterer. See sequestrator.

In the following examples, no such nuance was intended, and sequester would have been the better word: "[I]t is difficult to see why a plaintiff in any action for a personal judgment in tort or contract may not . . . apply to the chancellor for a so-called injunction sequestrating [read sequestering] his opponent's assets pending recovery and satisfaction of a judgment in such a law action." De Beers Consol. Mines v. U.S., 325 U.S. 212, 222–23 (1945)./ "The practice of sequestrating [read sequestering] the property of the defendant to coerce his obedience to the decree was soon developed."

sequestration; attachment; garnishment. In the context of civil remedies, these terms are closely related. Sequestration = the removal, by judicial authority, of real or personal property from its possessor, usu. to preserve it until a court has determined who has a right to it. Attachment = the prejudgment seizure of property and placement of it under the court's control as security to satisfy a judgment that the plaintiff may recover. (Attachment may also refer to the arrest of a person: see attachment.) Garnishment = a judicial proceeding in which a judgment creditor, or a suitor who may become a judgment creditor, serves notice on a third party who may be indebted to, or on a bailee for, the judgment debtor, that any of the debtor's property held by the person served must be turned over to the judgment creditor.

Garnishment differs from the other two terms in two important ways: it refers to a judicial proceeding—not to a seizure or removal—and the property stays in the third party's hands until judgment is pronounced.

sequestrator; sequesterer. Though not as logically formed as its alternative, sequestrator is the standard term meaning "one who sequesters property." E.g., "[C]ompelling the personal appearance of a nonresident defendant . . . is accomplished by the appointment of a sequestrator to seize and hold the property of the nonresident located in Delaware . . . ." Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186, 186–87 (1977). Sometimes, however, sequestrator means not the person who seizes, but the party at whose instance the sequestration occurs. Cf. sequester, n.

Serbonian bog. See LITERARY ALLUSION (A)(4).

serendipity forms the adjective serendipitous, a useful term of recent vintage (ca. 1943).

sergeant; serjeant. In medieval times this word (ultimately deriving fr. L. servient "serving") came to mean someone performing a specific function in the household or jurisdiction of a king, lord, or deliberative assembly and reporting directly to the top authority under which that person served. From the 14th century until 1875, serjeants-at-law were appointed as a superior order of advocates. They wore silk gowns and coifs and (until 1846) had an exclusive right of audience in the Court of Common Pleas. See silk & Order of the Coif.

Of the more than 50 variant spellings of the term over the centuries, the preferred spelling in AmE today is sergeant. In BrE, there is some DIFFERENTIATION between the spelling: sergeant is largely military (sergeant-major) and serjeant largely legal (serjeant of the coif, serjeant-at-law, serjeant-at-arms).

Sargeant is a common misspelling stemming perhaps from the military casualism sarge.

SERIAL COMMA. See PUNCTUATION (C).

seriatim = in turn; serially; one after another; in sequence; successively. Though common in references to seriatim opinions, this LATINISM in other contexts is generally best replaced with either of its anglicized siblings, serially and in series, or of one of the phrases used just above in defining the term. E.g., "After presenting the factual and procedural setting, we dispose of the issues seriatim [read serially]."/ "One court refused to sever the civil-rights claims or to dismiss the state law ones, electing to submit all claims serially to the same jury."

series may be either singular or plural, although the plural is mandatory when more than one series is intended. Here the verb is a plural noun of multitude: "There have been a series of efforts made by the central P.L.O. but also splinter groups to move through Jordan into the West Bank." See SYNESIS.

Boswell quoted Samuel Johnson as using the now-obsolete plural serieses in a legal context: "Entails are good, because it is good to preserve in a country, serieses of men, to whom the people are accustomed to look up as their leaders." 2 James Boswell, Life of Johnson 428 (1791).

serjeant. See sergeant.

serjeanty (or sergeanty) is the term for a form of feudal tenure under which a specified personal service was rendered to the king.

The spelling sergeantry is obsolete. See sergeant.

serve (= to make legal delivery of [a process or a writ] in a legally required manner) as a legal term dates back to the 15th century. In the legal idiom, one who serves process may either serve a writ on or upon another, or serve another with a writ. See OBJECT-SHUFFLING.

service was once only a noun, but since the late 19th century it has been used as a transitive verb as well. It may mean "to provide service for" <the mechanic serviced the copying machine>, "to pay interest on" <to service a debt>, or generally "to perform services for" <servicing corporate clients>. Ordinarily, the verb to serve ought to be used in broad senses; service, v.t., should be used only where the writer believes that serve would not be suitable in idiom or sense.

service(-)mark = a name, phrase, or other device intended to identify the services of a certain supplier. This term is increasingly made one word—e.g.: "[T]rade names, trademarks, and servicemarks are often referred to interchangeably . . . ." Frances Denney, Inc. v. New Process Co., 670 F. Supp. 661, 667 (W.D. Va. 1985). It is odd that the writer did not make tradename (q.v.) one word in that quotation. See trade(-)mark.

service of process. See process.

servient. See dominant.

servitude. A. And *easement. Servitude is primarily a civil-law term, deriving from L. servitus (= subjection), and equivalent to the term easement in common law. But even in the common law, servitude has a restricted currency in referring to a servient tenement (i.e., land subject to an easement), and meaning "a charge on an estate for the use of another estate belonging to another owner." The DIFFERENTIATION usu. observed in common-law countries is that easement refers to the personal enjoyment of the burdened property, and servitude either to the burden or to the burdened property itself.

International lawyers use servitude in an extended sense: "an international agreement giving a territory some permanent status, such as a demilitarized or neutralized status, or creating rights over bodies of water."

B. And slavery. "The word servitude is of larger meaning than slavery, as the latter is popularly understood in this country, and the obvious purpose [of the Thirteenth Amendment] was to forbid all shades and conditions of African slavery." Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36, 69 (1872). Both terms, in addition to denoting "the condition of being a slave or serf, or of being the property of another person," carry the notion of subjection to excessive labor.

session = (1) the time during which a court or other body meets <court is in session>; or (2) a term of court—that is, a period that constitutes termtime (q.v.) <the October session of the Supreme Court>.

By historical extension, session came to signify certain courts, the most famous and longest lasting being the Court of Session, the supreme civil court of Scotland, established in 1532 and still in session today. See cession.

sessional; sessionary. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the adjective corresponding to the noun session.

session laws = the statutes enacted by a legislative body and published in a form identifying them with the term in which the legislative session took place <Session Laws of 1994>. E.g., "[W]e can scarcely credit, as we know state legislation today, what the session laws of an older time disclose . . . ." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 53 (1938).

set aside. A. In Legal Jargon. This phrase, meaning "to vacate," is sometimes misunderstood by nonlawyers. One lay writer on legal language misinterpreted the phrase as possibly meaning "to lay to the side temporarily, as for review" (as "to take under advisement"). See Terri LeClercq, Jargon 2: Just When You Thought It Was Safe . . ., 48 Tex. B.J. 852, 852 (1985) ("So if you are describing the action of a court, you might qualify how the court set aside the ruling by adding, for example, that the court set aside the ruling for review.").

Such are the linguistic traps that lawyers have needlessly laid for those unfamiliar with legal jargon, in which this quite ordinary English phrase is given the extraordinary meaning "to annul, to make void." Migdol v. U.S., 298 F.2d 513, 516 (9th Cir. 1961). E.g., "[Nullity] can be used, and most commonly is, to describe a marriage that exists until either party obtains a decree of the court setting it aside, e.g. on the ground of impotence . . . ." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 67 (1968). See overrule.

B. Set aside and vacate. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS setback. To a nonlawyer, of course, this term means "an unexpected interruption of progress." To real-estate lawyers, however, it refers to the amount of space required between a lot line and the building line to ensure that enough light and ventilation reach the ground. In land law, ironically, increased setbacks represent human progress.

set-off, n., = (1) a counterdemand, generally of a liquidated debt growing out of an independent transaction for which a lawsuit might be maintained; or (2) the general right of a debtor to reduce the amount of a debt by any sum that the creditor owes the debtor. It is older than the term offset and is considered more correct by purists. E.g., "That payment had been made only in respect of the plaintiff's claim and not in respect of the claim less the equitable set-off." (Aus.) The OCL includes set-off, which is usual in BrE, but not offset. See offset.

As a verb, the hyphen is unnecessary: "On the other hand, a subsequent agreement between the parties to set-off [read set off] a claim of the buyer in satisfaction of part of the purchase price may satisfy the statute . . . ." E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 236 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950).

set of facts is more elegant, dignified, and descriptive than either factual situation or fact situation. See fact situation.

set over = to transfer, convey. E.g., "Vendor does by these presents grant, bargain, sell, assign, convey, transfer, set over, and deliver to the purchaser the following described property."

SET PHRASES. Fossilized language should not be consciously defossilized—which is to say that one should not try to vary what has been set in stone. Thus set in stone should never become set in shale, or whatever variation one might lamely invent. Nor, to cite another example, should one change madding crowd to maddening crowd. See madding crowd.

Set phrases are sometimes changed out of a sense of cleverness, sometimes out of ignorance. Thus, the lawyer who writes, "Time is the essence of this subcontract," simply betrays an ignorance of the idiom Time is of the essence (of this subcontract).

Many expressions are so well entrenched in the English language that the slightest change will make them un-English. For example, we have the phrase out from under, ruined by a metamorphosis in this sentence: "[Plaintiff] was injured when the back of the teller stool on which she was sitting fell off and the chair rolled out from underneath her [read out from under her]." Syrie v. Knoll Int'l, 748 F.2d 304, 305 (5th Cir. 1984).

Wilson Follett called set phrases "inviolable" (if not quite inviolate): "the attempt to liven up old clichés by inserting modifiers into the set phrase is a mistake: the distended phrase is neither original, nor unobtrusive, nor brief, and sometimes it has ceased to be immediately clear, as in They have been reticent to a tactical fault." Modern American Usage 303 (1966).

In addition to the fault of inserting modifiers into set phrases, three other faults commonly occur. First, it is wrong to wrench a set phrase into ungrammatical contexts, as here: "This was reported to we the people." The phrase we the people, of course, derives from the U.S. Constitution; but the sentence calls for the objective us.

Second, it is bad style to substitute an alien word for the familiar one in a well-known phrase. For example, changing in large part or in large measure to in large degree simply does not work: "The prejudice to appellant is attributable in large degree [read in large part] to appellant's own conduct."

Third, it is poor to aim at novelty by reversing the usual order of a phrase: "Many persons must rely upon Medicaid for their well-being and health." (The standard phrase is health and well-being.) Cf. INELEGANT VARIATION.

settle. Ordinarily, litigants who compromise in order to end the litigation are said to settle the lawsuit. By extension in AmE, a judge who pressures the parties to compromise is likewise said to settle the lawsuit—e.g.: "Frustrated by a huge backlog of asbestos liability cases, a federal judge and a New York state judge have combined forces to try to settle hundreds of the lawsuits." Wade Lambert & Jill Abramson, Judges Join Forces on Asbestos Litigation, Wall St. J., 31 Jan. 1990, at B2.

settlement sheet. See closing statement.

settler; settlor. The two forms usually convey different senses. Settler = (1) one who settles; or (2) a homesteader. Settlor = the creator of a trust; a party to an instrument. Settlor has also been used—confusingly—in reference to one who settles a case: "The settlors [read settlers] have agreed between themselves that the worker shall retain the face value of the settlement and that the third party shall be responsible for satisfaction of the compensation lien."

settlor; trustor; donor; creator. These four terms are used to name the person who establishes a trust. The first is the most common. It should be spelled with the -or suffix to differentiate it from the quite different word settler, q.v. Of these four forms, trustor is the least usual and most awkward, although trustee is the common name for the holder of the property in trust. See creator & donor.

set up = to raise (as a defense). Both civil and criminal defendants are traditionally said to set up defenses—e.g.:

- "[T]he dishonest contractor [could not] set up his original dishonest intent as an excuse for non-performance . . . ." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 262 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937).

- "Suppose that D breaks and enters a house, and on a charge of burglary sets up the defence of insanity." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 523 (2d ed. 1961).
- "[T]he promisee can set up such a promise as a defence to an action but cannot himself sue upon it." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 126 (3d ed. 1981).

severability clause = a contractual or statutory provision—usu. boilerplate—preventing the complete loss of the contract or statute if a court were to hold a single provision invalid. Typically, a severability clause states, "If any part of this agreement is for any reason found to be unenforceable, all other parts nevertheless remain enforceable." A variant name for this provision is saving clause. See saving(s) clause (B).

several for separate, an archaic remnant of Middle English, has survived only in legal language. The usage survives primarily in the phrase joint and several liability, but thrives in other contexts as well: "The share of each tenant in common is, unlike that of a joint tenant, several and distinct from the shares of his cotenants."/ "The constitutional rule requiring bills to be read on three several days in each house is hereby suspended."/ "The dispute does not cease to be a priori because it is a matter of the cumulative effect of severally inconclusive premises." (Eng.) See joint and several.

severalty = the condition of being separate or distinct. The legal phrase in severalty is used in law in reference to land, and means "held by an individual absolutely, not jointly or in common with another." E.g., "The whole transaction required the cooperation of all for its success; the division of the shares among them was as much a part of it as any other; they selected each other as owners in severalty; and they should be held liable for any defaults of those whom they chose, although their liability is secondary."/ "Suppose that Twose had thought that the common was land belonging to her in severalty." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 309 (2d ed. 1961).

severance pay. This AmE phrase, dating from 1940–45, denotes money (apart from backpay and wages) paid to an employee who is dismissed, often for reasons outside the employer's control. E.g., "In a more complex form, a termination clause might combine several of these possibilities, and it might add such considerations as acts of third parties, or further conditions, or some kind of 'severance pay.'" David Crump, The Five Elements of a Contract, 43 Tex. B.J. 370, 371 (1980). The BrE equivalent is redundancy pay.

sewage; sewerage. Sewage is the refuse conveyed through sewers; sewerage refers either to the removal of sewage or to the system of removal.

sex, adj.; sexual. Both sex discrimination and sexual discrimination appear in law reports. The former is perhaps better, inasmuch as sexual has come to refer more to sexual intercourse and things pertaining to it than to questions of maleness or femaleness. See gender.

SEXISM. Many who at first shrugged off feminists' claims that the English language can be detrimentally sexist have come to acknowledge that many of the contentions are undeniably valid. And with that acknowledgment come certain responsibilities—and difficulties—for the writer concerned with maintaining credibility.

How does one deal with linguistic forms that have traditionally been sexist? The best course today is to eliminate sexist language while not resorting to ugly or awkward linguistic artifices. The purpose, of course, is to avoid distracting any variety of readers, from traditional grammarians to feminists.

A. The Pronoun Problem. English has a number of common-sex general words, such as person, anyone, everyone, and no one, but it has no common-sex singular personal pronouns. Instead, we have he, she, and it, the first denoting a male; the second denoting a female; and the third denoting a nonhuman object or being (though occasionally a baby). In general literary and legal usage, the traditional approach has been to use the masculine pronouns he and him to cover all persons, male and female alike. That this practice has come under increasing attack has caused the single most difficult problem in the realm of sexist language. Other snarls are far more readily solvable.

The inadequacy of the English language in this respect becomes apparent when one reads, for example, the words from an appellate brief excerpted in an opinion addressing medical malpractice in the performance of a hysterectomy: "The objective of the doctrine [of informed consent], the plaintiff asserts, 'is to insure the patient's right to self-determination by requiring that he have access to all [the] knowledge necessary for him to give an intelligent and informed consent . . . .'" Bly v. Rhoads, 222 S.E.2d 783, 785 (Va. 1976).

Actually, the generic masculine pronoun also sits uneasily in a sentence containing a female to which it is meant to refer—e.g.:

- "When a person, whether male or female, dies without leaving a will, he is called an 'intestate.'" Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 4 (2d ed. 1953).
- "Anyone, including a married woman, who has attained the age of twenty-one, has sufficient sense to know what he is doing, and is not under the influence of terror or fraud, can make a valid will." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 299 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).
- "That is not to say that the accessory will necessarily be punished as severely as the principal. Yet sometimes he may be the guiltier, as Lady Macbeth was. The master mind and guiding spirit of a crime ring will probably receive a heavier sentence than his tools." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 404 (2d ed. 1961).
- "If a testator fails to provide by will for his surviving spouse [a she?] who married the testator after the execution of the will, the omitted spouse shall receive the same share of the estate he [i.e., the spouse] would have received if the decedent left no will . . . ." Unif. Probate Code § 2-301(a) (1989).

Even when the context does not make the masculine pronoun somewhat ludicrous, one may feel bludgeoned by its use at every turn—e.g.: "[I]n the acquisition of background information a judge should be left to his own devices. If he is left to himself to find his own sources of background information where he thinks he needs it and if in the acquisition of it he behaves in a discreet way, he will not be criticized." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 52 (1979).

"There are," Fowler notes, with contributions from Gowers, > three makeshifts: first, as anybody can see for himself or herself; second, as anybody can see for themselves; and third, as anybody can see for himself. No one who can help it chooses the first, it is correct, and is sometimes necessary, but it is so clumsy as to be ridiculous except when explicitness is urgent, and it usually sounds like a bit of pedantic humour. The second is the popular solution; it sets the literary man's teeth on edge, and he exerts himself to give the same meaning in some entirely different way if he is not prepared to risk the third, which is here recommended. It involves the convention (statutory in the interpretation of documents) that where the matter of sex is not conspicuous or important the masculine form shall be allowed to represent a person instead of a man, or say a man (homo) instead of a man (vir).

> MEU2 404 (1965).

At least two other makeshifts are now available. The first is commonly used by American academics: as anybody can see for herself. Such phrases are often alternated with those containing masculine pronouns, or, in some writing, appear uniformly. Whether this phraseology will cease to sound strange to most readers only time will tell. This is one possibility, however, of (1) maintaining a grammatical construction; and (2) avoiding the awkwardness of alternatives such as himself or herself.

But the method carries two risks. First, unintended connotations may invade the writing. A recent novel was published in two versions, one using generic masculine pronouns and the other using generic feminine pronouns; the effects on readers of the two versions were reported to have been startlingly different in ways far too complex for discussion here. Second, this makeshift is likely to do a disservice to women in the long run, for it would likely be adopted only by a small minority of writers: the rest would continue with the generic masculine pronoun.

A second new makeshift has entered Canadian legislation: as anybody can see for themself; if a judge decides to recuse themself. The word themself, q.v., fills the need for a gender-neutral reflexive pronoun, but many readers and writers—especially Americans—bristle at the sight or the sound of it. Thus, for the legal writer, this makeshift carries a considerable risk of distracting readers.

Typographical gimmickry may once have served a political purpose, but it should be avoided as an answer to the problem. It is trendy, ugly, distracting, and usually unpronounceable. E.g., "A district judge who, on reflection, concludes that s/he erred may rectify that error when ruling on post-trial motions." U.S. v. Miller, 753 F.2d 19, 23 (3d Cir. 1985)./ "S/he is required to hold an appropriate qualification specified in the Companies Act and s/he must be appointed to hold office . . . ." S.B. Marsh & J.B. Bailey, Terminology of Business and Company Law 9 (1987).

Variants are he/she and she/he, and even the gloriously misbegotten double-entendre, s/he/it. If we must have alternatives, he or she is the furthest we should go. See he or she.

For the persuasive writer—for whom credibility is all—the writer's point of view does not matter as much as the reader's. Thus, if one is writing for an unknown or a broad readership, the only course that does not risk damaging one's credibility is to write around the problem. For this purpose, every writer ought to have available a repertoire of methods to avoid the generic masculine pronoun. No single method is sufficient. Thus, in a given context, one might consider doing any of the following:

- Delete the pronoun reference altogether. E.g., "The judge should read the briefs as soon as they are submitted to him [delete to him] by the parties."

- Change the pronoun to an article, such as a or the. "A judgment-creditor may use legal means to enforce his [read a] judgment."
- Pluralize, so that he becomes they. E.g., "A judge should meet his responsibility to avoid even the appearance of impropriety." [Read Judges should meet their responsibility . . . , or reword: A judge should avoid . . . .]
- Use the relative pronoun who, especially when the generic he follows an if. E.g., "If a student cannot write competently, he cannot be expected to understand complex legal problems." [Read A student who cannot write competently cannot be expected to understand complex legal problems.]
- Repeat the noun instead of using a pronoun, especially when the two are separated by several words. E.g., "When considering a motion to remand, the judge should evaluate the suitability of the alternative forum. In particular, he [read the judge] . . . ."

For a sensible discussion of the generic masculine pronoun, see Beverly Ray Burlingame, Reaction and Distraction: The Pronoun Problem in Legal Persuasion, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 87 (1990).

Though the masculine singular personal pronoun may survive awhile longer as a generic term, it will probably be displaced ultimately by they, which is coming to be used alternatively as singular or plural. (See CONCORD (B).) This usage is becoming commonplace—e.g.:

- "Anyone who has subscribed to the Literary Review for more than one year may join, as long as they are proposed by a writer known to the committee." K. Saunders, Literati, Glitterati, Choose Your Party, Sunday Times, 10 Sept. 1989, at F1.
- "It is assumed that, if someone is put under enough pressure, they will tell the truth, or the truth will emerge despite the teller." Robin T. Lakoff, Talking Power: The Politics of Language in Our Lives 90 (1990).
- "How the Elizabethans reacted is, alas, unknown, since nobody thought Shakespeare's plays important enough to bother recording their impressions." John Carey, Stages of Hatred, Sunday Times (Books), 4 Oct. 1992, at § 6, p. 8.
- "Anyone planning a dissertation on Hollywood's fling with yuppie demonology will want to include 'The Temp' in their calculations." Janet Maslin, A Perfect Secretary, Temporarily, N.Y. Times, 13 Feb. 1993, at 8.

Speakers of AmE resist this development more than speakers of BrE, in which the indeterminate they is already more or less standard. That it sets many literate Americans' teeth on edge is an unfortunate setback to what promises to be the ultimate solution to the problem. For a similar etymological progression, see none.

B. Words in man- and -man. "For the lawyer more than for most men, it is true that he who knows but cannot express what he knows might as well be ignorant." That sentence opens chapter 1 of Henry Weihofen's Legal Writing Style (2d ed. 1980)—a sentence that, ironically, is flanked by warnings against sexist language (pp. vii, 19–20). If Weihofen were writing today, no doubt he would express himself in neutral language.

Throughout the English-speaking world, writers' awareness of sexism seems to have been heightened most markedly during the 1980s. In September 1984, the Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department in Canberra, Australia, issued a press release entitled "Moves to Modify Language Sex Bias in Legislation." The release states that "[t]he Government accepts that drafting in 'masculine' language may contribute to some extent to the perpetuation of a society in which men and women see women as lesser beings." The press release recommends, "[w]here possible and appropriate, avoidance of the use of words ending in man, such as chairman, serviceman, seaman, and so on." See Note, The De-Masculinisation of Language in Federal Legislation, 58 Aus. L.J. 685, 685–86 (1984).

Three years later, the U.S. Supreme Court announced its adoption of changes in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to weed out gender-specific references; thus Rule 4(b) was changed so that him and his became the defendant and the defendant's. See 55 U.S.L.W. 1138, 4265–90 (March 10, 1987).

The process is at work elsewhere. The Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, 33 U.S.C. § 901 (1927), was amended by the Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act (1984).

Similarly, American courts have begun to write opinions in more neutral language, sometimes obtrusively neutral—e.g.:

- "The affreightment contracts are commercial undertakings entered into by sophisticated businesspersons [read business people]."
- "This diversity case involves a breach of a personal service contract between Gaylord, the owner of a New Orleans television station, and Lynn Gansar, one of Gaylord's former news anchorpersons [read a former news anchor for Gaylord]." Gaylord Broadcasting Co. v. Cosmos Broadcasting, Inc., 746 F.2d 251, 252 (5th Cir. 1984).
- "Edison argues that the district court should > have construed the 'doubtful' language of the escalation clause against the appellee, as the draftperson [read drafter]." RCI Northeast Servs. Division v. Boston Edison Co., 822 F.2d 199, 203 n.3 (1st Cir. 1987).

Some of the extremes to which the trend has been taken seem absurd—e.g.: "This case presents another example of the waste of time, energy, legal and judicial personpower and consequent waste of money occasioned by the existence of the Family Court as a separate court of limited jurisdiction." In re Anthony T., 389 N.Y.S.2d 86, 87 (Fam. Ct. 1976).

As a nonsexist alternative, the suffix -person leaves much to be desired. For every chairperson, anchorperson, draftsperson, ombudsperson, and tribesperson, there is a superior substitute: chair, anchor, drafter, ombuds, and tribe member. Words ending in -person are at once wooden and pompous. See chairman.

The traditional language of the law, of course, abounds in -man words: remainderman, venireman, warehouseman, materialman, foreman, landman, bondsman, and juryman. The last of these is virtually obsolete alongside juror; it was in common use, however, through the mid-20th century. Courts have experimented with replacements for foreman—e.g.: "[W]e are unable to conclude that the state trial judge erred in deciding that the foreperson's statement that the jury was unable to agree was more than an expression of present inability to agree." Fay v. McCotter, 765 F.2d 475, 478 (5th Cir. 1985). Because the -person words are so ugly and ineffective, a better nonsexist expression is presiding juror.

Venireman is gradually undergoing transmutation, or, more accurately, emasculation: "It was not error for the court to refuse to ask venirepersons whether the testimony of the government investigator was entitled to more weight than the testimony of any other witness."/ "I respectfully dissent from the holding that this case should be remanded for inquiry into the prosecution's reasons for exercising its peremptory challenges against black venirepersons." Justice Rehnquist used both venireman and veniremember in a single opinion. See Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 418–19 (1985). (See INELEGANT VARIATION.) In that opinion, one use of venireman was specifically in reference to a woman, a Mrs. Colby. (See id.) Justice Rehnquist is right, however, to avoid the -person form. Veniremember is the better option.

Remainderman, warehouseman, and longshoreman are less easily neutralized. Legal writers have experimented with remainderperson, remainderer, -or, and remainor. None is quite satisfactory. The -er suffix does show promise, though: warehouser is listed in W3; it would certainly take some getting used to, like all linguistic changes. Yet longshorer and remainderer are more difficult to pronounce distinctly with the -er. Perhaps we can satisfy ourselves, however, that, in having reached these words in our analysis of sexist terminology, we have traveled to the furthest reaches of the language.

For other entries bearing on this issue, see castle doctrine, chairman, drafter, foreman, mechanic's lien, reasonable person & venireman.

C. Feminine Forms in -ess and -trix. Legal prose is perhaps the last bastion of these feminine forms. We have prosecutrix; testatrix; tutrix; relatrix; conciliatrix, -tress; heritrix, -tress; inheritrix, -tress, and even such rarely seen oddities as dictatrix, -tress; victrix, -ess; and aviatrix, -ess. Most of these moribund terms ought to be sped along to their graves.

For most legal writers, it is far less bothersome to read of a woman testator than it is to read of a lady booksalesman. The Latinate agent nouns in -or are almost universally perceived as being common-sex terms. We have never, for example, thought it odd that women may be termed litigators; we have gotten along fine without litigatrix. With the loss of terms in -ess and -trix we lose a nuance in the language, but the nuance is not worth preserving: the sex of a testator does not matter.

D. Equivalences. Among the subtler problems of nonsexist usage is to refer to men and women in equivalent terms: not man and wife, but husband and wife; not chairmen and chairs (the latter being female), but chairs (for all); not men and girls (a word that diminishes the status of an adult female), but men and women.

Even Mr., on the one hand, as contrasted with Miss or Mrs., on the other, causes problems on this score. Differentiating between one woman and another on the basis of her marital status is invidious, really, if we do not make the same distinction for men. The idea that it matters as an item of personal information whether a woman is married—but that it doesn't matter whether a man is married—is surely an outmoded one. Though many people once considered Ms. an abomination, it is today accepted as the standard way of addressing a married or unmarried woman. Unless the writer knows that a woman prefers to use Mrs., the surest course today is to use Ms.

E. Statute of Limitations. Those committed to nonsexist usage ought to adopt a statute of limitations that goes something like this: in quoted matter dating from before 1980, passages containing bland sexism—such as the use of the generic he or of chairman—can be quoted in good conscience because in those days the notions of gender-inclusiveness were entirely different from today's notions. Although it is quite fair to discuss cultural changes over time, it is unfair to criticize our predecessors for not conforming to present-day standards. How could they have done so? Therefore, using "[sic]" at every turn to point out old sexist phrases is at best an otiose exercise, at worst a historically irresponsible example of mean-spiritedness. For a choice example of this, see James R. Nafziger, A Sickness Unto Death, 1 Scribes J. Legal Writing 149 (1990).

SFO, in England, refers to the Serious Fraud Office—e.g.: "Set up by the Criminal Justice Act of 1987, the SFO already has two major investment cases apart from Guinness in the courts . . . plus 63 other cases at different stages." The Fraud Buster with 66 Cases on His Hands, Sunday Telegraph, 11 Feb. 1990, at 28.

shadow jury (AmE) = a group of mock jurors who are culled from jury lists and paid to sit through a trial and report to a jury consultant hired by one of the litigants. The shadow jury, which is matched as closely as possible to the jury, regularly reports on their reactions to what is taking place in the courtroom and thereby provide counsel with information about the jurors' likely perceptions.

shadow of a doubt, beyond the. This phrase is a CLICHÉ to be avoided. E.g., "It is clear beyond the shadow of a doubt [read beyond doubt] that no TVA employee with proper authority had either ordered or accepted this microfilm."

sham, adj., (= pretended, counterfeit) is frequently used in legal writing in phrases such as sham corporation, sham marriage, and sham wedding. E.g., "In that case 193 persons who had been individually induced, by means of a fraudulent prospectus, to invest their money in a sham corporation were permitted to join in one action for fraud against the promoters." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 467 (4th ed. 1983)./ "It is alleged that a 'bride' would enter into a sham marriage with one of the 'aliens' in order to enable the alien, a native of Portugal, to apply for and obtain a non-quota immigrant visa to which he would not otherwise be entitled." U.S. v. Rodriguez, 182 F. Supp. 479, 482 (S.D. Cal. 1960).

shark repellent (= a device by which a company, in either its bylaws or its articles of incorporation, makes it more difficult for an outsider to mount a corporate takeover) is one of several colorful metaphors that emerged in corporate law during the 1970s and 1980s. E.g., "[S]ection 14(e) requires that there actually be a tender offer before anything can be considered manipulative, so 'shark repellent' techniques like 'poison pills' might fall outside its grasp." Dennis S. Karjala, Federalism, Full Disclosure, and the National Markets in the Interpretation of Federal Securities Law, 80 Nw. U.L. Rev. 1473, 1505 (1986)./ "From a shareholder perspective the best justification for shark repellents . . . is that they provide a means of coordinating shareholder response to a takeover bid . . . ." Jeffrey N. Gordon, Ties That Bond: Dual Class Common Stock and the Problem of Shareholder Choice, 76 Calif. L. Rev. 3, 14 n.35 (1988).

sharp practice. This phrase originally, in the early 19th century, referred merely to hard bargaining in business. But by the mid-19th century, it came to be associated with lawyers as well as business people, and it took on more strongly negative connotations. Since then, sharp practice has referred to unethical practices and trickery—e.g.:

- "In the course of time the law has evolved a number of remedies which protect me against sharp practice in such situations when I bail a chattel, and these remedies are common remedies, though they have to some extent been supplemented by the intervention of Equity." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 163 (1961; repr. 1964).

- "What raised the court's ire was the plaintiff's 'sharp practice' in moving to strike." Monroe Freedman, In the Matter of Manners, Legal Times, 11 March 1991, at 23, 25.
- "Michael Joseph, author of Lawyers Can Seriously Damage Your Health, which first exposed sharp practice by solicitors five years ago, said only an independent complaints system can salvage solicitors' reputations." John Rowland, Lawyers Bar Door to Outside Policing, Sunday Times, 24 March 1991, in Features section.

shepardize is a mid-20th-century -IZE NEOLOGISM derived from Shepard's Citators. Originally, the word was capitalized as a tradename: "If you have before you a recent case in a nisi prius court or in an intermediate court of appeal, do not rest content with Shepardizing it." Paxton Blair, Appellate Briefs and Advocacy, 18 Fordham L. Rev. 30, 40 (1949). But today, the word is increasingly written without the initial capital, as the tradename threatens to lose its uniqueness and become generic. E.g., "Apparently failing to properly shepardize that case, neither plaintiff's nor defendant's counsel cited to this Court a Florida case . . . which specifically rejects Toussaint." Caster v. Hennessey, 727 F.2d 1075, 1077 (11th Cir. 1984)./ "[K]een legal minds at the Dickinson School of Law, having time to spare since computers freed them from the drudgery of shepardizing, found application of the chess clock first to the teaching, thence to the practice of law." Robert E. Rains, Of Clocks and Things, 39 J. Legal Educ. 259, 259 (1989).

The process of shepardizing cases—once extremely tedious—has been greatly simplified by computer-assisted research. Now, instead of laboriously checking several volumes, one merely punches a button. But the process retains the old name.

In G.B., the equivalent volumes are termed Current Law Citations, or noter-ups, and one notes up one's cases. See note up.

sheriff. In England, a sheriff is the Crown's chief executive officer in a shire or county, responsible (now nominally in most areas) for keeping the peace, overseeing elections, and administering justice generally. In the U.S., the sheriff, an officer elected within each county, has similar responsibilities, but they are real, not nominal. An American sheriff has substantial police powers. In Scotland, the sheriff principal and the sheriffs are the judges of the main local courts.

sheriffalty; shrievalty. Both terms date from the early 16th century and refer to a sheriff: to his jurisdiction, to his term of office, to his responsibilities in office, or to all three. In English antiquity, the sheriff represented the royal authority in a district (i.e., a shire) and presided at the shire-moot, the judicial assembly of the shire. Today the position of high sheriff of a county (i.e., of a shire, a term no longer used officially, though it continues to have historical and literary meaning) is an honorary one, largely nominal and ceremonial.

W3 and the OED suggest that shrievalty is the more widely used term and that sheriffalty is a NEEDLESS VARIANT, even though shrieve is an obsolete variant of sheriff. Actually, both are extremely rare, with one citation apiece in federal decisions in the U.S.—and they are both 19th-century citations. If such a noun is needed today, sheriffalty—the form used in the Constitution of West Virginia (art. 9, § 3)—is surely more widely comprehensible.

sheriffdom; sheriffwick. See bailiwick.

shew, an obsolete spelling of show, occurred in AmE and BrE writing—legal and nonlegal—up to the early 19th century.

shield law = a state law governing a journalist's right to refuse to testify about sources of information or information not used in the journalist's reporting, such as notes and outtakes. E.g., "The term 'shield law' is commonly and widely applied to statutes granting newsmen and other media representatives the privilege of declining to reveal confidential sources of information." In re Farber, 394 A.2d 330, 335 n.2 (N.J. 1978).

shingle, to hang out (or set up) one's. This AmE casualism, meaning "to begin to practice a profession such as law or medicine, esp. on one's own," originated in the 1840s and has always been closely associated with law. The metaphor is not, of course, to be taken literally.

shire court is sometimes hyphenated shire-court, but most legal historians write it as two words. E.g., "The old shire court had nothing in common with the modern county court established by an Act of 1846 . . . ." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 29 (2d ed. 1953).

shock the conscience. This phrase, a CLICHÉ, expresses judicial disapproval of some type of outrageous conduct or outcome. It originated in equity courts in the early 19th century; an 1825 decision by the Ohio Supreme Court quotes Lord Eldon as using the phrase in a legal standard: "In the case of Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 246 [1804], Lord Eldon declared, that unless the inadequacy of price was such as to shock the conscience, . . . it was not itself a sufficient ground for refusing a specific performance." Wills v. Cowper, 2 Ohio 124, 148 (1825).

Over the years, the phrase has appeared in various ways, not just as a verb phrase. Cardozo used it as a noun phrase (a shock to conscience): "Still more common are the cases where the evil is less obvious, where there is room for difference of opinion, where some of the judges believe that the existing rules are right, at all events where there is no such shock to conscience that precedents will be abandoned." Benjamin N. Cardozo, A Ministry of Justice, 35 Harv. L. Rev. 113, 119 (1921). The phrase now sometimes appears attributively, as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE: "[A] study of the cases indicates that the courts in thus parroting the rule had no occasion to insert the shock-the-conscience clause in the particular cases under consideration . . . ." Golden v. Tomiyasu, 387 P.2d 989, 993 (Nev. 1963).

shone; shined. The former is the past tense of the intransitive shine <the sun shone>, the latter the past tense of the transitive shine <he shined his shoes>.

should. Oddly, should, like may, q.v., is sometimes used to create mandatory standards, as in the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct. In that code, in which "[t]he canons . . . establish mandatory standards unless otherwise indicated," six of the seven canons begin, "A Judge should . . . ." See ought (B) & shall.

should/could is the type of monstrosity that would-be profound writers, or terminally wishy-washy ones, are fond of. E.g., "Should/could states impose additional requirements that must be met in order to obtain a hearing?" Typographical gimmickry of this sort ought to be avoided; surely the perpetrator does not actually believe he or she conveys otherwise overlooked nuances. See and/or (A).

show [+ (to be) (as)]. The infinitive to be is generally preferable to as after this verb. E.g., "It is incumbent upon the district court to weigh that claim in light of the facts at hand and in light of any alternatives that may be shown as [read shown to be] feasible and more promising in their effectiveness."

show cause (= to give a legally satisfactory reason) is common legal JARGON. E.g., "Judge Arnold issued an order . . . directing appellants to show cause why they should not be deemed in contempt of court." In re Farber, 394 A.2d 330, 332 (N.J. 1978)./ "When he was let go, he was informed that he would have to appear at a hearing to show cause why he should not be deported." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 9 (1988).

This verb phrase has recently given rise to a corresponding PHRASAL ADJECTIVE: "The Ruiz court may issue a show-cause order for criminal or civil contempt."/ "At the show-cause hearing, appellant testified that because no one had called to schedule his testimony, he assumed that the case had been settled or continued." Cf. good cause shown.

show trial = a trial, usu. in a nondemocratic country, that is staged primarily for propagandistic purposes, with the outcome predetermined. E.g., "[T]he Stalin period [was] a time of purges, show trials, fabricated plots, executions and mass exile." Genieve Abdo, Spoon Tells Tale of Suffering in Stalinist Camp, L.A. Times, 5 Aug. 1990, at A3.

shrink > shrank > shrunk. Some writers mistakenly use shrunk as the past-tense form.

shudder; shutter. These words sound the same, but they are otherwise very different. To shudder is to tremble or quiver. A shutter is the device, such as a screen for a window, that limits the passage of light. Most literate people know this distinction, but some writers forget—e.g.: "'I shutter [read shudder] to think of the impact downtown if 18-year-olds were not allowed some means of activity,' she said." John Riley, Pearl Street Club Wins Right to Entertain Teens, Daily Hampshire Gazette, 17 Nov. 1993, at 1-3 (misquoting Judith Fine, a city-councilor-elect for Northampton, Mass.)./ "I wouldn't want to hold my breath until Castro is deposed, and I shutter [read shudder] to think how much it will cost our country through the hemorrhaging of our tax dollars to support such a system." Marianne Sikler, Send Cubans, Haitians Back to Their Homes, Arizona Republic, 10 Sept. 1994, at B7.

shyster = a rascally lawyer; one that is shrewdly dishonest. The word has long been an enigma to English-language etymologists, who have posited a dozen possible derivations. In his 124-page monograph entitled Origin of the Term "Shyster" (1982), Gerald L. Cohen conclusively solves the enigma by citing previously overlooked material in a New York City newspaper (1843–1844).

Shyster arose as part of the editor's crusade against legal and political corruption in the city. The correct etymology is that which derives from the vulgar German word Scheisse (= excrement), hence Scheisser became shyster.

Among the mistaken hypotheses are that the word comes from the proper name Scheuster, supposedly the name of a corrupt practitioner; from the Gaelic siostair (= barrator); from an allusion to Shylock, Shakespeare's villain in The Merchant of Venice (c. 1596); and variously from words in Yiddish, Dutch, and Anglo-Saxon.

Shyster referred originally to an unscrupulous lawyer, but its meaning has now widened to include unscrupulous persons in other professions as well. E.g., "[H]e told the group of cutters that the union officials were a bunch of shysters . . . ." N.L.R.B. v. Lettie Lee, Inc., 140 F.2d 243, 245 (9th Cir. 1944). Thus, although the phrase shyster lawyer would have seemed redundant in the late 19th century, it did not by the mid-20th century: "[T]he shyster lawyer assigned by the court wanted to squeeze all the money he could out of the boy's family." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 106 (1943). See pettifogger & LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A).

S.I., in British legal writing, is an abbreviation for Statutory Instruments, formerly known as Statutory Rules and Orders (or S.R. & O.).

sibling (= brother or sister) is sometimes mistakenly thought to mean "child"—e.g.: "I went to see Tate. He opened the door himself, his youngest sibling [read child] clutching with sticky hands at the legs of his corduroy trousers." Angus Ross, The Leeds Fiasco 109 (1975).

sic. A. Generally. Sic (= thus, so), invariably put in brackets, is used to indicate that a preceding word or phrase in a quoted passage is reproduced as it appeared in the original document. Sic at its best is intended to aid the reader (or a typesetter following copy), who may be confused by whether it was the quoter or the quoted writer who is responsible for the spelling or grammatical anomaly.

This interpolation has been much on the rise: In Westlaw's Allstates-Old database, which includes all state-court opinions from the 19th century up to 1944, the word appeared 1,239 times; from 1945 to 1990, the word appeared 69,168 times. A similarly spectacular rise can be seen in recent federal opinions (from 616 in Allfeds-Old to 26,210 in Allfeds). This increase may result from a number of factors, but one major factor is the benighted use of sic, discussed just below.

B. Benighted Uses. Some writers use sic meanly—with a false sense of superiority. Its use may frequently reveal more about the quoter than about the author of the quoted material. For example, a recent book review of an English legal text contained a sic in its first sentence after the verb analyse, which appeared thus on the book's dustjacket. In AmE, of course, the preferred spelling is analyze; in BrE, however, the spelling analyse is not uncommon and certainly does not deserve a sic. In fact, all the quoter (or overzealous editor) demonstrated was ignorance of British usage: "The dust jacket tells us: 'In this book, the author brings to bear empirical evidence and legal theory in a critical comparison of English and American discovery, and analyses [sic] and evaluates the differences between the two systems.'" See Book Review, 61 Tex. L. Rev. 929, 929 (1983). The same publication also sic'd Plucknett's spelling of skilful (BrE)—see Thomas Lund, The Modern Mind of the Medieval Lawyer, 64 Tex. L. Rev. 1267, 1270 n. 14 (1986).

Another irksome use occurs when writers insert sic in others' citations, as if to belittle the person quoted for ignorance of correct citation form. For example, a federal appeals court judge had the audacity to sic the Supreme Court's citation of one of its own cases: "'We strike the balance in favor of institutional security, which we have noted is 'central to all other corrections goals,' Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S., [sic] at 823, 94 S. Ct., [sic] at 2804." Thorne v. Jones, 765 F.2d 1270, 1275 (5th Cir. 1985). The better course would be to leave the citations as they are without comment or to give one's own "correct" version in brackets without comment.

C. Ironic Uses. In the following example, the author inserted sic after his own word choice, as if to say, "I really do think this is the right word": "[I]n 1951, it was the blessing bestowed on Judge Harold Medina's prosecution [sic] of the eleven so-called 'top native Communists,' which blessing meant giving the Smith Act the judicial nod of constitutionality." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 302 (1955).

sic transit. A fairly common Latin maxim from Classical literature is Sic transit gloria mundi: "So passes away the glory of the world." Some legal writers have adapted the first two words of the phrase to denote the lamentable passing of a convention or doctrine, as here: "With our decision today, all I can say is sic transit United Beef Producers, Inc. and Rule 320, Tex. R. Civ. P."

sic utere. The sic utere doctrine embodies the Latin maxim sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas, which means "use your own property in such a manner as not to injure that of another." E.g., "These sections of the Louisiana Civil Code owe an expression of the sic utere doctrine that limits the rights of proprietors in the use of their property." Holmes called this Latin maxim an "empty general proposition" that leads to "hollow deductions." Oliver W. Holmes, "Privilege, Malice, and Intent," in Collected Legal Papers 120 (1920). See MAXIMS.

sidebar. A. Sense. Originally, sidebar referred to a small fencelike partition, either in the Outer Parliament House in Edinburgh or in Westminster Hall. Each morning in term, attorneys argued motions to the judges ex parte from within the sidebar. Today, most American lawyers think of the sidebar, in its literal sense, as the side of the judge's bench, where counsel can confer with the judge beyond the jury's earshot. See at (the) bar, bar & outer bar.

B. Sidebar Conference. The phrase sidebar conference now usu. refers to a discussion among the judge and counsel—usu. over an evidentiary objection—outside the jury's hearing. At times, however—esp. during voir dire—it has been used in reference to a discussion between the judge and a juror or veniremember. See bar.

C. Sidebar as an Ellipsis. The word sidebar is often used in AmE as a shortening of sidebar conference. E.g., "[A]ppellate specialist John Pollok stuck strictly to arguing questions of procedure and admissibility during sidebars." Gregg Krupa, Teamwork, Sidebars Tipped Gotti Case, Manhattan Lawyer, March 1990, at 1.

D. As a Popularized Legal Technicality. By the mid-20th century, journalists had come to use sidebar to refer to a short, secondary article within or accompanying a main story in a publication. Also, we speak of sidebar remarks or sidebar comments, which are comments incidental to the main point. These extended senses almost certainly derived from the connotation that sidebar has long carried in legal contexts—i.e., that the discussion is peripheral to the main issues. See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES sideswipe; sidewipe. Sideswipe (= to strike a glancing blow), dating from the early automotive age (1926), is the term to use. Sidewipe, an artificial form, has no valid standing.

Siete Partidas. See Las (Siete) Partidas.

sight unseen. From a strictly logical point of view, the phrase makes little sense. In practice, however, it has an accepted and useful meaning: an item is bought sight unseen when it has not been inspected before the purchase.

signatary, adj. See signatory, adj.

signatary, n.; signatory; signator. Fowler and Krapp both recommended in the 1920s that signatary be adopted as the preferred noun. See Fowler, MEU1 534; George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 540 (1927). Today, however, signatary is virtually never used; the COD and W10 contain signatory only. E.g., "International commercial litigation involving nationals of signatories to the Hague Convention is not at all infrequent."/ "The Court has no jurisdiction to rectify the articles, even if it is proved that they were not in accordance with the intention of the original signatories." J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 25 (4th ed. 1945).

Signatory may be an adjective as well as a noun (Krapp considered it the only adjectival form), often a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE—e.g.: "It has been finally executed by the parties signatory, and is, in and of itself, supposed to pass property only upon death." See signatory.

Signator, modeled on Latinate agent nouns, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of signatory, n. E.g., "Liability under section 11 is limited to signators [read signatories] of the registration statement, directors or partners of the issuer, experts named as preparing or certifying a portion of the registration statement, or underwriters with respect to the issue."

signator. See signatary, n.

signatory, adj.; signatural. Signatory = forming one of those (persons or governments) whose signatures are attached to a document (OED) <the convention gives the signatory states rights to search one another's fishing vessels>. (See signatary.) Signatural = of or pertaining to signatures.

signed, sealed, and delivered. This phrase traditionally appears in the attestation clause of a deed, a contract under seal, or a specialty contract. (See deed & special(i)ty.) The only requirements of such a contract are that it be intended as such and that it be signed, sealed, and delivered. But two of three past participles in the triplet signed, sealed, and delivered are now fictions. Today, the seal is largely symbolic—a sticky wafer simply being attached to the document instead of a genuine seal. (See seal (A).) Likewise, "delivery" is not literally necessary, as long as the parties clearly intended the deed to be operative. E.g., "Specialty Contracts . . . must be executed with certain formalities. There must be a document, in print or in writing, and it must be signed, sealed and delivered." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 10 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950). See seal (B), POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES & DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS significance; signification. These should be distinguished. Significance = (1) a subtly or indirectly conveyed meaning; suggestiveness; the quality of implying; or (2) the quality of being important or significant.

Signification = (1) the act of signifying, as by symbols; or (2) the sense intended to be conveyed by a word or other symbol. Writers occasionally misuse significance for signification (sense 2)—e.g.: "There may be social observances existing before it or without it, but they are not law in any proper significance [read signification or, better, sense] of that term." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 2 (7th ed. 1964).

silk; silk gown. These terms are metonymic for "King's or Queen's Counsel." In England, a Queen's Counsel wears a silk gown; hence to obtain, receive, or take silk, means to become a Queen's Counsel, and silk and silk gown have come to denote a person who has achieved this rank. E.g., "Yet when North J. was first appointed to the Bench on November 1, 1881, he was assigned to the Queen's Bench Division, although his practice both as a junior and as a silk had lain on the Chancery side." R.E. Megarry, Miscellany-at-Law 10 (1955)./ "[A]mong the members of the Bar, there is a comparatively small group of senior [barristers], enjoying certain privileges and subject to certain disabilities, known as Queen's Counsel, or (from the fact that they wear silk instead of 'stuff' gowns in court) silks." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 67 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). See dispatent & take silk.

similar and like. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS

SIMILES, very simply, are comparisons constructed with like or as. They differ from METAPHORS because, with similes, the comparisons are explicit (e.g., "trying this case is like wrestling a grizzly bear"), not implicit (e.g., "this case is a real bear").

E. B. White's insight is characteristically telling: "The simile is a common device and a useful one, but similes coming in rapid fire, one right on top of another, are more distracting than illuminating. The reader needs time to catch his breath; he can't be expected to compare everything else, and no relief in sight." William Strunk & E.B. White, The Elements of Style 80 (3d ed. 1979). That similes are useful is not to be doubted—e.g.:

- "To waste time and argument in proving that, without [the authority to make necessary and proper laws,] Congress might carry its powers into execution, would be not much less idle than to hold a lighted taper to the sun." McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 419 (1819) (per Marshall, C.J.).
- "Like a coral reef, the common law thus becomes a structure of fossils." Robert H. Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy 295 (1941).
- "The position of a judge has been likened to that of an oyster—anchored in one place, unable to take the initiative, unable to go out after things, restricted to working on and digesting what the fortuitous eddies and currents of litigation may wash his way." Calvert Magruder, Mr. Justice Brandeis, 55 Harv. L. Rev. 193, 194 (1941).
- "Just as, perforce, the musical composer delegates some subordinate creative activity to musical performers, so, perforce, the legislature delegates some subordinate (judicial) legislation—i.e., creative activity—to the courts." Jerome Frank, Courts on Trial 308 (1949; repr. 1963).
- "The [European Community] Treaty is like an incoming tide. It flows into the estuaries and up the rivers. It cannot be held back." Bulmer Ltd v. Bollinger S.A., [1974] 2 All E.R. 1226 (C.A.) (per Lord Denning).
- "As a moth is drawn to the light, so is a litigant drawn to the United States." Smith Kline & French Labs. v. Bloch, [1982] 1 W.L.R. 730, 733 (C.A.) (per Lord Denning).
- "[T]he common law came down through the centuries with some of its past sticking to it, like a skin it never quite succeeded in molting." Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 24 (2d ed. 1985).

But, as White noted, the enthusiastic users of similes can easily fall into OVERSTATEMENT, and sometimes into foolish-sounding PURPLE PROSE—e.g.: "Not reversing this case would be like the United States failing to challenge the pernicious crimes of Hitler in the Second World War; the United States did so, and this honorable Court should likewise reverse." (This comparison of the Holocaust to one litigant's case is, in a sense, offensive to humanity.)/ "To allow what was done in the instant case would be not only to expand Rule 35 to a point where it is no longer frozen like a mastodon in a glacier but also to allow resentencing under Rule 35 to become like molten lava cascading down a mountain and destroying the remainder of the double jeopardy protection afforded by the Constitution." (The cascading similes here are simply distracting.)

simple. In a phrase such as fee simple, the word simple denotes that the estate is inheritable by the owner's heirs with no conditions concerning tail (q.v.); in the phrase simple contract, q.v., the word simple means that the contract was not made under seal.

simple contract – a contract not under seal, whether express or implied, and whether oral or in writing. Oddly enough, the term parol contract is synonymous, even when the contract is in writing. Williston preferred the term informal contract, believing that the phrase simple contract could mislead. See informal contract.

simpliciter (= simply; summarily; taken alone unconditionally; absolutely) can usually be said more simpliciter—e.g.:

- "Both the Georgia statute and the Georgia prosecutor thus completely fail to provide the Court with any support for the conclusion that homosexual sodomy, simpliciter, [read unconditionally] is considered unacceptable conduct in that State . . . ." Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186, 220 (1986) (Stevens, J., dissenting).
- "I concur heartily in the court's judgment that a grand jury subpoena simpliciter [read simply or, depending on the sense, taken alone] does not satisfy the more rigorous requirements . . . ." Doe v. DiGenova, 779 F.2d 74, 92 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (Starr, J., concurring).
- "If we think that discrimination simpliciter is [read is absolutely] wrong, then even reverse discrimination is wrong." Simon Lee, Law and Morals 74 (1986).

The LATINISM adds only obscurity. See FORBIDDEN WORDS (A). simplistic is a pejorative adjective meaning "oversimple; facile." E.g., "I do not mean to endorse the simplistic view that the words printed in the United States Code can answer all questions regarding the meaning of statutes." It is not a synonym for simple, though apparently used thus in this sentence: "The simplistic [read simple?] notion that parties exercise their volition by committing themselves to future action (or inaction), and that the law provides their circle of assent with the status of private law, is fundamental to any discussion of contracts."

simultaneous death. In cases of intestacy, this phrase denotes the death of two or more persons in the same mishap in circumstances making it impossible to determine who was the first to die or the last to survive. It describes a presumption, not necessarily a reality. See commorientes.

In the phrase simultaneous-death statute, the hyphen is necessary because simultaneous-death functions as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE.

since. See as (A).

since . . . then mangles the syntax of a causal construction. E.g., "Since plaintiff purchased the pool after defendant had built it for the previous owner, then the express warranty is void according to the terms of the contract." The problem is remedied by omitting then, and this particular sentence could be clarified still further by changing since to because.

sine damno (= without damage) is an unnecessary LATINISM. E.g., "If the act be sine damno [read without damage], no action on the case will lie." (Eng.) See damnum.

sine die (= without a day being fixed) is used to indicate that no date has been set for resumption. The phrase is Officialese for "indefinitely." E.g., "The court adjourned sine die." 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 400, 400 (1790) (term notation). Sine die is used exclusively in reference to adjournment taken with no date set for resumption of the proceedings or meeting. See go hence without day & day in court.

A linguist complains that the phrase is "horribly mispronounced to the point where the first part sounds like the trigonometric function and the second like a synonym for 'perish' . . . ." Mario Pei, Words in Sheep's Clothing 83 (1969). But /si-ni-dI-ee/ has long been established as the usual English-language pronunciation.

sine qua non /si-nee-kwah-non/ (L. "without which not") = an indispensable condition or thing. This LATINISM is common in both lay and legal writing and should remain unmolested by plain-English reform. E.g., "[A]mbiguity of constitutional language and uncertainty about constitution-makers' intent is the very sine qua non of judicial review as it has operated in the United States." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 117–18 (1960)./ "Goldfarb is not properly read as making compulsion a sine qua non to state-action immunity."/ "We are mindful that sine qua non [read the sine qua non] in a prosecutorial vindictiveness claim is that the second charge is in fact harsher than the first." Cf. but for.

singlehanded(ly). The preferred adverb is singlehanded, but only when this word follows the verb <she did it singlehanded>. When the adverb precedes the verb, singlehandedly is called for <she singlehandedly brought the corporation to the brink of bankruptcy>.

sink > sank > sunk. In AmE, some writers misuse the past participle for the simple past—e.g.: "The original owner of the vessel had failed to remove it after it sunk [read sank or had sunk] . . . ." Magno v. Corros, 630 F.2d 224, 227 (4th Cir. 1980)./ "After he sold the house, it sunk [read sank] into underlying permafrost." Alaska Pac. Assurance Co. v. Collins, 794 P.2d 936, 937 (Alaska 1990).

sister, as an adj. <sister state>, is rather quaintly used in a number of expressions, perhaps more commonly today in legal than in lay contexts. Like she in reference to states or ships, sister may be obsolescent because of whatever latent SEXISM may appear to those who seek to eliminate every vestige of male-female differentiation in the language.

Sister has traditionally been used in a number of contexts—e.g.: "Our holding is therefore that, as a matter of comity, we will enforce the equitable decrees of a sister state affecting Texas land as long as such enforcement does not contravene an established public policy in this State."/ "It is a general rule that, upon a sufficient showing of facts, a court of equity in any state may enjoin a citizen of that state from prosecuting a suit against another citizen thereof, in the courts of a sister state."

Not only does a state have 49 sister states in the U.S., but also the federal judicial circuits, by analogy, have sister circuits. E.g., "Four of our sister circuits have held that the time expended by an attorney litigating the fee claim is justifiably included in the court's fee award."

sistren is the archaic and dialectal equivalent of brethren. Karl Llewellyn began his last speech with the jocular remark, "Well, Brethren and Sistren, I find myself in a completely impossible position . . . ." Karl Llewellyn, A Lecture on Appellate Advocacy, 29 U. Chi. L. Rev. 627, 627 (1962). See brethren.

sit = (1) of a judge, to occupy a judicial seat; or (2) of a court, to hold judicial proceedings. E.g.:

(Sense 1) "Yet President Washington had difficulty finding men of national stature willing to sit on so inconsequential a court." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court v (1960)./ (Sense 2) "No court in Britain normally sits behind closed doors, so you can walk in boldly and listen to its proceedings." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 17 (11th ed. 1982).

site, v.t., = to locate, place, or provide with a site. E.g., "In Texas, the state [nuclear] repository stalled in court, with a ruling that set back the siting process by about four years." Shawn Hubler, Only California Is on Track for Nuclear Dump, L.A. Times (Orange Co.), 20 May 1991, at A1./ "The state law of Texas defines whether the taxpayer has a property right in the Texas-sited realty; if he does, it is subject to the government tax lien."

site, n. See situs.

situate, p.pl.; situated. The language of the law abounds in needless ARCHAISMS, and situate used as a past participle is one of them. Historically, it is one of a great many English participial adjectives formed from Latin perfect passive participles—e.g., corrupt (from the Latin corruptus, "having been spoiled"), select, compact, effeminate, legitimate, and adequate. In the Renaissance, many more such participial adjectives existed than do today. Those that have not survived in the Latinate t-form (ending in -t or -te) have been thoroughly anglicized, taking on the English past-participial suffix -ed. The verb to situate is among these.

Many wills contain phrases such as the following: "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, real as well as personal and wheresoever situate [read situated], of which I die seised and possessed, I direct my executor to distribute as he considers it will be most effective in the advancement of Christ's Kingdom on Earth."/ "I give, devise, and bequeath all my property and estate of whatsoever nature whether real, personal, or mixed, and wheresoever situate [read situated], unto my two beloved children."

The usage appears even in judicial opinions, commentary, and statutes—e.g., "The land in question, situate [read situated] in Multnomah County, was bought by the defendant Pennoyer at a sale upon the judgment of such suit."/ "The celebration must take place . . . in a recognized place of worship or Registrar's office situate [read situated] in the district in which one at least of the parties resides." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 52–53 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984)./ "[T]he county court of the district in which the registered office of the company is situate [read situated] shall . . . have concurrent jurisdiction with the High Court. . . ." Companies Act 1948 § 218(3).

Shakespeare, in Love's Labour's Lost (c. 1588), had one of his comically pompous characters say, "I know where it is situate." Some lawyers continue to use the word similarly, probably unaware of the comic pomposity of the word. It is time they came into the 20th century and wrote situated.

One other point about this word merits attention. Situate is often superfluous, as in "Appellee's car was situated about three feet from the south curb of Jackson Street." The word could be dropped from the sentence with no change in meaning, and with enhanced concision.

situate, lying, and being in. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

situation has, in one of its senses, become a VOGUE WORD, and is often used superfluously, as here: "The instructor told his class that there had been many instances of starvation situations, where [read of starvation, when] people simply could not eat monkey, snake, horse, or rodent meat, and died because of it."

It is also often used illogically: "He might be significantly affected by the situation he seeks to litigate." One does not litigate a situation. Dispute, issue, and claim are all more specific examples of what can be litigated. See litigate.

situs (= the location or position of [something] for legal purposes) is a legal word not quite equivalent to site. E.g., "Historically, federal courts used a situs or locality test to determine whether a tort action was within admiralty jurisdiction."/ "The validity of a will of land is determined by the situs of the land." As a legal term, the word dates from the early 19th century: "Personal contracts have no situs; they are to be governed by the law of the place, where they are to be performed." Maisonnaire v. Keeting, 16 F. Cas. 513, 516 (C.C.D. Mass. 1815) (No. 8,978). Pl. situs.

Sometimes situs is misleading: "If the will contains a devise of land, the will must be probated at the situs of the land [read in the jurisdiction in which the land is located] in order to establish title." (It is not necessary that probate be obtained at the very site where the land is; rather, the will must be probated by a court having territorial jurisdiction over the land.) See lex situs & locus.

six of one, half a dozen of the other is one of our most shopworn CLICHÉS.

siz(e)able. The preferred spelling is sizable in AmE, sizeable in BrE. See MUTE E skeptic(al); sceptic(al). The former is the AmE, the latter the BrE spelling.

skid is incorrect in the past tense; skidded is the correct form. "He skid [read skidded] down the slope."

skil(l)ful. The AmE spelling is skillful, the BrE skilful. Cf. wil(l)ful.

skul(l)duggery; scul(l)duggery. Skullduggery is a misspelling of skulduggery (= trickery; unscrupulous behavior), the spelling preferred over the forms beginning sc-.

skyjack; hijack. Today airline hijackings are still sometimes termed skyjackings. But hijacking remains the more common word. See hijack & PORTMANTEAU WORDS.

skyrocket, v.i., is a favorite CLICHE of hyperbolists; in the following sentence, however, it may be accurate: "Most close corporations simply do not have the capital to afford the skyrocketing costs of products liability insurance."

slander. See libel & defamation.

slanderize is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of slander, v.t.

slander of title denotes the tort that a person commits who makes false statements, orally or in writing, that cast doubt on another person's ownership of real property. Despite the name, this tort has nothing to do with slander in the sense of oral defamation. E.g., "Not dissimilar to the acts just discussed are statements in disparagement of title to property, giving rise to the action for 'slander of title.'" Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 189 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937)./ "A false denial of the plaintiff's title to his property, whereby he was hindered in selling it, was actually called 'slander of title' . . . ." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 521 (3d ed. 1990).

SLAPP is an ACRONYM for "Strategic Lawsuit Against Public Participation," i.e., one brought usu. by a developer, corporate executive, or elected official to stifle those who protest against some type of high-dollar initiative (often involving the environment). The term SLAPP is ordinarily used as a noun—e.g.: "Some legal experts familiar with *SLAPP*s say they are more a political muzzle than a legal remedy." SLAPPing the Opposition, Newsweek, 5 March 1990, at 22./ "But Mr. Pring and Ms. Canan say SLAPPS are unconstitutional actions against non-governmental individuals or groups because of their communications to a government body, official or the electorate on an issue of public concern." Bruce Nichols, Firms SLAPPing Down Critics, Dallas Morning News, 5 May 1991, at 45A.

But it appears also as a verb, as in the title of the two articles just quoted, and as in this quotation from the first article: "Those doing the SLAPPing almost always lose; the First Amendment generally protects activists like Betty Blake, whose case is pending." SLAPPing the Opposition, Newsweek, 5 March 1990, at 22.

slink > slunk > slunk. The verb is so inflected.

slip-and-fall case = (1) a lawsuit brought by a plaintiff for injuries sustained in slipping and falling, usu. on the defendant's property; or, by extension, (2) any minor case in tort. Sense (2) arose because the slip-and-fall case is the archetypal minor tort case—e.g.: "Young, who mostly hears 'slip and fall' cases, soon will tackle a custody battle between Blount County's Junior and Marry Sue Davis that could set a legal precedent in the USA." Judge to Decide Embryo Custody, USA Today, 17 May 1989, at 2A. Because the phrase contains a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it should be hyphenated as at the outset of this entry slip opinion; advance sheet. In the U.S., reported opinions are published first individually in slip opinions, and are then collected in soft-cover advance sheets, before appearing in the hardcover reporters.

In some courts, the phrase slip opinion formerly referred to a preliminary draft of an opinion not yet ready for publication: "On the margin of one 'slip opinion,' the preliminary draft of an opinion [that] is circulated among the justices, McReynolds wrote, 'This statement makes me sick.'" Donald D. Jackson, Judges 336 (1974).

slippery slope. This once-clever METAPHOR—a way of saying that if we take the first step there will be no stopping—has been all but exhausted as a legal CLICHÉ. First used in the mid-1960s, it gained widespread currency in the 1980s. Here are the first examples recorded in federal and state caselaw, respectively: "If agency power to designate programming 'not in the public interest' is a slippery slope, the Commission and the courts started down it too long ago to go back to the top now unless Congress or the Constitution sends them." Banzhaf v. F.C.C., 405 F.2d 1082, 1094 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (per Bazelon, C.J.)./ "It seems more likely that a future court, armed with today's decision, will take one more 'logical' step down the slippery slope to absolute liability." Renslow v. Mennonite Hosp., 367 N.E.2d 1250, 1265 (Ill. 1977) (Ryan, J., dissenting).

Justice Harlan played cleverly with the metaphor: "I, for one, however, do not believe that a 'slippery slope' is necessarily without a constitutional toehold." Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 699–700 (1970) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

When used attributively, the phrase needs a hyphen: slippery-slope argument, slippery-slope reasoning. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A).

SLIPSHOD EXTENSION. Several individual entries in this dictionary refer to this heading. Slipshod extension denotes the mistaken stretching of a word beyond what it is generally accepted as denoting or connoting, the mistake lying in a misunderstanding of the true sense. It occurs most often, explained H.W. Fowler, "when some accident gives currency among the uneducated to words of learned origin, and the more if they are isolated or have few relatives in the vernacular" (MEU1 540).

Today one might rightly accuse not only the uneducated, but the educated as well, of the linguistic distortion of a priori and protagonist, qq.v., to name but two of any number of possible examples. For other examples, see ad hoc, alias, alibi, calculus, compound, dilemma, duplicity, egoism, enjoinder, factor, hopefully, literally, material, medicine, veracity, verbal, viable, & vitiate. See also POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.

slow has long been treated as an immediate adverb, that is, one not requiring the -ly suffix. It is ill-informed pedantry to insist that slow can be only an adjective. Though slowly is the more common adverb, and is certainly correct, slow is often just as good in the adverbial sense. Euphony should govern the choice. For example, Coleridge wrote, in "The Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman": "I'll follow you across the snow, / You travel heavily and slow." The usage is common in legal contexts: "One should go slow about relying on decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in any but the federal field."

slush fund. Originally, in the early 19th century, this phrase was a nautical term referring to money collected from the sale of fat or grease obtained from meat boiled on board ship; the money was used to buy luxuries for the crew. By the late 19th century, the phrase had come to denote money used to supplement the salaries of government employees, esp. through bribes. Today the phrase always carries connotations of moral impropriety, and sometimes of legal impropriety.

small-claims court = a local tribunal in which disputes involving small amounts can be adjudicated quickly and cheaply, usu. without legal representation; the model for small-claims courts arose in the late 17th- and 18th-century England, and they were revived in the late 20th century. Small-claims is a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE when it precedes a noun, and thus requires a hyphen.

smart money (= punitive damages, i.e., an award that smarts) arose in the 18th century and has been more or less steadily used ever since—e.g.: "There has been much discussion in the Courts, and among elementary writers upon the subject of vindictive damages, or 'smart money' as they are sometimes called." Malone v. Murphy, 2 Kan. 245, 257 (1864)./ "The purpose of punitive damages, sometimes denominated as exemplary damages or smart money, is two-fold: to punish the wrongdoing of the defendant and to deter others from engaging in similar conduct." Rogers v. T.J.X. Cos., 404 S.E.2d 664, 666 (N.C. 1991).

smellfungus (= a faultfinder, grumbler) is too valuable a word, especially for lawyers in ad hominem reference to other lawyers, to be as neglected as it is.

snuck is a nonstandard past tense of sneak common in American dialectal and informal English. The past tense to be used in formal writing is sneaked—e.g.: "A degree of federalization was, so to say, sneaked in the back door . . . ." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 96 (1974).

Surprisingly, though, snuck appears half as often in American caselaw as sneaked—e.g.: "Trujillo snuck [read sneaked] up behind Rodriguez and squeezed him so tightly that Rodriguez could not breathe." Stripco Sales, Inc. v. NLRB, 934 F.2d 123, 128 (7th Cir. 1991)./ "[D]uring the month before the shooting, he had snuck [read sneaked] out through the window several times while his mother was asleep and his father was at work." Barrett v. Pacheco, 815 P.2d 834, 835 (Wash. Ct App. 1991).

so. A. Omission of. This error is not uncommon. E.g., "The court of appeals concluded, although it was the first court to [read court so to] hold, that the 19th-century joinder cases in this court created a federal, common-law, substantive right in a certain class of persons to be joined in the corresponding lawsuits."

B. For very. The casualism of substituting so for very or terribly should be avoided in formal writing. E.g., "He cannot reason so well [read very well]."

so as [+ infinitive]. This construction is a common and a useful one in legal writing, but it often leads to problems. Most common among these is the unnecessary repetition of so: "Was the omission by Jacobs so trivial and innocent so as [read as] not to be a breach of the condition?"/ "A change will not be tolerated if it is so dominant and pervasive so as [read as] to frustrate the purpose of the contract."/ "If you define it so broadly so as [read as] to exclude nothing, then you have done nothing."/ "The issue is whether the company so clothed H. with the mantel of authority so as [read as] to cause X. to rely upon his words."

In the following sentences, as has been suppressed, leaving the syntax incomplete: "We do not believe that the acceptance in the case at bar diverged so radically from the terms of the offer to warrant [read as to warrant] this result."/ "If a defendant's activities are not so pervasive to subject [read so pervasive as to subject] it to general jurisdiction, this court makes an evaluation in determining whether there is limited jurisdiction."

Here, the phrase is simply misused for to or in order to: "Res ipsa loquitur is invoked here so as to avoid [read here to avoid] having to name a particular defendant out of several possible defendants." The meaning of this sentence calls for the sense "in order to," not "in such a way as to," so that to can stand alone. Note also the ugly use of the PASSIVE VOICE, which deprives the verb avoid of an acting subject. [A possible revision: By invoking res ipsa loquitur here, counsel avoids having to name one particular defendant out of several possible defendants.]

Not infrequently, and especially in long sentences, so as to and such as to are improperly mixed, as here: "The necessity that the plaintiffs should join this association is not so great, nor is the association's relation to the rights of the defendants, as compared with the right of the plaintiffs to be free from molestation, such as to [read as to] bring the acts of the defendants under the shelter of the principles of trade competition." See such (C) & sufficiently . . . as to.

social. A. And societal; societary. These words overlap to some degree, but may be validly distinguished. Social = (1) living in companies or organized communities <humans are social animals>; (2) concerned with the mutual relations of (classes of) human beings <the social compact>; or (3) of or in or toward society <social interactions> (COD). Societal has replaced societary (now merely a NEEDLESS VARIANT) in the sense "of, pertaining to, concerned or dealing with, society or social conditions" (OED). E.g., "Certainly the defendant will accept the societal postulate that parents have the obligation to support their children."

B. And sociable. Sociable = ready for companionship, quick to unite with others, gregarious. Social = relating to persons in society, communities, or commonwealths.

social harm = an invasion of any social interest that the criminal law protects. Every crime involves a social harm committed by some person.

social-legal. See sociolegal.

societal; societary. See social (A).

societas, the Roman-law term for "partnership," sometimes appears in Anglo-American legal texts—e.g.: "When several persons unite for the purpose of carrying on business in common, which is usually done upon the terms that each of them shall be an agent for all the rest, the contract is called partnership, 'societas,' and takes various shapes, according to the business contemplated." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 304 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937).

society, in torts and family law, often means "consortium; sexual and other intimate companionship." E.g., "The spouse of an injured crew member who survives his injury may recover her loss of society in an action for unseaworthiness."/ "The jury could take into consideration only the bruises that the plaintiff sustained, and the loss of his wife's society."/ "The right of consortium is a right growing out of the marital relation, which the husband and wife have, to enjoy the society and companionship and affection of each other in their life together." See consortium.

sociolegal; social-legal. Sociolegal = relating to the field of law and society. E.g., "Historically, sociolegal scholars have not been able to assume the perspective of social scientists—to seek to learn how law as a phenomenon affects behavior in society . . . —because our theory has been tied to a concept of law which was developed by and for the use of judges and lawyers." Paul Lermack, What Does Law Do? 12 Legal Stud. F. 401, 401 (1988).

Social-legal is a NEEDLESS VARIANT: "He had, in effect, created a social-legal [read sociolegal] counterpart of that mathematical curiosity, the Klein bottle, whose spout curves back into its mouth, so that it became a one-sided surface which is closed and has no boundary." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble With Lawyers 252 (1970).

sociological jurisprudence denotes a philosophical approach to law stressing the actual social effects of legal institutions, doctrines, and practices. E.g., "In 1906, . . . [Roscoe Pound] startled the entire bar with an original, highly critical, and constructive analysis of the American legal system. His address shattered the complacency of many leaders of the bar, jurists and professors of law, and started a movement in the United States toward what is called 'sociological jurisprudence,' which . . has made enormous headway and has radically affected, sometimes directly and sometimes indirectly, the thinking of American jurists, judges, and lawyers." René A. Wormser, The Story of the Law 484–85 (1962)./ "Both sociological jurisprudence—which is the opposite of abstraction, formalism, and purism—and legal realism—which rejects scientism and system-building—emphasize the difficulty and the importance of focusing on the judicial process." John H. Merryman, The Civil Law Tradition 71 (1969). Cf. analytical jurisprudence.

socius criminis = a partner in crime; an accessory. This LATINISM, which appears primarily in BrE, is invariably unnecessary for accessory. E.g., "In Mapolisa v. The Queen, the board held that the relevant provision in the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act of 1960 applied to a socius criminis [read an accessory] and that a participant in a crime under that section was subject to the same mandatory penalty as the principal offender." (Eng.)

Socius is sometimes used as an elliptical form of socius criminis. E.g., "To establish the degree of proximity of the appellant to the crime, the evidence must establish that he had exact knowledge of the crime and of the identity of the principal; the appellant can be a socius [read an accessory] only on establishing his own mens rea." (Eng.) Cf. particeps criminis. See accessory.

sodomist; sodomite. The latter is an example of BIBLICAL AFFECTATION.

sodomize is plagued by the same ambiguities as sodomy, q.v. Not everyone would agree on what the following sentence describes: "LePage put the body in the back of the pickup and drove to a remote location, where he sodomized the corpse before disposing of it." LePage v. Idaho, 851 F.2d 251, 252 (9th Cir. 1988).

sodomy. This ambiguous term can include almost any kind of "unnatural" sex, though it is most often confined to bestiality and buggery. Sodomy was not a common-law offense, though an early statute criminalizing it became a part of the common law of many American jurisdictions, most of which now have anti-sodomy statutes.

so far as. See as . . . as & insofar as.

soft law; hard law. In the JARGON of international lawyers, soft law contains general principles that are widely accepted as international norms of conduct, as well as declaratory statements of those principles without specific obligations. Hard law, by contrast, is binding and requires an active decision on the part of a state to accede to or ratify it. A convention is an example of hard law; an international declaration is an example of soft law. E.g., "Much of the original 'soft law,' or nonbinding principles, has served as the basis for the hard law of international conventions and agreements." Allegra Helfenstein, Comment, U.S. Controls on International Disposal of Hazardous Waste, 22 Int'l Law. 775, 784 (1988).

soft-pedal. For a fairly common error involving this term, see peddle.

so help me God. This formula concludes the oath as traditionally administered to a Christian witness in an Anglo-American court. The person administering the oath traditionally said, "So help you God," and the oath-taker would then say me. See 2 Alexander M. Burrill, A Law Dictionary and Glossary 472 (1860). Presumably, alternative forms have varied for witnesses of other faiths. Some such witnesses, as well as unbelievers, make an affirmation rather than taking an oath. See affirmance.

soi disant = self-proclaimed. This French affectation is inferior both to the translation just given and to self-styled. See GALLICISMS solace (= alleviation of sorrow or trouble; relief from distress) should not be used merely as a synonym of comfort, without the circumstance of grief or distress being implied. E.g., "Companies with the greatest market share often have a tendency to 'sit on a lead.' They will take solace [read' undue pride?] in their numbers, become complacent, and lose their competitive edge." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 205–06 (1984). For a related MALAPROPISM, see surcease.

The following misuse is even more puzzling:

"No clear legal framework has ever provided for federal jurisdiction over aviation torts. Instead, cases involving aviation torts find solace [read end up or are heard] in federal courts via diversity or admiralty jurisdiction." Albert Lin, Comment, Jurisdictional Splashdown: Should Aviation Torts Find Solace [read Be Heard] in Admiralty? 60 J. Air L. & Com. 409, 411 (1994).

sole (= the one and only, single) should not be used with a plural noun, as in the sole criteria [read the only criteria]. See fem(m)e sole.

sole and exclusive is a legalistic REDUNDANCY. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

sole cause. See CAUSATION (E).

solecism. Generally, solecism means "a grammatical or syntactic error." Here it is close to the literal sense: "It is no more a solecism to say 'immovable personal property' than it is to say 'removable fixtures,' nor more contradicting than in the division of actions to use the term 'in rem,' when, under the particular state of facts, the action is primarily 'in personam.'"

The word has been extended to figurative senses, however: "The common law recognized no such solecism as a right in the wife to the estate, and a right in someone else to use it as he pleased, and to enjoy all the advantages of its use."/ "The plaintiff asks for protection only during the season, and needs no more, for the designs are all ephemeral; it seeks in this way to persuade us that, if we interfere only a little, the solecism, if there be one, may be pardonable."

solely. The placement of this word sometimes causes trouble. E.g., "The responding document states a condition solely advantageous [read advantageous solely] to the party proposing it." Cf. only.

sole practitioner; solo practitioner. In AmE generally, sole practitioner is much more common. But there are areas, such as Texas, where solo predominates.

sole proprietor; individual proprietor. These synonymous phrases denote an individual who owns a business and is responsible for all its debts.

solicit. A. For elicit. This is a MALAPROPISM. E.g., "As noted by the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the question that came closest to soliciting [read eliciting] the information in question was a two-part question asked by the prosecutor." (Note also the awkward repetition of question.)

B. For What a Solicitor Does. Although solicitor (q.v.) is the BrE term for a certain kind of lawyer, it is incorrect to say that what such a lawyer does is solicit. (This sense of the verb has long been obsolete.) The confusion appears in this passage in a reference book: "In America, lawyers can both solicit cases and plead them in court, but in England solicitors handle the preliminaries, while barristers alone are members of the bar and can take cases to court." Robert Hendrickson, Business Talk 34 (1984). The quoted statement is so phrased that some word such as prepare would be necessary to fit the context. Apart from chamber practice (conveyancing, wills, probate), a solicitor prepares cases and instructs counsel. See instruct.

solicitate, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of solicit, was coined as a BACK-FORMATION from solicitation. But it serves no purpose: "[A]n employer in good faith discharged two employees whom it believed had made violent threats against the company when the employees tried to solicitate [read solicit] union memberships." M.B. Zaninovich, Inc. v. ALRB, 171 Cal. Rptr. 55, 66 (Ct. App. 1981).

solicitation. In criminal law, this broad term covers any word or actions by which one requests, urges, advises, counsels, tempts, commands, or otherwise entices or incites someone to commit a crime.

solicitor. In G.B., and many of the former Commonwealth countries, this term refers to a member of one of the two branches into which the legal profession is divided, handling usu. general legal and business advice, conveyancing, and instruction of and preparation of cases for counsel (barristers). They may do some pleading, particularly in lower courts. See attorney (A).

In AmE, the term generally refers to an advertiser or to one who solicits business—and is frequently used disparagingly. E.g., "[A] vocational expert . . . opined that the claimant should be able to perform the work of a telephone soliciter [sic] . . . ." Beavers v. H.E.W., 577 F.2d 383, 385 (6th Cir. 1978). Regardless of the sense, the word should be spelled -or.

solicitor-general. In BrE and AmE alike, this term denotes the second-highest ranking legal officer in government, but there the similarities end. In G.B., the solicitor-general (hyphenated) is a Crown-appointed law officer who advises the cabinet on legal matters and supervises the passage of bills through Parliament. Ironically, the solicitor-general in England is invariably a barrister—not a solicitor. In the U.S., the solicitor general (unhyphenated) is the chief courtroom lawyer for the executive branch, with chambers at the Supreme Court as well as at the Justice Department. In AmE, the title solicitor general is often, after the first mention of the full title, shortened to solicitor.

solicitude has two important senses that may render the word ambiguous: (1) "anxiety"; and (2) "protectiveness."

solidary liability. See joint and several.

solo practitioner. See sole practitioner.

solon, journalese for legislator, is derived from the name of Solon, an Athenian statesman, merchant, and poet (ca. 640–560 B.C.). In the early 6th century, Solon achieved important political, commercial, and judicial reforms that greatly improved life in the city-state of Athens. He reversed the trend to convert impoverished Athenians into serfs at home or to sell them abroad as slaves. He also standardized Athenian coinage and its system of weights and measures, granted citizenship to immigrant craftsmen, and enhanced the prosperity and independence of Athenian farmers.

In modern times, his name has been used to denote either a "sage" or a "wiseacre" (OED). Today, the term "may be inescapable, and thus grudgingly admissible, in headlines, where legislator, senator, or representative will not fit, but in text it is to be avoided." Roy Copperud, Webster's Dictionary of Usage and Style 368–69 (1964).

When used in reference to legislating judges, solon often carries a mocking tone: "At any rate, concluded the nine solons, the dodge works; the statute doesn't cover the case; no tax." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 46 (1939; repr. 1980).

so long as. See as long as & as . . . as (A).

soluble; solvable. Soluble is usually applied to substances in solvents, whereas solvable is usually applied to problems. Soluble is often used in reference to problems, however; this usage is acceptable, though not preferred. Cf. resolvable.

solution may take either to or of as its preposition.

solvabilité, in French civil law, means "solvency," not "solvability" or "solubility."

solvable. See soluble.

solvent. See insolvent.

some . . . as for such . . . as or some . . . that. E.g., "The two-year statute of limitations applicable to an action based on fraudulent inducement to execute a contract begins to run when plaintiff learns of the alleged wrongdoing or knows of facts sufficient to excite some inquiry as [read such inquiry as or some inquiry that] would have been made in the exercise of reasonable diligence."

somebody; someone. The words are equally good; euphony should govern the choice of term. Someone is often better by that standard. Each is a singular noun and hence, for purposes of CONCORD, the antecedent of a singular pronoun. Some one as two words is an obsolete spelling, though Cardozo used this spelling as recently as 1928.

someplace is informal for somewhere; it is out of place in formal prose, although it is acceptable in speech.

sometime; some time. Sometime = at a time in the future; some time = quite a while. The difference may be illustrated by contrasting the following two sentences: "It was not until sometime later [i.e., an unknown date] that he quit."/ "It was not until some time [i.e., awhile] later that he quit."

Sometime, in a slightly archaic sense, means "former"—e.g.: "Let me also recall my indebtedness to my former tutor, the late Professor F. deZueta; the late Sir John Miles, sometime Warden of Merton College . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making vi (7th ed. 1964). In such phrases as my sometime friend, it does not properly signify "on-again-off-again" or "on occasion." See erstwhile.

somewhat should be avoided as a WEASEL WORD—e.g.: "In approaching solution to this problem we must look somewhat [omit somewhat] beyond the immediate consequences of the decision in this case." See FLOTSAM PHRASES & FUSTIAN

Son-of-Sam law denotes a statute that prevents a criminal from profiting from selling the rights to his or her story to a publisher or moviemaker. New York was the first state to enact such a law, in 1977, when the serial murderer David R. Berkowitz (known as "Son of Sam") was offered large sums for his life story.

About 40 American states have enacted such statutes. Generally, these statutes, enacted mostly in the 1980s, authorize prosecutors to seize royalties from convicted criminals. During his prosecution, O.J. Simpson was able to skirt the issue by arranging for his lawyers to profit from books sales, as opposed to Simpson himself. Further, of course, he had only been accused—not convicted—when he wrote his book entitled I Want to Tell You (1995).

sonorous is accented on the second syllable /sə-nohr-əs/ in AmE, and on the first syllable /sohn-ər-əs/ in BrE. The latter pronunciation is a secondary variant in AmE.

sophic(al). See sophistic(al).

sophist(er). Sophister is, except in historical contexts denoting a certain rank of student, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of sophist, which today has primarily negative connotations in the sense "one who makes use of fallacious arguments; a specious reasoner." Formerly it was a respectable word meaning "one who is distinguished for learning; a wise or learned man" (OED).

sophistic(al); sophic(al). These words have opposite connotations. The former (usu. sophistical) means "quibbling, specious, or captious in reasoning." The latter (usu. sophic) means "learned; intellectual."

The disparaging term is more common: "The hospital makes the sophistic [read sophistical] argument that its admission requirement does not turn on the physician's academic medical degree, but on the nature of the institution at which he received his post-doctoral training."/ "Thence 'special pleader' came in time to be used for any disingenuous or sophistical disputant." (Eng.)

sorb. See absorb.

sore-back lawyer. See LAWYERS, DEROGATORY NAMES FOR (A) sort of, adv., is a dialectal casualism to be avoided in writing. E.g., "The prosecutor sort of agreed that . . . ." It is also a FUDGE WORD and a WEASEL WORD.

For the problem raised by the phrase these sort of, see these kind of.

so . . . so as. See so . . . as [+ infinitive].

sought for. The preposition is unnecessary. E.g., "As the relief sought is the appointment of a trustee, and the necessity for such appointment requires the construction of the will as an incident to the relief sought for [read merely sought], the complainant is properly here."

sound, v.i. This verb has a special legal sense, "to be actionable (in)." E.g., "As for the claims sounding in malicious prosecution, however, neither Smith nor any of the other authorities advanced by appellees controls them."/ "There is no doubt that an easement may be created by words sounding in covenant."/ "It is, of course, to the advantage of any lienor . . . to plead his claim as sounding not in contract but in tort." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 753 (2d ed. 1975).

The OED refers to the expression sound in damages (= to be concerned only with damages)—e.g.: "This covenant did not create a specifically ascertained debt, but only a claim which sounded in damages" (quoted in OED). Today the sense has been carried beyond "to be concerned only with," to the meaning set forth at the outset of this entry.

SOUND OF PROSE, THE. We're all occasionally guilty of having a tin ear. The effective writer is self-trained to avoid writing in a way that distracts by undue alliteration, unconscious puns, or unseemly images, for these may irritate or distract the reader. The writers of the sentences in the following sections might have benefited from reading their own prose aloud.

A. Undue Alliteration or Rhyme. Cardozo, a masterly stylist, wrote in one of his classic opinions: "Nothing in this situation gave notice that the fallen package had in it the potency of peril to persons thus removed." Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R. Co., 162 N.E. 99, 99 (N.Y. App. Div. 1928). This type of wordplay should be undertaken cautiously, for it declares that one's purpose is to be wry or coy.

Intentional but ineffective alliteration is one thing. Thoughtless alliteration is quite another:

- "The unauthorized publication of personal letters is a piracy of a portion of the sender's personality."
- "Such a claim makes little sense since the plaintiff in no way relied on the fact that he was trading with an insider."
- "The change in the complexion of complex litigation necessitates a more concentrated and prolonged inquiry into this area."

- "Such taxes merely apportion the cost of state services among all beneficiaries, and imports must bear their fair share."
- "She was, at the time of the ceremony of marriage, and has been ever since, incapable of consummating the marriage with her husband in that she evinced an invincible repugnance to him." (Eng.)

See ALLITERATION

B. Unwieldy or Illogical Imagery. "That case held that quasi in rem jurisdiction over a defendant could not be exercised unless the defendant had such 'minimum contacts' with the forum state that in personam jurisdiction could be exercised over him under International Shoe." (Prepositional clash: over . . . under; image: under . . . shoe.)/ "The accounting problem has already come to a head at the SEC in connection with initial public offerings." (Two idioms collide in the reader's mind: come to a head and head of an organizaiton or department.)

C. Unnecessary or Awkward Repetition. "The decision in Klaxon v. Stentor would have suggested that Illinois conflict of laws should be looked to to determine whether Illinois or Indiana law on physical examination orders is to be observed." (Substitute followed for looked to; or, if this seems to change the meaning, insert in order before the second to.) See REDUNDANCY (B).

Having words with the same root in close proximity can be especially jarring. Legal writers often use in succession two different forms of the same root, as an agent noun and a verb. E.g., "In conference the conferees largely acceded to the Senate's approach to Indian regulatory authority."/ "By the first clause the covenantor covenanted as follows." (Eng.) Thoughtful writers vary one of these words, usually the verb—e.g.: "While meeting, the conferees largely acceded . . . ."/ "By the first clause the covenantor agreed [or bound himself] as follows."

This type of variation is unobjectionable, its purpose being to avoid an obtrusive repetition. Hence it is distinct from INELEGANT VARIATION.

In the following sentence, the same root appears in two words that, in context, have remote senses (the verb impress and the noun impression): "From what has been said we are convinced that appellant's profits in question were not impressed with a trust when they first came into existence; the board was obviously of the impression [read obviously thought] that the trust first attached when appellant credited them to the beneficiaries on his books of account."

D. Arrhythmic Plodding. "Nevertheless, the lengthy process of securing a final state-court judgment that reviews the Board's denial—which envisions state district court trial, intermediate state court appeal, and state supreme court certiorari review—augurs much-belated and possibly ineffective relief to a recent law-school graduate ultimately held to have been improperly denied a certificate of fitness that would have made him eligible to take a bar examination soon after he had completed his legal studies and received his law degree." This sentence can hardly be meaningfully read aloud on first or second try; it should be split into smaller clauses in which the emphasis, the author's implied intonation, is clearer.

E. Jarring Contrasts. "That such tenancy found its existence in the lease of July 14 is admittedly true, for plaintiff contends that defendant is holding over under it, and defendant contends that he is holding under it." (Who has the upper hand?) (Read: . . . for the plaintiff contends that defendant is a holdover tenant—in violation of the lease—whereas the defendant contends that he is holding in accordance with the lease.)/ "There is here no claimed invasion of any substantive constitutional right." [Contextual rewrite: Smith does not claim that the University has invaded any substantive constitutional right.]

F. Misleading Parts of Speech. In the following sentence, will (futurity) sounds like will (testament): "Although the courts have been more liberal in admitting extrinsic evidence for the purpose of integrating holographs than they have for the purpose of integrating attested wills, it is likely that the proponent will have to rely upon evidence appearing in the various pages because sufficient extrinsic evidence may be impossible to obtain."

soup, in England, is legal slang equivalent to dock brief, q.v., or to the fee involved in such a brief.

source, though it has a respectable history as a verb in certain contexts, has recently been adopted by jargonmongers as a VOGUE WORD. Like other such words, it should be avoided. Examples of its objectionable uses follow: "This information is not sourced [i.e., its sources are not cited (intelligence jargon)]."/ "In making concessions on such questions as sourcing—where parts should be made—GM tacitly conceded Toyota's superiority in small-car desigu and manufacture."

sources of law. As Holland pointed out, this phrase is ambiguous. It is commonly used in four senses, i.e., to refer to: (1) the place from which we obtain our knowledge of the law, e.g., whether from the statute-book, the reports, or treatises (literary source); (2) the ultimate authority that backs up the law, i.e., the state (formal source); (3) the causes that have, seemingly automatically, brought into existence rules that have subsequently acquired legal force, such as custom, religion, and scientific discussion (historical or material sources); or (4) the organs through which the state either grants legal recognition to rules previously unauthoritative, or itself creates new law, such as legislation and adjudication (legal source). See Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 55 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937).

sour grapes is one of the most commonly misused idiomatic metaphors. It is not a mere synonym of envy or jealousy; rather, as in Aesop's fable of the fox who wanted the grapes he could not reach, sour grapes denotes the human tendency to disparage as undesirable what one really wants but cannot get (or has not gotten). Following is a typical journalistic misuse: "Great Britain's reaction [in the Falklands war] was more a case of sour grapes and wounded pride than any genuine desire to right a terrible wrong." Letter of Philip Naff, Falklands Furor, Time, 10 May 1982, at 5.

sovereignty; sovranty. The former spelling is preferred. Brierly rightly calls sovereignty a "much abused word." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 150 (5th ed. 1955). It has three primary senses: (1) "supreme dominion, authority, or rule"; (2) "the position, rank, or control of a supreme ruler, such as a monarch, or controlling power, such as a democratically formed government"; or (3) "a territory under the rule of a sovereign, or existing as an independent state." To the international lawyer, sovereignty "is not a metaphysical concept, nor is it part of the essence of statehood; it is merely a term which designates an aggregate of particular and very extensive claims that states habitually make for themselves in their relations with other states [sense (1)]. To the extent that sovereignty had come to imply that there is something inherent in the nature of states that makes it impossible for them to be subjectod to law, it is a false doctrine which the facts of international relations do not support." Id. at 48–49.

spatial; spacial. The former spelling is preferred both in AmE and in BrE.

spawn litigation is a legal CLICHÉ.

speaking. A. Speaking Motions and the Like. Through HYPALLAGE, speaking has evolved in legal JARGON as an adjective denoting some type of impermissible or extraordinary communication. A speaking motion, for example, is one that requires consideration of facts outside the pleadings; a speaking objection is one laced with comments or arguments that reach beyond the legal grounds for the objection; a speaking demurrer, in former practice, was one that introduced a new fact or facts not contained in the original petition.

A related term without the connotation of impermissibility is the phrase speaking order (= an order that not only commands but also gives reasons for the court's action). E.g., "The decision in the Northumberland Case opened up new possibilities in certiorari when there was a 'speaking order'—i.e. a record of judgement or decision giving reasons [that] could, if necessary, be assailed for error of law." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 573–74 (7th ed. 1964).

B. As a Sentence Adverb. The word speaking is among the few "acceptable danglers" or "disguised conjunctions" when used as a sentence adverb. E.g., "Speaking in general terms, it is desirable to speed the growth of technical legal meanings." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 23 (1967)./ "Speaking very generally, the answer to this question is that contractual obligations are absolute, and that absence of fault is no defence." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 184 (3d ed. 1981). See DANGLERS (A) & SENTENCE ADVERBS.

special(i)ty. The legal term for a contract under seal is spelled specialty in both AmE and BrE. In the general lay sense "a special thing," the word is specialty in AmE, speciality in BrE.

special limitation; executory limitation; condition subsequent. The ideas denoted by these terms are so intricate that it is difficult if not impossible to explain them without falling into JARGON. Here is an attempt at least to minimize the jargon. A special limitation is a restriction on the estate of a grantee who is a first taker, arising either when the grant creates a possibility of reverter or when a third party acquires a defeasing interest after the grant. An executory limita- tion is a restriction on the estate of a grantee who is the first taker, arising when a defeasing interest in a third party is granted simultaneously with the grantee's present interest. A condition subsequent is an event that, when it occurs or fails to occur, gives the grantor or the grantor's successors the right to end an existing estate. See condition (B) & condition precedent.

special litigation committee = a committee of independent corporate directors assigned to investigate the merits of a derivative shareholder action and, if appropriate, to recommend maintaining or dismissing the suit. The phrase dates from the 1970s, when the device it denotes sprang into existence in response to shareholder litigation.

special verdict; special interrogatory; special issue. These synonymous phrases refer to a jury question that requires detailed, specific answers about each factual issue—as opposed to a general verdict, general interrogatory, or general issue, which asks merely who wins. See general issue.

specie; species. Specie means "coined money"; it has no plural, unless one means to refer to different types of coined money. Species is both singular and plural and means "a group of similar plants and animals that can breed with each other but not with others." From that sense have grown natural extensions of the meaning of the word. Sometimes species is correctly used as an equivalent of type, as here: "Loss of services was the gist of this species of action." The writer of the following sentence was erroneously attempting to make specie a singular of species: "Penalties are a specie [read species] of punishment for wrongdoing and are not looked upon with favor." The same blunder appears in the title of an article: Harold S. Bloomenthal, Shareholder Derivative Actions under the Securities Laws—Phoenix or Endangered Specie [read Species]? 26 Ariz. L. Rev. 767 (1984). For more on species, see genus (A).

In specie (= in kind; specifically; without any kind of substitution) is a LATINISM that is sometimes justified in providing a valuable nuance to legal writing. E.g., "Apparently the Stuarts sought only to compel forced loans of money and impose taxes and levies under claim of prerogative, but not to take property in specie." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 108 (1957; repr. 1975)./ "It is presumed that the testator intended the transferee for life to receive the income arising from investing the proceeds realized on selling the consumables, rather than to enjoy the consumables in specie."

In specie has given rise to the elliptical adjectival form specie: "The executor will permit beneficiaries of any and all trusts hereunder to enjoy the specie use or benefit of any household goods, chattels, or other tangible personal property."

-specific. In legal writing, this word is increasingly used as a combining form, as in fact-specific, city-specific, and even newsrack-specific—e.g.: "[T]he City of Lakewood finds itself between a rock and a hard place: make the rules newsrack-specific, and be accused of drawing the noose too tightly around First Amendment protected activities; apply more general rules to newsracks, and be told that your regulators lack standards sufficiently specific to pass constitutional muster." City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 486 U.S. 750, 795 (1988) (White, J., dissenting).

specific implement. See specific performance.

specific performance; specific relief; specific implement. In contract cases in which damages would not be an adequate remedy—as where the sale of rare or valuable articles, or of land, is concerned—the court may use its equitable powers to order specific performance, i.e., that the contract be performed. E.g., "What is commonly called the specific performance of contracts is the doing of what was agreed to be done, but not at the time when it was agreed to be done; i.e., not till after the time when it was agreed to be done is past, and hence not till the contract is broken." C.C. Langdell, A Brief Survey of Equity Jurisdiction (pt. 3), 1 Harv. L. Rev. 355, 355–56 (1888)./ "In American commentary it has become a truism to say that the once exceptional remedy of specific performance is rapidly becoming the order of the day." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 83 (1974).

In both AmE and BrE, specific relief is a synonym—e.g.: "Chancery intervened by granting specific relief, such as the performance of an obligation, or the return of goods which had been lent to defendant." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 108 (2d ed. 1979).

Specific implement is the equivalent phrase in Scots law.

specious. See spurious.

spectate. See BACK-FORMATIONS

specter; spectre. This favorite word of legal writers is preferably spelled -er in AmE, -re in BrE. Curiously, however, many Americans cling to the British spelling. A California court writes: "We were not halted by the spectre [read specter] of an inability to prejudge every future case."/ "Neither one objected below or raised on appeal the spectre [read specter] of an inadequate hearing." In American writing, the usual spelling of many words such as theater is -er. See -ER (C). spectrum. Pl. spectra. See PLURALS (A).

sped. See speeded.

speech, in BrE, can refer to a judgment (i.e., a judicial opinion) in the House of Lords. The term derives from the law lords' custom of delivering their pronouncements orally, as parliamentary "speeches." E.g., "It should, however, be said that not all the law lords agreed with Lord Radcliffe, and that in a number of speeches (including, indeed, that of Lord Radcliffe himself) there is evidence of support for a third 'theory.'" P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 209–10 (3d ed. 1981)./ "Lord Simon of Glaisdale also canvassed the possibility of prospective overruling in a dissenting speech in an earlier case . . . ." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 232 (4th ed. 1991). See decision.

speechify (= to deliver a speech) is typically used in a mocking or derogatory way. Cf. argufy.

speed, all deliberate. See with all deliberate speed.

speeded; sped. The best preterit and past-participial form of the verb to speed is sped, except in the PHRASAL VERB to speed up (= to accelerate) <she speeded up to 80 m.p.h.>.

speedy trial. The Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution declares that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy . . . trial . . . ." In 1974, Congress enacted the Speedy Trial Act (18 U.S.C. § 3161), which set time limits for indicting, arraigning, and prosecuting federal criminal defendants. Speedy refers to the point of beginning important events in the prosecution—not the speed with which they are carried out.

speluncean /spə-lən-see-ən/ is often mispronounced /spə-lən-kee-ən/, esp. in references to Lon Fuller's brilliant article, The Case of the Speluncean Explorers, 62 Harv. L. Rev. 616 (1949). Though the cognate words spelunker and spelunking do indeed have the hard -k- sound, the -c- in speluncean is soft.

spiel (= a set monologue or rehearsed oral presentation) is pronounced /speel/, not in the mock-Yiddish fashion that has become so common (/shpeel/).

spirit, in matters of interpretation, refers to a general purpose: hence, the spirit of the law is frequently contrasted with the letter of the law. E.g., "As in all interpretations, the 'spirit' of constitutional texts or the 'spirit' of constitutions began to be invoked and it became necessary to give a content to abstract constitutional formulas exactly as the civilian has had to give a content for modern purposes to abstract oracular texts of the Roman Books." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 97 (1938)./"[I]t is an almost inevitable feature of legal systems in their adolescence that the spirit of the law is overshadowed by the letter of procedure, . . . the demands of precision far outweigh[ing] those of abstract justice." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 34 (2d ed. 1953). See letter of the law, the.

spiritual(istic); spirituous; spiritous; spirituel(le); spirited. Spiritual is the broadest of these terms, meaning "of spirit as opposed to matter; of the soul; concerned with sacred or religious things." Spiritualistic = of or relating to spiritualism, i.e., the belief that departed spirits communicate with and show themselves to the living, esp. through mediums. Spirituous = alcoholic. E.g., "The indictment charges the unlawful sale of spirituous liquors within two miles of Bethel Methodist Church in Macon County." Spiritous is an ARCHAISM in the sense of "highly refined or dematerialized," and is also a NEEDLESS VARIANT of spirituous. Spirituel (masculine) or spirituelle (feminine) means "witty" or "of a highly refined character or nature, esp. in conjunction with liveliness or quickness of mind" (OED).

spit > spat > spat. Occasionally spit wrongly displaces spat as the past-tense or past-participial form—e.g.: "The portraits of downtown life are almost always moving—in spite of the grime and foul language spit [read spat] through rotten teeth . . . ." Soto, New Poems, Stories on America's "Unwashed," Japan Times, 3 June 1990, at 14.

spite of, in. See despite.

splendiferous is a usually comic or colloquial word for splendid.

split between (or in) the circuits. This phrase is used in American legal writing to denote that U.S. Courts of Appeals have arrived at contrary holdings on the same point of law. E.g., "Recognizing that the split in the circuits exists, we find that Bailey and not Collins provides the appropriate analysis, which we now follow." The U.S. Supreme Court or Congress is capable of remedying a split between the circuits, by laying down an explicit rule of law that the courts of appeals must afterwards follow.

SPLIT INFINITIVES abound in legal writing, often needlessly—but they are not invariably wrong. The English language gives us "the inestimable advantage of being able to put adverbs where they will be most effective, coloring the verbs to which they apply and becoming practically part of them . . . . If you think a verb cannot be split in two, just call the adverb a part of the verb and the difficulty will be solved." Joseph Lee, A Defense of the Split Infinitive, 37 Mass. L.Q. 65, 66 (1952).

Fowler divided the English-speaking world into five classes: (1) those who neither know nor care what a split infinitive is; (2) those who do not know, but care very much; (3) those who know and condemn; (4) those who know and approve; and (5) those who know and distinguish. (MEU2 at 579.) It is this last class to which, if we have a good ear, we should aspire. See SUPERSTITIONS (B).

An infinitive, of course, is the tenseless form of a verb preceded by to, such as to reverse or to modify. Splitting the infinitive is placing one or more words between to and the verb, such as to summarily reverse or to unwisely modify.

A. Splits to Be Avoided. If a split is easily fixed by putting the adverb at the end of the phrase, and the meaning remains the same, then avoiding the split is the best course:

> Split: "It is not necessary to here enlarge upon them."
> Unsplit: "It is not necessary to enlarge upon them here."

This is an excellent example of the capricious split infinitive, which serves no purpose, unless that purpose is to jar the reader. Similar examples turn up frequently in legal writing:

- "This issue is confusing the court, and we would like to all clear it up [read we would all like to clear it up]."
- "The equal protection clause will continue to almost automatically invalidate [read to invalidate almost automatically] classifications that are unmistakably racial on their face . . . ."
- "This statement appears to be an objection to the trial court's failure to more clearly explain [read to explain more clearly] Harper's defensive theory."
- "In order for someone to voluntarily take a risk [read For someone to take a risk voluntarily], he must know the dangers involved, and decide to take the chance anyway."

Wide splits are to be avoided—e.g.: "We encourage counsel on both sides to utilize the best efforts to understandingly, sympathetically, and professionally arrive at [read to arrive understandingly, sympathetically, and professionally at] a settlement regarding attorneys' fees."

With CORRELATIVE CONJUNCTIONS, a split infinitive simply displays carelessness—e.g.: "White was to either make or obtain a loan." [Read White was either to make or to obtain a loan.] See PARALLELISM.

B. Justified Splits. A number of infinitives are best split. Perhaps the most famous is from the 1960s television series, Star Trek, in which the opening voice-over included this phrase: to boldly go where no man—or, in the revival of the 1980s and 1990s, where no one—has gone before. The phrase sounds inevitable partly because it is so familiar, but also because the adverb most naturally bears the emphasis, not the verb go.

And that example is not a rarity. Consider: She expects to more than double her profits next year. We cannot merely move the adverbial phrase in that sentence—to "fix" the split, we would have to eliminate the infinitive, as by writing, She expects her profits to more than double next year, thereby giving the sentence a different nuance. (The woman seems less responsible for the increase.)

Again, though, knowing when to split an infinitive requires a good ear and a keen eye. Otherwise, the ability to distinguish—the ability Fowler mentioned—is not attainable. To flatly state, for example, suggests something different from to state flatly. In the sentences that follow, unsplitting the infinitive would either create an awkwardness or change the sense:

- "The confidentiality of a marketing concept does not create a continuing competitive advantage because, once it is implemented, it is exposed for the world to see and for competitors to legally imitate." (Changing placement of the adverb here would change the meaning.)

- "The statute denies to respondent the right to reasonably manage or control its own business."
- "The majority improperly places the burden of proof on the appellees to affirmatively establish the existence of a statutory exemption."
- "He asserted self-defense in order to affirmatively avoid appellant's cause of action."
- "The statute prohibits supplying others with the necessary information and documents to falsely claim their income as tax exempt."
- "Appellants failed to timely file their notice of appeal."
- "Inability to directly attain the remedial goal of prevention of harm in tort cases is a major deficiency of the common-law system of substitutional money damages."
- "The great progress of the art, which owed little to financiers and much to operating men, had reduced costs fast enough to pretty well cover the manipulations of the holding companies." Robert H. Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy 142 (1941).
- "Imagine what the Court would have said if Congress had tried to expressly delegate the matter to the Court." Charles P. Curtis, Jr., Lions Under the Throne 242 (1947).

Distinguishing these examples from those under (A) may not be easy for all readers. Those who find it difficult might advantageously avoid all splits.

C. Awkwardness Caused by Avoiding Splits. Occasionally, though, sticking to the old "rule" about split infinitives leads to gross phrasing. The following sentences illustrate clumsy attempts to avoid splitting the infinitive. In the first two examples, the adverb may be placed more naturally than it is without splitting the infinitive; in the third and fourth examples, a split is called for:

- "Now to legitimize L's breach of the contract by the retroactive application of the October 1982 amendments would be unjustly to enrich L [read to enrich L unjustly] while unjustly penalizing U."
- "We should not permit Congress to continue inadequately to compensate judges [read to continue to compensate judges inadequately]."
- "The court does not have the resources necessary effectively to superintend [read to effectively superintend] the day-to-day details of the execution of the program to be set out in the decree."
- "We are not impressed with the soundness of the doctrine, which, in the case at bar, would be an attempt judicially to interpret [read to judicially interpret] the language of the donor provisions contrary to his actual intent as expressed."

split sentence = a criminal penalty involving a short jail term—to expose the offender to the unpleasantness of prison—followed by a period of probation. Its use is described and defended in ABA Standards for Criminal Justice ch. 18, 100–07 (2d ed. 1980), though as an unnamed "intermediate sanction" rather than under the name split sentence.

splitting the baby has become a legal CLICHÉ to describe an adjudicated compromise imposed on two contending parties—usu. with the implication that such a resolution is unsatisfactory. Alluding to the biblical story of Solomon's ruse that revealed which of two contending women was truly the baby's mother, this phrase appears to have come into legal use in AmE first in the mid-1960s: "Without questioning the Solomonic simplicity of this resolution, it is no more permissible than splitting the baby would have been conscionable." Conlon v. McCoy, 278 N.Y.S.2d 449, 452 (App. Div. 1967).

spoil(s). Although the word is plural in the phrase spoils of war, it is traditionally singular in the sense "goods, esp. such as are valuable, seized by force or confiscated." E.g., "No right to the spoil is vested in the piratical captor."

spoliation, a learned word, is, in the hands and mouths of the less-than-learned, often misspelled and mispronounced spoilation, as in a 1992 legal seminar on the subject of "Spoilation [read Spoliation] of Evidence." The difference between the form of the verb and of the noun—though etymologically the words are identical—is understandably the source of confusion. That difference arises from different paths by which the words came into English: in the 14th century, spoil was borrowed from Old French (espoille), whereas in the 15th century spoliation was borrowed from Latin (spoliatio).

For the same error in a related term, see despoilation.

spoonfuls; spoonsful. The former is preferred. See PLURALS (E).

spotted pony case. See whitehorse case.

spousal, adj. The OED defines this term as (1) "of, pertaining or relating to, espousal or marriage; nuptial; matrimonial"; or (2) "(of a hymn, poem, etc.) celebrating or commemorating an espousal or marriage." W3 contains like definitions. In modern American law, however, spousal means "of, relating to, or by a spouse or spouses." E.g., "Pragmatically, spousal support now serves to deliver economic justice based on the financial needs of the specific parties involved in a dissolution proceeding." See interspousal.

spouse is a word that lawyers use much more often than nonlawyers, who are accustomed to husbands and wives. Certainly in referring to a particular husband or wife, spouse is not the best word—e.g.: "We know that the design and text of the Code bears the inimitable imprint of its chief draftsman, Karl N. Llewellyn, and that his spouse [read wife], Soia Mentschikoff, had a major hand in the entire project." James J. White & Robert S. Summers, Uniform Commercial Code § 1, at 5 (3d ed. 1988).

spread, v.t. The figurative parliamentary idiom to spread upon the minutes has been extended in legal usage to other printed matter, and, as in the second example, even to unprinted matter. E.g., "The court's findings that lesser sanctions would be inadequate must be spread upon the record."/ "Appellee has had this picture of its indifference, or at least ineptness, spread before a jury and now upon the pages of this reporter." springing use; shifting use. A springing use is one that arises on the occurrence of a future event, whereas a shifting use is one that operates to terminate a preceding use. A springing use arises, for example, when property is given to Johnson to the use of Gilbert when Gilbert marries; Gilbert has a springing use that vests in him when he marries. A shifting use, by contrast, might arise when property is given to Johnson to the use of Gilbert, but then to Bradley when Foster pays $1,000 to Burke; Bradley has a shifting use that arises when Foster makes the specified payment. In G.B., secondary use is a variant of shifting use, although all these terms are of historical interest only there. See use.

spurious; specious. Spurious is used in reference to things, and specious arguments or reasoning. Spurious = not genuine. Specious = having superficial appeal but false. E.g., "Many specious reasons for practices revolting to our ideas of justice may be found in old books."

ss. A. As Mysterious Legal Abbreviation. The sign ss. is an abbreviation that often appears on the top of the first page of an affidavit or acknowledgment—e.g.:

> District of Columbia, ss.:
> John Rand, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has read the foregoing bill by him subscribed and knows the contents . . .
> Eugene A. Jones. Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 39 (1916).

Many possible etymologies have been suggested for this mysterious abbreviation. One is that it signifies scilicet (= namely, to wit), which is usually abbreviated sc. or scil. Another is that ss. represents "[t]he two gold letters at the ends of the chain of office or 'collar' worn by the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench . . . ." Max Radin, Law Dictionary 327 (1955). Mellinkoff suggests that the precise etymology is unknown: "Lawyers have been using ss for nine hundred years and still are not sure what it means." David Mellinkoff, The Language of the Law 296 (1963).

In fact, though, it is a flourish deriving from the Year Books—an equivalent of the paragraph mark: "¶." Hence Lord Hardwicke's statement that ss. is nothing more than a division mark. See Jodderrell v. Cowell, 95 Eng. Rep. 222, 222 (K.B. 1737) ("[T]he word ss. I verily believe, was not originally meant to the county, but only a denotation of each section or paragraph in the record"). An early formbook writer incorporated it into his forms, and ever since it has been mindlessly perpetuated by one generation after another.

American lawyers have puzzled over its meaning and have even wasted time litigating whether it is necessary in affidavits. See, e.g., Sway v. Shrader, 95 N.W. 690, 691 (Neb. 1903). There are no judicious uses of this LEGALISM.

B. As an Equivalent of "§§." In BrE, ss. frequently means "sections"—e.g.: "Forgery Act 1913 ss. 8(2)." Citation in Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 389 n.4 (1978)./ "Under the Statute of Frauds, 1667, ss. 1, 2, it was enacted that leases . . . had to be in writing." L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 317 (2d ed. 1979).

stabilize; stabilify; stabilitate. The second and third are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

stadium. Several dictionaries seem to prefer stadia as the plural form, but stadiums is the more natural and the more usual form, even in formal legal writing of several generations ago.

stagflation. See MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITIES.

stakeholder; stockholder. These terms are not to be confused. Stakeholder, missed by the OED but included in W2 and W3, originally meant "the holder of a stake or wager," a meaning it still carries. But in modern American legal writing it usually denotes one who holds property, the right or possession of which is disputed between two other parties (as in an interpleader action).

Stockholder = (1) a shareholder in a corporation; or (2) one who is a proprietor of stock in the public funds or the funds of a joint-stock company (OED). Sense (1) is labeled an Americanism in the OED, although the COD definition suggests that this sense is now current in BrE. Sense (2) is largely confined to BrE. See shareholder.

stale, in law, means "(of a claim, demand, or offer) having lain dormant for too long to be enforceable." The term provides one of the law's more picturesque METAPHORS—e.g.: "[I]t [may be] clear to the offeree that there has been such a long delay in the transmission of the offer as to make it obvious to the offeree that the offer was stale when it reached him." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 16 (8th ed. 1991).

stanch. See staunch.

stand, n., is an AmE shortening of witness stand—e.g.: "As to any differences among themselves these clerical proficients might develop on the stand, these could hardly be greater than the direct contradictions exchanged between the remunerated medical experts." Herman Melville, Billy Budd 38 (1891; repr. N.Y., Signet, 1979). In the common idiom, a witness takes the stand after being sworn. See witness-box.

stand, v.i., = to remain good law. E.g., "Amanda Acquisition Corp. . . . claimed that the statute was unconstitutional and that if it were allowed to stand, the company's offer would be doomed." Laurie P. Cohen, Court Upholds State Anti-Takeover Law That Makes Raiders Get Board Approval, Wall St. J., 26 May 1989, at B3.

standard-form contract (= a preprinted contract, often referred to as an adhesion contract) is hyphenated thus. E.g., "Standard-form contracts are also widely used in transactions between businessmen." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 15 (3d ed. 1981).

For more on adhesion contract, see adherence (A).

standards of the industry. See state of the art.

stand down, in BrE, means "to step down" either literally <she stood down from the witness box> or figuratively <Tory supporters asked Margaret Thatcher to stand down before the 1990 election>.

standee. See -EE.

standing; locus standi. These synonymous TERMS OF ART mean "a position from which one may validly make a legal claim or seek to enforce a right or duty." The first is primarily AmE, and the second (a LATINISM) is commonly used in BrE. One is said to have standing when one's arguments on the merits of a case can be considered by an adjudicator. E.g., "The corporate interests have been largely taken care of by highly qualified lawyers acting in individual cases and by Bar Associations proposing procedural reforms that define, for example, the 'aggrieved' persons who have standing to object to agency orders or decisions." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 79–80 (1970)./ "They . . . argue that no individual blind vendor or state agency would have standing because none has alleged a 'concrete, perceptible harm of a real, nonspeculative nature.'" Randolph-Sheppard Vendors v. Weinberger, 795 F.2d 90, 99 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

Joseph Vining's comments on standing show that its history is strikingly similar to that of many other legal NEOLOGISMS:

> The word standing is rather recent in the basic judicial vocabulary and does not appear to have been commonly used until the middle of [the 20th] century No authority that I have found introduces the term with proper explanations or apologies and announces that henceforth standing should be used to describe who may be heard by a judge Nor was there any sudden adoption by tacit consent The word appears here and there, spreading very gradually with no discernible pattern. Judges and lawyers found themselves using the term and did not ask why they did so or where it came from
> Joseph Vining, Legal Identity 55 (1978)

One of the earliest uses of the term occurred in 1877: "The mortgage and bonds under and by virtue of which the appellant claims a standing in court were executed by the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company as a corporation." Wallace v. Loomis, 97 U.S. 146, 154 (1877). See locus standi.

standpoint. See viewpoint.

standstill agreement (= an agreement to preserve the status quo) has become a commonplace phrase in reference to actions by parties involved in a legal dispute. The original standstill agreement, according to the OED, was concluded in 1931 between German and what would become Allied banking and commercial institutions, allowing Germany to postpone short-term credit repayments because of the country's severe economic plight. Shortly afterwards, the word came to be used in other banking situations—e.g.: "At this juncture the creditor banks in Chicago agreed to enter into what they term a 'standstill' agreement, by the terms of which they would refrain from foreclosing on their collateral and from pressing for payment on their loans . . . ." Lincoln Printing Co. v. Middle W. Utils. Co., 6 F. Supp. 663, 667 (N.D. Ill. 1934). Within a couple of decades, however, the phrase had been extended considerably beyond economic and banking contexts—e.g.: "During the course of the September 14 hearing, the parties reached a 'standstill' agreement which had the effect, in part, of amending the prayer for relief." Ramsburg v. American Inv. Co., 231 F.2d 333, 335 (7th Cir. 1956).

Star Chamber. In 16th- and early-17th-century England, the Star Chamber was a special equity court charged with keeping the peace by punishing libels, perjury, jury-packing, contempt of court, and conspiracies to pervert justice in any of the king's courts; it acted on private petition. Unacceptable practices such as compulsory self-accusation, unconscionable searches and seizures, and inquisitorial investigations "were among those intolerable abuses of the Star Chamber, which [was] brought . . . to an end at the hands of the Long Parliament in 1640." Jones v. S.E.C., 298 U.S. 1, 28 (1936).

The origin of the court's name is unclear. Two explanations are current: (1) that the room in which the court sat had a ceiling decorated with gilded stars (camera stellata, chambre d'estoiles)—Coke's view (see 4 Inst. 66); or (2) that Jewish merchants' contracts, known as starra, were kept in the chamber in which the court conducted its work. Formerly, some writers conjectured that the name derived from OE. steoran "to steer or govern"; or from its punishing of cozenage, known as crimen stellionatus.

Today, the phrase Star Chamber proceeding usu. refers to an unfair judicial proceeding in which the outcome is predetermined.

stare decisis (L. "to stand by things decided") = the doctrine of precedent, under which it is necessary to follow earlier judicial decisions when the same points arise again in litigation. The full phrase is stare decisis et quieta non movere (= to stand by things decided and not disturb settled points). See precedent (A).

Though a verb phrase in Latin, the phrase is used as a noun phrase in English—e.g.: "The courts are actually returning more and more to a stare decisis of principles [that] prevailed during the earlier centuries of the law's history, as distinguished from a narrow stare decisis based on mere decisions." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity iii (1930)./ "Judicial precedent has some persuasive effect almost everywhere because stare decisis (keep to what has been decided previously) is a maxim of practically universal application." Rupert Cross & J.W. Harris, Precedent in English Law 3 (4th ed. 1991).

In AmE, the phrase has even come to be used commonly as an adjectival phrase—e.g.: "The stare decisis effect [read precedential effect] of the judgment obtained by the plaintiff established as a matter of law the right of a discernible class of persons to collect upon similar claims." On the question whether to hyphenate such an adjectival use, see PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (B)

The phrase is pronounced /stahr-ee/ or /stair-ee-də-si-sis/. As one might expect, judges are better at pronouncing the phrase than senators are: "One unresolved issue appeared to be the pronunciation for 'stare decisis.' Clarence Thomas pronounced 'stare' like the word for a clear night—'starry'—while Sen. Orrin Hatch said 'stairay' and Sen. Patrick Leahy, 'star-ay.'" Legal Lexicon, A.B.A. J., Aug. 1993, at 44.

start. See begin (B) & commence.

state, n., = (in international law) an institutional system of relations that people within a territory establish among themselves to secure order. Brierly warns that state "should not be confused with the whole community of persons living on its territory; it is only one among a multitude of other institutions, such as churches and corporations, [that] a community establishes for securing different objects, though obviously it is one of tremendous importance . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 118 (5th ed. 1955).

Within a legal system, as in the U.S., state may denote an institution of self-government (e.g., Vermont) within a larger entity (the United States), which can also be called a state. Many countries such as Canada have other political subdivisions, such as provinces; others, like England, have counties. The name chosen generally reflects the extent of the smaller entity's powers—states having more power than provinces, and provinces more power than counties; but there are no invariable rules on this point.

state action (= governmental feasance) is a phrase used in international as well as in constitutional law. E.g., "What the Crown does to foreigners by its agents is state action . . . beyond the scope of domestic jurisdiction." Johnstone v. Pedlar, 2 A.C. 262, 290 (1921) (per Lord Sumner).

In constitutional law, state action often appears in the context of civil rights and denotes some type of illegal governmental intrusion into a person's life. E.g., "If the State requires a certain electoral procedure, prescribes a general election ballot made up of party nominees so chosen and limits the choice of the electorate in general elections for state offices, practically speaking, to those whose names appear on such a ballot, it endorses, adopts and enforces the discrimination against Negroes . . . . This is state action within the meaning of the Fifteenth Amendment." Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 664 (1944). In the wake of Smith, the U.S. Supreme Court broadened the concept of state action to strike down segregation laws under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

stated. In the phrase account stated, the word stated means "settled, closed, at an end." E.g., "Norell Forest Products (Norell) sued H & S Lumber Company (H & S) on an account stated." Norell Forest Prods. v. H & S Lumber Co., 417 S.E.2d 96, 98 (S.C. Ct. App. 1992). The phrase is sometimes written stated account.

stated otherwise is a pompous version of in other words. E.g., "Stated otherwise [read In other words], the deduction will invariably affect the taxpayer's liability." Cf. to put it another way.

statehouse (= a state capitol) is an Americanism dating from the 17th century.

statement. Though to a nonlawyer the usage is counterintuitive, the word statement in law commonly includes expressive nonverbal behavior as well as the spoken word. For example, Rule 801(a) of the Federal Rules of Evidence defines statement as either "(1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion."

statement of claim is the modern BrE phrase for the plaintiff's first pleading. Formerly, at common law, it was called a declaration. (See declaration.) In the U.S., it is usu. called either a complaint or a petition, and in Scotland a summons or initial writ.

statement of facts. See record (B) & report of proceedings.

state of the art, n.; state-of-the-art, adj. These VOGUE WORDS illustrate the interests of a fast-changing society with rapidly produced technological innovations <state-of-the-art products>. For the moment, they are tainted by association with the cant of salespeople.

Notably, state of the art is distinguishable from standards of the industry because the former refers to that which the most advanced technology allows, as opposed to that which is in common use within an industry. See Cantu v. John Deere Co., 603 P.2d 839, 840 (Wash. Ct. App. 1979) (saying, "We believe the two phrases are not synonymous . . . .").

state's evidence, to turn. See turn state's evidence.

states' rights (= those rights and powers not delegated to the federal government by the U.S. Constitution nor prohibited by it for the states to exercise) is so punctuated, unless used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE calling for a hyphen .

The agent noun is states'-righter—e.g.: "In recent times the situation has been the precise reverse, so that solid citizens are not states'-righters and liberals put greater faith in the federal government, even under conservative auspices." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 77 (1955).

stati. See status (B).

stationary; stationery. The former is the adjective ("remaining in one place"), the latter the noun ("materials for writing on or with").

statistic (= a single term or datum in a statistical compilation) is a BACK-FORMATION from statistics dating from the late 19th century. Today its correctness is beyond challenge. E.g., "When this statistic is considered with the massive discovery involved, and with the fact that few of the large class-action cases are ever tried, the real impact of complex litigation is seen."

statu quo, in. See in statu quo.

status. A. Legal Sense. Status = a summation of or basis for the legal grounds of various capacities or incapacities, for example, one's age, mental state, and the like. "Status is . . . belonging to a particular class of persons to all of whom the law assigns particular legal powers, capacities, liabilities or incapacities . . . ." 1 David M. Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law 198 (3d ed. 1982). Generally speaking, as statuses have been assimilated in Anglo-American law, status has dwindled in interest and importance as a legal topic. See D. Neil MacCormick, "General Legal Concepts," in 11 The Laws of Scotland: Stair Memorial Encyclopedia ¶ 1070, at 389 (1990).

B. Plural. Status forms the plural statuses (or, in Latin, status), not stati: "But this does not militate against the defendants' essential argument that while the jurors come from all socio-economic stati [read statuses], they represent, on the whole, the higher echelons of the community as opposed to the lower." U.S. v. Duke, 263 F.

Supp. 828, 833–34 (S.D. Ind. 1967). See HYPERCORRECTION (A).

status quo; status quo ante; status in quo. Status quo means "the state of affairs at present"; hence current status quo is a REDUNDANCY. (See in statu quo.) Status quo ante (= the state of affairs at a previous time) is a common and useful LATINISM in contexts involving torts or contracts. E.g., "The first and most obvious result of rescinding a contract is that, so far as is possible, the status quo ante must be restored . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 299 (3d ed. 1981)./ "[A] plaintiff's right to be restored to the status quo ante has always to be weighed against the duty to do what is reasonable to mitigate the cost to the defendant." R.W.M. Dias & B.S. Markesinis, Tort Law 428 (1984).

Status quo in the sense "the original condition" (as opposed to "the present condition") is a LEGALISM to be avoided, for lawyers as well as nonlawyers are likely to misunderstand the import. Status in quo is an archaic variant of status quo.

statutable. See statutory.

statute, in AmE, refers to a legislative act that the state gives the force of law. E.g., "American courts interpret the usual wording of the abortion statutes, quite remarkably, to prohibit the removal of a dead fetus from the mother." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 191 (1957; repr. 1972).

In BrE, however, statute bears a broader meaning: "It is common in popular and even, to some extent, in legal language to treat 'statute' and 'Act of Parliament' as equivalent terms. That is quite incorrect. All Acts of Parliament are statutes; but [not] all statutes are . . . Acts of Parliament . . . ." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 40 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967). How can that be? In G.B., statutory instruments—government orders akin to what in the U.S. are called "administrative regulations" and "executive orders"—are considered statutes. See statutory instrument.

statute book is two words—unhyphenated.

STATUTE DRAFTING. A. Generally. Perhaps the most sensible approach to the broad principles of drafting statutes are those of Montesquieu, who discussed the subject in L'Esprit des Lois (39, ch. 16):

- The style should be both concise and simple: whatever is grandiose or rhetorical should be omitted as distracting surplusage. See PLAIN LANGUAGE
- The words chosen should be, as nearly as possible, absolute—not relative—so as to minimize differences of opinion.
- Statutes should be confined to the real and the actual, avoiding the metaphorical or hypothetical.
- They should not be subtle, but instead comprehensible to the average person.
- They should not confuse the main issue with exceptions, limitations, and modifications, unless such devices are absolutely necessary.
- They should not be argumentative: they should not give detailed reasons for their bases. (This is not to criticize general-purpose clauses, which are quite valuable.)
- They should be maturely considered and practically useful and should not shock the public sense of reason and justice.

Those goals are extraordinarily difficult to attain, and few have succeeded in attaining them. Samuel Williston (1861–1963), the author of many Uniform Acts approved by the Commissioners of Uniform State Laws between 1905 and 1920, was among those few: "Williston was one of the best statutory draftsmen who has ever worked at that mysterious art; he was the most ingenious system-builder in the history of our jurisprudence; he wrote with lucidity and grace." Grant Gilmore, The Ages of American Law 134 n.12 (1977) But Williston was the rare exception.

In fact, complaints about mediocre to horrible statutory drafting have echoed through the decades and centuries—e.g.:

- In 1857, Lord Campbell criticized "an ill-penned enactment, like too many others, putting Judges in the embarrassing situation of being bound to make sense out of nonsense, and to reconcile what is irreconcilable." Fell v. Burchett, (1857) 7 E. & B. 537, 539.
- "So unintelligible is the phraseology of some statutes that suggestions have been made that draftsmen, like the Delphic Oracle, sometimes aim deliberately at obscurity, as a disingenuous means of passing a Bill quickly through Parliament." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 486 (7th ed. 1964).
- "Parliament has been industrious in multiplying offences, very inartistically drawn, but it is slow to remedy clear absurdities and deficiencies in the law as they come to light . . . ." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 8 (1978).
- "For over a century and a half judges have railed against incomprehensible drafting, only to be met with the bland reply that the judges are themselves to blame. The existing draftsmen are not only established but entrenched.

No other word than pathetic can describe Lord Gardiner's hope in 1971 to 'encourage' them to be simpler . . . ." J.A. Clarence Smith, Legislative Drafting: English and Continental, 1980 Statute L. Rev. 14, 22.

- "[T]he ultimate style and shape of much legislation is today increasingly unsatisfactory. Many statutes emerge from the parliamentary process obscure, turgid, and quite literally unintelligible without a guide or commentary." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 127–28 (1983).
- "The Statute Law Society criticized the language of the statutes as: 'legalistic, often obscure and circumlocutious, requiring a certain type of expertise in order to gauge its meaning. Sentences are long and involved, the grammar is obscure, and archaisms, legally meaningless words and phrases, tortuous language, the preference for the double negative over the single positive, abound.'" Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 22 (2d ed. 1985) (quoting the Report of the Renton Committee entitled Preparation of Legislation).

Perhaps the current state of affairs results mostly from the fact that "statutory drafting . . . [is] an insufficiently appreciated art." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 12 (1976). That holds as true in the U.S. as it does in Great Britain. Only someone with experience and wisdom recognizes that "[t]here is no more important, exciting, and intellectually rewarding work for a lawyer than that of drafting legislation." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 214 (11th ed. 1982). The accomplished writer who tries legislative drafting will find that it taxes one's literary abilities as much as any other type of writing.

B. Choice of Words. The simplest, most concise English is the best for legislation: "The draftsman should bear in mind that his Act is supposed to be read by the plain man. In any case he may be sure that if he finds he can express his meaning in simple words all is going well with his draft, while if he finds himself driven to complicated expressions composed of long words it is a sign that he is getting lost and he should reconsider the form of the section." Alison Russell, Legislative Drafting and Forms 12 (4th ed. 1938). See PLAIN LANGUAGE (C)

C. Tenses Generally. In an important early work on the writing of statutes, George Coode laid down for the first time some important rules of drafting that have formed the basis for modern principles of drafting—and have been routinely ignored in practice. See George Coode, On Legislative Expression (1842).

The fundamental mode of expression in statutes, as worked out by Coode, is to recite facts concurrent with the statute's operation as if they were present facts, and facts precedent to the statute's operation as if they were past facts.

In elaboration of that deceptively simple statement, what follows is a modernization of Coode's precepts on the use of tenses in statutes, and especially the use of shall and may. (This adaptation paraphrases Coode as quoted in E.A. Driedger's The Composition of Legislation, 225–28 [1957].)

Coode recognized that much of the trouble in statute drafting originates in the use of shall. Proscriptions that begin "No person shall . . ." are inferior to those that begin "No person may . . ." because shall can be understood in two senses: simple futurity (i.e., will) and obligation (i.e., must). See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (A).

The drafter should not attempt to render every action referred to in a statute in a future tense. Some drafters erroneously assume that the words shall and shall not put the enacting verb into a future tense. Yet, in commanding, as in a statute that mandates a certain action, shall is modal rather than temporal. Thus it denotes compulsion—the obligation to act—not a prophecy that the person will or will not at some future time perform some act. The commandment "Thou shalt not murder" is not a prediction; it is obligatory in the present tense, continuously through all the time of the law's operation.

Likewise, when the verb may is used, the expression is not of a future possibility; instead, it is of permission and authority. The statement, "The chair may canvass committee members," means that the chair is authorized to canvass the committee members.

Yet, because the legal action referred to in a statute is sometimes—when shall is used—supposed to be in the future tense, drafters often attempt (for the sake of consistency) to express the circumstances that are required to precede the operation of the statute (i.e., all conditions) in the future or future perfect tenses. Thus, in poor drafting language, one frequently finds the following expressions:

- If any person shall give [read gives] notice, he may appeal . . . .
- If the commissioners shall instruct [read instruct] by any order . . . .
- All elections shall [read must] hereafter, so far as the commissioners shall direct [read direct] . . . .
- In case any person shall willfully neglect or disobey [read willfully neglects or disobeys] . . . .
- When such notice shall have been published [read is published] . . . .

• If any balance shall have been found [read is found] to be due . . . .

The fear that gives rise to this use of shall is that, if the condition for operation of the statute were expressed in the present tense (i.e., when any person is aggrieved), the law would be contemporaneous and would operate only on conditions that are met at the moment when the statute is enacted. Likewise, some drafters wrongly assume that if a statute were expressed in the present-perfect tense (i.e., when any person has been convicted), the law would be retrospective and would apply only to convictions that took place before the act was passed.

These apprehensions are mistaken. An elementary rule of statutory construction is that past tenses never give retrospective effect to a statute unless the intention for retrospectivity is clearly and distinctly framed in words to that effect. Any number of statutes are written in the present or present-perfect tense but still are interpreted prospectively only.

If the law is regarded, while it remains in force, as constantly speaking, then a simple two-part rule will serve to guide those who draft statutes:

1. Use the present tense to express all facts and conditions required to be concurrent with the operation of the legal action. E.g., "If by reason of the largeness of parishes the inhabitants cannot reap the benefits of this Act, two or more overseers must be chosen." (The first clause in this conditional sentence is in the present tense; the main clause that follows contains obligatory language still in the present tense.) See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (A) & (D).
2. Use the present perfect tense to express all facts and conditions required as precedents to the legal action. E.g., "When the justices of the peace of any county assembled at quarter sessions have agreed that the ordinary peace officers are not sufficient to preserve the peace, the justices may appoint a chief constable." (The left-branching dependent clauses contain verbs in the past perfect [assembled, have agreed] to indicate necessary precedent conditions that now exist [are] and thus make legal action possible; the main clause is in the present [permissive] tense to indicate the specific legal action that is open to the justices of the peace.)

D. Each, any, all, no (etc.). See ADJECTIVES (G). statute law. See statutory law.

statute-making is hyphenated thus.

statute of frauds. A. Senses. In 1677, Lord Nottingham (1621–1682) drafted the original Statute of Frauds, the best known act prescribing written formalities for some contracts. (In references to that original act, the words should have initial capitals.) It declared that certain contracts would be judicially unenforceable (but not void) if not committed to writing. Most Anglo-American jurisdictions have statutes modeled in some way on the original.

In BrE, the phrase statute of frauds also sometimes refers to an act affording relief against debtors who transfer assets to defraud or foil creditors.

B. Within (or without) the statute of frauds. These idioms, though fairly common, confuse even veteran lawyers. Within the statute of frauds = violative of the statute of frauds, i.e., within its coverage. E.g., "Oral promises to a creditor to answer for the debt or default of another are not within the statute of frauds where the promisor is already otherwise obligated, irrespective of his promise, to perform such duty." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 128 (1950). Without the statute of frauds = not violative of the statute.

statute of limitation(s) – a statute that establishes a time limit for suing or for prosecuting a crime. Either statute of limitations or statutes of limitation is idiomatic and correct. Statute of limitations is often made into the elliptical form limitations: "The court ruled that limitations were tolled for all 809 workers during the time that elapsed between the date suit was filed and the date the trial court denied class certification." (Cf. the English quotation under run.) See repose, laches (C) & limitation. See also time-bar & toll.

statute of repose. See repose.

statutorial. See statutory (A). statutorification (= the excessive reliance upon legislation to cure society's ills) is a NEOLOGISM invented by Guido Calabresi, the dean of Yale Law School in the 1980s and 1990s. It is an ugly word for an ugly process—e.g.: "The 'statutorification' of American law is not the only reason for these varied proposals and events." Guido Calabresi, A Common Law for the Age of Statutes 1 (1982)./ "Guido Calabresi has written a provocative book about the 'statutorification' of American law, a neologism intended to be as ugly as the condition it describes." Dan Rosen, A Common Law for the Ages of Intellectual Property, 38 U. Miami L. Rev. 769, 770 (1984).

statutorily, not statutorally, is the correct adverbial form: "Thereafter McGlothin continued to wear a headdress, but only when she felt like it, until her dismissal for insubordination statutorally [read statutorily] defined as 'misconduct.'" Mississippi Employment Sec. Comm'n v. McGlothin, 556 So. 2d 324, 332 (Miss. 1990).

statutory. A. And statutorial. Statutory = (1) of or relating to legislation <statutory construction>; (2) legislatively created <the law of patents is purely statutory>; or (3) conformable to a statute .

Statutorial is a NEEDLESS VARIANT not recognized in the dictionaries. E.g., "The hardship driving statutorial [read statutory] procedure, as interpreted in Munson, leaves a hole literally [q.v.] wide enough to drive any motorized vehicle through, calling for swift action by the General Assembly." Burns v. Director of Revenue, 784 S.W.2d 918, 919 (Mo. Ct. App. 1990).

The adverb statutorily is not infrequently rendered, by mistake, statutorially or statutorally. See statutorily.

B. And statutable. Statutable = (1) prescribed, authorized, or permitted by statute; (2) conformed to statutory requirements for quality, size, or amount; or (3) (of an offense) legally punishable (OED). Thus, statutable overlaps to a significant degree with the more usual word, statutory. In the 19th-century specimen that follows, statutable is used in a context in which statutory would inevitably appear today: "But there are express statuteable provisions, which directly apply to the present case." Gelston v. Hoyt, 16 U.S. (3 Wheat.) 246, 311 (1818). As in the preceding quotation, the word has occasionally been spelled statuteable, but that spelling is inferior. See MUTE E.

statutory charge. Copperud has observed that in lay parlance statutory rape, a precise term, has been stretched into phrases such as statutory charge or statutory offense. See Roy Copperud, American Usage and Style 363 (1980). These phrases are sometimes considered illogical, inasmuch as criminal offenses or charges are invariably statutorily defined or codified. But in some jurisdictions, such as Scotland, major crimes such as murder and theft are still defined by the common law only. So the phrase statutory charge may be quite sound, if it is used to dispel the possibility that one is referring to a common-law crime.

statutory construction. See interpretation.

statutory enactment is a REDUNDANCY for statute, and the word enactment is used loosely in this phrase. E.g., "This article is designed to cover general principles relating to statutory enactments [read statutes]." See enactment. Cf. statutory legislation.

statutory instrument, in BrE, refers to a government order similar to an executive order or agency regulation in the U.S. E.g., "The most important kind of legislation is the Act of Parliament (otherwise called a statute), though nowadays what is called delegated legislation, like the many government orders generally known as statutory instruments, has come to be of great importance as well." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 24 (11th ed. 1982). See statute. Cf. instrument.

statutory law; statute law. Both forms appear in AmE, but the former is the more common. In BrE, statute law (preferably unhyphenated except as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE) is the predominant form.

In some contexts, the phrases are not entirely synonymous. Statute law has two meanings: (1) "a law contained in a statute"; or (2) "the system of law and body of principles laid down in statutes, as distinct from the common law." Statutory law shares sense (2) with statute law but not sense (1).

statutory legislation is a REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "The distinction between the content of constitutional law and that of ordinary statutory legislation [read legislation] is largely one of degree and in the States of the American Union this distinction is fast disappearing." James W. Garner, "Law, Constitutional," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 96–100 [page so numbered], 101 (1953)./ "In my view, the plain meaning of 'manslaughter' as used in early statutory legislation [read statutes or legislation] did not contemplate the offense of 'involuntary manslaughter' . . . ." Morris v. U.S., 648 A.2d 958, 964 (D.C. Ct. App. 1994) (Mack, J., dissenting). Cf. statutory enactment.

statutory rape (= sexual intercourse with a person below the age of consent, regardless of whether it occurs against his or her will) is an Americanism that originated in the 19th century. Originally, statutory-rape laws applied only to female victims, but today the great majority of American states have sex-neutral legislation dealing with this offense. The term is a popular one, not a statutory one. See rape.

staunch; stanch. Staunch is preferable as the adjective ("trustworthy, loyal"), stanch as the verb ("to restrain the flow of [usu. blood]").

stay, n. & v.t. In law, stay means either (1) "postponement" or (2) "the order suspending a judicial proceeding or the judgment resulting from that proceeding" <stay of the mandate> <the court's stay of execution>.

Although the verb to stay is usually intransitive in lay contexts <he stayed awhile>, it is transitive in its legal senses: (1) to postpone, usu. until the court determines a contested issue <to stay the mandate>; or (2) to halt <to stay waste>. E.g., (Sense 1) "Filing of the petition under Chapter 11 automatically stayed the proposed sale to enforce the maritime lien."/ (Sense 2) "An injunction to stay waste may be granted in favor of one who is entitled to a contingent or executory estate of inheritance." See continue.

stayable (= capable of being legally postponed or halted) is a legal NEOLOGISM not recorded in the OED, W3, or most other dictionaries. E.g., "[J]udgments in actions for injunctions . . . are not stayable as of right." 9 James Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice par. 208.04, at 8-11 (1987).

stay law (= a statute that suspends execution or some other legal procedure) is a 19th-century Americanism. E.g., "No advantage to be taken of stay laws or injunctions, & c." Coe v. Pennock, 5 F. Cas. 1172, 1172 (C.C.N.D. Ohio 1857) (No. 2,942)./ "I believe it was once held that a stay-law passed after a note was given could not affect that debt . . . ; but where the law is passed before the debt is created, a stay-law is good in every State." 2 Cong. Rec. 1,226 (5 Feb. 1874) (statement of Sen. Oliver P. Morton).

stay of execution = the suspending of the operation of a court's judgment or order. In lay parlance, the phrase usu. appears in reference to a death sentence, but not in legal parlance.

In the following example, Judge Learned Hand employed a variation on the phrase: "[T]he judge sentenced him to not less than five years nor more than ten, execution to be stayed, and the defendant to be placed on probation . . . ." Repouille v. U.S., 165 F.2d 152, 153 (2d Cir. 1947).

ste(a)dfast. The preferred spelling is steadfast.

steal has a narrow and a broad sense. It may mean (narrowly) "to obtain by larceny" or (broadly) "to obtain by any one of the three principal forms of theft—embezzlement, false pretenses, or larceny. See rob & embezzle.

steamroll(er), v.t. The longer form of this verb is the preferred, except (oddly) in the -ing participle. E.g., "Theoretically, the inquisition model will produce more information than one premised upon heavy incentives to advance one's position and can prevent a wealthier opponent from steamrolling his adversary."

stedfast. See ste(a)dfast.

stereotypic(al). The longer form is preferred in figurative senses. E.g., "In City of Thomas, the Ninth Circuit recognized that constitutional concerns are heightened by any classification scheme singling out former mental patients for differential treatment because of the possibility that the scheme will implement inaccurate stereotypic [read stereotypical] fears about former mental patients." Stereotypic is the better form for the narrow sense "of or produced by stereotypy (the process of printing from stereotype plates)."

sterility; impotence. The first refers to the inability to procreate, the second to the inability to copulate.

stigma. Pl. -mas, -mata. As with many other such words, the English plural (-mas) is preferable. See PLURALS (A). stimulus. Pl. -li. Unlike stigma, this word does not make a native-English plural. See PLURALS (A).

stipe is English slang for a stipendiary magistrate (= a salaried magistrate who is a lawyer appointed by the Lord Chancellor to hear small claims and minor criminal cases such as those heard by [unsalaried] justices of the peace).

stipital. See stirpital.

stipulate = (1) (of an agreement) to specify (something) as an essential part of the contract; (2) (of a party to an agreement) to require or insist upon (something) as an essential condition; or (3) to make express demand for something as a condition of an agreement.

This verb belongs to the language of contracts, and is not felicitously transported into contexts involving statutes, where it becomes a substitute for provide. E.g., "The statute stipulates [read provides] that any cause of action under this subsection must be brought before the court within two years."/ "The original statute stipulated [read provided] that parents must leave a portion of their wealth to their progeny . . . ." Frances Marcus, Does Napoleonic Law Have Future in Louisiana? N.Y. Times, 1 Dec. 1989, at 27.

Nor has the verb traditionally meant "(of counsel) to reach an agreement about business before a court," although this extension of contractual sense is not uncommon in American trial practice: "The relevant facts are stipulated." U.S. v. National Bank of Commerce, 472 U.S. 713, 715 (1985)./ "The district court adopted a plan, stipulated to by the Ector County school district and by the United States but forcefully objected to by the plaintiff-intervenors."/ "This organization appeals the district court's adoption of the stipulated plan."

stipulative; stipulatory; stipulational. The first two are distinct. Stipulative = that stipulates or specifies as an essential condition . Stipulatory = of or relating to (a) stipulation .

Stipulational is a late 20th-century AmE NEOLOGISM—and it is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of stipulatory: "The facts which were thus given stipulational [read stipulatory] establishment were that the injury to plaintiff had occurred at the Roberts Theater . . . ." Chenette v. Trustees of Iowa College, 431 F.2d 49, 51 (8th Cir. 1970).

stirpital; stipital. The preferred adjectival form of stirps (= branch of a family), used in reference to a per stirpes distribution, is stirpital. Black's (4th & 5th eds.) listed only stipital as the correct form, but changed to stirpital in the 6th edition (1990). W3 defines stipital as "of or relating to the stipes," stipes being a betanical or zoological term meaning "peduncle" or, less commonly, "stirps." W3 does not, however, include stirpital. And Words and Phrases contains stirpital but not stipital. The OED records stirpital, noting that it is ill-formed and should be stirpal if properly Latinized, and dates it from 1886 with the following quotation: "A division of the proceeds of sale per stirpes is more in accordance than a division per capita with the original stirpital division of the income." The OED does not contain stipital.

Stirpital is by far the more prevalent word—e.g.: "Counsel for the defendant Nolan, as an alternative claim, suggest the application of the doctrine of stirpital survivorship . . . ." State Bank & Trust Co. v. Nolan, 130 A. 483, 489 (Conn. 1925)./ "Some courts, on the other hand, take a position contrary, or at least in opposition, to the foregoing . . . stirpital distribution." 57 Am. Jur. Wills § 1292 (1948)./ "This analysis does not result in a consistently stirpital distribution of the settled fund as one might have expected." Re Drummond's Settlement, [1988] 1 All E.R. 449, 453 (1987).

Though it has the approval of some dictionaries, stipital is rarely encountered—e.g.: "Considering the circumstances it may be inferred that it would have been impracticable for the testator to have designated his half brothers as stipital progenitors . . . ." Theopold v. Sears, 258 N.E.2d 559, 561 (Mass. 1970).

With all due respect to Black's and W3, stirpital must be deemed better than stipital as the adjective of per stirpes. Most lawyers know the term per stirpes and understand stirpital if they hear or read it; stipital is another matter. And if a legal term is obscure to lawyers, what hope is there for the nonlawyer?

Then again, in most contexts the phrase per stirpes might be used where an adjective is called for <per stirpes distribution>. The phrase per stirpital, however, is a needless hybrid: In Mercantile Trust Co. v. Davis, 522 S.W.2d 798 (Mo. 1975) (en banc), the court quotes a lower court as having used per stirpital and attaches sic to the phrase (at 803), and then uses the phrase itself (at 805): "[T]his court reversed and ordered a per stirpital [read per stirpes] distribution to be made . . ."/ "The Uniform Probate Code § 2-106 requires per capita distribution among surviving heirs in the nearest degree with per stirpital [read per stirpes] distribution among those entitled to take but who are in a more remote degree."

stock; shares. Stock = (1) the capital or principal fund raised by a corporation through subscribers' contributions or the sale of shares; (2) the proportional part of this capital credited to an individual shareholder and represented by the number of units he or she owns; or (3) the goods that a merchant has on hand.

Whereas stock is a mass noun, shares is a count noun closely related to sense (2) of stock. Shares = the units of capital that represent an ownership interest in a corporation or in its equity. See COUNT NOUNS AND MASS NOUNS.

stockholder. See shareholder & stakeholder.

stole, took, and carried away. The traditional phrasing of a larceny charge, these words are "clearly an old form derived from the simplest type of stealing, and [were] made the basis of the theory that larceny is a violation of possession." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 448 (5th ed. 1956). The phrase carried away met the requirement of alleging that an asportation had taken place. See asportation.

stone, etched in. This is a SET PHRASE. Variants such as carved in stone, cast in concrete, cast in cement, and the illogical cast in stone ought to be avoided.

stop-and-frisk rule = the American constitutional doctrine (announced in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)) that a police officer may, with neither a warrant nor probable cause, stop and search a person for concealed weapons. The PHRASAL ADJECTIVE should be hyphenated whatever the noun may be: stop-and-frisk law, stop-and-frisk doctrine, etc.

straitjacket; straightjacket. Straightjacket is a common error for straitjacket—e.g.: "Therefore no one should be able to put him in a straightjacket [read straitjacket] as to his method . . . ." Redevelopment Agency v. Mitsui Inv., Inc., 522 P.2d 1370, 1373 (Utah 1974)./ "[W]e do not wish to put a straightjacket [read straitjacket] on the creative development of new forms of alternative dispute resolution . . . ." Annapolis Professional Firefighters v. City of Annapolis, 642 A.2d 889, 895 n.6 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1994).

straitlaced (= prudish, rigidly narrow in moral matters) referred originally, in the 16th century, to a tightly laced corset—strait meaning "narrow" or "closely fitting." Over time, writers have forgotten the etymology and have confused strait with straight. Hence the erroneous form straight-laced—e.g.:

- "In former days, a bootlegger would much rather trust his fate to a straightlaced [read straitlaced] prohibitionist minister than to a former saloonkeeper." Local 36, Int'l Fishermen & Allied Workers v. U.S., 177 F.2d 320, 341 (9th Cir. 1949).
- "The standards of 'the Block' (an area in Baltimore in which there are a number of shops [that] deal with pornographic materials) are not the standards to be applied in this case, any more than the standards of the most straight-laced [read straitlaced] persons." U.S. v. Womack, 509 F.2d 368, 380 (D.C. Cir. 1972).
- "The court finds that the plaintiff is 'straight-laced' [read straitlaced] and professional in her work." Fox v. Ravinia Club, Inc., 761 F. Supp. 797, 799 (N.D. Ga. 1991).
- "Frankfort told [the plaintiff] not to tell Howard Moore, the Executive Vice President . . . of Purchasing, as he was very straight-laced [read straitlaced] and a family man . . . ." T.L. v. Toys 'R' Us, Inc., 605 A.2d 1125, 1128 (N.J. Super. Ct. 1992).

stranger, in law, means (1) "one not a privy or party to an act" ; or (2) "one not standing toward another in some relation implied in the context" <the trustee was dealing with a stranger>.

stratagem. So spelled—but strategem, on the analogy of strategy, is a common misspelling. Though etymologically related, the words stratagem and strategy came into English by different routes, and their spellings diverged merely as a matter of long-standing convention.

stratum. Although the Latin plural strata is thoroughly established, some writers ill-advisedly experiment with an anglicized plural—e.g.: "They say nothing concerning depths, levels or stratums [read strata]." Rogers v. Westhoma Oil Co., 291 F.2d 726, 732 (10th Cir. 1961) (Bratton, J., dissenting). See PLURALS (A).

straw man, lit. "a scarecrow made of straw," has come to mean primarily a fictitious person—always conveniently weak or flawed—used as a seeming adversary in an argument. A straw-man argument is easily overcome by the advocate who invents it as a foil to his or her own argument. See SEXISM (B).

stray. See estray & waifs and (e)strays.

stricken, though common as a past participle in much legal writing, is considered by the better authorities to be inferior to struck. It is an ARCHAISM in all but the adjectival sense . Most modern uses of stricken occur as the ill-advised past participle, though: "Had George been suddenly stricken [read struck] blind instead of having become afflicted with an abdominal illness, the circumstances determining whether the attestation took place in his presence would have been no different."/ "Appellant also argues that the special term of parole authorized by 21 U.S.C. § 841(b)(1)(a) is unconstitutional, and should be stricken [read struck] from his sentence."/ "The government had not produced the criminal record of this witness, and Jennings therefore moved that the witness's testimony be stricken [read struck] and the jury instructed to disregard the testimony of the witness for failure to comply with the court's order."

The participial usage has given rise to the mistaken use of stricken for strike as a present-tense verb. E.g., "The law does not provide a remedy for every ill that may stricken [read strike] a community."/ "When such a tragedy strickens [read strikes] a community, the people must rely upon each other to a degree otherwise never realized." Stricken is sometimes used as a preterit in the guise of an adjective. E.g., "He has not shown that the striking was in fact premised on a determination of the merits of the allegation [that was] stricken [read struck]." See strike (A). strict construction; strict constructionism. Strict construction refers to the literal construction of constitutions, statutes, contracts, and the like. E.g., "Strict construction of a statute is that which refuses to expand the law by implications or equitable considerations, but confines its operation to cases which are clearly within the letter of the statute, as well as within its spirit or reason, not so as to defeat the manifest purpose of the Legislature, but so as to resolve all reasonable doubts against the applicability of the statute to the particular case." William M. Lile et al., Brief Making and the Use of Law Books 343 (3d ed. 1914)./ "And the Constitution alone could not serve to quiet these misgivings, for, as the warring camps soon discovered, it could be cited on either side, depending on whether a 'strict construction' or a 'loose construction' were adopted." Robert G. McCloskey, The American Court 29 (1960).

Strict constructionism denotes the doctrine that courts should interpret statutory and constitutional words strictly according to the letter, without considering their "spirit" or "tenor," lest the judges begin unpredictably to imbue statutes and constitutions with their own biases. E.g., "A judge or scholar who embraces a literalist theory (which is also referred to as 'strict constructionism') relies on an analysis of the words and phrases of the Constitution and an analysis of the overall structure of government as ordained by the concepts of separation of powers and checks and balances in determining what the Constitution sanctions and what it forbids." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 93 (1988).

The phrase has, unfortunately, acquired connotations that may limit its utility in some contexts. As one commentator observes, strict construction has—at least since the 1960s—been used to signal "a proclivity to reach constitutional judgments that will please political conservatives." John H. Ely, Democracy and Distrust 1 n.* (1980). Cf. interpretivism.

One who adheres to the doctrine of strict constructionism is known, not surprisingly, as a strict constructionist. E.g., "It sounds to me like a voice from the past . . . . It is the voice of the strict constructionist." Nothman v. Barnet Council, [1978] 1 W.L.R. 220, 228 (per Denning, M.R.). See original intent.

strictest sense of the word, in the. See WORD-PATRONAGE & stricto sensu.

stricti juris; strictissimi juris. The first phrase means "strictly according to the law, esp. as opposed to equity." The second, a stronger phrase, means "most strictly according to the law." These LATINISMS, as infrequently used in modern contexts, are not easily simplified—e.g.: "But this privilege or lien . . . is a secret one; it may operate to the prejudice of general creditors and purchasers without notice; it is therefore 'stricti juris,' and cannot be extended by construction, analogy, or inference." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 633 (2d ed. 1975).

strict liability; absolute liability; liability without fault. Among these broadly synonymous phrases, meaning "liability that does not depend upon actual negligence or intent to harm," strict liability is the most common term in both AmE and BrE. The second and third phrases were formerly common, and are still occasionally used.

In some contexts, legal writers distinguish between strict and absolute liability. L.B. Curzon, for example, differentiates between the absolute-liability school of thought, which views intent as being irrelevant in tort—a school represented by Holdsworth—and the strict-liability school of thought, which views intent as being minimally relevant in tort—a school represented by Winfield. See L.B. Curzon, English Legal History 254 (2d ed. 1979). But Winfield himself seems to have made no such distinction in sense—only in the choice of words: "Liability, then, we suggest, was never absolute . . . . It remains to add that the description of the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher as an example of absolute liability in tort is unhappy in view of some half dozen exceptions . . . [that] are admitted as qualifications of it. 'Strict liability' seems to be a better term." Percy H. Winfield, The Myth of Absolute Liability, 42 Law Q. Rev. 37, 46, 51 (1926).

strictly construe. See strict construction.

stricto sensu (= in the strict sense) is an unjustifiable LATINISM. E.g., "The category of defendant is not limited to manufacturers stricto sensu [read in the strict sense] either." R.W.M. Dias & B.S. Markesinis, Tort Law 103 (1984). The phrase is often translated into English—a fine practice: "As long as the principles of equity were administered by separate courts, questions of equity jurisdiction were often considered, in the strict sense, jurisdictional."

strict scrutiny = the standard of review that federal courts apply in equal-protection cases involving the constitutionality of governmental classifications that either are based on race or infringe fundamental constitutional rights. To pass muster, a challenged governmental action must be "closely related to a compelling governmental interest." This standard is the toughest of the three levels of scrutiny applied by federal courts—ordinary scrutiny and heightened scrutiny being the least tough and the intermediate levels. Few statutes survive a constitutional challenge judged by the standard of strict scrutiny.

Though this phrase did not emerge as a legal standard of appellate constitutional review until the mid-20th century, in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), it first appeared much earlier, in The Federalist Papers: "And who is there that will either take the trouble or incur the odium of a strict scrutiny into the secret springs of the transaction?" The Federalist No. 70, at 428 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

stride > strode > stridden. The past participle stridden is rare; strode is a variant past-participial form.

strike, vb. A. Senses. This word has more than 100 senses, all told. Among the important law-related senses are these: (1) (v.i.) of an employee or employees, to refuse to continue to work (at a workplace) until certain demands have been met <the employees struck for three days before a settlement was reached>; (2) (v.t.) of an employee or employees, to engage in a strike against <the steelworkers struck the Indiana Harbor Works>; (3) (v.t.) to reject (a veniremember) by a peremptory challenge <the prosecution then struck several blacks, thereby raising a Batson issue>; or (4) (v.t.) to expunge, as from a record <motion to strike>.

B. Strike for strike down. When a court invalidates a statute, it is best to write that the court strikes it down. E.g., "The Rule against Perpetuities normally operates to strike down only the remote contingent interest." Strike as a lone verb has so many other meanings that making it more precise in this context is desirable. "The Court strikes [read strikes down] Alaska's distribution scheme, purporting to rely solely upon the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

C. Inflected Forms. Strike yields struck for both its past tense and its past participle. Stricken is archaic as a past participle, and should be reserved only for adjectival uses ; <stricken with polio>. See stricken.

strike suit, in colloquial legal parlance, refers to a suit filed not because the courts are likely to think it meritorious but because the defendant seems likely to settle favorably regardless of the weakness of the plaintiff's case. E.g., "Of course it is error to deny trial when there is a genuine dispute of facts; but it is just as much error—perhaps more in cases of hardship, or where impetus is given to strike suits—to deny or postpone judgment where the ultimate legal result is clearly indicated." Arnstein v. Porter, 154 F.2d 464, 480 (2d Cir. 1946) (Clark, J., dissenting). Most specifically, strike suits are generally shareholder derivative actions begun "with the hope of winning large attorney's fees or private settlements, and with no intention of benefiting the corporation on behalf of which suit is theoretically brought." Note, Security for Expenses Litigation, 52 Colum. L. Rev. 267, 267 (1952).

strive > strove > striven. The past tense seems to cause the most trouble—e.g.: "Negotiators strived [read strove] to get South African power-sharing talks back on track." Wall St. J., 20 May 1991, at A1.

struck. See stricken.

stultify (now "to make stupid or cause to appear foolish") formerly meant "to attempt to prove one's own mental incapacity." E.g., "Dr. Johnson seemed much surprized [sic] that such a suit was admitted by Scottish law, and observed that in England no man is allowed to stultify himself." (Eng.) The term is now used in British legal writing of a witness who, e.g., casts doubt on his own account of a remark alleged to have been overheard by him by admitting that he was too far away to hear it. See Sidney L. Phipson, The Law of Evidence 394 (8th ed. 1959). See self-stultification.

The word is sometimes misunderstood as being synonymous with the verb to disgrace or dishonor. Nor is it equivalent to retard or emasculate—e.g.: "To hold that the Commission had no alternative in this proceeding but to approve the proposed transaction would be to stultify [read weaken or enfeeble?] the administrative process."

stupefy. So spelled; stupify is a fairly common misspelling—e.g.: "If a man, in order to cause a woman to succumb to his wishes, stupifies [read stupefies] her by drugs . . . , then of course she does not consent . . . ." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 520 (1978). Cf. rarefy.

stupid. See ignorant.

style = (1) in AmE and BrE, a case name <the style of the case>; (2) in BrE, the name or title of a person <royal style and titles>; and (3) in Scots law, a model form or precedent of a deed or pleading (OCL). For non-Scottish equivalents of sense (3), see precedent (E).

STYLE. See LEGAL WRITING STYLE

stylish; stylistic. Stylish = in style, in vogue. Stylistic = having to do with style (of general application); in the appropriate style (of music).

stymie; stymy. This verb, originally a golf term meaning "to obstruct," is best spelled stymie—even in the inflected form stymieing. (See VOWEL CLUSTERS.) E.g., "Commentators had argued that greater attention should be paid to this potential solution to the stymieing of joinder."

suability. Though suable (q.v.) appeared in the 17th century, the noun suability began as an Americanism (first used, as far as documentation reveals, by Chief Justice John Jay in 1798) and has remained so. Jay's 18th-century assessment remains valid today: "Suability and suable are words not in common use, but they concisely and correctly convey the idea annexed to them" (quoted in OED). E.g., Mary Q. Kelly, Workmen's Compensation and Employer Suability, 5 St. Mary's L.J. 818 (1974).

suable. The adjective suable has existed from the early 17th century. At times it means "capable of being sued" , at other times "capable of being sued out [i.e., enforced]" . E.g., (Sense 1) "The Supreme Court has held that unincorporated labor unions are suable in their own names in the Federal courts for violation of the Anti-Trust Act . . . ." Charles E. Hughes, The Supreme Court 234 (1928; repr. 1966)./ (Sense 2) "The principal contracts known to the common law and suable in the King's Courts, a century after the Conquest, were suretyship and debt." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 289 (1881; repr. 1963).

sua sponte /soo-ə-spon-tee/ (= on its own motion; without prompting) is ordinarily used in reference to courts, esp. in AmE. Usually, the LATINISM is readily translatable—e.g.: "It is the duty of a court to take notice sua sponte [read on its own motion] when it lacks jurisdiction, even though the question is not raised by the contending parties."

In the sentence that follows, the phrase is used illogically: "The court, sua sponte, granted defendant's motion for summary judgment." If there was a motion by the defendant before the court, then the court could not have granted it sua sponte.

The Latin, it must be remembered, means literally "on his or its own motion." Thus it is probably wrong for the courts to use this phrase in reference to their own actions, as here: "Sua sponte we note that the same problem exists in this case as existed in Reyes . . . ." State v. White, 706 P.2d 1331, 1333 (Haw. Ct. App. 1985). The phrase should have been entirely omitted in that sentence. The phrase may acceptably be used with a plural noun—e.g.: "Courts should not, sua sponte, take up waivable rights not asserted by the parties." The phrase is sometimes misspelled sua sponti.

SUB-. Legal writers are fond of sub- words. This fondness often manifests itself in fussy distinctions drawn as analogues to subcontract and subheading (e.g., subcategory, subissue, subaspect, subagent, subbuyer). The only adequate description of such forms is substandard. E.g., "There are several distinct subaspects of the doctrine."/ "These cases on waiver present two distinct subissues." Surely there is a better way of saying that there are two issues within a broad issue, or more than one aspect within a broad aspect; words like issue and aspect are abstract enough without allowing them to become more so with prefixed forms. See ABSTRACTITIS.

The height of the fetish for this prefix consists in subsub-, illustrated in the following examples: "[T]he charter party was executed in the United States between the subsubcharterer, American corporation, and subcharterer, Liberian corporation . . . ." Cardinal Shipping Corp. v. M/S Seisho Maru, 744 F.2d 461, 462 syl. 1 (5th Cir. 1984)./ "Nor is it sufficient that Lake City, a subsubagent, might ordinarily have relied upon a subagent . . . to collect and forward funds due . . . ." Lake City Stevedores, Inc. v. East West Shipping Agencies, Inc., 474 F.2d 1060, 1064 (5th Cir. 1973)./ "In September 1985, Peoples Construction Company . . . , a subcontractor, for a construction project in Foster City, California, hired Matson as a plastering subsubcontractor for that project." Matson Plastering Co. v. Plasterers & Shophands Local No. 66, 852 F.2d 1200, 1201 (9th Cir. 1988). The device, though inelegant, saves a little space and lends greater precision to some contexts.

subaspect. See SUB-.

sub-bidder should be spelled thus, with the hyphen.

subcontract (= a contract made by a party to another contract [main contract or head contract] for carrying it out, or a part of it) is now in common usage, though some judges have objected to it—e.g.: "Being of the opinion that subcontract is a malapropism, we prefer to use the phrase contracting out or contract out." International Union v. Webster Elec. Co., 299 F.2d 195, 197 n.2 (7th Cir. 1962).

subcontractual is the adjective corresponding to subcontract, q.v. E.g., "[R]ecord evidence suggests that Local 829 had no way of knowing the existence of subcontractual arrangements on particular shows." United Scenic Artists v. NLRB, 655 F.2d 1267, 1270 (D.C. Cir. 1981)./ "An exculpatory clause . . . is not an uncommon occurrence in instances in which a prime contractor with the federal government establishes a subcontractual relationship with other companies." Atlantic States Constr., Inc. v. Hand, Arendall, Bedsole, Greaves & Johnston, 892 F.2d 1530, 1538 (11th Cir. 1990).

subfeudation. See subinfeudation.

subfeudatory. See subinfeudatory.

subhead(ing). Both subheading and subhead are used in reference to a textual subdivision under a heading. Subheading is much more common. Subhead is used esp. in reference to legislation—e.g.: "This legislation [Hammurabi's Babylonian code of 2350 B.C.] took the form of a code of 282 paragraphs, regularly arranged under heads and subheads, dealing with the rights of persons, property, the family, contracts, torts and procedure in a very adequate manner." Stephen Pfeil, "Law," in 17 Encyclopedia Americana 86, 87 (1953). See head.

subinfeud(ate). This term, a BACK-FORMATION meaning "(of a feudal tenant-in-chief) to grant a piece of land to a subtenant, who would hold the land by one of the medieval tenures such as knight service, serjeanty, frankalmoin, or socage," is ordinarily spelled subinfeudate—the shorter form being a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "The feudal lord who 'subinfeudates' to a feudal tenant should not be equated with the modern landlord who 'lets' to a tenant under a lease." Peter Butt, Land Law 38 (2d ed. 1988)./ "William the Conqueror 'leased' the land to his chief followers, who in turn 'subinfeudated' the land to others." Bellikha v. Green, 762 P.2d 997, 1004 n.10 (Or. 1988) (en banc)./ "Soon after the Norman Conquest tenants in chief who held by knight service began to subinfeudate—i.e., to grant portions of their lands . . . ." Roger A. Cunningham et al., The Law of Property 15 (2d ed. 1993).

Some legal writers use the term figuratively, but few readers are likely to follow the metaphor: "Indeed, were that not true, the Commission, when dealing at the outset with a colony of intricately subinfeudated companies would be obliged to stop unravelling them as soon as it reached any holding company . . . ." Protective Comm. for Class A Stockholders v. SEC, 184 F.2d 646, 648 (2d Cir. 1950).

subinfeudatory, dating from the 19th century, can be either an adjective ("of or relating to subinfeudation") or a noun ("one who holds land by subinfeudation"). The noun use is rarer: "In France . . . the sub-infeudatories . . . were expected to support their immediate lord in war . . . ." C. Gordon Post, An Introduction to the Law 21 (1963). Subfeudatory is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

subissue. See SUB-.

subject, n. See citizen (B).

subject, adj., in the sense "that is or are the subject of examination or consideration" <the subject property>, is LEGALESE without redeeming value. E.g., "The first [prerequisite] is a prior, unrelated history of close and trusted dealings of the same general nature or scope as the subject transactions [read these transactions or the transactions at issue]." Harris v. Sentry Title Co., 715 F.2d 941, 948 (5th Cir. 1983)./ "The subject [delete subject] property comprises 17,191 square feet of land zoned 'Waterfront Business . . . .'" Golemis v. Kirby, 632 F. Supp. 159, 160 (D.R.I. 1985). For a different adjectival use of subject, see subject to contract.

subjectability = the ability of something to be subject to (a law, etc.). E.g., "It would appear that the manufacturer and the importer, whose subjectability to Oklahoma [read Oklahoma's] jurisdiction is not challenged before this Court, ought not to be judgment-proof." World-wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 317–18 (1980) (Blackmun, J., dissenting). The word is listed in neither W2 nor W3, and is included in OED merely with the notation "in recent dictionaries." The word is arguably useful, though somewhat inaesthetic.

subject-matter is best hyphenated as an adjectival phrase <subject-matter jurisdiction> in both AmE and BrE. Only in BrE is the phrase hyphenated as a noun.

subject-matter jurisdiction; jurisdiction of the subject matter. The phrase is rendered both ways in modern legal writing. E.g., "The district court dismissed petitioner's complaint for want of jurisdiction of the subject matter." Subject-matter jurisdiction is more common and usually less cumbersome.

Subject-matter jurisdiction (= the extent to which a court can claim to affect the conduct of persons) is contrasted with personal jurisdiction (= a court's power to bring persons into its adjudicative process).

subject matter of the trust. See corpus.

subject to change by mutual agreement. This phrase, seen occasionally in contracts, is worthless: everything in the contract is subject to a change of this kind.

subject to contract is a formulaic expression that has the effect of making a preliminary contract for the sale of land and houses nonbinding—until a formal or final contract records the agreement. The phrase is somewhat more common in G.B. than in the U.S., but it is used on both sides of the Atlantic. E.g., "The Court of Appeal held that, as the preliminary agreement was 'subject to a proper contract,' neither party had ever become bound . . . ." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 30 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950)./ "[A]n acceptance 'subject to contract' or 'subject to title' or any similar term is conditional, and amounts to a counter-offer which may be accepted or rejected by the original offeror as he desires." Id. at 38.

subject to the provisions of this Act. This REDUNDANCY appears frequently in common-law STATUTE-DRAFTING. A variation is subject to any contrary provision in this Act. As often as not, it signals poorly organized drafting; certainly it makes the interpreter's job no easier. Cf. notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained herein.

SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT. A. False Attraction to Noun Intervening Between Subject and Verb. The simple rule is that plural subjects take plural verbs, and singular subjects take singular verbs. This subheading denotes a mistake in number usually resulting when a plural noun intervenes between a singular subject and the verb. The writer's eye is thrown off course by the plural noun that appears nearest the verb—e.g.:

- "This problem is also declining in importance as the language of statutes are [read is] modernized."
- "Concededly, the length of opinions vary [read varies] from case to case and from writer to writer."
- "At first, the difference between McCormick and Wigmore—or between McCormick and any of the other writers mentioned here—are [read is] a bit startling."
- "[I]ndeed the success of these cooperative enterprises turn [read turns] on this right . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 354 (1930).
- "The cost of all prosecutions are [read is] met out of the fund provided by the locality in which the proceedings take place . . . ." Patrick Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 14 (1960).
- "A group of cases have [read has, or several cases have] enacted broad cy pres, or reformation, statutes, of which the Vermont statute is an example . . . ." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 218 (2d ed. 1984).
- "A third set of cases where plaintiffs seek only money are [read includes or comprises] suits to collect debts." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 17 (1991).
- "[C]ompliance with the administrative complaint requirements of Title VII . . . are [read is] also applicable [read mandatory?]." Jack B. Moynihan, After the Civil Rights Act of 1991, Tex. B.J., May 1992, at 450, 454.
- "Unnecessary enumeration of particulars are [read is] not uncommon . . . ." Elmer Doonan, Drafting 38 (1995).

This error sometimes occurs when two or more nouns, seeming to create a plural, intervene between the subject and the verb—e.g.: "This amazing transformation has not been achieved solely by a concept of 'interference,' for the provision of 'works' (water, drainage, houses, transport, power, schools, hospitals and so on) and of 'facilities' (such as education, health services and social security) do [read does, because the subject is provision] not seem to be essentially interferences except to a one-track mind." R.M. Jackson, The Machinery of Justice in England 354 (5th ed. 1967)./ "Barefaced defiance of morals and law were [read was, because the subject is defiance] illegal." Lawrence M. Friedman, Crime and Punishment in American History 131 (1993). See SYNESIS.

The reverse error, plural to singular, also occurs—e.g.: "The interests of the class representative, Mr. Sampson, is [read are] not the same as those of the absent parties."/ "Strict interpretations of statutory language has [read have] been used at one time to mitigate the severity of the law and (much more rarely) at another time to increase it." J.W. Cecil Turner, Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law 38 (1952).

B. Reverse False Attraction. This occurs when the writer ignores the true and proximate subject by wrongly searching for a more remote subject earlier in the sentence. E.g., "The character of the punitive damages depends on the function such damages serves [read serve]." (The writer apparently thought function to be the subject.)

C. False Attraction to Predicate Noun. Occasionally a writer incorrectly looks to the predicate rather than to the subject for the noun that will govern the verb. The "correct" way of phrasing the sentence is often awkward, so the writer is well advised to find another way of stating the idea—e.g.:

- "The appellate judge's immediate audience are [read is] his colleagues who sat with him when an appeal was argued."
- "The second type of case on which I shall spend a little time are [read is] cases of negligence . . . ." H.L.A. Hart, "Intention and Punishment," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 113, 132 (1968). [A suggested edit to avoid awkwardness: The second type of case on which I shall spend a little time is the case involving negligence . . . .]
- "Another class of case in which juries are notoriously more willing to acquit than magistrates are [read is] cases in which everything hinges upon a conflict between the evidence of police witnesses and of the accused." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 22 (1983). [A suggested edit to avoid awkwardness: Another class of case in which juries are notoriously more willing to acquit than magistrates is the case in which everything hinges upon a conflict between the evidence of police witnesses and of the accused.]

D. Compound Subjects Joined Conjunctively. "But recent research and commentary has [read have] suggested that the emphasis upon eyewitness identification may lead to questionable results." (Research and commentary are different things.)/ "At the same time, the democratic process and the personal participation of the citizen in his government is [read are] not all we want." Charles P. Curtis, Jr., Lions Under the Throne 49 (1947) (The democratic process and personal participation are different things).

Sometimes the two nouns joined by and arguably express a single idea, and hence should take a singular verb: "The confusion and uncertainty is [confusion and uncertainty really describing a single mental state] compounded by doubt regarding the question whether the complete liquidation and reorganization provisions can have concurrent application."/ "Published criticism and vituperation is not necessarily libelous."

One must be careful of the compound noun phrase followed by a singular noun that properly is the singular subject: "First, we must decide whether the claim presented and the relief sought are of the type that admit [read admits, for the subject of the verb is type] of judicial resolution."

E. Alternatives. The last element in a disjunctive series determines the number of the verb. Thus:

- "Consent to contract may be vitiated if fraud, error, violence, or threats induce the consent."
- "But the jury or the court are [read is] not bound to accept the statement of a witness as true because it is not directly or expressly contradicted or impeached by other witnesses."
- "The decree undoubtedly contemplates that the government would be able to object where, as here, the process of combatting discrimination depends not merely on the development of particular lists, but on which of two alternative lists are [read is] used."
- "It can hardly be otherwise so long as justices or a court have [read has] to deal with applications, because they must act on insufficient information." R.M. Jackson, The Machinery of Justice in England 156 (5th ed. 1967).
- "Written defamation (libel) was, nevertheless, treated in a special way by the criminal law, where neither publication nor untruth were [read was] required to be shown." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 506–07 (3d ed. 1990). See neither . . . nor (A).
- "[W]henever the president or the governor issue [read issues] an executive order . . . " Bob Dunn, Contemplating Our Future, Tex. B.J., May 1992, at 448.

See either (B).

F. Plural Words Referred to as Words. These take a singular verb. "Neither 'per stirpes' nor 'descendants' were [read was] used in reference to the part of the estate Sue would get had George died intestate."/ "But 'per stirpes' were [read was] not used in the phrase granting power of appointment; they were used [read it (i.e., the phrase) was used] only in disposing of the property if George died intestate."

G. Misleading Connectives. The phrases as well as, added to, coupled with, and together with do not affect the grammatical number of the nouns preceding or following them. When such a phrase joins two singular nouns, the singular verb is called for—e.g.:

- "The provision for the payment of interest on the fund held by appellee, together with the fact that there was no designation or segregation of any particular fund from which payment was to be made, are [read is] of interest in determining the settlor's intent."
- "Logic, as well as equity, dictate [read dictates] this result." Affiliated Capital Corp. v. City of Houston, 793 F.2d 706, 709 (5th Cir. 1986) (en banc).
- "[F]or example, he says, America's declining ability to compete in the global sale of automobiles and other manufactured products, as well as its status as the world's leading debtor nation, are [read is] partly the result of the declining cognitive abilities of workers and administrators." Malcolm W. Browne, What Is Intelligence, and Who Has It? N.Y. Times, 16 Oct. 1994, § 7, at 3, 41.

See together with.

H. Plural Units Denoting Amounts. In AmE, a plural noun denoting a small unit by which a larger amount is measured generally takes a singular verb—e.g.: "Five hours are [read is] enough time."/ "Fifteen minutes pass [read passes] more quickly than you might think."/ "Before the leak was detected and the flow of oil shut down, a period of about two weeks, approximately 2,400 barrels of crude oil were [read was] discharged into the creek." See COLLECTIVE NOUNS & SYNESIS.

I. The False Singular. "The situation of the employer and the employee in today's society is equivalent." [Read The situation of the employer and that of the employee in today's society are equivalent.] It is the situations of the employer and the employee, not the persons themselves, that are being compared. See ILLOGIC (A).

J. Inversion. In the sentence that follows, the two that-clauses, dual subjects, demand a plural verb, although the writer was misled by the INVERSION into thinking a singular was needed: "That this court has jurisdiction to enforce a covenant between the owner of the land and his neighbor purchasing a part of it, and that the latter shall either use or abstain from using the land purchased in a particular way, is [read are] what I never know to be disputed."

The error is less understandable in a simpler sentence: "As usual there seems [read seem] to be a million things happening around the Texas Law Center." Karen Johnson, What's Happening at the Texas Law Center? Tex. B.J., May 1992, at 514. See there is (B).

As in the preceding example, sentences that begin with the expletive there invert the order of the subject and the verb, thereby frequently causing confusion in number—even where, as here, the subject being discussed is grammatical number: "The result of this evolution is that there is [read are] now both a plural media and a singular media, and each means something different." Robertson Cochrane, Verbum Sap, 21 Verbatim 11, 11 (1994).

K. Thing after thing (is) (are). E.g., "Exception after exception have [read has] whittled away the rule."/ "Assault after assault on the M'Naghten Rules were [read was] beaten off until 1957." H.L.A. Hart, "Changing Conceptions of Responsibility," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 186, 191 (1968). Cf. more . . . than (B). See CONCORD (A) & media.

L. Subject Area Implied. Some writers fall into the habit of implicitly prefacing plural nouns with UNDERSTOOD WORDS such as the idea of or the law of. To be sure, some of these wordings are, among lawyers, perfectly idiomatic—e.g.: "Torts is my favorite area of the law."

But the habit should not extend beyond the reach of idiomatic comfort—e.g.: "Estates and future interests is [read make up] a complex, highly technical body of material, foreign to most students' experience, and difficult to grasp." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests v (2d ed. 1984)./ "Lives in being plus 21 years has no purpose in the commercial field." Id. at 208. [Read The concept of lives in being plus 21 years has no purpose in the commercial field.]

M. One in five; one of every five. This construction takes a singular: one in three is not admitted, one of every five achieves a perfect score. E.g., "The truth is that in the period 1805–10, one in five of reported crimes were [read was] not prosecuted . . . ." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 276 (1966).

N. A number of people (is) (are). See SYNESIS.

O. One of those who (is) (are). See one of those ——s who (or that).

P. Each as Subject. See each (A).

Q. What as Subject. See what.

subjoin (= to annex, append) was formerly extremely common in LEGALESE. E.g., "Other statements of the rule will be found in the subjoined footnote." Today the term is rarely used, subjoined footnote conveying nothing that footnote does not equally clearly convey. Where the word is not, as above, completely superfluous, join or attach will often suffice in place of this pomposity: "The next verbal repetition, 'consigned pianos,' is subjoined [read attached] to the stipulation for the dealer to make monthly stock reports."

sub judice (= before the court; awaiting judicial determination), though almost always an unnecessary phrase, rose tenfold in frequency of use between the 1940s and the 1980s in American judicial opinions. Structurally an adverbial of place, the phrase usu. functions as a POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVE <case sub judice>.

The phrase is easily translated. Case sub judice readily becomes case at bar. Better yet, one might write this case or the present case: "In the case sub judice [read In this case], extensive controversy was present in the medical opinions."/ "Appellees argue that the case sub judice [read this case or the present case] does not fall within any of the three categories enumerated in Blagge."/ "As in Crouch, the case sub judice [read the present case] involves none of the concerns upon which the domestic-relations exception exists."/ "The case sub judice [read The present case] is clearly distinguishable on its facts from those two cases." See case at bar & instant case. See also LATINISMS.

The phrase is best pronounced either /sub-joo-di-see/ or /sub-yoo-di-kay/—and it ought to be two words, not one.

subjugable. See -ATABLE.

subjugate (= [1] to conquer or bring under control; or [2] to subdue) should not be used for subordinate. E.g., "We decline to require them to name their remedy when to do so would be to subjugate [read subordinate] fairness and common sense to technical nicety."

SUBJUNCTIVES are concededly obsolete for the most part in English. They still survive in such constructions as "If I were," "If he were," etc. Legal writers frequently omit the subjunctive mood of the verb when they should use it, usually when the situation postulated is hypothetical or contrary to fact—e.g.:

- "Would your answer be different [hypothetical] if the basis of judicial jurisdiction was [read were] an attachment of real estate, the value of which would not be known until it was sold to satisfy judgment?"
- "Suppose now that the foreign corporation in question was [read were or had been] doing business within the state."
- "The claims of workmen who were employed in such a factory, and cannot continue to work there because of fire, represent only a small fraction of the claims which would arise if recovery is [read were, because the if is hypothetical] allowed in this class of cases."
- "If there were no state statutes, then of course the federal courts did [read would] not have to refer to state law at all, unless the action were local."
- "This section of the Act was designed to ensure that the government was not prevented [read that the government not be prevented] from exercising its leadership and planning functions."
- "Drafting is more than a mechanical process of recording the terms of a transaction in writing. If this was [read were] all that drafting involved, it would not be necessary to look to lawyers to do drafting." Elmer Doonan, Drafting 6–7 (1995).

It is ironic, in view of the sentences just quoted, that legal writers still often cling to basically outmoded subjunctives. Krapp labeled the usage If I be an "archaic survival" in 1927. See George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 651–52 (1927). But similar archaic examples abound in 20th-century legal prose:

- "If one partner go [read goes or went] to a third person to buy an article on time for the partnership, the other partner cannot [read as is if goes is in the first clause, or could not if went is in the first clause] prevent it by writing to the third person not to sell to him on time."
- "If the nonresident have [read has] no property in the state, there is nothing for the tribunals to adjudicate."
- "[I]f after conviction a prisoner become [read becomes] insane, he cannot be hanged until his recovery." J.W. Cecil Turner, Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law 75 (1952).
- "The House of Lords does now enjoy—if that be [read is] the appropriate word—the freedom not to follow its own previous decisions—a freedom only very recently acquired, and not, it would seem, likely by over-use to degenerate into licence." Leslie Scarman, English Law—The New Dimension 5 (1974).

When one relates an indirect question asking about past condition, and no hypothetical or contrariety to truth is implied, the simple past should be employed, and not the subjunctive. Confusion on this point is the most common among those who profess to know how to handle subjunctives—e.g.:

- "One inquired whether the money were [read was] lost property, and the other inquired whether the money was [read had been] mislaid."

- "In Wagner, the court rejected the defendant's theory that it would be liable to a rescuer only if the rescue were [read was] 'instinctive'."
- "In the instant case, there was sufficient reason to allow the questioned demonstration; however, even if it were [read was] error, it was harmless error."
- "It was not that these scriveners did not know how to punctuate; they were simply operating under the old rules; if there were [read was] a compelling oral reason for punctuation, punctuation would be supplied."

The three following sentences contain constructions in which—even in the modern idiom—the subjunctive is needed. In the first two examples, a demand or intention is expressed (this is one of the few exceptions to the obsolescence of subjunctives); the third sentence describes a condition that is contrary to fact: "These prisoners demanded that they all engaged [read engage] in sex and, although the complainant was frightened, he refused and climbed back into bed."/ "Parties may intend that a certain document is [read be] the final expression of agreement as to matters dealt with in that writing."/ "Some courts have construed wills acts patterned upon the Statute of Frauds as if the signature rather than the will was [read were] the thing to be acknowledged by the testator."

But in the following group of sentences, the subjunctive is vestigial and moribund and should therefore be changed to the indicative: "What has been said, however, does not mean that the taxpayer had no right to carry out his declaration after the subject matter had come into existence, even though there were [read was] no consideration."/ "In Iowa, and generally elsewhere, the title to a decedent's real estate, whether he die [read dies] intestate or testate, including the right of dower, vests in the heir, devisee, or spouse instantly upon the death of the decedent, subject, of course, to the payment of his debts, and costs of administration."/ "In England, fair comment includes the inference of motives, if there be [read, in modern prose, is] foundation for the inference."

Having cited so many examples of misuse, this article might best end with a correct use of the subjunctive in its most common setting: "Where an attesting witness has denied all knowledge of the matter, the case stands as if there were no attesting witness." (Eng.)

On the consistent progression of mood within a sentence, see TENSES (B).

sublease, n.; subtenancy; underlease. The first is the usual term in AmE and BrE. The other two are primarily BrE variants.

Unlike an assignment of a lease, in which the lessee's entire interest is transferred to the assignee from the assignor, a sublease transfers only the unexpired portion of the lease (often less one day) to the sublessee from the sublessor, who retains a reversion in the lease.

sublease, v.t. See let & underlease.

sublessee; subtenant; undertenant. See sublease, n. sublessor (AmE & BrE); underlessor (BrE). See sublease.

sublet. See let.

submersible; submergible. Though the latter seems simpler (cf. persuadable and persuasible), the former is more common in both AmE and BrE. E.g., "That case involved claims for property damage arising from a blowout of a high-pressure gas well that occurred during workover operations on the well aboard a submersible drilling barge."

submissible; submissable; submittable. Even though it is labeled "rare" in the OED, submissible is frequently used in AmE. See, e.g., Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 641 (4th ed. 1983) ("there is a submissible issue"). Submissable and submittable are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

submission is used in several senses: (1) an argument by counsel in court <In his April 10 submission, Cochran argued to Judge Ito that the prosecution was trying to cause a mistrial>; (2) the agreement to abide by a decision or to obey an authority <our submission was limited to the 1992 dispute>; (3) the action of allowing, or agreement to allow, an authority to decide an issue <The voluntary submission of parties to the jurisdiction of courts>; or (4) the referring of a matter to arbitration <submission to arbitration by consent>.

submittal (= the act of submitting), though not uncommon in American legal writing, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT OF submission. E.g., "Counsel made his submittal [read submission] to the court outside [or off] the record."/ "[T]he public may obtain information, [or] make submittals [read submissions] or requests." Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(1)(a) (1982).

sub modo (= under a qualification; subject to a restriction or condition) is a recherché Latinism. "But whether a creditor or a grantee of the plaintiff in this case would be entitled to the immediate possession of the property, or would only take the plaintiff's title sub modo [read or would take title subject to the restrictions on plaintiff's title], need not be decided."

sub nom. (fr. L. sub nomine) = under the name. This abbreviation is commonly used, and justifiably so, in citations to note that a certain case may have involved different parties at an earlier or later procedural stage. E.g., "Again, in In re Morgani, [1942] Ch. 347, the Court of Appeal . . . was doubtless relieved when it was reversed by the House of Lords sub nom. Perrin v. Morgan, [1943] A.C. 399." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 382 (7th ed. 1964).

suborn; subornate. Suborn = to get another to commit a crime, esp. perjury. E.g., "To bribe a trustee, as such, is in fact neither more nor less than to suborn him to be guilty of a breach or an abuse of trust." Jeremy Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation 240 n.3 (Hafner Pub. Co. 1948) (1823).

Subornate, a BACK-FORMATION for subornation, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of suborn. E.g., "The evidence . . . of the plaintiff's attempt to bribe the witness and subornate [read suborn] perjury was not being introduced to prove the plaintiff's character in order to show conformity as provided in Rule 404(b)." Lay v. Mangum, 360 S.E.2d 481, 483 (N.C. Ct. App. 1987).

subornation of perjury. Although subornation may mean in a general sense "the act of inducing or procuring a person to commit an evil action, by bribery, corruption, or the like" (OED), in practice today it almost invariably means "the act of procuring a person to commit perjury." Hence subornation of perjury is a virtual REDUNDANCY, though an established and therefore a pardonable one.

The verb corresponding to this noun is suborn (= to procure [another] to commit perjury) and the agent noun is suborner. See suborn & suborner.

subornee = one who is suborned. See -EE (A).

suborner is the only form of the word. E.g., "[T]he suborner was originally thought of as committing a separate crime because it was a more serious offense than perjury,—although it was not a felony except in very ancient times." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 525 (3d ed. 1982). See -ER (A). subpart. See SUB-.

subp(o)ena. A. Sense. W3 lists subpoena as an adverb meaning "under penalty" (or "under pain"). This, of course, is its etymological sense. It virtually never appears in modern legal writing with this meaning, and should be considered obsolete in that use.

The modern use is as a noun. Even in medieval English practice, subpoena served as a noun denoting the writ that commenced civil proceedings by ordering the defendant to attend under pain of a monetary penalty. Today, its meaning is "a court order commanding the presence of a witness under a penalty of fine for failure."

B. Form and Pronunciation. Subpena, the spelling recommended by the Government Printing Office Manual up until the early 1980s, appears in any number of American federal statutes. Subpoena is, however, by far the more common spelling and for that reason alone is to be preferred. Moreover, the better view is reflected in the Government Printing Office's Style Manual as revised in 1984.

The form with the digraph œ—namely subpœna—is pedantic at best in modern writing.

The plural is subpoenas, not subpoenae: In re Two Grand Jury Subpoenae [read Subpoenas] Duces Tecum, 769 F.2d 52 (2d Cir. 1985). "The subpoenae [read subpoenas] specifically called for, once again, interview memoranda. On June 6, 1984, the Government filed a motion to quash the subpoenae [read subpoenas]." U.S. v. Omni Int'l Corp., 634 F. Supp. 1414, 1427 (D.Md. 1986). The form subpoenae results from the mistaken view that subpoena is a Latin singular noun, whereas it is a Latin phrase used as an English noun. See HYPERCORRECTION (A).

The word is pronounced /sə-pee-nə/ as both noun and verb.

C. Types. A subpoena ad testificandum /ad-tes-ti-fi-kan-dəm/ is a subpoena to testify; usu., when subpoena is used alone, the word refers to this type. A subpoena duces tecum /doo-səs-tee-kəm/ commands the witness not only to appear but also to bring specified books, papers, or records.

subpoena, v.t. The inflected forms of this verb, which dates from the early 17th century, are subpoenaed and subpoenaing. The miscast forms subpoened and subpoening are fairly common—as is subpoenaeing.

Subpoena'd is an old BrE past-tense form. See, e.g., Sir John Hawles's Remarks Upon Mr. Cor- nish's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 455, 460 (1685) ("any person may inform in point of fact, though not subpoena'd . . .").

subpoenable (= capable of being subpoenaed) is an ungainly NEOLOGISM of questionable utility—e.g.: "[T]he results could be subpoenable . . . ." People v. Pezzette, 444 N.E.2d 1386, 1387 (Ill. App. Ct. 1983)./ "That is what Bruce insisted he was entitled to from The Ohio State University, which is the formal and subpoenable name of his last employer." Bruce Passes Up Shot at Last Laugh, Chicago Tribune, 29 Nov. 1987, at C1.

subpoenal (= required or done under penalty) is listed in W2, but not in the OED or in W3. Still, it is occasionally useful as an adjective in the sense "required or done in compliance with a subpoena." E.g., "Additionally, the petitioners contend that their right to produce witnesses on their own behalf will be impinged upon and that their right against self-incrimination will be violated by requiring them to testify under subpoenal compulsion." A v. Curran, 306 N.Y.S.2d 753, 755–56 (Sup. Ct. 1969).

subrogate = to put (a person) in the place of, or substitute (a person) for, another in respect of a right or claim; to cause to succeed to the rights of another (OED). It was once a general English word, more literary than vernacular; today it is mostly confined to legal contexts.

subrogation. A. Senses. Subrogation = (1) generally, the substitution of one party for another as a creditor, with the transfer of rights and duties; esp., an equitable assignment that substitutes a surety to the position of the creditor whom the surety has paid; (2) the principle under which an insurer that has paid the loss under an indemnity policy is entitled to take on all the rights and remedies belonging to the insured against a third party with respect to any injuries or breaches covered by the insurance policy; or (3) in civil law, the attribution of legal qualities usu. attached to one kind of property to another kind of property. Cf. novation.

B. Legal and Conventional Subrogation. Legal subrogation arises by operation of law or by implication in equity to prevent fraud or injustice. Conventional subrogation arises by contract.

C. And reimbursement; contribution; exoneration. All of these equitable doctrines serve to prevent the unearned enrichment of one party at the expense of another by creating a relation similar to a constructive trust in favor of the party making payment in the creditor's legal rights. See constructive trust (B).

subrogative; subrogatory; subrogational. Among these less-than-common adjectives, subrogative appears most frequently—twice as frequently as subrogatory and more than three times as frequently as subrogational. It would therefore be convenient if writers treated the -tory and -tional forms as NEEDLESS VARIANTS and avoided them.

subrogee; subrogatee. The usual form is subrogee (= a person put in the place or substituted for another in upholding a right or claim)—e.g.: "Subrogation is a legal fiction [that] results in the substitution of the subrogee to the position of the subrogor . . . ." John T. Hood, Jr., "Subrogation," in Essays on the Civil Law of Obligations 174 (Joseph Dainow ed., 1969). Subrogatee is an erroneous form—e.g.: "A drawee bank under current Texas law will not be deemed the equitable subrogatee [read subrogee] of the maker on the ground that the maker has a valid defense to the debt evidenced by the check."

subrogor (= one who allows another to be substituted for oneself as creditor, with a transfer of rights and duties) is a 20th-century legal NEOLOGISM created to correspond to subrogee, q.v. It is listed in W3 but not in the OED or in W2. As a term corresponding to subrogee, subrogor is quite acceptable. The word is pronounced /səb-rə-gohr/.

subscribe lit. means "to write (one's name or mark) on, orig. at the bottom of, a document, esp. as a witness or consenting party" (OED). In this sense the word is now purely a LEGALISM. Arguably it has its uses, although sign will almost always suffice more comprehensibly. E.g., "The summons is the mandate of the court and is subscribed [read signed] by an attorney who is an officer of the court."

For the misuse of ascribe for subscribe, see ascribe.

subsequently. A. For later. Using the four-syllable word in place of the two-syllable word is rarely, if ever, a good stylistic choice.

B. And consequently. Though both words contain the sense "following" or "occurring later," consequently has an added causal nuance: "occurring because of." See consequent (B).

subsequent to is a lawyer's pomposity for after or later, just as prior to is for before. E.g., "The controversy in Kulko involved an attempted modification of child custody and support several years subsequent to [read after] the divorce of the parents."/ "Subsequent to [read After] drawing the will in Detroit, the decedent became a resident of Webberville."/ "The petitioner may, of course, subsequent to [read after] the execution of the trust agreement, have issue, but until such issue come into being, they cannot be said to have the status of existing beneficiaries."

Used adjectivally (without to), subsequent is perfectly acceptable in phrases such as condition subsequent and subsequent history (of a case).

subserve is an ARCHAISM for serve. E.g., "In that way the ends of justice and the best interests of the public will be subserved [read served]."/ "The interests of the people are best subserved [read served] by sustaining the statute quoted as it is written."/ "The beneficial ends to be subserved [read served] by public discussion would in large measure be defeated if honesty must be handled with delicacy."

subsidence (= the act or process of settling or sinking) is pronounced /səb-sɪd-əns/ or /səb-sɪd-əns/. The word is sometimes misspelled subsidance—e.g.: "[A]ppellant asserts the trial court erred in . . . finding that the passage of a truck trailer over a three to five inch subsidance [read subsidence] in a road is a 'collision' within the meaning of the policy . . . ." Nutchey v. Three R's Trucking Co., 674 S.W.2d 928, 929 (Tex. App.—Amarillo 1984).

subsidiarity = (1) the quality of being subsidiary; or (2) the principle that a central authority, such as the European Community, should have a subsidiary function, performing only tasks that cannot be performed effectively at a more immediate or local level. A NEOLOGISM dating from the 1930s, it arose as a paraphrase of a 1931 speech given by Pope Pius XI, in which he used the German word subsidiarität (in sense 1). In legal contexts, sense (1) has traditionally been most usual—e.g.: "The requirement of subsidiarity, that no other remedy be available at law, is met because no contract exists under which recovery could be had." Howell v. Rhoades, 547 So. 2d 1087, 1089 (La. Ct. App. 1989).

sub silentio, adj. & adv., is an often unnecessary LATINISM. In many contexts, silent(ly), tacit(ly), under silence, or in silence provides a good substitute. E.g., "The district court may have accepted, sub silentio, [read tacitly accepted] the appellees' contention that appellant waived all claims in his pleadings except the claim for denial of procedural due process."/ "It does not make sense that Congress intended sub silentio [read silently] to broaden the required exemption to preclude pro rata reductions."

subsist. This verb was formerly used regularly in the sense "to exist." This usage is now a legalistic ARCHAISM. E.g., "Such laws must be invariably obeyed, as long as the creature itself subsists, for its existence depends on that obedience." (Blackstone) The more common word exist should now be preferred, esp. since the usual meaning of subsist today is "to survive with a bare minimum of sustenance, to continue to exist; to keep oneself alive."

In the following sentences, subsist is used in its archaic sense: "Joint tenancy is a relationship subsisting [read existing] between two or more persons in respect to an interest in land."/ "The respondent by his amended answer has alleged that, at the time of the ceremony of marriage which he went through with the petitioner, there was already a subsisting [read an existing] marriage which had previously taken place between him and another lady in Pakistan." (Eng.)

The general lay sense also appears in legal writing, a fact that may lead to AMBIGUITY if the archaic sense is retained: "On the basis of this sole difference the first class is granted and the second class is denied welfare aid upon which may depend the ability of the families to obtain the very means to subsist—food, shelter, and other necessities of life."

substantial damages. See nominal damages.

substantial performance = the equitable doctrine that, if a plaintiff fails to fulfill some of its detailed obligations under a contract, as by not performing quite on time, the plaintiff may nevertheless hold the defendant to his promise despite that failure if the substantial purpose of the contract is accomplished. E.g., "The rule that gives a remedy in cases of substantial performance with compensation for defects of trivial or inappreciable importance has been developed by the courts as an instrument of justice." Jacob & Youngs, Inc v. Kent, 129 N.E. 889, 892 (N.Y. 1921)./ "Rules of 'substantial performance' were developed to protect plaintiffs who had almost, but not quite, completed performance." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 74 (1974).

substantive, one of the words most commonly mispronounced by lawyers, has three, not four syllables /səb-stən-tiv/. The common error in AmE is to insert what is known as an epenthetical substantive law. See procedural law.

-e- after the second syllable /səb-stə-nə-tiv/. Still another blunder is to accent the second syllable /səb-stan-tiv/.

substantuate is solecistic for substantiate.

substitute; replace. Substitute = to put a person or thing in place of another <she will substitute for him>. Replace = (1) to put something or someone back in the same place as before, restore to a former state; (2) to supply an equivalent of; (3) to return; (4) to repay; or (5) to put in a new place.

substituted service, a phrase contrasted with personal service, refers to any means of serving legal papers other than by delivering them directly to the person to be served. Examples of substituted service include service by publication in newspapers and service on the attorney instead of the party. The phrase substituted service is more common in AmE than its synonym, constructive service.

substitutional; substitutionary; substitutive. In law, substitutional is the preferred form, substitutionary, a late-19th-century coinage, being a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Even so, substitutionary appears almost as frequently as -al in the law of wills. It should, like all other such variants, be uprooted. E.g., "[A] remote power . . . will actually be exercised only by substitutionary [read substitutional] deed . . . ." Comm'r v. Singer's Estate, 161 F.2d 15, 18–19 (2d Cir. 1947). Substitutive, a learned word, almost never occurs in legal contexts.

SUBSUB-. See SUB-.

subsumed takes under or in.

sub suo periculo (= at his, her, or its peril) is a LATINISM with little to commend it. E.g., "[I]f the parent [who is] granted custody undertakes to foist restrictions [that] a court should not impose, he does so sub suo periculo [read at his peril]." Asbell v. Asbell, 430 S.W.2d 436, 439 (Mo. Ct. App. 1968)./ "When Patrolman Ward, relying on the statement of Regina Bailey, that he would not need his gun and unjudiciously holstered it, he did so 'sub suo periculo' [read at his peril]." Ward v. State, 366 N.Y.S.2d 800, 808 (Ct. Cl. 1975).

subtenancy is a chiefly BrE variant of sublease. See sublease.

subterfuge is pronounced /sub-tər-fyoojʃ/, not /fyoozh/.

subtle; subtile. The latter is an archaic and NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "It is enough for the present case that the law should at least be prompt to recognize the injuries that may arise from an unauthorized use in connection with other facts, even if more subtilty [read subtlety] is needed to state the wrong than is needed here."

subtraction, a common mathematical word, has a special meaning in law: "the withdrawal or withholding from a person of any right or privilege to which he or she is lawfully entitled." E.g., "Among rights 'in personam,' family rights, and their analogues, are infringed by 'subtraction,' adultery, refusal of due aliment, ingratitude on the part of a freedman, or neglect by a vassal of his feudal duties . . . ." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 334 (13th ed. 1924; repr. 1937).

subvention (= a grant of money—esp. a governmental grant—for the support of an object or institution), chiefly a BrE term, has no live verb corresponding to it: subvene and subvent, both illustrated with a single pre-1800 citation in the OED, are obsolete. But the noun is in fairly frequent use—e.g.: "On the Treasury accounts [legal aid] looks like a huge recurrent subvention to an indigent relative." Sedley, Breaking the Law, London Rev. Books, 18 May 1989, at 3.

succedent. See successive.

succeeding for after or following is unnecessarily stuffy in most contexts. E.g., "The year succeeding [read after] the sale the company sold its real-estate holdings."

succession, in law, has two primary senses: (1) the act or right of legally or officially coming into a predecessor's office, rank, or functions; (2) "the acquiring of an intestate share of an estate"; or (3) loosely, "the acquiring of property by will." E.g., "If a decedent died intestate, property passes by intestate succession to his heirs."/ "The daughter transferred the property to her mother upon an oral agreement to hold in trust for the daughter and to be returned to the daughter by intestate succession." (See descent (B).) The adjectival form of succession in this sense is successional. (See successive.)

Like success, succession is pronounced with the first -c- as if it were a -k-. Otherwise it is easily confused with secession. Cf. accession & accessory.

successive; successional; succedent. Successive = consecutive; following one after another, in uninterrupted succession. Successional = proceeding or passing by succession or descent. (See succession.) Succedent to is a pompous phrase meaning "following, after, subsequent to."

successor in interest. The phrase need not be hyphenated.

successors and assigns. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

succinct. The first -c- is hard in this word. Cf. succession, accession & accessory.

such. A. As a Demonstrative Adjective. Such is properly used as an adjective when reference has previously been made to a category of persons or things: thus such = of this kind, not this, these, or those. With this word two points should be kept in mind. First, when used as a demonstrative adjective to modify a singular noun, such typifies LEGALESE as much as aforesaid and same, n. Contrary to what some think, such is no more precise than the, that, or those. Second, such is a DEICTIC TERM that must refer to a clear antecedent. In the following sentence, such is used once vaguely (without an antecedent), once clearly: "The Association agreed to compile data on all conventions that will occur in cities where there are interested Gray Line members and to forward such report to such members." The first such would best have been omitted; no reports have been referred to—only the compilation of data, which is not necessarily the same as a report. The second such, less objectionable because the noun following it is plural, would read better as those.

Fowler calls the use of such in place of the or that "the illiterate such." E.g., "We adopt the opinion of the Court of Appeal. Such [read The] opinion is as follows."/ "Such cause of action, if any such there was, survived her death." [Read The cause of action, if there was any, survived her death.]/ "The general rule is that objection to a juror because of his disqualification is waived by failure to object to such [read that] juror until after the verdict." Cf. said & same.

Like said and same, this word is much beloved of those who believe in the MYTH OF PRECISION. It therefore teems in the work of some drafters—e.g.:

> Notwithstanding section 502 of this title, there shall not be allowed in such partner's case a claim against such partner on which both such partner and such partnership are liable, except to any extent that such claim is secured only by property of such partner and not by property of such partnership. The claim of the trustee under this subsection is entitled to distribution in such partner's case under 726(a) of this title the same as any other claim of a kind specified in such section.
> 11 U.S.C. § 723 (1994).

In that passage, all but the last such could be advantageously replaced by the; the last should be that. But, from the viewpoint of good DRAFTING, the whole section needs rethinking.

B. As a Pronoun. Although the pronoun use of such has ancient history on its side—it dates from the 9th century—today it is best regarded as an ARCHAISM except in a few such phrases as such is life. In legal contexts, the word is barbarous-sounding—e.g.: "I must dissent from the majority's holding that appellant's detention and ensuing search and seizure were lawful; such [read that holding] is pure dictum." (Notice that the last clause is nonsensical—holding and dictum being antithetical.) Indeed, Krapp called it a "crude low colloquialism." George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 568 (1927).

C. Such . . . as to. This generally unobjectionable construction should not be split by more than a few words: "Nothing in the letters was such an outrage as to inflame the passions of the jury." See so as [+ infinitive].

D. Such [noun + s] as are. Rephrase to avoid this archaic construction—e.g.: "The terminating shareholder shall execute and deliver to the Corporation such instruments as are [read all instruments] necessary to transfer full and complete title.

sue, in the sense "to sue and win," is a common legal idiom in questions posed in law-school exams, as in, "Can Y sue X?" As fully expressed, this question means, "Can Y sue X successfully?" Glanville Williams laments the exam answer that states, "Y can sue X but he will fail": "This displays the writer's common sense but also his lack of knowledge of legal phraseology. It is true that there is virtually no restriction upon the bringing of actions: for instance, I can at this moment sue the Prime Minister for assault—though I shall fail in the action. But when a lawyer asserts that [Y] can sue [X], what he means is that [Y] can sue [X] successfully; if he meant his words to be taken literally, they would not have been worth the uttering." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 131 (11th ed. 1982).

sue facts (= facts that bear on whether to bring suit, esp. whether to institute a shareholder derivative action alleging a state-law cause of action) is an ungainly phrase from corporate-law JARGON. The phrase turns the verb sue into an adjective. Scholars have found this phrase more useful than judges, who had not used it by 1990. E.g., "I will skip over Borden's intelligent analysis of the current state of the law in Delaware; interesting material on determining value and 'sue facts'; the line-by-line dissection of SEC Rule 13e-3 . . . ." James C. Freund, Lawyer Confronts Peril in Going-Private Transactions, Legal Times, 24 Jan. 1983, at 13./ Rule 10b-5 and Santa Fe—Herein of Sue Facts, Shame Facts, and Other Matters, 87 W. Va. L. Rev. 189 (1985)./ "It would be possible, of course, to interpret clause (b) as prohibiting only misrepresentations relating to investment decisions ('investment facts') rather than decisions to bring suit for an injunction or appraisal ('sue facts'), as several commentators have suggested." Dennis S. Karjala, Federalism, Full Disclosure, and the National Market in the Interpretation of Federal Securities Law, 80 Nw. U.L. Rev. 1473, 1545 (1986).

sue out. Sue is best known to lawyers and nonlawyers alike in the sense "to institute legal proceedings against." Historically it has also been used in the PHRASAL VERBS sue out and sue forth, more commonly the former, in the sense "to make application before a court for the grant of (a writ or other legal process), often with implication of further proceedings being taken upon the writ" (OED). E.g., "[The] certificate from the clerk of the Court . . . [must state] the cause . . . and certify[ ] that such writ of error or appeal had been duly sued out and allowed." Sup. Ct. R. 32, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) vii (1821)./ "Again the defendant sued out a writ of error . . . ." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 140 (1973)./ "If no execution was sued out within a year and a day, the judgment became dormant."/ "'Defendant in error' is the distinctive term appropriate to the party against whom a writ of error is sued out." The phrase sue out, then, is not one of the phrases in which a preposition (here out) is merely an unnecessary particle. See out (A) & PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

suffer (= to permit or acquiesce in) is legal JARGON—an archaic use of an ordinary English word.

sufferance. So spelled; suffrance is a common misspelling.

suffice it to say is the SUBJUNCTIVE form of it suffices to say. E.g., "Suffice it to say that those cases were decided under facts dissimilar to those existing in the present case." The phrase is sometimes wrongly transformed into either suffice to say or sufficient to say—e.g.: "Suffice to say [read Suffice it to say] that, as things stood in 1973, common-law rules of allowable pleading of matters in several counts of a single indictment, and the permissible consequences of so pleading, had been melded with predecessor articles before the 1965 changes in article 21.24."/ "Congress had no authority to ratify the sale of the lien lands; sufficient to say [read suffice it to say] that the law is complete on the subject."

sufficiency; sufficience. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

sufficient. See adequate.

sufficiently . . . as to for sufficiently . . . to results from confusion with so . . . as to. E.g., "These anomalies appear sufficiently [read so] enmeshed in the current tangled web of the jurisprudence on this subject as to be beyond attempted amelioration by a panel of this circuit."/ "If the machine was in fact sufficiently defective as to [read so defective as to] create liability merely for marketing it, the failure to test adequately adds nothing." [Or read: If the machine was in fact sufficiently defective to create liability . . . .] See so as [+ infinitive].

sufficient number of is verbose for enough—e.g.: "It is obvious also that if a sufficient number of [read enough] individuals so weaken themselves, society will thereby be weakened." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 111 (1968).

suffrage (= [1] the right given to a member of a body, state, or society to vote in assent to a proposition or in favor of the election of a person; or [2] by extension, the right to vote for or against any controverted question or nomination) typically calls up notions of women's suffrage or universal suffrage, the most common phrases in which the word has appeared in the 20th century.

But the word has historically referred to the right of enfranchised citizens generally, without reference to disenfranchised groups—e.g.: "If we say that five or six hundred citizens are as many as can jointly exercise their right of suffrage, must we not deprive the people of the immediate choice of their public servants in every instance where the administration of the government does not require as many of them as will amount to one for that number of citizens?" The Federalist No. 57, at 354 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

suffrance. See sufferance.

suggestibility; compliance. These two terms have become key words in the law relating to false confessions. Suggestibility is the readiness with which a person accepts another's suggestion.

Generally speaking, people are more suggestible if they are unassertive, diffident, anxious, or unintelligent. Young people, too, are more suggestible than older people. Compliance is the extent to which a person will follow another's wishes to avoid confrontation or for some other short-term gain. A compliant person is usually eager to please and wants to avoid clashing with authority. Compliance can result from feelings of guilt. See Dorothy Wade, Why Say "I Did It" If You Didn't? The Independent, 23 Feb. 1992, at 22.

suggestible; suggestable. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A).

suggestio falsi; suppressio veri. Suggestio falsi (lit., "suggestion of an untruth") = misrepresentation without direct falsehood. Suppressio veri (lit., "suppression of the truth") = a tacit misrepresentation; a silent lie. These LATINISMS may be useful (probably with an accompanying explanation), for there are no comparably short English phrases that convey the same notions. Maitland cleverly used the phrases in figurative senses: "That is the worst of our mortgage deed—owing to the action of equity, it is one long suppressio veri and suggestio falsi. It does not in the least explain the rights of the parties; it suggests that they are other than they really are." F.W. Maitland, Equity 182 (J. Brunyate ed., 2d ed. 1936). See misrepresentation.

suicide. A. And *self-killing; self-murder; self-slaughter; felo-de-se. The five terms are generally synonymous, though the phrases self-murder and self-slaughter are charged with extremely negative connotations. Suicide and self-killing are broad terms that include every instance in which a person causes his or her own death within the legal rules of causation. Not always, though, was suicide so broad; when first used in the 17th century, it referred only to "the self-killing of a criminal fearing a worse fate: its scope grew steadily, in step with the tendency, profitable to the crown, to declare forfeit the goods of anyone who died by violence." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 64 (1966).

Suicide used to be included within the definition of homicide (= the killing of a human being by a human being), but the modern trend has been to distinguish the one from the other by defining homicide as "the killing of a human being by another human being."

B. As an Agent Noun. In the early 18th century, suicide took on the secondary sense of "one who dies by his or her own hand," and the word has been steadily used with this meaning ever since—e.g.: "Both the elder of Anne's sisters, Jane, and an aunt, Frances, were suicides." John Simon, Connoisseur of Madness, Addict of Suicide, New Criterion, Dec. 1991, at 58, 59. Earlier synonyms, now less frequently employed, include self-destroyer, self-killer, self-murderer, self-slayer, and felo-de-se.

C. As a Verb. The verb has been used intransitively <he suicided>, reflexively <he suicided himself>, and transitively <he suicided her>. In the intransitive and reflexive uses, the senses are self-evident; in the transitive use, the sense is "to drive to suicide." In legal writing, the most common use is the intransitive one—e.g.: "Three days later he suicided by drowning in Sanhican Creek." Bullis v. Pitman, 105 A. 589, 590 (N.J. Ch. 1918) / "[W]hatever the diagnosis of Nott's case, the inescapable fact remains that he suicided within forty-eight hours after his discharge." Nott v. State, 75 N.Y.S.2d 737, 740 (Ct. Cl. 1947)./ "On November 14, 1963, his mother, Lorine Asher Toole, suicided." State v. Toole, 173 So. 2d 872, 873 (La. Ct. App. 1965).

suicide victim, a seeming OXYMORON, is a phrase that suggests a dogmatic stand on the issue whether suicide is ever justifiable. The less doctrinaire equivalent, suicide (n.), probably better suits most legal contexts. E.g., "Typically, in his experience, the gun is found on the seat next to suicide victims [read suicides] or clutched in their hands." State v. Barrett, 445 N.W.2d 749, 756 (Iowa 1989) (Lavorato, J., dissenting).

sui juris; sui generis. Sui juris /soo-ee-jur-əs/ = (1) of full age and capacity; or (2) having full social and civil rights. Sense (1) is more usual—e.g.: "Since in the present case all the beneficiaries are not in being and sui juris, revocation by consent is impossible."/ "If the beneficiary is sui juris, the promisee, at his election, may maintain an action for breach of contract."/ "Resignation is effective only when approved by the proper court, unless the trust terms provide otherwise, or by consent of all the beneficiaries if they are sui juris." Often this LATINISM is easily translated into ordinary English; when that is so, it should be.

Sui generis /soo-ee-jen-ə-rəs/ (= of its own kind; individual; like only to itself) is an acceptable LATINISM because of its familiarity. The phrase is singular only, and should not be used with plural nouns. E.g., "That case has always been considered sui generis, and inconsistent with the fundamental principle of the action."/ "Garnishment is an anomaly, a statutory invention sui generis, with no affinity to any action known to the common law."/ "The strictly fundamental legal relations are, after all, sui generis; and thus it is that attempts at formal definition are always unsatisfactory, if not altogether useless."

The terms are sometimes confused. In the following sentence, for example, sui juris is wrongly made sui generis: "The expression 'uninhabited dwelling' is sui juris [read sui generis] and should be given some meaning not covered by the term 'dwelling' itself." Reeves v. State, 16 So. 2d 699, 702 (Ala. 1943).

suit; bill; action. Anciently, a litigant brought a suit or bill in equity and an action at law. At an early date, however, suit was imported into common-law procedure—hence the development of suit at law and lawsuit. E.g., "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved . . . ." U.S. Const. amend. VII./ "[The] bill of peace originated as a means or remedy of seeking to enjoin repeated attempts to litigate the same right." William Q. deFuniak, Handbook of Modern Equity 241 (1956).

suit, v.t. (= to sue), is obsolete in legal English, although the negative form nonsuit is still used as a verb. See action (A) & nonsuit.

suitability, in the sense "liability to suit" <the suitability of the states of the union>, is recorded in none of the major dictionaries. This sense is obfuscatory at best for lawyer-readers as well as for nonlawyers; it should be avoided. See nonsuitability.

suit at law is an esp. formal way of saying lawsuit, the usual term today. Generally, the careful writer would prefer to use one word rather than three if no nuance is lost. But when law is contrasted with equity, as in the following example, using the phrase makes good sense: "Here, the Neuzils filed the suit at law [i.e., as opposed to an equitable action]." Neuzil v. City of Iowa City, 451 N.W.2d 159, 163 (Iowa 1990). See suit.

suit money. In some American jurisdictions, this phrase refers to the husband's payment of the wife's attorney's fees in a divorce action.

suitor has virtually opposite meanings in lay and legal language, though a 17th-century writer found common ground: "Amonge sutors in love and in lawe money is a comoun medler" (OED quot. fr. c. 1660). The lay suitor seeks matrimony; the legal suitor seeks legal redress.

Suitor is properly used only of a complainant or plaintiff in a suit, as opposed to a defendant. E.g., "[A] suitor's conduct in relation to the matter at hand may disentitle him to the relief he seeks." Sanders v. U.S., 373 U.S. 1, 17 (1963)./ "Every suitor who resorts to chancery for any sort of relief by injunction may, on a mere statement of belief that the defendant can easily make away with or transport his money or goods, impose an injunction on him."/ "In an era when the greatest effort in history is being made to neutralize financial disparity in litigation, there is little reason why a suitor should have permitted his limited means to influence too late a start."

In the context of mergers and acquisitions, suitor retains its overtones of wooing: "The Delaware Supreme Court, in a ruling late yesterday afternoon, blocked a takeover of the publishing company by a rival suitor, Kohlberg, Davis, Roberts & Company, the leveraged-buyout firm." Jacob I. Fabrikant, Maxwell Wins on Macmillan, N.Y. Times, 3 Nov. 1988, at 29.

suit over. See over (A).

suit papers. See court papers.

suitwrong. This recent legal NEOLOGISM, unrecorded in the dictionaries, is hardly a model of lucidity. E.g., "The filing of the action against a suitwrong [read an inappropriate] corporate defendant did not toll the statute of limitations as to the correct defendant."

sum certain. See POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES.

summarily = by summary legal procedure. E.g., "When you are prosecuted for dangerous driving you may, if you wish, refuse to have your case dealt with in the police court—i.e. 'summarily'—and insist on being tried by a jury." Anon., The Home Counsellor 112 ([London: Odhams Press] c. 1940–45).

summary judgment = a judgment granted on a claim, about which there is no genuine issue of material fact and upon which the movant is entitled to prevail as a matter of law. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56.

When used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, summary judgment needs to be hyphenated: "And still more pressure was coming from Fish, who might well gut the Hunts' entire case by granting the banks' summary judgment [read summary-judgment] motion." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 294 (1989).

summary offence; indictable offence. In England, crimes are divided into summary offences, which are triable in the lower courts (magistrates' courts) without a jury, and indictable offences, which are triable in the Crown Court by jury. A few indictable offences, sometimes known as hybrid offences or dual offences, are triable either on indictment or summarily. Summary offences were formerly known as petty offences, but the expression fell into disuse because it minimized the seriousness of the crimes it described.

As Glanville Williams notes, the phrase summary offence has two liabilities: it exemplifies HYPALLAGE and misleadingly suggests greater substantive differences than it denotes: "The term 'summary offence' is now established, and is used in legislation; but it is somewhat inappropriate, since what is summary is not the offence itself but the mode of procedure. Even as applied to the mode of procedure 'summary' is an infelicitous adjective, because the procedure of magistrates' courts is supposed in general to be as careful and formal as trial by jury." Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law 10 (1978).

summation (AmE) = (1) the lawyer's closing argument at trial; or (2) formerly, a judge's closing speech to the jury summarizing the evidence (an equivalent of the BrE sense of summing-up)—e.g.: (Sense 2) "[T]he court in its summation of the evidence to the jury, referred to that fact . . . ." Kelly v. Georgia, 68 F. 652, 657 (S.D. Ga. 1895).

summing-up is the British phrase meaning "the judge's summary for the jury of the main points in evidence, together with his guidance on the form of the verdict to be given." E.g., "Their Lordships would repeat, it is the effect of the summing-up as a whole that matters and not any stated verbal formula used in the course of it." (Eng.)/ "The Judge's summing-up was brief but thorough, and after a short retirement the jury brought in a verdict of guilty." Stanley Jackson, The Life and Cases of Mr. Justice Humphreys 175 (n.d. [1951]). The AmE equivalent is jury instructions or instructions to the jury.

In AmE, summing up refers to the closing arguments of counsel: "The judge instructs the jury orally at the conclusion of the trial after the summing up arguments of counsel to the jury." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 672 (5th ed. 1994).

summer associate. See clerk.

summonee (= one who has been summoned) is omitted from the OED, W3, and most other dictionaries, but it has proved useful in legal writing. E.g., "The summonees' attempt to bring the summoned [read summonsed (q.v.)] documents within the work product doctrine is similarly meritless." U.S. v. Davis, 636 F.2d 1028, 1039 (5th Cir. 1981). See -EE (A).

summons, n., = (1) formerly, a writ directed to a sheriff and requiring him to summon a defendant to appear in court; or (2) a writ or process commencing the plaintiff's action and requiring a defendant to appear and answer.

summons, v.t., dates from the 17th century and is still in fairly common use in the sense (1) "to cite to appear before a court or a judge or magistrate"; or (2) "to request (information) by summons." The verb is properly inflected summonsed in the past tense, summonses in the third-person singular.

The term summonsed has some notable detractors, including U.S. District Judge Lynn N. Hughes, who has criticized the verb in private correspondence, and Glanville Williams: "The horrible expression 'summonsed for an offence' (turning the noun 'summons' into a verb) has now become accepted usage, but 'summoned' remains not only allowable but preferable." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 15 n.28 (11th ed. 1982).

When used in sense (1), as by saying that a person is summonsed, the verb appears to be a NEEDLESS VARIANT of summon, v.t.: "I came here because I had been summonsed [read summoned] by Medina council to pay £342 . . . ." David Sapsted, Poll Tax Case Collapses in Confusion, Times, 2 June 1990, at 1 (quoting David Icke).

In modern legal usage, however, a latent DIFFERENTIATION has emerged: by HYPALLAGE has arisen the idiom that information may be summonsed, as in sense (2). E.g.: "We view the requirement in this Circuit to be that the taxpayer must show that the Government actually possesses the information summonsed, such that enforcement of a summons is 'unnecessary.'" U.S. v. Texas Heart Inst., 755 F.2d 469, 476 (5th Cir 1985)./ "We conclude that the IRS is not already in possession of the summonsed information in the instant appeal."

summonses is the correct plural form of summons, n. E.g., "Mr. Winn does not ask us to send back the other summonses that are consequential summonses." (Eng.)/ "Before us are two appeals from separate orders of the district court enforcing two sets of Internal Revenue Service summonses." sumptuous; sumptuary. These words have almost opposite senses. Sumptuous = excessively luxurious; made or produced at great cost. Sump- tuary = relating to regulating expenditures by individuals on food, clothing, jewelry, and other personal items.

sundry (= various) is, in AmE, a quaint term with literary associations. The clichéd DOUBLET various and sundry ought to be avoided even in the most casual contexts, for it smacks of glibness.

sunk. See sink.

sunset law; sunshine law. Though superficially appearing as if they might be antonyms, these picturesque terms for administrative laws have little relation apart from their both arising in AmE during the 1970s.

Sunset law = a statute under which a governmental agency or program automatically terminates at the end of a fixed period unless it is formally renewed. By extension, the transitive verb sunset (= to subject to such a statute) likewise came into existence in the late 1970s. E.g., "[T]he legislature's failure to provide 'phase-out' deregulation resulted in the sunsetting of the entire state motor carrier regulatory scheme . . . ." Alterman Transp. Liner, Inc. v. Department of Transp., 519 So. 2d 1005, 1008 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1987). The past tense and past participle are awkwardly made sunsetted—e.g.: "We cannot decide to send this case first to the Collection Agency Board because it was sunsetted effective December 31, 1980 . . . ." Wiginton v. Pacific Credit Corp., 634 P.2d 111, 117 (Haw. Ct. App. 1981).

Sunshine law = a statute requiring a governmental department or agency to open its meetings and its records to public access. E.g., "Sunshine laws are aimed chiefly at keeping administrative decisions above board. The underlying assumption of sunshine laws is that it is unwise to permit our administrators to make public policy decisions behind closed doors." Kenneth F. Warren, Administrative Law in the American Political System 187 (1982).

superadd (= to add over and above) is rarely used in lay, and infrequently in legal, contexts. It is usually pompous in place of add—e.g.: "In many legal systems, therefore, a discretionary or moderating influence has been superadded [read added] to the rigour of formulated law." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 385 (7th ed. 1964).

supercede. See supersede.

supererogatory has two almost opposite sets of connotations, some positive and others negative. The core sense is "going beyond what is required." On the one hand, the word may connote "superfluous," and is often used in this way. On the other hand, it may mean "performing more than duty or circumstances require; doing more than is minimally needed."

superfirm = a large prestigious law firm. E.g., "Chris Harvey is from the Dallas superfirm of Strasburger, Price, Kelton, Martin and Unis, which has the reputation of being perhaps the best insurance defense office in Texas . . . ." Joseph C. Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 72 (1978). Cf. superlawyer.

SUPERFLUITIES of various kinds may be found in most legal writing. This entry contains a few common examples of unnecessary words: "A foreign mining corporation may carry on such functional intrastate operations as those of [omit those of] mining or refining."

Verbs are often unnecessarily repeated in comparisons—e.g.: "Of the many possible forms of human capital, none has received more attention over the past two decades than has [omit has] the economics of education."

Superfluous commas abound in most older judicial opinions—e.g.: "The witness who proved this, [omit comma] said . . . ." (1809)/ "The declaration stated, [omit comma] that the plaintiff . . . ." (1842). Even today, sentences just like those two are commonplace.

The best contemporary writing is free from such minor refuse; the fewer impediments we put in the way, the more likely readers are to follow. See CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF & VERBOSITY superimpose; superpose. Both forms are used in legal writing, the older form, superimpose (1794), being more familiar to most readers. E.g., "Superimposed upon this uniform system is the maximum grant regulation, the operative effect of which is to create two classes of needy children and two classes of families." Superpose, today rightly counted among NEEDLESS VARIANTS, is recorded from 1823.

superior. See inferior.

superlawyer dates from the early 1960s but was not popularized until Joseph C. Goulden published his book The Superlawyers in 1971. The word, largely confined to journalism, is typical of the glitzy, hyperbolic labels characteristic of journalese—as the second and third examples illustrate: "The French notaire is a superlawyer, especially trained for his work, a combination of lawyer, court clerk, and petty judge." René A.

Wormser, The Story of the Law 213 n.† (1962)./ "[T]his man . . . makes probably as much money a year as . . . the fabled Washington superlawyers Clark Clifford and Lloyd Cutler . . . ." Joseph C. Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 76 (1978)./ "The Harvard law professor and superlawyer has crowded his office in Cambridge, Mass., with enough paraphernalia to stock a Dershowitz museum." Steven Taylor, Dershowitz on the Offensive, National Jurist, April/May 1992, at 10.

The adjective super-lawyerlike may predate the noun: "In all likelihood, the general slant of the new Justice will be just about the opposite of Reed's—except for a similarly super-lawyerlike over-attention to detail." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 329 (1955). See lawyerly.

superlegislature. This tendentious term, dating from the 1920s, describes a court that usurps the power of the legislative branch of government. E.g., "To decide . . . [these matters] is, in my opinion, an exercise of the powers of a superlegislature—not the performance of the constitutional function of judicial review." Jay Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan, 264 U.S. 504, 534 (1924) (Brandeis, J., dissenting)./ "Our recent decisions make plain that we do not sit as a superlegislature to weigh the wisdom of legislation nor to decide whether the policy which it expresses offends the public welfare." Day-Brite Lighting, Inc. v. Missouri, 342 U.S. 421, 423 (1952)./ "Marshall made of the Court a sort of superlegislature, back in 1803 . . . ." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 25 (1955)./ "Rights such as these are in principle indistinguishable from those involved here, and to extend the 'compelling interest' rule to all cases in which such rights are affected would go far toward making this Court a 'superlegislature.'" Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 661 (1969) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

superpose. See superimpose.

supersede. A. Spelling. This word—from the Latin root -sed "to sit," not -ced "to move"—is the proper spelling. But so many other English words end in -cede or -ceed that many writers unconsciously distort the spelling of supersede. Spelling it correctly is one of the hallmarks of a punctilious writer. The misspelling occurs in some surprising places, as in Arthur A. Leff, The Leff Dictionary of Law, 94 Yale L.J. 1855, 1867 (1985), under "Abortion Act," and in nearly a thousand federal judicial opinions in the U.S. It has even fouled a statute: "Any demand for a product of discovery supercedes [read supersedes] any inconsistent order . . . ." Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 15.10(d)(2) (West 1987). And the title of a law-review article: Charles J. Yeager & Lee Hargrave, The Power of the Attorney General to Supercede [read Supersede] a District Attorney, 51 La. L. Rev. 733 (1991) (and passim in text).

B. Special Sense. In law, supersede sometimes carries the specialized sense "to invoke or make applicable the right of supersedeas against [an award of damages]," a sense unknown to nonlawyers, for whom the term means "to replace, supplant." Following are examples of the special legal use: "It is clear that, if the relator was entitled to supersede the judgment against him [i.e., post a supersedeas bond], the court of appeals has the power to enter any order necessary for that purpose."/ "In Aetna Club v. Jackson, the court of civil appeals had before it an original application for a writ of mandamus to require the trial judge to fix the amount of the bond necessary to supersede a final judgment granting an injunction."

C. Corresponding Noun. Supersession is the noun form, meaning either "the act of superseding" or "the state of being superseded." E.g., "[T]he writ of tolt died a natural death with the supersession of both forms of writ of right by the newer action of ejectment . . . ." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 46 (2d ed. 1953).

As with the verb, the internal -s- is sometimes incorrectly made -c-: "The Louisiana Supreme Court declared the statute authorizing supercession [read supersession] to be unconstitutional . . . ." Charles J. Yeager & Lee Hargrave, The Power of the Attorney General to Supercede [sic] a District Attorney, 51 La. L. Rev. 733, 734 (1991).

Supersedure is a NEEDLESS VARIANT in all but beekeeping contexts, but it still occasionally appears: "Despite the apparent supersedure [read supersession] of the act, however, some decisions continue to treat it as controlling in this area." E.W. Cleary, McCormick on Evidence § 97, at 24 (3d ed. Supp. 1987).

D. For surpass. This is a fairly unusual MALAPROPISM—e.g.: "Arguably, Russia supersedes [read surpasses] even England in the publication of Shakespeare's works and the staging of his plays." Melor Sturua, O.J. Through Russian Eyes, Wall St. J., 21 Sept. 1994, at A14.

supersede and displace. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

supersedeas, when used elliptically as an attributive noun for supersedeas bond or writ, forms the plural in -es. E.g., "It also prescribed the conditions upon which such appeals or writs of error should operate as supersedeases." Holland v. Webster, 29 So. 625, 630 (Fla. 1901) (Mabry, J., dissenting).

SUPERSTITIONS. In 1926, H.W. Fowler used the term "superstitions" in reference to what, in the field of writing, are merely "unintelligent applications of an unintelligent dogma" (MEU1 at 586). Experts in usage have long railed against them as arrant nonsense, yet they retain a firm grip—if not a stranglehold—on the average person's mind when it comes to how best to put words on paper. Most of them are perpetuated in the classrooms in which children and adolescents learn to write.

Most of these superstitions are treated elsewhere in this book, in the entry to which the reader is referred at the end of each subentry. For additional perspectives on these points, below are briefly collected the views of respected authorities on style, grammar, and usage.

A. Never End a Sentence with a Preposition. "The origin of the misguided rule is not hard to ascertain. To begin with, there is the meaning of the word 'preposition' itself: stand before. The meaning derives from Latin, and in the Latin language prepositions do usually stand before the words they govern. But Latin is not English. In English prepositions have been used as terminal words in a sentence since the days of Chaucer, and in that position they are completely idiomatic." Theodore M. Bernstein, Miss Thistlebottom's Hobgoblins: The Careful Writer's Guide to the Taboos, Bugbears, and Outmoded Rules of English Usage 177 (1971). See PREPOSITIONS (A)

B. Never Split an Infinitive. "[T]he split infinitive is in full accord with the spirit of modern English and is now widely used by our best writers." George O. Curme, English Grammar 148 (1947; repr. 1955)./ "However offensive it may be to many persons, the split infinitive makes clear beyond all doubt what the adverb modifies." G.C. Thornton, Legislative Drafting 28 (2d ed. 1979). See SPLIT INFINITIVES

C. Never Split a Verb Phrase. "When an adverb is to he used with [a compound verb], its normal place is between the auxiliary (or sometimes the first auxiliary if there are two or more) and the rest. Not only is there no objection to thus splitting a compound verb, but any other position for the adverb requires special justification: I have never seen her, not I never have seen her, is the ordinary idiom, though the rejected order becomes the right one if emphasis is to be put on have (I may have had chances of seeing her but I never have). But it is plain . . . that a prejudice has grown up against dividing compound verbs . . . . [I]t is entirely unfounded." H.W. Fowler, A Dictionary of Modern English Usage 464 (Ernest Gowers ed., 2d ed. 1965). See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (A)

D. Never Begin a Sentence with and or but. "Next to the groundless notion that it is incorrect to end an English sentence with a preposition, perhaps the most wide-spread of many false beliefs about the use of our language is the equally groundless notion that it is incorrect to begin one with 'but' or 'and.' As in the case of the superstition about the prepositional ending, no textbook supports it, but apparently about half of our teachers of English go out of their way to handicap their pupils by inculcating it. One cannot help wondering whether those who teach such a monstrous doctrine ever read any English themselves." Charles Allen Lloyd, We Who Speak English 19 (1938). See and (A) & but (A).

E. Never Write a One-sentence Paragraph. "[T]o interpose a one-sentence paragraph at intervals—at longish intervals—is prudent. Such a device helps the eye and enables the reader (especially if 'the going is heavy') to regain his breath between one impressive or weighty or abstruse paragraph and the next." Eric Partridge, Usage and Abusage 224–25 (5th ed. 1957; repr. 1963)./ "Basically, there are three situations . . . that can occasion a one-sentence paragraph: (a) when you wish to emphasize a crucial point that might otherwise be buried; (b) when you wish to dramatize a transition from one stage in your argument to the next; and (c) when instinct tells you that your reader is tiring and would appreciate a mental rest-station." John R. Trimble, Writing with Style 94 (1975).

F. Never Begin a Sentence with because. So novel and absurd is this superstition that seemingly no authority on writing has countered it in print. It appears to result from concern about fragments—e.g.: "Then the group broke for lunch. Because we were hungry." Of course, the second "sentence" is merely a fragment, not a complete sentence. (See INCOMPLETE SENTENCES (A).) But problems of that kind simply cannot give rise to a general prohibition against starting a sentence with because. Good writers do so frequently—e.g.: "Because of the war the situation in hospitals is, of course, serious." E.B. White, "A Weekend with the Angels," in The Second Tree from the Corner 3, 6 (1954)./ "Because the relationship between remarks is often vague in this passage, we could not rewrite it with certainty without knowing the facts . . . ." Donald Hall, Writing Well 104 (1973). See because (D).

G. Never Use since to Mean because. "It is a delusion that since may be used only as an adverb in a temporal sense ('We have been here since ten o'clock'). It is also a causal conjunction meaning for or because: 'Since it is raining, we had better take an umbrella.'" Roy H. Copperud, American Usage and Style: The Consensus 349 (1980). See as (A).

H. Never Use between with More Than Two Objects. "When Miss Thistlebottom taught you in grammar school that between applies only to two things and among to more than two, she was for the most part correct. Between essentially does apply to only two, but sometimes the 'two' relationship is present when more than two elements are involved. For example, it would be proper to say that 'The President was trying to start negotiations between Israel, Egypt, Syria and Jordan' if what was contemplated was not a round-table conference but separate talks involving Israel and each of the other three nations." Theodore M. Bernstein, Dos, Don'ts & Maybes of English Usage 29 (1977). See between (A).

I. Never Use the First-Person Pronouns I and me. "[I]f you want to write like a professional, just about the first thing you have to do is get used to the first person singular. Just plunge in and write 'I' whenever 'I' seems to be the word that is called for. Never mind the superstitious notion that it's immodest to do so. It just isn't so." Rudolf Flesch, A New Way to Better English 49 (1958). See FIRST PERSON (A).

J. Never Use Contractions. "Your style will obviously be warmer and truer to your personality if you use contractions like 'I'll' and 'won't' when they fit comfortably into what you're writing. 'I'll be glad to see them if they don't get mad' is less stiff than 'I will be glad to see them if they do not get mad.' There's no rule against such informality—trust your ear and your instincts." William Zinsser, On Writing Well 117 (3d ed. 1985). See CONTRACTIONS.

K. Never Use you in Referring to Your Reader. "Keep a running conversation with your reader. Use the second-person pronoun whenever you can. Translate everything into you language. This applies to citizens over 65 = if you're over 65, this applies to you. It must be remembered that = you must remember. Many people don't realize = perhaps you don't realize.

"Always write directly to you, the person you're trying to reach with your written message. Don't write in mental isolation; reach out to your reader." Rudolf Flesch, How to Be Brief: An Index to Simple Writing 114 (1962). See you.

supervene (= to come on or occur as something additional or extraneous; to come directly or shortly after something else, either as a consequence of it or in contrast with it) is rarely seen outside the law. E.g., "The attachment of a judgment lien will not sever the joint tenancy, thus leaving the judgment creditor exposed to the destruction of the lien by a supervening death of the judgment debtor."

supervening cause. See CAUSATION (D) & (E). supervision. See oversight.

supervisory; supervisorial. Supervisory = of or relating to supervision. Supervisorial = of or relating to a supervisor. E.g., "There shall be in each county a board of supervisors, to consist of three members who shall be qualified electors of their supervisorial district . . . ." McCarthy v. State, 101 P.2d 449, 451 (Ariz. 1940) (quoting a statute).

supplemental pleading; amended pleading. American caselaw is rife with judicial statements that counsel mislabeled an amended pleading by calling it a supplemental pleading, or vice-versa. The important distinction concerns when the events pleaded occurred. A supplemental pleading puts into the record matter that is material to an issue that has arisen after the filing of a pleading. An amended pleading, by contrast, puts right a matter that might have been pleaded at the time the pleading being amended was filed, but that was erroneously or inadvertently omitted or misstated. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a), 15(d).

supplementary; supplemental; suppletory; suppletive. Supplementary is the ordinary word. The other forms have the same meaning, namely, "of the nature of, forming, or serving as, a remedy to the deficiencies of something."

One might jump to brand the three other forms NEEDLESS VARIANTS, yet the law has found niches for two of them in special phrases. In the U.S., we refer usually to a supplemental pleading (q.v.), not supplementary. In older Anglo-American law, a suppletory oath was "an oath (given by a party in his own favor) admitted to supply a deficiency in legal evidence." These variant forms should be confined to these particular uses.

Suppletive is probably best considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT of supplementary—e.g.: "Here the legal need is for substantive suppletive [read supplementary] rules, rules which presuppose and supplement the incomplete private transaction with specific 'terms.'" R.E. Speidel et al., Commercial Law Teaching Materials 2 (4th ed. 1987). "This framework consists mostly of suppletive [read supplementary] rules of law." A.N. Yiannopoulos, Of Legal Usufruct, the Surviving Spouse, and Article 890 of the Louisiana Civil Code, 49 La. L. Rev. 803, 803 (1989).

supplicant; suppliant. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former, an ARCHAISM referring to one who supplicates—i.e., who begs, prays, or humbly petitions or entreats. Supplicant has the advantage of more immediately suggesting the corresponding verb.

supply an omission. In the modern idiom, we make up for or remedy or compensate for an omission rather than supplying it. E.g., "The class action rule does not suggest that the zeal or talent of the representative plaintiffs' attorney can supply [read make up for] the omission of the requirement that claims of the representative parties be typical of the class." Nothing can supply an omission. One can supply (= to make up a deficiency in [OED]) in an obsolete sense of the word. But today supply is so closely connected with the sense "to provide" that it seems almost contradictory to write of supplying (providing) an omission.

supposable; supposit(it)ious; suppositional; suppositive. Supposable = capable of being supposed; presumable. The words suppositious and supposititious sometimes cause confusion. Although some modern dictionaries list these as variants, some DIFFERENTIATION is both possible and desirable. Suppositious should be used to mean "hypothetical; theoretical; assumed." Supposititious should be confined to its usual sense, "illegitimate; spurious; counterfeit." E.g., "May there not be feigned legal relations, fictitious legal rights and duties, supposititious titles?" Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 27 (1967). In legal contexts, supposititious when applied to a child means "falsely presented as a genuine heir" (W10). E.g., "The main question in dispute was whether one calling himself 'Archibald Douglas' was the legitimate child of Lady Jane Douglas or was supposititious." (Eng.) The phrase supposititious will = a fake or falsified will.

Suppositional = conjectural, hypothetical. It has much the same sense as suppositious, and is perhaps generally the clearer word. Suppositive (= characterized by supposition; supposed) is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of supposititious and suppositional.

supposing is inferior to suppose in introducing a hypothetical. E.g., "Supposing [read Suppose] that car A collides with car B at this intersection."

supposition; supposal; suppose, n. In legal contexts, as in most contexts, supposition is the ordinary word, and the others are probably NEEDLESS VARIANTS. Supposal is sometimes used by logicians.

supposit(it)ious; suppositional; suppositive. See supposable.

suppressible; suppressable. The former spelling is standard. See -ABLE (A). suppressio veri. See suggestio falsi.

supra. This citational signal is disfavored in modern legal writing, inasmuch as short-form citations are more convenient for the reader. An archaic variant of supra is ubi supra (= as above). E.g., "In Inches v. Hill, ubi supra [read 698 F.2d at 344, e.g., if the case has previously been cited in full], the same person had become owner of the equitable life estate and of the equitable remainder, and, no reason appearing to the contrary, the court decreed a conveyance by the trustees to the owner." See infra (B) & ante.

supraconstitutional (= above the constitution) is a NEOLOGISM that might be apt in some circumstances but is ready-made for hyperbole. Following is the earliest known example: "Calling the court 'a supraconstitutional body that has made itself unaccountable to the people of Illinois,' [Professor Louisin] also took a swipe at the court's inability to 'root out corruption among judges.'" Paul Marcotte, Auditing Dispute, A.B.A. J., Aug. 1990, at 16, 16.

supralegal (= above the law) is a NEOLOGISM that has enjoyed moderate success in modern legal writing. E.g., "We might suppose from this phrase that Bodin intended his sovereign to be an irresponsible supra-legal power, and some of the language in the Republic does seem to support that interpretation." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 9 (5th ed. 1955).

supranational is a term used of a body of law that is of higher authority and wider application than national law, but yet is not international or worldwide, such as European Community Law. E.g., "The decisions of the Community derive their binding force from the fact that they are taken by organs endowed with the appropriate power by the Treaties . . . . To describe this new type of political organism, the word 'supranational' has been used." Trevor C. Hartley, The Foundations of European Community Law 6–7 (1981).

supra protest. The phrase can be translated under protest, and ought to be. Spelling the phrase with a circumflex (suprâ protest) is an error, perhaps the result of HYPERCORRECTION—e.g.: "Then any person, not being a party already liable thereon, may, with the consent of the holder, intervene and accept the bill suprâ protest [read under protest or supra protest] . . . ." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 187 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950).

supreme court, in most American jurisdictions, denotes the highest court of appeal. New York, like South Africa, is an exception; The New York Times has editorialized about the names of the New York courts and their judges: "The trial court is misnamed the Supreme Court, which is what most people expect to find at the top. A system that uses the term Supreme Court justice for judges of original jurisdiction is a system that resists modernization and invites cynicism." N.Y. Times, 3 Jan. 1985, at Y18.

Supreme Court of Judicature, an English court, consists of the High Court of Justice (q.v.), the Court of Appeal (q.v.), and the Crown Court. The Supreme Court of Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 consolidated the following courts into the Supreme Court of Judicature: Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, Chancery, Probate, Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Admiralty, and (from 1883) the London Court of Bankruptcy. The phrase is a misnomer, really, because the House of Lords is superior to all the courts just mentioned.

Supreme Court of the United States. See United States Supreme Court.

supreme law of the land. See law of the land.

sur appears in various LAW FRENCH phrases. It means merely "on"; the English word should supplant it wherever possible. E.g., "About 18 months thereafter the plaintiff caused to be issued an attachment sur judgment [read on the judgment] in which the City of Philadelphia Police Beneficiary Association was summoned as garnishee." Mamlin v. Tener, 23 A.2d 90, 91 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1941). For action sur le case, see action on the case.

surcease = a cessation; a temporary respite. To confuse this word with solace (= that which gives comfort when one has experienced disappointment, stress, or grief) is a MALAPROPISM. "Having failed to offer the challenged testimony in an acceptable manner, appellant may not draw surcease [read solace] from Chambers, which is inapplicable."/ "Knighton sought a stay of execution and other habeas surcease [read solace] in a petition filed in district court," See death.

surety, n., in law, usu. means either (1) "a formal engagement entered into, a pledge, bond, guarantee, or security given for the fulfillment of an undertaking," or (2) "one who undertakes some specific responsibility on behalf of another." Sense (1), illustrated in the following sentence, is slightly less usual: "One nominated as trustee is not required to take an oath that he will faithfully discharge his duties as trustee, or to execute a bond with satisfactory sureties conditioned upon the faithful performance of his duties." The archaic lay sense "certainty" is rarely encountered today.

In the broad sense, a guarantor is a type of surety (sense [2]). But some authorities distinguish between the two terms, giving surety a narrow sense: a surety joins in the same promise as the principal and becomes primarily liable, while a guarantor makes a separate promise and is only secondarily liable—i.e., liable only if the principal defaults.

The word surety has three syllables /shoor-ə-tee/.

suretyship; suretiship. The former spelling is preferred.

surmisal is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of surmise, n. surmise and conjecture. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

surname; Christian name. The surname is the part of a name not given in baptism but acquired originally by accident or by custom and common to all the members of the family. In many cases it was derived from physical characteristics and later transmitted to descendants; in other cases it indicated paternity, e.g., Davidson. In Gaelic, MacDonald indicated the son of Donald. Such names came to be called surnames from the sire or father. A person can adopt any surname so long as he or she does not do so with fraudulent intent. In modern practice a woman, upon marrying, frequently adds (but need not) her husband's surname to her own, e.g., Hillary Rodham Clinton. And often, of course, she keeps her own without adding his.

The Christian name or forename is older; it was the baptismal name and in medieval England was the only name. Surnames were given later to differentiate, e.g., in a charter Testibus Willelmo Cancellario et Roberto filio Haemonis.

The first name of a person not of the Christian faith is better called a forename. E.g., "'Woranoj' is the forename and 'Anurugsa' is the surname of my friend in Bangkok."

surplus is the tendentiously humorous group term for lawyers—the invention of Eric Partridge. See Usage and Abusage 300 (5th ed. 1957). Hence we have a gaggle of geese, a bevy of quail, a flock of sheep, and a surplus of lawyers.

surplusage; surplus. The distinction is slight. Surplus, the fundamental term, means "what remains over, what is not required for the purpose at hand, esp. excess of public revenue over expenditure for the financial year" (COD). Surplusage is a NEEDLESS VARIANT in all senses but the primarily legal one: "an excess or superabundance of words; a word, clause, or statement in an indictment, plea, or legal instrument that is not necessary to its adequacy, or in a statute that is merely redundant and insignificant." Courts often recite the canon of construction that prevents them from reading statutory or contractual language in a way that renders part of it surplusage. Surplusage, like surplus, is stressed on the first syllable.

surrebutter; surrebuttal. See rebuttal, -ER (B) & COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS.

surrejoinder. See -ER (B) & COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS.

surrender, in the language of nonlawyers, is confined to contexts of battles, literal or metaphorical. In the language of the law, it continues in the archaic sense of yielding up something. For example, in the law of leaseholds, it is a TERM OF ART that denotes "the termination of a lease, which occurs when a tenant gives up his or her interest to the landlord, followed by delivery of possession of the premises"—e.g.: "A lease may be terminated by surrender, a 'yielding up' to the owner of the reversion or remainder." 1 American Law of Property 390 (A.J. Casner ed., 1952).

surrenderee (= one to whom property is surrendered) dates from the 17th century and is still occasionally used. E.g., "The estate surrendered would merge in the estate of the surrenderee." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 169 (2d ed. 1988). See -EE (A). surrogacy; surrogateship. Both may mean "the position of a surrogate." (See surrogate.) Surrogacy, the more usual form, is the only one used in the sense "the fact or state of being a surrogate (as a surrogate mother)." E.g., "The British bill permits a surrogate mother to be paid for her services, which is reasonable, but then would throw the criminal law at any intermediary who might be involved, or at any service that advertises surrogacy." (Eng.)/ "Proponents of surrogacy seek to distinguish surrogacy from babyselling and adoption . . . ." Irma S. Russell, Within the Best Interests of the Child, 27 J. Fam. L. 587, 596 (1989).

For the sense "the office of a [judicial] surrogate," it would be helpful to use surrogateship rather than surrogacy because of the specialized connotations becoming encrusted on the latter. The Century Dictionary supports this usage, which also appears in caselaw—e.g.: "[B]efore his surrogateship, [Surrogate David B. Ogden was] regarded by his contemporaries as not second to Webster at the federal bar . . . ." In re de Saulles, 167 N.Y.S. 445, 449 (Sur. Ct. 1917).

surrogate, n. = (1) something that is put in the place of another as a successor or substitute; (2) in some states of the U.S., a judge with probate jurisdiction; or (3) in G.B., the deputy of an ecclesiastical judge, of a bishop or bishop's chancellor, esp. one who grants licences to marry without banns (OED). Sense (1), the generic one, is by far the most widespread—e.g.:

- "To many observers, leading the Western World by standing up to the Soviets and their surrogates in this manner was the heart of the President's job." Jonathan A. Bush, Book Review, 80 Va. L. Rev. 1723, 1723 (1994) (reviewing John H. Ely, War and Responsibility (1993)).
- "Market share has long served as a surrogate for market power." Michael S. Jacobs, The New Sophistication in Antitrust, 79 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 53 n.44 (1994).
- "[W]hen a patient is incompetent and no surrogate is available, practitioners are forced either to use substituted judgment or to act in the best interest of the patient—in short, to adopt the family's viewpoint and bear their ethical burdens." Peter Cherbas, Paradigms and Our Shrinking Bioethics, 69 Ind. L.J. 1105, 1111 (1994).

Sense (2) appears mostly in New York and other jurisdictions in the eastern U.S. "[W]hile there undoubtedly is merit to that learned Surrogate's objection, it does not seem to this court that an objection of surmise is any more meritorious in the area of revocation of wills, than it is to other areas of probate law." In re Will of Collins, 458 N.Y.S.2d 987, 993 (Sur. Ct. 1982).

surveil is a relatively new, and decidedly useful, verb corresponding to the noun surveillance. It is, in fact, a BACK-FORMATION from the noun. The participial and past-tense forms are surveilling and surveilled. E.g., "The chief of police directed several police officers to surveil different locations in town."/ "The simple fact of a meeting at a restaurant takes on a much greater meaning based upon the information that the surveilling agents had obtained from the informants." The OED gives the year 1960 as the date of its first recorded use, by an American Court at that: "The plaintiff also stresses that the store as a whole, and the customer exits especially, were closely surveilled." Alexandre of London v. Indem. Ins. Co., 182 F. Supp. 748, 750 (D.D.C. 1960).

William Safire spelled the verb surveille in his column dated 6 Oct. 1985, but this spelling is inferior. See Invasion of the Verbs, N.Y. Times, 6 Oct. 1985, at 6–12 ("Other Lexicographic Irregulars wince at such back-formations as to surveille [read surveil] . . .").

surveillance, place under, is an established phrase that was necessary before surveil, q.v., was developed as a verb. The metaphor of placing under surveillance does not work in all contexts, however. Surveillance can be had of both persons and places, but only persons can be "placed under surveillance," because the metaphor of "placing" will not work for real property (which, as an immovable, cannot conceivably be "placed"). E.g., "The parking lot was placed under surveillance, and the watching officers [read The officers conducted surveillance of the parking lot and] observed Miller drive up in a 1979 Lincoln Continental at 8:00 p.m." survival statute. See death statute.

survivance is not a mere NEEDLESS VARIANT of survival, although it is increasingly rare. Survivance is used solely in G.B. and means "the succession to an estate, office, etc. of a survivor nominated before the death of the existing occupier or holder; the right of such succession in case of survival" (OED). E.g., "The right exists by virtue of survivance and cannot be excluded by will or otherwise, nor can it be apportioned unequally among the children." (Scot.)/ "He would have to exercise on survivance the rights, and come under the obligations, stipulated in regard to the surviving partner by the articles of association." (Eng.)

surviving widow(er). The gender-neutral equivalent, surviving spouse (= a spouse who outlives the other), is preferable in modern contexts. E.g., "[T]he proprietary interest of the estate of the appointor is one which arises only in default of appointment and in the event of there being no surviving widow [read surviving spouse]." Baird v. Baird, [1990] 2 All E.R. 300, 305 (P.C.).

survivorship = (1) the state or condition of being the one person out of two or more who remains alive after the others die; or (2) the right of a surviving party having a joint interest with others in an estate to take the whole. E.g., "Tenants in common are owners of undivided shares in the land. There is no survivorship between them, i.e., when one dies that person's share in the property passes to the decedent's heirs or devisees." A. James Casner & W. Barton Leach, Cases and Text on Property 255 (3d ed. 1984).

susceptible (of) (to) (for). The only prepositions with which this verb may properly be construed are of and to. Usage has differentiated susceptible of from susceptible to, the latter now being more common in ordinary lay contexts. Susceptible to = capable of receiving and being affected by (external impressions, influences, etc., esp. something injurious); sensitive to; liable or open to (attack, injury, etc.). E.g., "Some courts have not required that the contestant produce evidence to indicate that the testator is susceptible to undue influence."

Susceptible of was formerly used in this sense, but is now confined to the senses, common in law, of (1) "capable of undergoing, admitting of (some action or process such as interpretation)"; (2) "capable of taking or admitting (a form, meaning, or other attribute)"; or (3) "capable of receiving into the mind, conceiving, or being inwardly affected by (a thought, feeling, or emotion)." Sense (1) of susceptible of is perhaps most common—e.g.: "These damages are not susceptible of exact proof and the amount is left largely to the sound discretion and common sense of the jury."/ "The timberland was theoretically susceptible of such use."/ "Admittedly, this language is susceptible of the interpretation placed upon it by the district court." Sense (2) also frequently appears—e.g.: "A latent ambiguity exists where the language of the will, though clear on its face, is susceptible of more than one meaning, when applied to the extrinsic facts to which it refers."/ "News matter, however little susceptible of ownership or dominion in the absolute sense, is stock in trade to both parties alike."

In the following sentences, to wrongly displaces of in sense (2): "The phrase is susceptible to [read of] more than one interpretation."/ "The rule that statutes in derogation of the common law should be strictly construed does not mean that the statute should be given the narrowest meaning to [read of] which it is susceptible."

Rarely is susceptible of misused for susceptible to, but the mistake does occur—e.g.: "The selection procedure is susceptible of [read to] abuse and is not racially neutral."/ "Appellant argues that that complaint, labeled conversion, does not state a cause of action because the subject matter is money, and mere money is not susceptible of [read to] conversion."

Susceptible for is quite wrong—e.g.: "We remanded for factual findings concerning whether the timberland at issue was susceptible for [read of] use to produce interest, dividends, rents, or royalties."

Susceptible is sometimes mispronounced, even by educated speakers, /sək-sep-tə-bəl/ rather than the correct /sə-sep-tə-bəl/.

suspect, adj.; suspicious. Generally, the former denotes a fully formulated impression, while the latter denotes only an incipient impression. Suspect = regarded with suspicion or distrust; suspected <suspect findings>. Suspicious = (1) open to, deserving of, or exciting suspicion ; (2) full of, inclined to, or feeling suspicion <an unduly suspicious supervisor>.

suspect, n. See unknown suspect.

suspendible; suspendable; suspensible. The first is the standard term; the second and third are NEEDLESS VARIANTS. See -ABLE (A). suspension of deportation; withholding of deportation. In American immigration law, these phrases denote distinctive procedures. A suspension of deportation, resulting in permanent residency, is granted when a potential deportee proves "extreme hardship"—an admittedly vague concept. A withholding of deportation, resulting only in temporary residency in the U.S., is granted when a potential deportee proves that he or she will suffer persecution (not just discrimination) because of race, religion, political opinion, or social position. See deportee.

suspensory; suspensive. Suspensory conditions are conditions precedent that suspend the operation of a contractual promise until those conditions are met. The phrase suspensive conditions is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—except in Scotland, where it is usual.

suspicious. See suspect, adj.

sustain is a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD if ever there was one. Idiomatically, we speak of sustaining damage, of sustaining motions, and of sustaining a population. Other variations with slight nuances are possible, and all are permissible because of historical usage. Sustain may mean "to undergo, experience, have to submit to (evil, hardship or damage)" (OED). E.g., "The testatrix died from injuries she sustained in the automobile accident."/ "Various train cars sustained damage totaling over a million dollars." Or it may mean "to uphold the validity of." E.g., "The important question is whether the statute can be sustained."

The sense "to nourish or support life in" is one of the general lay senses of the word. Additionally, sustain may mean "to keep up or keep going"—e.g.: "Green's medical records indicate that he has sustained [better experienced] remarkably good health during his confinement in the prison."

Given these multifarious senses, few uses of the word seem to be objectionable; in the following sentence, however, it appears to have been used as a turgid substitute for have: "Neither the defendant nor the man who made the patterns sustained [read had] any relation by contract with the plaintiff."

sustainment; sustentation. What is the noun corresponding to the verb sustain, as in "Objection sustained"? Up to 1940, the learned word sustentation was more common in legal texts, but since then sustainment has appeared nearly twice as often.

Even so, both forms are BURIED VERBS. Thus, one should try to use the verb instead of either of the nouns—e.g.: "The sustentation of the motion for sanctions was plain error only if a manifest injustice resulted therefrom." State v. Williams, 828 S.W.2d 894, 898 (Mo. Ct. App. 1992). [Read: In sustaining the motion for sanctions, the court committed plain error only if a manifest injustice resulted.]

SWAPPING HORSES while crossing the stream is H.W. Fowler's term for "changing a word's sense in the middle of a sentence, by vacillating between two constructions either of which might follow a word legitimately enough, by starting off with a subject that fits one verb but must have something tacitly substituted for it to fit another, and by other such performance." (MEU 589.) E.g., "The subject of this paper, however, is the evidentiary rule and concerns those situations where evidence is sought from the lawyer through compulsion of law." The writer has switched gears mentally from "subject . . . is" to "paper . . . concerns." [Read The subject of this paper, however, is the evidentiary rule and those situations in which . . . , or This paper, however, concerns the evidentiary rule and those situations in which . . . .] swear, v.t., in law often takes phrasal objects, whereas in nonlegal contexts its objects are almost uniformly clauses beginning with the relative pronoun that. Specimens of the legal usage follow: "I might add that the reference to swearing a petition and an affidavit in support is to a practice no longer in use." (Eng.)/ "In correct legal phraseology, the deponent swears an affidavit and the judge takes it."

Swear is also sometimes used as a shorthand form for swear in—e.g.: "Swear the witness."/ "One who calls a witness and has him sworn, vouches his credibility and is not permitted to discredit him unless taken by surprise." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 20 n.9 (1916)./ "When Stewart said that he preferred not to have the jury sworn until Monday, so that if a juror became ill over the week-end a replacement could be chosen on Monday morning, Darrow protested that the jury should be sworn at once . . . ." Ray Ginger, Six Days or Forever? 99 (1958).

swear out (= to obtain the issue of [a warrant for arrest] by making a charge upon oath) is an American legalism dating from the 19th century. E.g., "He walked into the trap, swore out a criminal warrant, and haled us before Judge Tompkins sitting as a magistrate." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 69 (1943). See out (A) & PARTICLES, UNNECESSARY.

sweat > sweat > sweat. So declined.

swing vote = an appellate judge's vote that determines an issue on which the other judges are evenly split. The agent noun is swing voter—e.g.: "Since President Reagan appointed O'Connor eight years ago, her role in many divisive issues—thanks in part to the arrival of two additional conservatives—has evolved from that of habitual dissenter to that of frequent swing voter." All Eyes on Justice O'Connor, Newsweek, 1 May 1989, at 34.

sworn affidavit is a common REDUNDANCY syllabus. Pl. -buses, -bi. American judges and college professors are fond, perhaps overfond, of the Latin plural. Though Gowers wrote (wishfully?) that "[t]he plural -buses is now more used than -bi" (MEU2 at 610), in American judicial opinions -bi outstrips -buses by more than fifty to one. See PLURALS (A).

SYLLEPSIS. See ZEUGMA AND SYLLEPSIS.

sympathy. See empathy.

symposium. Pl. -siums. Symposia is a pedantry. See PLURALS (A).

synallagmatic contract (= [in civil law] a contract involving mutual obligations; a bilateral contract) dates back to the early 19th century. But in Anglo-American law, the sensible approach is to use the predominant Anglo-American term: bilateral contract. E.g., "Every synallagmatic [read bilateral] contract contains in it the seeds of the problem: in what event will a party be relieved of his undertaking to do that which he has agreed to do but has not yet done?" Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co. v. Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha, [1962] 2 Q.B. 26, 65 (per Diplock, L.J.)./ "[T]he judge referred to the well-known distinction discussed in the speeches between synallagmatic [read bilateral] contracts and unilateral or 'if' contracts, such as options . . . ." Chiltern Court (Baker Street) Residents Ltd v. Wallabrook, Prop. Co. [1988] 2 Est. Gaz. L. Rep. 253, 253.

sync, short for synchronism or synchrony, is preferred to synch. E.g., "Section 7 is simply out of sync with a changing jurisprudence."

synchronous; synchronic; synchronal. The second and third are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

SYNESIS. In some contexts meaning, rather than the strict requirements of grammar or syntax, controls in the question of SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT. Henry Sweet, the 19th-century English grammarian, used the term "antigrammatical constructions" for these triumphs of logic over grammar. (Expressions in which grammar triumphs over logic are termed "antilogical.") Modern grammarians call the principle underlying these antigrammatical constructions "synesis."

The classic example of an antigrammatical construction is the phrase a number of (= several, many). It is routinely followed by a plural verb, even though technically the singular noun number is the subject: "[A] number of scholastic . . . dogmas have grown up which tend to obscure the real function of precedent in our legal reasoning." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 268 (7th ed. 1964). (See number of, a.) But if the definite article the appears rather than the indefinite a, the verb is singular—e.g.: "She said that the number of participants was disappointing."

Of course, some writers use the construction a number of things is, but the resulting sentence invariably looks priggish—e.g.:

- "The Maccabaean Lecture aroused an interest greater than it deserved. There is [read are] a number of reasons for this." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals vii (1968).

- "However, there is [read are] a number of exceptions to this rule, whose importance appears to be increasing today." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 260 (3d ed. 1981).
- "A number of federal statutes which deal with the allowance of costs has [read have] been considered." 6 James W. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice par. 54.77[2], at 54-410 (1988).

Although writers are perfectly justified in writing a number of people were there, some avoid the construction merely to prevent raised eyebrows. Instead, they write many people or several people. This sound practice keeps readers from being distracted.

If a number of people were is grammatically safe, however, similar constructions involving collective nouns are somewhat more precarious. The rule consistently announced in 20th-century grammars is as follows: "Collective nouns take sometimes a singular and sometimes a plural verb. When the persons or things denoted are thought of as individuals, the plural should be used. When the collection is regarded as a unit, the singular should be used." George L. Kittredge & Frank E. Farley, An Advanced English Grammar 101 (1913). Generally, then, with nouns of multitude, one can justifiably use a plural verb.

Among the common nouns of multitude are bulk, bunch, flood, handful, host, mass, majority, minority, percentage, proportion, variety. Each of these is frequently followed by of + [plural noun] — [plural verb]—e.g.:

- "A great variety of techniques were employed." (A variety of = several.)
- "Few younger lawyers have escaped his influence, but only a handful of them possesses [read possess] his creative zest or renovating energy." (A handful of = several.)
- "A flood of questions come to mind as I consider the future application of such a theory."
- "In each of these instances, as so often in our history, a majority of the Justices were behind the political times." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 11 (1955).
- "A high percentage of cases are of a routine nature." Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr., "A Trial Judge," in Whereas—A Judge's Premises 3, 4 (1965).
- "Thus, in relation to the total number of prosecutions, only a small proportion are taken by the Director." R.M. Jackson, The Machinery of Justice in England 138 (5th ed. 1967).
- "A large mass of rules of evidence restrict the questions that might be asked . . . ." Id. at 142.
- "[T]he great mass of these social prohibitions is [read are] not directly against the making of contracts as such but against the doing of acts." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 55 (1968).
- "There is [read are] also a host of new difficulties that are even more salient in contract than they were in torts . . . ." Bruce A. Ackerman, Reconstructing America 61 (1984).
- "The vast bulk of recorded crimes falls [read fall] into the category of property offences." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 39 (1991).

As shown in the last two examples, these nouns of multitude are not just acceptably treated as plural. One might go so far as to say that host and mass are preferably treated as plurals when they are followed by of and a plural noun.

Very occasionally, an AMBIGUITY arises: "There is now a variety of antidepressant drugs that can help lift these people out of their black moods." If the sense of a variety of is "several," then are is the appropriate verb; if the sense of the phrase is "a type of," then is is the appropriate verb.

But the nouns amount, class, group, and (ironically) multitude all typically call for singular verbs:

- "[S]pecific relief will be given if practicable where the amount of damages are [read is] so uncertain and speculative, for any reason, that the fixing of the amount . . . by the jury could not be guided by any definite standard . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 309 (1930).
- "Needless to say, there are [read is] a multitude of examples." Charles P. Curtis, Jr., Lions Under the Throne 220 (1947).
- "The most important class of chattels real are [read is] leasehold estates." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 80 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). (The be-VERB follows the number of its subject, not of its predicate.)
- "A group of states have [read has] enacted broad cy pres, or reformation, statutes, of which the Vermont statute is an example . . . ." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 218 (2d ed. 1984).
- "But even if a group of members decide [read decides] to challenge such an agreement . . . there is no guarantee that the government will provide time for a debate or the opportunity of a vote." Michael Zander, The Law-Making Process 70 (2d ed. 1985). (In a BrE text, this usage is defensible; it would be less so in an AmE text. See COLLECTIVE NOUNS.)

There may be little or no logical consistency in the two sets of examples just given—justifiable plurals and less justifiable ones—but the problem lies just outside the realm of logic, in the genius of the language. It is no use trying to explain why we say, on the one hand, that pair of shoes is getting old, but on the other hand, the pair were perfectly happy after their honeymoon.

For more on grammatical agreement generally, see CONCORD & COLLECTIVE NOUNS synonym(it)y. Synonymy is the preferred form. See synonymous.

synonymous (in the sense "coextensive") is a LEGALISM not found in general lay writing. E.g., "Nor do we subscribe to the argument that Merrill's powers of control over partnership property as a general partner of a limited partnership are per se synonymous with the partnership's." The corresponding noun is used in an analogous sense—e.g.: "Given the synonymy between the limits of the Louisiana long-arm statute and those of due process, it becomes necessary to consider only whether the exercise of jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant comports with due process."

The word is frequently misspelled synonomous, as here: "'Special inquiry officer' is synonomous [read synonymous] with immigration judge." Purba v. INS, 884 F.2d 516, 517 (9th Cir. 1989).

SYNONYMY. The myth is that no two words in the language can have identical meanings, as stated here: "strictly speaking, no two words have the same meaning. There are connotations that attach to language and even two synonyms will suggest slightly different meanings to a reader." Norman Brand & J.O. White, Legal Writing: The Strategy of Persuasion 114 (1976). Adherents to this view must contend that restitutional and restitutionary are merely different forms of the same word—not different words—and must resort to etymology to distinguish sedulous from assiduous.

This belief may help explain the inclination of lawyers to use DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS. E.g., "The indictment alleged that respondents unlawfully kept, confined, and imprisoned George in a dark, cold, and unwholesome room."/ "Vendor does grant, bargain, sell, assign, convey, transfer, set over, and deliver the land to the purchaser." Instead of using these verbal strings, the writer should determine which of the words can be subsumed under (and therefore omitted because of the presence of) broader terms. In the first sentence quoted above, imprison certainly encompasses confine and keep; in the second, grant or convey would easily suffice. Lawyers generally seek to cover every contingency, especially in DRAFTING; we should do so, however, discriminatingly rather than in blunderbuss fashion.

systemic; systematic. Systemic should be systematic unless the reference is systems of the body, as in systemic disorders. E.g., "The plaintiffs alleged systemic [read systematic] disparate treatment of minority groups."/ "The complaint alleged across-the-board, systemic [read systematic] discrimination against black employees."

table, v.t., has nearly opposite senses in AmE and BrE. By tabling an item, Americans mean postponing discussion for a later time, while Britons mean putting forward for immediate discussion. Thus Americans might misunderstand a use like the following one: "MPs from both sides of the Commons will tomorrow table parliamentary questions demanding to know what official action has been taken to uncover the facts . . . ." John Furbisher & Richard Caseby, "God's Policeman" Keeps Head Down as Bricks Fly, Sunday Times, 10 June 1990, at 1-4.

taboo; tabu. The former spelling is standard. For the verb to taboo (= to exclude or prohibit by authority or social influence [COD]), the past tense is tabooed rather than taboo'd. E.g., "A copyrighted work is not tabooed to subsequent workers in the same field."

tabula rasa (= a blank tablet ready for writing; a clean slate) has been an esp. common metaphor in legal writing. It has grown into a CLICHÉ.

Pl. tabulae rasae.

tactile; tactual. The latter has become merely a NEEDLESS VARIANT. Tactile is the usual word meaning either "of or relating to touch" or "touchable; tangible."

tail, in the legal sense denoting a type of limited freehold estate, is a LAW FRENCH term, deriving ultimately from the Old French verb taillier "to cut, shape, hence to fix the precise form of, to limit." Formerly, the anglicized word was spelled taille, but today it is spelled tail as in fee tail and in tail. E.g., "It has been repeatedly determined that if there be tenant for life, remainder to his first son in tail, remainder over, and he is brought before the court before he has issue, the contingent remaindermen are barred." Sometimes the word is used also in the phrase estate tail, as here: "Under the first rule, if A devises his lands to B and to B's children or issue, and B has not any issue at the time of the devise, the same is an estate tail." See fee tail (A).

Tail may be a noun taking POSTPOSITIVE ADJECTIVES (tail female, tail special) or may itself be a postpositive adjective (fee tail). Some writers hyphenate tail-female, tail-male, and even estate-tail, but the hyphens are better omitted. See entail & disentail.

taint. See attaint.

take. A. In Its Ordinary Sense. In its everyday uses, take "is an ambiguous word, particularly when one is speaking of an adult 'taking' a child somewhere, which could be construed as simply guiding or accompanying the child, or as a forcible taking." U.S. v. Macklin, 671 F.2d 60, 65 n.6 (2d Cir. 1982).

B. In the Context of Estates. Take (= to receive (property) by will or intestate succession) is peculiar to the legal idiom. E.g., "The will itself indicates the proportions according to which the beneficiaries shall take." See taker. See also bring.

C. In the Phrase stole, took, and carried away. See stole, took, and carried away.

take articles. See article, v.t.

take exception. This phrase means "to object" in general lay contexts, but is used in legal writing in the sense "to posit an error on appeal." E.g., "The defendants took five exceptions; the questions raised by exceptions as we have shown are four."

take-it-or-leave-it contract. For this synonym of adhesion contract see adherence (A).

taken. Appeals to higher courts are said, in the legal idiom, to be taken. E.g., "We do not discuss various objections to the plan of merger filed after this appeal was taken."

taken back, to be is an illiteracy when used for take(n) aback.

take-nothing judgment (= a judgment for the defendant providing that the plaintiff recover nothing) should be hyphenated thus. See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES.

take notice. This is a common substitute for—and a better phrase than—know all men by these presents, q.v. E.g., "Take notice that an application will be made by the Defendant to the presiding Judge or Master of the Courthouse at Law Courts, Begbie Square, New Westminster, at 9:45 o'clock in the forenoon, on the 10th day of October 1985, for an order under Rule 2(5) of the Rules of Court that the Plaintiffs' action be dismissed by reason of the failure of the Plaintiffs to make discovery of documents." (Can.) The phrase is often, alas, written entirely in capitals. See CAPITALIZATION (A).

take-or-pay; take or pay. When used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, take-or-pay should be hyphenated, as in take-or-pay obligations, take-or-pay clauses, and take-or-pay status. Some writers use quotation marks with this phrase instead of hyphens (i.e., "take or pay" contract)—a usage to be avoided.

When, however, take and pay are used as alternative verbs, the phrase should not be hyphenated: "This right to restrict flow, however, did not operate to diminish Transmission's obligation to take-or-pay [read take or pay] for 75% of the wells' estimated yearly output." Garshman v. Universal Resources Holding Inc., 824 F.2d 223, 226 (3d Cir. 1987).

takeover, n. One word.

take precedence. See precedence.

taker = one who receives property by will or intestate succession. E.g., "With respect to real estate, such a gift over, in the event of the indefinite failure of the issue of the first taker, was construed to cut down and limit the interest of the first taker to an estate tail."/ "The terms 'heirs,' 'issue,' and 'children' are commonly used in dispositive instruments to designate a class of takers . . . ." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 230 (2d ed. 1984). See take (B).

take silk is a BrE phrase meaning "to become a Queen's Counsel [Q.C.] or King's Counsel [K.C.]." See silk.

take the Fifth Amendment, to. See Fifth Amendment.

take under advisement. See advisement.

taking (= a taking of property by a governmental entity using eminent domain) is midway between JARGON and a TERM OF ART. Lawyers have long argued about just what constitutes a taking, but it is hard now to improve on a general statement of more than a century ago: "Anything may be said to amount to a taking [that] deprives the owner of the use, occupation, or enjoyment of his property." Alfred R. Haig, The Law of Eminent Domain in Pennsylvania, 39 Am. L. Reg. 449, 463 (1891).

tales; talesman; tales-juror. Originally, tales /tay-leez/ (L. pl. meaning "such men") referred to persons selected from among those in court to serve on a jury in a case in which the original jury panel has become deficient in number by challenge or other cause. The OED notes that the word is "loosely applied in Eng. as a singular (a tales) to the supply of men (or even one man) so provided."

In AmE, this "loose" usage (as it is considered in BrE) was formerly common. That is, tales once referred to a supply of people available to replace jury panelists. But AmE, unlike BrE, does not use the term tales to refer to a single person who is available to serve as such a replacement. Talesman is used in this latter sense (though rarely) in both AmE and BrE. See SEXISM (B).

The word tales also refers in some contexts to the order or act of supplying such juror substitutes, as to pray, grant, award a tales. In England up to 1971, this usage was restricted to a summoning of common jurors to serve on a special jury.

In AmE, the term is becoming obsolete, though a few writers use it as a fancy substitute for veniremember—e.g.: "In strong terms, he repeatedly admonished the talesmen [read veniremembers] that they must 'not start out th[e] case with a predisposed state of mind because of something that happened in the past.'" Neron v. Tierney, 841 F.2d 1197, 1202 (1st Cir. 1988). See venireman.

Talesman has long been the usual form, tales-juror being a variant. Both terms are ARCHAISMS, as methods of selecting venires have become more sophisticated.

talisman (= a charm, amulet, or other thing supposed to be capable of working wonders), a favorite word of judges, is not to be confused with talesman. (See talesman.) E.g., "The law has outgrown its primitive stage of formation when the precise word was the sovereign talisman, and every slip was fatal." (Cardozo)/ "Freedom of choice is not a sacred talisman; it is only a means to a constitutionally required end—the abolition of the system of segregation and its effects." The plural form is talismans, not talismen.

The corresponding adjective is talismanic—e.g.: "There is nothing talismanic about neutral laws of general applicability . . . ." Employment Div., Dep't of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 901 (1990) (O' Connor, J., concurring)./ "Such a result could only be based on a talismanic reliance on mere words and labels that would be contrary to the spirit of the privilege." Wiles v. Wiles, 448 S.E.2d 681, 685 (Ga. 1994) (Sears-Collins, J., concurring)./ "Such a talismanic requirement would clearly place form over substance." Commonwealth v. Blount, 647 A.2d 199, 204 (Pa. 1994).

talk to; talk with. The former suggests a conversation in which the remarks strongly preponderate from one side, as between a superior and an inferior. The latter suggests a conversation between equals, with equal participation.

Taney, Roger Brooke. The last name of the Chief Justice of the United States from 1836 to 1854 is pronounced /taw-nee/, not /tay-nee/.

tantalize (= to torment or test [a person] by sight or promise of a desired thing withheld or kept just out of reach [COD]) is not infrequently confused with titillate (= to excite pleasantly or tickle).

The verb tantalize is derived from the Greek myth about Tantalus, the Lydian king who was born of the union of Zeus and the nymph Pluto. Tantalus offended the gods by divulging their secrets to mortals. Because the father of Tantalus was divine, Tantalus was himself immortal (though not a god) and thus could not be executed for his crime. Instead, as an eternal punishment, he was placed in a pool of fresh water up to his chin, while overhead boughs of edible fruit hung temptingly near. Whenever he dipped to drink, the water receded; whenever he stretched to eat, a wind blew the laden boughs out of reach.

tantamount is an adjective only, meaning "equivalent." Using it as a verb is incorrect: "The legal effect of the judgment in the class action . . . tantamounts [read is tantamount], we think, to removing [Humphrey] from the representative class : . . ." Humphrey v. Knox, 244 S.W.2d 309, 312 (Tex. Civ. App.—Dallas 1951).

tape-record, v.t. This verb is always hyphenated.

task, v.t. See VOGUE WORDS.

taskforce is increasingly made one word, esp. in BrE. That being so, it would be convenient for writers—in BrE and AmE alike—to make it one. E.g., "On June 11th he even got round to naming the members of the taskforce that will deal with it." What the Centre Holds, Economist, 19 June 1993, at 25.

tautologous; tautological. The latter, though older, has become a NEEDLESS VARIANT of the former. E.g., "The [lower] court's statement that the plaintiff must seek redress for an injury caused by conduct that RICO was designed to deter is unhelpfully tautological [read tautologous]." Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., 473 U.S. 479, 494 (1985).

TAUTOLOGY. "What's the first excellence in a lawyer? Tautology. What the second? Tautology. What the third? Tautology." Richard Steele, The Funeral (1701). It is worth pointing out, lest the irony escape those who have used this book at all and still are fond of LEGALESE, that the words quoted are derisive, not serious. Yet tautologies continue to proliferate: "Wide public participation in rulemaking obviates the problem of singling out a single defendant among a group of competitors for initial imposition of a new and inevitably costly legal obligation." See REDUNDANCY (B).

tax, n.; assessment. Some American writers distinguish these words usefully. A tax generally supports improvements for the entire community. An assessment, by contrast, is usu. levied only on property near some local municipal improvement—property that receives some special benefit different from that of the general public.

In BrE, by contrast, an assessment is a calculation of tax due and a request for payment. Tax inspectors issue assessments.

taxable = (1) subject to taxation <taxable income>; or (2) (of legal costs or fees) assessable <taxable expenses>. Sense (2): "Expert-witness fees are not taxable as costs of court."

taxation, in the sense "the taxing of costs," is an unusual idiom to many ears, whether law-trained or not—e.g.: "Petitioners argue that since § 1920 lists which expenses a court 'may' tax as costs, that section only authorizes taxation of certain items." Crawford Fitting Co. v. J.T. Gibbons, Inc., 482 U.S. 437, 441 (1987).

tax avoidance; tax evasion. The difference between these phrases is the difference between what is legal (avoidance) and what is not (evasion).

taxpayer. See ARTICLES (B) & payor.

teachings = holdings and dicta in a judicial opinion. E.g., "The threshold question is whether appellant has stated a procedural due process claim under section 1983, particularly in light of the Supreme Court's teachings in Parratt v. Taylor."/ "The failure of the interrogating officers to avoid asking more questions violated the teachings of Miranda and Edwards v. Arizona, thereby tainting his confession." See hold & dictum.

tear gas, n.; teargas, v.t. This term is spelled as two words for the noun, as one for the verb.

technic. See technique.

technical; technological. The distinction is sometimes a fine one. Technical = of or in a particular science, art, or handicraft; of or in vocational training. Technological = pertaining to the science of practical or industrial arts. Technological connotes recent experimental methods and development, whereas technical has no such connotation.

technique; technic. The latter, a variant spelling, is to be avoided.

technological. See technical.

telecast. See broadcast.

teleconferencing. See conferencing.

telephonee. See -EE (A).

telephonic is a highfalutin adjectival form of telephone, which ordinarily serves as its own adjective. E.g., "On request, the clerk will notify counsel who desire immediate collect telephonic notification when the decision is rendered." [Read On request, the clerk will call counsel collect when the decision is rendered.]/ "The residence was secured, and the officers obtained a telephonic warrant [read telephone warrant] and subsequently searched the apartment and seized the marijuana and related paraphernalia." State v. Will, 885 P.2d 715, 717–18 (Or. Ct. App. 1994)./ "The District Court, during a telephonic pretrial conference [read pretrial telephone conference], advised the parties that both pending motions were dismissed." Roe v. Corbin Water Users' Ass'n, 885 P.2d 419, 420 (Mont. 1994).

tell for say. Tell is a transitive verb that demands an indirect as well as a direct object. E.g., "One of the industry's major producers told [read said] recently that a large studio receives 20,000 stories or ideas per year, of which but twenty are made into motion pictures."

temperature is pronounced /tem-pə-rə-chər/, not /tem-pə-rə-tyur/, which is precious, or /tem-pə-chər/, which is slovenly. A combination of the precious and the slovenly, /tem-pə-tyoor/ is humorously affected.

temporal (1) of or relating to time; (2) worldly; (3) nonecclesiastical; (4) transitory; (5) pertaining to the temple (part of one's head); or (6) pertaining to bones in the vertebrae. In other words, this is a classic CHAMELEON-HUED WORD. Usually, temporal refers to time (sense 1) in legal writing—e.g.: "Although not temporally clear from the record, it appears that while the attorneys and the trial judge were in chambers, the court coordinator and the bailiff conducted a shuffle of the panel." Sense (2) is also common: "The reason behind the exception is a simple one of human relationships, implicit in the principle that human laws, and other temporal things, are for the living."

Temporal was a favorite word of Justice Holmes, who used it in the special legal sense, a variation on sense (3) given above, namely "civil or common as opposed to criminal or ecclesiastical." E.g., "In numberless instances the law warrants the intentional infliction of temporal damage because it regards it as justified." (Holmes, J.)/ "Actions of tort are brought for temporal damage; the law recognizes temporal damage as an evil which its object is to prevent or to address." (Holmes, J.) temporal limit is unidiomatic and stuffy in place of time limit, which is well established. E.g., "The Supreme Court has yet to decide how long an auto search may be delayed before a warrant must be obtained, or indeed whether there is a temporal limit [read time limit]."

TEMPORAL SEQUENCES. See TENSES (A).

temporary restraining order; preliminary injunction. A temporary restraining order (or t.r.o.) is an order provisionally granting injunctive relief in an emergency situation, but only for the short time (usu. a matter of days at most) until the court can hear evidence and consider longer-term injunctive relief.

A preliminary injunction is just such relief. It is an interlocutory injunction issued after notice and a hearing, and it restrains a party until a trial on the merits is concluded. See interlocutory relief.

temporize has three important senses: (1) "to act so as to gain time" <defendant temporized by filing dilatory pleas>; (2) "to comply with the requirements of the occasion" <politicians are adept at temporizing>; (3) "to negotiate or discuss terms of a compromise" <defendant attempted to temporize with plaintiff rather than go to trial>.

tenancy; tenantship; tenantry. The first is, of course, the usual term, meaning (1) "a holding or possession of lands or tenements, by any title of ownership"; (2) "occupancy of lands or tenements under a lease"; (3) "that which is held by a tenant"; or (4) "the period during which a tenant occupies land or a building."

To the extent that tenantship overlaps with any of those four meanings, it is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of tenancy; yet it does usefully mean "the state of being a tenant," as distinct from ownership. To the extent that tenantry overlaps with any of the senses outlined above, it too is a NEEDLESS VARIANT; yet tenantry may stand on its own in the sense "the body of tenants" <the tenantry is dissatisfied with the proposed improvements>.

tenancy by the entireties; tenancy by the entirety. The phrase refers to a joint tenancy between the husband and wife; it arises in some jurisdictions when a single instrument conveys realty to the husband and wife but nothing is said in the deed or will about the character of their ownership. Upon the death of either the husband or wife, the survivor automatically takes title to the deceased spouse's share.

The plural form entireties is slightly more common in both AmE and BrE, although Black's (6th ed.) contains its definition under tenancy by the entirety, which is also widespread.

tenancy in common. See joint tenancy.

tenancy from month to month. See periodic tenancy.

tenancy per la verge; tenancy by the verge; tenancy by the rod. These equivalent phrases denote a copyhold. The first is LAW FRENCH, the second somewhat anglicized version, and the third an anglicized LOAN TRANSLATION of the first phrase. The terms are little used but in historical contexts (the rod having been delivered for purposes of conveying seisin, q.v.). Each of these phrases ordinarily requires some explanation by the user.

tenant. A. Senses. Tenant = (1) the holder of land under a contract of tenancy; or (2) the defendant in a writ of right (the plaintiff being known as a demandant, q.v.).

B. And tenanter. The word tenanter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

tenant at sufferance; tenant by sufferance. The former is the traditional idiomatic phrase. See sufferance.

tenant at will. Although Henry S. Maine, among others, used hyphens (tenant-at-will), the noun phrase is best spelled without the hyphens. E.g., "In a law court, O is probably viewed simply as T's tenant at will—that is, as a tenant whose estate may be legally terminated at any time by T." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 84 (2d ed. 1984). See at will.

tenant by sufferance. See tenant at sufferance.

tenant by the curtesy initiate. See curtesy & initiate tenant by curtesy.

tenant by the entirety. See tenancy by the entirety.

tenanter. See tenant (B).

tenant-in-chief (= a person who holds land directly under the king) is most commonly written thus—with the hyphens—following the similar convention in the phrases case-in-chief (q.v.) and editor-in-chief.

In the Latin form of tenant-in-chief, namely tenant-in-capite, the last two words are best italicized. Cf. in chief.

tenantry; tenantship. See tenancy.

tendentious means "biased (usu. in favor of something); prejudiced." Its meaning is often misapprehended, as in this specimen, in which the writer apparently thought the word means "frivolous": "Even though Texas did not move to dismiss the appeal as frivolous, the fact is that it patently has no merit. The removal petition does not even colorably fall within the strict tests set out in Johnson. We believe the appellant had ample reason to know that his appeal lacked merit and that it was merely tendentious." The phrase merely tendentious gives away the writer's ignorance of the meaning of the word tendentious.

Tendencious is a variant spelling to be eschewed.

tender, n. See bid, n.

tender, v.t., is a FORMAL WORD for make or give.

tendinitis; tendonitis. Tendinitis = inflammation of a tendon. Tendonitis is incorrectly arrived at by association with the spelling of the noun tendon.

tenement (= [in law] an estate in land) usu. denotes in lay contexts "a building or house." In lawbooks, tenement is often associated with the word messuage (q.v.). See lands, tenements, and hereditaments.

TENSES. A. Sequence of. The term sequence of tenses refers to the relationship of tenses in subordinate clauses to those in principal clauses. Generally, the former follow from the latter.

In careful writing, the tenses agree both logically and grammatically. The basic rules of tense-sequence are easily stated, although the plethora of examples that follow belie their ostensible simplicity in practice.

1. When the principal clause has a verb in the present (he says), present perfect (he has said), or future (he will say), the subordinate clause has a present-tense verb. Grammarians call this the primary sequence.
2. When the principal clause is in past tense (he said, he was saying) or past perfect (he had said), the subordinate clause has a past-tense verb. Grammarians call this the secondary sequence.

The primary sequence has proved to be a little less troublesome than the secondary sequence. Examples may be readily found, however, in which the primary sequence is mangled: "It was [read is] as a professor of law—teaching torts especially—that Leon Green will be remembered."

But it is the secondary sequence that most commonly trips up writers, as in the following examples:

- "The majority opinion did not go [read does not go] so far, Justice Marshall said, and he would have dissented if it did." (Or: "The majority opinion did not go so far, Justice Marshall said, and he would have dissented if it did [read if it had].")
- "Unless there was a formed writ that exactly or nearly fitted the applicant's case, he generally must [read had to] take such inadequate relief as the inferior local courts offered."
- "It will be seen that Duguit set out to find a rational basis for law (though he cannot be said to succeed [read to have succeeded]) . . . ." W.W. Buckland, Some Reflections on Jurisprudence 11 (1945).
- "This power to imprison a man without trial, not for what he had [read has] already done, but for what he might hereafter do, was entrusted by Parliament to the executive." Alfred Denning, Freedom Under the Law 11 (1949).

Continuous tenses cause problems when the action described in the subordinate clause is supposed to have preceded the action that is stated in the past tense in the governing clause—e.g.:

- "A jury being waived, the case was tried . . . ." [Read A jury having been waived, the case was tried . . . ."]
- "Fossils have been collected from the area on several occasions, the largest collection being [read having been] made by L. Kohl-Larsen in 1938–39."
- "Plaintiff sued in an Illinois District Court for damages he suffered in an accident occurring [read that occurred or having occurred] in Indiana." [Or, better still, end the sentence as follows: suffered in an accident in Indiana, but not suffered in an Indiana accident.]

A related problem occurs with (tenseless) infinitives, which, when put after a past-tense verb, are often wrongly made perfect infinitives, as here:

- "Accordingly, the trial judge was required to have recused himself [read to recuse himself] pursuant to the unambiguous dictates of the statute."
- "Although all but M. had served the number of years required for their pension benefits to have accrued [read to accrue], all were still on active duty when their marriages were dissolved."
- "Today we witness another startling valid legal reason why this court should have aborted, rather than to have given birth to, [read should have aborted, rather than given birth to,] the monster child now known in our legal circles as 'Almanza the Terrible.'"
- "When this happened (and without any negligence on the part of the bus driver) there did not remain sufficient time and distance for the bus driver to have done [read to do] anything to avoid the collision."
- "To have been fortunate enough to have grown up [read to grow up] with this fascinating book at hand . . . we count among such blessings as to be healthy (which we are), wealthy (which we aren't), and wise (which we may yet become)."
- "Certainly, it would have been desirable for the court to have instructed [read to instruct] the jury as to the proper standard for judging unreasonableness."

Still another bugbear is the incomplete verb phrase by which the writer attempts to give two tenses, but only one tense is actually completed. The result is one type of zeugma—e.g.: "This mischaracterization of pension rights has, and unless overturned, will continue to result [read has resulted and, unless overturned, will continue to result] in inequitable division of community assets."/ "This diversity case is one of a multitude of asbestos cases, presently filed and reasonably anticipated, in which injured plaintiffs or their survivors have or will seek damages [read have sought or will seek damages] for injuries associated with exposure to asbestos." See ZEUGMA AND SYLLEPSIS.

B. Subjunctives. As Partridge has pointed out, not sequence but mood is involved in the correct use of SUBJUNCTIVES, but the mistakes are common enough and closely enough related to merit treatment here: "This would have been a funny story if the headhunter were [read had been] joking, but he wasn't."/ "William put his arm around Ann and she could not thrust him away for fear he fell out of the door [read would fall out the door]." (Eng.)/ "If the title were acquired [read was acquired; see SUBJUNCTIVES] by purchase, the disseisee's entry was not barred." See STATUTE DRAFTING (B).

C. The Historical Present. Some writers use the present tense to discuss what happened long ago. To many readers this mannerism is an affectation. E.g., "As regards the real estate of the deceased, it is settled by the end of the thirteenth century that he can make no will, except where there is a local custom to that effect." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 36 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). Cf. FIRST PERSON (B).

D. Present Tense for Ongoing Truth. General and ongoing truths require the present tense, regardless of the tense of the principal verb—e.g.: "He observed that federal courts had [read have] a special place in our system of federalism."

E. Past-Perfect Tense. Many writers stumble on the correct use of this tense, formerly called the "pluperfect" tense. The past perfect (had [+ past participle]) represents a past action or state as having been completed before a more recent time in the past—e.g.: "In 1974, the court decided that the insurance-coverage team should not have communicated with the defense team. Two years earlier, in Kelly, it had decided that the defense lawyers owe an undivided loyalty to the insured." Because the second sentence takes us still further back in time, it is in the past perfect (had decided).

Increasingly—and especially in AmE—writers want to change the past perfect to the simple past. This trend, formerly characteristic only of colloquial speech, should be avoided—e.g.: "She began taping his conversations because she heard [read had heard] that he was intent upon firing all workers over the age of 45."

F. In Statute Drafting. See STATUTE DRAFTING (C)

tentative trust. See Totten trust.

tenurial, the adjective corresponding to tenure, is almost exclusively a legal term. E.g., "The basic idea of feudal land 'ownership,' then, was that it was tenurial in character—more a holding of land on good behavior than ownership as we think of it today." Thomas F Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 4 (2d ed. 1984).

term, n. (= a limit in space or duration), has the special legal senses "an estate or interest in land for a certain period" <term of years> and, as a plural (terms), "conditions or stipulations limiting what is proposed to be granted or done" (OED). See fundamental term & terms.

term for years. See term of years & termor.

terminus; terminal, n. Terminus = the city at the end of a railroad or bus line. Pl. termini. Terminal = the station of a transportation line.

terminus a quo; terminus ad quem. The former means "departure point"; the latter, "destination." Figuratively, the words are used of the beginning and ending points of an argument. Both figuratively and literally, the phrases are pomposities.

term loan; time loan. These phrases are interchangeable, term loan being slightly more common.

term of years; term for years; estate for years; lease for years. These synonymous phrases denote an estate whose duration is known—in years, weeks, and days—from the moment of its creation. As between term of years and term for years, the former is more common in BrE, whereas both forms are used in AmE.

termor = a person who holds lands or tenements for a term of years, or (rarely) for life. E.g., "[W]hen today we speak of someone taking on 'a new lease on life,' we do not think of him as a termor."

terms has increasingly been used as an elliptical form of terms of the contract or terms of payment. See term.

terms and conditions. This phrase is among the most common redundancies in legal drafting. But, someone might ask, is term really broad enough to include condition—is not a condition something that must be satisfied before a contractual term applies? The OED defines terms as "conditions or stipulations limiting what is proposed to be granted or done," and that is its usual sense in law. Hence terms is sufficient.

terms and provisions is a REDUNDANCY terms, in. The phrase in terms means "expressly; in plain words." Though the OED labels the phrase "obsolete," it continues to thrive in legal contexts—e.g.: "The act in terms applies to all the courts of the United States . . . ." Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 140 (1916).

TERMS OF ART are words having specific, precise meanings in a given specialty. Having its origins in Lord Coke's vocabula artis, the phrase term of art is common in law because the legal field has developed many technical words whose meanings are locked tight (e.g., bailment, replevin)—as well as JARGON, constituting would-be terms of art, whose meanings are often unhinged.

How can one say "unhinged"? Take per stirpes, a phrase that many lawyers cite as a quintessential term of art. Yet, as a leading expert in the field of wills and estates has remarked, "per stirpes is a textbook example of legalese that seductively suggests certainty but actually can produce ambiguity and litigation." Stanley M. Johanson, In Defense of Plain Language, 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 37, 37 (1992). The phrase creates a problem in this scenario: Mary's will bequeaths property "to my descendants per stirpes." She has two children—John, who has two children, and Bob, who has four. The complication arises when both of Mary's children die before she does. Some courts would say that the shares are divided between John and Bob, others that the shares must be divided at the level of John's and Bob's children. And in many states, the issue has never been decided and would therefore have to be litigated. Id. at 38.

Jargon, then, creates more than just aesthetic problems, though some writers lament those most prominently: "the unnecessary or inartistic employment of more or less technical terms in the drafting of legal documents is by no means rare . . . ." Lancaster Malleable Castings Co v. Dunie, 73 A.2d 417, 418 (Pa. 1950). Expert drafters, who know that clear, simple drafting is less subject to misinterpretation than legalistic drafting, recommend avoiding jargon precisely because it invites substantive problems.

On the other hand, "Not to use a technical word, even if it is a long one, in its proper place, would be an affectation as noticeable as the overfrequent use of such words where they are not needed." E.L. Piesse, The Elements of Drafting 46 (J.K. Aitken ed., 7th ed. 1987). Lawyers need not invent homegrown ways of saying res ipsa loquitur.

One secret of good legal writing is to distinguish rigorously between terms of art and mere jargon. It is elementary to know that and his heirs and elegit have historically been terms of art; yet only the first is a living term of art, the second having become archaic (and therefore useful primarily in historical contexts).

Is res gestae (q.v.) a term of art? Or scire facias and fieri facias (qq.v.)? Many such questions are debatable: but the debate is important, for we must attempt to winnow the useful law words from the verbal baggage amid which so many of them are buried. See JARGON & PLAIN LANGUAGE.

termtime (= the time of year during which a court is in session) is the antonym of vacation, q.v. E.g., "A judge of a district court may, either in termtime or [in] vacation, grant writs of mandamus . . . ." Tex. Govt. Code § 24.011 (West 1988).

British writers tend to use two words (term time)—e.g.: "At common law, serjeants had an exclusive right of audience in the Court of Common Pleas during term time, while sitting in banc." R.E. Megarry, A Second Miscellany-at-Law 23 (1973).

terre-tenant; tertenant; land-tenant. As between the first two, terre-tenant is the standard spelling of this LAW FRENCH term. Tertenant, a Middle English anglicized spelling, never gained widespread use. In the OED's only listed sense of terre-tenant—"one who has the actual possession of land; the occupant of land"—the word hardly seems justified. But there is another definition, probably purely AmE: "a person, other than a judgment debtor, who has an interest in the debtor's land after the judgment creditor's lien attached to the land"—a sense that Black's (4th–6th eds.) limits to Pennsylvania.

No writer should use the phrase terre-tenant without both understanding and making clear the precise sense in which it is used, and without a sound reason for doing so. The thoroughly anglicized form, land-tenant, which is listed in some of the older law dictionaries, would be an improvement. See landman (B).

territory; dependency; commonwealth. The distinctions in AmE usage are as follows. A territory = a part of the United States not included within any state but organized with a separate legislature (W10). Guam and the U.S. Virgin Islands are territories of the United States; Alaska and Hawaii were formerly territories. Dependency = a land or territory geographically distinct from the country governing it, but belonging to it and governed by its laws. The Philippines was once a dependency of the United States. Commonwealth = a political unit having local autonomy but voluntarily united with the United States. Puerto Rico and the Northern Mariana Islands are commonwealths. Puerto Rico is sometimes referred to as a dependency, but its proper designation is commonwealth.

In BrE, commonwealth = a loose association of countries that recognize one sovereign as its head <the British Commonwealth>.

Terry* stop (= the act of a police officer's stopping a person whose behavior is reasonably considered suspicious and frisking that person for weapons) derives from Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968). E.g., "Upholding the legality of the Terry stop of a van that led to Jones' arrest, the D.C. Court of Appeals affirmed Jones' conviction . . . ." D.C. Digests, Legal Times, 4 Dec. 1989, at 37. See CASE REFERENCES (A) tertenant. See terre-tenant.

tertius gaudens = a third party who profits when two others dispute. Literally, the term means "a rejoicing third." It is good to have a word for this concept, which is not uncommon in law, but it is unfortunate that the word is so abstruse.

testable = (1) that may be tested or tried; (2) legally qualified to bear witness; (3) legally qualified to make a will; or (4) willable; devisable by will. Only sense (1) can be said to be thriving; the other three are obsolescent if not obsolete.

testacy; intestacy. Testacy = the condition of leaving a valid will at death. Intestacy is its antonym. See intestate.

testament is not, as is sometimes supposed, obsolete outside the phrase last will and testament, q.v. In legal prose, it is still sometimes contrasted with devise, for in the legal idiom testament has come generally to signify a will disposing of personal property, whereas devise is traditionally the word for a will disposing of land. E.g., "The Wills Acts of 1837 eliminated substantive distinctions between devises and testaments." Cf. bequeath.

Usually, however, the word is used not for reasons of fastidiousness, but for less good reasons. In the following sentences, for example, it is an archaic pomposity, to which will would have been preferable: "A valid testament [read will] includes two essential elements: there must be a sufficient designation of the beneficiary and of the property given to him."/ "In In re Bluestein's Will, both the language of the testament [read will] and the attendant circumstances were said to support the conclusion that, in context, the testator's 'request' bespoke a direction, imposing an obligation upon the legatee." See will.

In Scots law, the testament was formerly that part of a will in which the testator named an executor. Today, however, and elsewhere in the civil-law world, testament is used more broadly as a synonym of will—e.g.: "[T]he average citizen, relying on the existing legal framework governing intestate successions, will usually make no testament." A.N. Yiannopolous, Of Legal Usufruct, the Surviving Spouse, and Article 890 of the Louisiana Civil Code, 49 La. L. Rev. 803, 803 (1989).

testamentary. A. Senses. Testamentary = (1) of or relating to a will or testament, as a document <testamentary papers>; (2) provided for or appointed by a will <testamentary guardian>; or (3) created by will <testamentary trust>. In sense (1), the word is not ordinarily confined to contexts involving testaments of personal property (as opposed to devises of real property)—e.g.: "It is everywhere recognized that the purpose of the law of wills is to give effect to the last valid testamentary act of the testator."

B. And testamental. The word is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that occurs mostly in lay writing.

C. For testimonial. Since the early 1960s, this error has become surprisingly common in reported American opinions. Usually, testamentary appears in tandem with documentary—hence the writer is misled by some kind of "false attraction" to the first suffix—e.g.: "[A] thorough review of the documentary and testamentary [read testimonial] evidence convinces us that the commissioner's findings on this point are amply supported by the record . . . ." Lambert v. U.S., 153 Ct. Cl. 501, 510 (1961)./ "Bankrupts then offered documentary and testamentary [read testimonial] evidence to rebut the Government's proof." Solari Furs v. U.S., 436 F.2d 683, 685 (8th Cir. 1971).

In the following sentence, the distinction is made clear: "Lay witnesses, before they may express a testimonial opinion as to testamentary capacity must testify first to facts inconsistent with sanity." In re Estate of Powers, 134 N.W.2d 148, 161 (Mich. 1965).

testate, n. (= a testate person), though corresponding in form to intestate, n., is generally a NEEDLESS VARIANT of testator. Testatus is the civil-law term. See intestate.

testate, v.i., = (1) to testify; or (2) to make one's will. In sense (1), the word is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of testify. In sense (2), the verb is so rare as to sound affected.

testation = the disposal of property by will <power of testation>. E.g., "But tenants soon acquired the right of alienation in their lifetime[s], though not, until much later, that of testation." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 57 (2d ed. 1953)./ "Before 1600, the province of Canterbury (excepting Wales and London) came to permit complete freedom of testation, whereas the province of York adhered to the old system of parts until 1692." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 436 (3d ed 1990).

testator. A. Senses. Testator = (1) a person who dies leaving a will; or (2) a person who makes or has made a will. Sense (1) is more usual, perhaps for two reasons: first, we have more occasion to refer to testators who have already died; and second, the living feel uncomfortable being called "testators."

B. And devisor. Because testament historically came to be more or less confined to dispositions of personal property, and devise to those of real property, it has been thought that testator was at one time confined to a person who left personal, as opposed to real, property. See, e.g., Morton S. Freeman, A Treasury for Word Lovers 173 (1983). No such crabbed meaning ever attached to the word, however; Blackstone wrote, as long ago as 1766, "that all devises of lands and tenements shall not only be in writing, but signed by the testator" (quoted in OED). See testate & deviser.

testatorial; testorial; testatory. The OED records only testatory as the adjective corresponding to testator, but this form is extremely rare. As between testatorial and testorial, the former is the more logical form—e.g.: "[A]n ademption may occur without testatorial intention." J.A. Ballentine, Ballentine's Law Dictionary 28 (3d ed. 1969).

But the most common form—which has no foundation in the OED, W3, or Black's—is testorial: "[I]t is enough if the circumstances, taken together, leave no doubt as to the testorial [read testamentary] intention, and in some cases it is said that the implication may be drawn from slight circumstances appearing from the will." 57 Am. Jur. Wills § 1192, at 783 (1948)./ "[T]he testorial intention will control . . . ." Hixon v. Hixon, 715 P.2d 1087, 1090 (Okl. 1985).

Often, testamentary will be the best option <testamentary intention>. It changes the meaning slightly, from "testator's intention" to "intention as expressed in the will," but ordinarily the latter is a more precise notion.

testatory. See testatorial.

testatrix. The word is useless, testator quite properly referring to men and women alike. See SEXISM (C). testatus. See testate.

test case = a lawsuit brought to determine an unsettled legal point in some matter of broad application. E.g., "Should test cases be brought directly to the highest court and without the lower court procedure?" David Lawrence, Nine Honest Men 123 (1936)./ "The appeal is a test case, its purpose being to determine whether a juvenile or criminal court has the power to order compensation to be paid to the victim of crime by the local authority in whose care the child who committed the offence was at the time of the offence." Leeds City Council v. West Yorkshire Metro. Police, [1983] 1 A.C. 29, 37 (H.L.)./ "Constitutional lawyers say the large size of the punitive damages assessed against The Inquirer, if upheld on appeal, could become a test case for the United States Supreme Court, which is already considering the constitutionality of punitive awards." Michael deC. Hines, Philadelphia Paper Assessed $34 Million for Libel, N.Y. Times, 4 May 1990, at A1, A11.

teste is the name, in DRAFTING, of the clause that states the name of a witness and evidences the act of witnessing. E.g., "Judgments did not bind chattels, but at early common law a writ of fieri facias bound chattels from the date of the teste, i.e., the date of the issuance, thereby invalidating all subsequent alienations." In older instruments teste was used in much the same way as some legal writers use witnesseth, q.v., today. Cf. testimonium clause.

Like much legal terminology, this word is not in tune with the times. Several American judges have been known to joke that they would much prefer not to attach a teste to a document.

testification is an unnecessary word for testimony or testifying.

testifier. See witness (C). testify. See give evidence.

testimonial, not testamentary, q.v., is the adjective corresponding to testimony. See testamentary (C).

testimonium clause, in a sworn legal document, is the attestation clause that traditionally begins with the phrase In witness whereof, which commonly concludes legal instruments and pleadings. Among the traditional forms are the following: "In witness whereof I have subscribed my name this _____ day of 19____."/ "Witness my signature this _____ day of 19____."/ "In witness whereof we hereto set our hands and seals."

The plural of testimonium is either -iums or -ia, the former being preferable. See attestation clause & in witness whereof. Cf. teste.

testimony is sometimes loosely used as a COUNT NOUN but the more natural-sounding usage is to treat it as a mass noun. E.g., "This court has no way of actually knowing which testimonies or parts of testimonies [read which testimony] the jury accepted as the most credible."/ "Even if the testimonies [read testimony] of the various witnesses are [read is] looked upon in the light most favorable to the appellees, the verdict returned by the jury is not supported by those testimonies [read that testimony]." See evidence (A).

testing-clause. See attestation clause.

testis [L.] = (1) a witness; or (2) a testicle. Modern witnesses are not likely to take kindly to being called testes. See witness. Cf. teste.

testorial. See testamentary (A) & testatorial.

text as an adjective is inferior to textual: "This is made clear by quotations from recognized text [read textual] authorities." See textual.

textual; textuary. As an adjective, the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

than. A. Verb Not Repeated After (than is, than has). Usually it is unnecessary to repeat be-verbs and have-verbs after than. E.g., "The controlling issue is whether the decision-makers who are in a better position than is the judiciary [read than the judiciary] to decide whether the public interest would be served have created a scheme with which the remedy would interfere." If you need to repeat the verb after than to avoid an AMBIGUITY, it should follow the noun after than—e.g.: "She is closer to her father than her mother [read, depending on the sense, than her mother is or than to her mother]."

B. Than what. This collocation usually signals a poor construction. E.g., "The jurisdictional reach of courts became substantially broader than what [omit what] it had been under the strict territorial guidelines of the Pennoyer case."

C. For then. This error is so elementary that one might fairly wonder whether it is merely a lapse in proofreading; but it occurs with some frequency. E.g., "If Blom-Cooper's judgment is correct, than [read then] the failure is in Lord MacNaghten's style, not in his subject-matter." (Eng.)

D. Case of Pronoun After (than me or than I). Traditionally, grammarians have considered than a conjunction, not a preposition—hence He is taller than I [am]. That view has had its detractors, including Eric Partridge, who preferred the objective case: You are a much greater loser than me. See Eric Partridge, Usage and Abusage 332 (1947). But those siding with Partridge have been a small minority.

For formal contexts, I recommend the traditional usage. The prepositional use of than is acceptable only in the most relaxed, colloquial contexts. Here it seems ill-advised, even ironic: "[S]o many of our students seem to struggle . . . . (Are we really that much smarter than them [read they]?)" John B. Mitchell, Current Theories on Expert and Novice Thinking, 39 J. Legal Educ. 275, 275 (1989).

E. Than whom. This idiom, common since the latter part of the 16th century, originated perhaps as a LOAN TRANSLATION of the Latin comparative with quam. Strictly speaking, than who would have been preferable, since than is treated as a conjunction, not a preposition (see (D)). But the phrase than whom—as in, Holmes was a judge than whom no other could be considered better—is now established.

thankfully – gratefully; in a manner expressing thanks. The word should not be misused in the way that hopefully, q.v., is misused, namely, in the sense "thank goodness; I am (or we are) thankful that." Following are two examples of the all-too-common fall from stylistic grace: "Our country, thankfully, has never chosen that path." Roberts v. U.S., 445 U.S. 552, 571 (1980) (Marshall, J., dissenting)./ "As Mustill L.J. has already remarked the many and complicated issues which were debated over many days before Mr. Justice Saville have now, thankfully, been considerably refined." G & H Montage GmbH v. Irvani, [1990] 1 W.L.R. 667, 687 (C.A.) (per Purchas, L.J.). See hopefully & SENTENCE ADVERBS.

that. A. Wrongly Suppressed that as Relative Pronoun. Although in any number of constructions it is perfectly permissible, and even preferred, to omit that by ellipsis (e.g., The dog you gave me rather than The dog that you gave me), in formal writing that is often ill-advisedly omitted where it creates an AMBIGUITY, even if only momentarily. E.g., "I noticed those who left the city attorney's office [read I noticed that those who left the city attorney's office] early in their careers were unhappy also in private practice." (The sentence at first leads the reader to believe that the writer refers to the persons who have left, not to their unhappiness.)/ "In Eleason, we held the driver, an epileptic, [read we held that the driver, an epileptic,] possessed knowledge that he was likely to have a seizure."/ "There are authorities which [read that] generally hold insanity is not [read generally hold that insanity is not] a defense in tort cases except for intentional torts."/ "She thought Batman was good [read thought that Batman was good] and was trying to help save the world and her husband [read that her husband] was possessed of the devil." (Without the relative pronoun, it sounds as if the writer is stating a fact—that her husband was possessed by the devil)./ "Carbide International prays we reverse [read prays that we reverse] an adverse trial court judgment." See MISCUES (F).

B. Unnecessarily Repeated that. One must be careful not to repeat the conjunction after an intervening phrase; either suspend it till just before the verb, or use it early in the sentence and omit it before the verb. E.g., "The officers told Mr. P. that, if he would waive his right to receive any benefits from A.I. under the deferred compensation portion of his employment contract, that [omit that] they would take care of him."/ "Rule 10b-10(a) requires that prior to the completion of a transaction that [omit that] a written statement be sent or given to a customer setting forth prescribed information relating to the transaction."/ "Appellant argues that since Lent, Inc. was the principal in the indemnity agreement, that [omit that] it cannot also be an indemnitor in the same agreement."

C. The Biblical that. In lieu of so that or in order that, that often smacks of the biblical, as in: "A lawyer may never give unsolicited advice to a layman that [read in order that] he retain a client."/ "We must preserve the work of art that [read so that] it may continue to convey to the sympathetic spectator the creative ecstasy that went into its making." See BIBLICAL AFFECTATION.

D. As an Ellipsis for the fact that. This construction is often useful; here, however, the phrase is badly used, because the subject and verb are too far removed: "That the district court's order authorizing the sale of the Charles House property and judgment confirming the sale and passage of title to Southmark operated as a final judgment on the merits is evident." [Read It is evident that . . . .] See fact that, the.

E. Relative Adverb. E.g., "Many charities fail by change of circumstances and [by] the happening of contingencies that no human foresight can provide against." (See PREPOSITIONS (E).) Some lightweight authorities do not understand that the construction in the sentence just quoted is perfectly acceptable. One such manual for legal writers recommends, "The case on which the lawyer was working never went to trial," instead of, "The case that the lawyer was working on never went to trial," and labels the latter incorrect. See Texas Law Review Manual on Style 28–29 (4th ed. 1979). Actually, both constructions are correct—and the construction with that is far more natural-sounding.

F. For so or very: "This case is not that important." This usage is informal and colloquial and, though it hardly merits condemnation in speech, it should be avoided in writing: "This case is not so [or very] important."

G. That of. This phrase is often used unnecessarily. E.g., "In another comparative study, that of [omit that of] anthropology, they also find much to make them question current ethics."

H. And which. See RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES & REMOTE RELATIVES.

I. And who. See who.

J. The Demonstrative that. See DEICTIC TERMS.

that is. The conventional wisdom is that, if this phrase is used to begin a sentence, the result is a fragment. (See INCOMPLETE SENTENCES (A).) But good writers regularly use it in this way, in place of in other words—e.g.: "A misrepresentation generally has no effect unless it is material. That is, it must be one [that] would affect the judgment of a reasonable person in deciding whether, or on what terms, to enter into the contract . . . ." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 301 (8th ed. 1991)./ "They are punitive rather than remedial. That is, they do not attempt to restore any version of the status quo . . . ." Douglas Laycock, The Death of the Irreparable Injury Rule 199 (1991).

The longer phrase, that is to say, is usually wordy in place of that is—e.g.: "[T]he statute does not speak with absolute crystalline clarity . . . . That is to say [read That is], Congress has chosen, wisely or no, to speak to the precise issue at hand through a Committee Report that was expressly adopted by both Houses." ACLU v. FCC, 823 F.2d 1554, 1583 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (Starr, J., dissenting in part). Cf. viz. & namely.

that is to say. See that is.

that which; those which; those that. When a noun introduced by that, as a DEICTIC TERM, is followed by defining matter, that matter is introduced by which. E.g.: "The commission merchant must exercise that degree of care which a prudent person would exercise in the conduct of his own affairs." Sometimes the construction is wrongly made that . . . that, as in: "We must distinguish between a belief in the literal truth and falsity of a statement and that type of belief in falsity that [read which] underlies the fraudulent misrepresentation." When that becomes, in plural, those, it is permissible for the second member of this construction to be either which or that. E.g.: "Deductible distributions are usually those that [or those which] are made to the residuary beneficiaries."/ "Those issuers that [or Those issuers which (or who)] have already issued stock under such plans will have to fight hard to obtain some sort of grandfathering relief."

theft was not the name of a common-law crime. Rather, statutes such as England's Theft Act of 1968 have made theft a statutory crime. In ordinary usage, theft denotes the act of stealing. In legal usage, in some jurisdictions, it is used as a synonym of larceny.

In still others, such as England, larceny has been abolished and replaced by theft—which sometimes includes embezzlement and false pretenses. The Model Penal Code makes theft the name of all such acquisitive offenses. See burglary (A).

their; they're; there. A book like this one ought not to have to explain such distinctions. So it will not. But: "Liberals are again trying to explain why they lost their fifth presidential election in 20 years. They've been talking about what they're [read their] party should be for." What's a Liberal For? Wall St. J., 13 Jan. 1989, at A6./ "And that's where these radio stations are really missing the boat, because there [read they're] missing the folks who hold the purse strings to all the disposable income." Brad Tooley, Canyon Views, Canyon News, 13 Jan. 1994, at 1, 2.

theirself. See ourself.

the law abhors a forfeiture. See equity abhors a forfeiture.

themself is a part-plural, part-singular abomination. Sometimes it is intended as a gender-neutral equivalent of himself or herself—e.g.: "The successful applicant will identify themself through a proven record of generating respect . . . .' Various revisions suggest themselves: The successful applicant must have a proven record . . . ; The successful applicant will have generated respect . . . ; The successful applicant will identify himself or herself through a proven record of generating respect . . . .

In the early 1990s, Canadian statute drafters began using themself in legislation.

then. A. Adjective. Then should not be hyphenated when used in the sense "that existed or was so at that time." E.g., "In Griggs the Supreme Court noted that the then-guidelines [read the then guidelines] issued by the Equal Opportunity Commission were to be accorded 'great deference' by the courts."/ "The 1969 and 1962 convictions were proved for enhancement, and Carter received the then-mandatory [read the then mandatory, here the word is adverbial] life sentence."/ "At the time of the events critical to the determination of this case, three of the board members had been appointed by the then mayor."/ "In a trial presided over by the then magistrate, now district judge Marcel Livandais, the jury returned a verdict in favor of each parent." In most of those examples, however, the writer could have eliminated then altogether with no loss of meaning—a desirable result because of the awkward PHRASING that then creates.

B. For than. This is a distressingly common error, esp. in newsprint: "'I could not be any more excited then [read than] I am right now,' said C.B., a supporter of the measure."/ "Under section 183, if dependency is the basis of recovery, the measure of damages is very much greater then [read than] it would be under section 184." For the reverse error, see than (C).

thence; whence; hence. Thence = from that place or source; for that reason. Whence = from there. Hence = (1) from here; or (2) therefore. These are literaryisms as well as LEGALISMS, acceptable perhaps in the more literary style of legal prose, despite carping by those who advocate "consumer English."

thenceforth; thenceforward. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

theoretic(al)(ly). The best, most usual form of the adjective is theoretical, not theoretic. Of a common use of theoretical, Walter Wheeler Cook aptly observed: "Theory which will not work in practice is not sound theory. 'It is theoretically correct but will not work in practice' is a common but erroneous statement. If a theory is 'theoretically correct' it will work; if it will not work, it is 'theoretically incorrect.'" Introduction to Wesley N. Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions 21 (1919). Holmes likewise observed, "I know no reason why theory should disagree with the facts." Oliver W. Holmes, The Theory of Legal Interpretation, 12 Harv. L. Rev. 417, 417 (1899).

thereat (= there; at it). Even at the turn of the 20th century, when the OED was being compiled, this word was considered "formal [= pompous] and archaic." Today it is more so. E.g., "He was astonished thereat [read at it]."/ "The purpose of the bill as stated in the prayers for relief was to enjoin the defendants from combining and conspiring to interfere with the complainants in the practice of their trade and occupation, or to prevent them from obtaining further employment thereat [read in their trade]." The word is not a locative. Cf. whereat. See HERE- AND THERE-WORDS.

thereby cannot rightly be considered a FORBIDDEN WORD, but see HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

therefore; therefor. The former (stress on first syllable) means "for that reason," "consequently," or "ergo"—this is the word known to nonlawyers; the latter (stress on last syllable) means "for that" or "for it." The proper use of therefore, which always states a conclusion, needs no illustration.

A. Proper Use of therefor Illustrated. In the following sentences, the musty word therefor is properly used—even so, though, it generally ought to be replaced for stylistic reasons: "The plaintiff discharged union cutters and shop foremen without just cause therefor [delete the word]."/ "We are not unmindful of the sound and salutary rule, and of the obvious reasons therefor [read reasons for it]."/ "Recovery should be limited, in any event, to the reasonable value of the necessaries furnished rather than the contract price therefor [read their contract price]."/ "Mrs. W. bought 275 acres of land soon after the death of her second husband, paying therefor $2,000 [read $2,000 for it]." See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

B. Therefore for therefor. In the sentences that follow, therefore is wrongly used for therefor, a surprising lapse: "This memorandum is solely for the use of the person named below and may not be reproduced or used for any other purpose; any action to the contrary may place the persons responsible therefore [read persons responsible therefor, or, better, responsible persons] in violation of state and federal securities laws."/ "Dividends on the stock may be declared and paid by the board of directors of the company only out of the funds legally available therefore [read therefor, or, better, for that purpose]."

C. Therefor for therefore. This is the slightly more usual error with these homophones. In the first example, the misuse occurs twice in two sentences: "The point is that the Delaware statute contains no such limiting language and therefor [read therefore] must be construed to authorize any reasonable corporate gift of a charitable or educational nature. Significantly, the corporation was incorporated in Delaware in 1958, before 8 Del. C. § 122(9) was cast in its present form; therefor [read therefore], no constitutional problem arises."/ "These were not the acts of a competent master; they therefor [read therefore] rendered the vessels unseaworthy to a gross degree."/ "The Supreme Court (per Vinson, C.J.) therefor [read therefore] shifted from constitutional to other grounds."

D. Punctuation Around therefore. One must take care in the punctuation of therefore. In short sentences it need not, indeed should not, be set off by commas. Punctuating around it in short sentences creates great awkwardness: "We, therefore, dismiss the appeal." (The commas destroy the rhythm and emphasize we, as opposed to dismiss.)/ "It, therefore, becomes our duty to review these findings and to determine for ourselves whether they are sustained by the weight of the evidence." (Again, omit the commas around therefore. Whenever a single word like it precedes therefore, the latter should not be enclosed in commas unless that initial word is to receive stress.)/ "The court, therefore, remanded the action to the Secretary with instructions that he furnish the court with the basis of his final determination." (Who else would remand the action? Omit the commas around therefore.)

E. Run-On Sentences with therefore. One should take care not to create run-on sentences in this common way: "These works might be of paramount public interest, therefore [read interest; therefore] the rights of their compilers are accordingly [omit accordingly, which is here redundant] in the public interest." See RUN-ON SENTENCES.

therefrom (= from that or it) for therefor (= for that or it) is an odd blunder. E.g., "Petitioner has not presented any valid reason for allowing costs in this particular case and, there being no indication that defendant's removal petition was not made in good faith, the court denies petitioner's request therefrom [read therefor or, better, for costs]."

Even in contexts in which therefrom is technically correct, it is stilted and often vague. Thus, an editor will usually improve on it—e.g.: "We note that the trial counsel referred to the testimony about the upcoming marriage of the prosecutrix and her decision to leave town in his argument and deduced therefrom [read from those facts] why she would not claim she did not consent."

therein. See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

there is; there are. A. As Signals of Clutter. These phrases are enemies of a lean writing style. Rarely do they add anything but clutter to a sentence—e.g.: "In a few jurisdictions there are [read A few jurisdictions have] special statutes of limitations prohibiting the initiation of administration proceedings after a designated number of years." Thomas E. Atkinson, Handbook of the Law of Wills 569 (2d ed. 1953)./ "There is nothing in the record to indicate [read Nothing in the record indicates] that Jones intentionally relinquished his right to have Acme procure insurance."

The exceptions to this dictum invariably occur when the writer is addressing the existence of something—e.g.: "In tribal times, there were the medicine men. In the Middle Ages, there were the priests. Today there are the lawyers." Fred Rodell, Woe Unto You, Lawyers! 1 (1939; repr. 1980).

B. Number with. The number of the verb is controlled by whether the subject that follows the inverted verb is singular or plural. Mistakes are common—e.g.: "[A] trial judge has an affirmative duty . . . to ascertain whether there is [read there are] irrelevant, immaterial, or privileged matters contained within the records or documents." Peeples v. The Honorable Fourth Sup. J. Dist., 701 S.W.2d 635, 637 (Tex. 1985)./ "It has also been held (although dealing with exclusions from public places where there are [read there is] discrimination on the basis of race or color) that preventive relief is available where a public agency operates the public place." See EXPLETIVES & SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT (K).

C. Obliquely Phrased Duties in Drafting. In contractual and statutory DRAFTING, the phrase there is or, worse yet, there shall be displaces a more direct way of phrasing a duty—e.g.: "Because of the difficulty of ascertaining damages, there shall be payable to [read Tenant must pay] the Landlord $5,000 in liquidated damages for each such breach."

thereof. Avoid this legalistic word by rephrasing the thought—e.g.: "The Employee understands that this is a restrictive covenant and fully agrees to the reasonability thereof [read that it is reasonable]." See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

thereon. See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS

thereout is an ARCHAISM for therefrom—e.g.: "[T]he Arbitration Act rendered a written provision in a contract by the parties to such a transaction, to arbitrate controversies arising thereout [read therefrom, or, better, from the contract], specifically enforceable." The Anaconda v. American Sugar Ref. Co., 322 U.S. 42, 44 (1944)./ "But the gift is made subject to the payment thereout [read from the fund] of a rateable portion of capital transfer tax." (Eng.) See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS there shall be. See there is (C).

The others were born subsequently thereto [read later]."/ "Probate of wills, and litigation related thereto [read related litigation], belonged to the Church courts until 1857." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 436 (3d ed. 1990). See HERE- AND THERE- WORDS & CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF.

B. For thereon: "It comes as a surprise that the 1972 Code amendments and official comments thereto [read thereon] refer to the 'requirement' of filing." (One comments on, not to, a statute.)

these kind of; these type of; these sort of. These are illogical forms that, in a bolder day, would have been termed illiteracies because the demonstrative adjective these should modify a plural noun (e.g., kinds), not a singular one (e.g., kind). Today they merely brand the speaker or writer as being slovenly—e.g.: "The evidence shows that LTV's Board of Directors gave LTV's General Manager the requisite authority to enter into these type [read these types] of transactions." *LTV Fed. thieve, vb., may be either transitive (in the sense "to steal [a thing]") or intransitive (in the sense "to act as a thief"). In legal contexts today, the most common use is transitive—e.g.: "[D]efendant . . . told them he would melt down and dispose of any gold they could thieve . . . ." State v. Lewis, 293 S.E.2d 638, 641 (N.C. Ct. App. 1982)./ "A safe had been thieved and asported from the Canton Food Center." State v. Gardner, 429 N.W.2d 60, 62 n. (S.D. 1988) (Henderson, J., concurring).

thing. Users of this word are often chastised by ill-informed amateurs of usage. Though frequently derided, thing can be very useful in contexts in which no more specific or pseudospecific term is needed. Still, the word can easily be overused.

In law—which borrowed the term from philosophy—a thing is "the object of a right; i.e., is whatever is treated by the law as the object over which one person exercises a right, and with reference to which another person hes under a duty." Thomas E. Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence 101 (13th ed. 1924).

3d; 3rd. In legal writing, and esp. in citations, the first of these abbreviations is preferred. See 2d.

third(-)party is spelled as two words as a noun  and is hyphenated as an adjective  and as a verb <they were third-partied>. For the origin of this phrase, see party of the first part.

third-party, v.t., – to bring into litigation as a third-party defendant. This phrase—a casualism—should be hyphenated. E.g., "The defendant hospital did not third party [read third-party] Travenol." Richard v. Southwest La. Hosp. Ass'n, 383 So. 2d 83, 90 (La. Ct. App. 1980). This usage is informal at best, although it is increasingly common in AmE. See NOUNS AS VERBS third-party plaintiff. Pl. third-party plaintiffs. E.g., "The settlement did not subrogate third-parties plaintiff [read third-party plaintiffs] to plaintiff's rights against Ford."

third person should be pluralized third persons, never third people.

thither = there; to that place. See whither.

thitherto. See hitherto.

thoroughgoing = thorough, but connotes zeal or ardor. It is not, therefore, merely a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "The conflicts on the applicable interest rates alone—which we do not think can be labeled 'false conflicts' without a more thoroughgoing treatment than was accorded them by the Supreme Court of Kansas—certainly amounted to millions of dollars in liability."

threshold. So spelled; threshhold is a common misspelling (see, e.g., Zweygardt v. Colorado Nat'l Bank, 52 B.R. 229, 231 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1985)). The word is not a compound of the verb hold, but rather a modern form of OE thaerscwold (= doorsill). But cf. withhold.

thrice is a literary ARCHAISM, and sometimes a useful one, meaning "three times." E.g., "The words are thrice repeated in the statute." (A literalist would read this sentence as meaning that the words appear four times in the statute—once perhaps at the beginning and three times repeated.)/ "Before the instant conviction Avery, albeit a relatively young man, had at least thrice been convicted of felony charges."

thrift institution is the current jargon for savings and loan association.

thrive > thrived > thrived. Thrived, not throve, is the better past tense—e.g.: "Infantile sexuality lived and throve [read thrived]—in child and adult—before Freud brought it to scientific attention."

Likewise, thrived, not thriven, is the better past participle—e.g.: "[P]arody . . . has thrived from the time of Chaucer . . . ." Berlin v. E.C. Publications, Inc., 329 F.2d 541, 545 (2d Cir. 1964).

throw out, as legal slang, means "to reverse, overturn, or hold unconstitutional." E.g., "A decision throwing out a newly written law may hint to the lawmakers how to get the same thing done in a different way which the Justices will then approve." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 12 (1955)./ "This was the second trial of Speller the court threw out; the first was overturned because he had been tried by an all-white jury." Paul R. Clancy, Just a Country Lawyer: A Biography of Senator Sam Ervin 150 (1974)./ "The Rhode Island attorney general . . . declined to prosecute for lack of corroborating evidence, and the charges were thrown out by a Rhode Island judge . . . ." Hoffman v. Reali, 973 F.2d 980, 983 (1st Cir. 1994).

thru, an aborted variant spelling of through, should be shunned. Oddly, it appears in parts of the Internal Revenue Code.

thus. A. General Senses. Thus has four meanings: (1) in this or that manner <One does it thus>; (2) so <thus far>; (3) hence, consequently <Thus, the doctrine does not apply>, and (4) as an example <There are several possible courses of action: thus, one might amend the pleadings, nonsuit the defendants, or move for dismissal>. In senses (3) and (4), thus, when it begins a clause, should usu. have a comma following.

Here thus is given none of these meanings: "The factors that determine whether Article 2 applies are thus: (i) the type of transaction (sale); and (ii) the subject matter of the transaction (goods)." The best approach to remedying the problem in that sentence would be to replace thus with as follows.

B. Thusly. Thus itself being an adverb, it needs no -ly. Formerly, one might have labeled the use of thusly illiterate. Still, though it has appeared in otherwise respectable writing, it remains a grave lapse: "Professor Choper summarized our school aid cases thusly [read thus]." Edwards v.

Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 639 n.7 (1987) (Scalia, J., dissenting)./ "Grubbs is hardly a surprising decision when it is thusly interpreted [read interpreted thus]." Paxton v. Weaver, 553 F.2d 936, 942 (5th Cir. 1977)./ "He illustrated his concern thusly [read thus] . . . ." Barbara H. Craig, Chadha: The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle 54 (1988). Cf. overly & muchly. See ADVERBS, PROBLEMS WITH (D).

ticket-of-leave. See parole.

tidings is an ARCHAISM in AmE, although it persists in BrE literary usage. "A sues B on a policy of insurance, and shows that the vessel insured went to sea, and that after a reasonable time no tidings of her have been received, but that her loss has been rumoured; the burden of proving that she has not foundered is on B." (Eng.)

tie makes tying. Tieing is incorrect. E.g., "The court's determination that the surplus income is intestate, effectively avoiding, as it does, tieing up [read tying up] and so depriving Olive and her children of the enjoyment of it for what might prove to be a long term of years, is a result that fortifies this conclusion."

till; until. Till is, like until, a bona fide preposition and conjunction. Though less formal than until, till is neither colloquial nor substandard—e.g.: "The present English doctrine was not thoroughly received till the nineteenth century." Roscoe Pound, The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty 54 (1957)./ "Our system does not interfere till harm has been done and has been proved to have been done with the appropriate mens rea." H.L.A. Hart, "Punishment and the Elimination of Responsibility," in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 158, 182 (1968).

The myth to the contrary persists, as some authors and editors mistakenly think that till deserves a bracketed sic. See, e.g., William Brewer & Francis B. Majorie, One Year After Dondi, 17 Pepperdine L. Rev. 833, 842 n.68 (1990).

If any form deserves a sic, it is 'til, which is incorrect. E.g., R. Michael Otto, Comment, "Wait 'Til [read Till] Your Mothers Get Home": Assessing the Rights of Polygamists as Custodial and Adoptive Parents, 1991 Utah L. Rev. 881 (1991).

timbre; timber. These are different words in BrE and AmE. Timbre is primarily a musical term meaning "tone quality." Timber is the correct form in all other senses.

time-bar means "a bar to a legal claim arising from the lapse of a defined length of time, often contained in a statute of limitations." E.g., "The government bases its time-bar claim upon an earlier letter."

Hence time-barred = barred by the statute of limitations. The phrase is useful, though somewhat inelegant, shorthand—e.g.: "Kossick's action would have been time-barred under the federal maritime law." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 466 (2d ed. 1975)./ "The result may indeed differ, depending upon what body of law governs the availability of a third-party claim in this case, when the cause of action accrues, and when it becomes time-barred."

time immemorial. Popularly, this word means "a very long time." More technically, it means "a point in time so far back that no living person has knowledge or proof contradicting the right or custom alleged to have existed since then." See memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

time is of the essence. When a contractual stipulation relating to the time of performance is "of the essence" of a contract, a party's failure to meet that stipulation automatically justifies the other party's rescinding the contract—no matter how trivial the failure. If, on the other hand, time is not of the essence, then the failure to comply with a stipulation about time will justify rescission only if there is a substantial failure in performance. Gradually, the phrase time is of the essence has become so widespread that it is now classifiable as a POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITY.

timely, adj. & adv. Because timely may be an adverb as well as an adjective in AmE, phrases such as in a timely fashion and in a timely manner are wordy and should be shortened. E.g., "Unless he renounces his power in timely fashion [read unless he timely renounces his power], the trust corpus will be handled as part of his gross estate for tax purposes."/ "Here, Orpiano filed his objections in a timely fashion [read timely filed his objections], but the district court felt that a de novo determination of the portions Orpiano objected to was unnecessary." This adverbial use of timely is archaic in BrE. The rare adverbial form timelily is to be avoided.

In British law reports, timeous (= coming in due time) and timeously (= in a timely manner) are common. Though some Scots lawyers earnestly defend timeous, a Scottish glossary calls it "[a]n inelegant and unnecessary word." Andrew D. Gibb, Students' Glossary of Scottish Legal Terms 94 (A.G.M. Duncan ed., 2d ed. 1982). The word timeous is pronounced /tɪ-məs/, not /tim-ee-əs/. The word never occurs in AmE.

tippee = one who receives a tip (i.e., a critical bit of information); one who is illicitly tipped off. E.g., "Absent other culpable actions by a tippee that can fairly be said to outweigh these violations by insiders and broker-dealers, we do not believe that the tippee properly can be characterized as being of substantially equal culpability as his tippers." Bateman Eichler, Hill Richards, Inc. v. Berner, 472 U.S. 299, 314 (1985)./ "The scope of that implied right of action for investors is yet again before the Supreme Court—this time in the context of several defrauded and defrauding tippees of inside information seeking to recover against their also defrauding tipper."

The OED records the word from 1897 in a rather different sense: "the recipient of a 'tip' or gratuity." See -EE (A) tipper; tipster. Both refer to a person who gives tips (i.e., critical pieces of information). Tipster often refers to one who gives tips to police in criminal investigations, or sells tips relating to speculative or gambling subjects. Here the former sense applies: "An anonymous tipster, whose information was relayed to police by a private investigator, implicated appellant."

Tipper shares the meaning with tipster of an informer who tips off police on illegal activities; more commonly in legal AmE, it signifies "one who gives or sells tips to securities and other investors." See tippee.

tipstaff (= a court crier) has two plural forms: tipstaves and tipstaffs. The former predominates in American law reports. See crier.

title = (1) the legal link between a person and some object of property, e.g., ownership, possession, custody <What sort of title does she have?>; (2) legal ownership of property <No known person has title to the property>; (3) the grounds by which a landowner has rights of possession; or (4) the legal evidence of a person's ownership rights, or the means by which the owner comes to have those rights. Lon Fuller once remarked that title is an indispensable device of legal thought and expression, but that it has abuses when one speaks not of apportioning ownership rights between two or more persons: "[w]hen one's task necessitates breaking through the cover and apportioning the contents among different individuals, the cover [i.e., the word title] should be thrown away." Lon L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 121–22 (1967).

title-deed = a deed providing evidence of a person's legal ownership. In AmE, the term conveys nothing not included in the simple word deed. (See deed (A).) But in BrE, in which deed continues to refer to any sealed instrument, title-deed is a useful specification—e.g.: "No witness who is a party to a suit can be compelled to produce his title-deeds to any property." (Eng.)/ "Mortgages of shares are usually made by depositing the share certificate with the lender. This, like a deposit of title-deeds in the case of land . . . creates an equitable mortgage." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 100 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984). The plural form title-deeds is sometimes shortened to titles.

title member is synonymous in AmE with name partner, q.v.: "While the three title members of the firm were merely expert publicity men who devoted themselves to pulling in the business, the rest of the partners were capable, hard-working, high-minded attorneys who cringed at the antics of their masters, but who, for financial reasons, could not afford to sever their connection." Ephraim Tutt, Yankee Lawyer 147 (1943).

TITULAR TOMFOOLERY, primarily an outgrowth of weekly newspapers and news magazines in the U.S., consists in the creation of false titles for people. Instead of Abraham Lincoln, the country lawyer—or, for that matter, the country lawyer Abraham Lincoln (the prefixed the making a significant difference)—it is today commonplace to read of country lawyer Abraham Lincoln, or, worse yet, Country Lawyer Abraham Lincoln. Officer, granted, is a title to be prefixed to a person's name; police officer is not.

This informal verbal contagion originated in a misplaced desire for economy in both words and punctuation, since APPOSITIVES ordinarily require commas (see most of the revisions below).

- "Venireman Hal Ray [read A venireman named Hal Ray] was excluded properly because he was unable to follow the law."
- "Counsel asked Juror Franklin whether he had any personal knowledge of the case." (In this sentence, if we already know Franklin is on the jury, omit Juror; if not, read asked Franklin, one of the jurors, whether. . . . Moreover, the term juror may be inappropriate here because, if the question was posed at voir dire, the proper term would be veniremember.)

- "The district judge then went into the chambers and called for juror Graham [read the juror named Graham]."
- "Early in 1979, Brown, with the help of attorney Rogers [read his attorney, Rogers], took steps to obtain credit for the time he served between arrest and conviction."
- "Marion Smith, widow [read the widow] of George P. Smith, and her six children appeal the dismissal of this diversity action under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6)."
- "A few months ago, second-year law student Jerry Coleman [read a second-year law student, Jerry Coleman,] was unsure of whether to include on his résumé his membership in Columbia University's Gay and Lesbian Law Students' Association." Job Opportunities Opening Up for Gays, Nat'l Jurist, April/May 1992, at 6.
- "The district attorney also said he would request a new trial for one of the four policemen acquitted in the 1991 beating of black motorist Rodney King [read Rodney King, a black motorist]." Wall St. J., 14 May 1992, at A1.
- "Lawyer Hamm carried the case to the state's highest court, the Supreme Court of California." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble with Lawyers 61 (1970). (Hamm has already been identified as a lawyer. This example—as one can tell from the fuller context—seems intended as a slight.)

TMESIS /tə-mee-sis/, the practice of separating parts of a compound word by inserting another word between those parts, occurs much more frequently in legal than in lay writing. A classic colloquial example—some would say dialectal example—is the phrase a whole 'nother, which, surprisingly, has actually appeared in legal contexts: "The plaintiff must have a whole 'nother trial." See SET PHRASES

The traditional form of tmesis in legal prose, however, occurs with formal legal words ending in -soever. E.g., "Recusal is an act, of what nature soever it may be, by which a strange heir, by deeds or words, declares he will not be an heir."/ "A man is also prohibited on the ground of affinity from intermarrying with the wife of his father or father's father, how high soever." The modern tendency, which we should heartily encourage, is to avoid such stuffiness by writing, e.g., of whatever nature and however high.

to for until or up to is a casualism—e.g.: "To [read Up to] September 1964, no Negro pupil had applied for admission to the New Kent school under this statute."

to all intents and purposes. See for all intents and purposes.

together appears in a number of REDUNDANCIES, such as merge together, connect together, consolidate together, couple together, and join together, q.v. These phrases should be avoided.

together with; coupled with; as well as; added to. These expressions do not affect the number of the terms that precede or follow them. E.g., "Johnson, as well as Tucker and Thurman, was [not were] present at the hearing." See SUBJECT-VERB AGREEMENT (II).

to go on circuit. See circuit, to ride.

tolerance; toleration. The former is the quality, the latter the act or practice toll. In the context of time limits—esp. statutes of limitation—toll means "to abate" or "to stop the running of (the statutory period)." E.g, "There are various ways in which the statute of limitations may be tolled, such as by the absence of the defendant from the state."/ "Plaintiff's delays after being required to perfect service could not toll the limitation period."

Toll in this special sense has been misunderstood as meaning "to set into motion"—that is, just the opposite of its true sense. See Langford v. Shamburger, 417 S.W.2d 438, 445 syls. 7 & 8 (Tex. Civ. App.—Fort Worth 1967). That blunder is an infrequent one.

tome refers not to any book, but to one that is imposingly or forbiddingly large.

too. A. Beginning Sentences with. When it means "also," too should not begin a sentence, although there is a tendency in facile journalism today to use the word in this position. E.g., "Too [read Also], existing laws are read into contracts in order to fix obligations between the parties." As in the preceding edit, also may unobjectionably appear at the beginning of a sentence. Also, words such as moreover, further, and furthermore serve ably in this position.

B. For very. This informal use of too occurs almost always in negative constructions, e.g., not too common. In such contexts, the word very is preferable to too.

C. Too [+ adj.] a [+ n.]. This idiom being perfectly acceptable, there is no reason to insist on the artificiality of a too —— ——; that is, too good a job is better than a too good job. E.g., "[R]ights under a contract, in so far as they are not of too personal a nature, may form the subject of an assignment . . . ." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 122 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

toothless (= ineffectual; lacking the means of enforcement) is a snarl-word used, in legal discourse, to describe a statute or court decision that the writer or speaker considers too weak. E.g., "Even if something less than complete separability were required, the court's toothless standard disserves the important purposes underlying the separability requirement."

top court is a legal casualism referring to the court of last resort within a given jurisdiction. E.g., "The top court, in backing their convictions, rejected the defendants' reasoning." Sam H. Verhovek, New York Court Says Defendants Can't Reject Jurors Based on Race, N.Y. Times, 30 March 1990, at A1.

to put it another way; put another way. Either is acceptable, although the former is somewhat better from a literary point of view. Here the two idioms are confused: "Or, put it another way [read Or, to put it another way], they are estopped from denying that they were exercising the right they had under the original mortgage." Cf. stated otherwise.

to ride circuit. See circuit, to ride.

tornadic (= of or relating to a tornado or tornadoes) is almost always a pomposity—e.g.: "The Bossier Center, Inc. (Center) leased premises in its shopping center to Palais Royal (Palais) whose clothing store was heavily damaged by the tornadic forces [read the tornado]." Bossier Ctr., Inc. v. Palais Royal, Inc., 385 So. 2d 886, 887 (La. Ct. App. 1980)./ "Specifically, plaintiff's allegations challeng[ed] the NWS' failure 'to detect, or to recognize, certain radar signatures' allegedly indicating severe tornadic activity [read tornadoes] . . . ." Bergquist v. U.S., 849 F. Supp. 1221, 1230 (N.D. Ill. 1994).

torpid. See turbid.

Torrens system. In 1840, Robert Torrens moved from England to South Australia, where he assumed the post of Collector of Customs. While in that post, he developed a new system of conveyancing based on title certificates and enacted in the Real Property Act 1862.

In the U.S., the Torrens system is one of four types of evidence of title to real estate (the other three being abstract and opinion, certificate of title, and title insurance). A few counties with large metropolitan areas—e.g., Boston, Chicago, Minneapolis, and New York City—have adopted the Torrens system. Under this system, one who wants to establish title first acquires an abstract of title and then applies to a court for issuance of a certificate. This proceeding amounts to a lawsuit against all claimants to the land. Once the certificate is issued, it is conclusive evidence of ownership.

tort = a civil wrong; the breach of a duty that the law imposes on everyone. But those definitions are barely adequate, because "it is perhaps impossible to give an exact definition of 'a tort,' or 'the law of tort' or 'tortious liability,' and, as a corollary, it is certainly impossible to give a definition [that] will satisfy every theorist who has taken any interest in the topic." T.E. Lewis, Winfield on Tort 1 (6th ed. 1954). Why? Because there is no common set of traits that every tort possesses.

The word derives from LAW FRENCH, meaning lit. "wrong, injustice," and ultimately from L. tortus (= twisted, crooked). For the adjectival form, see tortious.

tortfeasor was once spelled as two words (as late as 1927 in the U.S. Supreme Court), then was hyphenated, and now has been fused into a single word. See feasor.

tortious. A. Two Senses. Tortious = (1) of or relating to tort <tortious causes of action>; or (2) constituting a tort <tortious acts that are also criminally punishable>. Sense (2) is now more common than sense (1), which is exemplified in this sentence: "In tort, the duty is imposed by law; the person under that tortious duty has no choice about whether he will shoulder it or not." See delictual.

B. And tortuous; torturous. Cardozo's famous opinion in Palsgraf demonstrated that a tortious act could result from a tortuous chain of events with torturous consequences. Tortuous = full of twists and turns . Torturous = of, characterized by, pertaining to torture <torturous abuse>. The word aptly appears in the phrase "the con-scienceless or pitiless crime [that] is unnecessarily torturous to the victim." State v. Dixon, 283 So. 2d 1, 9 (Fla. 1973).

Tortuous is sometimes misused for tortious—e.g.: "Such duty falls into a very different category [from] the general duty to avoid tortuous [read tortious] conduct." Walls v. Rees, 569 A.2d 1161, 1167 (Del. 1990)./ "Petitioners urge that [defendants] . . . engaged in the intentional tortuous [read tortious] conduct specified below . . . ." Korson v. Independence Mall I, Ltd., 595 So. 2d 1174, 1177 (La. Ct. App. 1992).

Similarly, tortuous is occasionally misused for torturous: "Eight-year-old Jenny, a second grader, left for school as usual at 7 a.m. on Dec. 10, 1991. It was still dark as she walked along the sidewalk. So she never saw the tall, thin stranger sneak up from behind and grab her by the back of the neck. She was forced into an alley and then put on the floorboard of the stranger's car and covered with a blanket. This young child was beginning a long, tortuous [read torturous] ordeal [involving repeated rapes]." Bill Walsh, A Coordinated Approach to Crimes Against Children, 55 Tex. B.J. 488, 488 (1992).

tortious interference with contractual relations; procuring (or inducing) breach of contract; interference with a subsisting contract. The first is the American phrase; the latter two are primarily British. Each one means "the tort of intentionally persuading or inducing someone to breach a contract made with a third party."

tortuous; torturous. See tortious (B).

totality of the circumstances is a common legal catchphrase, esp. in AmE. E.g., "Our recent cases have thoroughly rejected the Palko notion that basic constitutional rights can be denied by the states as long as the totality of the circumstances do not disclose a denial of fundamental fairness."

total(l)ed. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS to the effect that is often verbose for that.

Totten trust; tentative trust. These phrases, which are equivalent, denote "a revocable trust created by one's deposit of money in one's own name as a trustee for another." E.g., "It seems well settled that the creditor of one who deposits money in a savings account in the name of the depositor as trustee for another, in a jurisdiction in which this transaction creates a so-called tentative or Totten trust, can reach the deposit in satisfaction of his claims." The name Totten trust, which is perhaps slightly more common, derives from the case In re Totten, 71 N.E. 748 (N.Y. 1904). See CASE REFERENCES (C).

touch and concern. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS touching (= concerning; about; bearing on) is today virtually peculiar to the legal idiom. E.g., "Such evidence as was adduced touching the affidavit for the search warrant showed that it was issued on information and belief without stating the grounds of belief." The OED labels this use of the word "somewhat archaic"; today it is rightly considered an ARCHAISM.

toward, which implies movement, is sometimes misused for to—e.g.: "One has an affirmative responsibility toward [read to] others when one has taken active part in directing the manner in which those others perform their work."/ "There is no legal objection toward [read to] constituting such a trustee in favor of one who was not in being when the fraud was perpetrated."

toward(s). In AmE, the preferred form is toward; towards is prevalent in BrE.

to(-)wit. The ordinary progression in such common phrases is from two words, to a hyphenated form, to a single word. Though Mellinkoff idiosyncratically spelled this as a single word throughout The Language of the Law (1963), and the hyphenated form was once common, today it seems that to wit is destined to remain two words, if indeed its destiny is not oblivion. To wit is a legal ARCHAISM in the place of which namely is almost always an improvement. Cf. viz.

toxic. When the context calls for a noun, the adjective toxic (= poisonous) should not displace the noun toxin (= poison). "Solvents can increase the mobility of certain toxics [read toxins] in the soil."

toxicology; toxology. Toxicology = the science of poisons; toxology = the branch of knowledge dealing with archery.

track is sometimes misused for tract (= a parcel of land) in the phrase tract of land—e.g.: "The defendant and two others cut down over two miles of continuous barbed wire fence on three adjacent tracks [read tracts] of land in one night." State v. Lubrano, 550 So. 2d 1283, 1286 (La. Ct. App. 1989).

Of course, the two words should be pronounced differently: tract /trakt/ and track /trak/.

trade(-)mark; trade(-)name. The unhyphenated, one-word spellings are preferred. Formerly, in AmE, these terms were distinguished: A trademark was an arbitrary, fanciful, or suggestive name of, or symbol for, a product or service that was protectible under trademark laws. A tradename, by contrast, was a descriptive, personal, or geographical name or symbol protectible under the law of unfair competition. With the enactment of the Lanham Act in 1946, this distinction became defunct.

Today in AmE, the term trademark embraces all the types of names or symbols just mentioned. Its two primary senses are: (1) "a word, phrase, logo, or other graphic symbol used by a manufacturer or seller to distinguish its products from those of others"; or (2) "the body of law dealing with how businesses distinguish their products and services from those of others." In sense (2), the word encompasses such narrower fields as service marks, tradenames, unfair competition, and palming off. See service(-)mark.

Tradename continues only in the sense "a symbol used to distinguish a company, partnership, or business (as opposed to a product or service)." See 1 J. Thomas McCarthy, Trademarks and Unfair Competition §§ 4.02–4.05 (3d ed. 1984); 3 Rudolf Callmann, The Law of Unfair Competition, Trademarks, and Monopolies § 17.05 (L. Altman ed., 4th ed. 1983).

In sum, tradenames identify businesses; trademarks identify goods produced by or services provided by businesses.

traduce is a literary word meaning "to slander; calumniate." It has never been a law word per se, although occasionally it is used in legal contexts. E.g., "Libelous statements tend to excite the wrath of the person so traduced or to deprive him of public confidence."

traffic, v.i., forms the participles trafficking and trafficked, but the adjective trafficable and the noun trafficator.

trammel is inflected trammeled, trammeling in AmE; and trammelled, trammelling in BrE. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

transcendent(al). Transcendent = surpassing or excelling others of its kind; preeminent. It is loosely used by some writers in the sense "excellent." Transcendental = supernatural; mystical; metaphysical; superhuman. The adverbial forms are transcendently and transcendentally.

transcript; transcription. The former is the written copy, the latter the process of producing it. See record (B).

transfer, v.t., is traditionally accented on the second syllable, hence the past-tense spelling transferred, not transfered. Transferor but transferral; transferred, transferring, but transferable, transferability. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

transfer, n.; transference; transfer(r)al. Of these three, transfer is the all-purpose noun. E.g., "As far as the question has been considered, this court is committed to the doctrine that a transfer of shares on the books of the corporation passes the legal title to the person named in the stock certificate." Transfer commonly appears in the legal phrase transfer of venue. Transferral (the spelling included in the OED) is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of transfer. The W3 entry and the W10 notation, strangely, appear under transferal.

Transference justifies its separate existence primarily in psychological contexts, in the sense "the redirection of feelings or desires." E.g., "Appellant also contends that the probability of transference of guilt was heightened because the two defendants were brothers."

transferable; transferrible. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A). transference. See transfer, n.

transferor. So spelled in legal contexts—e.g.: "A transfer is effected by sending to the transferee a 'proper instrument of transfer' executed by the transferor, together with the share certificate relating to the shares comprised in the transfer." J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 89 (4th ed. 1945).

W3 lists transferor as a variant spelling of transferrer, but notes under the legal definition "usu. transferor." For transferee, see -EE (A). transferral. See transfer, n.

transferrible. See transferable.

transfusible; transfusable. The former spelling is preferred. See -ABLE (A). transience; transiency. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

transient; transitory; transitive. Transient = impermanent; quickly passing. The word is used in the phrase transient jurisdiction. Transitory, which has virtually the same meaning, is used in the legal phrase transitory action (= an action in which the venue might be proper in any county). Transitive is a grammatical term denoting a verb that takes a direct object.

transit in rem indicatam. See MAXIMS transitory. See transient.

transmissible; transmittable. The former is preferred; the latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT. E.g., "This discussion leads to the principal question of the case: whether the testator intended that Mary Silva must survive the trust beneficiary before her interest could be transmissible to her heirs."

transmit is a minor pomposity—but a pomposity nevertheless—for send. E.g., "The clerk shall transmit [read send] the notice to the chief judge . . . ." Fed. R. Crim. App. 49(e). transmittable. See transmissible.

transmittal; transmittance; transmission. Transmittal is more physical than transmission, just as admittance is more physical than admission, q.v. Transmittal, though labeled rare in the OED, is common in AmE legal writing, esp. in the phrase transmittal letter (= a cover letter accompanying documents or other things being conveyed to another). E.g., "The taxpayers contend that the corporation's transmittal of the loan proceeds to the partnership satisfies this criterion."/ "The company will send a check for the amount due directly to the beneficiary and will send the executor a copy of its letter of transmittal for his records."/ "Both the preparation of the report and its transmittal to Jaworski occurred several months before any negotiations for the sale of the subsidiary." Transmittance is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

transmutation means "to change," not "to transfer," as used by some legal writers (as in the erroneous phrase used in some legal contexts for transfer, but conveys transmutation of possession).

transnational. So spelled.

transpire. The traditionally correct meaning of this word is "to pass through a surface; come to light; to become known by degrees"—e.g.: "[A]n indictment against a man as accessory before should be good even if it transpires [i.e., becomes known] that he is a principal in reality." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 406 (2d ed. 1961). Because this usage grows rarer by the year, it is probably beyond redemption. Lawyers and judges should therefore be aware of the ambiguity created by the coexistence of the popular meaning: "to happen, occur."

When used in that sense, transpire is a mere pomposity displacing an everyday word (happen). The word is badly needed in its true sense, as it is used here: "[S]uppose that a person were to sell a second-hand car and were to state that the brakes were in good working order. If in fact it transpired that the brakes did not work at all the seller would find it difficult to convince a judge that he had merely been negligent rather than dishonest." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 228 (3d ed. 1981; repr. 1986).

The loose meaning, of course, is rampant—e.g.: "Many changes have transpired [read occurred] with regard to state-authorized administrative agencies."/ "A discussion then transpired [read took place] between the trial judge and counsel regarding the pleadings and damages, followed by the return of the jury and closing arguments."

Another loose usage occurs (not transpires) when transpire is used for pass or elapse—e.g.: "Only ten days transpired [read passed] between filing of the joint motion for entry of consent decrees and the time that plaintiffs first gave notice of appeal." The OED brands this usage "obsolete, rare, and erroneous"; only the last of these adjectives fits.

transportation; transportal; transportment. The second and third forms are NEEDLESS VARIANTS.

transship. So spelled—without a hyphen.

trauma, in pathology, means "a wound, or external bodily injury in general," although in popular contexts it has been largely confined to figurative (emotional) senses.

traverse, v.t. & n. This word is obsolescent in AmE, but it appears in many not-so-old cases. As a verb, traverse means "to deny a factual allegation made in the opposite party's pleading." E.g., "The declaration states that the ass was lawfully on the highway, and the defendant has not traversed that allegation."/ "[I]n reply to a claim, a defendant at common law may traverse the allegations of the plaintiff, i.e. deny the truth of his assertions." G.W. Paton, A Textbook of Jurisprudence 595 (4th ed. 1972).

As a noun, traverse means "a denial of a factual allegation made in the opposite party's pleading."

E.g., "Brown filed a traverse to the state's response, asserting that he failed to seek relief earlier because he was not aware of his right to file on his guilty plea."/ "At common law the respondent . . . was required to plead specially by distinct traverse of the allegations of the writ." Sansom v. Mercer, 5 S.W. 62, 65 (Tex. 1887). A denial of all the facts was, at common law, called a general traverse; a denial of one material fact was called a special traverse.

tread. See trodden.

treason. This word (fr. L. tradere "to give up or betray") originally meant treachery to one's lord rather than to the king. At common law, it was petit treason for a vassal to kill his lord, a wife her husband, a servant his master, or a clergyman his prelate; it was high treason to kill the king.

In the U.S. today, it is treason to levy war against the nation or to materially support its enemies.

treasonable; treasonous. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

treasure trove, lit. "treasure found," is a remnant of LAW FRENCH. In Anglo-American law, it means "treasure (usu. gold or silver) found hidden in the ground or other place, the owner of which is unknown." E.g., "It is customary for the Treasury to recompense the owner of the land and the finder if it is declared treasure trove, as was the case with the collection of Roman silver plate found a few years ago at Mildenhall." O. Hood Phillips, A First Book of English Law 34 (3d ed. 1955).

treaty; convention; pact; act; declaration; protocol; executive agreement. Contracts between states are called by these various names, none of which has a single fixed meaning. The distinctions that follow are based on those contained in J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 243 (5th ed. 1955). A treaty is the most formal type of agreement between nations. A convention or pact is generally a less important and less formal agreement. An act generally results from a formal conference involving high officials. A declaration is ordinarily an agreement that declares the law or makes law (as in the Declaration of Independence or Declaration of Paris), though such an agreement is just as often called a convention (as in the Hague Convention). A protocol is usu. either the minutes of the proceedings at an international conference or an addendum to a treaty.

In the U.S., an executive agreement is an agreement between the U.S. and another nation. Unlike a treaty, which must have the advice and consent of the Senate, an executive agreement is made by the President but not ratified by the Senate. Some writers loosely refer to executive agreements as treaties.

treaty, v.i., (= to make a treaty with) is a NEOLOGISM that is not widespread—and is therefore subject to the objection that many readers will find it jarring. E.g., "Although the United States treatied [read made treaties] with tribes for the majority of the tribes' land claims, such negotiations did not always take place." James E. Torgerson, Indians Against Immigrants—Old Rivals, New Rules, 14 Am. Indian L. Rev. 57, 78 (1988).

treble; triple. These words are distinguishable though sometimes interchangeable. Treble is more usual as the verb, especially in legal contexts: "Before enactment in the 1979 amendments to the Deceptive Trade Practices Act, trebling of any damages was mandatory."

As an adjective, treble usually means "three times as much or as many" <treble damages>, whereas triple means "having three parts"  <triple bypass surgery>.

trek (fr. Dutch trekken "to march or travel") is occasionally misspelled treck—e.g.: "[T]he campers would engage in such activities as water skiing, scuba diving, horseback trecks [read treks] into the Grand Canyon, mountain climbing, river trips on rubber rafts and fossil hunting." Ferman v. Estwing Mfg. Co., 334 N.E.2d 171, 172 (Ill. App. Ct. 1975)./ "[T]he arrestees were allowed to retain control of [the potential weapons] during the long treck [read trek] back." People v. Brisendine, 531 P.2d 1099, 1102–03 (Cal. 1975) (en banc).

trespass. The LAW FRENCH word for transgression or wrongdoing, trespass began not as a term of art but as a word so broad as to encompass felony, misdemeanor, and disseisin.

In the later common law, the action of trespass took on a variety of forms, among which it is useful to distinguish. Trespass vi et armis = an action for intentional injuries to the person. Trespass de bonis asportatis (or trespass de bonis) = an action for the wrongful taking of chattels. Trespass quare clausum fregit (or trespass q.c.f.) = an action for invasion of possession of realty. Trespass on the case = an action for myriad other injuries, from negligence to nuisance to business torts. See trespass on the case.

trespasser; trespassor. The better spelling is trespasser.

trespassers will be prosecuted is, in itself, usually a lie. Trespass to land is a tort, not a crime. But trespassers who cause damage, as by damaging crops or breaking windows, can be prosecuted.

trespass on the case is a form of action that, at common law, provided compensation for a wide spectrum of injuries, from personal injuries caused by negligence to business torts and nuisances.

Case is often used as an elliptical form of the phrase trespass on the case. E.g., "While the actions of trespass and trover, and even case, are described above in the past tense, it is erroneous to assume that these legal labels have altogether dropped out of current usage."/ "The rule for ascertaining what damages a plaintiff could recover did not depend on whether his action was framed in case or assumpsit; the principles laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale applied in either case." (Eng.) See action on the case.

trespassor. See trespasser.

trespassorily. See trespassory.

trespassory, dating from 1888, is the adjective corresponding to the noun trespass. Included in W2, it is, oddly, missing from W3. Yet it is common—e.g.: "Before that time, South Carolina decisions had indicated a trespassory entry was necessary to conviction." Sodergren v. State, 715 P.2d 170, 175 (Wyo. 1986)./ "[A]n action on the case for nuisance gave him a remedy for non-trespassory interference with the use and enjoyment of his land." Roger A. Cunningham et al., The Law of Property 9 (2d ed. 1993).

The adverb is trespassorily—e.g.: "[A] defendant commits a robbery when, with the intent permanently to deprive, he trespassorily takes and carries away the personal property of another from the latter's person or presence by the use of force or threatened force." 4 Wharton's Criminal Law § 469, at 40 (14th ed. 1981).

triable = capable of being tried in a court of law; liable to judicial trial (OED). This term is used in reference to persons as well as issues and offenses, but primarily in reference to offenses—e.g.: "Whether a given offense is to be classed as a crime so as to require a jury trial or as a petty offense triable summarily without a jury depends primarily upon the nature of the offense."/ "[I]f there has been a demand but the case is not triable to a jury as of right, the case will be tried to the court." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 618 (4th ed. 1983).

trial, at; upon trial; on the trial. The usual idiom today is at trial, not upon trial or on the trial. E.g., "But if it develops on the trial [read at trial] that the plaintiff is not entitled to equitable relief in any form, equity will not retain the case to award damages." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 142 (1930)./ "To what extent, if any, equitable relief may ultimately be granted must rest with exigencies as they appear upon trial [read at trial] . . . ." High v. Trade Union Courier Pub. Corp., 69 N.Y.S.2d 526, 529 (Sup. Ct. 1946). See at (the) trial.

trial, v.t. The OED records four instances of this verb, in the sense "to test (a thing, esp. a new product)," beginning in 1981 <several models are already being trialed>.

In Australia and the U.S., it is sometimes said that a defendant is "trialled" (or "trialed," as the word would be spelled in AmE). An Australian writer comments: "Apparently the outré misused word was supposed to mean that he or she had been brought to trial, or had been put to trial. What an unsavoury ill treatment of the English language." Theo Ruoff, Murky Muddleheadedness or Magic? 61 Law Inst. J. 734, 734 (1987). When this unsavory ill treatment occurs in AmE, it comes usu. from the mouth of a nonlawyer—e.g.: "I was trialed as a habitual offender."

trial lawyer, in AmE, has in two ways come to have connotations somewhat different from litigator, q.v. First, a trial lawyer is usu. one who actually feels comfortable going into court for trial, whereas a litigator is increasingly thought of as a pretrial paper-pusher.

Second, in journalism and even in some legal writing, trial lawyer often denotes one who represents primarily plaintiffs, esp. in tort actions. E.g., "Aside from the trial lawyers themselves, no group has lobbied as hard to expand the scope of liability as the consumer movement." Walter Olson, A Naderite Backflip on Liability, Wall St. J., March 11, 1986, at 30./ "Trial lawyers—used here, the term refers to the advocates for victims of what the law calls torts—are a virtually unknown class of the bar . . . ." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators xii (1989). The American Trial Lawyers' Association is composed primarily of the plaintiffs' bar, as opposed to defense counsel.

Just as often, however, trial lawyer is used in its broader sense, referring to defense counsel as well as plaintiffs' counsel—e.g.: "Trial lawyers view a disqualification motion as one of the most difficult maneuvers, because they recognize that they must appear before the judge for the rest of their careers." N.Y. Times, 3 Oct. 1988, at 26./ "It was thought that surprise, dearly cherished by an earlier generation of trial lawyers, would be minimized or ended altogether." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 540 (4th ed. 1983).

trial to the bench. See bench trial.

tribunal has two senses: (1) "a court or other adjudicatory body"; or (2) "the seat, bench, or place where judges sit." In its most usual application—sense (1)—tribunal is broader than court and generally refers to a body, other than a court, that exercises judicial functions <industrial tribunal> <social-security tribunal>.

trier of fact; fact-trier. These terms refer to the finder of fact in a judicial proceeding, i.e., the jury or, in a bench trial, the judge. Trier of fact is the older phrase, fact-trier a form that has recently come into use in AmE and that reduces the awkwardness of trier of fact when a possessive is called for <the fact-trier's impartiality>. See POSSESSIVES (G).

triggerman. See nontriggerman & SEXISM (B) trillion, in the U.S. and France, means "a million millions," and traditionally in G.B., "a million million millions." The difference is more than substantial. Today many British writers follow the American usage, however. Cf. billion.

trip (= appeal) is judges' JARGON in AmE—e.g.: "In Milton's first habeas trip, we set out the procedural history of his case."

triple. See treble.

TRIPLETS. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

triumphant; triumphal. Persons are triumphant (= celebrating a triumph), and things are triumphal (= of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a triumph).

-TRIX. See SEXISM (C).

T.R.O. = temporary restraining order. The letters in this abbreviation are usu. capitalized in AmE. Though the periods are often absent, the better practice is to use them, for T.R.O. is an initialism, not an acronym. See ACRONYMS AND INITIALISMS.

trodden is preferred to trod as the past participle of tread. Ironically, however, untrod is preferred to untrodden as the adjectival form.

troops. This plural form, which signifies soldiers <the troops were deployed along the crest of the ridge>, is usually modified by an adjective to indicate some special training the soldiers have completed or some special assignment <ski troops> <airborne troops> <desert troops>. An adjective may also designate the upper command level at which the soldiers are currently functioning <divisional troops> <corps troops> <army troops> <allied troops>. In the singular, a troop refers not to an individual soldier but to an assembled unit of soldiers of whatever special kind, mission, or affiliation   . The plural term troops is meaningful when the soldiers referred to are five, six, or more in number <get these troops out of the sun>.

These military terms are not to be confused with the term troupe   .

Both troop and troupe have their origin in the medieval French term troupeau, meaning a crowd or herd.

trove = accumulation, hoard. See treasure trove.

trover. See detinue.

true bill = the grand jury's notation that a criminal charge should go before a petty jury for trial. The phrase is an 18th-century LOAN TRANSLATION of the medieval LATINISM billa vera. E.g., "A second grand jury impaneled in Potter County returned a true bill indicting Miracle for aggravated robbery, a first-degree felony, with two felony convictions alleged for enhancement."/ "In theory anyone could put an accusation in a bill, lay it before the grand jury with supporting evidence, and invite them to call it a true bill." Patrick Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 5 (1960). See grand jury (A) & LAW LATIN.

true-bill, v.t. = (1) to indict; or (2) to endorse (an indictment) in a way that shows that the grand jury finds the indictment to be sustained by the evidence. E.g., in sense 2: "It is formal notice at the time the indictment was true-billed . . . ." Clara Tuma, Court Expands Weapon Notice Requirements, Tex. Law., 14 May 1990, at 14.

true facts. Although lawyers often use the word facts as shorthand for alleged facts—and can therefore make out a (weak) case for writing true facts—the latter phrase is usually nothing more than a commonplace REDUNDANCY. E.g., "Here, the true facts are [read facts are] that there is no coverage . . . ." Ohio Casualty Ins. Co. v. Cooper Mach. Corp., 817 F. Supp. 45, 48 (N.D. Tex. 1993)./ "The status of 'insured' is to be determined by the true facts [read facts], not false, fraudulent, or otherwise incorrect facts that might be alleged [read allegations] . . . ." Blue Ridge Ins. Co. v. Hanover Ins. Co., 748 F. Supp. 470, 473 (N.D. Tex. 1990). See facts. Cf. actual fact, in.

trump, n. & v.t. In cards, a trump is a card of a suit that, for the time being, ranks above the other three, so that any such card can 'take' any card of another suit. Thus, one says that this card trumps (i.e., overcomes) that one.

During the late 20th century, legal scholars began using this cardplaying metaphor in discussing legal doctrine. Though sometimes deplored as a casualism, the usage is now established—e.g.: "[I]t is hard to understand why . . . the same purpose should not also be sufficient to trump the per se rule in all other price-fixing cases that arguably permit cartel members to 'provide better services.'" Business Elecs. Corp. v. Sharp Elecs. Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 756 (1988) (Stevens, J., dissenting)./ "[N]o Member of Congress came to the judgment that the District Court cases would trump Johnson on the point at issue here . . . ." Blanchard v. Bergeron, 489 U.S. 87, 98 (1989) (Scalia, J., concurring in part).

trust. A. Senses. Trust = (1) the confidence reposed in a person who looks after property for another's use or benefit; (2) an equitable estate committed to the charge of a fiduciary (trustee) for a beneficiary; (3) the relationship between the holder of the property and the property so held; or (4) a combination that aims at a monopoly <trustbuster>.

In sense (1), trust can apply to a variety of fiduciary relationships, including executorship, guardianship, and agency. The transference in meaning between (1) and (2) resulted from a type of HYPALLAGE; so successful was it that sense (2) is now the predominant one.

Sense (4) is an odd extension of meaning, but it is indeed an extension of sense (2): "The monopolistic trusts were originally so called because the stock of the combining corporations was transferred to technical trustees to accomplish a centralization of control." George T. Bogert, Trusts § 1, at 2 (6th ed. 1987).

B. In trust and on trust. In sense (1), the word commonly appears in two idioms. In a formal express trust, it is usual to designate the trustee as such and to state that the transfer is in trust. The phrase on trust is really just a variation of that idiom—e.g.: "A woman left her residuary estate on trust for her husband for life, remainder to trustees for her children." Erwin Griswold, Cases and Materials on Taxation 241 (6th ed. 1966).

C. Trust Without Qualifying Adjective. When trust appears without a qualifying adjective, the sense is almost always "express trust." When a constructive trust is intended, the entire phrase invariably appears. See Restatement of Restitution § 160 cmt. a, at 642 (1937).

D. Other Names for constructive trust. Though constructive trust is by far the most common phrase today for a trust imposed by a court on equitable grounds, legal writers formerly used in this sense the phrases trust de son tort, implied trust, trust ex delicto, trust ex maleficio, and involuntary trust.

trust agreement. See declaration of trust.

trust deed. See deed of trust & declaration of trust.

trust de son tort. See trust (D).

trustee, n. A. And trusty. Trustee = a person who, having a nominal title to property, holds it in trust for the benefit of one or more others, the beneficiaries. Trusty, n., is an Americanism meaning "a (trusted) convict or prisoner." E.g., "A trusty who had accompanied the officers crawled under the house and retrieved a lady's girdle from inside one of the vents underneath the house, along with several rectal syringes." In re Wright, 282 F. Supp. 999, 1005 (W.D. Ark. 1968).

B. And executor. In the context of wills, nonlawyers are frequently confused about the difference between an executor and a trustee. The executor collects the decedent's property, pays the debts, and hands over the remaining property to the persons who are entitled to it under the will. A trustee becomes necessary only when the property must be held for a time because it cannot, for some reason, be handed over at once to the persons entitled to it.

trustee, v.t., dates from the early 19th century, though it looks like a newfangled verbalization of a noun. The term has three senses: (1) "to place (a person or a person's property) in the hands of a trustee or trustees"; (2) (AmE) "to appoint (a person) trustee, often of a bankrupt's estate in order to restrain the creditor from collecting moneys due"; and (3) (AmE) "to attach (the effects of a debtor) in the hands of a third person." E.g., "He trusteed his publications." (Horwill)/ "The defendant in this case . . . is a jointly trusteed employee health and welfare benefit plan." Powers v. South Cent. United Food & Commercial Workers Unions, 719 F.2d 760, 761 (5th Cir. 1983). The first quotation illustrates sense (1), a use known in BrE; the second illustrates sense (2), which predominates in AmE.

truth and veracity is an old but unjustified DOUBLET. To make any sense in modern English, the phrase should be truthfulness and veracity. In other words, truth in this phrase is shorthand for either truthfulness or truth-telling, but even most lawyers would be hard-pressed to explain why, since that meaning of truth passed into disuse in the 18th century. Today the phrase needs editing: "Parties in both civil and criminal actions are frequently assailed by the character witness who testifies that the reputation of one of the parties to the action is bad for truth and veracity [read truthfulness] . . . ." Asher L. Cornelius, The Cross-Examination of Witnesses 103 (1929).

truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. This phrase is the quintessential example of ceremonial legal language—e.g.: "A young girl walked to the witness stand. As she raised her hand and swore that the evidence she gave would be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth so help her God, she seemed somehow fragile-looking, but when she sat facing us in the witness chair she became what she was, a thick-bodied girl accustomed to strenuous labor." Harper Lee, To Kill a Mockingbird 181 (1960).

try. In G.B., only judges and juries try cases; but in the U.S. lawyers, as well as judges and juries, are said to try cases. E.g., "The court would say unequivocally that this case has been well tried by excellent attorneys." See litigate.

try and is, in AmE, a casualism for try to; in BrE, however, it is a standard idiom.

tu quoque (lit. "you also") = a retort in kind; accusing an accuser of a similar offense.

turbid; turpid; torpid. Turbid = (of water) muddy, thick; (fig.) disordered. Turpid is a rare word meaning "filthy, worthless." Torpid = dormant, sluggish, apathetic.

turn state's evidence (AmE) = turn King's (or Queen's) evidence (BrE). This idiom dates from the early 18th century: an accomplice to a crime is said to turn evidence by cooperating with the prosecutors and testifying against other criminal defendants. E.g., "Matthews . . . had turned Queen's evidence in the hands of a police officer who was not above suspicion." Patrick Devlin, The Judge 170–71 (1979)./ "[A]nother legitimate use for pardons was found, as a means of persuading accomplices to 'turn king's evidence' and testify against their fellows at their trial of indictment." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 589 (3d ed. 1990).

turpid. See turbid.

tutrix is a legal ARCHAISM meaning "a female guardian." The word guardian itself suffices. See SEXISM (C).

twelve free and lawful men; twelve good and lawful men; twelve men good and true; twelve good and true men. These hoary references to a 12-member jury are LOAN TRANSLATIONS of either of two Latin phrases: duodecim liberos et legales homines and duodecim bonos et legales homines. Variations on the phrase have appeared in a wide range of literature, though concerns about SEXISM will surely restrict their use to historical contexts, a tendency already evident—e.g.:

- "In the meantime make twelve free and lawful men of the neighbourhood view the land, and record their names." Alan Harding, A Social History of English Law 43 (1966) (translating an assize of novel disseisin from the time of Henry II).
- "[H]e uses every trick of oratory and acting to appeal to the crudest emotions of the twelve good men and true." Jerome Frank, Law and the Modern Mind 197 (1930; repr. 1963).
- "Massachusetts, among other states, created a system of these courts in 1775—though, true to ideology, issues of fact were to be decided by 'twelve good and lawful men.'" Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law 53 (2d ed. 1985).
- "The twelve free and lawful men mentioned in the writ were summoned to 'make recognition' of the facts, and were sometimes called recognitors." J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 86 (3d ed. 1990).

With all the variations on this expression, it could hardly be termed a SET PHRASE. Thus, it is hardly surprising to see writers varying it still further—e.g.: "[I]n times of public excitement the participation of a dozen or two 'good men and true' may merely serve to lend a veneer of due process to expressions of mass hysteria." Lon L. Fuller, Anatomy of the Law 39 (1968).

twofold; threefold; fourfold. These and like terms should be spelled as one word.

two-witness rule = the rule that, to support a perjury conviction, two independent witnesses (or one witness together with corroborating evidence) must establish that the perjurer gave false evidence. In the context of treason, the two-witness rule appears in the Constitution: "No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 2.

type. For the problem raised by the phrase these type of, see these kind of.

type of is often used unnecessarily and inelegantly. E.g., "In this type of case [read In a case of this kind] it is not the function of the board to reconsider the evidence but only to consider whether there was evidence that, if reasonably considered by the trial court, would justify its view as to the appellant's guilt." (Eng.)

Of is dropped in the following examples, which are typical of the modern American colloquial trend. Again, however, the phrasing with type makes the sentence wordy: "Speedfast is not entitled to the rigid type protection [read protection] it seeks . . . ." Julius M. Ames Co. v. Bostitch, Inc., 235 F. Supp. 856, 857 (S.D.N.Y. 1964)./ "[I]t was reasonably necessary to employ someone in this type business [read business] to keep the property rented . . ." Corpus Christi Bank & Trust v. Roberts, 597 S.W.2d 752, 754 (Tex. 1980).

tyrannical; tyrannous. Though the senses often seem to merge, the former corresponds to tyrant, the latter to tyranny. In the following examples, a tyrant is being suggested: "[N]obody has yet been found to say a good word for King John. He was false, cowardly, and tyrannical." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 49 (2d ed. 1953)./ "Even the most tyrannical despot, who may operate on the basis that his whim is law, soon discovers that his whims will be most effectively enforced if they are translated into 'real' law." P.S. Atiyah, Law and Modern Society 65 (1983).

But tyrannous is the appropriate word when referring to tyranny—e.g.: "[T]he representative character of the Commons forms one half of the safeguard against precipitate or tyrannous legislation . . . ." H.G. Hanbury, English Courts of Law 20 (2d ed. 1953).

Sometimes the two forms provoke suspicions of INELEGANT VARIATION—e.g.: "The colonists regarded the acts as tyrannous and oppressive . . . . American historians are generally in agreement that the Navigation Acts . . . , together with the ensuing tyrannical physical acts of forcible entry . . . [etc.] were the main causes of the American Revolution." In re Site for Hunts Point Sewage Treatment Works, 138 N.Y.S.2d 118, 121 (Sup. Ct. 1954). Perhaps, though, those uses are distinguishable, as tyrannical is inevitably more concrete than tyrannous.

tyro; tiro. This term, meaning "a novice," is spelled tyro in AmE, tiro in BrE.

uberrima fides; uberrimæ fidei. The first, a noun phrase meaning lit. "the utmost good faith," describes a class of contracts (such as insurance contracts) in which one party has a preliminary duty to disclose to the other material facts relevant to the subject matter. In American legal writing, the nominative form uberrima fides (as defined above) is more common ; meanwhile, in British legal writing the genitive uberrimæ fidei (= of the utmost good faith) is prevalent .

When American lawyers use the genitive form, they sometimes mangle the second word, making it fidae (or fidS) instead of fidei—e.g.: "[W]e have considered the Underwriter's argument that East Coast owed them [sic] a duty of uberrimae fidae [read either of ubberima fides or uberrimae fidei], but we find it unpersuasive." East Coast Tender Serv., Inc. v. Robert T. Winzinger, Inc., 759 F.2d 280, 284 n.3 (3d Cir. 1985)./ "Albany relied on the doctrine of utmost good faith or uberrimae fidae [read uberrimae fidei], seeking to void the policy from its inception based on the owner's representation as to value." Warren J. Marwedel, Admiralty Jurisdiction and Recreational Craft Personal Injury Issues, 68 Tul. L. Rev 423, 469 (1994).

The phrases are pronounced in this way: uberrima fides /yoo-bə-ree-mə-fī-deez/ and uberrimæ fidei /yoo-bə-ree-mī-fī-day-ee/. See LATINISMS & PRONUNCIATION (C).

ukase /yoo-kays/, orig. a Russian term, meant lit. "a decree or edict, having the force of law, issued by the Russian emperor or government" (OED). By extension it has come to mean "any proclamation or decree, esp. of a final or arbitrary nature." E.g., "If the revolution in sexual mores that appellant proclaims is in fact ever to arrive, we think it must arrive through the moral choices of the people and their elected representatives, not through the ukase of this court."

Ulpian(us). Though the Roman form of the name is Ulpianus, Anglo-American writers usu. refer to this 3rd-century Roman treatise-writer as Ulpian.

ult. ([ultimo] = of last month); prox. ([proximo] = of next month); inst. ([instant] = of this month). These abbreviations, primarily from commercialese, are to be avoided in preference for straightforward terms such as March 12, or next month, or last month. See inst.

ultima ratio = the final argument; a last resort (often force). E.g., "[I]t seems to me clear that the ultima ratio . . . is force, and that at the bottom of all private relations, however tempered by sympathy and all the social feelings, is a justifiable self-preference." Oliver W. Holmes, The Common Law 38 (1881; repr. 1963).

ultimate destination is not necessarily a REDUNDANCY, as is often assumed. Where a shipment has a series of stops or transfers—i.e., a series of 'immediate destinations'—it may be appropriate to use the phrase final or ultimate destination. One may be on one's way to Bangkok, with a stopover in Tokyo. If, on that flight to Tokyo someone asks about one's destination, it would not be inappropriate to characterize Tokyo as the immediate destination (i.e., the destination of that particular flight) and Bangkok as the ultimate destination (the destination of the entire trip).

Yet the phrase final destination or ultimate destination should not be used (as it commonly is) in contexts in which such specificity is not called for. Cf. final outcome & end result.

ultimately = (1) in the end <she ultimately reached her destination>; or (2) at the beginning <the two doctrines are ultimately related>.

ultimatum. Pl. -ums. E.g., "It was only after these ultimata [read ultimatums] . . . that RFC reasonably concluded to cease making further loan advances." Meriden Indus. Co. v. U.S., 386 F.2d 885, 895 (Ct. Cl. 1967). See PLURALS (A). ultimo. See ult.

ultra (= [1] beyond due limit; extreme; or [2] extremist; fanatical), when used for beyond, is erroneous. E.g., "Exemplary damages are therefore damages ultra [read beyond] compensation."

ultra vires /əl-trə-vī-reez/ (= unauthorized; beyond one's power) is classically used as an adverb, as here: "Petitioner maintains that the commission acted ultra vires when it applied its new interpretation of its suspension powers to him." See intra vires.

But this naturalized LATINISM is now perhaps more frequently used as an adjective—e.g.: "If a director parts with the company's money or property for an ultra vires purpose, he will be liable to the company for the loss it has sustained . . . ." J. Charlesworth, The Principles of Company Law 14 (4th ed. 1945)./ "If the contract is beyond the powers of the company, it is ultra vires . . . ." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 214 (P.W. French ed., 10th ed. 1951).

The phrase has even come to be used as a noun—e.g.: "Under the doctrine of ultra vires, there is a limit in point of substance on the transactions into which a corporation may enter." William Geldart, Introduction to English Law 62 (D.C.M. Yardley ed., 9th ed. 1984).

unavailing = of no avail. E.g., "If Johnson lacks sufficient assets, reversing the district court on this issue as a part of this judgment would be unavailing." See avail.

unbeknown(st). Krapp suggested that both forms are humorous, colloquial, and dialectal. George P. Krapp, A Comprehensive Guide to Good English 602 (1927). The COD likewise suggests that both are colloquial. Eric Partridge and John Simon have written, in conformity with the OED, that unbeknown is the preferred form in the phrase unbeknown to, and that unbeknownst is dialectal.

These inconsistent pronouncements serve as confusing guides. We can perhaps accept as British orthodoxy the pronouncement of the COD that in BrE the forms are colloquial (for unknown). In AmE, neither can really be called dialectal or colloquial, for the word is essentially literary. In current AmE usage, unbeknownst far outranges unbeknown in frequency of use, and it must therefore be considered at least acceptable. But a stylist might justifiably consider unbeknown preferable, since the -st forms (e.g., whilst, amidst) uniformly come less naturally to AmE.

Often, though, the ordinary word unknown would serve equally well if not better—e.g.: "The fact that, unbeknownst [read unknown] to Towers and Parks, undercover government involvement made any actual expert impossible does not alter the jury's finding."/ "The latter question has arisen where young girls have been invited to submit to acts in order to train their voice or to improve their breathing—unbeknown [read unknown] to them, the act [that] they were permitting was sexual intercourse." Andrew Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 306 (1991). See unknown.

unborn child. See fetus.

uncategorically is a silly but distressingly common mistake for categorically (= unconditionally; without qualification). And it has gotten wide exposure. In 1991, Judge Clarence Thomas, testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee, "uncategorically" denied that he discussed pornographic materials with Anita Hill: "Senator, I would like to start by saying unequivocally, uncategorically, that I deny each and every single allegation against me today . . . ." The Thomas Nomination, N.Y. Times, 13 Oct. 1991, at 1-12.

Even by then, though, the illogically formed "nonword" had already made its way into American law reports: "[T]he statement . . . purports uncategorically [read categorically] to announce what a finite set of people—political scientists—think about a given subject—Ollman's scholarship." Ollman v. Evans, 750 F.2d 970, 1030 n.115 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (en banc) (Robinson, C.J., dissenting)./ "The affidavit of Hogan . . . and interrogatories of Butterworth . . . both state uncategorically [read categorically] that the religious or ethnic background of the sponsors was never considered or discussed." Rogers v. Fair, 902 F.2d 140, 143 (1st Cir. 1990).

unclean hands. See clean hands.

uncollectible. So spelled.

unconscionable = (1) (of persons) having no conscience; or (2) (of actions) showing no regard for conscience; not in accordance with what is right or reasonable. Lawyers use the word a great deal, often without fastidiously observing its meaning. For example, some writers and speakers use it hyperbolically in place of inequitable, which is a much softer word. See conscionable & against conscience.

unconstitutional. See nonconstitutional.

uncontrovertible should be incontrovertible.

uncounseled (= without the benefit or participation of legal counsel) is generally used today in constructions exhibiting HYPALLAGE; that is, the convict, not the conviction, is uncounseled, though we speak of uncounseled convictions. E.g., "In Scott v. Illinois, . . . this Court held that an uncounseled misdemeanor conviction is constitutionally valid if the offender is not incarcerated." Moore v. Georgia, 484 U.S. 904, 904 (1987) (White, J., dissenting).

uncovered is inherently ambiguous; it may mean (1) "not covered," or (2) "having had the cover removed."

unctious is a not uncommon misspelling of unctuous.

under is preferable to pursuant to when the noun that follows refers to a rule, statute, contractual provision, or the like. It is better to say service under Rule 4 than service pursuant to Rule 4. E.g., "Under Rule 32(a)(2), the deposition testimony may be used by an adverse party for any purpose at trial." Mark A. Cymrot, The Forgotten Rule, Litigation, Spring 1992, at 6, 6. In some contexts, though, under may be taken to have a spatial relation to the other words, and may therefore lead to MISCUES such as this one: "You cannot play hide the peanut under this rule." Id. at 8. See pursuant to.

under advisement. See advisement.

under appeal. See appeal (A).

underhand(ed). The shorter form is much older. E.g., "And what shall we say to the underhand manner in which the incompetence of the worker, and hence his lack of right to a share of the world's goods, are suggested in these verses?"/ "'Pettifogger' was also shortened as the 16th-century 'fogger,' applied mostly to lawyers, but also to others given to underhand practice for gain." Underhanded is also perfectly acceptable, however.

underinsurance refers not to a particular type of insurance one can purchase, but to the fact of being underinsured. In the following sentence, the word is used attributively: "Failure by Republic-Franklin Insurance Company to have responded within a reasonable time to notification of a settlement offer will void the subrogation clause in the underinsurance motorist provision of its policy, the Supreme Court of Ohio said." Ohio Supreme Court Decision, Daily Legal News, 17 Aug. 1989, at 1.

under law; in law; at law; by law. These idioms have long been common in Anglo-American legal writing. They are not interchangeable. In law most often means "in the eyes of the law"—e.g.: "Such invasions should be actionable in law, unless the newspaper can prove before a jury that its publication was in the public interest." Economist, 28 Jan.–3 Feb. 1989, at 18. Under law ordinarily means "in accordance with the law" or "in our system of law"—e.g.: "Every person has a right under law as between him and his fellow-subjects to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital according to his own will." (Eng.) The phrase by law, in contrast, usu. means "by statute"—e.g.: "By law all owners of firearms must have a permit." The idiom at law usu. signals a contrast with equity—that the law being referred to is the common law: "At law, laches was not a defense."

underlease is a BrE variant of sublease, q.v., the usual term in both AmE and BrE.

underlessee (BrE) = sublessee (AmE).

underlessor. See sublessor.

underlie. So spelled. Underly is an infrequent blunder—e.g.: "I have said that the morals [that] underly [read underlie] the law must be derived from the sense of right and wrong [that] resides in the community as a whole . . . ." Patrick Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals 22 (1968)./ "It is not enough that the same facts underly [read underlie] the claims." Gagne v. Fair, 835 F.2d 6, 7 (1st Cir. 1987). Writers fall into this error because they more commonly see the adjectival participle underlying than the uninflected verb.

under my signature. This expression should not be taken too literally. It means "under my authorization," and has nothing necessarily to do with the physical placement of one's signature.

under seal. See seal (B). undersigned, rarely used outside legal contexts, is a slightly preposterous way of avoiding the FIRST PERSON. Usually it is an attributive noun <the undersigned agrees to forbear from execution>.

A few lawyers, in writing their clients, actually conclude with, "If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact the undersigned." That approach is hardly an endearing one.

understanding is a vague word sometimes used in DRAFTING as a weaker word than agreement or contract. If there is an agreement, then use the word agreement; if there is none, then understanding may suggest unsatisfactorily that there is. Phrases such as It is the parties' understanding that or In accordance with the parties' understanding are subject to a variety of interpretations—and ought therefore to be avoided.

understood and agreed. Some contracts teem with provisions that begin, It is further understood and agreed that the Releasor hereby represents and declares that . . . . For two reasons, the phrase understood and agreed ought to be struck everywhere it appears. First, the lead-in to the agreement already covers the point by saying something like, The parties therefore agree as follows. So the phrase understood and agreed later in a contract is mere surplusage. Second, if only some of the provisions are graced with the phrase, then the implication is that not every term is understood and agreed. The phrase could rightly be classed among FORBIDDEN WORDS. Understood? Agreed?

UNDERSTOOD WORDS are common in English and usually are not very troublesome if we are able to mentally supply them. Often they occur at the outset of sentences. More important is short for What is more important; as pointed out earlier is short for as was pointed out earlier.

Objects, too, are often elided with the understanding that the reader will know and mentally supply the missing term—e.g.: "Not mentioned was the fact that the standard auto liability policy also obligates the insurer to defend." (After defend, the object suit is understood.)// "A wrong was clearly committed. What circumstance will excuse?" (After excuse, an object such as offender or wrongdoer is understood.)

In a compound sentence, parts of a verb phrase can carry over from the first verb phrase to the second, in which they are understood: "Gorbachev has demanded that Lithuania suspend the declaration of independence before the blockade can be lifted and talks begun." (That sentence is considerably more elegant than it would have been if the second verb phrase had appeared in full: talks can be begun.)

On verbs supposedly "understood" whose absence detracts from clarity, see BE-VERBS (A). See also JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT (next-to-last par.).

under submission = being considered by the court; under advisement. E.g., "Norton v. National Bank of Commerce remained under submission for nine months."

undertake, a word having both popular and legal senses, may mean (1) "to take upon oneself, try earnestly" <she has undertaken to help the unfortunate child>; (2) "to bind oneself contractually, to promise" <the builder impliedly undertook that the house would be safe>; or (3) "to become surety or security, to make oneself answer or responsible for a person, fact, or the like" <his friends undertook for his appearance in court>.

In historical contexts, undertake is common as a native-English-language equivalent of assumpsit (q.v.)—e.g.: "This position was turned by the development of assumpsit; the defendant will not be liable unless he 'undertook' to produce a particular result." Theodore F.T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 469 (5th ed. 1956).

undertaker. In AmE and BrE alike, this word predominantly refers to a person who is more euphemistically described as a mortician or funeral director. Using undertaker to refer colorlessly to somebody who undertakes to do something—more often today termed a promisor—is likely to result in a MISCUE, or at least a momentary distraction. E.g., "[W]e arrive at the classical form of the doctrine, that a valuable consideration is a benefit given or promised to the undertaker [read promisor], or some loss or liability incurred by the promisee, in return for the promise given by the undertaker [read promisor]." Edward Jenks, The Book of English Law 317 (P.B. Fairest ed., 6th ed. 1967).

undertaking (= a promise, pledge, or engagement) inhabits almost exclusively the domain of legal JARGON. It is perhaps more common today in BrE than in AmE dominions. E.g., "[T]here is another form of security, termed 'personal security,' which is an undertaking (e.g., a bond), unaccompanied by any charge on goods or property, to pay a debt." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 30 (P.W. French ed., 10th ed. 1951).

undertenant (BrE) = sublessee (AmE & BrE).

under the circumstances. See circumstances.

under (the) law. See under law.

underway; under way. Some dictionaries record the term as two words when used adverbially, one word when used as an adjective preceding the noun <underway refueling>. In the phrases get underway (= to get into motion) and be underway (= to be in progress), the term is increasingly made one word, and it would be convenient to make that transformation, which is already underway, complete in all uses of the word.

Under weigh for underway is a MALAPROPISM.

underwrite. The literal sense, of course, is to write one's name at the bottom of a document. By extension, in everyday language, underwrite has come to mean "to support or reinforce." In law and business, however, the term has two specific senses: (1) "to assume a risk by insuring it; to insure life or property"; or (2) "to agree to buy unsold shares of a given number of securities to be offered for public sale."

underwriter; assurer; insurer; carrier. Each of these terms is commonly used in referring to one that insures a risk. In the context of marine insurance, assurer is the most frequently used term; elsewhere, the other three terms predominate.

Underwriter can also correspond to sense (2) of underwrite, q.v. In that sense, the agent-noun refers to a person or entity—usu. a bank or syndicate—that agrees to buy unsold shares of a given number of securities to be offered for public sale.

undocumented alien; undocumented (migratory) worker; illegal alien. The usual and preferable term in AmE is illegal alien. The other forms have arisen as needless EUPHEMISMS, and should be avoided as near-GOBBLEDYGOOK. The problem with undocumented is that it is intended to mean, by those who use it in this phrase, "not having the requisite documents to enter or stay in a country legally." But the word strongly suggests "unaccounted for" to those unfamiliar with this quasi-legal jargon, and it may therefore obscure the meaning.

More than one writer has argued in favor of undocumented alien. E.g., "An alien's unauthorized presence in the United States is not a crime under the Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1952 . . . . Thus many people find the term undocumented alien preferable to illegal alien, since the former avoids the implication that one's unauthorized presence in the United States is a crime." Elizabeth Hull, Undocumented Aliens and the Equal Protection Clause, 48 Brook. L. Rev. 43, 43 n.2 (1981).

That statement is only equivocally correct, however: although illegal aliens' presence in the country is no crime, their entry into the country is. As Justice Brennan wrote in Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 205 (1982): "Unsanctioned entry into the United States is a crime, 8 U.S.C. § 1325 . . . ." Moreover, it is wrong to equate illegality with criminality, inasmuch as many illegal acts are not criminal. Illegal alien is not an opprobrious epithet: it describes one present in a country in violation of the immigration laws (hence "illegal").

Those who enter the U.K. illegally are termed by statute illegal entrants.

unearned income, to one unskilled in accountancy, may seem like an OXYMORON. The term refers to income derived from investments as opposed to personal labor.

uneconomic(al). The correct words are uneconomical (= not cost-effective) and noneconomic (= not relating to economics). The most common error is to use uneconomic for uneconomical—e.g.: "Manifestly uneconomic [read uneconomical] projects have been pursued . . . . Lavish spending on the new federal capital, Abuja, is at odds with economic [correct] realities." Aid and Reform in Nigeria, Fin. Times, 6 Jan. 1992, at 10. See economic.

unenbanc, v.t., (– to dismiss motion for hearing en banc after it has already been granted) is a NONCE WORD coined by a judge who enjoyed neologizing: "I dissent to the Court's unenbancing the case and refusing to reconsider the panel's opinion." Burleson v. Coastal Recreation, Inc., 595 F.2d 332, 332 (5th Cir. 1978) (Brown, C.J., dissenting). The caselaw contains no examples of a positive form, enbancing. But cf. enbancworthy.

unenforceable; nonenforceable. The former is preferable. See NON-.

unenforceable contract. The most important aspect of a valid contract is that it must be enforceable. So, in a sense, unenforceable contract denotes an OXYMORON. (For other phrases using contract but involving something other than a true contract, see contract of record & void contract.) Generally speaking, an unenforceable contract is invariably one that is not in writing despite a statute's requiring contracts of its type to be in writing (such as a guaranty or a contract for the sale of land).

unequivocal; unequivocable. The latter is erroneous, yet the error is surprisingly common. The dictionaries contain only the former, though undaunted lawyers and judges have written—e.g.: "The court unequivocably [read unequivocally] stated that it rejected its previous premise."/ "The court would say unequivocably [read unequivocally] that this case has been well tried by excellent attorneys." Even great writers err on this point: "Eastern systems (Hinduism and Buddhism) do not pronounce unequivocably [read unequivocally] and absolutely against suicide." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 249 (1957; repr. 1972).

unfair competition. This is the name of a body of law that protects the first user of a name, brand, or other symbol in the sale of goods or services against a competitor whose use of the symbol confuses (or will likely confuse) consumers into believing that the first user, rather than the competitor, is the source of the goods or services. See Paul Goldstein, Copyright, Patent, Trademark and Related State Doctrines 88–89 (2d ed. 1981).

Of course, the phrase also denotes an instance of any practice to which that body of law applies unfair dismissal; wrongful dismissal. In English law, unfair dismissal is a breach of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act of 1978, which requires employers to conduct a dismissal fairly and reasonably. Wrongful dismissal, by contrast, is a cause of action arising at common law, e.g., when the dismissing employer either fails to give proper notice and to compensate the employee during the period of notice, or does not compensate the employee for the unexpired term of the contract.

<the company had systematically engaged in unfair competition>.

In most American jurisdictions, the term equivalent to wrongful dismissal is wrongful discharge (or wrongful termination). For an inadvertently humorous use of wrongful discharge, see prophylactic.

unfeasible. See infeasible.

unfind (= to undo an earlier factual determination) is a NEOLOGISM dating from the 1950s; it is arguably quite useful, though it has yet to spread outside Texas. E.g., "A court of civil appeals has no power to 'find facts,' it may only 'unfind facts' [that] a jury or trial judge has improperly found." Alvey v. Goforth, 263 S.W.2d 313, 319 (Tex. Civ. App.—Fort Worth 1953)./ "Other reasons and other names would require this Court to 'unfind' the factual determination heretofore decided . . . ." Longoria v. Robertson, 669 S.W.2d 870, 872 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 1984) (Nye, C. J., concurring)./ "[A] court of appeals cannot make original findings of fact, it can only 'unfind' facts." Bellefonte Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Brown, 704 S.W.2d 742, 745 (Tex. 1986).

uniformly is the adverb corresponding to the adjective uniform. But many writers get it wrong by writing uniformally—e.g.: "Those exceptions apply uniformally [read uniformly] to all persons 'chased' or arrested." Leonard Atkinson, Note, The Origins of Wiretapping in Connecticut, 12 U. Bridgeport L. Rev. 247, 292 n.111 (1991)./ "Judges McAuliffe and Eldridge . . . went so far as to urge trial judges to use uniformally [read uniformly] the pattern instruction on reasonable doubt." Joyner-Pitts v. State, 647 A.2d 116, 122 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1994)./ "In both state and federal courts nationwide, cocaine possession, manufacturing, and/or sale is uniformally [read uniformly] treated far more harshly than similar activity involving marijuana." In re Doherty, 650 A.2d 522, 523 (Vt. 1994).

unilateral contract. See bilateral contract.

uninheritable. See inheritable.

unintentional; involuntary. There is an important distinction between these two words, for one may commit a voluntary act that has unintentional consequences. An involuntary act is one outside the control of the will, such as a sneeze; an unintentional act is one not aimed at or desired, such as a person's death resulting from a misdirected shot. Voluntariness therefore generally refers to the cause, and intentionality to the effect. See intent(ion).

unintentional murder. See murder (B).

uninterest(ed). See disinterest(ed).

unique. A. Broad Definition in Contracts. In law, unique carries the sense "practically unique"; absolute uniqueness is usually too stringent a definition. E.g., "Is the new automobile unique or peculiar to the buyer, so as not to be measurable in money damages?"

B. For unusual. Strictly speaking, unique means "being one of a kind," not "unusual." Hence to write very unique, quite unique, how unique, and the like is slovenly. The OED notes that this tendency to hyperbole—to use unique when all that is meant is "uncommon, unusual, remarkable"—began in the 19th century. However old it is, the tendency is worth resisting.

But who can demand responsible use of the language from an ad-writer who is loose enough to say, in a national advertisement, that a certain luxury sedan is "so unique, it's capable of thought"? See ADJECTIVES (B).

United Kingdom. See Great Britain.

United States. A century ago, in AmE, this proper noun had "ceased to have any suggestion of plurality about it." Harry T. Peck, What Is Good English? 16 (1899). That represented a change, though, from just 50 years before, when particularism for states rights was rampant. Thus, much earlier even than 1850, it was usual to say the United States have, as Alexander Hamilton did in The Federalist No. 15, at 108 (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

Today, however, it is quite unidiomatic to suggest plurality in referring to the U.S. But some BrE writers use the phrase in this way—e.g.: "It has been shown that under the law of some of the United States there is a legal advantage . . . ." Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 183–84 (1957; repr. 1972).

United States Court of Appeals; United States Circuit Court of Appeals. The latter was the title from 1891 until 1948 but was changed in that year by the new § 43 of the Judicial Code.

United States Supreme Court. The more formal name is the Supreme Court of the United States. But if United States is used adjectivally—as it usually is—the name should be written as it is in the headword to this entry. Some British writers have made the mistake of putting a possessive apostrophe after States—e.g.: "One of the landmark cases in the United States' [read States] Supreme Court was United States v. American Trucking Association . . . ." Rupert Cross, Statutory Interpretation 132 (1976).

unitization (= the aggregation of two or more oil-producing properties, owned by different persons, to form a single property so that it can be operated as a single entity or unit under an arrangement for sharing costs and revenues) is a 20th-century NEOLOGISM dating from about 1930. See communitize (A). unitize. See communitize (A).

unity. Four unities are traditionally required in creating a joint tenancy: of title, of time, of interest, and of possession. Without all four, a joint tenancy does not exist. Unity of title requires that all joint tenants acquire their interests under the same instrument. Unity of title requires that all joint tenants' interests vest at the same time. Unity of interest requires that the joint tenants' interests be identical in nature, extent, and duration. Unity of possession requires that each joint tenant be entitled to possession of the whole property (along with other joint tenants).

universal. On the phrase more universal, see ADJECTIVES (B).

unjust enrichment; unjust benefit; unjustified enrichment. Unjust enrichment = (1) a benefit obtained from another, not intended as a gift and not legally justifiable, for which the beneficiary must make restitution or recompense; or (2) the body of law governing claims for benefits of this kind. See impoverishment.

Unjust enrichment began its career as an AmE term but is now used on both sides of the Atlantic; unjust benefit is a primarily BrE variant, which some Britons stoutly prefer: "I can only surmise that while Lord Wright's position on quasi-contract or restitution was accepted, there was an objection to the expression unjust enrichment, perhaps because it was professorial or American." Estok v. Heguy, 43 W.W.R. 167, 173 (Br. Col. 1963). But the leading British treatise uses unjust enrichment. See Robert Goff & Gareth Jones, The Law of Restitution 13 (3d ed. 1986).

Unjustified enrichment is a NEEDLESS VARIANT unknown is perfectly acceptable where unbeknown might ordinarily appear—e.g.: "Unknown to the parties, there were two ships called 'Peerless,' each of which was carrying cotton from Bombay to Liverpool."/ "Bailhache J. based his judgement on a case [that], unknown to him and apparently to counsel, had been reversed by the Court of Appeal . . . ." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 319 n.1 (7th ed. 1964). See unbeknown(st).

unknown suspect; unidentified suspect. The phrase unknown suspect is an OXYMORON, unidentified suspect, on the other hand, is not and is therefore preferable. To have a suspect, the authorities must have somebody in particular in mind. They may know a great deal about a suspect without having identified him or her—for example, they may have photographs or DNA samples—but to say unknown suggests that the authorities know nothing about the person. E.g., "[T]he officer became faced with the prospect of witnessing an unknown [read unidentified] suspect depart the area without taking any steps to satisfy himself that he could be found again." Addison v. State, 765 S.W.2d 566, 573 (Ark. 1989) (Perroni, S.J., concurring)./ "The books and pamphlet were found in the defendant's room in the house where he lived, along with components for making a bomb and clothing similar to that worn by an unknown [read unidentified] suspect in a previous bombing." State v. Starkey, 516 N.W.2d 918, 926 (Minn. 1994).

A similar—but worse—source of confusion appears in the following case name: Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971).

unlaw = (1) a violation of law; (2) lawlessness; or (3) a fine. The term is rare; Pollock and Maitland used it in sense (2): "Times of unlaw alternate with times of law" (quoted in W2).

unlawful = (1) unauthorized by law; (2) criminally punishable; or (3) involving moral turpitude. Sense (1) is most common, but senses (2) and (3) so complicate matters in using this term that they lessen its utility. See illegal.

unlawful assembly. See riot.

unlawfully. Though commonly included in criminal statutes, this word is best omitted: "If the courts made a habit of treating 'unlawfully' as pleonastic, whenever a special meaning is not required, the beneficial result might be that this obscure word would be dropped from criminal statutes." Glanville Williams, Criminal Law 29 (2d ed. 1961). The primary problem with the word is that it typically prevents the reader from finding out precisely what conduct is prohibited. If the statute prohibits unlawfully engaging in some specified act, then it begs the question of precisely when that act is unlawful.

unless and until. In this doublet, of course, the two words are not synonymous—e.g.: "If the signature is obtained by fraud, . . . the innocent party may take steps to repudiate the contract, but unless and until he does so, the document will be binding . . . ." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 155–56 (3d ed. 1981). Even so, the meaning of until swallows that of unless in most contexts, so until is ordinarily sufficient. Cf. if and when. See DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS.

unlike. A. For despite what. This is a solecism. E.g., "Unlike some believe [read Despite what some believe], that the name of 'Christ' came from 'Krishna,' which means 'the black one,' many scholars note that 'Christ' comes from the Greek 'Christos.'"

B. For unlike in. This misuse leads to faulty comparisons. E.g., "Unlike Bayou Bottling, in which [read Unlike in Bayou Bottling, in which], a full-line competitor would not have been unfairly threatened by the uniform decrease in price of a single product in its line, in this case appellant has produced evidence sufficient to support the possibility that appellee's product was predatory as to appellant, the sole victim of the lower prices."/ "Thus, unlike the present case [read unlike in the present case], allowing recovery in that suit would have been tantamount to having the court enforce the precise conduct that the antitrust laws forbid."/ "Unlike the instant case [read Unlike in the instant case], the original party that induced Hudson's breach of contract was a plaintiff in the action for an injunction, and thus sought to benefit from its own wrongdoing." (The original party is not being compared to the instant case, as the syntax suggests.) See ILLOGIC (A).

Though some usage critics have called the phrase a "gaucherie" and even worse things, unlike in—in which unlike takes on an adverbial sense—is now common usage in AmE and BrE alike. It occurs about 2 percent of the time in which the word unlike is used. (More than 4,000 instances of unlike in were recorded in the NEXIS/OMNI database in 1990.) E.g., "It seems unlikely that the deregulation of air traffic transport in Sweden next year—unlike in the U.S.—will produce genuine competition with more services and lower fares." Robert Taylor, SAS to Cut Stake in Domestic Airline, Fin. Times, 11 Sept. 1990, at 27./ "But unlike in the primary, Cropp won't be running with the support of John Ray's well-financed mayoral campaign." René Sanchez, D.C. Council in the Throes of an Upheaval, Wash. Post, 13 Sept. 1990, at C7.

unlimitedly, though an ugly word, has become common in the phrase unlimitedly liable, perhaps no longer an exaggeration given the proclivities of American juries. See -EDLY.

unliquidated damages are those that have not been previously specified or contractually provided for. These damages become liquidated only after a court or jury assesses them. Tort actions almost always involve unliquidated damages.

unmercilessly is a MALAPROPISM on the order of uncategorically, q.v. Mercilessly, of course, is the word: "He worked with top-flight professionals and drilled them unmercilessly [read mercilessly]." David Richards, That Fosse Flair, Wash. Post, 27 Sept. 1987, at F12./ "They were joined in their crime by the 'slashers' who cut away at the film gem unmercilessly [read mercilessly], undoubtedly to make room for all the commercials in its two-hour time slot." John A. Mason, Television Desk, L.A. Times, 24 Dec. 1989 (T.V. Times), at 2. Unmercifully might also suffice, though it adds another syllable.

unmeritorious is certainly preferable to nonmeritorious, which some writers use, but meritless is best when it suffices: of course, an unmeritorious applicant in a strong field is not quite the same as a meritless applicant.

unmoral. See immoral.

unnatural. "One of the surest ways of running off the rails," writes the estimable Glanville Williams, > is to introduce the words 'natural' and 'unnatural.' . . . [T]he supposed connection between nature and morals . . . is completely mistaken. It is hardly necessary to point out that men do many things that are unnatural (in the sense of being a merely acquired skill or habit). Miscellaneous examples are washing, shaving, driving automobiles, building cathedrals, and giving blood transfusions, to which may be added all the rest of the intricate routine that has prolonged men's lives upon this planet. . . . The term 'unnatural' has been applied at different times to vaccination, anæsthetics, male gynæcologists, the emancipation of women, and the use of steam engines.

> Glanville Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 59–60 (1957; repr. 1972).

In brief, this term frequently reflects both a fear of the unfamiliar and hidebound conformism.

unobjected to is a common idiom in the law of evidence. E.g., "The cross-examination complained to be prosecutorial misconduct was also unobjected to." When the phrase is placed before the noun, it is hyphenated: "Clearly, the district court's unobjected-to comments, when reviewed in context, do not amount to fundamental error resulting in a miscarriage of justice." See PHRASAL ADJECTIVES (A) unpaid, adj. One should not write "the unpaid automobile," because one does not pay an automobile—rather, one pays for it. (See HYPALLAGE.) Yet unpaid-for automobile is unpalatable because it is awkward. Unpaid debt on the auto is better; the loss in brevity is outweighed by the gain in clarity and euphony.

unreason; unreasonableness; unreasonability. Unreason = absence of reason; indisposition or inability to act or think rationally or reasonably (OED). Unreasonableness = (1) an act not in accordance with reason or good sense; or (2) the fact of going beyond what is reasonable or equitable. Unreasonability is a NEEDLESS VARIANT of unreasonableness. Cf. reasonableness.

untenable; untenantable. The former means "indefensible" (figuratively) as well as "unable to be occupied." The latter means "not capable of being occupied or lived in." In speech, many people seem to say untenantable when they mean untenable.

until. See till.

unto, an ARCHAISM for to, is common in legal prose and is easily overdone: "To have and to hold the same unto [read to] the said Martha Florence and unto [read to] her bodily heirs and assigns forever, with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging [read its appurtenances]."/ "Plaintiff assigned all claims arising out of the accident unto [read to] the intervenor-appellant."/ "Comes now the plaintiff . . . and will show unto [omit unto] the court the following: . . ." (See comes now.)/ "There were many alleged violations of appellant's rights guaranteed unto him by the Constitution [read appellant's constitutional rights]."/ "It seems nigh unto [read almost] superfluous to remind that § 1983 . . . provides a federal civil remedy in federal court for violations, under color of state law, of the rights, privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States." Findeisen v. North E. Indep. Sch. Dist., 749 F.2d 234, 236–37 (5th Cir. 1984).

Margaret M. Bryant prematurely pronounced this usage obsolete in 1930, stating: "Ordinarily [in general English contexts] unto denotes 'until.' If Mr. Brown says, 'Unto this day, John has not taken a drink,' he means until this day. Its obsolete meaning is to. Many illustrations of this meaning are found in the Bible, such as 'Give unto the Lord,' signifying 'to the Lord.'" Margaret M. Bryant, English in the Law Courts 180 (1930).

untrod(den). See trodden.

untypical. See atypical.

unwieldy, an adj. meaning "difficult to handle," often seems to be mistaken for an adverb in -ly. E.g., "The FERC offered the carrot of blanket transportation certification . . without the encumbrance of an unwieldly [read unwieldy] individual certification process." Consolidated Edison Co. v. FERC, 823 F.2d 630, 640 (D.C. Cir. 1987).

unwigged. See wigged.

unwisdom (= lack or absence of wisdom; ignorance; folly; stupidity) was common through the Middle Ages, fell into disuse in the 17th century, but was revived in the 19th century, much to the delight of common-law judges, who enjoy writing about it. E.g., "The conveyor indicated an intent to have the postponement operate solely as a protection of the taker against his possible intermediate unwisdom, rather than as a condition precedent of his interest."/ "His losses would not be attributable to the defendant's breach, but to the unwisdom of the bargain."

unwritten law is something of a misnomer. Though the phrase suggests that it relates to laws that are handed down orally from generation to generation, never being committed to paper, in fact it refers to the part of the law that has never been enacted in the form of a statute or ordinance. Of course, this law is "written," in the sense that it appears in thousands of judicial decisions, but it has not been the subject of legislation.

upholden. See holden.

upon is a FORMAL WORD that is usually unnecessary in place of on, especially when it seems habitual—e.g.: "The relief sought upon [read on] the second branch is upon [read on] a footing entirely apart from that prayed upon [read for] the first." E. Edelmann & Co. v. Triple-A Specialty Co., 88 F.2d 852, 854 (7th Cir. 1937). As a general matter, then, it is better to write service on a defendant than to write service upon a defendant.

But upon is quite justifiable when it introduces a condition or event—e.g.: "Upon a proper showing, a permanent or temporary injunction, decree, or restraining order shall be granted without bond."/ "Upon plaintiff's refusal to amend, his action was dismissed and he appealed." The sense "with little or no interval after" is often an important nuance. E.g., "The order of the commission was made upon petition and upon hearing after due notice to plaintiff in error."

Upon is inferior, however, when a shorter, simpler, and more direct word will suffice.

A. For on. "My Lords, if these conclusions are applied to the present case, it is not difficult to arrive at a decision upon [read on] this appeal." (Eng.)/ "As the plaintiff had placed the perfected pump upon [read on] the market without obtaining the protection of the patent laws, he thereby published that invention to the world and no longer had any exclusive property therein." See on.

B. For to. "Threat upon [read to] the victim is an element of the crime of aggravated robbery."

C. For in. "At the time they were served, they were subject to a compulsory attendance upon the [read in] court." This is a legalistic ARCHAISM.

upon the trial. See at (the) trial.

upper court. See higher court.

upper house. The meaning depends on the country referred to. Rarely is this phrase used in reference to the U.S. Senate. It is the customary term for Great Britain's House of Lords, Germany's Bundesrat, and India's Rajya Sabha, as well as the upper chambers in the parliaments of Barbados, Japan, Nepal, and Poland, to name a few.

upset (= to set aside; overturn) is legal JARGON. E.g., "The court is loath to upset these restrictive covenants that have run with the land."/ "Any mala fides must be proved very clearly in order to upset the title . . . ." 1 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 98 (P.W. French ed., 13th ed. 1950)./ "The Appeal Court declined to upset the judgment of the lower court." Nigel Miller, "Garden Leave" Enforceable Only in Cases of Real Risk to Employers, Fin. Times, 22 Feb. 1990, at 18.

up-to-date should be hyphenated as an adjective, unhyphenated as an adverb. Hence, "Once the log is brought up to date, we will have an up-to-date log."

up to now is a comfortably idiomatic equivalent of heretofore and hitherto—e.g.: "It is unquestionably true that up to now Erie and the cases following it have not succeeded in articulating a workable doctrine governing choice of law in diversity actions." Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 474 (1965) (Harlan, J., concurring). See hither to.

urge (in law) – (1) to argue in favor of; or (2) to argue. Sense (1): "Appellee urges affirmance of the order."/ "Appellant urges the first solution; appellee the second, adopted by the trial court, and by us."

When urge in sense (2) precedes a clause, it should be followed by that: "The plaintiff urged payment [read urged that payment] by the owner was a condition precedent to its duty to pay the subcontractors."/ "She urges that the district court abused its discretion by denying her request to amend her complaint." Sometimes, though, sense (2) is followed by a simple phrase: "Since the causes of action, as well as the facts and legal theories necessary to urge such causes of action, are very different in the two suits, a judgment on the merits in either one will not bar proceedings in the other."

usable. So spelled; useable is incorrect.

usage, in law, usu. means "a customary practice." E.g., "These fundamental principles are traceable to ancient customs and usages and are fixed by tradition and evidenced by the decisions of the courts."/ "While both the conception and the term 'privilege' find conspicuous exemplification under the law of libel and the law of evidence, they nevertheless have a much wider significance and utility as a matter of judicial usage."/ "Both parties had adopted the practice in accordance with common business usage." See use.

Usage also means "an idiom or form of speech," or forms of speech in general. E.g., "That the word has a wider signification even in ordinary nontechnical usage is sufficiently indicated, however, by the fact that the term 'special privileges' is so often used to indicate a contrast to ordinary or general privileges."

Here the use [not usage] of the word is poor: "But bad language usage [read the bad use of language or bad usage] can hurt good law; good language usage [read the good use of language or good usage] can promote respect for good law." Where use is possible, it should be used.

Usage for use, however, is not an uncommon error—e.g.: "Unless their impact on land usage [read use] denies the owner the 'justice and fairness' guaranteed by the Constitution, they should be upheld."/ "Holmes's position is an endorsement of the 'pretext' usage [read use] of the power."/ "I want to emphasize that this decision should not be read as an endorsement of a more generalized usage [read use] of the harmless error rule."/ "Defendant's expert testified that recent or excessive marijuana usage [read use] has a negative effect on police work."

The opposite error—use for usage—is quite uncommon but does occur: "This Concise Dictionary is primarily a manual for people who aspire to write a clear and forceful American in accord with current good use [read usage]." Robert C. Whitford & James R. Foster, Concise Dictionary of American Grammar and Usage v (1955). Given the title of the book, this sentence also illustrates INELEGANT VARIATION usance is unjustified in all senses but one: in mercantile law, the term refers to the customary time (varying in different countries) allowed for the payment of a bill of exchange or the like, esp. one drawn in a foreign country.

use, n. In phrases like the Statute of Uses and cestui que use, the word use means "benefit" and not "employment," as in everyday language. The etymology is completely separate from the ordinary word use, as Maitland explained: "It seems that at a very early period the French oes, ues, from the Latin opus, was confused in English with the French us from the Latin usus, and the use of our law is traceable directly to the former rather than to the latter." Note, 3 Law Q. Rev. 115, 116 (1887). E.g., "The will, therefore, creates a use, or, in more modern phraseology, a 'dry,' 'passive,' or 'naked' trust, and as such it is executed by force of the statute of uses." See trust & springing use.

use; utilization. Use is the general all-purpose noun and verb, ordinarily to be preferred over utilize and utilization. Utilize is both more abstract and more favorable connotatively than use. See utilize.

Where the connotative nuance of using something to its best advantage is missing, utilization should not appear. Here it is defensible: "The section on efficient utilization of information concerns one of the most rapidly developing areas of law." (Still, it would no doubt improve the sentence to uncover the BURIED VERB. The section on efficiently utilizing information . . . .) Here it is not defensible: "Plaintiff's prompt utilization [read use] of the charge embraced in the criminal prosecution as the basis for a civil action was likewise voluntary."

useable. See usable.

used to could is semiliterate for used to be able to or could formerly—e.g.: "Juries used to could not [read used not to be able to or formerly could not] consider parole . . . ." Onumonu v. State, 787 S.W.2d 958, 960 (Tex. Crim. App. 1990) (en banc) (quoting a prosecutor's argument).

user (= continued use, exercise, or enjoyment of a right) almost always creates a MISCUE in the minds of most modern readers, who are likely to read user as an agent noun. E.g., "[T]he fullest enjoyment of land ownership demands the restraint of full freedom by forbidding unreasonable user interfering unreasonably with like rights of enjoyment of others . . . ." William F. Walsh, A Treatise on Equity 222 (1930)./ "Apart from express or implied grant, easements may arise by prescription, that is, by continual user over a period of at least 20 years." usucaption; usucapion. Though neither can be said to be common, usucaption (= [in civil law] the prescriptive acquisition of ownership) is the more frequent form in American decisions. Academic writers tend to use either usucapion or the Latin form usucapio.

usufruct [L. ususfructus, Fr. usufruit], a civil-law term comparable to the common-law life estate, means "the lifelong right of possession, use, or enjoyment of another's property, as far as may be had without causing damage or prejudice to the owner." A common-law will might leave A a life estate with the remainder to B; a civilian will would ordinarily leave the property to B subject to a usufruct to A for life. E.g., "In 1961, Samuel Zemurray bequeathed the naked ownership of his one-half interest in the land to plaintiff and bequeathed to his wife Sarah the usufruct." (La.)

Because usufruct is a COUNT NOUN, one refers to a usufruct, the usufruct, this usufruct, and so on.

usufructuary, n. & adj., = (adj.) of, relating to, or of the nature of, a usufruct; (n.) one having the usufruct of property. E.g., "The English' lawyer treats the usufructuary as a limited owner—the nearest equivalent seems to be a life tenant." (Eng.)

usurious = of, relating to, or constituting excessive interest. E.g., "The finance company's motion for summary judgment might be defeated if the borrower had a lawyer who could show that the hidden charges, when cumulated, resulted in usurious charges." William O. Douglas, Points of Rebellion 61 (1970). See usury.

usurpation; usurpature. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

usury is a word whose content has changed considerably over time. Originally, usury meant "compensation for the use of money; the lending of money for interest." By the 18th century, however, its meaning had been narrowed considerably to what it is today: "the lending of money at an excessive interest rate." The corresponding adjective is usurious, q.v.

As for the pronunciation of usury and usurious, the first syllable of these words is pronounced "you." Because the words begin with a consonant sound, -y-, they should be preceded by a and not an where an indefinite article is called for: "In its counterclaim, N.T. contended that M.'s prayer for interest amounted to an usurious [read a usurious] charge of interest in violation of the statute." See a (A) & usurious.

uterine. See consanguineous.

utilization. See use.

utilize = to apply profitably; put to good use. It is not an exact synonym of use, q.v.

ut infra = as below. See ante.

ut supra = as above. See ante* & *supra.

utter is a LEGALISM used in reference to written instruments to mean "to put or send (a document) into circulation." Hence, to utter a forged instrument is to present it to another with knowledge that it is a forgery. E.g., "On October 3, 1960, an indictment was filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia charging the applicant in four counts with forgery and four counts with uttering a fake check."

utter bar. See outer bar.

ux., an abbreviation of uxor (= wife), was once commonly used in the phrase et ux. to indicate that a wife is joined with her husband in a legal action. Today the wife is usually accorded the dignity of being named, or at least she should be. If her name does appear, there is certainly no reason for et ux., as some real-estate brokers seem mistakenly to believe. See SEXISM (D).

In writing ux., one should include the period to show that the word is an abbreviation (for uxor).

uxorial; uxorious. The first is neutral, the second pejorative. Uxorial = of or relating to a wife; uxorious = submissive to or excessively fond of one's wife.

v.; vs. A. Form of Abbreviation. Both are acceptable abbreviations of versus, but they differ in application: in case names, v. is the accepted abbreviation, while vs. is more common among nonlawyers.

B. Pronunciation. In pronouncing case names, one should be careful to say versus or against in AmE, not "vee." For some reason, people generally (not just lawyers) tend to say "Roe vee Wade," though few would say "Brown vee Board of Education." Perhaps "Roe vee Wade" became popular because the name consists of three one-syllable words.

In BrE, the abbreviation v. is pronounced "and" in the names of civil cases; thus, British lawyers write one thing but say something else. See versus.

C. Whether to Italicize. In American legal writing, it was formerly common to leave the v. in a case citation unitalicized <in Hughes v. Rhodes, the court declared . . . >. Today, however, the prevailing practice is to italicize the full case name, including v. <in Hughes v. Rhodes, the court declared . . . >. British legal writing has followed a similar evolution, though the unitalicized v. remains perhaps more common than in the U.S.

vacant; unoccupied. These words are often used in the context of insurance policies on buildings. They are not synonymous: vacant means without inanimate objects, while unoccupied means without human occupants.

vacate. See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT, overrule & set aside.

vacation, n., in law may mean: (1) the period during which court is not in term; or (2) the act of vacating. Either sense is likely to amount to a MISCUE for the nonlawyer—e.g.: (Sense 1) "Under a statute authorizing a judge either before or during the term to order additional jurors, an order directing the additional jurors, made in vacation, is within the court's discretion."/ (Sense 2) "The remedy provided by the National Prohibition Act and the Espionage Act for vacation of a warrant improperly issued and for return of property was not applicable."

Justice Lewis F. Powell once complained of the popular misconception that justices enjoy a three- to four-month vacation (sense 1) each year. See Powell, Myths and Misconceptions About the Supreme Court, 61 A.B.A. J. 1344, 1344 (1975).

value received. This phrase is customarily inserted in bills of exchange, but it is invariably superfluous, as value is implied.

vara. This word denotes a measure used in some American states that were once under Spanish dominion. In California, the vara is equivalent to 33 inches, but in Texas it is 33⅓ inches.

variable; variant; variational; variative. Variable = subject to variation; characterized by variations. Variant = differing in form or in details from the one named or considered, differing thus among themselves (COD). Variational = of, pertaining to, or marked or characterized by variation. Variative shares the senses of variational, and, being the rarer word, might be considered a NEEDLESS VARIANT; but the courts have found uses for it—e.g.: "This variative approach to intrastate branching was nicely illustrated at the time by the structure in New York." Northeast Bancorp, Inc. v. Federal Res. Sys., 472 U.S. 159, 172 (1985).

variance; at variance; variation; variant, n. Variance is common in legal writing in two widely divergent senses: (1) a difference or discrepancy between two statements or documents that ought to agree, such as allegations in the pleadings and the proof actually adduced on the record; or (2) a waiver of or exemption from a zoning law.

Sense (1) commonly appears in contexts referring to charging instruments—e.g.: "The second conviction was tainted by a variance between what was alleged in the indictment as the cause number and the proof."

At variance = (of persons) in a state of discord; (of things) conflicting; in a state of disagreement or difference. E.g., "In Boxsius v. Goblet Frères, Lord Esher expressed views quite at variance with his utterance in Pullman v. Hill." (Eng.)/ "This exact question has not been decided by this court, and the decisions of the courts of other jurisdictions are somewhat at variance."/ "Such a result is plainly at variance with the policy of the legislation as a whole."

Variation = (1) a departure from a former or normal condition or action or amount, or from a standard or type; or (2) the extent of this departure. The term is standard equipment in discussions of contract law—e.g.: "The rule . . . is always applied in cases in which there is a material variation between the actual principal contract and what the surety believes it to be." Laurence P. Simpson, Handbook on the Law of Suretyship 92 (1950)./ "[A] variation of a contract may amount to a rescission of the old contract followed by the making of a new one relating to the same subject-matter." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 96 (8th ed. 1991).

The terms variance and variation are especially susceptible to INELEGANT VARIATION. E.g., "The plaintiffs as a matter of law do not have a cause of action for the allegedly arbitrary and discriminatory denial of their request for a zoning variance [sense 2]; in any event the denial of a zoning variation [read variance] is not a deprivation of property."

Variant = a form or modification differing in some respect from other forms of the same thing (OED). E.g., "Some jurisdictions having modern variants of the rule would approach the problem differently."

variant; variational; variative. See variable.

variety. When the phrase a variety of means "many," it is quite proper to use the plural form of the verb: "there are a variety of court-made rules by which particular orders are treated as 'final' and appealable as such." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 698 (4th ed. 1983). See SYNESIS.

For the problem raised by the phrase these variety of, see these kind of.

various different is a common REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "Pike then recounted that on various different [read various] occasions White had, 'in her presence, "threatened to kill his wife."'" White v. State, 784 S.W.2d 453, 457 (Tex. App.—Tyler 1989). If, as one authority writes, various different occasions means "a number of different occasions," then the better wording would be several different.

vehement is pronounced /vee-ə-mənt/, not /və-hee-mənt/.

vehicle. The -h- is not pronounced; hence /vee-i-kəl/.

vehicular. A. *Vehicular homicide. Vehicular /vee-hik-yə-lər/, an adjective dating from about 1900, is not objectionable per se. Several states in the U.S. have Vehicular Homicide Statutes, for which there is no ready substitute for vehicular. E.g., "A conviction of vehicular homicide requires, as a matter of law, a finding that the defendant has either driven recklessly or driven while under the influence of alcohol." But see (B).

B. Vehicular accident. The phrase is pompous LEGALESE and OFFICIALESE for traffic accident, car accident, or motoring accident.

C. Vehicular unit. The phrase is especially absurd for car: "The declaration sheet seeks to provide separate coverages for uninsured motorists on three vehicular units." If car or automobile were too specific, then vehicle would suffice.

vel non (lit., "or not"), almost always superfluous, is always pompous. W3 defines vel non as "whether or not," but that phrase could hardly be plugged into the following sentences: "We come finally to the merits vel non of this appeal."/ "We need address only the propriety of the ultimate finding of discrimination vel non."/ "Yet another barometer of the descriptiveness vel non of a particular name is the extent to which it has been used in the tradenames of others offering a similar service or product." A more accurate definition of the phrase as frequently used in American legal writing is "or the lack of them (or of it)."

Usually the phrase is pretentious surplusage, as it can be either deleted or translated into simpler words—e.g.: "The ultimate issue, that of discrimination vel non [omit], is to be treated by the district and appellate courts in the same manner as any other issue of fact."/ "Clearly, the argument bears solely on the nature of the violation, not on the existence of a violation vel non [omit]."/ "The vice in the decree lies in the fact that it enjoins, not specific acts or omissions, but results, evidence of the existence vel non [omit] of which must be determined by the opinions of witnesses."

For the phrase devisavit vel non, see devastavit.

venal; venial. These words are frequently mistaken. Venal has two closely related senses: (1) "purchasable; for sale"; or (2) "highly mercenary; amenable to bribes; corruptible." E.g., (Sense 2) "Child labor laws protect children against themselves, but also from the prospect of exploitation by venal parents."/ "Even though we admit that the advocate is ready to undertake either side of a cause for hire, it does not thereby follow that he is venal or that his attitude contravenes the principles of a sound morality."/ "That venality exists among certain members of the bar it would be idle to deny."

Venial = slight (used of sins); pardonable; excusable; trivial. E.g., "There will be no assumption of a purpose to visit venial faults with oppressive retribution." (Cardozo, J.)/ "[I]t is a habit . . . of counsel for the defence to make the most of minor uncertainties or discrepancies and to deal with a police officer in cross-examination as if any venial sin to which he might admit justified his professional damnation." Patrick Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 40 (1960).

vend is now usu. commercialese for sell, though it has been established since the 17th century.

vendable. See vendible.

vendee, an unnecessary LEGALISM for buyer or purchaser, is most commonly used in real-estate transactions. Some might argue that it is useful in some contexts as a correlative of vendor. But using vendee and vendor invites serious typographical errors and, in any event, simpler words are available—e.g.: "A sale contract was then drawn, naming the Millers individually as vendors [read sellers], and the lessee's sister as vendee [read buyer]."/ "The rule of Flureau v. Thornhill restricted vendee's [read the buyer's] damages for seller's breach of a land contract by failure to make good title to what we would call the vendee's [read buyer's] reliance expenses—searching title and so on." Grant Gilmore, The Death of Contract 51–52 (1974). Cf. breachee. See -EE (A), (C) & vendor.

vendible; vendable. The -ible spelling is preferred (and more than five times as common), though the -able spelling appears fairly often—e.g.: "O.T. Hodge Chile Parlors only has the right to use 'Hodge's' as a trade name and not as a trademark to identify its vendable [read vendible] products." Hodge Chile Co. v. KNA Food Distribs., Inc., 575 F. Supp. 210, 211 (E.D. Mo. 1983) (emphasis omitted). See -ABLE (A). vendor. Seller is generally a better word, along with the corresponding buyer rather than vendee. (See vendee.) Using the better-known words increases readability and reduces the possibilities of typographical error. So real are those possibilities that they sometimes materialize: drafters have actually had to testify about their mistakenly using vendor in place of vendee. See Prahmcoll Properties v. Sanford, 474 N.W.2d 639, 643 (Minn. Ct. App. 1991).

In specific contexts, however, a DIFFERENTIATION is emerging: in computer contracting, the practice is to use vendor rather than seller almost exclusively. The term vendor is used in two senses: first, to refer to the entire class of business entities (often the manufacturers or producers) engaged in marketing the particular product that a prospective purchaser may be interested in acquiring; and second, to refer to the individual business entity that makes the ultimate sale (including a lease). In this context, vending and selling represent two distinct phases of commerce: vending emphasizes the process of engaging in marketing or offering a product for sale rather than the sale itself, while selling focuses on the final step in the process—the actual sale.

venerable is a CLICHÉ when used inaccurately for old. E.g., "This firmly rooted principle was first established in the venerable case of [read, e.g., more than a century ago in] Strawbridge v. Curtiss." Properly, venerable = (of persons) worthy of being venerated, revered, or highly respected and esteemed, on account of character or position; commanding respect by reason of age combined with high personal character and dignity of appearance; (of things) worthy of veneration or deep respect

venire, /və-nī-ree/ or /və-neer/, was originally an elliptical form of venire facias (lit., "that you cause to come"), the name of the writ directed to a sheriff requiring him to summon a jury to try a case or cases at issue between parties. Today venire—never italicized—is used in the sense "a panel of persons selected for jury duty and from which the jurors are to be chosen."

Jury venire is a fairly common REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "In Witherspoon v. Illinois, the Supreme Court held that those individuals in the jury venire [read in the venire] who indicate that they could never vote to impose the death penalty, or that they would refuse even to consider its imposition in the case before them, may be excluded from juries in the trial of the penalty phase in capital cases."

The phrase venire panel is also a redundancy—e.g.: "The venire panel [read venire] comprised 35 persons, 9 of whom were members of minority groups."

venireman; venireperson; veniremember. The terms all mean "a prospective juror." The best nonsexist form is veniremember, not -person. E.g., "[A] defense lawyer in a Mississippi capital case contacted thirty-one of the veniremembers in connection with a motion for a new trial." King v. Lynaugh, 850 F.2d 1055, 1062 (5th Cir. 1988) (Rubin, J., dissenting)./ "I dissent from the holding that this case should be remanded for inquiry into the prosecution's reasons for exercising its peremptory challenges against black venirepersons [read veniremembers]." Though today common in legal writing, both venireperson and veniremember are omitted from the standard English-language dictionaries. See SEXISM (B) & potential juror.

An additional advantage of veniremember over venireman is that the latter is a HYBRID. Thus a linguist refers to "[t]he ugly venireman, in use since 1444," noting that "its Latin part goes back to venire facias . . . ." Mario Pei, Words in Sheep's Clothing 84 (1969). See venire.

venire panel. See venire.

venireperson. See venireman.

venter [L. "womb"] (= one or the other of two or more women who are sources of the same man's offspring) is a term nowadays considered objectionable, as it refers to the woman merely as the possessor of a birth canal. E.g., "'That, whereas by the law as it now stands, the issue of an ancestor by one venter [read mother], cannot inherit to the issue of such ancestor by a different venter [read mother], whereby the real estate of an ancestor in some instances goes out of the family to the great injury of the remaining issue of such ancestor.'" Ryder v. Myers, 167 A. 22, 24 (N.J. Ch. 1933) (quoting Pierson v. De Hart, 3 N.J.L. 73, 78 (1809)). Cf. en ventre sa mere.

venue = (1) originally, the neighborhood from which a jury had to be selected; (2) the county or other territorial unit over which a trial court has jurisdiction; or (3) the proper or a possible place for the trial of a lawsuit. One court has said that the exact etymology of the word is "obscured by a thick doubt," citing these possibilities: it could be derived "from the French as the anglicized spelling of the past participle of venir, to come, and thus it means '(those who) come,' or from the modern French substantive, meaning 'a coming,' or . . . from the Latin vicinitatum, meaning 'of the neighborhood,' shortened by usage to visinetum, and again in law Latin to visnetum, whence visne, which in early days was used and written interchangeably for venue . . . ." Blair v. U.S., 32 F.2d 130, 132 (8th Cir. 1929) (citation omitted). Modern lexicographers have recorded the modern legal sense from 1531 and speculate on still a different etymology: that it derives immediately from the Middle English word veneu (= an assault or attack), which in turn derives from the French verb venir, the spelling venue being the feminine form of the past participle. See jurisdiction (B).

venued, adj. An odd usage has cropped up among some American legal writers, who prefer to say that a case is venued in a particular locale, rather than that a local court has venue. Most readers are likely to consider this newfangled phrasing unidiomatic—e.g.: "The FTC concedes that one of the original plaintiffs . . . was properly venued in Delaware . . . ." [Read The FTC concedes that, for one of the original plaintiffs, venue was proper in Delaware.] Exxon Corp. v. F.T.C., 588 F.2d 895, 898 (3d Cir. 1978)./ "Where a case is improperly venued it may [read venue is improper, the case may], on agreement of counsel, be transferred to the county of proper venue." E.B. Gustafson, Minnesota Tax Appeals § 2.03, at 13 (1989).

The usage seems to have arisen in Minnesota at the turn of the 20th century: "The appellant made and served a reply venued in the county of Ramsey . . . ." Clay County Land Co. v. Alcox, 92 N.W. 464, 465 (Minn. 1902).

veracity = (1) truthfulness; observance of the truth; or (2) truth; accuracy. Sense (1), denoting a quality that persons have, is the traditionally correct use. Sense (2) began as a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION in the 18th century, and still might be so considered; it is not, however, uncommon in legal prose—e.g.: "The controversy over the veracity [read accuracy] of the search-warrant affidavit arose in connection with petitioner's state conviction for rape, kidnapping, and burglary."/ "The fact that there are clerks or carriers at the Greenville Post Office with seniority dates between September 1979 and April 1979 does nothing to call into question the veracity [read accuracy] of Smith's affidavit."/ "Control Data disputes the veracity [read accuracy] of each point, but the resolution of these factual issues is for another place and another time."

Veracity is not to be confused with voracity (= greediness in eating). See MALAPROPISMS.

verbage. See verbiage.

verbal is, unfortunately, "[a] term often used as meaning oral, parol, or unwritten." 92 C.J.S. at 995 (1955). But careful writers avoid this usage. Verbal, strictly speaking, means "of or relating to words" —e.g.: "The transposition of the words 'the court' and the addition of the word 'and' at the beginning of the first sentence [of the Rule] are merely verbal changes." Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) advisory committee's note. The movie producer Samuel Goldwyn's supposedly ironic remark, "A verbal contract isn't worth the paper it's written on," was not ironic at all given the proper sense of the word verbal, because a written contract is verbal. The phrase requires oral, which is restricted to what is spoken. For those senses cited in Corpus Juris Secundum and quoted at the outset of this entry, oral or unwritten should be used. See verbal contract.

The error is especially acute when verbal is opposed to written, as in a statute quoted in Franklin v. South Carolina, 218 U.S. 161, 163 (1910): "Any laborer working on shares of crop or for wages in money or other valuable consideration under a verbal [read oral] or written contract to labor on farm lands, who shall receive advances . . . and thereafter wilfully . . fail to perform the reasonable service required of him . . . shall be liable to prosecution for a misdemeanor . . . ."/ "A verbal [read oral] submission is not so advantageous as a written submission." 2 E.W. Chance, Principles of Mercantile Law 291 (P.W. French ed., 10th ed. 1951).

The misuse of verbal for oral has a long history and is still common. Nevertheless, the distinction is worth fighting for, especially in legal prose. Ironically, though, as one writer observes, lawyers "are among the chief offenders in the oral-verbal confusion . . . ." Robert C. Cumbow, The Subverting of the Goeduck, 14 U. Puget Sound L. Rev. 755, 778 (1991).

Because verbal is always used in reference to words, verbal definition is redundant, as there can be no definition without words: "Neither scientists nor philosophers have been more successful than judges in providing a verbal definition [omit verbal] for the concept of causality." Similarly, verbal is redundant in such phrases as verbal promise, verbal denial, verbal affirmation, and verbal criticism, as these activities usually cannot occur without words.

VERBAL AWARENESS. Lest writers commit unconscious gaffes or create MISCUES—as by referring to a "prophylactic against a wrongful discharge"—they must be aware of all the meanings of a given word, where one particular meaning is intended but other potential meanings may confuse or seem odd. And, of course, careful writers listen to what they say and read, so that they do not let a sign such as "Ears Pierced While You Wait" pass unnoticed. Nor do they overlook the humor in the church bulletin that reads, "All women wishing to become Young Mothers should visit the pastor in his office." Likewise, legal writers ought not to refer to "Roe v. Wade and its progeny"—though several prominent writers have done just that. Illustrations from law are legion—e.g.:

- "The language of the press may carry 'All the news that's fit to print'; the language of the law expresses the fit and the unfit, the fleeting and what passes for permanent." David Mellinkoff, The Language of the Law 33 (1963). (In that sentence, passes should not be used alongside permanent—esp. just after fleeting—because, in another sense, what passes is impermanent.)
- "At stake was no mere matter of taste; ammonium nitrate cakes when wet and is difficult to spread on fields as fertilizer." The proximity of taste and cakes, which may not at first be recognized as a verb, and the immediate proximity of ammonium nitrate, which must be torturous to the palate, do not make for pleasant reading. A less gustatory version would read: "At stake was no mere matter of personal preference; for ammonium nitrate, when wet, cakes and becomes difficult to spread on fields."
- " 'There is almost complete accord among many text writers that at common law commission of the crime [i.e. sodomy] required penetration per anum and that penetration per os did not constitute the offense.' This is the logical position . . . ." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 466 (3d ed. 1982) (quoting a case). Once again, which position is more logical?

A heightening of verbal awareness would save writers from odd contradictions: "After the work stoppage started [better: workers walked off the job], he was assigned to answer telephone complaints about company service." Cf. ETYMOLOGICAL AWARENESS & MISCUES

And who knows exactly what kind of consciousness-raising a writer needs who entitles an article Apprehending the Fetus En Ventre Sa Mere: A Study in Judicial Sleight of Hand? See 53 Saskatchewan L. Rev. 113 (1989).

verbal contract should be oral contract or unwritten contract—e.g.: "[I]t is a safeguard against inadvertence and innocent mistake—e.g. in verbal [read an oral] contract or in the release of a debt." Carleton K. Allen, Law in the Making 395 (7th ed. 1964). See verbal. Cf. informal contract & simple contract.

verbals (BrE) = any remarks that an accused person has made in the presence of the police (CDL). The term appears to be an elliptical form of verbal statements, itself incorrect for oral statements. But verbals appears to be ensconced in BrE legal JARGON—e.g.: "'Verbals'—the oral comments made by defendants once arrested, or rather the comments policemen say they made—are often vital pieces of the prosecution's case. So, if his client denies having made them—and imaginative policemen are no more unusual than bent lawyers—a barrister has to pitch in to the police witness." Yes You Did, No I Didn't, Economist, 29 March 1972, at 27. See verbal.

verbatim; ipsissima verba; literatim. These near-synonyms carry slight nuances. Verbatim = word for word. Literatim = letter for letter. Sometimes the phrase verbatim et literatim is seen. Ipsissima verba (lit., "the selfsame words") = the exact language used by someone quoted (W10). E.g., "Had the application for costs against the solicitors personally been pursued in this case, it would have been a weighty factor in favor of the solicitors; moreover, the ipsissima verba of a judgment can be of help." (Eng.) See in haec verba* & ipsissima verba.

verbiage was formerly unerringly pejorative. It referred to prolix language and redundancies. More recently, it has come to signify, esp. to American lawyers, "wording, diction," in a neutral sense. Perhaps it is neutral because lawyers have become inured to their prolixities and inelegancies: "Mr. Smithson was preparing the verbiage for the agreement." Strictly, the word should maintain the negative connotations it has always had; verbiage describes a vice of language. In the sentence just quoted, the writer might have eliminated some clutter by writing, "Mr. Smithson was preparing the agreement." A somewhat different error is illustrated in this specimen: "It is well settled that the exact verbiage [read wording] of the statute need not be alleged in an indictment when there is no material difference between the language of the statute and the allegations employed."

Verbage for verbiage is a common error spawned perhaps by the analogy of herbage—e.g.: "Parker also forgoes equivocation and cuts through the verbage [read verbiage]." William Rice, Clawing Their Way to the Top, Chicago Tribune, 16 Oct. 1986, at 14C.

VERBOSITY. Samuel Johnson once said, "It is unjust, sir, to censure lawyers for multiplying words when they argue; it is often necessary for them to multiply words" (quoted in Boswell's Life of Johnson (1781)). Perhaps so. But lawyers must at least attempt to distinguish between those occasions when it is necessary and those when it is not. For verbosity is always an enemy of clarity.

As a result, verbosity is virtually never appropriate (much less necessary) in statutes. Yet it is especially common in STATUTE DRAFTING. The following statute says nothing more than that the industrial commission is to lay down rules to ensure safety in the handling of liquefied petroleum gases:

> The industrial commission shall ascertain, fix, and order such reasonable standards, rules, or regulations for the design, construction, location, installation, operation, repair, and maintenance of equipment for storage, handling, use, and transportation by tank truck or tank trailer, of liquefied petroleum gases for fuel purposes, and for the odorization of said gases used therewith, as shall render such equipment safe.
> Wis. Stat. § 101.105(2) (1963).

Certain BURIED VERBS and other verbose phrases recur in statutes—among the most common are these:

Verbose Expression	Kernel Expression
at the time of her death	when she dies (or died) give consideration to	consider give recognition to	recognize have need of	need
have knowledge of	know
make application to	apply make payment	pay
make provision for	provide for Judicial writing is also a sanctuary for verbosity. Following are some typical specimens, with recommended ways of eliminating the clutter:

- "He contends that while assisting in hooking cables to the cover of said barge, while assisting in the offloading of it, he was injured when the cover of said barge was moved, causing him to sustain a downward fall." [This sentence appears to have been dictated and unedited. Read He contends that, while offloading the barge and, in particular, assisting in hooking cables to its cover, he fell when the cover was moved.]
- "Upon the filing of the petition [read filing the petition], appellant was appointed special guardian." See of (A).
- "The court should not attempt to enforce any variation of the relations between insured and insurer while the insurance contract is in process of performance [read being performed, in effect, or under way]."
- "With the benefit of hindsight and its unerring superb visual acuity, one might suggest that the trial strategy chosen by Austin's appointed counsel left much to be desired." (Omit that desultory amplification of hindsight, the qualities of which people know well enough.)

- "A venture, to constitute a joint adventure, must be for profit in a financial or commercial sense [read financial profit]." (On the variation of venture / adventure, see INELEGANT VARIATION.)
- "The existing partners and incoming partners desire by this amendatory agreement to admit the incoming partners as partners in the partnership." (This bit of verbosity needs no comment.)

Those are merely sentence-level examples of verbosity. When these sentences are aggregated, and the writings in which they appear are aggregated, obscurity proliferates. As Edgar Allan Poe is reputed to have said: "In one case out of a hundred a point is excessively discussed because it is obscure; in the ninety-nine remaining it is obscure because excessively discussed." verdict. A. Etymology. Voir dire (q.v.) is etymologically equivalent to verdict, having passed into English through French. Verdict came through Anglo-Norman (verdit) but was refashioned after the medieval Latin vere dictum or verdictum, itself based on the French verdit.

B. Who Hands Down. Juries, not judges, hand down verdicts (both civil and criminal). Strictly, verdicts are returned by juries, although we have the lay colloquialisms to pass a verdict on and to give a verdict on. Cf. sentence.

C. Verdict for vote. The jury collectively renders a verdict; individual jurors tender votes, not verdicts. E.g., "A prejudice against the defense of insanity will not disqualify one from sitting as juror where the nature of the prejudice is such that the court is satisfied that it will not influence the juror's verdict [read vote]."

D. Verdict for judgment. In journalistic references to appellate-court judgments, this error is frequent—e.g.:

- "I talked to John Baker a few months after the Supreme Court verdict [read judgment]." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble With Lawyers 230 (1970) (referring to Wisconsin's highest appellate court).
- "At the time the Court of Appeal handed down its verdict [read judgment] on the Birmingham public house bombers in January[,] the Lord Chief Justice made it clear that the court would not welcome further referrals of such cases . . . ." Final Decision, Daily Telegraph, 19 Nov. 1988, at 12.
- "Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor jerked forward in her black leather chair, visibly astonished. . . . The verdict [read decision] is expected next year." Keith C. Epstein, Ohio Free Speech Case Shocks Supreme Court, Plain Dealer (Cleveland), 13 Oct. 1994, at 3A.

The mistake occurs also in reference to taking appeals—one appeals from a judgment, not a verdict: "A verdict [read judgment] for defendant was reversed by the Supreme Court and retrial ordered." Asher L. Cornelius, The Cross-Examination of Witnesses 116 (1929)./ "At a press conference, Mr. Lozano, 31, a Miami policeman for five years, said he would appeal the verdict [read judgment], and 'keep fighting for my job.'" José de Cordoba & Wade Lambert, Miami Policeman Is Found Guilty in Deaths of Black Biker, Passenger, Wall St. J., 8 Dec. 1989, at B5. See JUDGMENTS, APPELLATE-COURT veredicto. See judgment *non obstante veredicto.

verification. See acknowledgment (B).

verificational (= of or relating to a verification) is, in almost every conceivable context, a NEEDLESS VARIANT of verified—e.g.: ". . . a verificational [read verified] letter dated January 14, 1977, signed by the plaintiff . . . ." Good v. Paine Furniture Co., 391 A.2d 741, 743 (Conn. Super. Ct. 1978)./ "[A]ny alleged problem raised by the lack of a jurat was cured by Mundinger's having filed his verificational [read verified] affidavits with jurats . . . ." Lincoln Nat'l Bank v. Mundinger, 528 N.E.2d 829, 836 (Ind. Ct. App. 1988).

verify = (1) to confirm by swearing <to verify her accounts by affidavit>; (2) to swear to (a statement) <he duly verified his affidavit at the end>; or (3) to check the accuracy of <to verify all the citations>.

verily (= in truth) is an affected ARCHAISM in modern contexts. It appears in old-style affidavits.

One usage critic, Margaret Nicholson, says that I verily believe means "it is almost incredible, yet facts surprise me into the belief." The phrase has never been used that way in American law, where the phrase is merely pretentious for I believe—e.g.: "I verily believe that Mr. White communicated these facts to the Richland County Attorneys [sic] office . . . ." State v. Copeland, 448 N.W.2d 611, 615 n.4 (N.D. 1989) (quoting an affidavit).

versus for as against (q.v.) is quite acceptable. E.g., "The FCC's decision is consistent with respect to the use of long- versus short-form procedures." This word need not be italicized as a foreign word. See v.

vertical restraints. See horizontal restraints.

very. A. As a Weasel Word. This intensifier, which functions as both an adjective and an adverb, surfaces repeatedly in flabby writing. In almost every context in which it appears, its omission would result in at most a negligible loss; in many contexts the idea would be more powerfully expressed without it. E.g., "We are very reluctant to substitute our views on damages for those of the jury." Here the word very weakens the adjective that follows; a simple statement would be more forceful: "We are reluctant to substitute our views . . . ." See clearly, obviously & WEASEL WORDS.

B. Very disappointed, etc. Very modifies adjectives (sorry, sick, etc.), and not, properly, past participles (disappointed, uninterested, etc.). Follett wrote that "finer ears are offended by past participles modified by very without the intervention of the quantitative much, which respects the verbal sense of an action undergone. Such writers require very much disappointed, very much pleased, very much engrossed, very well satisfied, etc. Only a few adjectives from verbs—tired, drunk, and possibly depressed—have shed enough of their verbal quality to stand an immediately preceding very." Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 343 (1966). Very interested is another acceptable idiom, although very much interested seems preferable in formal contexts. When a past participle has become thoroughly established as an adjective (e.g., drunk), it takes very rather than very much.

vest, v.t. & v.i., is used in a number of legal and lay idioms, particularly to vest in and to vest with. The primary senses are these: (1) "to confer ownership of (property) upon a person"; (2) "to invest (a person) with the full title to property"; or (3) to give (a person) an immediate, fixed right of present or future enjoyment." In all three senses, "the term has reference to the absence of a condition precedent to the future interest becoming possessory, other than the termination of the preceding estate or estates created by the same conveyance." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 121 n.5 (2d ed. 1988).

At common law, in the ceremony known as investiture, the lord handed the vassal some object representing the land: "The vassal was thus vested with the fief and the fief was vested in him: from these terms developed the modern meanings of to vest as, first, to place or secure something in the possession of a person; secondly, to place or establish a person in possession or occupation of some thing; and, thirdly, to pass into possession—the senses, in other words, which are represented in the current idioms vest in or be vested in and vest with or be vested with." J.E.S. Simon, English Idioms from the Law (pt. 3), 78 Law Q. Rev. 245, 249 (1962). See invest.

vested. A. And contingent. These terms are ordinarily opposed in reference to future interests. A vested interest is an estate that is invariably fixed in a determinate person, who will take upon the termination of a prior estate. A contingent interest, by contrast, involves uncertainty: there is some condition precedent to its taking effect in possession other than the mere termination of the preceding estate.

The word vested is occasionally, however, used in quite a different sense: in this sense, vested "is defined to mean that there is no condition precedent of survival. Or, as it has sometimes been said, the distinction is really whether or not the interest is 'transmissible' on the death of the owner before the time of distribution named in the creating instrument." 1 American Law of Property 460–61 (A. James Casner ed., 1952). This is the loose, confusing sense disapproved in the entry entitled vested interest subject to a contingent remainder.

B. Vested interest as a Popularized Legal Technicality. In the common idiom, any interest is known as a "vested interest." Whether the use is a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION or a useful metaphor is usually a matter of degree—e.g.: "The Pacific War is recalled for the public every year with massive media attention on the anniversary of the atomic bombing of Hiroshima, but no group in Japanese society has any vested interest in recalling the indignities and hardship of the first decade after surrender." Roger Buckley, Japan Today 53 (2d ed. 1990)./ "In the expense and delay the common run of lawyers had, of course, a vested interest; simple cheap conveyancing and certainty of titles do not increase the emoluments of attorneys." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 253 (1961). In the first sentence quoted, the phrase vested interest seems too attenuated from the literal sense; in the second, however, the metaphor seems quite natural and helpful to the passage. See POPULARIZED LEGAL TECHNICALITIES.

vested interest subject to a contingent remainder. This phrase is an ambiguous one referring apparently to a type of contingent remainder that is alienable or transmissible. "The phrase," according to leading commentators in property law, "is awkward and confusing . . . [and] its use is not desirable. If, by the use of the term, it is meant that the remainder in question is alienable or transmissible, then the remainder should simply be called alienable or transmissible and the reason given for attributing to it those legal characteristics." Lewis M. Simes & Allan F. Smith, The Law of Future Interests § 112, at 95 (2d ed. 1956).

vested interest subject to divestment; vested interest liable to be divested. The first is AmE, the second BrE.

vested remainder; contingent remainder. A vested remainder is a present estate of freehold in an existing and ascertained person who has the right to immediate possession whenever the preceding estate ends. A contingent remainder is not an estate at all; rather, it is a limitation by which an estate will arise when some contingent event occurs and then vest in possession when a preceding estate ends. See contingent remainder.

vestigial. So spelled; vestigal is a not uncommon misspelling.

via = (1) by way of (a place); passing through <they flew to Amarillo via Dallas>; or (2) by means of, through the agency of <we sent the letter via facsimile transmission>. Sense (2) is considered "certainly acceptable in informal use" by the Oxford Guide, though it remains questionable whenever a simple English preposition would suffice. Gowers called it a vulgarism in the revised edition of Fowler's Modern English Usage, and Follett (Modern American Usage) and Bernstein (The Careful Writer) concur.

The following sentences illustrate the objectionable sense, the result of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION: "Finally, she argues that the tax lien is subordinate to her interest in the property because it was not filed until she 'purchased' it via [read through or in] the divorce proceedings."/ "Once they arrived at the Army's criminal investigations headquarters, the FBI agents showed appellant their badges and gave him his Miranda warnings via [read off or by reading aloud] an advice-of-rights form."/ "When a party fails to secure a witness's voluntary cooperation by notice or commission procedure, it may seek discovery via [read through] a letter rogatory."

Here is an acceptable figurative use of sense (1): "Whereas the appellant in Shelley v. Kramer arrived via a state court, thereby permitting of disposition on Fourteenth Amendment grounds, the Hurd case arose in the District of Columbia."

viable originally meant "capable of living; fit to live," a sense that still applies in many phrases, such as a viable fetus. By acceptable extension it has come to refer figuratively to immaterial things or concepts, as here: "Ancillary jurisdiction presupposes the existence of an action that a federal court can adjudicate and should not be used to breathe life into a lawsuit that is not otherwise viable."/ "We conclude that Powell's claim for back salary remains viable even though he has been seated in the 91st Congress and thus find it unnecessary to determine whether the other issues have become moot."

The word has lately been the victim of SLIPSHOD EXTENSION, when used in the sense "feasible, practicable" . This sense is objectionable not alone in being slovenly, but also in its current status as a VOGUE WORD. One writer has noted that "dictionaries now give [as definitions for viable] real, workable, vivid, practicable, important, newer definitions that seem only to confirm the critics' complaints that the word has had the edge hopelessly ground off it." Roy Copperud, American Usage and Style 405 (1980). Thus such uses as the following are to be avoided; it is hard even to know what the writer of this sentence meant: "She intended to transport the aliens to the nearest viable [read practical?] Immigration and Naturalization Service office for the purpose of allowing them to file applications for asylum."

vicarious liability; vicarious responsibility. Both terms refer to indirect legal responsibility, such as an employer's liability for an employee's acts or a principal's liability for the agent's torts or contracts. Vicarious liability is the usual term in both AmE and BrE; vicarious responsibility is a primarily BrE variant.

The antonyms to these phrases are primary liability and primary responsibility. See responsibility.

vice versa (= the other way around; just the opposite) should have mirror-image referents, even if only implied. E.g., "It is unlikely that any of the participants in the debates about constitutional theory are going to have their minds changed by reading a polemic by a person of another sect, any more than Baptist theologians are likely to convert to Catholicism or vice versa [read or Catholic theologians to Baptism] when presented with a 'refutation' of [their] position." (The uncorrected sentence denotes, through vice versa, "or Catholicism is likely to convert to Baptist theologians.")

Vice versa does not work here: "A mother may inherit from an illegitimate child whom she has acknowledged and vice versa." If we reverse the equation, we get this: "An illegitimate child may inherit from a mother whom she has acknowledged." An illegitimate child does not acknowledge her parent.

Nor does vice versa work with a verb like distribute. E.g., "The testatrix intended to give the trustees a broader and more discretionary power that would permit them, to some extent, to distribute as income what would otherwise go as principal and vice versa." The writer did not intend to say, by vice versa, that the trustees had the power to distribute as principal what would otherwise go as income. The phraseology would work if the verb had been to treat as.

vicinity; vicinage. Though vicinage (= neighborhood; the relation of neighbors) is the older term in English, dating from the 14th century, it is (in AmE) a legalistic variant of vicinity, which dates from 1560. Vicinity, however, has far outranged vicinage in its usefulness.

The following example shows vicinage as a legalistic affectation for venue: "Changes of venue or continuances may subject the parties and courts to inconvenience and expense and may even violate the defendant's right to speedy trial in the vicinage." Fowler aptly wrote that "vicinage is now, compared with neighborhood, a FORMAL WORD, and, compared with vicinity, a dying one" (MEU1 693).

victimless = (of a legal offense) having or involving no victims. This useful NEOLOGISM dates from the early 1970s, though the idea came earlier. See E.M. Schur, Crimes Without Victims (1965).

victor; victress; victrix. Victor applies to women as well as to men; the other forms are unnecessary. See SEXISM (C).

victory. The phrase win a victory is a common but venial REDUNDANCY.

victress; victrix. See victor.

victuals, spelled for colloquial uses vittles, is pronounced /vit-əlz/ with either spelling. It forms victualer (= one who provides food and drink for payment), victualed, and victualing in AmE; these three inflected forms double the -l- in BrE. See DOUBLING OF FINAL CONSONANTS.

videlicet. See viz.

vi et armis (= by or with force and arms) is a LEGALISM formerly common, but today moribund. It was a necessary part of the allegation, in medieval pleading, that a trespass had been committed with force and therefore was a matter for the King's Court because it involved a breach of the peace. In England, the term survived as a formal requirement of pleading until 1852 (CDL). See trespass & LOAN TRANSLATIONS.

viewpoint; point of view; standpoint. The first has been stigmatized by a few writers and grammarians who consider it "inferior to point of view" (AHD). Eric Partridge wrote that the term "has been deprecated by purists; not being a purist, I occasionally use it, although I perceive that it is unnecessary." Usage and Abusage 307 (1973). In fact, viewpoint, apart from being extremely common, conveniently says in one word what point of view says in three. No stigma should attach. E.g., "So far prosecutions have been considered from the viewpoint of the prosecutor." R.M. Jackson, The Machinery of Justice in England 145 (5th ed. 1967).

vilify is misspelled villify more than 10 percent of the time in American caselaw.

vindicable is the proper form—not vindicatable, which sometimes appears: "Only the named plaintiffs have any vindicatable [read vindicable] rights . . . ." Schultz v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 560 F.2d 849, 855 (7th Cir. 1977). See -ATABLE.

vindicate = (1) to clear from censure, criticism, suspicion, or doubt, by means of demonstration; or (2) to assert, maintain, make good, by means of action, esp. in one's own interest; to defend against encroachment or interference (OED). Sense (1) is the usual lay sense <I've been vindicated>.

Sense (2) is the legal sense—e.g.: "An arrest is the initial stage of a criminal prosecution; it is intended to vindicate society's interest in having its laws obeyed."/ "We do not pass upon other claims that may be available to him to vindicate his rights." The word implies success in justifying something. This sentence is therefore redundant: "Plaintiffs contend that a class action procedure is the only means of ensuring that the potential claimants will be able to successfully vindicate [read to vindicate] their rights."

vindicatory; vindicative; vindictive. Vindicatory = (1) providing vindication; or (2) punitive, retributive. Vindicative is a NEEDLESS VARIANT that, if ever used, would be liable to confusion with vindictive, a common word meaning "given to or characterized by revenge or retribution." E.g., "We note the interest of the public in shielding responsible federal government officials against the harassment and inevitable hazards of vindictive or ill-founded damage suits."

vindictive damages. See punitive damages.

violatable is incorrect for violable—e.g.: "The courts may then infer the receipt of confidences violatable [read violable] by the subsequent representation." Brasseaux v. Girouard, 214 So. 2d 401, 406 (La. Ct. App. 1968).

violate; contravene; abridge; breach; flout. These verbs are common in legal contexts, and in some contexts have virtually the same senses. Violate and flout commonly take law as an object <to flout the law>. (See flaunt.) Contravene is also common, but usu. refers to something less well defined, such as public policy <the rule contravenes public policy>. Violate and abridge are often used in reference to constitutional or statutory rights. (See abridge.) And violate and breach are often used of contractual provisions.

violative. The phrase to be violative of is verbose for to violate. E.g., "Even if residency requirements would be a permissible exercise of the commerce power, they are so unjustifiable as to be violative of [read to violate] due process." See BE-VERBS (B).

The OED records violative from 1856 at the earliest, but the word appeared more than half a century before, in Marbury v. Madison: "To withhold his commission, therefore, is an act deemed by the court not warranted by law, but violative of a vested legal right." 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 162 (1803).

vires is an unnecessary LATINISM for power or authority. E.g., "Right from the beginning he never had vires [read the power] to deal with the matters other than by reference to the Act." (Eng.) See ultra vires & intra vires.

virile (lit. "masculine, manly") bears an odd sense in Louisiana civil law, namely "that can be rightly attributed to or assessed against (a person)." E.g., "The right to enforce contribution does not mature until there has been payment of the common obligation, or at least payment of more than the virile share."/ "Among solidary obligors, each is liable for his virile portion."

virtual, virtually. These are WEASEL WORDS: they weaken what they modify. E.g., "[R]igid trimester analysis . . . [has made] constitutional law in this area a virtual Procrustean bed." Webster v. Reproductive Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 517 (1989) (per Rehnquist, C.J.). virtue of, in & by. By virtue of, not in virtue of, is currently the idiomatic phrase; the latter is an ARCHAISM that remains fairly common in legal writing, however: "[I]n virtue of the State's jurisdiction over the property of the non-resident situated within its limits, [the state courts] can inquire into that non-resident's obligations to its own citizens . . . to the extent necessary to control the disposition of the property." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714, 723 (1878)./ "The restricted range of international law is merely the counterpart of the wide freedom of independent action which states claim in virtue of their sovereignty . . . ." J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations 74 (5th ed. 1955).

vis-à-vis is a CHAMELEON-HUED preposition and adverb in place of which it is usually desirable to use a more precise term. The traditional sense is adverbial, "in a position facing each other." The following sentences contain acceptable figurative uses: "The practical possibility is present in all intrafamilial legal relationships, particularly parent vis-à-vis child."/ "Vis-à-vis their lord they were unfree, though to some extent protected against ill usage, but vis-à-vis the rest of the world they were accorded the rights of free men." A.W.B. Simpson, An Introduction to the History of the Land Law 148 (1961).

As a preposition, vis-à-vis has been extended to the senses "opposite to; in relation to; as compared with." Usually simpler, more precise prepositions are better. E.g., "The advantage of equitable remedies for the misappropriation of money lies in establishing a preferred position vis-à-vis [read over] others having claims against the wrongdoer, by way of an equitable lien or through equitable subrogation."/ "It is harsh enough when, vis-à-vis [read as between] the carrier and the shipper, the law commands a shipper to pay the carrier twice the cargo if the latter has not in fact received the money."

viscera (= internal organs) is the plural of viscus. See PLURALS (A).

visit, n.; visitation. Visit, the ordinary word, means "a call on a person or at a place; temporary residence with a person or at a place" (COD). Visitation denotes a visit by an official, an unduly long visit, or the divine dispensation of punishment or reward. In family law, visitation is used in the phrases visitation rights (= provisions for spending time with one's children living with another, usu. the divorced spouse). E.g., "This case involves court orders regarding child-support obligations and visitation rights under a divorce decree."

visit upon = to inflict punishment for, to avenge. E.g., "The drastic remedy of an involuntary dismissal with prejudice may not under our jurisprudence be visited upon a client because of his attorney's deficiencies in professional courtesy."

vis major*; force majeure; act of God. The first is a LATINISM, the second a French equivalent, and the third a common English phrase. All are used in legal writing, and the first two appear almost exclusively in legal writing. All three phrases have undergone HYPALLAGE, so that the reference is now usually to the destruction caused by forces of nature, rather than to the forces of nature themselves. Also, the phrases refer to an "inevitable" accident that is not just caused by nature, but that occurs despite all reasonable precautions. The equivalent phrase in Scots law is damnum fatale.

The preferable phrase might seem to be force majeure. Though act of God is the most universal of these terms, it is the least desirable because it so easily misleads:

> As a technical term, act of God is untheological and infelicitous. It is an operation of 'natural forces' and this is apt to be confusing in that it might imply positive intervention of the Deity. This (at any rate a common understanding) is apparent in exceptionally severe snowfalls, thunderstorms and gales. But a layman would hardly describe the gnawing of a rat as an act of God, and yet the lawyer may, in some circumstances, style it such. The fact is that in law the essence of an act of God is not so much a positive intervention of the Deity as a process of nature not due to the act of man, and it is this negative side [that] needs emphasis.
>
> T.E. Lewis, Winfield on Tort 55–56 (6th ed. 1954).

See act of God & force majeure.

visualize does not mean "to see," but "to see in the mind's eye." The word is figurative, not literal. Here the word is wrongly used in a literal sense: "On May 10, 1973, the neurosurgeon performed the surgery. After opening her back, the defendant visualized [read saw] a slightly bulging annulus on the left at L5-S1."

vitiate = (1) to impair by the addition of (something); (2) to render corrupt in morals; (3) to corrupt or spoil in respect of substance; or (4) to render of no effect; to invalidate either completely or in part; to destroy or impair the legal effect or force of (a deed, etc.) (OED). Sense (1) is the most widely used. E.g., "The real complaint in this case, however, is that by treating reasonable retaliation as a separate and distinct element, the judge may have misled the jury and vitiated the effect of the proper direction which he had previously given."/ "Consent to contract may be vitiated if fraud, error, violence, or threats induce the consent [i.e., if one of these elements is added]."

Here vitiate is used in the sense "to impair by the subtraction or omission of something," an unexceptionable use: "Excising the racial indicia from Exhibit Z would have vitiated its relevance in rebutting the claim of discrimination."/ "The omission to refer to the lease did not vitiate the memorandum." (Eng.)

Sense (4) is the legal sense. E.g., "Where the object contemplated by one or both of the parties to a contract is unlawful or immoral, though it may not be directly punishable, the contract is vitiated."/ "The fact that Hartford Insurance paid compensation to Blanks does not vitiate the statutory employment relationship between Blanks and ANR."/ "The Perrys assert that the merger doctrine is inoperative; to vitiate the merger doctrine on the basis of mutual mistake, the party seeking to avoid the doctrine must show that both parties had the same misunderstanding about the same material fact." It is perhaps a SLIPSHOD EXTENSION to stretch this sense into "to strike down": "The court vitiated [read invalidated] the statute on grounds that it conflicted with constitutional provisions."

A frequently misunderstood word, vitiate does not mean "to weaken or lessen," as used here: "It is conceded that anger can be vitiated [read reduced] by a change in physical surroundings." Nor does it mean "to belie": "Plaintiff's assertion is vitiated [read belied] by the plain language of the agreement." Nor "to correct": "[T]he court's later instruction . . . cannot be deemed to have vitiated [read cured or corrected] the prejudice caused by the court's earlier apparent indorsement of the improper questioning." People v. Wood, 488 N.E.2d 86, 90 (N.Y. 1985). The word is also sometimes misused for obviate, q.v.

vittles is not the literary spelling; victuals, q.v., is.

vituperative; vituperous. The former is the preferred adjectival form of vituperation. Vituperous is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

viz. is an abbreviation of the Latin word videlicet (fr. videberé = to see; licet = it is permissible). The English-language equivalents are namely or that is to say, either of which is preferable to this LATINISM. Like its English counterparts, the term signifies that what follows particularizes a general statement, without contradicting what precedes, or that what follows explains certain obscurities that the writer acknowledges to be lurking in what has just been said. E.g., "[If a testator has] devised certain real estate to his widow, 'her heirs, viz., her children and grandchildren and assigns,' the words following the videlicet have been held not to be repugnant to, but explanatory and restrictive of, the word 'heirs,' and to operate to limit the widow's estate to an estate for life." 57 Am. Jur. Wills § 1156, at 753 (1948)./ "In its second opinion, the district court certified the main issue, viz., the executive officers' liability under section 23:1032."

The abbreviation is odd in two ways. First, how does one derive viz. for videlicet? The final z in the abbreviation represents the medieval Latin symbol of contraction for et or -et (OED). Second, how does one pronounce viz.? Preferably by saying "namely." As with i.e. and e.g. (qq.v.), the abbreviation is customarily set off from the rest of the sentence by a pair of commas. (Or, when given as the first word within a parenthetical expression, it is set off by one comma.) vocation. See avocation.

vociferous; vociferant. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

VOGUE WORDS are those faddish, trendy, ubiquitous words that have something new about them. They may be NEOLOGISMS or they may be old words in novel uses or senses. Often they quickly become CLICHÉS or standard idioms, and sometimes they pass into obscurity after a period of feverish popularity. For whatever reason, they have such a grip on the popular mind that they come to be used in contexts in which they serve no real purpose. As they become more popular and appear more frequently, says the Oxford Guide, "so their real denotative value drains away, a process that closely resembles monetary inflation. . . . One should carefully guard against using them either because they sound more learned and up to date than the more commonplace words in one's vocabulary, or as a short cut in communicating ideas that would be better set out in simple, clear, basic vocabulary" (1983).

void; voidable. "It is regrettable that the courts have used the term 'voidable' in the sense of both 'voidable' and 'void.'" Lewis A. Jeffrey, Infants—Contract of Suretyship, 3 Tex. L. Rev. 328, 329 (1925). The distinction should be evident. Void = absolutely null. Voidable = capable of being voided or confirmed. The practical effect is that a void contract (q.v.) gives no rights at all; a voidable contract gives certain rights, though one of the parties (such as a minor) may abruptly put an end to those rights.

Yet confusion seems to abound, as Corpus Juris Secundum points out: "There is great looseness and no little confusion in the books in the use of the words void and voidable, growing, perhaps, in some degree, out of the imperfection of the language, since there are several kinds of defects which are included under the expressions void and voidable, while there are but two terms to express them all." 92 C.J.S. at 1020–23 (1955).

The phrases totally void and completely void are REDUNDANCIES. (See ADJECTIVES (B).) Null and void, q.v., is questionable as a DOUBLET, void itself being perfectly strong: "The natural tendency of the condition contained in the will is to restrain all marriage and for that reason it is void." See null and void.

voidance. See avoid.

void ab initio is an extremely common phrase, and some lawyers try to justify the LATINISM on grounds that it is not easily translated. But quite respectable writers have used void from the beginning—e.g.: "[T]he maxim is 'that which is void in the beginning cannot be cured by waiver, acquiescence or lapse of time.' " Eugene A. Jones, Manual of Equity Pleading and Practice 12 n.24 (1916). See ab initio.

void and of no(ne) effect. This DOUBLET is quite redundant. If the phrase must be used, modern idiom requires void and of no effect.

void and unenforceable is a common REDUNDANCY void contract. As Patrick Atiyah points out, void contract is "really a contradiction in terms inasmuch as a contract has already been defined in terms applicable only to a valid contract. However, the term is convenient and is universally used." P.S. Atiyah, An Introduction to the Law of Contract 36–37 (3d ed. 1981). Among typical void contracts are those in which:

- no consideration was given;
- the acceptance of an offer was not communicated;
- wagering is involved; or
- family relations are prejudiced.

In essence, a void contract is no contract at all—it is not necessarily unlawful, but it has no legal effect. For other phrases using contract but not truly involving a contract, see contract of record & unenforceable contract. See also OXYMORONS.

void for vagueness. This phrase was originally confined to the law of deeds and other instruments affecting real or personal property: if the property was not sufficiently identified—or some other critical provision was vaguely worded— the instrument would be declared void for vagueness. This usage first appeared in the mid-19th century and has persisted into the late 20th—e.g.:

- "[A]lthough our early decisions would hold them void, for vagueness, our decisons for the last ten and fifteen years, have gone further, and established the law to be liberal enough to sustain mortgages quite as indefinite and vague as the present." Utley v. Smith, 24 Conn. 290, 314 (1855).
- "Secondly, That said mortgage is void, for vagueness, and uncertainty in respect to the debts intended to be secured, and which were in existence at the time the mortgage was executed." Gill v. Pinney's Adm'r, 12 Ohio St. 38, 46 (Ohio 1861).
- "We are therefore of the opinion that the description is sufficient to cover and to convey this particular stock of goods, and that the mortgage is not void for vagueness or uncertainty." Davis v. Turner, 120 F. 605, 612 (4th Cir. 1903).
- "[T]he description [in the deed] is not void for vagueness and it may be aided by parol evidence." Peel v. Calais, 31 S.E.2d 440, 443 (N.C. 1944).
- "The Hodges court held that a devise of a specified number of acres out of a larger tract was void for vagueness, but relied on cases dealing with deeds, mortgages, and foreclosures rather than wills." Clayton W. Davidson III, Stephenson v. Rowe: The Testator's Will Prevails, 65 N.C. L. Rev. 1488, 1490 (1987).
- "She argues that . . . both the liquor license provision in the contract for deed and the default notice sent to her are void for vagueness . . . ." Turbiville v. Hansen, 761 P.2d 389, 391 (Mont. 1988).
- "We agree with appellees that this description was sufficient to constitute a key by which the property may be identified, and thus the contract was not void for vagueness due to any insufficiency of the description of the property." Cole v. Shoffner, 421 S.E.2d 322, 325 (Ga. Ct. App. 1992) (citation omitted).

Not until the early 20th century did the phrase come to bear what is today its most usual sense, in reference to statutes. If legislation establishes a requirement or a punishment without stating precisely what is required or what conduct is punishable, the courts generally hold that it is void for vagueness because it violates due process—e.g.:

- "Four reasons are assigned in the motion to quash, against the validity of the statute under the Constitution: . . . second, that it is void for vagueness and uncertainty . . . ." U.S. v. U.S. Brewers' Ass'n, 239 F. 163, 165 (W.D. Pa. 1916).
- "Exemption of vehicles operating within 'usual transfer delivery zone' from Motor Vehicle Transportation Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833] § 9 held void for vagueness." Ex parte Schmolke, 248 P. 244, 245 syl. 6 (Cal. 1926).
- "The word 'orchard' has always had a well-understood meaning, and the use of such a term in a statute could not possibly render the statute void for vagueness." Kelleher v. French, 22 F.2d 341, 344 (W.D. Va. 1927).
- "[The defendant contends that] the statute under which defendant was prosecuted is void for vagueness, because it grants unlimited discretion to the state in deciding how many charges to bring for a course of criminal conduct . . . ." State v. Altgilbers, 786 P.2d 680, 691 (N.M. Ct. App. 1990).

When the expression is used as a PHRASAL ADJECTIVE, it should be hyphenated <void-for-vagueness doctrine> voidity. See voidness.

void marriage, like void contract (q.v.), is an OXYMORON: "The expression 'void marriage' is but a convenient phrase. A void marriage is no marriage. Considered literally the expression is self-destructive and contradictory." Ross Smith v. Ross Smith [1963] A.C. 280, 314 (per Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest).

voidness; voidity. The first is the usual noun. The second, a NEOLOGISM not recorded in most English-language dictionaries, is a NEEDLESS VARIANT—e.g.: "[V]oidity [read Voidness] of marriage requir[es] by the trend of the more modern cases an express statutory declaration . . . ." Karl Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition: Deciding Appeals 488 (1960).

voir(e) dire, n., meaning literally "to speak the truth," is a LAW FRENCH equivalent of the Latinate verdict (voir having been the Norman-French word for the modern French vrai). But the two words have come to denote two distinct aspects of jury trials. The preferred spelling is voir dire. It is pronounced /vwah-deer/, or, in the southern U.S., /vohr-dir/. See verdict (A) & PRONUNCIATION (A).

voir dire, v.t., is a lawyer's colloquialism not listed in general English-language dictionaries. E.g., "When I voir dired the jury, I asked each prospective juror whether he could set his prejudices aside." John A. Jenkins, The Litigators 379 (1989) (quoting Rex Carr)./ "Some lawyers take voluminous notes as the panel is voir dired and pore over them intently as they strike their lists." Among the possible substitutes are the verbs to examine and to question (on voir dire). See NOUNS AS VERBS volenti non fit injuria (lit., "to a willing person a wrong is not done") denotes the tort defense that the plaintiff voluntarily accepted the risk with full knowledge. The LATINISM is gradually falling into disuse in AmE, though it is still used with great frequency in BrE, in which it is sometimes said that the injured person was volens.

The Fifth Circuit once wrote what amounts to a usage note on the phrase: "[T]he joint appellants claim that . . . Mobil was not liable to Gantt under the Texas doctrine of assumption of risk (usually referred to by Texas lawyers and courts in its Latin form, 'volenti non fit injuria,' or 'volenti' for short)." Gantt v. Mobil Chem. Co., 463 F.2d 691, 699 (5th Cir. 1972). True, the clipped form volenti is fairly common, but in Texas judicial opinions, assumption of the risk (q.v.) is more than four times as common as the LATINISM in any form.

volitional; volitive. Volitional = of or belonging to volition (i.e., an act of willing or resolving); pertaining to the action of willing. E.g., "A change in a given relation may result from some superadded fact or group of facts not under the volitional control of a human being." Volitive is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

voracious (= devouring large quantities of food) is sometimes misused for vigorous. Perhaps the confusion arose through the CLICHÉ voracious reader, in which many seem to have forgotten the metaphor of devouring. With reading (which involves mental ingestion), the metaphor works; with other activities in which the idea of consuming is absent, the metaphor flops—e.g. "From the start, McCurley's team—which included his lawyer wife, Johanna, two associate attorneys, and a paralegal—attacked voraciously [read vigorously]. Dozens of depositions were taken, tens of thousands of documents assembled. Expert and character witnesses were flown in from around the country. At times McCurley and his crew worked in shifts, sixteen to twenty hours a day." Dana Rubin, Courting Costs, Tex. Monthly, May 1992, at 52, 58.

voracity. See MALAPROPISMS.

votary; votarist. The latter is a NEEDLESS VARIANT.

vote; ballot. These words "are sometimes confused, and, while they are sometimes used synonymously, the 'ballot' is, in fact, under our form of voting, the instrument by which the voter expresses his choice between candidates or in respect to propositions; and his 'vote' is his choice or election, as expressed by his ballot." Clary v. Hurst, 138 S.W. 566, 569 (Tex. 1911).

For the distinction between a juror's vote and a jury's verdict, see verdict (C).

vote damages, in AmE, is the lawyer's shorthand phrase for vote to award damages—e.g.: "An insurance functionary—a guy with a big title and a small salary—loves to go back to the office and write a memo telling his boss that he 'did the right thing' and refused [as a juror] to vote damages." Joseph Goulden, The Million Dollar Lawyers 71 (1978) (quoting Franklin Jones, Jr.).

vouch, in modern lay contexts, almost invariably means "to answer for, be surety for" <she vouched for him> <vouched for his honesty>. Archaically, vouch = to call upon, rely on, or cite as authority; to confirm by evidence or assertion. E.g., "Jhering, emphasizing the effect of trade and commerce in liberalizing the strict law, vouched the introducing of Greek mercantile custom into the law of the old city of Rome." (Roscoe Pound) This sense appears to be an extension of the obsolete legal phrase to vouch to warrant, meaning "to cite, call, or summon (a person) into court to give warranty of title" (OED).

vouchsafe is not equivalent to grant or provide, as suggested here: "A person is entitled to the actual and continued enjoyment of his civil rights as vouchsafed by the statute, and these cannot be permanently thwarted by some other avenue of escape." Rather, today it ordinarily denotes "to grant something in a condescending way," or, more neutrally, "to grant something as a special favor." E.g., "[T]he Court does not vouchsafe the lower courts . . . guidelines for formulating specific, definite, wholly unprecedented remedies . . . ." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 267 (1962) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

VOWEL CLUSTERS are not indigenous to the English language, although one finds them in our imported vocabulary, in words such as giaour (= one outside the Muslim faith), maieutic (= Socratic), moueing (= making a pouting face), onomatopoeia (= the use of imitative or echoic words, such as fizz and buzz), queuing (AmE) or queueing (BrE). In forming NEOLOGISMS, esp. by agglutination, one should be wary of clumping vowels together in a way that would strike readers as un-English. Even three consecutive vowels may have this effect, as in antiaircraft, which is better hyphenated: anti-aircraft.

wafer, in law, is a small red piece of paper that is stuck on a document under seal—in place of a wax seal. Traditionally, the signer of the document, after signing, would touch the wafer with his or her finger. See seal (A).

waifs and (e)strays. This legal phrase has passed into common parlance in the sense "abandoned or neglected children," which is an extension of the original sense "unclaimed property; wandering animals." In lay usage, the second element is usually strays. Technically, waifs came to mean, at common law, things stolen and thrown away by the thief in flight, but not things left behind or hidden; they belonged to the Crown by prerogative right if they had been seized on its behalf (OCL). Estrays, q.v., = valuable tame animals, found wandering and ownerless; at common law, they belonged to the Crown or, by virtue of grant or prescriptive right, to the lord of the manor (id.).

waivable, a word supported in the OED with but one citation from 1818, is common in modern legal contexts—e.g.: "The defects which were not waivable under either system were: want of jurisdiction over the subject matter, failure to state a cause of action, and lack of an indispensable party." Fleming James, Civil Practice §4.3, at 135 (1965)./ "The distinction between subject-matter jurisdiction and waivable defenses is not a mere nicety of legal metaphysics." U.S. Catholic Conference v. Abortion Rights Mobilization, Inc., 487 U.S. 72, 77 (1988).

The noun waivability is likewise common, though it appears in none of the general English-language dictionaries. E.g., "Can finding of waiver of unionized employee's state civil rights and privacy law claims be predicated on federal court's mere assumption of waivability?" Labor, 57 U.S.L.W. 3727, 3727 (2 May 1989)./ "[T]he second [topic] involv[es] the nature and waivability of the Workers' Compensation defense." Robert A. Barker, Collateral Estoppel, N.Y.L.J., 23 April 1990, at 3.

waive. A. Narrowing of Sense. This word has undergone what linguists call "specialization," its primary sense having gotten narrower with time. Originally, waive was just as broad as abandon. In general usage today, waive means "to relinquish something that one has the right to expect"

<to waive the formalities>. And in legal usage, the word ordinarily means "to relinquish a legal right" <the company waived that defense>.

B. For wave. Waive (= to relinquish or abandon voluntarily) is sometimes used as a MALAPROPISM for wave (= to move to and fro with the hand)—e.g.: "But a new bidder—the Blockbuster Bowl, sponsored by the video store chain—threw the deal into doubt by waiving [read waving] a few extra dollars before the noses of our institutions of higher learning . . . ." Frederick C. Klein, Who Cares Who's No. 1? Wall St. J., 3 Jan. 1992, at A5. Cf waiver (D). waiver. A. Senses. Waiver = (1) the voluntary relinquishment or abandonment of a legal right or advantage <waiver of immunity>; or (2) the instrument by which a person relinquishes such a right or advantage <she signed the waiver>.

B. Imprecise Uses. Waiver is "an imprecise and generic term" when used, for example, to describe the action of a landlord who decides not to forfeit a lease that a tenant has breached, but the word is "used in many of the leading cases." Peter Butt, Land Law 284 (2d ed. 1988). Sometimes the word is used vaguely as a synonym for laches, esp. when a lien claimant has lost the lien by delay. As leading admiralty scholars put it, when "a lien has attached at the time . . . services were furnished, waiver, unless it refers to an express agreement by which the lienor releases his claim against the ship, seems to be merely a word [that] some judges like to use for stylistic effect, by itself or in double harness with its more industrious companion laches." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 786 (2d ed. 1975). Finally, waiver is sometimes confused with estoppel, q.v., but the words are quite "incorrectly regarded as synonymous." Thomas N. Carlton Estate, Inc. v. Keller, 52 So. 2d 131, 132–33 (Fla. 1951).

C. And estoppel. Waiver = the voluntary relinquishment of a known right. Estoppel = the legal abatement of somebody's rights and privileges when it would be inequitable to allow that person to assert them. Though the distinction is a fine one (and a frequently muddled one), it is worth carefully observing. In insurance law, for example, "[w]aiver arises by the act of one party; estoppel by operation of law. Waiver depends upon knowledge of the insurer; estoppel upon a prejudicial change of position by the insured. While they may coexist, they are not identical . . . . The term estoppel is broader than that of waiver, and may embrace it within its scope, in certain instances, since an insurer, after waiving certain rights, would be estopped thereafter to assert them. The converse is not true, as an estoppel need not be founded upon a waiver." 16B John A. Appleman & Jean Appleman, Insurance Law and Practice § 9081, at 497 (1981).

D. For waver. It is a MALAPROPISM to confuse waiver with waver (= to vacillate)—e.g.: "Mayor Koch . . . waivered [read wavered] between silence and support for months." Bess Myerson Accused of Stealing $44 in Goods, N.Y. Times, 28 May 1988, at 9./ "The Court has never waivered [read wavered] on this point." U.S. v. Bates, 917 F.2d 388, 395 n.10 (9th Cir. 1990)./ "[T]he firm—and Klein and Farr in particular—waivered [read wavered] over whether to embrace faster growth." Eleanor Kerlow, Small Is No Longer Beautiful, Legal Times, 27 May 1991, at 1.

E. For waive. When waiver is not misused for waver, it is often displacing the more straightforward verb waive—e.g.: "While none have been approved by EPA, the three 'tertiary' ethers are chemically similar to MTBE and would probably be waivered [read waived] by the EPA." George H. Unzelman, U.S. Clean Air Act Expands Role for Oxygenates, Oil & Gas J., 15 April 1991, at 44, 47–48.

waiver by estoppel. This phrase is a useless jumble: "[W]e feel that the term waiver by estoppel is confusing and tends to blur the useful distinction between waiver and estoppel. The waiver by estoppel term in our previous cases has always been applied in estoppel situations and should be understood to refer to estoppel and not waiver." Reed v. Commercial Ins. Co., 432 P.2d 691, 692 (Or. 1967). For the distinction between waiver and estoppel, see waiver (C).

waive the tort. Many lawyers have heard this idiom but are unsure of its origin and meaning. In common-law pleading, a plaintiff often had the choice of framing a cause of action in contract or in tort. One who chose to sue in contract was said to waive the tort.

Actually, though, waiver of tort is a misnomer because a party "waives" the tort only in the sense of electing to sue in quasi-contract to recover the defendant's unjust benefit instead of suing in tort to recover damages. The remedies, in other words, are in the alternative. And, even when the plaintiff elects to sue in quasi-contract, "the tort is not extinguished. Indeed it is said that it is a sine qua non of both remedies that [the plaintiff] should establish that a tort has been committed." Lord Goff of Chieveley & Gareth Jones, The Law of Restitution 605 (3d ed. 1986).

waivor; waivee. These terms are surely needless, waivor being particularly susceptible of confusion with waiver. E.g., "[A] waiver of one misrepresentation does not constitute a waiver of another when the 'waivor' [read waiving party] had no reason to believe the second representation was also false." Housour v. Prudential Life Ins. Co., 136 N.W.2d 689, 691 (Mich. Ct. App. 1965)./ "[A] valid waiver requires a known legal right, relinquished for consideration, where such legal right is intended for the waivor's [read waiving party's] sole benefit and does not infringe on the rights of others." Brannock v. Brannock, 722 P.2d 636, 637 (N.M. 1986).

wake; awake; awaken; wake up; woke; waked; waked up; woke up; awakened; awaked; awoke. The past-tense and past-participial forms of wake and its various siblings are perhaps the most vexing in the language. Following are the preferred declensions:

wake > woke > waked (or woken) awake > awoke > awaked (or awoken) awaken > awakened > awakened wake up > woke up > waked up wane; wax. Wane = to decrease in strength or importance. E.g., "The aspect of Lochner that curtailed economic regulation has clearly waned since the 1930s."/ "The imperative of a predeprivation hearing wanes when impractical, as in a negligent tort situation." Wax (= [1] to increase in strength or importance, or [2] to become) is used primarily (in sense (2)) in clichés such as to wax poetic, eloquent, etc., or (in sense (1)) as a correlative of wane <the doctrine waxed and waned>.

wangle. See wrangle.

want, n., (= lack) is an especially formal word, sometimes used in literary contexts but frequently in legal writing <want of prosecution>. E.g., "The district court dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction, and this court reversed."/ "Want of probable cause and malice are seldom established by direct evidence of an ulterior motive." The participial wanting (= lacking) also appears often in legal prose: "We first consider the appellee's contention that federal jurisdiction is wanting."/ "Authority on these points is wanting." (Eng.)

wanton; reckless. The word wanton usu. denotes a greater degree of culpability than reckless. A reckless person is generally fully aware of the risks and may even be trying and hoping to avoid harm. A wanton person may be risking no more harm than the reckless person, but he or she is not trying to avoid the harm and is indifferent about whether it results. In criminal law, wanton usually connotes malice, but reckless does not. See malice.

ward has two primary legal senses today: (1) "a territorial division in a city, usu. defined for purposes of city government" <ward leader>; or (2) "a person—usu. a minor—who is under a guardian's charge or protection" . Though these meanings are seemingly unrelated, the term ward originally meant "guard"—hence sense (1) refers to a place to be guarded and sense (2) to a person to be guarded.

-WARD(S). In AmE, the preferred practice is to use the -ward form of directional words, as in toward, forward, backward, westward. Words in -ward may be either adjectives or adverbs, whereas words in -wards, common in BrE, may be adverbs only. See toward(s).

warehousemen. See SEXISM (B) warning of caveat (= a notice given to a person who has entered a caveat warning him to appear and state what his interest is) is a curious but established REDUNDANCY. See caveat.

warrant, n., = (1) a writ directing or authorizing someone to do an act—esp. one directing a law enforcer to make an arrest, a search, or a seizure; or (2) a document conferring authority, esp. to pay or receive money. Sense (2) is often used figuratively—e.g.: "What warrant then had our four new judges for hoping that history would reject these rival claimants and confirm the Supreme Court's constitutional prerogative?" Robert G. McCloskey, The American Supreme Court 11 (1960).

warrant, v.t. A. General Usage. Today, warrant most commonly means "to justify." And in modern idiom, one naturally says that objects or actions are warranted, but not so naturally that people are warranted. Therefore, "Such a conclusion warrants federal judges in substituting their views for those of state legislators," reads better this way: Such a conclusion warrants federal judges' substituting their views for those of state legislators. To illustrate this point, we might say that acts or beliefs are warranted or unwarranted, but not that actors or believers are warranted or unwarranted.

Nevertheless, the OED contains examples of warrant used with personal objects from the 17th century, and the usage remains common in law, if not elsewhere. E.g., "The facts and circumstances must have been sufficient in themselves to war- rant a man of reasonable caution in the belief that an offense has been or is being committed."

B. Legal Senses. In law, warrant may mean (1) "to guarantee the security of (realty or personalty, or even a person)" <the company will warrant him from any harm>; (2) "to give warranty of (title), to give warranty of title to (a person)" <the third party had warranted title>; or (3) "to authorize" <Who has warranted this search?>. In senses (1) and (2), the verb to warrant is closely connected with the noun warranty. Sometimes, however, lawyers use the word warrant loosely—esp. in contracts—by stating, for example, that a party warrants something when no warranty is intended; in modern usage, if a mere promise is intended, as opposed to a warranty, then warrant is the wrong word. See justify.

warranted (= authorized by a search warrant) is common in American legal writing. Warranted has had the sense "furnished with a legal or official warrant" (OED) since the mid-18th century. E.g., "[C]ourts have upheld the use of forceful breaking and entering where necessary to effect a warranted search, even though the warrant gave no indication that force had been contemplated." Dalia v. U.S., 441 U.S. 238, 257 n.19 (1979)./ "The evidence found during the warranted search showed overwhelmingly that Lennick was growing marijuana in his home." U.S. v. Lennick, 18 F.3d 814, 818 (9th Cir. 1994).

The antonym of warranted in this sense is warrantless, not unwarranted (= unjustified). See warrantless.

warrantee—properly, the person to whom a warranty is given—is sometimes incorrectly used in place of warranty. The OED cites two examples of this misusage. See guarantee (A).

warranter. See warrantor.

warrantless = (1) without a warrant ; or (2) unjustified <completely warrantless accusations>.

warrantor, warranter. The former spelling is preferred.

warranty. A. General Senses. "The word warranty is multivocal throughout the law . . . ." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 63 (2d ed. 1975). The word has three primary senses: (1) "[in property law] a covenant by which the grantor in a deed (a) binds himself or herself, as well as any heirs, to secure to the grantee the estate conveyed in the deed, and (b) pledges to compensate the grantee with other land of equivalent value if the grantee is evicted by someone possessing paramount title"; (2) "[in contract law] an express or implied undertaking by the seller of property that it is or will be as represented or promised to be"; or (3) "[in insurance law] a pledge or stipulation by the insured that the facts relating to the person insured, the thing insured, or the risk insured are as stated.

B. And condition. In modern usage, a contractual promise may be a condition, a warranty, or an intermediate term. The breach of a condition gives the innocent party the option of treating the entire contract as discharged, while a breach of a warranty (or covenant) merely entitles the innocent party to claim damages but does not discharge that party's remaining contractual duties. This distinction in terminology arose fairly recently: in older cases, warranty is often used to refer to any contractual term. Because the terms condition and warranty are often loosely used, courts often face difficult questions about whether the parties to a contract intended a term to be a condition or a warranty; such questions are answerable by resort either to express language or to inferences about the importance that the parties seem to have attached to a given term. See condition (A).

C. And guarantee. See guarantee (A).

wastage, as Gowers has noted, "is properly used of loss caused by wastefulness, decay, leakage, etc., or, in a staff, by death or resignation. It would be well if it were confined to this meaning instead of being used, as it habitually is, as a long variant of waste" (MEU2 688).

waste, as a legal term of art, carries the sense "permanent harm to real property committed by a tenant (for life or for years) to the prejudice of the heir, the reversioner, or the remainderman." E.g., "[I]t is the tenant's obligation to replace broken windows and to take other steps to preserve the premises from dilapidation. While a tenant may make repairs, he is not permitted to make any material change in the nature and character of the building leased. The making of such a material change is called waste." Robert Kratovil, Real Estate Law 300 (1946; repr. 1950). The usual legal phrase is to commit waste. See devastavit.

Waste comes in a variety of types (listed here in order of commonness):

- Commissive waste (known also as voluntary waste) is caused by the affirmative acts of the tenant.
- Permissive waste is caused by the failure of the tenant to make necessary repairs that would prevent deterioration and decay. (A life tenant, as opposed to a tenant for years, is not generally liable for permissive waste unless the instrument creating the tenancy imposes a duty to repair.)

- Equitable waste is caused by an exempt life tenant (see just above) who flagrantly destroys or damages the property.
- Ameliorating waste (BrE) occurs when a tenant improves the land, as by building a high rise on it. "Understandably," as the leading Australian authority puts it, "remaindermen and reversioners rarely complain about ameliorating waste." Peter Butt, Land Law 115 (2d ed. 1988). In the U.S., ameliorating waste is no waste at all.

ways and means is—by virtue of the Ways and Means Committee in the U.S. House of Representatives and the House of Lords—a DOUBLET of unimpeachable credentials when used in reference to such a committee, which determines how money will be raised for various governmental projects. The phrase appears in some important 18th-century documents—e.g.: "[The States] have no right to question the propriety of the demand; no discretion beyond that of devising the ways and means of furnishing the sums demanded." The Federalist No. 30, at 189 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961). Of course, in modern contexts divorced from historical discussions, ways and means is an inexcusable REDUNDANCY way which, unseparated by a comma, is erroneous for way in which. E.g., "One of the ways which [read ways in which] the consignor may protect his interests is by filing under Article 9 pursuant to section 2-326(3)(c)." But in sentences that, like that one, contain relative clauses, it is idiomatic to use that in place of in which—or even to omit the relative pronoun altogether. This usage is colloquial—e.g.: "One of the ways the consignor may protect the interest . . . ."

wear and tear. In the context of leases, the phrase wear and tear—a "reduplicative phrase," as linguists call it—includes not only the action of the weather but also the normal use of property. A tenant is not liable to replace a carpet that becomes dingy from normal use during the tenancy—but a spilled bottle of black ink is another matter. The phrase is usually preceded by a synonym, for good measure: normal wear and tear, reasonable wear and tear, and fair wear and tear are generally synonymous.

we are persuaded that is often just so much verbal baggage in judicial opinions. E.g., "We are persuaded that the principles announced in Tabacalera and Maltina are dispositive here." The sentence becomes much more forceful if the phrase is deleted: "The principles announced in Tabacalera and Maltina are dispositive here." See persuade & FLOTSAM PHRASES.

WEASEL WORDS. Theodore Roosevelt said, in a speech in St. Louis, May 31, 1916: "One of our defects as a nation is a tendency to use what have been called weasel words. When a weasel sucks eggs it sucks the meat out of the egg and leaves it an empty shell. If you use a weasel word after another there is nothing left of the other." Some writers have incorrectly assumed that the metaphor suggested itself because of the wriggling, evasive character of the weasel. In any event, sensitive writers are aware of how supposed intensives (for example very, q.v.) actually have the effect of weakening a statement. Many other words merely have the effect of rendering uncertain or toothless the statements in which they appear. Among these are significantly, substantially, reasonable, meaningful, compelling, undue, clearly, obviously, manifestly, if practicable, with all deliberate speed (orig. a weasel phrase, now with a history), all reasonable means, or as soon thereafter as may be, rather, somewhat, duly, virtually, and quite. See clearly. Cf. FUDGE WORDS

wed. A. Past Tense and Past Participle. Wedded is the preferred past-participial form, but wed often edges it out—e.g.: "Last year, the singer [Dan Fogelberg] wed [read wedded] his longtime fiancée, Anastasia Savage, who shares his love of oil painting." Walter Scott, Personality Parade, Dallas Morning News (Parade Mag.), 3 Jan. 1993, at 4./ "In February 1951, we wed [read wedded] women we had met at college . . . ." Walter Goodman, In Business for Profit; Imagine That! N.Y. Times, 16 Oct. 1994, § 7, at 9. In the negative, the proper adjective is unwed <unwed mothers>.

B. Wrongly Referring to the State of Matrimony. The verb wed refers to an act, not to a state—to what happens during a wedding, not to what one is afterward: "[T]hat purchase occurred during the interval in which we were legally wed [read married] . . . ." Larry Wallberg, "Marital Property": Divvying Up Those Intangibles, Wall St. J., 23 Oct. 1990, at A16. Married, by contrast, contains just the ambiguity that the writer just quoted fell into; to say, "I was married last Saturday," may mean either that the wedding took place then or that a divorce has since occurred.

C. Figurative Uses. Wed is often used metaphorically in American legal prose for adopt or endorse. E.g., "But, though our Supreme Court has not yet wedded this new doctrine, it has certainly at least paid ardent courtship."

welcher. See welsher.

well, when forming an adjective with a past participial verb, is hyphenated when placed before the noun (e.g., a well-known person, a well-written book), but is not hyphenated when the phrase follows what it modifies (e.g., a person who is well known, a book that is well written). See ADJECTIVES (C).

well-being is hyphenated, not spelled as one word.

well-pleaded complaint; artful pleading. Although these terms may seem related, they are used very differently. A well-pleaded complaint is an original or initial claim that sufficiently sets forth a claim for relief, by including the grounds for the court's jurisdiction, the basis for the relief claimed, and a demand for judgment, so that a defendant may draft an answer that is truly responsive on the issues to be decided.

Artful pleading, by contrast, is a derogatory term referring to a plaintiff's disguising a federal claim as if it were solely a state claim in order to prevent a defendant from removing the case from state court to federal court well-settled, a CLICHÉ, is usually inferior to settled in reference to points of law, because, unfortunately, most legal writers use the one for the other undiscriminatingly. See WEASEL WORDS.

welsher; welcher. The former is usual; the term means "one who shirks his or her responsibility in a joint undertaking," and most commonly refers to one who does not pay gambling debts.

Many natives of Wales consider the word insulting, though there is no etymological evidence supporting a connection with Welsh (= of, relating to, or hailing from Wales). Even so, the popular mind makes this connection, and the careful writer must be heedful.

westerly. To denote something stationary, the term should be west boundary; to denote something moving, westerly direction. See DIRECTIONAL WORDS we the people. See SET PHRASES.

wharf. Pl. wharves.

what. Eric Partridge took the view that what, as the subject of a clause, takes a singular verb no matter what follows (not what follow). See Usage and Abusage 362 (5th ed. 1981). But good usage allows more variety than this straitjacketing advice: when used as a pronoun, what may be either singular or plural. The possibilities are several.

A. Singular what in the Noun Clause Followed by a Singular Predicate Noun. This construction is the easiest: what (= the thing that) takes a singular verb. E.g., "What the legal system needs is an apprentice system to ensure that every young lawyer has a mentor."

B. Singular what in the Noun Clause Followed by a Plural Predicate Noun. In this construction, as in (A), what = the thing that—but the main verb is (illogically) attracted to the plural noun that follows it. E.g., "But what worries restaurateurs more are customers like Eric Wyka." Molly O'Neill, Recession and Guilt Pare Dining Trade and Menus, N.Y. Times, 31 March 1991, at 1. Fowler would have recommended rewriting that sentence in this way: What worries restaurateurs more is customers like Eric Wyka. (See MEU2 at 691–92.) Either sentence would be correct, but O'Neill's original sentence typifies modern usage more than the revision.

C. Plural what in the Noun Clause Followed by a Plural Predicate Noun. In this construction, what = the things that. E.g., "What are in issue are propositions, not facts." 3 Charles F. Chamberlayne, The Modern Law of Evidence § 1718a, at 2216 (1912)./ "What the judge principally wants to hear are the relevant cases . . . ." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 163 (11th ed. 1982)./ "Ebullience and eccentricity are to be found on every page but what are harder to discover are the depths of the Hailsham character . . . ." John Mortimer, High Court Jester, Sunday Times, 8 July 1990, at 8-1.

D. Undetermined what Followed by a Plural Predicate Noun. In many contexts, what is the object in a noun clause; when that is so, the word is, in actual usage, plural three times as often as it is singular. The whats in this category are hard to resolve into a translated phrase, such as "things that" (a phrase that does not quite fit). E.g., "[T]he jury [will] award to the injured party what are called his damages." Edward T. Channing, Judicial Eloquence, in Lectures Read to the Seniors in Harvard College 98, 109 (1856; repr. [Dorothy I. Anderson & Waldo W. Braden eds.] 1968)./ "The Supreme Court case next discussed in the text is . . . the basic authority for turning what are essentially breach of contract claims into torts pro hac vice." Grant Gilmore & Charles L. Black, Jr., The Law of Admiralty 740 (2d ed. 1975).

whatever; whatsoever. As an intensive meaning "at all," whatsoever is an established idiom in AmE <he had no reason whatsoever>, though it is obsolescent in BrE. Still, many American stylists prefer the shorter word, whatever—e.g.: "We now consider whether plaintiff was entitled to recover any damages whatever for the death of his wife."/ "In such cases there are no circumstances whatever that would give the court jurisdiction." On phrases such as what nature soever, see TMESIS.

what it is, is. Sentences such as the following are much on the rise: "What this case really is, is a contest of equities, not between the carrier and a shipper, but between a subrogee of a carrier and that shipper."/ "What it is, and as such acknowledged by fame, is one of humanity's stablest and strongest artistic treasures." This stylistically poor construction, common in sloppy speech, has thus made its way into sloppy writing. Instead of using a what-clause, one should state the sense more directly: This case is really a contest of equities . . . ; it is, and is acknowledged to be, one of humanity's strongest artistic treasures.

whatsoever. See whatever.

when. See where (A).

when and as. See as and when & if and when.

whence (= from where; from which; from what source) is an especially FORMAL WORD that some readers consider stilted. Flesch prematurely called it "obsolete," perhaps to reinforce his absolute recommendation to use from where instead. See Rudolf Flesch, The ABC of Style: A Guide to Plain English 294 (1964; repr. 1966). But from where would hardly work in every context, and whence retains some vigor—e.g.: "If his method is to work at all, it must at least work in the sorts of economic cases whence it sprang." True, the writer might have said cases from which it sprang, but surely not cases from where it sprang.

From whence is technically a REDUNDANCY—because whence implies from—but the locution has appeared continually in the great writing from the 16th century to the 20th; for example, Shakespeare, Dryden, and Dickens all used the phrase. And from whence is less stilted than whence alone, which requires a greater literary knowledge for it to be immediately understandable. E.g., "They cast the body into the water from whence it could not be reclaimed." Some people object to this usage, however well established; no one would object to from which. See from hence & thence.

whenever. In legal drafting, this term is inferior to if or when—e.g.: "Whenever [read If or When] a deposition is taken at the instance of the government, or whenever [read if or when] a deposition is taken at the instance of a defendant who is unable to bear the expenses of the taking of the deposition, the court may direct . . . ." Fed. R. Crim. P. 15(b). See where (A).

where. A. And when. The best word in stating a circumstance to which a statement relates is either if or when, the word where being archaic and legalistic to nonlegal readers. Hence: "[W]here [read When] a person examines goods and subsequently makes an offer to buy or hire-purchase them, it may be an implied term of the offer that the goods should remain in substantially the same state in which they were when the offer was made." G.H. Treitel, The Law of Contract 43–44 (8th ed. 1991). But see where, as here.

One writer actually suggests a nuance between when and where, but actual usage has never reflected this distinction: "Where is used in cases where frequent occurrences of the event are contemplated. When is used when a single or rare occurrence of the event is contemplated." G.C. Thornton, Legislative Drafting 24–25 (2d ed. 1979). But the commentator's final words are sound: "If . . . is very often a better word because it is the word generally used to introduce a condition in ordinary everyday usage." Id. at 25.

B. For in which. In formal prose, where should not be used as a relative pronoun instead of as a locative. E.g., "Understanding the operation of equal protection in both of these situations, however, will facilitate an understanding of the equal protection clause in the very different situations where [read in which] it was meant to apply."/ "We agree that it is a situation where [read in which] the decedent's trustee would have an impossible burden of explaining how the accident happened if defendant himself could not explain it."/ "There are many cases where [read in which] as an incident to a judgment creditor's action the defendant has been required to convey to a representative of the court property outside the court's jurisdiction."

When a writer wants a relaxed tone, where may be more suitable. In the following example, the contraction I've might not comfortably fit in the same sentence as in which—hence where is justifiable: "I've deliberately chosen an example where [read in which] this unspeakable cluster did not stand out . . . ." Richard A. Lanham, Revising Prose 29 (1979). See case where & CASE REFERENCES (B).

C. Wrongly Used in Defining. Those who are unfamiliar with the art of defining terms often use where (or when) to create maladroit and ambiguous definitions. E.g., "A breach is where one party does not fulfill his obligation." [Read A breach is a party's failure to fulfill his obligation.]/ "Substantial performance is defined as where the performance meets the essential purpose of the contract." [Read Substantial performance is defined as performance that meets the essential purpose of the contract.] See is when.

whereabout(s). Whereabouts is the preferred form. (See thereabout(s).) This word may take a singular or a plural verb. E.g., "The whereabouts of these persons are [or is] unknown."

whereas. In the sense "given the fact that," whereas is the archetypal LEGALISM—it was formerly every lawyer's idea of how to begin a recital in a contract. The more modern drafting style is to use a heading such as Recitals or Background, followed by short declarative sentences, as opposed to the sometimes unceasing stream of independent clauses linked by semicolons and whereases.

One significant feature of these whereas clauses is that they usually have no legal effect: they are merely preliminary statements providing introductory background information before the binding promissory language.

Whereas also has a cluster of literary senses, namely "although; while on the one hand; on the contrary; but by contrast." Whereas the contractual use is legalistic, these literary uses are a part of the general writer's idiom—e.g.: "Whereas both his parents have black hair, he has blond."

One usage critic has stated: "Whereas sounds stuffy. In spite of the objections of some grammarians, the common word is now while." Rudolf Flesch, The ABC of Style 294 (1964). Yet whereas is better than while if the latter ambiguously suggests a time element—e.g.: "I developed the arguments and marshaled authorities, while [read whereas if the idea of simultaneity is absent] she wrote the brief itself." See while.

where, as here. This is a useful phrase—and one in which an editor would generally be ill-advised to change where to when—e.g.: "The general interpretive [read interpretative] principle . . . is of especial force where, as here, resort to legislative history is sought to support a result contrary to the statute's express terms." ACLU v. FCC, 823 F.2d 1554, 1568 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (emphasis omitted). But see where (A).

whereat is an old-fashioned word dating back to the 13th century. Still, it is best not used in modern writing, for where, a locative, includes the concept of "at." E.g., "The L.C.R.A. is correct in its brief at page 30, whereat [read where] it states that the quoted sections of Galveston City Co. are from appellants' brief." Cf. thereat.

whereby can be a useful word, though it is easily overworked. It means "by means of or by the agency of which, from which (as a source of information); according to which, in the matter of which" (OED). E.g., "There is a competing thought in the trust provision that permits the invasion of the trust corpus in case of an emergency whereby unusual and extraordinary expenditures are necessary for the support of the beneficiary's children."/ "The United States has brought suit for breach of a contract whereby defendants, it is said, agreed to buy from it 9599 twenty-five-pound boxes of raisins unfit for human consumption which could be converted to alcohol."

wherefor(e) = (1) for what? why? <Wherefore all this expense?>; (2) for which (preferably spelled wherefor) <he incurred the debt, the liability wherefor accrued more than two years ago>; (3) on account of which <the reason wherefore the accident occurred>; (4) therefore <Wherefore, premises considered, plaintiff prays . . . .>; or (5) the cause or reason <the whys and wherefores of the situation>. In all but sense (2), the word is preferably spelled wherefore, but in none of these senses is the word wherefore particularly useful in modern writing. There are almost always more straightforward equivalents—e.g.: "The children alleged that when the father changed his will he was incompetent, wherefore it was alleged that [read and they therefore alleged that] the change of beneficiaries was null and void."/ "Defendant breached the contract, wherefore plaintiff suffered severe damages." [Read Defendant breached the contract; consequently, plaintiff suffered severe damages. Or: Because defendant breached the contract, plaintiff suffered severe damages.] Cf. HERE- AND THERE- WORDS.

whereof (= of what; of which) is a FORMAL WORD, perhaps an ARCHAISM <he knows not whereof he speaks>. The word is best avoided, esp. if, as in the following example, the writer does not seem to know precisely how it is used: "Is this company one of the directors whereof have a controlling interest therein?" What does that mean?

wheresoever is an unnecessary and archaic legalism for wherever. See whatever.

whereupon (= upon [the occurrence or occasion of] which; immediately after and as a result of which) may, by convention, begin a sentence, though it technically creates a FRAGMENT. E.g., "Plaintiff demurred to those pleas, and the court of original jurisdiction gave judgment for the defendant. Whereupon the plaintiff brought error . . . ." Christmas v. Russell, 72 U.S. (5 Wall.) 290, 306 (1866)./ "Willis replied over the phone that he had not received the acceptance. Whereupon Morrow said he was very glad of it, and would then withdraw his acceptance, to which Willis assented."

But good legal writers just as often use this FORMAL WORD in midsentence—e.g.: "[T]he general, naturally obeying his commander-in-chief instead of Taney, paid no attention to the writ; whereupon Taney quixotically ordered the general arrested for contempt of court." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 136 (1955). Cf. but & and.

wherewithal = means, esp. pecuniary means. Hence financial wherewithal is redundant—e.g.: "[F]ew, if any, local authorities . . . have the financial wherewithal [read wherewithal] to provide necessary expert regulation . . . ." Wisconsin Pub. Intervenor v. Mortier, 501 U.S. 597, 618 (1991) (Scalia, J., concurring).

whether usually directly follows the noun whose dilemma it denotes: decision whether, issue whether, question whether. (See question as to whether.) E.g., "Under Kansas law, the liability of a principal for the negligent acts of his agent is controlled by a determination as to whether [read determination whether], at the time in question, the agent was engaged in the furtherance of the principal's business."/ "This test was not very helpful since the determination of whether [read determination whether] the agreement was 'collateral' was also the conclusion sought to be shown." Regardless, an adverb, makes regardless of whether. See regardless whether.

A. As to whether. This collocation, though rarely defensible (see question (as to) whether), is here justified: "We are of the opinion that reasonable men might well reach different conclusions as to whether [i.e., on the question whether] the servant was within the area of probable deviation, and therefore within his employment, when the accident occurred."

B. Issue of whether. Though this phrase is generally better without the of (i.e., as issue whether), it has certain uses in which of is obligatory, usu. when issue is modified by an adjective. E.g., "A host of public-policy considerations must be weighed in resolving the threshold issue of whether such a remedy should be an addition to or a substitute for the liability imposed by our civil damages suit." See issue (B).

C. Whether or not. Despite the SUPERSTITION to the contrary, the words or not are usu. superfluous, since whether implies or not. E.g., "It remains to be seen whether or not [read whether] the special litigation committee will determine that the derivative suit should have been brought." The only context in which or not necessarily appears occurs when whether or not means "regardless of whether" <the meeting will go on whether or not it rains>.

D. And if. See if (A).

which. A. Which [+ noun]. This construction is somewhat outmoded and stilted, though occasionally it is useful to avoid an ambiguity. In these examples it is unnecessary: "The resolution was to award the contract to Ivey subject to the approval of the Public Housing Administration, which agency [read which] subsequently approved the acceptance."/ "S.I. enclosed a $20,000 check along with its acceptance, which check was deposited." [Read Along with its acceptance, S.I. enclosed a $20,000 check, which was deposited.]/ "The facts showed unconscionable delays in the treatment of appellant for his gunshot wounds, which delays amounted to an unconscionable denial of medical treatment. [Better: The facts showed that, when appellant was treated for gunshot wounds, there were unconscionable delays, which amounted to an unconscionable denial of medical treatment.]

The which [+ noun] construction is defensible only if which is necessarily separated from its antecedent by a phrase—i.e., it overcomes the difficulty presented by the REMOTE RELATIVE. But which [+ noun] should never, as in the following sentence, directly follow its antecedent: "SEC sanctions can be imposed only after affording the respondent a notice of and an opportunity for a hearing, which hearing must comply with the hearing provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act." [Read Only after the respondent is afforded a notice of and an opportunity for a hearing, which must comply with the hearing provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act, can SEC sanctions be imposed.]

B. The Overeager which. One must be certain, before introducing a subordinate clause with which, that this word has a clear antecedent.

Often writers actually put the which-clause before the antecedent. E.g., "Once again, this Court is called upon to apply the law of New York to the issue of damages if it finds (which appellant vigorously urges would be an incorrect finding) that appellant is liable for breach of contract." [Read Once again, this Court is called upon to apply New York law to the issue of damages if it finds that appellant is liable for breach of contract, a finding that appellant vigorously urges would be incorrect.] See ANTICIPATORY REFERENCE.

C. And which, or which, and but which. These constructions often signal trouble, for there is only one quite limited context in which any of them can be proper. Each must follow a primary which-clause, with which it is parallel, not left floating at the end of a sentence without a shore in sight, as in the following sentence:

> The offer and sale of the certificates of deposit pursuant to the plan shall be conducted in such a manner as to be a separate, distinct offering not integrated with any related offer and sale of similar instruments pursuant to any subsequent pool or plan and the organizers shall not otherwise enter into subsequent transactions within a time period, or which otherwise satisfy the factual criteria set forth above, with the result that they might be integrated with offerings made pursuant to the plan.

To edit that sentence, one might break it into two sentences, neither having an overeager which:

> The offer and sale of the CD's under the plan must be conducted separately from any related offer and sale of similar instruments. In addition, the organizers may not, within a given period, either (a) engage in later transactions that satisfy the factual criteria set forth above, or (b) integrate the present offerings with later offerings under the same plan.

D. Without a Proper Antecedent. Grammarians have termed this mistake "broad reference": which refers to a general idea or an entire statement rather than to a specific antecedent. This fault should be carefully avoided. E.g., "Plaintiff is compelled to call the police department, after which the keys are returned." [Read Plaintiff is compelled to call the police, and only then are the keys returned.]/ "But the Saudi authorities refused to accept the animals, claiming they were diseased, which [read a charge] Australia denied." Richard Ellis, Sheep Trapped on Death Trip, Sunday Times, 15 Oct. 1989, at A2.

E. Wrongly Elided. E.g., "This is to advise you that as long as you continue to use the premises for the purposes [insert for which] you are now using them, namely, for sawmill and lumber yard purposes, and pay the rentals, your possession will not be disturbed."

F. In Rhetorical Disclaimers for and. E.g., "If surrogate motherhood is to be considered legally acceptable in this country (which [read and] I think it should not be), then state legislatures must act to legalize the contracts drawn up for these arrangements."/ "Even if it could be considered error, which [read and] this court does not consider it so, it would be harmless error."

G. And that. See RESTRICTIVE AND NONRESTRICTIVE CLAUSES

H. The Remote which. See REMOTE RELATIVES

while for although or whereas is permissible and often all but necessary, despite what purists say about the word's inherent temporality. Though while is a more relaxed and conversational term than although or whereas, it is usually quite at home in formal contexts. E.g., "While in form our law is chiefly the work of judges, in great part judges simply put the guinea stamp of the state's authority upon propositions [that] they found worked out for them in advance." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 138 (1938)/ "It is settled, too, that orders granting or denying a preliminary injunction are appealable, while similar orders involving a temporary restraining order are not." Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts 708 (4th ed. 1983). See whereas.

The writer who uses while in this way should be on guard for ambiguities. For instance, does it denote time or concession in the following sentences? "While [read Although or During the time when?] the police were waiting beside the house, they did not hear the burglars enter."/ "While [read Although or During the time when?] the mall was open to the public, its policy was not to permit any visitor to engage in publicly expressive activities."

While should not be used merely for and. "He is a lawyer while she is a doctor." [Read He is a lawyer and she is a doctor.] Sometimes this sloppy usage leads to preposterous statements—e.g.: "Len Hickman delivered the opening statement while Jim Bethell made the closing argument."

while at the same time is a common REDUNDANCY—e.g.: "While the husband was creating joint tenancies for the benefit of his daughters, he was at the same time [omit at the same time] building up the value of the farm chattels."/ "Motivate them to keep selling the company while at the same time [read while] taking credit for their particular accomplishment." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 194 (1984).

while away; wile away. The phrase while away (= to spend [time] idly) dates from the early 17th century and remains the predominant form. Wile away, a synonymous phrase dating from about 1800, began as a corrupt form but is included in modern dictionaries such as W10 and AHD without any cautionary note. Most commonly, of course, wile is a noun meaning "a stratagem intended to deceive" or "trickery"; it may also function as a verb in the corresponding sense "to lure or intice." However old the mistaken form wile away is—and never mind that Charles Dickens used it—it is still inferior to while away. E.g., "Pizzas were ordered and the boys wiled [read whiled] away the time by examining defendant's unloaded guns." Dino v. State, 405 So. 2d 213, 214 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1981)./ "Before Kim Peek saw Rain Man, the 1988 award-winning movie loosely based on his life, he stayed home and wiled [read whiled] away the time working and reading books." Rhonda Smith, Into the World, Austin American-Statesman, 28 April 1994, at D1.

whilom. See erstwhile.

whilst, though a correct form, is virtually obsolete in AmE and reeks of pretension in a modern American writer. Whilst is still common in BrE, however. E.g., "Defendant, knowing the premises, maliciously intended to injure plaintiff as lessee and manager of the theatre whilst the agreement with Wagner was in force." (Eng.)/ "The plaintiff's loss would have been only £5 plus a further £11 as his estimated loss through two months' deprivation of a vehicle whilst it was being repaired and a purchaser found." (Aus.)

Like its sibling while, it may be used for although or whereas, although this is not good usage in AmE. E.g., "The jurisprudence of this state is to the effect that whilst it is the rule that costs in a suit follow the judgment before execution, it is likewise the rule that after execution has taken place the question of costs comes before the appellate court as an independent issue."/ "Whilst, therefore, the end of the writing in point of space may be taken as the end of the disposition, it does not follow that in all cases the signature must, of necessity, be there written." For amongst, see among (A).

whistleblower (= an informant) is best written as one word, as the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1989 (U.S.).

Whiteacre is the mythical tract of land contrasted with Blackacre in hypothetical legal problems. E.g., "Let it be assumed, further, that, in consideration of $100 actually paid by A to B, the latter agrees with A never to enter on X's land, Whiteacre." (Hohfeld) See Blackacre.

White Book = the two-volume compilation—published in white hardcover editions—of the procedural and administrative rules of the Supreme Court of England and Wales. Cf. White Paper.

whitehorse case; horse case; gray mule case; goose case; spotted pony case; pony case. These are terms meaning "a reported case with virtually identical facts, the disposition of which should determine the outcome of the instant case." The terms are now less commonly used in the law schools than formerly; but they are useful terms. E.g., "The decision mentioned is rather a 'white horse' case . . . ." Roosth & Genecov Prod. Co. v. White, 262 S.W.2d 99, 101 (Tex. 1953).

Goose case is common in the southern U.S., esp. in Louisiana. Cf. on all fours.

White Paper; Green Paper. In British governmental affairs, a White Paper announces a firm government policy to be implemented (cf. White Book). A Green Paper announces a tentative proposal for discussion.

white-powder bar is a derogatory name for defense lawyers who represent cocaine dealers. E.g., "Neal R. Sonnett, the president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said such behavior was offensive to most trial lawyers, as was the term 'white-powder bar.' 'There's no such thing as a 'white-powder bar,' he said. 'It's a very pejorative term.'" Neil A. Lewis, Drug Lawyers' Quandary: Lure of Money vs. Ethics, N.Y. Times, 9 Feb. 1990, at A1, B11.

who. A. Who & whom. Edward Sapir, the philosopher of language, prophesied that "within a couple of hundred years from to-day not even the most learned jurist will be saying 'Whom did you see?' By that time the whom will be as delightfully archaic as the Elizabethan his for its. No logical or historical argument will avail to save this hapless whom." Edward Sapir, Language 156–57 (1921; repr. 1949). A safer bet might have been that no one will be spelling to-day with a hyphen. In any event, writers in the late 20th and early 21st centuries ought to understand how the words who and whom are correctly used.

The distinction to keep in mind is that who acts as the subject of a verb, whereas whom acts as the object of a verb or preposition. Though not commonly observed in informal speech, the distinction is one to be strictly followed in formal legal prose.

Some lapses are so flagrant that one can hardly fathom how they could have been committed. E.g., "The three top finishers on the bar exam were Beverly Ray, Michelle Monse, and Kenneth Buck, all of who [read all of whom] took our bar review course!" Others are more forgivable because the correct use is less obvious:

- "Boyer said she knew the person who [read whom] she identified as Roy Summers as 'Tiny's' brother . . . ." State v. Iwakiri, 682 P.2d 571, 593 (Idaho 1984).
- "And he [Judge Stephen G. Breyer, as nominee to the Supreme Court] promised, following the admonition of the late Justice Arthur Goldberg, who [read whom] he served as a law clerk 30 years ago, to do his best to avoid footnotes." Ruth Marcus, Judge Breyer Gets Day in Rose Garden, Wash. Post, 17 May 1994, at A8.
- "Holeman stated to witnesses that the nolle prosequi left him open for a lawsuit, and he went directly to the district attorney, whom [read who] he said looks after policemen." Smith v. Holeman, 441 S.E.2d 487, 492 (Ga. Ct. App. 1994).
- "At trial, Miller refused to testify unless the district court excluded four young African-American men whom [read who] she felt posed a threat to her personal safety." Feazell v. State, 906 P.2d 727, 728 (Nev. 1995).

Although whom might seem to be the object of reveal in the sentence that follows, in fact the relative pronoun is the subject of an implied verb—failed to reveal who [might have wanted to kill Robert Nachtsheim]. Therefore, who is correct: "There are a number of people who might have wanted to kill Robert Nachtsheim in his Minneapolis flower shop early one morning in 1973, but the intervening two decades have failed to reveal whom [read who]." Kevin Diaz, $4 Million Award's a Start Toward a Clean Slate, Star Tribune (Minneapolis), 22 Oct. 1994, at 1A.

Many writers have announced the demise of whom, but it persists—especially in AmE. Who would be impossible, for example, in this sentence: "If the person on whom the duty of electing rests elects te take in conformity with the will or other instrument of donation, he thereby relinquishes his own property, and must release or convey it to the donee upon whom the instrument had assumed to confer it." And, in formal writing, the following instances of whom seem natural:

- "Proprietors of private enterprises, such as places of amusement and resort, were under no such obligation, enjoying an absolute power to serve whomever they pleased."
- "It will not restrain the person whom it purports to restrain, namely, the litigious troublemaker."
- "A fundamental principle of our representative democracy is, in Hamilton's words, 'that the people should choose whom they please to govern them.'"

The correct uses of who are sometimes tricky But if the pronoun acts as the subject of a clause, it must be who, never whom:

- "If the servant, without authority, entrusts the instrumentality to one who, on account of his age, inexperience, or recklessness, he has reason to believe is likely to harm others, the master would be liable." (Who is the subject of is.)
- "It may, for instance, be negligent on the part of the employer to hire an employee who the employer should realize is unfit and poses a risk to others." (Who is the subject of is.)
- "An 'apparent agent' is one who the principal, either intentionally or else by lack of ordinary care, induces third persons to believe is his agent, even though no actual authority, either express or implied, has been granted to such agent." (Again, who is the subject of is, but the sentence, though correct in this respect, is badly phrased.)

Among the toughest contexts in which to get the pronouns right are those involving linking verbs. We say, for example, who it is for the same reason we say It is I, but some very good writers have nodded—e.g.: "The distinguished political and social philosopher Russell Kirk used the word 'energumen' to describe . . . whom [read who] it is I agitate against . . . ." William F. Buckley, The Jeweler's Eye 284 (1969)./ "Trials on indictment are in the name of the Queen . . . ; thus a criminal case is generally called Reg. v. whomever [read whoever] it is . . . ." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 17 (11th ed. 1982). See HYPERCORRECTION (F).

William Safire takes an interesting approach for those caught between feeling pedantic (by using whom) or incorrect (by using who for whom): "When whom is correct, recast the sentence." On Language, N.Y. Times, 4 Oct. 1992, § 6, at 12. Thus Whom do you trust? becomes, in a political campaign, Which candidate do you trust? See PHRASING & NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES.

B. Placement of. In well-constructed sentences, who directly follows the name it refers to, or is interrupted at most by a parenthesis properly set off. Writers who violate this principle risk befuddling their readers—e.g.: "The largest collection of fossils was made by L. Kohl-Larson in 1938–1939, who also found a small fragment of hominid maxilla." [Read The largest collection of fossils was made in 1938–1939 by L. Kohl-Larson, who also found a small fragment of hominid maxilla.] See REMOTE RELATIVES

C. Improper Use in Reference to Nonhuman Entities (who for that or which). Who and that are the relative pronouns for human beings; that and which are the relative pronouns for anything other than human beings. But writers sometimes forget this elementary point—e.g.: "In this diversity action, we are called upon to decide whether a drawee bank who [read that] has missed the midnight deadline is accountable to the payee under a special set of circumstances."/ "Many companies, I believe, who [read that] are busy buying new businesses and bringing in new management teams haven't even tested the outside edge of their profitability." Mark H. McCormack, What They Don't Teach You at Harvard Business School 203 (1984).

D. Which for who or whom. This misuse—the opposite of that illustrated in (C)—occurs when writers use which in referring to human beings—e.g.: "There are 21 shareholders in the corporation, two of which [read whom] are vying for the chairmanship." (The correction assumes, as the context bears out, that the shareholders referred to in the sentence are persons, as opposed to corporations.)/ "Exhibit 9 names the client which [read whom or that] Kroeneke served."

The word that, of course, is permissible when referring to humans: the people that were present or the people who were present. Editors tend, however, to prefer the latter phrasing.

whom. See who (A).

whom(so)ever. See who(so)ever.

whoredom = (1) prostitution; or (2) idolatry.

who's; whose. The former is the contraction of who is; the latter is the possessive form of who. The two forms are occasionally confused, usually when who's erroneously displaces whose—e.g.: "At the very least, the burden of proof carried by one who would have rights cancelled should be greater than the burden of one who's [read whose] only purpose is to prevent a registration from issuing." Food Specialty Co. v. Catz Am. Co., 433 F.2d 817, 819 (C.C.P.A. 1970) (Baldwin, J., dissenting)./ "Mr. Hahn also identified $628.00 as cashed checks, who's [read whose] purpose was unknown." U.S. v. Curry, 681 F.2d 406, 413 n.16 (5th Cir. 1982).

whose may usefully refer to nonpersons <an idea whose time has come>. This use of whose, formerly decried by some 19th-century grammarians and their predecessors, is often an inescapable way of avoiding clumsiness. Which, unfortunately, has no other possessive form, apart from of which, an inaesthetic phrase in many contexts: "What is commonly termed ownership is in fact tenancy, the continuance of which [read whose continuance] is contingent upon legally recognized rights of tenure, with corresponding duties."

But whose in place of of which can lead to such problems as these: "One of those dealers was J & S Government Securities, Inc., whose home office was in New York, but who also had offices in Houston." (See ANTHROPOMORPHISM.) The sentence could be recast in myriad ways—e.g.: "which had its home office in New York, but offices in Houston as well." (In the corrected sentence, offices is a plural noun, not a verb. See office.) who(so)ever; whom(so)ever; whoso(ever); whomso(ever). A. Choice of Term. The forms whoever and whomever are preferred in modern writing. Users of whosoever and whomsoever, as well as who(m)so, are liable to criticism as LEGALESE, ARCHAISMS, and BIBLICAL AFFECTATION. Often these terms are completely superfluous, as here: "This is a right that avails against all persons whomsoever [omit whomsoever], and is distinguished from a right that avails against a particular individual or a determinate class of persons."

B. Case. The problem of proper case arises with these words, just as it does with who and whom. E.g., "Whomever is [read Whoever is] responsible for implementing the program is responsible for its faults." The Oxford Guide contains this rather poor advice. "Use whoever for the objective case as well as the subjective, rather than whomever, which is rather stilted" (135). Stilted, perhaps, but correct, and really not very stilted in formal prose. See NOMINATIVE AND OBJECTIVE CASES.

C. Possessives. Whoever's (colloquial) is incorrect (in formal prose) for whosever. "He denied telling appellant that she was going to jail, although he did admit saying that whoever's [read whosever] fingerprints were found in that vault could go to jail." Williams v. State, 441 So. 2d 653, 655 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1983)./ "[T]he detective in charge of the interrogation testified that prior to the interrogation he had had a conversation with the fingerprint expert in which both agreed to almost a hundred per cent certainty that whoever's [read whosever] finger prints were on one side of the door panel which had been removed, the palm prints matched because they were in perfect configuration." Commonwealth v. Haynes, 577 A.2d 564, 572 n.2 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1990).

Justice Holmes sometimes used whosesoever, a correct form made unnecessary by the modern preference of who(s)ever over who(se)soever.

wide; broad. The former, when used in contexts in which idiomatic English would require the latter, is a LEGALISM. E.g., "A public body has wide discretion in soliciting and accepting bids for public improvements." Baxter's Asphalt & Concrete, Inc. v. Department of Transp., 475 So. 2d 1284, 1287 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985)./ "The district court did not abuse its wide discretion." Wide is used more commonly in BrE in this sense—e.g.: "The terms of the order are too wide." (Eng.) widespread was, until the early 20th century, spelled as two words, but now it should always appear as one.

widespreadedly is a bastard formation. W3 records no adverbial form of the adjective widespread, although if there were one it would be widespreadly. E.g., "[A]n adherent to current American doctrine in the negligence field would hardly reject a principle already so widespreadly accepted by judges and other scholars alike." Hewitt v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 404 F.2d 1247, 1254 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

The form widespreadedly, malformed perhaps on the spurious analogy of allegedly and reportedly, wrongly assumes the existence of a past tense form spreaded. E.g., "[T]he area of public interest to which [the publications] relate—conditions allegedly capable of wide-spreadedly affecting public health—would seem . . . to be one of such inherent public concern and stake that there could be no possible question as to the applicability of the New York Times standard for any defeasance." United Medical Labs., Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting Sys., Inc., 404 F.2d 706, 711 (9th Cir. 1968). See -EDLY widow, n. The Supreme Court's phrase surviving widows who administer estates is a REDUNDANCY. See Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71, 75 (1971) (paraphrased). A widow who administers her deceased husband's estate must—by the very nature of the situation—have survived him.

widow, v.t., may apply to a spouse of either sex. Thus widowed man is unobjectionable, although to many it may seem at first unnatural.

widow(er). Is one still a widow(er) when one remarries? No.

wield; weald. Wield is the verb meaning "to control; handle; hold and use" <he wields his power with good judgment>. Its rare homophone, weald, is the noun meaning "a forest" or "an uncultivated upland region."

wigged; unwigged. These attributive nouns denote barristers and solicitors, respectively—e.g.: "The two sides—the wigged and the unwigged—are kept severely apart: solicitors cannot have lunch in the barristers' Inns of Court, and barristers must never be seen at the solicitors' Law Society." Anthony Sampson, Anatomy of Britain 148 (1962).

wile away. See while away.

wilful. See wil(l)ful.

will. See WORDS OF AUTHORITY (D).

will; testament. A common belief among lawyers is that, at common law, a will disposed of real property and a testament of personal property. This belief is, strictly speaking, erroneous, although from the 18th century such a distinction in usage (unfounded in the substantive law) began to emerge. The distinction is now obsolete, however, so that in modern legal usage the words are interchangeable, although will remains the usual term.

The archaic distinction between the words is said to have grown out of the historical development of property dispositions. Ecclesiastical courts had jurisdiction of cases involving the distribution and use of personal property; appeals from these courts were to Rome, under the Catholic hierarchy, until 1533. The common-law courts of England, meanwhile, decided cases involving the use and disposition of real property. The two court systems developed distinct terms for decedents' estates. E.g., "The common-law courts took the position that a will was ambulatory in its revocatory effect; the ecclesiastical courts held that a testament was revoked at the time the revoking instrument was executed." As a result of the bifurcated judicial system, the myth goes, the terminology was Anglo-Saxon (will) for real property dispositions, and Latinate (testament) for personal property dispositions, the latter term having derived from Roman law.

History, especially linguistic history, never comes so neatly packaged, however. It is not surprising, then, to discover that medieval writers are recorded as having used will in reference to personal property, and testament in reference to land. Even so, the myth concerning these terms may be valid insofar as it explains the tendencies in usage that would later give rise to an idiomatic DIFFERENTIATION. It is at least possible that the DOUBLET last will and testament, q.v., had in its origins a purpose for the inclusion of both real and personal property. In any event, will now denotes the entire testamentary instrument, a place formerly said to be occupied by devise, q.v. See also codicil & testament.

will, as a verb meaning to dispose of by will, is always transitive. E.g., "In Louisiana a testator can will no more than one-tenth of his estate to a woman with whom he has lived in open concubinage."/ "Aliens could, at common law, will personalty and devise land, but the state could seize the land in the hands of his devisees."/ "I will and bequeath all my effects to my brothers and sisters, to be divided equally among them." See devise, v.t.

willable = transferable by will. E.g., "Land became willable with the Statute of Wills." The OED traces this sense back only to 1880.

wil(l)ful. Wilful is the preferred spelling in BrE, willful in AmE. Willfull, a misspelling, occasionally appears in the U.S.

"Wilful is not," commented Lord Justice Wright, "a term of art and is often used as meaning no more than a high degree of carelessness or recklessness. It is not necessarily limited in its use to intentional or deliberate wrong-doing." Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Assoc. Collieries, [1940] A.C. 152, 177 (H.L.). The same problem exists in AmE: "The word wilful or wilfully when used in the definition of a crime, it has been said time and again, means only intentionally or purposely as distinguished from accidentally or negligently and does not require any actual impropriety; while on the other hand it has been stated with equal repetition and insistence that the requirement added by such a word is not satisfied unless there is a bad purpose or evil intent." Rollin M. Perkins & Ronald N. Boyce, Criminal Law 875–76 (3d ed. 1982). One influential writer has therefore suggested that the word should not be used because of its AMBIGUITY. See G.W. Paton, A Textbook of Jurisprudence 313 n.2 (4th ed. 1972).

wil(l)fulness; malice aforethought. These terms are sometimes confused in criminal contexts. Willfulness is the broader term. "An act is done willfully if done voluntarily and intentionally, and with the specific intent to do something the law forbids." 1 Edward J. Devitt & Charles Blackmar, Federal Jury Practice and Instructions 384 (1977). But see wil(l)ful.

Malice aforethought, q.v., is used in the context of homicide: "Malice aforethought means an intent, at the time of a killing, wilfully to take the life of a human being, or an intent wilfully to act in callous or wanton disregard of the consequences to human life; but malice aforethought does not necessarily imply any ill will, spite, or hatred toward the individual killed." 2 Edward J. Devitt & Charles Blackmar, Federal Jury Practice and Instructions 215 (1977).

willy-nilly (= willingly or unwillingly, by compulsion) is an English equivalent of the LATINISM nolens volens. E.g., "If a federal court is to do it, it must act in its traditional manner, not as a military commander ordering people to work willy-nilly, nor as the President's Administrative Assistant." (Douglas, J.) It is sometimes, as the OED remarks, erroneously used for "undecided, shilly-shally" .

win a victory, to. See victory.

winner. See loser.

-WISE. Phrases arrived at with this combining form are generally to be discouraged, for they often displace a more direct wording, and they are invariably graceless and inelegant. E.g., "We must . . . respond to [the] claims . . . that even if acceptable populationwise [read as applied to the population as a whole], the . . . plan was invidiously discriminatory because a 'political fairness principle' was followed . . . ." Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 751–52 (1973)./ "Whether accumulation of earnings in the corporation is cheaper tax-wise [read cheaper for tax purposes] than accumulation in the partnership depends on a comparison of the corporate tax rate and the applicable rate to the individuals involved."/ "There are several other advantages tax-wise [read tax advantages] but these illustrate the tax inducements for making inter vivos transfers."/ "To continue this litigation, even though the parents should ultimately prevail, may well be, at least money-wise [read at least financially], like digging a hole to get the dirt to fill another hole."/ "A notice, signed by the commissioners, was file-stamped on the day of the hearing, content-wise [omit content-wise altogether] this notice met the statutory requirements."

wise (= manner, fashion, way) is an ARCHAISM that still appears infrequently in legal writing. E.g., "The testamentary revocation may be express, in order that the testator may do his new testamentary work without being in any wise [read in any way] fettered by the contents of his former will."/ "The judgment commands the defendant to refrain from in any wise interfering [read interfering in any way] with plaintiffs in the conduct of the business of their stable." See nowise.

wit, to. See to-wit.

withal is an ARCHAISM for besides, nevertheless, with, or therewith. E.g., "The documentation and literature of this case is of truly gargantuan proportions; yet withal [omit withal] there has been a strange dearth of real issues of fact or of law."

with all deliberate speed calls to mind the LATINISM festina lente (= make haste slowly). Made famous in Brown v. Board of Educ., 349 U.S. 294, 301 (1955), the phrase is thought to have originated in English Chancery Courts: "[A] state cannot be expected to move with the celerity of a private business man; it is enough if it proceeds, in the language of the English Chancery, with all deliberate speed." Virginia v. West Virginia, 222 U.S. 17, 19–20 (1911) (per Holmes, J.). But the more frequent phrase in equity courts was with all convenient speed.

Deliberate speed, on the other hand, has literary as well as equitable origins. The English poets Lord Byron (1788–1824) and Francis Thompson (1859–1907) both used the phrase, as did Goethe (1749–1832), if one forces the translation a little.

The phrase "resembles poetry and resembles equity techniques of discretionary accommodation between principle and expediency, but [it] fits precisely one thing only, namely, the unique function of judicial review in the American system. . . . It means only that the Court, having announced its principle, and having required a measure of initial compliance, resumed its posture of passive receptiveness to the complaints of litigants." Alexander M. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 253–54 (1962). However grandiose that may sound, the Court later said that the phrase "has turned out to be only a soft EUPHEMISM for delay." Alexander v. Holmes County Bd. of Educ., 396 U.S. 1218, 1219 (1969). See OXYMORONS & WEASEL WORDS with force and arms. See vi et armis.

withhold is sometimes used incorrectly for deprive of or deny. E.g., "Petitioner filed suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 seeking monetary damages and injunctive relief for being forced to work beyond his physical capabilities and for being withheld [read denied or deprived of] necessary medical treatment."

withholding of deportation. See suspension of deportation.

within, adj. "The legal tone is still too strong for common use in the within letter." Wilson Follett, Modern American Usage 45 (1966). Indeed, it is perhaps too strong even for use by legal writers, for enclosed is far more common and more natural. E.g., "The within property shall not be sold or encumbered without the express written consent of the within mortgagees." (This use is apparently elliptical for within-named; the writer should have omitted the word or phrase completely, for it adds nothing.)/ "Opposing counsel are being furnished with a copy of the within [read enclosed] response." within-named. See within.

within the statute. See statute of frauds (B).

without is a FORMAL WORD when used as an equivalent of outside. Usually, without is contrasted to with; but in law it is frequently an opposite of within. Though somewhat archaic, in formal legal prose this usage should be considered unexceptionable. E.g., "Grants or devises are construed to bring them within or without the operation of the Rule in Shelley's Case."/ "The plaintiff put himself without the pale of the comparative negligence rule, since he was wholly at fault when he received his injury."

without day. See go hence without day, sine die & LOAN TRANSLATIONS without prejudice (= without loss of any rights) is peculiar to legal JARGON. The phrase describes a legal action—either judicial or among private parties—that in no way harms or cancels the legal rights or privileges of a party. The antonym is with prejudice.

without recourse; sans recours. The English phrase without recourse is preferred over the GALLICISM sans recours for the stipulation that the drawer or indorser of a bill of exchange may add to his signature, repudiating his liability to the holder.

with prejudice. See without prejudice.

with regards to. See regard (A).

with respect to. See respect (A).

with the object of ——ing is verbose for a simple infinitive, e.g., with the object of preventing in place of to prevent.

witness. A. Senses. Witness = (1) one who sees or knows something and testifies about it; or (2) one who gives evidence under oath or affirmation, either orally or by affidavit or deposition; or (3) one who, to vouch for the genuineness of a signature, affixes his or her name to an instrument that another has signed.

B. Possessive Form. The preferable possessive form is witness's.

C. And testifier or testis. Testifier is rarely if ever justified in practice; testis never is. They are both NEEDLESS VARIANTS. See testis.

witness, v.t. = to attest or act as a witness <to witness a will> is a LEGALISM that is fairly familiar in the lay idiom.

witness-box; witness stand. The former is primarily BrE, the latter primarily AmE—although there is some overlap on both sides of the Atlantic. Following are modern English and American examples of witness box: "Nor do I agree with the suggestion that the question be asked by the court when the client is in the witness-box or by requiring him to sign some pro forma document on the day of the hearing." (Eng.)/ "The court rearranged the witness box so that the jury would be unable to see the shackles." State v. Calhoun, 554 So. 2d 127, 132 (La. Ct. App. 1989). Cf. jurybox.

A British philologist writes that "in the middle 'fifties, a British judge vehemently rebuked the American defendant's use in 'his' court of the expression witness-stand and insisted with some heat on having witness-box." Brian Foster, The Changing English Language 61–62 (1968). Before the end of the decade, however, witness stand had found its way onto B.B.C. airwaves. Id. at 62. See stand.

witnesseth is commonly used at the outset of contracts and affidavits. E.g., "Witnesseth: that whereas first and second parties have certain litigations pending in the Mercer Circuit Court . . . it is agreed between all of the parties that all said suits are to be dismissed." Says one writer: Witnesseth that is a phrase "admittedly archaic but so firmly entrenched in the draftsman's vocabulary as to allow of few, if any, substitutes." Sidney F. Parham, The Fundamentals of Legal Writing 23 (1976). Actually, the whole mess is easily dispensed with; drafters should get right to the point, without whereas, q.v., preceding the recital, and without witnesseth to introduce the whereas-clauses.

Actually, the modern use of witnesseth is premised on a mistake: that the word is a command in the imperative mood. Actually, it is the third-person singular verb—she sings = she singeth; he says = he sayeth; she witnesses = she witnesseth. The word at the outset of instruments is really just a remnant of a longer phrase, such as This document witnesseth that . . . . Hence to make WITNESSETH shout in all capitals from the top of a document makes no literal sense. It seems to have originated in an early formbook writer's mistake. See -ETH.

witness whereof, in. See in witness whereof.

woefully is a CLICHÉ, esp. when coupled with adjectives like inadequate or insufficient. E.g., "The meager record before us is lacking and woefully insufficient to establish that the covenant 'touches and concerns' the land."/ "As evidence of the proposition that the government pays a disproportionate share of the cost of hospital malpractice insurance, the Westat Study is woefully inadequate." woodshed, v.t. See horseshed.

WOOLLINESS is the quality in expression of being confused and hazy, indefinite and indistinct. Excessive use of cross-references in writing, as in the Internal Revenue Code, is perhaps the apotheosis of woolliness—e.g.: "For purposes of paragraph (3), an organization described in paragraph (2) shall be deemed to include an organization described in section 501(c)(4), (5), or (6) which would be described in paragraph (2) if it were an organization described in section 501(c)(3)." I.R.C. § 509(a) (1984). See OBSCURITY (A) & PLAIN LANGUAGE (D).

woolsack in G.B. refers to the sack of wool used as the Lord Chancellor's seat when he presides over the House of Lords. E.g., "I entirely agree with my right honorable and learned friend upon the woolsack." (Eng.) By extension woolsack is sometimes used in the general sense "a seat of justice." Cf. ermine.

WORDINESS. See CUTTING OUT THE CHAFF, REDUNDANCY & VERBOSITY

WORD-PATRONAGE is "the tendency to take out one's words and look at them, to apologize for expressions that either need no apology or should be quietly refrained from" (MEU1 at 733). E.g., "Hopefully—to use an ugly word—the dilemma will be solved by the proposed legislation." In his preface to MEU2, Gowers indulged mildly in word-patronage when he wrote: "This was indeed an epoch-making book in the strict sense of that overworked phrase" (p. iii). The tendency is not at all uncommon

- "He came to the conclusion then that the best way of exploiting this invention was to use the mills himself and to what has been described as 'trade grind'—rather a lengthy split infinitive." Young v. Wilson, (1955) 72 R.P.C. 351, 353 (Ch.D.) (per Upjohn, J.). See SPLIT INFINITIVES
- "You have got to so frame yours so that it 'sells the Court,' to use the term of the marketplace, which I abhor . . . ." Karl N. Llewellyn, A Lecture on Appellate Advocacy, 29 U. Chi. L. Rev. 627, 630 (1962). In that sentence, the which-clause is ambiguous: it may refer either to marketplace or (as Llewellyn intended) term of the marketplace. See REMOTE RELATIVES
- "The language of this description is perhaps not very elegant, for it homologates (if I may use that horrible word) the noun 'dealer' with the participles which appear in the parenthesis." Walter Chadburn and Son Ltd. v. Leeds Corp., (1969) 20 P.&C.R. 241, 241, 246 (C.A.).
- "The House of Lords does now enjoy—if that be the word—the freedom not to follow its own previous decisions . . . ." Leslie Scarman, English Law—The New Dimension 5 (1974).
- "The last sentence is rather clumsy, but what I mean is this." Glanville Williams, Learning the Law 75 (11th ed. 1982).
- "Although it is a cliché to say so, it is in every way encyclopedic: every form of every description in connection with any Queen's Bench action is here." Charles Joseph, Book Review, 83 Law Soc. Gazette 3667 (1986).

A variation of this mannerism occurs when one defends one's choice of words in anticipation of the reader's distaste: "The Maryland statute appears to be unique in the proper use of that much misused word." Williams v. Patuxent Inst., 347 A.2d 179, 187 (Md. 1975)./ "The 'philosophy' of the Act (if I may be forgiven this neologistic use) was to allow a legally aided party to civil proceedings only one successful bite at the legal cherry . . . ." Megarity v. Law Soc'y, [1982] A.C. 81, 103 (per Lord Diplock)./ "[T]he bank may and should be held liable for gratuitously, officiously, and affirmatively—a surfeit of adverbs never hurt anyone—telling the government how to place its grasp upon its customer's funds." Schuster v. Banco de Iberoamerica, S.A., 476 So. 2d 253, 255 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1985) (Schwartz, J., dissenting)./ "Even a murderer can look forward to a parole after 17 years, in a manner best characterized by that much-misused word, 'hopefully.'" In re Clements, 440 N.W.2d 133, 137 (Minn. Ct. App. 1989) (Irvine, J., dissenting). See if you will.

WORDS OF ART. See TERMS OF ART.

WORDS OF AUTHORITY. Few reforms would improve legal DRAFTING more than if drafters were to begin paying closer attention to the verbs by which they set forth duties, rights, prohibitions, and entitlements. In the current state of common-law drafting, these verbs are a horrific muddle—and, what is even more surprising, few drafters even recognize this fact. The primary problem is shall, to which we must immediately turn.

A. Shall. This word runs afoul of several basic principles of good drafting. The first is that a word used repeatedly in a given context is presumed to bear the same meaning throughout. (Shall commonly shifts its meaning even in midsentence.) The second principle is strongly allied with the first: when a word takes on too many senses and cannot be confined to one sense in a given document, it becomes useless to the drafter. (Shall has as many as eight senses in drafted documents.) The third principle has been recognized in the literature on legal drafting since the mid-19th century: good drafting generally ought to be in the present tense, not the future. (Shall is commonly used as a future-tense modal verb.) In fact, the selfsame quality in shall—the fact that it is a CHAMELEON-HUED WORD—causes it to violate each of those principles.

How can shall be so slippery, one may ask, when every lawyer knows that it denotes a mandatory action? Well, perhaps every lawyer has heard that it's mandatory, but very few consistently use it in that way. And, as a result, courts in virtually every English-speaking jurisdiction have held—by necessity—that shall means may in some contexts, and vice-versa. These holdings have been necessary primarily to give effect to slipshod drafting.

What, then, are the meanings of shall? The shadings are sometimes subtle, but the following examples—all but the last two from a single set of court rules—illustrate the more common shades:

- "The court . . . shall enter an order for the relief prayed for . . . ." The word imposes a duty on the subject of the sentence.
- "Service shall be made on the parties . . ." The word imposes a duty on an unnamed person, but not on the subject of the sentence ("service," an abstract thing).
- "The debtor shall be brought forthwith before the court that issued the order." The word seems at first to impose a duty on the debtor but actually imposes it on some unnamed actor.
- "Such time shall not be further extended except for cause shown." The word shall gives permission (as opposed to a duty), and shall not denies permission (i.e., it means "may not"). This problem—shall being equivalent to may—frequently appears also in the statutory phrase No person shall. Logically, the correct construction is No person may, because the provision negates permission, not a duty. See (E).
- "Objections to the proposed modification shall be filed and served on the debtor." The word purports to impose a duty on parties to object to proposed modifications, though the decision to object is discretionary. This amounts to a conditional duty: a party that wants to object must file and serve the objections.
- "The sender shall have fully complied with the requirement to send notice when the sender obtains electronic confirmation." The word acts as a future-tense modal verb (the full verb phrase being in the future perfect). Many readers of this sentence, however, encounter a MISCUE in reading the sentence, which confusingly suggests that the sender has a duty.
- "The secretary shall be reimbursed for all expenses." The word expresses an entitlement, not a duty.
- "Any person bringing a malpractice claim shall, within 15 days after the date of filing the action, file a request for mediation." Courts interpreting such a rule or statute often hold that shall is directory, not mandatory—that it equates with the softer word should.

So much for the "Golden Rule" of legal drafting, which Reed Dickerson put this way: "[T]he competent draftsman makes sure that each recurring word or term has been used consistently. He carefully avoids using the same word or term in more than one sense . . . . In brief, he always expresses the same idea in the same way and always expresses different ideas differently." The Fundamentals of Legal Drafting § 2.3.1, at 15-16 (2d ed. 1986).

One solution to the problem that shall poses is to restrict it to one sense. This solution—called the "American rule" because it is an approach followed by some careful American drafters—is to use shall only to mean "has a duty to." Under the American rule, only the first of the eight bulleted items above would be correct. The drafter might well say that a party shall send notice, but not that notice shall be sent by the party. (If this "has-a-duty-to" sense is the drafter's convention, must serves when the subject of the sentence is an inanimate object.) This solution leads to much greater consistency than is generally found in American drafting.

Another solution is the "ABC rule," so called because, in the late 1980s, it was most strongly advocated by certain Australian, British, and Canadian drafters. The ABC rule holds that legal drafters cannot be trusted to use the word shall under any circumstances. Under this view, lawyers are not educable on the subject of shall, so the only solution is complete abstinence. As a result, the drafter must always choose a more appropriate word: must, may, will, is entitled to, or some other expression.

This view has much to be said for it. American lawyers and judges who try to restrict shall to the sense "has a duty to" find it difficult to apply the convention consistently. Indeed, few lawyers have the semantic acuity to identify correct and incorrect shalls even after a few hours of study. That being so, there can hardly be much hope of the profession's using shall consistently.

Small wonder, then, that the ABC rule has fast been gaining ground in the U.S. For example, the federal government's Style Subcommittee—part of the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure—a subcommittee that since 1991 has worked on all amendments to the various sets of federal court rules, adopted this approach, disallowing shall, in late 1992. (This came after a year of using shall only to impose a duty on the subject of the verb.) As a result, the rules have become sharper because the drafters are invariably forced into thinking more clearly and specifically about meaning.

There is, of course, a third approach: to allow shall its traditional promiscuity while pretending, as we have for centuries, that preserving its chastity is either hopeless or unimportant. Of course, that approach breeds litigation, as attested in 76 pages of small-type cases reported in Words and Phrases, all interpreting the word shall. As long as the mass of the profession remains unsensitized to the problems that shall causes, this appears to be the most likely course of inaction.

For more on the use of must as opposed to shall under the ABC rule, see (C). For further discussion of the general problem, see Robert Eagleson & Michele Asprey, Must We Continue with "Shall"? 63 Austl. L.J. 75 (1989); Robert Eagleson & Michele Asprey, We Must Abandon "Shall," 63 Austl. L.J. 726 (1989); Jim Main, "Must" Versus "Shall," 63 Austl. L.J. 860 (1989); Michele Asprey, Plain Language for Lawyers 149–52 (1991); Joseph Kimble, The Many Misuses of "Shall," 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 61 (1992); Michele Asprey, "Shall" Must Go, 3 Scribes J. Legal Writing 79 (1992). For a contrary (and unpersuasive) point of view, see J.M. Bennett, In Defence of "Shall," 63 Austl. L.J. 522 (1989); J.M. Bennett, Final Observations on the Use of "Shall," 64 Austl. L.J. 168 (1990).

A major cause of the litigation over shall, as Kimble observes in his thoughtful essay, is the relative strength of the word. That is, what are the consequences when somebody fails to honor a contractual or statutory duty? If it's a contractual duty, does a failure to honor a shall-provision always amount to a breach? Does it entitle the other party to rescind? If it's a statutory requirement, does a violation invalidate the proceedings? Or is it merely a directory provision? This unclarity about consequences is a continuing problem in any system that we adopt, however linguistically principled that system might be.

B. Shall not. Under the American rule (see A), this phrasing works as long as it means "has a duty not to." Thus, "Thou shalt not steal" works, but not "The money shall not remain in the court's registry for more than 30 days." In the latter example, the proper choice is either must not or may not. See (F).

C. Must. Under the American rule (see A), this word means "is required to" and is used primarily when an inanimate object appears as subject of the clause. Hence, "Notice must be sent within 30 days."

Under the ABC rule (see A), must denotes all required actions, whether or not the subject of the clause performs the action of the verb—e.g.: "The employee must send notice within 30 days."/ "Notice must be sent within 30 days."

The advantage of must over shall is that its meaning is fastened down more tightly in any given sentence. Take, for example, a sentence from a widely used commercial lease: "The premises shall be used by the tenant for general office purposes and for no other purposes." Once one decides to follow the ABC rule, the dilemma in meaning becomes clear: are we mandating something with that sentence (use of the premises), or are we merely limiting the tenant's freedom to use the premises for other purposes? One might revise the sentence—removing the PASSIVE VOICE—in either of two ways: (a) The tenant must use the premises for general office purposes; or (b) The tenant may use the premises only for general office purposes. Which meaning is correct? Perhaps somebody should litigate the question so that we might all find out.

In private drafting—contracts as opposed to statutes, rules, and regulations—some drafters consider must inappropriately bossy. The word may strike the wrong tone particularly when both parties to a contract are known quantities, such as two well-known corporations. It seems unlikely that, for example, an American car manufacturer and a Japanese car manufacturer engaging in a joint venture would want the word must to set forth their various responsibilities. Indeed, it seems odd to draft one's own contractual responsibilities with must: a lawyer for Ford Motor Company is unlikely to write Ford must . . . Ford must . . . Ford must . . . . The word will is probably the best solution here. See (D).

On the other hand, in a consumer contract or other adhesion contract, must is entirely appropriate for the party lacking the bargaining power. In the 1994 revision of its form residential lease—a document signed by a million Texas residents every year—the Texas Apartment Association changed the traditional shall to either must or will. The landlord became we, and the tenant became you, so that the form reads as follows: You must . . . You must . . . You must . . . We will . . . We will . . . We will . . . . Although one might think that the resulting tone would be irksome, none of the typical users on whom the form was tested expressed that thought. Indeed, the distinctive use of must for the tenant and will for the landlord is very much in keeping with the natural rhetoric of an adhesion contract. And it certainly informs the consumer precisely what his or her obligations are.

Must is a useful device to uncover client misunderstandings about obligations. Thus, some lawyers use it despite the danger of a bossy tone. And, because present-tense drafting reduces the incidence of must, the musts that remain in a given document will—in many contexts—offend no one.

D. Will. This word, like any other, ought to bear a consistent meaning within any drafted document. Two of its possible meanings are discussed in (C): it may express one's own client's obligations in an adhesion contract (as in a residential lease), or it may express both parties' obligations when the relationship is a delicate one (as in a corporate joint venture).

There is still a third possibility: if a future tense really is needed, as to express a future contingency, then will is the word. But this circumstance is not common, as the best drafting should generally be in the present, not the future, tense. See STATUTE DRAFTING (C).

E. May. This term, very simply, means "has discretion to; is permitted to." It should be the only term used to denote these senses. Thus, one would never write the licensee is free to sell as many units as it desires, as opposed to the licensee may sell as many units as it desires.

Sometimes, may should replace shall—e.g.: "No person shall [read may] set off fireworks without the prior authorization of the fire marshal." That sentence does not negate a duty; it negates permission. See (A) & STATUTE DRAFTING (C).

F. Must not; may not. These two are nearly synonymous. Must not = is required not to. May not = is not permitted to. For those following the ABC rule (see A), the phrase must not is usually the more appropriate wording.

Some drafters avoid may not because it is sometimes ambiguous—it can mean either "is not permitted to" or (esp. in AmE) "might not." For example, an application to a law school states: "This office may not consider applications received after April 30." Some readers would take that to mean that the office has discretion whether to consider applications received after April 30, whereas others would infer that some rule or regulation prohibits the office from doing so.

G. Is entitled to. This is the wording for expressing an entitlement. It means "has a right to." E.g., "The guardian ad litem shall [read is entitled to] be reimbursed for expenses reasonably incurred." See (A).

H. Using a Consistent Glossary. A disciplined drafter uses words of authority consistently. This involves, in part, restricting the vocabulary by which one sets forth duties, rights, prohibitions, and entitlements. The drafter who proliferates ways of wording duties, for example, flirts with the danger that somebody interpreting the document—most disastrously, in court—will presume that a difference in wording imports a difference in meaning.

Yet drafted documents are commonly riddled with inconsistencies. It is not uncommon, in American contracts, to find the following variations in paragraph after paragraph:

- "The employee shall follow . . . ."
- "The employee agrees to follow . . . ."
- "The employee is to follow . . . ."
- "The employee must follow . . . ."
- "The employee understands her duty to follow . . . ."
- "The employee will follow . . . ."
- "It is the responsibility of the employee to follow . . . ."

The better practice is this: after the lead-in (which states, "The parties therefore agree as follows: . . ."), use only words of authority. An adherent of the American rule would make each of the above items the employee shall; an adherent of the ABC rule would make each one the employee must.

The careful drafter might consider adopting either of the following glossaries, preferably the latter:

American Rule

shall	=	has a duty to
must	=	is required to [used for all requirements that are not duties imposed on the subject of the clause]
may not	=	is not permitted to; is disallowed from
must not	=	is required not to; is disallowed from; is not permitted to may	=	has discretion to, is permitted to
is entitled to	=	has a right to will	=	(expresses a future contingency) should	=	(denotes a directory provision)

ABC Rule (Preferred)

must	=	is required to
must not	=	is required not to; is disallowed from; is not permitted to may	=	has discretion to, is permitted to
may not	=	is not permitted to; is disallowed from
is entitled to	=	has a right to will	=	[one of the following:] a. (expresses a future contingency) b. (in an adhesion contract, expresses one's own client's obligations) c. (where the relationship is a delicate one, expresses both parties' obligations)
should	=	(denotes a directory provision)

words of conveyance are the words—usu. DOUBLETS, TRIPLETS, AND SYNONYM-STRINGS—that effect a transfer of ownership in a deed. In a warranty deed, for example, the standard words of conveyance are convey and warrant or grant, bargain, and sell; in a quitclaim deed, the words are usu. remise, release, and forever quitclaim or convey and quitclaim.

words of purchase; words of limitation. In a grant or conveyance of a freehold estate, words of purchase designate the persons who are to receive the grant, and words of limitation describe the extent or quality of the estate. E.g., "In a transfer 'to A and his heirs,' the words 'and his heirs' are now words of limitation (words denoting the duration of the estate), not words of purchase (words denoting who is getting the estate). The name 'A' is the only word of purchase; A is the only person who is getting an estate." Thomas F. Bergin & Paul G. Haskell, Preface to Estates in Land and Future Interests 27 (2d ed. 1984).

wordy does not mean "sesquipedalian," as many seem to suppose; it means, rather, "verbose; prolix."

workaholic. See -AHOLIC & MORPHOLOGICAL DEFORMITIES.

work an ademption is a legal idiom akin to the lay idiom work a hardship (on someone). E.g., "A change in the form of a security bequeathed does not necessarily work an ademption." See adeem & ademption.

worker's comp. See comp.

workers' compensation; workmen's compensation. These words contain a plural possessive, hence workers' and workmen's, not worker's and workman's. The former phrase is becoming more and more common, doubtless because of a sensitivity to the SEXISM of the other.

workforce; workload. Each is one word.

workman; workingman. Because of the growing awareness of sexism, it is better to use worker rather than either of these words. See SEXISM (B).

workplace. One word. See worksite.

workproduct is increasingly spelled as one word. The dictionaries still record the term as two words. But in legal contexts the trend, which is wholly salutary, is to hyphenate it or make it one word. E.g., "To what extent is the Court's equal protection workproduct based on a determinate political-moral principle?" Cf. decision-making & policy-making.

worksite. One word. Cf. job site.

World Court; International Court of Justice in The Hague. The latter is the official name, the former the popular name, for the tribunal that adjudicates international disputes between nations. The principal judicial organ of the U.N., it is the successor to the Permanent Court of International Justice, set up in 1920 under the League of Nations.

WORLD COURT PLEADINGS. The pleadings in an action before the World Court are as follows: (1) a memorial by the applicant state; (2) a countermemorial by the respondent state; (3) a reply by the applicant state; and (4) a rejoinder by the respondent state. Cf. COMMON-LAW PLEADINGS & EQUITY PLEADINGS worse comes to worst. See worst comes to worst.

worst comes to worst; worse comes to worst. The latter expression seems more logical, but the established idiom—as evidenced in the OED consistently from the 16th century—is worst comes to (the) worst (= if things fall out as badly as possible). E.g., "Such litigants are invariably solvent, and if worse comes to worst [read worst comes to worst], they have the authority to tax." City of Mound Bayou v. Roy Collins Constr. Co., 457 So. 2d 337, 341 (Miss. 1984). See ILLOGIC.

worth. When this word is used with amounts, the preceding term denoting the amount should be possessive. E.g., "This claim is not for a few dollars' worth of hobby goods that were negligently lost." See POSSESSIVES (B).

worthless person. In this legal ARCHAISM, worthless means "without worldly goods." But the double sense of the word makes the phrase unworthy in modern writing.

worthwhile. One word.

wot (= to know) is an ARCHAISM that Fowler called a "Wardour Street" term, i.e., an "oddment" calculated to establish (in the eyes of some readers) the writer's claim to be someone of taste and the source of beautiful English. In modern writing, it is a gross affectation—e.g.: "[O]f the financial status of the other two [lawyers] we wot [read know] not." Schine v. Schine, 309 N.Y.S.2d 51, 52 (App. Div. 1970).

would is often used as a hedge-word, qualifying the absoluteness of the verb following it. For example, a federal court states: "This court would agree with the Texas Supreme Court's statement of the measure of damages." If the writer intended to question the applicability of the Texas Supreme Court's statement in certain circumstances, the sentence as written is perhaps right; but it would be better to say This court agrees if a direct statement is intended. See SUBJUNCTIVES & appear.

would have for had. This error is an example of a confused sequence of tenses. E.g., "[I]f the trial judge would have [read had] allowed impeachment with a limiting instruction . . . , Robinson would be before this court arguing that this alternative solution was error." U.S. v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 64, 68 (7th Cir. 1986).

would have liked. This phrase should invariably be followed by a present-tense infinitive—hence would have liked to go, would have liked to read, not would have liked to have gone, would have liked to have read. E.g., "Many Americans would have liked to put the administration of justice wholly on a non-technical basis of natural equity." Roscoe Pound, The Formative Era of American Law 107 (1938).

would seem is usu. inferior to seems or seem. E.g., "Mr. Kohl would seem [read seems] to have made another concession . . . ." Alan Riding, European Leaders Give Their Backing to Monetary Plan, N.Y. Times, 9 Dec. 1989, at 1.

wrack; rack. Wrack = to destroy utterly; to wreck. Rack = to torture or oppress.

Wrack is also, and primarily, a noun meaning (1) "wreckage"; or (2) "utter destruction." In sense (2), it most commonly appears in the phrase wrack and ruin. But wrack is sometimes confused with its homophone—e.g.: "[The plaintiff stated] . . . that the building was 'virtually a shell,' having been allowed to go to rack [read wrack] and ruin." Hilton v. Federated Brokerage Group, Inc., 213 N.Y.S.2d 171, 177 (Sup. Ct. 1961)./ "Experience indicates that the state treasury would not fall to rack [read wrack] and ruin if the shield of immunity were lifted." Brown v. Wichita State Univ., 547 P.2d 1015, 1037 (Kan. 1976) (Fatzer, C.J., concurring in part & dissenting in part).

wrangle; wangle. The two are occasionally confounded. Wrangle = to argue noisily or angrily; wangle = [v.t.] (1) to accomplish or obtain in a clever way; (2) to manage (a thing) despite difficulties; or [v.i.] (3) to use indirect methods to accomplish some end. E.g., "He has aptly demonstrated his advertising acumen by wrangling [read wangling] almost half a million dollars in free print media from New York Magazine." Letter of David Curry, N.Y. Mag., 23 Jan. 1989, at 9.

wraparound mortgage is current American legal JARGON meaning "a deed of trust whereby a purchaser incorporates into agreed payments to a grantor or third-party the grantor's obligation in the initial mortgage." A court recently defined it as "a junior mortgage that secures a promissory note with a face amount equal to the sum of the principal balance of an existing mortgage note plus any additional funds advanced by the second lender." Mitchell v. Trustees of U.S. Real Estate Inv. Trust, 375 N.W.2d 424, 428 (Mich. Ct. App. 1985) (with minor differences in wording).

wreak. The better past tense is wreaked, not wrought. See reek.

wreath(e). Wreath is the noun, wreathe the verb.

wreckless for reckless is a written MALAPROPISM that appears to denote precisely the opposite of what it is supposed to mean. As literacy in the higher sense has become ever shakier, it has become disturbingly common—e.g.:

- "The answer contains numerous allegations to the effect . . . that the trucks were being used by plaintiff on the highway in a careless and wreckless [read reckless] manner and greatly depreciating said trucks." Place v. Parker, 180 S.W.2d 538, 542 (Mo. Ct. App. 1944).
- "The trial judge also instructed the jury that if it found that the Union had acted with 'actual malice or wreckless [read reckless] or wanton indifference to the rights of the plaintiff' it might award punitive damages . . . ." International Bhd. of Boilermakers v. Braswell, 388 F.2d 193, 199 (5th Cir. 1968) (quoting trial court).
- "In their petition, plaintiffs allege that the sole cause of accident was the combined negligence, gross negligence, wanton, wreckless [read reckless] conduct and intentional wrecklessness [read recklessness] . . . of the executive officers and supervisors . . . ." Benjamin v. First Horizon Ins. Co., 563 So. 2d 1337, 1339 (La. Ct App. 1990).
- "Prior to 1969, a number of courts had concluded that the military employee is subject to military discipline pursuant to the UCMJ for wreckless [read reckless] or drunken operation of a vehicle . . . ." Michael P. Frederick, Scope of Employment Under the Federal Tort Claims Act and Attempts to Expand the Limits, 33 A.F. L. Rev. 69, 81 (1990).

One court even went so far as to "correct" the lawyers' use of reckless—the bracketed -w- being in the reported case: " 'Cross-defendants' failure to place and maintain plaintiffs' prior Group Health Policy was negligent, careless and [w]reckless . . . .'" Kuperman v. Great Republic Life Ins. Co., 241 Cal. Rptr. 187, 188 (Ct. App. 1987) (quoting a pleading).

writ. A. As a Noun. At common law, a writ was any formal legal document in letter form, under seal, and in the king's name. Its meaning has evolved differently in AmE and BrE, though the following definition fits both: "a court's written command or order in the name of the sovereign, state, or other competent legal authority, directing or enjoining the addressee to do or refrain from doing some specified act." In AmE, writ generally applies to judicial writs, which are either extraordinary writs (e.g., mandamus, prohibition) or writs used in appellate procedure (e.g., writ of error, writ of certiorari).

In BrE, by contrast, writ is usu. synonymous with original writ (= one that begins an action), as an abbreviated form of writ of summons. E.g., "Claiming that the price of their homes had dropped because of the presence of their new neighbours, Tim and Sue Poeton, with nine other families, issued writs claiming that Heron Homes, the development company, had failed to tell them that part of the estate had been earmarked for council housing." Charles Oulton, When Neighbours Become Good Enemies, Sunday Times, 5 Nov. 1989, at A13./ "Lord Denning, 93, former Master of the Rolls, has had a High Court writ issued against him over his legal battle about the ownership of his old school at Whitchurch, Hants." Sunday Telegraph, 24 May 1992, at 2. As in the first of the two examples just quoted, it is good colloquial BrE to say that the plaintiff issues the writ, although in truth the court does the issuing at the plaintiff's request.

B. As a Verb. The OED records the verbal sense of writ "to serve (a person) with a writ or summons" <he was writted>, and notes that it is Anglo-Irish.

C. As a Past Participle. As a past participle, writ is an ARCHAISM for written, except in the CLICHÉ writ large. E.g., "If article 9 were writ large, it would set out that a director is not to be removed against his will." (Eng.)

write for underwrite is common in the insurance business. E.g., "St. Paul Fire & Marine writes about $2,500,000 worth of premiums in the lawyers' malpractice field and has become the largest in the field." Murray T. Bloom, The Trouble With Lawyers 57 (1970).

writ(e)able. The preferred spelling is writable. See MUTE E.

writer is an obsolescent Scottishism in the sense "an attorney or law-agent; an ordinary legal practitioner in country towns; a law-clerk" (OED).

writer, the present. See FIRST PERSON (A).

write specially = to concur in a separate opinion. E.g., "I fully concur in the opinion written by Judge Politz; however, I write specially to say that I believe the Secretary of Health and Human Services is right on track."/ "The three justices who voted for rehearing when the case was before them on appeal voted to deny the writ; these justices specially stated that, although each of them voted for a rehearing on the question of appellate review of the proportionality of the sentence, the issue was presented to the Court in a writ application and that application was denied."

writ of course. See of course.

writ of error. The preferred plural is writs of error, not writs of errors or writ of errors.

writ of right is a LOAN TRANSLATION of breve de recto, at common law "the highest and most solemn form of action." Cornelius J. Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 100 (2d ed. 1988). Through the litigation initiated with this writ, the mesne lord would decide whether the demandant or the tenant—that is, the plaintiff or the defendant—had older and better seisin in the disputed property. See breve,* demandant & form of action.

wrong, n. The word is not precisely equivalent to tort: legal writers who refer to civil wrongs usu. include not just torts but also breaches of contract and of trust, breaches of statutory duties, and defects in the performance of public duties. See civil wrong & tort.

wrong; wrongful. The distinction is an important one in law. Wrong – (1) out of order; (2) contrary to law or morality; wicked; or (3) other than the right or suitable or the more or most desirable (COD). Wrongful = characterized by unfairness or injustice; contrary to law; (of a person) not entitled to the position occupied <the wrongful possessor>. Occasionally the words happen to be coextensive—e.g.: "It is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act if injury ensues from it." (Eng.). Cf. wrongous.

One commentator takes a benighted view: "Does wrongful mean something different from wrong? Wrong alone implies a moral judgment. Wrongful, by adding a syllable, only makes the word more pompous and less clear." Robert C. Cumbow, The Subverting of the Goeduck, 14 U. Puget Sound L. Rev. 755, 779 (1991).

wrongdoer = one who violates the law. The term is used of tortfeasors as well as of criminals. E.g., "But the circumstance that the wife of one of the wrongdoers benefited by the imposition does not afford opportunity for relief of that character."/ "The policy of preventing the wrongdoer from escaping the penalties for his wrong, in this case punitive damages, is inapplicable."

wrongful. See wrong.

wrongful birth; wrongful life. These phrases refer to different causes of action. A wrongful-birth action is brought by parents usu. against a doctor for failing to advise them prospectively about their risks of having a child with birth defects. A wrongful-life action is brought by or on behalf of a child with birth defects, the allegations ordinarily being that, were it not for the doctor-defendant's negligent advice, the child's parents would not have conceived the child, or if they had conceived, would have aborted the fetus to avoid the pain and suffering resulting from the child's congenital defects.

wrongful death. See death case & death statute.

wrongful discharge (AmE) = wrongful dismissal (BrE). E.g., "The only other damages the plaintiff could claim if he had been wrongfully dismissed would have been purely nominal." (Aus.) Wrongful termination is sometimes used in the U.S. See unfair dismissal.

wrongful interference with goods. See detinue.

wrongful life. See wrongful birth.

wrong(ly). Both forms are proper adverbs; wrongly, which is less common, appears before the verb modified <the suspects were wrongly detained>, whereas wrong should be used if the adverb follows the noun <he answered the question wrong>.

wrongous, in Scots law, means "wrongful, illegal, unjust." It should be avoided by other than Scottish lawyers.

wroth (= angry) is an ARCHAISM—e.g.: "Petitti, 37, is so wroth [read angry] over what he sees in the videotape of his nuptial festivities that he has filed suit . . . ." Eric Zorn, Taped Memories Are More Maddening Than Magical, Chicago Trib., 20 March 1990, at 1C.

xerox is a registered trademark (Xerox) that is nevertheless used as a noun <he made a xerox of the document>, adjective , and verb <to xerox a will>. Sometimes the word is capitalized, but sometimes not—e.g.: "I had to get some letters from readers xeroxed last week." Godfrey Smith, Sunday Times, 22 Oct. 1989, at B3. Careful writers use photocopy or some other similar word. Zerox is a common misspelling.

x-ray; X-ray. Either form is correct, although the former is perhaps more common. W10 suggests that the term is hyphenated as an adjective and verb (x-ray), and not hyphenated as a noun (x ray). The COD hyphenates the term in all parts of speech.

y'all; ya'll. Perhaps the only time when the correct form of this Southernism arises is in transcriptions of testimony. For the record, y'all is the logically preferable and far more common form.

ye. See hear ye & oyez.

year and a day. The lapse of a year has many important effects in Anglo-American law. At common law, escheat was subject to the Crown's right to hold the land for ann, jour et wast (= one year, one day, including the right to commit waste). In English law today and in some American states, an act that causes death is not homicide if the death occurs more than a year and a day after the act was committed.

Why a year and a day—not just a year? Because several centuries ago, English lawyers computed times by including both the first and the last day, so that a year from January 1, 1500, was considered to be December 31, 1500. Hence the day was tacked on to make up a full year. Today, of course, times are generally computed by excluding the first day.

Year Book; Year-Book; year-book; yearbook. Each of these forms but the last has appeared in legal history books that discuss the unofficial English law reports dating from 1282 to 1537. The predominant form is Year Book, although the leading modern legal historian, J.H. Baker, refers to the year-books. See J.H. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 204–07 (3d ed. 1990). If that usage suggests a trend, then yearbook cannot be far away, since the manifest destiny of the hyphen is to disappear.

year of our Lord. See A.D.

yellow-dog contract (= an employment contract forbidding membership in a labor union) has become a part of American legal JARGON. The term dates from 1920. E.g., "The rapidly increasing use of the so-called 'yellow-dog contracts' has grown into a serious threat to the very existence of labor unions. In view of the inequitable conditions that surround the formation of such agreements and the unfair division of their obligation, to appeal to equity for their enforcement is to disregard the fundamentally ethical foundations of courts of chancery." Felix Frankfurter & Nathan Greene, Labor Injunctions and Federal Legislation, 42 Harv. L. Rev. 766, 779 (1928).

Today such contracts are generally illegal, having been outlawed by the Wagner Act of 1935: "A chocolate manufacturing company proposed an unlawful 'yellow-dog contract' when its president asked a job applicant if she would sign a statement pledging not to join a union or be affiliated in any way with unions . . . ." Today's Summary and Analysis, Daily Labor Rep., 3 April 1991, at A-A.

yet. See as yet, but yet & although . . . yet.

you, the second-person pronoun, is invaluable in drafting consumer contracts that are meant to be generally intelligible. Consider the difference between the following versions of a lease provision:

> Resident shall promptly reimburse owner for loss, damage, or cost of repairs or service caused in the apartment or community by improper use or negligence of resident or resident's guests or occupants.

vs.

> You must promptly reimburse us for loss, damage, or cost of repairs or service caused anywhere in the apartment community by your or any guest's or occupant's improper use.

Of course, the drafter must carefully define you and us, but doing so is usually a straightforward matter. See SUPERSTITIONS (K).

young person. See child.

your Honor. This is the accepted American way of addressing a judge in person, esp. in oral argument. Of British practice, an eminent barrister writes: "Judges prefer to be known as my lord or your Honour or your Worship (the last of these being an anachronistic but revealing indication of the vanity that can afflict adjudicators in minor courts and tribunals)." David Pannick, Judges 157 (1987).

your ladyship; your lordship. See my lord.

your petitioner, your defendant, your plaintiff, and like phrases are quaint ARCHAISMS to be avoided. E.g., "Your petitioner [read The petitioner] has reliable information and believes that the defendant intends to leave the jurisdiction before April 19, 1985."/ "Your relator [read The relator], George W. Strake, Jr., Chairman of the State Republican Executive Committee, requests temporary relief."

Z

zeitgeist should now be lowercase in both AmE and BrE.

zetetic(k). This adjective, meaning "proceeding by inquiry or investigation," is preferably spelled zetetic (OED & W3), though some law dictionaries anomalously spell it zetetick. The Center for Scientific Anomalies at Eastern Michigan University publishes a journal called The Zetetic Scholar, devoted to the skeptical analysis of paranormal claims.

ZEUGMA AND SYLLEPSIS. These are two closely related figures of speech. Zeugma is the better-known name, whereas syllepsis is the more common phenomenon. Our discussion might therefore usefully begin with the latter.

A. Syllepsis. Literally "a taking together, comprehension," syllepsis denotes the figure of speech in which a word—usually a verb or preposition—is applied to two other words or phrases in different senses (often literally in one sense and figuratively in the other). Unlike zeugma, syllepsis is not a grammatical error. It is usually both purposeful and humorous—e.g.:

- "Sir Charles Wilson, the newly elected member for Central Leeds, took the oath and his seat." (Take has two objects, oath and seat, but applies to them in different senses.)
- "Noah Swayne of Ohio . . . was a corporation lawyer, as successful as he was callously unethical, who was not to change his spots or his spottiness throughout his long judicial career." Fred Rodell, Nine Men 137 (1955).
- "I just blew my nose, a fuse, and three circuit breakers." (A character on "The Jim Henson Hour," 16 July 1989.)
- "We would venture out into the Gulf of Mexico off Port Aransas, where we found king mackerel and serenity." Cactus Pryor, He Called Me Puddin', Tex. Monthly, Feb. 1992, at 101, 134.

B. Zeugma. Literally "a yoking or bonding," zeugma is a grammatical error. It occurs when a single word is applied to two or more words or phrases when it properly applies to only one of them. One species of zeugma (the nontransferable auxiliary) plagues legal writing because lawyers so frequently try to express themselves alternatively—e.g.:

- "But many of these holdings have or will be overruled [read have been, or will be, overruled]."
- "Plaintiff claims that he has and will continue to receive [read has received and will continue to receive] fewer benefits from the trust than he should."
- "[A] grand jury appearance by a defendant may—as it often has—lead to [read may lead—as it often has led—to his complete exoneration . . ." People v. Goldsborough, 568 N.Y.S.2d 999, 1001 (Sup. Ct. 1991).
- "They were not liable at law for the continued suffering of the man who fell among thieves, which they might, and morally ought to have, prevented [read might have, and morally ought to have, prevented]."
- "If one party represents that he has (or will) put an oral agreement in writing, and the other party relies on this to his substantial detriment, the first party may be estopped to set up the Statute of Frauds as a defense." (Put is made to be both a past-tense and a future-tense verb.)

Cf. JANUS-FACED TERMS.

zonal; zonary. The adjective corresponding to zone is zonal in all but medical (obstetric) senses.

zonate(d). The term meaning "arranged in zones" is best made zonate rather than zonated.

zygnomic; mesonomic. These terms are the inventions of Albert Kocourek, the legal theorist and creative neologist. A zygnomic jural relation involves an act whose evolution directly abridges the freedom of the servus [= the legal person who bears a ligation (i.e., the generic term for the servient side of a jural relation—it includes duty, disability, liability, and inability)] in the enjoyment of a legal advantage. A mesonomic jural relation does not, legally speaking, directly affect a human being's natural physical freedom—yet it has legal consequences in its evolution. See Albert Kocourek, Jural Relations 69 (1927). Julius Stone summed up these NEOLOGISMS well: "Kocourek's mesonomic-zygnomic distinction is no doubt a valuable one, even if we shrink back at the neologisms." Julius Stone, Legal System and Lawyers' Reasonings 148 (1964). And who does not shrink back? It is all pure JARGON and GOBBLEDYGOOK. Still, for that very reason, it provides what some must consider a fitting conclusion to a law dictionary.
